15 May 2006 to 11 August 2006

The Northern Ireland Act 2006 made provision for Members of the Northern Ireland Assembly to meet in an Assembly.

The Act gave the Secretary of State power to refer to the Assembly the election of persons to hold the offices of First Minister and Deputy First Minister on the restoration of devolution; the nomination of persons to hold office as Northern Ireland Ministers on the restoration of devolution; and such other matters as he thought fit.

In addition, under the provisions of the Act, the Secretary of State directed that a Committee on the Preparation for Government and a Subgroup on the Economic Challenges Facing Northern Ireland be established.

This Bound Volume contains the Official Reports of all the plenary meetings of the Assembly and the meetings held by the Committee on the Preparation for Government and the Subgroup on the Economic Challenges facing Northern Ireland during the period 15 May 2006 to 11 August 2006.

THE ASSEMBLY

Monday 15 May 2006

The Assembly met at 10.30 am (Madam Speaker in the Chair).

ASSEMBLY BUSINESS

Madam Speaker: Members, please take your seats.

In accordance with the Northern Ireland Act 2006, the Secretary of State has directed that the Assembly should sit on Monday 15 May 2006 at 10.30 am to consider business as it appears in the Order Paper.

Before we proceed, I wish to read into the record some letters of appointment.

First, in a letter to me dated 9 May 2006, the Secretary of State said:

“By virtue of my powers under Paragraph 3(1)(a) of Schedule 1 to the Northern Ireland Act 2006, I hereby appoint you as Presiding Officer of the Assembly. Your appointment shall take effect from today’s date.”

Secondly, in a letter dated 11 May 2006, the Secretary of State said the following:

“I am writing to formally notify you that I have today appointed Jim Wells MLA of the Democratic Unionist Party and Francie Molloy MLA of Sinn Féin as Deputy Presiding Officers of the Assembly and have placed a Written Ministerial Statement before Parliament to this effect.”

I offer my congratulations to my two colleagues and look forward to working with them both.

Finally, Members, in a letter of intent to me dated 12 May 2006, the Secretary of State said the following:

“You will have received my letter of 11 May setting out the matters which I am referring for the first week of Assembly business.

I know from our discussions that you are fully aware of the challenges and opportunities that lie ahead and I have every hope that you will be able to oversee the rapid transition of the Assembly to full devolution. There will, of course, be obstacles to overcome and they must be overcome if MLAs are not to stand accused of perpetuating the democratic deficit which Northern Ireland has seen in recent years. But, given the bitter history of Northern Ireland, it is important that we recognise and understand the difficulties for all sides in what the Assembly is now being asked to do. No-one underestimates the challenges ahead and the divisions which remain.

If we are to heal those divisions then this must be a time to focus on what unites us. All the political parties, the British and Irish Governments and, most importantly, the people of Northern Ireland, are united in their belief that devolution and power-sharing are the only way to establish an enduring, stable future. That is why the Assembly has been recalled with the express purpose of electing a First and Deputy First Minister and forming an Executive, with the opportunity to consider issues of vital importance for their constituents. Now is the time for Northern Ireland’s politicians to shoulder this responsibility for their people’s future, as they have been elected to do; it is time to open a new chapter of stability, opportunity and restored devolution in Northern Ireland.

As I have said before, the decisions which will have to be taken are not easy ones, but history has presented us all with a decisive opportunity to move forward in the coming weeks. The tragic events of recent days have once again shown how desperately the people of Northern Ireland need a new vision for a truly shared society. I know that the promise of a better future for the young people of Northern Ireland will be uppermost in the minds of all MLAs as they approach the days ahead in a spirit of partnership and generosity.”

I have placed copies of these letters in the Assembly Library.

SILENT REFLECTION

Madam Speaker: Members will have noted that, as is the custom at the first sitting, we do not have Prayers on our Order Paper. I am, however, conscious, as we meet this morning, of the tragic death, on Monday last, of Michael McIlveen.

In recent days, I have heard expressions of sympathy made publicly and privately by Members on all sides of the House. With that in mind, I ask Members to stand and join me in observing one minute’s silent reflection.

Members observed one minute’s silence.

Roll of Membership

Madam Speaker: The next item of business on the Order Paper is the Roll of Membership. As required by Standing Order 3(a), a Member shall be regarded as having taken his or her seat only when he or she has signed the Roll of Membership. I do not therefore propose to take any points of order until after the Roll has been signed by all Members present.

I shall now explain the procedures that will be followed for the signing of the Roll. These have been discussed and agreed at meetings of the Business Committee.

In order to avoid the Chair being vacated, I will sign the Roll at the Speaker's Table, after which the Roll will be placed on the table in front of me. I shall then invite Members of the Assembly to come forward in their party groupings to sign the Roll. I will call the parties in alphabetical order by name of the party. Independent Members will be called in alphabetical order at the end.

When your party name is called, I ask Members of that party to rise in their places and proceed through the Aye Lobby on my right. Members should then come forward to sign one of the two Roll pages placed on the table in front of the Speaker's Table.

Members should enter today's date, print and sign their name, and may enter a designation of identity. I draw Members' attention to the provisions of Standing Order 3(e), regarding the designation of "Nationalist, Unionist or Other". A Member who does not register a designation of identity will be deemed to be designated "Other" for the purposes of the Standing Orders.

The process of signing the Roll will take some time, and I ask Members for their patience during this procedure.

Clerk, if I may now sign the Roll.

Madam Speaker signed the Roll of Membership as follows:

Bell, Eileen

Other

Madam Speaker: Members of the Assembly, I should like to make a brief personal statement before others sign the Roll.

I consider it a great privilege to have been appointed to hold the office of Speaker of this Assembly. In any elected body, the office of Speaker draws much of its authority and dignity from the respect and co-operation of the Members, particularly in their relationship with the Chair. I hope that I can rely on your support as I try to uphold the values of the tradition. For my part, I will do my utmost to maintain your respect for the office of Speaker, and I trust that I can count on your co-operation.

Like each of you, I have been elected to serve my constituents and, in whatever role I can play in this place, to work for the best interests of all the people of Northern Ireland. I regard that as a greater privilege, and I commit myself to assisting you to perform that task on behalf of your own constituents and the wider community.

This Assembly has been established to make preparations for the restoration of devolved Government in Northern Ireland and a fully restored Assembly. How we conduct ourselves in this Chamber, and particularly in regard to each other, will contribute to our electorate's view of our entitlement to hold office in that Assembly. That stands as both a challenge and a standard against which each one of us will be measured.

For my part, I want simply to state to you that I stand before you as a servant of the Assembly. I intend to follow the established precedent of not making political comment to the media; I intend to stand aside from party politics and to offer myself as a spokesperson for the Assembly, its collective will and particularly its secretariat, which has served us all so well.

I look forward to whatever time I will have in this position. I am indebted to you for your patience as I strive to serve you all.

We shall now proceed.

I invite Members of the Alliance Party to come forward to sign the Roll of Membership.

The following Member signed the Roll of Membership:

Madam Speaker: Finally, I invite any Member present who has not already done so to come forward to sign the Roll of Membership.

11.30 am

I thank Members for their co-operation and patience during the signing of the Roll of Membership. The Roll will be located in the Chamber during sitting days to enable any Member who has not been able to sign the Roll to do so.

Standing Order 3(a) states that my decision as to whether a Member has taken his or her seat in accordance with the Standing Order is final. I can make that decision only after scrutinising all of the entries on the Roll. I intend to make an announcement on this matter at the start of the next meeting of the Assembly.

Mr P Robinson: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. One of the other duties that you and your staff are expected to perform today is to publish a list of Members of each of the parties. Standing Orders are clear on the matter and refer to the:

They do not refer to a group or to those who are taking the whip of a particular party but to members of the party itself.

There are public indications that the Ulster Unionist Party intends that a Member for East Belfast, Mr Irvine, be a member of its group. Will you clarify the situation, either now or after you have taken counsel's opinion? There are political implications — perhaps long into the future — with this matter and as to whether it falls within the interpretation of the Standing Order that deals with being a member of a party. I understand from the constitution rules of the Ulster Unionist Party that, in order to be a member of that political party, a person cannot be a member of any other political party.

Madam Speaker: I thank Mr Robinson for his point of order. It is a serious matter and has to be looked at very carefully. I will be taking counsel and I will, hopefully, be making a ruling at tomorrow's sitting.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. Will you explain why you took the decision today to allow another Member to be incorporated under the Official Unionist banner?

Madam Speaker: I was provided with the information about party membership in accordance with Standing Order 3, and that information has been set out accurately in the published list.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. The list that we received showed:

“Progressive Unionist Party

Members (1):

Mr David Irvine”.

Madam Speaker: That list was from Thursday. An updated list was issued after we received the list from the Ulster Unionist Party Assembly Group. That list should now be in your possession.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: We never saw that list.

Madam Speaker: It was circulated this morning before 9.30 am, which is in line with convention. However, as I said to your colleague, it is a serious matter that will be looked at.

Adjourned at 11.34 am.

THE ASSEMBLY

Tuesday 16 May 2006

The Assembly met at 2.00 pm (Madam Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

Roll of Membership

Madam Speaker: In accordance with the Northern Ireland Act 2006, the Secretary of State has directed that the Assembly should sit on Tuesday 16 May 2006 at 2.00 pm to consider business as it appears on the Order Paper.

I have had an opportunity to scrutinise the entries in the Roll of Membership, and I am satisfied that all 108 Members have taken their seats in accordance with Standing Orders.

Regarding designations of identity, six Members entered designations that I have deemed to be "Other" for the purposes of Standing Orders. Members will find details of the designations in the minutes of proceedings for yesterday's sitting.

At the end of yesterday's sitting, a matter was raised as a point of order, and I agreed to give it careful consideration. I am currently seeking advice from Speaker's counsel, and I shall report back to the House when I have had the opportunity to consider the matter fully.

Mr Robert McCartney: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Before the business of this body commences, I wish to make a point of order on the status of this body and you as its appointed Speaker. The media in general, and the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC) in particular, continue to refer to this body as "the Assembly". That has caused widespread public confusion, which should be removed.

Madam Speaker, you are aware that this is not the Assembly to which Members were elected in November 2003: it is simply a body that the Secretary of State has invited the Members then elected to attend.

Madam Speaker: Thank you, Mr McCartney. Can I stop you there? According to the Northern Ireland Act 2006, this is "the Assembly". It is not the Northern Ireland Assembly and will not be the Northern Ireland Assembly until we restore full devolution. I was appointed by the Secretary of State, as were the two Deputy Speakers, under the Act, which is at the direction of the Secretary of State. All Assembly business is at the direction of the Secretary of State.

Mr Robert McCartney: Perhaps, Madam Speaker, you would permit me to finish my point of order. The Assembly, or this body, like Parliament, Congress or the French National Assembly, elects its Speaker to determine the Standing Orders for the conduct of business and the nature of the business to be debated. None of that applies to this body, convocation or assembly, however it may be described. You, Madam Speaker, were nominated by the Secretary of State, and, as you rightly say, the Secretary of State describes how business is to be conducted because he determines and amends, on a daily basis, the Standing Orders. He also determines what the business is to be. Now you, Madam Speaker, I believe unwittingly, said yesterday that you were the servant —

Madam Speaker: Mr McCartney, have you a question?

Mr Robert McCartney: Yes, but I have to frame it.

Madam Speaker: I have to say that your information so far has been quite inaccurate. As I said before, this is "the Assembly" and it is at the direction of the Secretary of State. All business must first be agreed in the Business Committee; it then goes to the Secretary of State, and an Order Paper comes back. That is the way it is. Unfortunately, until we get restored devolution that is the way it will remain.

Mr Robert McCartney: Madam Speaker, with respect, that may be the case. However, yesterday you declared that you were, and hoped to be, the servant of this Assembly. Since the New Testament was published:

"No man can serve two masters".

Which is to be your master, Madam Speaker?

Madam Speaker: Order. After my appointment by the Secretary of State, I asked, in my personal statement, that Members realise that I am here as their servant. I hope that when we get full devolution we can look at the matter and, if necessary, elect a Speaker as you suggest. I think that we have had enough of that point of order.

SECRETARY OF STATE MOTION

Economic Challenges and Proposed Working Group

Madam Speaker: I wish to advise that the motion was referred to the Assembly by the Secretary of State and is not subject to amendment. The Business Committee has agreed that a minimum of two hours be set aside for the debate. The Committee also agreed that the first round of speeches should be limited to 10 minutes, with subsequent Members being allowed five minutes. I intend to send a copy of the Official Report of the debate to the Secretary of State.

Motion made:

That the Assembly considers the economic challenges facing Northern Ireland, in the context of both the UK and all island economies, to be a key priority for a restored Executive and calls on the Business Committee to take forward establishing a working group on this issue to make recommendations to a restored Executive. — [The Secretary of State.]

Mr Simpson: It is fitting that we discuss the Northern Ireland economy after this morning's presentation from the Northern Ireland Business Alliance. I put on record my appreciation of those who gave it. It was informative.

Like so many people, families and communities, Northern Ireland's entire economic fabric was targeted for destruction by terrorists. When the IRA gave its stand-down order last year, it claimed that on every front where it had visited death and destruction, it was, and I quote, "entirely legitimate".

Those who gave their unqualified support to that claim must convince us that they now have a true concern for our economic well-being. One of the first duties of an Administration is to advance its country's economy. Ongoing criminality means that Northern Ireland is still denied devolution in which local economic affairs are administered by locally accountable representatives. However, it is my hope that others will embrace democracy and that we shall have it.

The absence of full devolution should not inhibit direct rule Ministers from exercising their powers to do what is right by Northern Ireland's economy — and there is much to do. Northern Ireland has enjoyed steady economic growth, with employment at an all-time high. However, our manufacturing base is eroding steadily, basic business costs are on the up, and reliance on the public sector remains dangerously high.

We need to find ways to diminish or even eradicate those elements that are a cause for concern and ensure that any economic indicator points in the right direction. Any future Executive must grapple with eight key foundations to encourage and underpin economic growth. These are a reduction in red tape and regulation; a concentration on skills development; an enhanced infrastructure; an improved planning process; lower business costs; a more attractive taxation system; reform of Invest Northern Ireland; and an efficient Government. If ever there were unnecessary intrusion of politics into business, it is in the expansion of business-based bureaucracy.

A priority for any future local Administration should be the unravelling of as much Government-generated red tape as it can. Businesses should be set free and allowed to get on with their work. Our economy lacks the required skills in many sectors, and that is not helped by high levels of economically inactive people. Business and Government need to combine to bring the right people with the right skills through the education system.

A proper partnership between an Executive, business and the individuals themselves is required to tool our economy for an increasingly competitive and cut-throat global economy. My party is consistent in calling for any future economic package to be ploughed into enhancing our ailing infrastructure. Thirty years of terrorism have deprived our roads, water and sewerage systems of much needed funds. Business would benefit as much as the general population from a better infrastructure.

Too many potential new investors or existing companies with an eye to expansion are put off by our cumbersome and constricting planning laws and procedures. An overhaul of the planning process could assist business growth immensely. Increased energy, insurance and fuel costs and new costs such as industrial rates deter growth and even discourage many from continuing to operate in this country.

Some of those costs are the Government's direct responsibility. The Government must strike the right balance between making business a financial contribution to the economy and ensuring that business retains its competitive edge. My party and I have pressed the Government hard on reducing our corporation tax rate, and some months ago I secured an Adjournment debate on that subject in the House of Commons. Some progress was made with the then Minister with responsibility for Enterprise, Trade and Investment, and I hope to take this up soon with her replacement.

In our competition with the South — and let us not forget that the South is our economic competitor — corporation tax is the main and crucial difference. A rate of corporation tax lower than that of the Republic could increase the overall tax take as existing companies expand and new ones enter Northern Ireland. If that is too unpalatable for the Government, then we need to examine the possibility of bringing about a cocktail of measures that has the same net effect of lower overall tax for businesses.

Mr Burnside: I thank the Member for giving way. Does he agree that there will be a major problem in getting a reduction of corporation tax in Northern Ireland with the continuing joint administration between the British Government, the Northern Ireland Office and the Southern Irish Government?

It is highly unlikely that the South of Ireland that he refers to as our competitor will allow us to introduce a more incentive-based corporation tax system in Northern Ireland than exists in the Republic.

2.15 pm

Mr Simpson: I do not think that we should have that defeatist attitude, but I see where the Member is coming from. I accept that it will be difficult, but through a cocktail of funding we may be able to get to the level that we require.

Madam Speaker: I would be grateful if the Member could address his remarks through the Chair.

Mr Simpson: That is not a problem, Madam Speaker, and I apologise. I will ensure that I keep looking in this direction.

Mr S Wilson: A very pleasant view it is too.

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr Simpson: Madam Speaker, you will notice that I did not say that.

Reform of Invest Northern Ireland is also required, but equally important is a refocus of its work. Instead of concentrating on micro businesses that merely redistribute wealth or looking into the world for solutions to all our economic ills, let us make the most of what we have, sell it well, and assist it to the full instead of chasing pipe dreams.

Any future Executive should make efficiencies in its own structures. Efficiency does not necessarily equate to job losses in the public sector, but there should be a realisation and recognition that we can no longer rely on the public sector to drive Northern Ireland. Progress on those issues is absolutely essential if Northern Ireland's economy is to lead in the right direction. However, I caution everyone not to fall into the trap of thinking that the Assembly is the answer to everything, given that we are as susceptible to global economic trends as every other economy.

Government must fix what is wrong instead of pursuing their fascination with fads and fantasies such as an all-Ireland economy. The motion is interesting, however, in that it refers to the UK economy, recognising our place there, and simply to an all-island economy, recognising the existence of two jurisdictions. Perhaps we could help our Southern neighbour and use the gravitational pull of the much larger UK economy to drag the South closer to the United Kingdom. We wish for good relations with our nearest neighbour. We are willing to co-operate if there are clear lines of self-interest for Northern Ireland, but the economic and financial cake is far greater and the benefits far larger.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: Does my hon Friend remember that the South of Ireland benefited by £5 million a day for a number of years from the European fund? If Mr Simpson gave me that for Northern Ireland, I, too, could have a tiger machinery for business — the Celtic tiger — I am sorry, I missed its nationality.

Mr Simpson: I do not know whether to comment on that, Madam Speaker. A debate will soon take place in the Province on whether the Celtic tiger is sustainable, so it will be interesting to hear the outcome of that. To concentrate exclusively on an all-Ireland economy might do well for a tree-hugger but not in the real world.

Madam Speaker: I remind the Member that his time is drawing near. [Laughter.] Time is short, Mr Simpson.

Mr Simpson: I am nearly finished. We have had many advantages that have often been overlooked, not least our inherent spirit of entrepreneurship. Government should work alongside business and not against it. That can become the challenge that faces us to start us on our way to a brighter economic country.

Sir Reg Empey: In recent years, an element of complacency has entered into the treatment of our economy. This is partly due to the fact that we have been consistently producing low unemployment figures that are very appealing on the surface and look as though we are, in fact, making progress, but they hide a number of underlying weaknesses.

No regional economy, such as our own, is isolated from the real world. We are well aware of that. In Northern Ireland, to some extent, we live in a public expenditure bubble, which is relatively high. However, many would argue that it is entirely consistent with our needs. Nevertheless, our entrepreneurial private sector is much smaller than those in other regions of the United Kingdom and, indeed, further afield.

We must highlight, therefore, that, although the surface level of unemployment appears low, it disguises the fact that there are skills shortages and that we are bringing in foreign labour. Many manufacturing plants in Northern Ireland are dominated by labour from other parts of the European Union or from further afield. It disguises also the fact that there are still large numbers of people who do not have fulfilling and worthwhile jobs. Although that situation is, to some extent, disguised by events, it is an underlying fact that must be taken into account.

Just as our politics and society need devolution, it is important to note that the experiences in Scotland and Wales have shown that those regional economies, which face similar challenges to our economy, have benefited from local Ministers and devolved institutions.

Mr Burnside: Does the Member agree also that the advantages of devolution in those two parts of the United Kingdom — Scotland and Wales — have been based on coalition Government, agreed voluntarily by democratically elected parties? Is today not a fine example of how the democratic parties here could move ahead to form a voluntary coalition?

Sir Reg Empey: The Member makes a valid point. Indeed, one hopes the day will come when that is exactly how Governments are formed here — if we have them. However, not only have the devolved Administrations in Scotland and Wales delivered coherent economic strategies, related education and skills policies to economic needs, and worked in partnership with the business and trade union sectors, they have used UK, European and international platforms to talk up their regional economies. Indeed, even though they do not have devolution, regions in the north-east and north-west of England have developed elaborate skills policies and have been trying to retain their young graduates so that they can reduce the brain drain.

As Northern Ireland's business community knows, the contrast between the performance of devolution in other parts of the UK and our direct rule Administration is inevitably stark and obvious. Clearly, Northern Ireland used to be the odd man out in the UK, as the only area with devolution. Now, the situation has turned around, and we are the odd man out because we no longer have devolution. Although we should not exaggerate what devolution can do, it can make a contribution.

Recognising the key role of the manufacturing sector must be fundamental to the economic vision of any future devolved Administration in Northern Ireland. Again, the lead given by the Scottish and Welsh devolved Administrations offers a model for us in this part of the UK. Scotland's manufacturing strategy, entitled 'Created in Scotland', and the Welsh manufacturing forum are evidence of a genuine commitment to a dynamic future for the sector in those regions.

While the Scottish Executive have given a commitment to keep business rates competitive, alongside a small business rates relief scheme, Northern Ireland's manufacturers are, of course, facing the imminent end of industrial derating. This historical concession predated our entry into the EU. Thereby, it was not contrary to EU competition laws. Now, manufacturers will be disadvantaged because of Northern Ireland's differences and because of the fact that our energy costs, which were the quid pro quo promised to the manufacturing sector if rates were introduced, have not been reduced. The commitment of £200 million made by Minister Pearson in September 2003 to offset the cost to industry has not been followed through as envisaged.

Consequently, the manufacturing sector is facing the double whammy of increasing rates and energy costs and, of course, transport costs.

This Assembly ought to be able to address that fundamental issue. The manufacturing sector has convincingly demonstrated that the Administration's present policy could cost the Northern Ireland economy job opportunities.

The hon Member for North Antrim, Dr Paisley, made the point about aid to the Republic — I believe it was called the cohesion fund, and it was available to only four countries in the European Union — which has given them an enormous boost, but in fairness they have gone further and identified their next target area, namely fourth-level education. When we were dismantling our technical school and college education, they introduced it, and that provided a flow of labour qualified to meet the needs of industry. A local Administration could tailor policies to the needs of local businesses.

Ensuring that our workforce has the skills to compete in the knowledge-based economy of the twenty-first century must be a priority. Whether it is ensuring that our higher education institutions and colleges are attuned to the needs of our economy, or addressing the scandal of poor literacy and numeracy skills among our school-leavers, any economic vision for Northern Ireland will be mere words unless small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs) and multinationals have access to a skilled labour market.

The hon Member for Upper Bann, Mr David Simpson, mentioned regulation. Attempts have been made to reduce regulation but, sadly, much of it derives from European Union legislation, to which our national Government sign up without necessarily understanding the downstream consequences — and they certainly do not have to meet the downstream costs.

Mr S Wilson: Does the Member accept that when we sign up to EU directives we "gold-plate" the regulations, thus making them far more severe in this part of Europe than in other parts? Perhaps that is what we should be addressing.

Sir Reg Empey: That is a valid point. It is often said that a seven-page document from Brussels comes out of a Whitehall Department as a 70-page document. We seem to be excessively rigorous in the enforcement of these measures.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I am sure that the Member is aware of the recent report titled, 'Investing in Regeneration, Unlocking the Belfast Opportunity'. It makes a salient point about the problem of over-regulation, which the Member has touched on. However, it also states that in 2004 in excess of £1 billion was taken away from local investment in Northern Ireland and put into GB, principally because regulation here was preventing the entrepreneurial spirit from flourishing.

Sir Reg Empey: I agree that there has been a significant and proud tradition of innovation and entrepreneurial skills in this part of the United Kingdom. Somehow we seem to have moved away from that. At this morning's presentation, Mr Paisley Jnr referred to the paintings of industrial scenes in the Senate Chamber, and that is very poignant. A local devolved Administration could contribute to encouraging the restoration of such industry. Of course, that cannot be achieved without the link to education at basic, further and higher levels.

We should not ignore the challenges, but nor should we fail to recognise the potential of the innovative approaches that our colleagues in the rest of the United Kingdom have taken. Devolution can mean the end of complacency and the beginning of a new, dynamic, nimble and agile approach — an expression that was used in this morning's presentation. I commend those ideas to Members.

Dr Farren: The SDLP supports the general terms of this motion. We accept that, as we prepare for devolution, we need to examine not just how we can modernise and develop the economy of Northern Ireland on its own, but how we must do so bearing in mind the opportunities offered by a joint approach to Ireland-wide economic development, as well as the opportunities that exist in the wider EU and global contexts.

I stress the SDLP's outward-looking approach, because of frequent accusations that we are fixated on looking inward or southward and have no regard to other dimensions and contexts — the SDLP recognises the global nature of the economy in which we live.

2.30 pm

The SDLP's objectives include maximising the economic potential of the whole island through a joint approach to planning and delivering infrastructure developments in roads, transport, energy supply, telecommunications, health, education and many other services where it makes sense to do so and where, in the words of the Good Friday Agreement, such developments would be to the "mutual benefit" of communities in both parts of the country. As has often been stated recently, those opportunities have never been better. At current estimates, over £100 billion will be spent over the next decade on basic infrastructure, North and South.

The distance we must travel in order to become a more successful economy can be measured in the gap between two major investments announced just three months ago: one for an enlarged retail development in east Belfast and the other for a pharmaceutical enterprise near Cork. Each promises around 400 new jobs, but there the similarities end.

The investment in east Belfast — welcome as it is — promises jobs at the lower end of the skills range; many are part time and many are at the lower end of the wage scale. In contrast, 80% of the jobs at the pharmaceutical enterprise in Cork, announced in the same week, will be for highly qualified and skilled graduates. When did we last have such investments? It is very hard to recall, because they have been few and far between.

To reach the point where the norm is investment offering many more opportunities for highly skilled, well-paid technicians and graduates, where those investments challenge our universities and institutes of further and higher education to produce a workforce capable of servicing technologically and intellectually challenging employment and where research and development increases from its current very low levels, needs a much more concerted and comprehensive approach than at present.

That approach must be supported by new fiscal and other incentives that put us on a more level playing pitch with the South's headline-grabbing 12.5% corporation tax and with the many other economies emerging in central and eastern Europe. Those economies are liable to attract much of the mobile international investment, if we are not able to match the incentives that they offer.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Although I welcome and acknowledge that our neighbour's economy is doing extremely well, does Dr Farren accept that Northern Ireland's economy was blighted and stymied for years by gunmen and gangsters, who carried out the most vicious campaign of terror against the economy to wreck this country, to wreck investment and to wreck stability — and all in the name of Ireland? Does he thoroughly oppose that?

Dr Farren: Not only the effects of the troubles, but the failures to develop sustained partnership arrangements within this institution and to sustain the North/South institutions established by the Good Friday Agreement have continued to inhibit the development of the economy. The SDLP is working to ensure that all institutions are restored, so that we can ensure that the economy moves forward in the way that we all want.

To return to my theme, incentives alone will not be sufficient to enable us to move the economy forward in a step change. Underlying the success that we have seen in the South, there has been a strong social partnership with real buy-in from all of the key partners: trade unions; the voluntary sector; and business. This partnership has been in existence for well over 15 years, and it has given a high degree of stability — both political and social — to the South's economy.

Therefore, if we are to move from a public sector-dependent economy to one that has a greater reliance on wealth creation, we will not do so over the heads of the social partners. We also need a similar strong social partnership. I do not believe that the Economic Development Forum (EDF) as it is presently constructed — representative and all that it is — is the best forum for ensuring the kind of objectives that I believe need to be set for a real vibrant social partnership.

In such a partnership, poverty elimination stands side by side with wealth creation and greater productivity as common targets. The delivery of quality public services is a common concern. Equality and fair treatment of all workers — whatever their origin or background — are guaranteed. The delivery of such a social partnership requires the leadership that a return to devolution, to the North/South Ministerial Council and to all the other elements of the Good Friday Agreement alone can provide.

While the SDLP supports the motion of creating a working party as a necessary means of preparing for devolution, it is no substitute for devolution. The sooner that we can move towards achieving that aim, the better it will be — not just for our politics but also for our economy.

Mr Neeson: Madam Speaker, I welcome the debate. However, may I say that for months my colleagues in the Alliance Party have been trying to persuade the Secretary of State to set up an economic forum involving elected members of the Assembly. The economy is an issue that has gained consensus across all the political parties, and I am pleased that over recent weeks I have shared a cross-party platform on matters relating to the economy.

The modern economy is very complex. We have the whole issue of globalisation. Who would have thought that we would see such development in the likes of China and India as we have seen in recent times? We are also dealing with issues relating to the enlargement of the European Union, and in Northern Ireland we are in a unique situation in which our nearest neighbour is dealing in a different currency. Therefore, there are a lot of challenges to deal with, but there is also a great number of opportunities. It is also worth saying that society is changing rapidly, and I suggest that in every decade over recent times there has been a new industrial revolution. That is a challenge for us all to meet.

Following on from this morning's meeting with the business sector, an important factor to consider is that in many ways it is up to us to create the climate in which we can move from a public-sector economy to a private-sector economy. An important issue in relation to that is for us to provide the necessary joined-up government.

I pose this question to Members: was the artificial creation of 10 Departments helpful to moving forward the economy? We must deal with that issue. When we had the Review of Public Administration (RPA), the Departments should have been reviewed at the same time.

It is important that we realise the problems that businesses face daily due to lack of co-operation among various Departments. We have been dealing with planning, which is one of the big issues. Other Members — Sammy Wilson in particular — and I have been working on planning, which is one area that must be investigated.

We have discussed corporation tax, particularly when compared with the lower levels in the Republic of Ireland. I know that I will not receive universal support in the Chamber, but I still believe that this Assembly should request tax-varying powers. Those powers could allow us to deal with the issue of corporation tax, as well as a number of other public issues. We have seen how the Scottish Parliament has successfully reformed services as a result of its having tax-varying powers.

Mr S Wilson: Does the Member agree that the tax burden increased when the Scottish Parliament got its hands on tax-varying powers? That seems to be at odds with the argument being made that we should try to encourage the private sector to invest in Northern Ireland, because we know that higher taxation and private-sector investment are not compatible. Higher taxation will tend to discourage the private sector from investing here.

Mr Neeson: I certainly believe that if we are to move forward the economy, we must find some way to bring about the necessary fiscal reform. The issue of tax-varying powers should be considered.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Although it is an enchanting argument that we should have a different rate of corporation tax — I understand how attractive that would be to various businesses — will the Member respond to these two points?

First, does the Member think that a different rate of corporation tax will help to create the 141,000 jobs that we need in Northern Ireland before 2015?

Secondly, if we get tax-varying powers, does he accept that the British Government will ask for a quid pro quo, which could involve putting the Barnett formula on the table? To do so would unravel a very beneficial formula that provides us with the rest of our subvention.

Mr Neeson: As we found out from this morning's discussions, there is more than one issue. We must develop an entire package of reforms in order to create the climate in which the economy can move forward.

In fact, the DUP, along with the other parties, met the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, Peter Hain, to discuss industrial derating. The purpose of industrial derating was to allow Northern Ireland to compete with the lower rates of corporation tax in the Republic of Ireland. At least some consensus exists. It is important, however, that we develop a package of reforms.

I am also concerned about the amount of investment that is being taken out of Northern Ireland, because of the complex situation here, and invested in other parts of the UK. If I may say so, considerable investment is going to the Republic of Ireland as well. That issue must be dealt with. If we are to create the 141,000 jobs to which Ian Paisley Jnr referred, there must be reform.

Investment in research and development was highlighted this morning. The small-business sector is important, so we should acknowledge one of the biggest problems, which is the fact that 89% of those currently employed in the private sector work for companies that employ 10 or fewer people. That issue must be addressed.

I also hope that the Assembly will get the opportunity to deal with the reform of the education system. It is important that the education system that we develop recognises and acknowledges the needs of modern society and business. When Nortel was expanding some years ago, the local further education colleges provided courses to develop the skills necessary for it. The education system should recognise the needs of business and the economy.

2.45 pm

Apart from Ian Paisley Jnr no one mentioned tourism this morning. It is an important element of the modern Northern Ireland economy, and we can see it expanding throughout Northern Ireland not only yearly, but daily. Tourism must be provided with the necessary facilities to expand. Finally, Madam Speaker —

Mrs D Dodds: Will the Member give way?

Mr Neeson: Yes.

Mrs D Dodds: Tourism is vital to the economy and could form part of a new vision for the economy in Northern Ireland. The Member also referred to the reform of the 10 artificial Government Departments. We also need to look at the creation of the artificial cross-border bodies that deal specifically with tourism. Northern Ireland pays twice as much to Tourism Ireland — over £22 million a year — as it invests in tourism in Northern Ireland. The Northern Ireland Tourist Board announced five signature projects, but the one for Belfast has no central Government funding promised for it and is proceeding with an application to the Big Lottery Fund. Tourism can advance Northern Ireland — [Interruption.]

I hope that the Member agrees that not only is tourism important but that the cross-border bodies are also important.

Mr Neeson: I appreciate that very much, but —

Madam Speaker: I am sorry, Mr Neeson, but your time is up.

Mr Robert McCartney: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Unless the Chair limits interventions, Members will not give way, since the time spent on an intervention comes off their speaking time.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Madam Speaker: Order. Members must limit their own interventions.

Mr N Dodds: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. There would be merit in considering the procedure in the House of Commons: if a Member intervenes in a time-limited speech, an extra minute or so is added for each intervention, with a maximum of two interventions allowed. It is then up to the Member to decide whether they wish to give way, and if they do they are not penalised for that.

Madam Speaker: Thank you, Mr Dodds. We will certainly consider that at the next meeting of the Business Committee.

Mr Newton: This morning's meeting underpinned the importance of this debate. I am sure that most Members would agree that real peace in Northern Ireland, if we ever get it, would have to be underpinned by economic prosperity. However, underpinning any successful Western economy these days is the necessity for everyone of working age at all levels to attain skills and knowledge. I would like to consider briefly three areas that require understanding and attention to deliver a highly skilled workforce: the background to skills development; skills in the context of industry's needs; and the development of entrepreneurial skills.

Under the Industrial Training Act (Northern Ireland) 1964, Northern Ireland once had a vocational training programme that was the envy of Europe. Statutory training boards covered all major sectors of industry, and the government training centres provided excellence in basic training for those undertaking apprenticeships. That is no longer the case; that system of training was demolished by a Conservative Government.

Recognising the need to move away from what were purely voluntary arrangements for vocational job training, the Government have seen fit to develop an infrastructure referred to as the Sector Skills Development Agency (SSDA). The recent formation of the SSDA — and, coming from that, the Sector Skills Councils — is a welcome move. While they go some way to meeting industry's needs, they do not completely fill the gap left by the closure of all but one of the statutory boards. The recruitment by employers of eastern European labour to meet skills shortages evidences that.

The UK-wide Sector Skills Councils are currently establishing their presence in Northern Ireland, and the type of provision varies from industry to industry. In order to ensure that the sector skills requirements are met, each council is developing an agreement for its sector. It is fundamentally important that those agreements, developed as they are within a UK-wide framework, are resourced and placed in the context of Northern Ireland industry.

The Government's recent programme of job-training provision, Jobskills, was described as one of the worst initiatives the Public Accounts Committee had ever examined. The poor ethos, delivery and standard of this £500 million programme must never be repeated. It let down the business community. It created poor morale among many trainees and within the bodies that delivered the programme.

Embedded in the Jobskills programme was the modern apprenticeship training programme. The scheme did few favours to our brightest young people who wanted to embark on vocational training as engineers, electricians or plumbers, with many leaving the programme without qualifying. The replacement programmes, as Jobskills is under review, must offer those who want to "serve their time" — our future technicians and technologists — training of the highest quality, based on real jobs, rather than just training places. The young people who take up apprenticeships need good guidance when they are ready to make a career choice. They also need to know that there is a career path in their chosen occupation. Let us remember that many of Northern Ireland's leading businessmen started their careers as apprentices.

The business community needs assurances from Government agencies that a well-trained, educated labour force will be available to meet identified needs. The economy demands a joined-up skills strategy.

In its document 'The Skills Strategy for Northern Ireland: A Programme for Implementation', the Department for Employment and Learning (DEL) identified three different types of skills. First, there are the essential skills of literacy and numeracy and, increasingly, information and communications technology. It is sad that in my constituency 17,000 people have difficulty with reading and writing. Secondly, DEL identifies employability skills to enable young people to learn to work as part of a team and to undertake problem-solving exercises. Finally, perhaps the most important from the economic perspective, there are the work-based skills, specific to a particular occupation or sector.

The document sets out how DEL will take those proposals forward in partnership with employers and their representative bodies —

Madam Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr Newton: Madam Speaker, if I could just finish —

Madam Speaker: I am afraid that the Member's time is up.

Dr Birnie: Why should we debate this motion? Well, economic policy is a classic example of how direct rule is not working. There has, first, been pervasive delay in the making of policy. In February 2005, the Northern Ireland Office published 'Economic Vision for Northern Ireland'. That document stated that it would be followed in autumn 2005 by a joined-up economic strategy for all the Northern Ireland Departments. Autumn came, then winter; now we are in summer 2006, and there is still no economic strategy.

Of course, our Secretary of State loves to chide MLAs for supposedly not doing their assigned jobs. It is worse than that, however. Economic policy under direct rule has shown signs of irrationality. When a new policy is introduced, it must be benchmarked by looking at what was done before to see what worked and what did not work. Unfortunately the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment and the other Departments have not been doing that under direct rule.

'Economic Vision for Northern Ireland' was published last year with much heralding. It outlined two major targets to test and evaluate economic improvement: first, raising the productivity of people at work; and secondly, raising the proportion of the population in work. There is no quarrel with the objectives; they are sensible. It should always be remembered that some people argue that up to 500,000 people here live in relative poverty. Surely it would have been sensible, before or during the introduction of 'Economic Vision for Northern Ireland', to ask what had become of what was still, at that point, Northern Ireland's economic strategy, 'Strategy 2010', which was published in 1999. Some Members may remember it.

It seems that 'Strategy 2010', like so many others policies, be they in education or in health, has been consigned to that great dustbin of policy documents as if it were some redundant plan that Stalinist Russia threw out. We have never been told whether the policy was working. Did it realise its targets, of which there were 10? In about half of the targets — for example, gross domestic product per head here; wages here relative to those in Great Britain; new-firm creation; R&D spending; and possibly export levels and high-technology structure of industry — Northern Ireland was either falling behind Great Britain or was doing no better than keeping pace. One economic strategy was failing, but the direct rule Minister simply pulled another one, like the proverbial rabbit, out of the hat. That is not rational policy-making.

The motion, which the Secretary of State has handed down to us in a non-amendable form, refers to the Northern Ireland and Republic of Ireland economies. The Ulster Unionist Party is not afraid of soundly-based, mutually beneficial, democratically accountable co-operation, but we must ask for some economic realism. The Northern Ireland and Republic of Ireland economies are already well integrated. That was recognised in a report this spring by the Irish Business and Employers' Confederation, which is the Republic of Ireland's equivalent of the CBI. The report showed that the flow of road traffic across the Irish border every day is the same as that between England and Scotland. Members may say, "So what?" The combined population of England and Scotland is 10 times that of Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland. That statistic hardly suggests that the two Irish economies lack economic integration.

"People of the same trade seldom meet together, even for merriment and diversion, but the conversation ends in a conspiracy against the public".

That was written in the eighteenth century by Adam Smith, the founder of economics. I would not apply that quotation to the Northern Ireland Business Alliance and what they said this morning, but there are two necessary points of caution. We must sift business proposals, because not all are for the general social good, and different business leaders suggest different things, such as calling for a change in the rate of corporation tax or for tax allowances.

Mr Dallat: Madam Speaker, this debate comes three and a half years late — certainly too late for the 400 people in the Coleraine area who have lost their jobs in the past 10 weeks.

There have been redundancies and threats of redundancies across the North.

3.00 pm

Mr Poots: Will the Member give way?

Mr Dallat: No, I have only five minutes.

We can expect more redundancies when industrial derating changes rise above 25%. Sadly, many of those jobs will be lost in the most disadvantaged areas of the North. If the economy is to prosper and the haemorrhaging of the population is to stop, unconditional power sharing must be restored. If it is not, the situation will become worse. Indeed, the North/South bodies must be taken off care and maintenance, and the political trips to Killarney must cease to be one-day wonders. Personally, I fancy Kinsale.

Since this Assembly met last, the agricultural industry has gone into rapid decline, with thousands of farmers losing their livelihoods. The textile industry has been decimated, and many more jobs in call centres and in the engineering and electronics sectors have gone abroad. Our skills shortage, which has been referred to several times, is a serious problem.

Madam Speaker: Members, the chatting that is going on means that it is becoming hard to hear the Member who is speaking.

Mr Dallat: I can cope with it, Madam Speaker. It is not a problem.

In the North of Ireland, 250,000 people are experiencing the skills shortage that Sir Reg Empey spoke so eloquently about earlier. That is a problem for this Assembly. Mind you, judging by the rapport across the Floor, I am not so sure.

Commitments to decentralise the Civil Service must be made to catalyse the regeneration of the economies of our towns across the North.

Mr Hussey: Will the Member give way to a fellow westerner?

Mr Dallat: I have already said that I will not give way.

The 19% rise in regional rates has left many businesses reeling, with no idea how they will absorb this hike now that competition from the multinationals is at an all-time high.

As a direct result of the Review of Public Administration, many people in local councils will lose their jobs. Again, no one has outlined how those jobs will be replaced. For the past three-and-a-half years, there has been no Public Accounts Committee to investigate fraud and to query the way in which civil servants spend public money. That is totally irresponsible. If a working party is to be set up to consider the economic challenges facing Northern Ireland, it must be understood clearly that it is time-limited and cannot be viewed as part of an ongoing shadow Assembly. The SDLP will play no part in that and expects full devolution to be delivered before the deadline set by the two Governments.

We must mark today as a milestone from which there is no turning back. No u-turns, no somersaults, no side deals — only a genuine desire to earn our money by working for this generation and for future generations. Perhaps it is unwise to dream, but I have a vision of a future where there is no bitterness — such as that which I have experienced across the Chamber — and no desire to do people down because they are different or hold political views that are at odds with others. Is it too much to expect that division can be replaced by diversity; that hope will replace hopelessness; and that a new vision will overcome the darkness of the past, which left everyone blind? I thank those Members who had the courtesy to listen to me.

Mrs I Robinson: My contribution is unashamedly parochial. Over the past 10 years, the constituency of Strangford has witnessed a colossal downturn in its indigenous manufacturing industries. The promised peace dividend has not materialised. Industries and businesses, which have formed the foundation of the local economy, are declining and disappearing at an alarming rate.

The cumulative effect of the demise of Harland and Wolff; the job losses from Bombardier Shorts, TK-ECC in Dundonald and the textile industry; and the decline in the fishing industry has been to rob the area of its traditional employment base. At the same time, however, Government has sought proactively to ignore that fact and to avoid, as much as possible, marketing the Strangford and east Belfast area as a location suitable for inward investment.

If 5,000 jobs had been lost in constituencies such as West Belfast or Foyle, there would have been a markedly different response from the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment. Instead, there seems to be a fundamental unwillingness to develop a strategic approach to the crisis.

It is as if, when investors fly into Northern Ireland's capital, there is a "No Left Turn" sign at the exit from Belfast City Airport. Instead the Department seems more concerned with rerouting investment to nationalist areas of the Province, at the continued expense of areas such as Strangford.

I wish to make it clear that I have no difficulty with nationalist areas attracting new investment, but I do object to an uneven playing field and the institutional discrimination practised against my constituency and others in the east of the Province. One wonders what must happen in my constituency before the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment sits up, takes notice and acts to deal with the crisis.

The inherent danger associated with the continuing decline of our traditional industries is that we are not only losing jobs but witnessing the removal of opportunities for future employment, and skills development and retention. As the manufacturing base continues to shrink there are an ever-decreasing number of opportunities for those with relevant skills. Some TK-ECC employees came from industries that had closed down, such as the textile firm in Newtownards and mid-Down.

Mr Trimble: Is it not a rather old-fashioned view of the economy to keep harping on about manufacturing industry when the most profitable forms of industry are tradable services? These are growing significantly in Northern Ireland and the level of profit is much greater than in traditional manufacturing industries, where we cannot hope to compete with cheap metal-bashing in the East.

Mrs I Robinson: You may say that, but I could not possibly comment. I feel that every job is important.

Mr P Robinson: And every sector.

Mrs I Robinson: And every sector. Thank you for that prompt.

Every time a factory closes, opportunities for employment are removed.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: Your husband is helpful.

Mrs I Robinson: Sometimes.

If action is not taken to address the situation, the local manufacturing industry will be consigned to the pages of the history books. Mr Trimble seems keen for that to happen.

The TK-ECC situation also illustrates the fragility and uncertainty that comes with new jobs that are not anchored in Northern Ireland and which can easily be transferred to sites outside Northern Ireland and the rest of the United Kingdom. It did not go bankrupt; it was simply axed by its parent company. A company, therefore, can come to Northern Ireland, take advantage of generous Government grants, and subsequently up sticks as soon as the benefit has been obtained. With so much being made of the growth in call centres, one only has to look to the Prudential to see that job security in this sector is all but non-existent.

Invest Northern Ireland holds 917 acres of unused industrial zoned land across the Province, of which 8.6 acres lies in the Strangford constituency — less than 1% of the total. The Government need to look at equality in this respect.

Madam Speaker: I remind Members to address their comments through the Chair.

Mr K Robinson: Members have referred to the fragile condition of our once-thriving manufacturing industry — and I say that in its widest sense, not its traditional sense — and the adverse impact of derating changes on the viability of many of our firms. Across the UK, the manufacturing sector is perilously small at 15%, compared with our competitors in Germany, where it is over 30%.

In the process of downsizing we have lost 500,000 jobs across the UK, but at the same time this Government have created over one million public sector posts. Daily we are assailed by the Northern Ireland Office, the local arm of the Labour Government who have created these public sector jobs, and told that we must correct the problem. They are the people who have caused the problem over the last 30 years.

Our local manufacturing sector has been halved over that period, with a further 18,000 jobs predicted to disappear over the next decade. Our wealth-creating base has been systematically reduced until it is now almost non-existent. Simultaneously, there is the spectacle of venture capital flowing out of Northern Ireland, often to fund developments elsewhere, and yet many patents created by research and development projects within our universities are still unexploited, mostly through lack of finance.

Those findings, if properly harnessed and financed in a co-ordinated and coherent manner, could provide a platform from which to launch new businesses. If clear links could be developed between those university projects, available venture capital and a focused skills training programme for our workforce, the potential would exist to achieve something worthwhile for our economy.

Many of the vital components required to build a vibrant, successful economy, which increasingly moves from the comfort zone of the public sector and confidently embraces an expanding, adequately financed, sector-focused private enterprise model are already in place. The future co-ordination of efforts between the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment and the Department for Employment and Learning, together with the expertise of Invest Northern Ireland, must be seamless. No longer can any vestiges of the silo mentality be tolerated. Equally, those elements within the private sector must move away from lecturing and hectoring mode and instead work in conjunction, providing real vision, entrepreneurial drive and a determination, along with politicians, to lead this community forward into a vibrant and economically stable future.

The Department for Employment and Learning corporate plan perhaps provides a good basis for harnessing the largely untapped expertise of the further education colleges, through its document 'Further Education Means Business'. It is also in a position to ensure that the enormous research and development potential of our universities is properly focused. I should point out, Madam Speaker, that there are about 2,000 jobs directly involved in research and development — much, much too low if our economy is to grow.

The small size of our manufacturing base might also lend itself to closer scrutiny of emerging opportunities, perhaps in niche markets. That, in turn, when supported by a focused upskilling of sectors of our workforce, could provide a much needed source for value-added jobs. The decision as to whether the relatively small size of the Northern Ireland economy represents a threat or an opportunity lies firmly in the hands of the wider business community, academia in all its forms, the financial sector, and politicians — both local and national.

I firmly believe that it is the agreed will of all those sectoral interests that Northern Ireland plc should not only survive, but thrive. This debate is an important initial step towards the completion of that necessary journey. I support the thrust of the revolution — sorry, resolution — if not the method. [Laughter].

That was a Freudian slip; I have been sitting beside Sammy Wilson for too long.

I support the thrust of the resolution, if not the method by which it has arrived on the Floor of the Chamber.

Mrs Foster: I speak in this debate on the Northern Ireland economy with particular reference to my constituency of Fermanagh and South Tyrone. Madam Speaker, I have been waiting quite some time to say the words "my constituency of Fermanagh and South Tyrone", and I am delighted to be able to say them today.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mrs Foster: As the most westerly part of the United Kingdom, Fermanagh and South Tyrone has its fair share of economic challenges, but likewise there are many strengths for businesses that are not being recognised by Government because of its rurality. The strengths are clearly in the quality of the workforce; a workforce and a community that has suffered greatly from the downturn in manufacturing. I note the comments of the Member for Upper Bann, but his attitude clearly shows why the last failed Administration did not deal with the clear signs that the manufacturing industry was on a downward spiral.

The community will again suffer in Fermanagh and South Tyrone, and in the west in general, when the Royal Irish Regiment is disbanded. Where will those men and women go for employment? That is a question that we have been asking, but we are yet to hear the answer. Frankly, if jobs and business opportunities do not present themselves locally, those people will move from rural areas and the depopulation of the west will continue apace — a trend accelerated by the publication of Planning Policy Statement 14 as Government policy.

The infrastructure is poor in the west. Recently, I had the opportunity to host a visit to Fermanagh by my colleague, Jim Allister MEP, who wanted to look at these matters. My right hon Friend, the Member for North Antrim, Dr Paisley, mentioned European funding and the fact that the Republic of Ireland is a huge net beneficiary from Europe. As a region, Northern Ireland must not continue to be discriminated against in comparison with other European regions. Indeed, my party has set that as one of its primary objectives in Europe. While Jim Allister was in Fermanagh, we learnt of the many problems facing companies in the constituency of Fermanagh and South Tyrone, including energy costs, poor road infrastructure and the differing tax systems in Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland, not to mention the ongoing and increasing threat of industrial derating, which is hanging over firms.

My Friend, the Member for West Belfast, Mrs Dodds, referred to tourism and the difficulties faced by Belfast's signature project. At least Belfast has a signature project. It was a quite bizarre decision taken by the Government not to include Fermanagh, which is Northern Ireland's lake district, in signature status. It is a decision that must continue to be challenged and that I will continue to challenge.

Mr Donaldson: Does the Member agree that it is highly regrettable that the Member of this Assembly who represents the constituency of Fermanagh and South Tyrone in the House of Commons is not present in her place this afternoon; is never present in her place in the House of Commons; and, therefore, is incapable of representing the people who elected her? The sooner the Member behind me is the Member of Parliament for that constituency, the better.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mrs Foster: You may say that, I could not possibly comment. I will comment, however, on the fact that the Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone, who sits here and in another place, does not come to represent the interests of her constituents.

The motion looks for solutions. Solutions to all these problems can be found through joined-up thinking, and that is why I support the creation of the working group. However, let me be clear: when looking for solutions, such a working group must take all of Northern Ireland into account and not just, as is regrettably so often the case, seek solutions to fit a Belfast-centric model. One size will not fit all in this instance, which is why I ask that when the working group is set up, it be geographically representative. I hope that the Secretary of State will take cognisance of that point when it comes before him.

I end with a positive message from the west. Business plans are in place for St Angelo airport, situated to the north of Enniskillen, and if the plans come to fruition, the vision of two local businessmen will offer significant economic potential for Fermanagh and, indeed, the whole region. The Member for North Antrim, Dr Farren, made mention of quality skilled jobs, and if the project comes to fruition, the jobs provided will be just so. We need to foster and assist the entrepreneurial talents of our indigenous people, and I trust that the working group will take that into account and make it its primary focus, and that the Government agencies involved with projects such as these will act expeditiously.

Ms Ritchie: There are major economic challenges facing all of us. It is clear also to the SDLP that the people who sent us here expect us to do something about those challenges and to act very soon to correct the punitive policies of the direct rule Administration. Pending restoration, the current political imperative to enable us to act on those challenges lies with the British and Irish Governments, but the community imperative demands that we get our acts together; get all the institutions up and running, as per the Good Friday Agreement; and set the economic and infrastructure agenda for the next 25 years.

That is a major challenge, which is now more compelling than ever and will not wait for another generation to implement. Despite the improved headline unemployment figures, our economy is not in good shape. By comparison with anywhere else in these islands, a low proportion of our people are economically active. By comparison with almost anywhere in the world, we have an inordinate dependence on the public purse. To put it bluntly, our economy is unsustainable, even in the medium term.

Of all the challenges facing us in the economic sphere, the first and major one, the absolute starting point for regeneration and resurgence, is the lack of political stability.

What our people need above all is a better life; we in this Chamber have the power to give them that. They need each of us to commit ourselves to the re-establishment of political institutions without delay and to a final end to sectarianism, violence, terror, criminality and racketeering, and to stand up for a lawful society and for policing institutions. That is what is needed to unlock our economic potential, to attract more inward investment, and to emulate and share in the outstanding growth and development in the Southern part of our island.

There is also a challenge for each one of us to put in place political structures that will say goodbye to disadvantage and deprivation, which is still rife in certain parts of Northern Ireland.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Will the Member give way?

Ms Ritchie: No, I will not give way; I have only five minutes.

There is also a challenge to each one of us to end the geographical inequalities and inequities of the past. We must ensure that each of our citizens has full access to all educational, employment and economic opportunities. We cannot do these things if we permit the current lack of regional balance, with developments clustering in the east and deprivation clustering in the south and west, to continue. There will not be balanced development unless and until we can offer well-distributed infrastructural investment on the quality levels demanded by investors — a revised and upgraded infrastructure with the development of all transportation networks on an all-island basis. Hence our policy of wanting the establishment of an all-island infrastructure and transportation body.

Solid, joint intergovernmental political action is now required to establish that body and to put it on board the North/South agenda. Economic competitiveness depends on the sound development of roads and railway infrastructure on an all-island basis.

Mr Trimble: Will the Member give way?

Ms Ritchie: No, I will not give way; I have only five minutes.

Many infrastructural challenges that would improve our economy and job-creation potential await us. There is a compelling need for all the political institutions of the Good Friday Agreement to be restored immediately in order to ensure that the infrastructural challenges that we need to address to meet the economic demands and challenges that we were told about this morning are fully addressed for the benefit of all on this island.

Madam Speaker: May I remind Members that several Members are making their maiden speeches in the House. I ask Members to accord them some courtesy.

Mr McNarry: From the boardroom to the shop floor, from the innovative and inventive to the inquisitive and the motivational, from the understanding and development of new technologies to the production of reliable skilled tradesmen — all in the beginning have first to be taught and then to find the opportunity to excel in their choice of future employment.

The consequences of damaging the business community's confidence in our education system's ability to secure proven academic and vocational entrance into the world of employment are too dire to contemplate. In this small nation of 1·6 million people, education has to be the keystone that guarantees Northern Ireland a role not only in job creation but in bringing forward those who can more than hold their own in sustaining our economy by competing with the best of other economies. A strong economy and an excellent education system are dependent on each other. Each will have a lasting effect on people's standards and their quality of life.

Therein lies a challenge. It is, if you wish, a gauntlet to be received and acted on, or some day soon it will be stroked across our faces because too many failed to engage at the first hurdle and too little was done about it in this place.

I refer to House of Commons Hansard and a speech by the late Harold McCusker on 19 June 1979. He said:

"I cite the previous Secretary of State for Northern Ireland as my reason for saying that, because when he visited various parts of the world to attract industry to Northern Ireland at a very difficult time, what was one of his principal arguments?

It was that we have one of the finest educational systems in the United Kingdom. He could show a record in A-level and O-level achievement which was better than that of anywhere else in the United Kingdom. He was citing that as one of his principal arguments for encouraging industry to come to Northern Ireland at the same time as he was setting about dismantling that system in the Province."

Somehow, I have heard that before. Is it not incredible that, some 27 years later, in this Chamber, I would use Harold McCusker's analogy linking education and business to make the point that, if we want to attract the best business investment, we must offer the best of all educational opportunities?

I support setting up a working group. Let it draw its expertise from this body, and let it report sooner, rather than later. Let it not be just something that we discuss here and then find that it goes to the consultation chamber.

I end by saying that, uniquely, this debate could result in myself and others not making just our maiden speeches, but our only speeches in this Chamber. I hope that, as we contemplate this motion and our responsibilities to the economy, this will not be the last time, and that we will participate in debate and send a message and a signal to the public that this is the place to do business, and this is from where our economy will be driven and survive.

Mr Buchanan: Following my good colleague Arlene Foster, I will mainly focus on the rural constituencies. The constituency of West Tyrone has much to gain from the establishment of a meaningful working group to consider the economic challenges that face our Province. Over the past 35 years, West Tyrone has witnessed the very fabric of its economy torn apart by terrorism. In the most recent years, it has suffered severely from huge job losses.

In Strabane, hundreds of jobs have been lost at companies such as Adria and Herdmans, while Omagh has seen the closures of the Desmonds, Nestlé and Rixell factories, with little or virtually no support or assistance from Invest Northern Ireland when it was requested.

Added to that, we have the uncertainties and concerns surrounding the current vacuum in the provision of proper acute healthcare provision for the south-west quarter of Northern Ireland. Although lifting the ban on exports of UK beef gave some hope to the rural economy, West Tyrone is set to suffer yet another blow through the decision to close the St Lucia and Lisanelly Army bases.

Far too often in the political storm surrounding these announcements, the fate of the many civilian workers is forgotten. Those are the people who will often struggle to find new employment as a result of having previously being employed in security bases. The closure of those bases will bring a large number of people out of economic productivity. It will be a huge challenge to ensure that the economy can be developed and that there are employment prospects for all those people.

There is, of course, also the added knock-on effect from the reduction of spending power, which will affect shops and other businesses in the surrounding area. When we access the indices of deprivation measures, areas such as West Tyrone are shown to be in need of help from a detailed look at the economy. Although I have mentioned some of the larger businesses that have closed in recent years, there are still many companies operating in rural areas that must be given the opportunity to compete on a level playing field.

A border region such as West Tyrone would severely suffer from a decision to push ahead with the end of industrial derating. Businesses in Omagh and Strabane have to look only a few miles across the border to see their competitors operating in a low-cost environment. While I appreciate that it is not the place for Government or this Assembly to do the job of businesses, we must create the best possible conditions for businesses to compete.

Businesses operating across Northern Ireland, particularly in rural areas such as West Tyrone, have much higher costs to contend with, such as electricity and transport costs, to name a few. However, one advantage that we have been able to highlight has been the derating of industrial businesses.

Manufacturing industries are not unwilling to pay rates, but they have rightly pointed out the need for the current rate of 25% to be kept. That is on a level with the rate set by the Government for freight transport companies and would allow the Government to set a sensible level of rating while not forcing companies to operate at an unsustainable cost base.

The Government have stated that they will listen to the views of the Assembly. I hope that they will follow that through and listen to what has been said today regarding the problems facing our economy and the measures that can be put in place to help remedy them. Areas such as West Tyrone face many problems, and I hope that a meaningful working group will help to deliver a strong and stable economy in my constituency.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Moutray: At the outset, I wish to express my disgust at the absence of one party from the Chamber. So much for its commitment to the Northern Ireland economy; but then it was always more committed to the night shift than the day shift.

A number of aspects of the Northern Ireland economy must change if the situation is to improve. The Province has a massively inflated public sector, and it is essential that we move quickly from a public-sector-dominated economy to one that is much more heavily influenced by the private sector. Such a transition, clearly, must be delicately overseen and managed.

Private sector investment must be encouraged, as it will prove difficult to sustain the current levels of public expenditure. Likewise, it is difficult to see how, in the short term, the private sector could fully compensate for the decline in historic levels of public expenditure. We currently spend billions more than our economy generates.

A comprehensive, new economic strategy for the Province is needed; a budget allocation for economic development should be ring-fenced and utilised to encourage job creation.

The size of central Government should be reduced. For many years, since the signing of the outdated Belfast Agreement, my party has advocated that.

I remain to be convinced that the Review of Public Administration will effect any substantial savings. In fact, it has been suggested that the new structures for local government, health and education will cost more. A reduction in the number of Government Departments would be much more productive.

Economic and social policy and its delivery should not be considered in isolation from plans for infrastructure, education and training. It will be difficult to increase our competitiveness globally, unless we are able to develop a world-class infrastructure in Northern Ireland. Our schools and education system must encourage children to consider careers in business. Similarly, school leavers must be provided with the necessary skills to succeed. Greater effort must be directed towards improving the marketing and sales techniques of our graduates and workforce.

Our current investment in innovation, research and development is among the lowest in the world. The managed transition away from the public-sector-led economy requires private sector expansion, increased foreign investment, growth in indigenous businesses and an increased entrepreneurial spirit. Relaxing unnecessary legislation and speeding up our labour planning process will stimulate investment in infrastructure and housing as well as reduce reliance on public expenditure.

There may be some areas in which working with the Irish Republic will prove to be in our interest and aid competitiveness. That is what it is about, and it is not an excuse for others to make foolish attempts to obtain political capital.

The percentage of the working-age population in employment or at participation level is at a record low. To meet the UK average participation level by 2015 means creating 68,000 additional jobs in Northern Ireland. Furthermore, our growing population means that 40,000 extra jobs are also required over the same period. Add that to the anticipated number of job losses over the next decade in such sectors as manufacturing and agriculture, and the overall total is above 140,000.

Therefore, to reach by 2015 the average work participation rate for the rest of the United Kingdom, 140,000 new jobs must be created.

When economic indicators are considered, areas of the Northern Ireland economy appear to perform well. Northern Ireland has performed best of all UK regions over the past decade in growth in employment, reduction in unemployment, and the percentage of school leavers with qualifications. The last statistic is one that Northern Ireland Ministers conveniently ignore when they attack our education system.

Business survival rates are also quite good in the Province, but there are a large number of other indicators on which we fare badly. These include long-term unemployment, business formation, activity rates, the proportion of private sector employment, average earnings, and the percentage of the working-age population with more than two A-level passes. It would be remiss of me not to mention business crime, regrettably all too common, and on the increase. As one who has had some experience in the fuel retailing business, I know the impact of smuggling and racketeering, emanating in many cases from the paramilitaries. Business leaders and politicians must be seen to fully back the PSNI and all other agencies in the fight against crime. This gangsterism has caused, and is causing, job losses in businesses and small businesses around Northern Ireland.

Mr McFarland: I want to talk briefly about our skills base. Colleagues have covered the issue of tax rates and the need for some co-ordinated plan. However, how can we hope to compete without a properly developed skills base? A Member has described Northern Ireland as having one of the lowest participation rates in the United Kingdom. The economically inactive surely need to be encouraged to take full advantage of the training programmes available.

More importantly, we have a difficulty with schools. We are sending 25% of children out of schools into the workplace ill-equipped to deal with the jobs available. There are problems with mathematics, speaking in public, writing letters and particularly in the modern age, computer skills. How can our children compete in the job market if we are sending them out of our schools not equipped to do the jobs?

In a more confusing area, we are sending our children out of universities incapable of going into the industrial world. Colleagues will be aware that Bombardier Shorts has a special course for its university graduates. It finds it has to retrain them in mathematics, speaking and writing letters, because they come out of university not equipped for these jobs. It will not allow them into the company without taking this course.

Unless we get our act together with a co-ordinated plan that allows us to train our schoolchildren properly so that they leave with the skills required; go through university gaining the skills required; and at the end of all this co-ordinate with industry on the skills required by industry, and not on what academia thinks is needed, then we are really going to get nowhere on this issue.

Mr A Maginness: We in this House are faced with an awesome responsibility in relation to the political future of this Assembly and of the institutions under the Good Friday Agreement. That responsibility is a heavy one and is one that we should take very seriously. Many people have come to this House with very little hope, indeed some with no hope.

I remind the House that C S Lewis, who was educated not far from here at Campbell College, said that between little hope and no hope lies an ocean of opportunity. We do have an ocean of opportunity. One of the most vital tasks of this House is to prepare an economic plan that the incoming Executive can implement on behalf of all the people whom we represent, not just in our constituencies, but throughout the whole of Northern Ireland. That is an important task. It is not something to take lightly. There is a false sense of security in the House that the economy will plough on despite everything. That is untrue. This economy is highly subsidised and dependent on the public sector. We need to shift that balance to an entrepreneurial economy in which everybody will be enriched.

We look across the border to the Republic and see the amazing success of the Celtic tiger. That success was based on one basic resource: a highly educated young population. We have that educated young population and we can adjust our education system to service the needs of our future economy and of an entrepreneurial society. We can do that, but we must get our act together politically. The first building block of reconstructing our economy is to create political confidence that will inspire people outside this jurisdiction to come and invest money to create industry in which all our people can partake. That is our solemn task in this House today and throughout the coming months.

It is a pity that some people have absented themselves and have evaded or avoided their responsibilities to complete that task. There is nothing in the motion that is antipathetic to the idea of creating a new Northern Ireland Executive. In fact, the motion is very much attuned with the creation of that Executive. Those people have no political excuse for not being in this Chamber. They are denying their constituents and the rest of the people of Northern Ireland an opportunity for this House to unite around a comprehensive economic programme that can rebuild this society, which has suffered for too long not just from them, their supporters and their allies, but from others who have taken advantage of the situation. Therefore, we must renew our efforts to deal with that situation.

A second important building block is the creation of a new fiscal policy that will encourage industry in Northern Ireland. We have a land border; one of our colleagues said that, in many ways, the economy is integrated both North and South, but we must have a competitive, level playing field for Northern Ireland. Therefore, we must fiscally attune the situation here with that pertaining in the Republic. It is vital that we get that fiscal policy well defined so that we can all unite behind it, and when we go to the Westminster Government, we can say that we have a consensus on which we are all agreed. That will transform our economy and society. We have another advantage, namely that we are members of the European Union, which is an extensive market of which we should take advantage.

Finally, if the Secretary of State is serious about this motion, he should take the serious step of ending the introduction of punitive measures that will undermine business in Northern Ireland.

Mr Ford: There was much talk today, both this morning and this afternoon, about the size of the public sector and the private sector. However, let us be clear that the problem in Northern Ireland is not that the public sector is too big. I am not going to stand here and advocate sacking a single teacher, nurse or police officer. The issue is how we grow the private sector.

It is a simple fact that, within the last decade, in the Republic of Ireland, the public sector has grown. However, the private sector has grown enormously. The balance in the Republic has shifted and we must emulate that.

I wish to refer to some points made by other Members. The key ingredient for growing that private sector is getting away from the current low-skills and low-wage expectation of much of that economy. There is a real need to do much more on worker skills and training, and on integrating the work done by business with further and higher education.

There are real problems in the pseudo-competition that exists among a number of institutions. The Department of Agriculture and Rural Development showed the way when it established the three-campus College of Agriculture, Food and Rural Enterprise.

It deals in a collaborative way with all the aspects that are relevant to one of our major sectors. Unfortunately, the competition among colleges to obtain money by getting people into the lecture halls means that we may not have the necessary level of co-operation. There is much need for competition in the private sector, but there is greater need for co-operation in the public sector to deliver the range of services that is needed to build that private sector economy.

I refer to the speech — sorry, the intervention — by Mrs Dodds during Mr Neeson's speech; a key issue regarding tourism has not been teased out properly. There is no doubt that we need to build on our tourism honeypots, but there is, moreover, no doubt that the tourism Northern Ireland will attract is heritage tourism or green tourism, and that can apply in every part of Northern Ireland. It is easy to see areas such as my constituency of South Antrim, which sits wedged between the Belfast honeypot and the Causeway Coast honeypot, as being purely for people to drive through, from one honeypot to another. Yet there is potential for developing other aspects of tourism in those areas. We cannot simply leave tourism to crowding people into central Belfast or one or two other resorts.

If we are to look seriously at the target of 141,000 new jobs, we must consider what can be done to attract foreign direct investment. There is no doubt that the record that Northern Ireland had some years ago has slipped recently, and it is a major target for Invest Northern Ireland to reach. We must consider the possibilities and we also have to be realistic, in that certain trades may work to our good, but there are others that we can no longer realistically depend upon. We cannot depend upon heavy engineering as being a growth area; we may or may not hold on to what we have. We need to find such issues as tradable services to avail of the opportunities that are there, and we must also consider the expectation that we will not attract the foreign investment that we hoped for to grow our own SME sector. There are major challenges in developing investment, training and R&D in a sector which is so dependent upon small and medium-sized firms. Yet, if we do not, we will not achieve the growth that is possible in Northern Ireland.

On the issue of taxation, it is clear that merely the ability to fiddle with the regional rate and industrial rates will not meet the needs of this sector. We are in direct competition with a low corporation tax economy and low excise duties across the border. During the economic briefing this morning, the business leaders suggested the need for a detailed research project on how lowering tax rates might improve total tax take in terms of corporation tax and income tax, and there is no doubt that that is of key importance.

However, another aspect, which has been almost ignored this afternoon, is how we actually seek to build a shared future in this society. There is no doubt that the successful economies across the world are those that are open, welcoming and integrated. We are getting a share of that with our new citizens coming from eastern Europe, but it is clear that until we provide opportunities for every person in this society, regardless of background, we will not have the economic growth that we need.

Mr Donaldson: It is almost 20 years since I last spoke in this Chamber, and, on that occasion, the party opposite — the SDLP — was not present, but I genuinely welcome its presence today. Also, on that occasion, the party known as Sinn Féin was absent, and, once again, it is absent today. Republicans ought to have learned by now that abstentionist politics does not get them anywhere, and it fails their constituents. They ought to be here today, putting their point of view. Their failure to attend the debate just demonstrates —

Madam Speaker: Please address the motion, Mr Donaldson.

Mr Donaldson: — demonstrates their apathy, Madam Speaker, towards the business community and towards addressing the problems in our economy, and that is highly regrettable.

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr Donaldson: The motion calls for the establishment of a working group, and I hope that Sinn Féin will not be absent from that. It is essential that all the parties put their shoulders to the wheel to address the issues that concern the people that we represent. The presentation from the business leadership this morning was important, and I do not understand why Sinn Féin could be there to hear it but did not have the good grace to come and debate the issues that were raised.

We have a window here, an opportunity. There is leverage in advance of the Administration being re-formed at some appropriate time in the future. There is leverage to apply to the Government at Westminster. We must use this opportunity to get what we need in order to build a strong economy. Unfortunately, that will not be helped if one party absents itself from the job at hand.

We heard this morning that long-term unemployment in Northern Ireland is the highest in the United Kingdom. Of particular concern is the fact that youth unemployment here is also the highest in the United Kingdom. We need to offer our young people some hope — especially those who find themselves unemployed. That is why this debate is important.

I listened with interest to the comments made by the hon Member for Upper Bann, who is, unfortunately, no longer in his place — as is the case across the water. It will come as a disappointment to his colleague, who is a party officer. Of course, being an officer in the Ulster Unionist Party Assembly Group means something rather different after yesterday.

Madam Speaker: Mr Donaldson, please keep to the motion.

Mr Donaldson: There is a lot of emotion, Madam Speaker.

His colleague Basil McCrea, whom I have worked with very closely on the issue of industrial derating, will have been disappointed to hear the hon Member for Upper Bann say that manufacturing is not the future for our economy in Northern Ireland. Manufacturing is the future, as indeed are tradable services. Of course we welcome investment in those areas, but we need to support and develop the manufacturing sector.

The reality, as we heard this morning, is that only 65 businesses in Northern Ireland employ more than 500 people. Many of these are manufacturing companies, and they need our support. Montupet (UK) Ltd, in my constituency, has over 700 employees. The company faces an industrial rates bill of almost £1 million. What will that do for the future employment prospects of the people who work at Montupet in Dunmurry, or, indeed, at Harland and Wolff, which is facing a potential rates bill of £4.375 million?

Surely we should be doing something to help the manufacturing sector. Indeed, we took a cross-party delegation to meet the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to put the case for capping those rates. That set an example. The working group would be able to take that issue forward, and other matters affecting the wider economy.

We need to help our economy; we need to help our businesses; we need to support our manufacturing sector. That means an end to the ongoing situation where the Government are taxing our businesses out of business. We, as political leaders, have a responsibility to do something about that. An all-party approach in the working group is the way forward.

Mr Beggs: Northern Ireland is over-dependent on the public sector. The days of significant increases in public sector funding are over. We face a bleak and degrading future if Northern Ireland has to rely on diminishing public funding in the long term. As politicians, we must help create the space for existing businesses and new enterprises to develop. More importantly, we must not create barriers to industrial development.

Engineers, scientists and entrepreneurs are the drivers of the economy. Politicians must contribute political stability. That may be the greatest contribution we can make to our local economy. We must all lead by example and not allow historic intransigence or emotive rhetoric to be misunderstood by our impressionable young people. We must all support the police and act to end all criminality and street conflict. Was that not agreed eight years ago, but not delivered by some?

We must ensure that Northern Ireland is business-friendly and learn lessons from other successful regions. We must forget about the politically charged rhetoric of an all-Ireland economy, which detracts from establishing genuine good relations. Manufacturing sales and exports surveys from last November reveal that 43·5% of Northern Ireland exports went to other regions of the United Kingdom, while 11·6% went to the Republic of Ireland. We must not narrow our vision to the so-called all-Ireland economy, but help local businesses to improve and export against European and global competitors.

Mr Hussey: We heard Mrs Foster, John Dallat and Tom Buchanan, representatives from the west, talk about the economic difficulties there. Does my Friend agree that it would be better for us as an Assembly to consider the east-west dimension within Northern Ireland, and with regard to the UK, rather than the Belfast-Dublin economic corridor?

Mr Beggs: The figures that I quoted clearly indicate that I do.

We must look for markets wherever they exist, because with businesses and export markets come jobs. We must allow business to establish where the markets are. If business activity is to be led by Government policy intervention, it must be mutually beneficial and subject to genuine local democratic accountability and scrutiny.

The recent industrial derating issue has shown how disengaged our locally unaccountable Northern Ireland Office Ministers are from the needs of the local business community. Our businesses compete over a land border and within a different fiscal regime, and that has not been taken into consideration. The Treasury and Northern Ireland Office Ministers appear unconcerned about the potential for company relocation to the Republic of Ireland, which is seen by some as more business-friendly. Why should we allow Invest Northern Ireland to spend millions encouraging inward investment when the full rates proposed for industrial premises have the potential to export or end many existing jobs? Clearly the planned manufacturing rates increases must be halted. A convincing and collective case must be put to the Treasury for the improvement of fiscal conditions to encourage development within Northern Ireland.

A prosperous economy will create opportunities for young people and enable any future Northern Ireland Executive to blossom. Market leaders such as Schrader Electronics, and FG Wilson in my own constituency, have led with R&D. They are worldwide leaders, and their exports are significant. As a region we need to change our approach to wealth generation. We must become more business-friendly. The efforts of our schools and colleges must closely meet the needs of local industry.

We would have liked to improve the wording of the motion, but, regrettably, that has not been possible. In particular, there is a need for a restoration-of-devolution committee, without which this is a lot of hot air. We could have six months of hot air, so I urge that such a committee be established as soon as possible so that we ourselves can make decisions in the future. I support the motion, and I hope that other Members will do so also.

Mr Dawson: I am glad of the opportunity to take part in this useful, and mostly constructive, debate. I agree with the Member from North Belfast, Mr Maginness, and my own colleague from Lagan Valley that it is a scandal that the Benches opposite are empty today as we discuss the economic future of Northern Ireland.

However, it is not surprising that Sinn Féin, which has nothing to offer economically, is not here to debate the economic future of the country. Whatever its public reason, I suspect that its real reason for not being here is that its Members cannot handle having to operate in a situation where they are armed only with the powers of argument and persuasion, like the rest of us.

Many issues have been referenced over and over again today by Members, both in the Northern Ireland Business Alliance meeting earlier this morning and in this afternoon's debate. Reference has been made to skills, education, reducing bureaucracy, improving planning infrastructure and processes, developing infrastructure, and reducing business costs, including industrial rates. The working party can constructively examine and take forward all of those issues and make recommendations to the Secretary of State on how the economy can be bettered. However, whatever the future arrangements, we must ensure that an Audit Committee is not allowed to strangle a developing flexibility and entrepreneurial culture in Northern Ireland, as it did in the past.

I wish to refer to two specific issues. First, there is the issue of North/South co-operation. I have no hesitation in saying that in regard to strength, scale and long-term stability, Northern Ireland's best economic interests lie within the United Kingdom, and within a United Kingdom context. However, my political convictions do not preclude me from wholeheartedly supporting the principle of economic co-operation with our Irish neighbours where that co-operation is practically and not politically motivated and where it is of economic benefit to the people of Northern Ireland. Trade between our two jurisdictions is of considerable benefit to many companies in Northern Ireland. That is the stuff of normal trade and politics; it is not the domain of politicians.

Dr Farren: Will the Member give way?

Mr Dawson: No, I will not.

I have no hesitation in encouraging companies to avail of that trade or in providing the opportunity for them to avail of that trade. That might refer to some matter on which the Member wanted me to give way.

However, no one should forget for a second that the Republic of Ireland is our economic competitor. Often, in the clamour to promote a false all-island economy, that fundamental fact is forgotten, along with two other harsh realities: there are two currencies and two tax regimes in the island of Ireland.

That takes me to my second point, which is corporation tax. I can understand the reticence of Her Majesty's Government in relation to differential tax rates across the kingdom, but there are precedents. The challenge to the working party and others will be to convince Her Majesty's Government of the negative effect of a 30% corporation tax in Northern Ireland, in comparison to our competitors in the South. Another challenge will be to convince the Government that because Northern Ireland's position is unique — in that it shares a land border with another European state and is in transition from over three decades of violence and civil strife — it deserves a period of managed special treatment.

If, as they claim, the Government are serious about improving Northern Ireland's competitiveness and making it world class, the Secretary of State's single most important step would be to consider seriously a lower corporation tax rate for Northern Ireland, below that prevailing in the Republic of Ireland. That can be done either by changing the headline rate or by a cocktail of measures focusing on research and development, marketing and training that would help not only foreign direct investors, but indigenous companies.

That, Madam Speaker, brings me to my conclusion. Although on some occasions it seems that Northern Ireland is struggling as an economy, and there are economic challenges facing us in the twenty-first century, Northern Ireland is well placed to meet those challenges. With the right incentives and the right level playing field, Northern Ireland can go forward to a better future.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That the Assembly considers the economic challenges facing Northern Ireland, in the context of both the UK and all island economies, to be a key priority for a restored Executive and calls on the Business Committee to take forward establishing a working group on this issue to make recommendations to a restored Executive.

THE ASSEMBLY

Monday 22 May 2006

The Assembly met at 2.00 pm (Madam Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

Madam Speaker: In accordance with the Northern Ireland Act 2006, the Secretary of State has directed that the Assembly should sit on Monday 22 May 2006 at 2.00 pm to consider business as it appears on the Order Paper.

At the end of the sitting on Monday 15 May, in response to a point of order from Dr Paisley, I advised him that I had published a list, as required under Standing Order 3(g), before 9.30 am, in line with convention. For the sake of accuracy, I should have said that the list was published before 10.30 am, in accordance with Standing Orders.

In a related point of order, Mr Peter Robinson asked me to “clarify the situation” with regard to that list. I have taken advice and counsel on the matter. The list was prepared on the basis of the information that was available at the time, and I have been advised, and am content, that the decision that I took in publishing the list on Monday was proper and in order. Members will be aware that a fresh list must be prepared in advance of any sitting of the Assembly at which Ministers are to be nominated.

Counsel has also advised me that the Clerk to the Assembly should make further enquiries of interested persons with regard to the meaning of the phrase “political party” in the Assembly’s Standing Orders, and letters have been duly sent to party leaders.

The matter is therefore under consideration, and I intend to make a ruling as soon as those considerations have concluded.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. In relation to today’s business and procedure, it has been rumoured and broadcast that proposals will be made for a First Minister and his deputy, and according to the bush telegraph, which was engineered by a lady from Canada — so she would know something about that — I am to get the most honourable post of First Minister. I want you to tell us how we will proceed today. I believe that, according to Standing Orders, if a person —

Madam Speaker: Order, Dr Paisley. If you give me a moment, I am about to explain that.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: Will you call me again then?

Madam Speaker: If necessary.

ELECTION OF FIRST MINISTER AND OF DEPUTY FIRST MINISTER

Madam Speaker: Before we commence, I wish to explain how I propose to conduct proceedings. I will begin by asking for proposals. Members are reminded that, under Standing Order 15, a proposal must include candidates for both First Minister and Deputy First Minister. If a Member wishes to make a proposal, he or she should rise in his or her place. If a proposal is made, I will ask for the proposal to be seconded, as required by Standing Order 15(d). Each candidate will then be asked whether he or she accepts the nomination. There will be no debate at this stage.

I will then seek further proposals. If further nominations are made, the process of seeking seconders and having nominations accepted will be repeated until there are no further proposals. At that point, if there are valid proposals, Members may, if they choose, commence debate.

I intend to conduct a single debate on all the proposals, and no Member will be permitted to speak more than once. At the end of the debate, or if there is no debate, I shall put the Question that the first pair of candidates be elected as First Minister and as Deputy First Minister on the restoration of devolved government.

Under Standing Order 15, two candidates standing jointly will not be elected to hold the two offices without the support of a majority of the Members voting in the election, a majority of the designated Nationalists voting and a majority of the designated Unionists voting. Should the proposal be carried, I will ask those Members elected to be First Minister and Deputy First Minister to affirm the terms of the Pledge of Office.

If the motion is carried, I will deem the other proposals to have fallen, even though they have not been put to the Assembly for decision. If the proposal is not carried, I shall put the Question in relation to the next pair of candidates, and so on as necessary, until a pair of candidates is elected or all proposals are exhausted. If that is clear, we shall proceed.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. Can I take it that, when proposing a candidate, there is no debate, only the proposal?

Madam Speaker: That is correct. There is no debate until all proposals have been made. Do we have any proposals?

Mr Burnside: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Will you give some guidance to the House? Are we electing a First Minister and a Deputy First Minister to the interim Hain Assembly, which will not receive any transfer of Executive power, or are we electing a First Minister and a Deputy First Minister to the Assembly that was elected in 2003?

Madam Speaker: We are electing persons to hold office on the first day of restoration. I hope that that is clear to you.

Do we have any proposals?

Mr Adams: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Ar dtús, sula rachaidh mé ar aghaidh, ba mhaith liom comhbhrón a dhéanamh le John O'Dowd, ár gceannaire anseo, nó fuair a mháthair bás ag an deireadh seachtaine. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr Adams: Molaim go gceaptar Ian Paisley ina Chéad-Aire agus go gceaptar Martin McGuinness ina LeasChéad-Aire ar athbhunú an rialtais seo.

First, may I extend condolences to John O'Dowd, whose mother, Bridie, died on Friday evening? John is Sinn Féin's leader in this Assembly.

I move that Ian Paisley be returned as First Minister and Martin McGuinness be returned as Deputy First Minister on the restoration of the devolved Administration. Go raibh maith agat.

Madam Speaker: Is there a Member to second the motion?

Ms Gildernew: Cuidím leis an rún. I second the motion.

Madam Speaker: Dr Paisley, do you accept the nomination as First Minister on the restoration of devolved government? Order. If there is not order, I will stop the proceedings completely.

Order. I must say that you are really all terrific parliamentarians.

Dr Paisley — once again — do you accept the nomination to be First Minister on the restoration of devolved government?

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: Certainly not, Madam Speaker. It goes without saying that my reasons are well known across this Province, and they have been endorsed by the majority of unionist voters.

Madam Speaker: Thank you, Dr Paisley. I remind Members that Standing Order 15(d) requires that both candidates state that they accept nomination. That has not occurred. The nomination is, therefore, invalid, and falls.

Is there any further proposal?

The time for proposals has expired.

Mr Ford: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. In accordance with the bizarre and sectarian voting rules that apply for this particular election, it is clear that the only proposal that could command what is laughingly described as a cross-community majority will not be achieved today. I presume that you will be informing the Secretary of State of the outcome. Will you also inform him of the need to convene immediate, inclusive and intensive all-party talks to deal with the outstanding issues?

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Madam Speaker: Thank you, Mr Ford. As did Dr Paisley, you have anticipated my next remarks. I will notify the Secretary of State that no persons have been elected to hold the offices of First Minister and of Deputy First Minister on the restoration of devolved government.

An Order Paper for tomorrow's business will be issued as soon as the Secretary of State has made a referral under the 2006 Act. Copies will be placed in Members' pigeonholes.

Mr Paisley Jnr: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Is it not ridiculous that Northern Ireland has been put through this charade today to satisfy the Secretary of State's political machinations, which have failed, and failed miserably?

Madam Speaker: That is not really a point of order, Mr Paisley. Please sit down. We are working under the Secretary of State's direction. Everybody knew what we were going to be doing today.

Adjourned at 2.15 pm.

THE ASSEMBLY

Tuesday 23 May 2006

The Assembly met at 10.30 am (Madam Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

Madam Speaker: In accordance with the Northern Ireland Act 2006, the Secretary of State has directed that the Assembly should sit on Tuesday 23 May at 10.30 am to consider business as it appears on the Order Paper.

Mr Burnside: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. My point of order concerns the conduct of business in this Assembly. We are at an interim stage where business is set by consultation between the Business Committee, the authorities within the House and the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. However, the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland was previously Leader of the House in the House of Commons, and the Government have a reputation for having contempt for Parliament, and the House of Commons, in setting future business.

If this House is to establish any dignity and authority and move away from being a talking shop, as it is at present, business should be announced by this House to its Members, and not on the airwaves of Radio Ulster in the morning — I use the example of the possibility, or probability, that a devolution committee may be set up in this House. I ask you, Madam Speaker, to represent this House and to try to give it some authority in its relations with the Secretary of State, or it will be treated with the same contempt as the House of Commons.

Madam Speaker: Thank you, Mr Burnside. Your comments will be passed on, both through the publication of Hansard and by the Business Committee, to the Secretary of State.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

Rural Planning Policy

Madam Speaker: Before I call Mr McGlone to move the motion, I wish to clarify how I propose to conduct the debate. One amendment has been selected and published on the Marshalled List. Speaking times will be as follows: the proposer of the substantive motion and the proposer of the amendment will each have 10 minutes to propose and 10 minutes for the winding-up speech, and all other Members who speak will have between five and seven minutes each.

When the debate has concluded, I shall put the Question on the amendment. If the amendment is made, I shall put the Question on the motion as amended. If the amendment is not made, I shall put the Question on the substantive motion. If that is clear, I shall proceed.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. The House could sit to 5.00 pm — is that not correct?

Madam Speaker: This House will sit until the conclusion of the debate. We have not decided at this stage whether that will be at 5.00 pm.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: Further to that point of order. Why are the times curtailed? If we can sit until 5.00 pm, why do we not do so and give people time? This is a very important debate on planning, and we should use the time at our disposal and not be cut off.

Madam Speaker: As I said, the debate may well go on until 5.00 pm. We will listen to everyone who wishes to speak, and no one will be curtailed. Five to seven minutes is more than enough. We would go past 5.00 pm if we allowed any more than that.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: Further to that point of order. Surely this Assembly should take the time at its disposal? We have been curtailed. We get into criticism from the press because we come and go, but here is an opportunity, because of the fallout of things, to have a full debate. Why can people not have time to put their case?

Madam Speaker: As I said before, this House can sit until 5.00 pm if necessary. Last week, the Business Committee agreed that there would only be a morning debate. However, this week it has been decided that the debate should go on as long as necessary, even if it takes until 5.00 pm.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: Madam Speaker, that is not the issue. If we finish at 4.00 pm, then we go, because you have limited the time. The time should be unlimited up until 5.00 pm.

Madam Speaker: We will proceed and see how we get on with that, Dr Paisley. The Business Committee meets at lunchtime. We will debate until then, and come back after lunch for as long as it takes.

Dr McCrea: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. Will you confirm that the 10-minute time restriction on this debate was not decided at any Business Committee meeting? Also, what part of the minutes of the Business Committee confirms that it was five minutes for others?

Madam Speaker: You are quite right. There was only a general discussion last week, and a decision was taken about a morning session. The length of the debate is at the discretion of the Speaker with the help of the Business Committee. Five to seven minutes has been the norm in other debates, and I hope that that will be enough. As the debate goes on we shall see. Every Member who has indicated a wish to speak will get the opportunity to do so. That is all I can allow for.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. Are you advising us that if things proceed in a particular way, Members speaking at the commencement of the debate might only have five or seven minutes while later contributors could have 10 or 12 minutes to speak? Surely that is unfair on those who made early contributions to the debate?

Madam Speaker: That is not what I meant. I meant that if there are other Members who wish to speak, they may do so. I do not want to restrict anyone, but the convention is that five to seven minutes is more than enough for any debate.

Mr Dallat: On a final point of order, Madam Speaker. Would it not be a good idea to get on with the debate?

Madam Speaker: That is what I have just asked for, Mr Dallat. [Interruption.] Order.

Mr McGlone: I beg to move

That this Assembly condemns the unilateral method by which the document 'Draft Planning Policy Statement 14, Sustainable Development in the Countryside' was introduced and calls on the Secretary of State to cease implementation of PPS 14 pending a comprehensive review of rural planning policy to develop a balanced policy for the sustainability of rural society and the environment. That, in the interim, all rural planning applications received since 16 March 2006 be considered under the application policy: A Planning Strategy for Rural Northern Ireland (1993).

Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Ar an chéad dul síos, gabhaim mo chomhghairdeas pearsanta leat as ucht do cheapacháin do do phost úr sa Tionól.

Madam Speaker, on my first opportunity to do so publicly, I congratulate you on your appointment as Speaker of the Assembly.

The nature and purpose of our business is to get straight to the point, to do what the people want and to meet the requirements of society. There should be no veneer or pretence that this Assembly has a competence or has powers that it has not.

The Planning Service often dismisses it as the rural remainder. For those of us who grew up — and still live — in the country, on land where generations before us have lived, it is home, pure and simple. However, with that comes the clear sense of attachment, belonging and being part of a community. That strong identity is replicated in rural communities across the country. That is the way those communities are, and it is the way that rural Ireland has evolved over centuries.

It was never an 'Emmerdale' of small rural chocolate-box-style villages and hamlets with a number of scattered, outlying farms. That, coupled with the need for a most basic human entitlement — the right to a home — is why over 300 people turned up at a public meeting in Cookstown that I was recently privileged to chair. They were people from the land, who wanted answers about Shaun Woodward and Lord Rooker's drastic Draft Planning Policy Statement 14, which is wrongly entitled 'Sustainable Development in the Countryside' — because that is the last thing it will achieve.

Allegedly in draft form and out for consultation, the document has been implemented for any applications acknowledged as valid by the Planning Service after 16 March. That raises issues, but there are more fundamental questions, such as why the authors of the document, the Department for Regional Development, cite, among other issues, overdevelopment of rural areas, or bungalow blight. Another issue is preservation of the environment, and in relation to what Mr Burnside said previously I note the attempt to ambush the debate on that matter on Radio Ulster this morning. All those important issues must be considered.

First, the policy prior to 16 March, 'A Planning Strategy for Rural Northern Ireland' (1993) is empowered to address planning and environmental concerns. Proper control of sewage from dwellings does not require a major lurch in planning policy, merely an alteration to its implementation. The onus is on the applicant to provide satisfactory septic tank arrangements, to show that the proposed dwelling is integrated in the rural setting, and to safeguard the integrity of the countryside, while simultaneously providing for its most valuable asset, its people, without whom there is no so-called sustainability.

The mindset of the document interprets "rural" as equalling farming or, specifically, those mainly or exclusively engaged in viable farm businesses. The media slant put on the document is that farmers and their sons and daughters will be catered for and that, therefore, the rural community is all right. A farmer's son or daughter, living and probably working — inevitably part-time — on what is determined by the Planning Service under Draft PPS 14 not to be a "viable" farm business, will simply not receive planning permission. Both the Northern Ireland

Agricultural Producers Association (NIAPA) and the Ulster Farmers' Union have highlighted that to me. Moreover, those engaged mainly in farming will find it nigh on impossible to get planning permission where a site has already been disposed of from a farm holding for a variety of reasons, some of those dramatic.

Will the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development (DARD) please enlighten its Civil Service cousins at the Department for Regional Development about the economic body blow suffered by the farming community over the last number of years? Many farms are no longer so viable as to support full-time occupation, let alone support sons and daughters in the farming business.

The main point is that the overwhelming majority of country people, now including many sons and daughters of farmers, have not been catered for in that document. They will be among the many who will be forced to leave family lands and, in many instances, the whole rural support network — be it family, cultural or sporting — that forms part of it.

The document provides an insight into the knowledge of its authors, whose perception of areas beyond Glengormley is more informed by watching 'Emmerdale' and listening to 'The Archers' than it is by getting out of Belfast to meet the real people who are affected.

One of the absolute ironies of Government policy is that one Department — the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development — supports community-led rural development policies, while another — the Department for Regional Development — will, through Draft PPS 14, undermine any efforts at rural development. What is there to develop if the rural community is having its most valuable asset — its future generations — removed? The irony is that Lord Rooker had ministerial responsibility for both rural development and planning.

A major issue now facing rural dwellers is where this leaves the British Labour Party's commitments to affordable housing. House prices have already soared in Mid Ulster, which I represent. Supply and demand is an issue; demand exists among a growing young population, yet not enough land has been zoned, even in villages. Land price increases have had a knock-on effect on the overall price of a house. Many people have relied on developing a site on family land to keep down overall housing costs. At least through the tradition of passing a site to a son, daughter or grandchild, overall costs are confined to the construction of the dwelling. Draft PPS 14 has removed that option. Any available individual sites that are for sale have already rocketed in price — in some cases by £40,000 to £50,000 — thanks to Lord Rooker's Draft PPS 14.

There has been a similar rise in the cost of development lands in towns and villages that is far beyond the reach of most people, who simply cannot afford to pay £150,000 for a site and then build a home on it.

We have now reached a stage where 40- and 50-year mortgages are being presented to those who, while they are employed and interest rates remain stable, can afford to pay them. This concept raises the spectre of a lifetime of debt, with, conceivably, debt being inherited. Little thought has been given to how a person could repay such a mortgage on retirement, when their income would be much reduced.

I proposed the motion at the request of many constituents from all backgrounds. I have consulted and listened to the major concerns of rural organisations, including the Ulster Farmers' Union, NIAPA, the Rural Development Council and the Rural Community Network. I am a member of the Northern Ireland Local Government Association (NILGA), within which Draft PPS 14 has unified political opinion across the spectrum, as elected representatives know that it will sound the death knell for many of our rural communities. No more houses — that will be the effect of Draft PPS 14; it will have drastic long-term social and economic consequences for our rural areas. Schools, community organisations and the strong, often extended, family support network that is integral to rural areas will all disappear, and that will further affect churches. I recently met senior representatives from An Cumann Lúthchleas Gael — the Gaelic Athletic Association (GAA) — who voiced their concerns about the effect that this will have on many of their clubs. Other rural-based organisations will share similar concerns.

Last week, this Assembly rightly devoted a good part of its time to looking at the local economy. The domino effect of Draft PPS 14 will bring rural post offices and local shops to their knees. It will also have major consequences for employment, small building firms and their suppliers, for whom construction of single houses in the countryside is the lifeblood of their business. It has been estimated that Draft PPS 14 could lead directly to the loss of 10,000 jobs. The document shows no knowledge of our rural communities, displays no awareness of rural society and no consciousness of the sense of place and belonging that goes with those communities.

In conclusion, I call for an immediate statement to review the content of Draft PPS 14 from the new Minister, who has triple responsibility for regional development, the environment and rural development. I trust that by the time the review has been completed we will have full devolution of powers.

Members will have heard these concerns from their constituents, so please let us reach a consensus and pass the matter for action to the Secretary of State, with whom it rightly rests. Molaim an rún.

Mr Wells: Madam Speaker, I beg to move — [Interruption.]

Mr P J Bradley: Did my fellow Assembly Member for South Down discuss the opposition to the motion with councillor William Burns, or any other DUP councillor who supports rural committees and farmers in the area?

Mr Wells: Madam Speaker, I suspect that that was not a point of order.

Madam Speaker: I could not hear Mr Bradley, but I thought that you were giving way to him. That was not the case.

Mr Wells, you may proceed.

Mr Wells: I beg to move the following amendment: Leave out all after “Assembly” and insert

“notes the publication of the Draft Planning Policy Statement 14 ‘Sustainable Development in the Countryside’ and calls upon the Business Committee to establish a working party to develop a balanced policy for the sustainable development of the countryside and the protection of the environment.”

I will accept reasonable and sensible interventions from Members opposite, as it is their motion.

After Lord Rooker made his announcement on 16 March, someone telephoned me and asked whether it was true that Lord Rooker had stopped all applications for building bungalows. I said that it was true. That person said “Thank goodness” because all his planning applications were for two-storey houses. He did not realise the significance of what was being announced.

The policy attracts a very diverse range of views — there is no question about that. At a public meeting held by the Draft PPS 14 team, a farmer said that he owned the land and that if he wanted to build 20 bungalows on his land, he had every right to do so.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Wells: With friends like that, who needs enemies? At another public meeting in Banbridge, a lady said that the damage to the countryside was so pervasive that all outstanding outline consents should be rescinded. I do not think that too many people would support that view.

Perhaps the most telling statement to come out of those public meetings was from a lady who owned bed and breakfast accommodation. A Dutch tourist who was staying in her accommodation said that she was going home early because she felt that the countryside had been destroyed through indiscriminate development. She was appalled at what had happened to the countryside since her last visit. The subject attracts various views. However, we are all agreed that something had to be done to prevent the indiscriminate loss of our countryside through speculative development.

The statistics are frightening. Each year, planning permission given for single dwellings in the countryside is equivalent to the size of Coleraine. Northern Ireland has 1.7 million people, yet we pass three times more individual buildings in the countryside than England, Wales and Scotland put together — and they have 58 million people. There is an imbalance in that statistic.

The regional development strategy set a policy of 60% brownfield development — old industrial sites and areas of inner-city dereliction — for Northern Ireland. The Assembly supported that target when the regional development strategy was agreed in 2001. Last year, more than half of all houses built in Northern Ireland were single dwellings in the countryside. How on earth are we to meet our brownfield development target of 60% if more than half of our developments are single dwellings?

There has been a rise in the number of multiple applications in recent years. One landowner in my constituency has 42 sites for sale, and a gentleman down the road has 17 sites for sale. In the Down District Council area — as the hon Member for South Down Ms Ritchie will know — 49 applicants have lodged 238 applications for single dwellings.

Mr Kennedy: They must have big families.

Mr Wells: Big families, indeed. [Laughter.]

Mr McGlone referred to the needs of the ordinary rural dweller. How can someone with 42 sites for sale be meeting the needs of the ordinary rural dweller?

Mr McGlone: I also represent a largely rural area. Forgive me for saying that Mr Wells’s experience may be peculiar to his area, but it is not my experience. People who contact me about sites are from the land; they want to live where generations before them have lived. The Member is saying that the exception should form the rule; those are the exceptions in my area.

Mr Wells: The Member makes a valuable point. The Holy Grail — the problem that we are all trying to solve — is to develop a policy that allows the ordinary rural dweller to continue to live in the countryside but which stops the speculation that I refer to.

Some Members: The Da Vinci code.

Mr Wells: It would be more difficult to solve than the Da Vinci code.

It is such a complex issue that the best way forward is to set up an all-inclusive working party to thrash out a sensible policy. I believe that that can be done, and I hope that the hon Member will support me, because it is the best way forward.

Until a decade ago, there were between 2,000 and 3,000 applications per annum. The system met the needs of rural dwellers, the farming community and those who wanted to look after disabled relatives. There were few problems, and it was sustainable. However, over the past decade, there has been a massive rise — a threefold increase — in the number of applications. Last year, the figure was 8,500.

Generally, those applications do not meet the needs of the rural community, as many are speculative. For example, in Ballyronney, which is in my constituency, a site was sold on Thursday for £183,000. Was that site sold to a local rural dweller? It was not; it was sold to a Belfast commuter. That is the problem, and that is why we need a working party to consider the issue. In recent years, applications have trebled, and the £100,000 site has become the norm.

This Assembly needs to be careful. Members of the previous Assembly passed the regional development strategy in 2001, which set out policies for the sustainable development of the countryside. All parties, including Mr McGlone's, supported it. The strategy set out a method whereby the countryside could continue to thrive, but in a way that would not lead to the destruction of the goose that lays the golden egg, and was to be achieved through the development plan process. However, in the intervening period, there was such a massive surge in speculative applications that the Department for Regional Development had to step in and take action, otherwise the regional development strategy would have been totally negated.

The motion tabled by Mr McGlone looks fine until you read it carefully.

Mr McGlone: The price of sites has been grossly inflated as a direct consequence of Lord Rooker signing Draft PPS 14.

Mr Wells: The hon Member fails to realise that sites were already selling for over £100,000 in the east of the Province before the introduction of Draft PPS 14 in March. Those sites are not being bought by local rural dwellers; they are being bought by commuters, and that is doing nothing to sustain the countryside.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Will the Member give way?

Mr Wells: I said that I would give way to the Opposition. [Laughter.]

Mr Paisley Jnr: Surely the Member is not trying to sustain an argument that the countryside is exclusive to those from the countryside and, by virtue of that, that cities and towns are exclusive to those from towns and cities? This country — Ulster — is ours; it is everyone's to share and everyone's to enjoy.

Mr Wells: Yes, indeed. Ulster is ours, and Ulster will be ours. However, our countryside should be protected primarily for rural dwellers, who should not be squeezed out by commuters. The problem with Mr McGlone's motion is that it calls for Draft PPS 14 to be set aside and for all applications to be treated under the old policy. If that happens, there will be a tidal wave of speculative applications throughout the country, which will completely clog up the planning system and cause utter chaos in the Planning Service.

Mr McGlone: Will the Member give way?

Mr Wells: No. I only have a minute and a half left, and I have been quite generous.

I agree that a review of the policy is needed. We need to think about it very carefully, but we must be careful that our attempts are not completely negated by the time the review is completed because of the massive surge of speculative applications.

I am sure that Mr McGlone is aware that 2,500 applications poured in to Omagh divisional planning office in the three months leading to the Minister's announcements — simply based on a rumour of a change in policy. The situation will become absolutely unsustainable if the policy is brought crashing to its knees and the situation returns to a free-for-all.

Let us get round the table as MLAs and thrash out a policy that keeps rural communities thriving, but stops the speculation that is destroying our countryside.

11.00 am

Mr Cree: Madam Speaker, this is my first opportunity to speak in the Assembly, and I congratulate you on your appointment.

As a townie who lives in the rapidly diminishing countryside of North Down, I feel qualified to speak on this issue. The two Members who have spoken have given the different sides of the argument, and they are equally valid. As with many of the issues that have been and will be debated by this Assembly, rural planning policy and Draft PPS 14 demonstrate that Northern Ireland needs devolution. Without any input from locally elected representatives, an unaccountable direct rule Minister opted for a quick-fix approach to a serious environmental and community problem and arbitrarily imposed on Northern Ireland's rural communities an artificial one-size-fits-all approach.

That is how direct rule misgoverns Northern Ireland. As long as politics in this part of the United Kingdom remains in complacent talking-shop mode, the flaws and weaknesses seen in Draft PPS 14 will also be seen in numerous other direct rule decisions impacting on the social and economic fabric of our society. If this Assembly is sincere in saying to Northern Ireland's rural communities that it acknowledges the flaws of Draft PPS 14 and that it would act differently, then we should be moving beyond the complacent acceptance of direct rule and preparing to restore devolution.

There is little doubt that the aims of Draft PPS 14 should be supported. Protecting our rural environment through a sustainable approach to rural development is in the interests of rural communities and Northern Ireland as a whole. The countryside is a precious resource for the tourism industry; it contributes importantly to the quality of life in this part of the United Kingdom; and it sustains living, rural communities. Haphazard, random development threatens this, and it is right that rural planning policy should protect the fabric of our rural environment and rural communities.

However, if the aims of Draft PPS 14 are worthy of support, its mechanism is not. Draft PPS 14 is far too blunt an instrument. I have already described it as a one-size-fits-all approach. It fails to recognise the different contexts of, and challenges faced by, rural communities in different parts of Northern Ireland. The crude imposition of this measure — although typical of direct rule governance — ensured that the consent and consensus of rural communities and the farming community was not forthcoming. Again we see the arbitrary nature of direct rule failing to acknowledge the views and concerns of citizens and local communities.

Perhaps one of the most disturbing aspects of the direct rule Administration's imposition of Draft PPS 14 has been the manner in which this has unnecessarily and artificially placed the desire for vibrant rural and farming communities in conflict with the commitment to environmental protection and sustainable development. The partnership between rural and farming communities and environmental organisations has been a positive and welcome development over recent years in Northern Ireland. It has reminded us that the stewards of the countryside and the rural environment are the rural and farming communities. If a locally elected Assembly with legislative powers had been making the decision on rural planning, that productive partnership would have been reflected in our proceedings and determinations. We would have ensured that the need for planned growth in rural communities proceeded in a sustainable manner, protecting Northern Ireland's rural environment.

The motion calls for the development of a balanced policy for the sustainability of rural society and the environment. Many Members will have their doubts that the previous policy, contained in the 1993 rural planning strategy, represented a balanced approach. That is why as an alternative it would be wise to consider the amendment rather than give — as the motion does — a blank cheque to all rural planning applications received since 16 March. That said, the arbitrary imposition of Draft PPS 14 fails to provide a planning policy that has the confidence of rural and farming communities across Northern Ireland. The protection of the rural environment is not served by this flawed approach, and I urge the Assembly to support the amendment.

Mr McCarthy: Draft Planning Policy Statement 14 comes after a ministerial statement in January 2005 by the now departed cross-channel Ministers Angela Smith and John Spellar, which affected part of my Strangford constituency. Rural development in the Ards Peninsula has already suffered as a result of that statement, and now the same rural community is faced with further impediments by Draft PPS 14.

The objectives of Draft PPS 14 are laudable and sensible; our countryside is precious, and we have a duty to ensure that nothing is done to damage the character of the landscape, nature conservation interest and our built heritage. However, I am greatly concerned about the criteria contained in Draft PPS 14 and, in particular, the restrictions it may place on the farming community, farming families and their right to sell land.

Of the 14 separate policies, the most important is countryside policy 1, which stipulates that a presumption against development will be operated throughout the countryside with very little exception. My main concern is that rural communities are not detrimentally affected, or that loopholes and unseen technicalities may permit abuse by developers at the expense of genuine rural people, which was earlier acknowledged by my colleague Mr Wells.

Rural people must not be forced away from their birthplace and into villages, towns or cities against their expressed wish. As someone from a rural background, I have real worries that Draft PPS 14 may be a way of depopulating our countryside, with detrimental consequences for schools, churches, recreation and sporting activities, and the closure of small shops and post offices, which we have all fought to retain.

Rural communities must be protected and given every assistance to thrive and prosper. I fervently believe in the creation of a vibrant, local, rural population with associated economies, and I call on the Department for Rural Development, working in conjunction with rural constituents and various agencies, to ensure opportunities to promote the social and economic development of our rural areas.

The Alliance Party supports any practical measure to sustain farm businesses and diversification of work to ensure a decent income for rural dwellers. We also welcome moves to promote affordable social housing in rural areas to sustain the number of people residing in townlands or small settlements.

We welcome proposals to improve the character of rural settlements and make them more cohesive by making the quality and design of dwellings compatible with the surrounding landscape. People who live in a rural setting shape the countryside. Those with a long history in an area have an affinity with the local landscape, and will wish to retain that particular rural character.

Opportunity must be given to local people to maintain their families and communities in their own locality.

Sustainable development in the countryside should also consider the needs of rural economies and changes in working patterns. Remote working, diversification and better use of modern telecommunications bring challenges to the development of rural planning policy.

The Alliance Party, being fully supportive of all green and environmental issues, acknowledges the problem created by faulty septic tanks in rural areas. However, modern technology has overcome these problems, and we agree, in the interest of good environment, that every new dwelling in the countryside should have a modern, working septic tank, and perhaps some method for ensuring its efficiency could be instigated. However, that must not be a barrier to enhancing our rural fabric.

As I said earlier, Draft Planning Policy Statement 14 has many laudable objectives; however, it is vital that we get the balance right. We do not support a blanket ban on rural living and we look forward to a clearly revised rural development policy.

In conclusion, the Alliance Party wishes to see a lively, vibrant, rural population. We do not wish to see our countryside destroyed with huge continental-style buildings.

The planners themselves have in the past allowed monstrosities to be built in the country, on top of hills and along our coasts and shoreline — all totally out of keeping with the local landscape. We strongly oppose any move to depopulate our rural areas, and we fully support efforts to manage, expand and revitalise the existing rural community with sensible planning decisions commensurate with the needs of the local people. Is it not a pity that through the fault of some parties in this House, we, the elected Northern Ireland Assembly Members, are being denied the right to make decisions for our own people?

Mr Shannon: I welcome the opportunity to speak on Draft PPS 14. It presents a direct attack upon the rural community. I represent a rural area and am concerned by attacks upon the planning process and reductions in the number of dwellings that people are able to put forward. This planning statement has taken ownership of land out of the hands of landowners and farmers and placed it in the hands of the Planning Service and of those responsible for planning legislation and proposals. To me that is wrong. The Ulster Farmers' Union, the Rural Development Council, and the Northern Ireland Agricultural Producers Association have also stated their concerns, and people right across the community that I represent have said they are unhappy with Draft PPS 14.

Colleagues will know that we in Strangford have already encountered the Draft PPS 14 legislation, albeit under the guise of the Ards and Down draft area plan. The heart of Strangford has become a no-go area for planning as the green belt creeps across every mile of the Ards Peninsula, but until the ministerial directive, houses could still be built in the rural remainder.

I am opposed to the current Draft PPS 14 process. Due to ill health, a farmer and landowner in the Ards Peninsula missed the three-year deadline. Under Draft PPS 14 he cannot now gain a two-year grace period in which to build a house. He has lost that for ever through circumstances of ill health. That is just one example of how Draft PPS 14 disadvantages people.

Mrs I Robinson: Will the Member agree that it is about time that the Planning Service employed within each area a person with a medical background to sit on panels when planning applications made on health grounds only are being discussed?

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Shannon: I thank the Member for her comments, and I will return to that issue later. I have been a councillor for 21 years and have been involved in planning matters during that time. In all those 21 years, of dozens upon dozens of applications on health grounds, only three have been passed. My colleague is correct: we need a panel to address medical concerns. I wish that one were in place.

I put it to the Assembly that before Draft PPS 14 — and here I must disagree with my colleague Mr Wells — the planning legislation in place and the Ards and Down draft area plan were already controlling the number of single dwellings in the Ards Peninsula and the Ards borough. Eighty-five per cent of applications for single dwellings in the Ards Peninsula were refused. That figure demonstrates that the rules and legislation in place were already controlling numbers. The existing process was capable of managing applications and ensuring sustainability of the countryside. The planners were able to state where an application was sustainable, and while I did not agree with every decision they made, at least there was an opportunity under that system for people in the rural community to build a house. Not everyone was building to sell; a lot of farmers and landowners wanted to pass on that opportunity to their children.

There may be exceptions to that, but should one bad apple ruin the whole bag? I do not think that it should, and that is what is wrong.

With regard to farm dwellings for sons and daughters, I reiterate the point: Draft PPS 14 will dramatically change the opportunities for sons and daughters, and it will penalise farmers and landowners who on occasions, because of financial necessity, have to sell a dwelling or a site on their land. Under Draft PPS 14, a son or daughter will lose the right to build a house. That is what worries me about the process. Also, it is proposed that Draft PPS 14 will be retrospective regarding sons and daughters. In that case, will a farmer be able to build a house for a son or daughter in the future? I suggest that under Draft PPS 14 that will not be possible.

Mr Robert McCartney: Can the Member explain the sudden surge in the number of applications — from 3,000 to 8,500 — on the basis of farmers' sons and daughters suddenly deciding that they require planning permission?

Mr Shannon: I can speak only about what I know. The Downpatrick divisional planning office has already seen a decrease in the number of applications. I return to my point: the Planning Service turned down 85% of applications in the Ards Peninsula before Draft PPS 14. Therefore a system had been in place.

Under Draft PPS 14 — and I refer to what planning officers say at site meetings — if an application can be changed to include minimal improvements, a replacement dwelling should be passed. I suggest, however, that Draft PPS 14 takes away the right of those who want a replacement dwelling and removes the opportunity for a landowner to have a house.

Years ago, families of six or eight children were reared in small cottages, but in today's society the footprint needs to be larger than the cottage. Therefore Draft PPS 14 denies the opportunity for replacement dwellings of a suitable design and structure, which is important.

I mentioned health, as did my colleague Mrs Robinson, so I shall leave that matter for other Members who may wish to comment on it.

With regard to diversification into tourism, it concerns me that Draft PPS 14 will have serious implications and will tax the very core of business in the countryside. We need the opportunity to have site meetings, and it worries me that under Draft PPS 14 that is denied.

There needs to be a reduction in the power of the Planning Service; encouragement for business opportunity in the rural hinterland; and a dwelling for a son or daughter without terms and conditions. Draft PPS 14 extends to the planners a level of control way beyond their past remit and in turn forces upon the rural community legislative changes that it does not need.

Mr Armstrong: One of the most important issues facing the rural community is the severe legislation, announced by Lord Rooker on 16 March 2006, that effectively bans one-off houses in the countryside. We have a beautiful countryside in Northern Ireland, and we should preserve it. The current proposals are too sweeping, too restrictive and take no account of their potential impact on rural families.

Planning permission should not be limited to the zoned development areas. To limit development to towns, villages and hamlets would be in direct contrast to the prevailing rural character. The main problem is caused by property speculators, some of whom see only pound signs, who come into country areas and buy up small farms. They exploit the whole area. Northern Ireland is not like rural England; people here do not live in nicely defined villages. Restricted development zones, with no building in the open countryside, would result in towns and villages becoming bigger and merging, and losing any sense of individual identity. Our smaller villages are already being swallowed up by larger towns.

If such a policy is to support sustainable rural communities, however, it must provide for the planned and sustainable growth of rural communities, as opposed to stifling any rural growth. Planning laws alone will not produce sustainable communities; they require strong Government support for rural development.

A sustainable rural environment and sustainable rural communities require careful integrated planning that allows for planned growth while protecting the needs of those who already live in the countryside. It is essential, therefore, that the new planning laws allow farming families to build family dwellings on their land. Otherwise, rural areas should be deprived of young people once they reach the age at which they need to step on to the property ladder, and that would result in the death of rural communities.

We must do everything possible to keep our rural communities alive. Those communities will suffer because they are unable to offer housing to employees of expanding businesses. The proposed policy will strangle rural enterprises, and rural communities will stagnate.

The proposed legislation will damage what it sets out to protect. The inevitable result of the severe restrictions on building will be a further rise in the already record level of house prices in Northern Ireland. That will put home ownership further out of reach. The restrictions will have a devastating effect, especially west of the Bann.

Agriculture remains Northern Ireland's largest employer, and we must encourage our young people into that industry in order to sustain it. If the proposed new planning laws are applied, more rural schools, post offices and churches will close. Areas will be unlivable, and they will become virtual deserts.

The huge attendance at public meetings has borne out that there are strong views on the matter. Unquestionably, there are rural areas in Northern Ireland in which haphazard development has further damaged our environment, marred our landscape and acted against the interests of rural communities. There are many unanswered questions to which the public have a right to know the answers. The Planning Service revealed that those applications that are still in the system could be judged against the new policy, while those deemed invalid from 16 March 2006 should be determined in accordance with the new policy.

The planning laws need to take account of the unique rural asset base and of the need to manage and protect our rural way of life in Northern Ireland. Planning policy must be joined up among different agencies and Departments, such as the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development, the Environment and Heritage Service (EHS) in the Department of the Environment, the Department for Regional Development, the Department of Education and the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (DHSSPS). Those Departments play key roles, as no Department is responsible at present for rural Northern Ireland.

I share the views of one architect who said that it took the Department for Regional Development two years to reach a conclusion on the blanket ban, yet people were given only 12 weeks for consultation. The consultation period closes on 9 June.

I find it ironic that, although Lord Rooker compared figures on the number of planning applications received in Northern Ireland to those in the rest of the UK and accepted that those are not sustainable, he failed to mention that John Prescott, the Deputy Prime Minister, supported one of the biggest building schemes approved in green-belt land — the decision, as a result of a housing shortage, to build 3,600 houses in Hertfordshire.

Draft Planning Policy Statement 14 simply fails to understand the complexity of Northern Ireland's countryside. The planning of rural dwellings must involve consideration of a huge number of factors, but it is completely unfair for the Government to introduce such sweeping legislation with only a 12-week consultation period.

Ms Ritchie: The direct rule Administration has attempted to justify Draft Planning Policy Statement 14 as necessary:

“to manage growth in the countryside to achieve appropriate and sustainable patterns of development that meet the essential needs of a vibrant rural community”.

It will not. Contrary to what Jim Wells said, the draft policy will strangle vibrant communities.

Another objective of the policy statement is to improve:

“the accessibility of the rural community to employment, services and regional amenities”.

That is not the case: the policy is, in fact, crudely anti-development.

In his statement of 16 March, the then Minister with responsibility for Regional Development, Shaun Woodward, said that Draft PPS 14:

“proposes a presumption against ... development in the countryside”.

He also stated:

“strict controls on development will operate to meet the essential needs of the rural community”.

How will the Minister's statement help to sustain the rural way of life over the next 20 to 25 years? How can he both protect vibrant communities and block the building of houses? That is the challenge facing the Secretary of State and the rest of the direct rule Administration. The Assembly has no competence or powers to deal with Mr Wells's amendment. The matter needs to go directly to the Secretary of State in order for there to be change. When taken with the ministerial statement, the contradictions inherent in Draft PPS 14 suggest that it is simply another example of the Government saying no in different ways.

The direct rule Administration's programme for managing the development of the countryside has been particularly dictatorial. The Member for Strangford Mr Shannon referred to the draft 'Ards and Down Area Plan 2015'. Speaking from a South Down perspective, the draft area plan has been implemented, as a result of the joint ministerial statement of 31 January 2005, in advance of planning-inquiry hearings that recommence next month. As with Draft PPS 14, no consultation took place on the draft area plan; it simply was written large over the rural area. The greater part of Down is now green belt, with people having to prove that they need to live in a rural area.

However, the draft area plan pre-dates 16 March 2006. The Planning Appeals Commission's (PAC) role in the planning inquiry has been usurped, and the imposition of the ministerial statement of 16 March has rendered meaningless the consultation measures that were in place.

As we know, and as has been mentioned in the House today, Draft PPS 14 may have been issued for consultation on 16 March, but its effect is to supersede all previous planning policies for the rural area. All new planning applications that have been submitted since 17 March will be judged against the criteria that are contained in Draft PPS 14. Therefore, the consultation process on the area plan has been a total nonsense. Certain applications' special circumstances will no longer be taken into account, and powers for areas of special control, which I know only too well from a constituency perspective, will be strengthened to prevent development within their boundaries. Not only is no prior consultation to take place with local authorities and others, but none of the normal procedures has been adhered to. In the past, public inquiries could be held when there was considerable objection to a measure. In this case, the public's rights have been violated and totally ignored. Where is the fairness and equity in this matter for rural communities?

It is time for the direct rule Administration to recognise that the majority of rural dwellers are custodians of the countryside. They want to preserve their environment. The consequences of Draft PPS 14 will probably not be felt immediately in the countryside, but, in the longer term, Draft PPS 14 will inevitably lead to the contraction of the population.

Government policies were supposed to prevent depopulation, through “Crossroads” housing development and small-job enterprises, and through an interdepartmental approach to rural regeneration. The reverse, however, will happen. Forcing people to move to towns will lead to that eventual contraction of population. Fewer houses being built will have an impact on the viability and sustainability of the local school, shop, filling station and car-repair outlet, and on church attendances.

Parents will be forced to find someone else to look after their children after school or during school holidays, because the children’s grandmother or aunt now lives too far away. Is that sustainable development? Do we want that to happen? Pending restoration of the institutions, we must ensure that we send a message to the Secretary of State to withdraw this document, which included no mechanism for consultation.

11.30 am

For many years, the Department of the Environment and the Planning Service have been totally inconsistent in their approaches to rural-planning applications. That has led not only to an unequal and unfair approach to the distribution of development in the countryside but to a presumption in some parts of favouring an “anything goes” policy — Members have already referred to that fact — and giving planning approval to Spanish-style villas while not allowing small alterations to bungalows, or even the building of bungalows.

Pending the restoration of the political institutions, the Secretary of State must withdraw Draft PPS 14; that is the message that we must send to him today. If people want to bury something, they create a committee. Do not let the Secretary of State off the hook. Do not allow him to fob off the problem under the pretence that this Assembly has powers and competence over building or strategic planning matters; it does not. We must keep it simple. We need to tell the Secretary of State that this Assembly wants Draft PPS 14 withdrawn, and he needs to go back to the drawing board to prepare a planning policy that reflects the needs of rural and farming communities and sustains the rural way of life.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I welcome the opportunity to debate rural planning, which has been afforded by the motion and the amendment. Many points have been raised. Indeed, the amendment allows me to reflect on the charitable view of my colleague that we all have our “Jim Wells” to bear. We bear with him on this issue, and I heard what he had to say. There are important issues to consider.

The motion should not be concerned only with Draft PPS 14 and the manner in which it was introduced. It should also address the fact that Government policy on the treatment of the countryside and countryside planning is fundamentally flawed. As Ms Ritchie rightly said, there are policies in place, which, if implemented consistently, would lead to good practice across the country.

Many of us deal with planning applications in our constituencies. Similar applications will be submitted, and the same planning officer will take a different view on how he or she interprets the policy and how it is implemented in practice. Members visit neighbouring constituencies and find that planning officers are not implementing policy consistently. It is a question of ensuring that policy and practice are consistent across rural Ulster. If we achieve that consistency, we will have made progress. The Planning Service should put its mind to achieving that consistency.

There is no doubt that rural and urban planning are in crisis. There are a number of reasons for that. The number of planning applications has increased, but it is not at the level given by Lord Rooker. Lord Rooker told a lie in Draft PPS 14 when he stated that there were over 9,500 planning approvals in one year. There was nowhere near that number of approvals in one year. He was absolutely wrong. In many cases, he triple counted.

Lord Rooker also failed to take account of certain factors. He said that the high number of planning applications was destroying the Planning Service’s ability to process them. However, far more planning objections than planning applications are launched in Northern Ireland. Last year, 55,000 planning objections were launched, irrespective of planning applications. A further 30,000 objections were lodged against the published area plans. Staff in any planning office — be it in Coleraine, Ballymena, Downpatrick or Omagh — will agree that such a flood of objections, many of them from professional objectors who object for the sake of it, slows down the planning process and destroys many development opportunities in the countryside and across Northern Ireland.

The Planning Service has failed completely to implement its policies on time and on target. For example, the Roads Service’s target is that 65% of all applications should be returned, either approved or rejected, within 15 days. In 75% of cases, the Roads Service misses that target by 35 days. The Water Service is the only service that is consistently on time. The Environmental Heritage Service, the supposed guardian of the countryside, has the worst record of all; over 88% of EHS responses to applications are 94 days late.

The planning crisis is not due to the number of applications but to the Planning Service being unable to handle the planning process. Some officials and professional objectors take a ruinous approach, with the result that economic development has slowed down completely. Planning does not sit all on its own; it affects our economy, our people and attempts to make Northern Ireland work as a whole. Statistics show that because the planning process is not working, business opportunities are being ruined.

A report published by Investment Belfast, 'Investing in Regeneration: Unlocking the Belfast Opportunity', makes a critical point. It states:

"Delays ... in processing major planning applications"

— meaning planning applications for business and job opportunities —

"are unacceptable and will lead to investment opportunities being missed or directed elsewhere."

The report also states that during the past two years, Northern Ireland investors spent £1 billion, not in Northern Ireland, but in GB or the Republic of Ireland. Opportunities are missed, which is a disaster for job creation. Planning is at the heart of the issue, and if we do not get planning right, we will ruin our economy. That is why I object to Draft PPS 14. It is ruining business opportunities and prospects for rural development.

Mr S Wilson: Will the Member give way?

Mr Paisley Jnr: Of course I will give way, but do not be flippant. [Laughter.]

Mr S Wilson: I am never flippant. I am not renowned for that at all. [Laughter.]

Does the Member agree that tourism is a big economic growth area? If Northern Ireland is to capitalise on its tourist potential, it is important that our natural heritage is not destroyed. For that reason, sensitive rural areas must be protected.

Mr Paisley Jnr: The Member makes a quite brilliant point, and I welcome that. He also made a brilliant speech on this issue in the House of Commons recently; I recommend that Members read that speech in Hansard.

The Member is absolutely right. When tourists visit Northern Ireland, we must ensure that they have something to see. Tourists also need somewhere to stay, but there are not enough bed and breakfasts or hotels. People do not have enough to do when they visit. The Member's point is that we must have balance, which is critical.

A couple of points are absolutely critical —

Madam Speaker: Order. I am sorry, but the Member is out of time; in fact, he has gone over his time.

Mr Elliott: It has been suggested that the debate could continue until 5.00 pm. Given the flow of some Members, the debate could well go on until that time.

I reject the Draft PPS 14 proposals. They are too restrictive and will destroy the countryside and the rural community's way of life.

I support the amendment, provided that the suggested working party is a genuine attempt to create a positive, balanced approach, which I trust is integral to the amendment.

There is a lack of consistency throughout the Planning Service. That has been highlighted during this morning's debate. There is also a lack of consistency in the Planning Appeals Commission, which regularly overturns planning decisions that were possibly perfectly correct. It does not substantiate appeals that should be allowed to continue.

However, if this policy is to support sustainable rural communities, it must provide for the planned and sustainable growth in those communities that we need in Northern Ireland. I do not believe that that is contained in Draft PPS 14; I am not sure whether it is contained within the old planning strategy for Northern Ireland either, and that is why we do need a balanced and effective policy in this Province.

I also support the protection of the assets of the rural environment and the promotion of sustainable development, and I understand the pressures and threats to Northern Ireland's countryside caused by the increasing demand for single rural dwellings. That is a result of many factors, not least the Department's plan-making process, which has triggered a rush to secure the planning permissions before the shutters come down. We are realising that throughout Northern Ireland.

PPS 14 has been submitted in draft form for discussion, but simultaneously a policy of presumption against new development in the whole of the Northern Ireland countryside has been implemented, with very limited exceptions. The identified pressures and the flood of applications that result when a tightening of policy is imminent would suggest that this is a holding policy, pending a detailed consideration of the new rural policy after the consultation period.

The clear purpose of this policy is to urbanise the rural population of Northern Ireland, and that is an unacceptable basis for the changes to rural policy proposed in the Department for Regional Development's Draft PPS 14. Many areas of Northern Ireland, such as Fermanagh, are remote from the population pressures of the Belfast metropolitan area. They do not exhibit the characteristics of an urbanised countryside but are areas of large extensive countryside with a low population density and perhaps only one sizeable town.

The characteristic countryside areas, with their small fields, farmsteads, isolated individual houses, dispersed rural communities, "Crossroads" housing groupings and small settlements and villages — together with the rural-based buildings for religious, social, sporting and business purposes and activities — are all part of the network of human and natural interactions that make up the very important and continuing cultural landscape of our rural areas.

I suggest that there is an opportunity to provide for regional circumstances in this situation through the local area plans and to remove the one-size-fits-all policy throughout Northern Ireland, which is detrimental to all areas of the Province. For far too long, we have had Government-produced policies that may be good for urban areas of Northern Ireland but are harmful and negative to rural areas, and indeed, it may be the other way round.

The legislation as proposed will damage what it sets out to protect, and the inevitable result of the severe restrictions on building will be that house prices in Northern Ireland rise from their already record levels. That will put home ownership, particularly for first-time buyers, almost out of reach. Those restrictions will have a devastating effect on the entire Province, but in particular, on the west of the Province.

If Draft PPS 14 has not confused the public enough, a question-and-answer session is published on the Planning Service website that confuses the public even more. I must say that it is with disquiet that we look at those questions and answers. I shall quote from one answer on the website:

“When published in its final form it is intended that the designations green belt, countryside area and dispersed rural communities will be withdrawn. The designation of exceptional landscapes, where there will be a strong presumption against any development, will be retained and these will be referred to as Special Countryside Areas.”

That is even more confusing than what we already have. That statement suggests that the final PPS 14 will retain the general presumption against rural development throughout Northern Ireland.

Is the consultation merely an exercise in commenting on the wording of specific policies in the draft document rather than a proper forum for discussing its more fundamental aspects? That is what I hope that the working party will actually do.

Draft PPS 14 justifies its restrictive policy on rural development on environmental protection and sustainable development grounds, but it also appears to be an exercise in ensuring that targets are met and books balanced with regard to housing figures and housing growth indicators. It especially appears to be an exercise in achieving targets for increasing the overall percentage of regional housing development within existing settlements. The agriculture and farming community of Northern Ireland will drastically suffer if Draft PPS 14 continues to be implemented.

Mr Morrow: I welcome the debate. I suspect that no other issue in Northern Ireland has generated so much debate and concern, not only here in this Assembly but in most rural councils, if not all 26 councils.

We must first recognise that there has been a problem with planning in the countryside. If we claim that everything is perfect with regard to planning in the countryside, we will fool not just ourselves but the people who live and work in rural areas. Those of us who do not support this policy are not arguing for one second that there should be a completely free rein on building in the countryside. Anyone who thinks that there should be can look at the failures in County Donegal, where there is a bungalow blight. This issue is about ensuring a sensible level of development instead of an overzealous prohibition of virtually all building in the countryside.

The aims and objectives of Draft PPS 14 state that the proposals are to manage growth in the countryside; to meet the needs of a vibrant rural community; and to allow a sustainable rural economy. No Member in this House would disagree with those aims. However, it seems that the Minister has published a draft strategy that will do its best to defeat them. For example, the section outlining the assessment of farm viability states that:

“The onus will be on the applicant to show that the proposed occupant is sufficiently involved in farming, to be considered mainly working in agriculture on the farm, and that it is essential that he or she should live there, for the working of that farm. Proposals for dwellings associated with “hobby” farms or enterprises where the proposed occupant’s main source of income is from another job or where he is semi-retired, will generally fail because of the viability test.”

The Northern Ireland agricultural census for June 2005 showed that there are just over 18,000 full-time farmers here. However, Draft PPS 14 would immediately categorise the 14,400 part-time farmers as hobby farmers, simply because they may not be sufficiently involved in farming to be considered as mainly working in agriculture. Draft PPS 14 is supposed to be a document that will deliver a vibrant rural economy. I am not for one second suggesting that agriculture is the sole economic driver in the rural community, but it most certainly is the most significant player.

Draft PPS 14 also seems to actively contradict other Government policies designed to reinvigorate the rural economy. The Department of Agriculture and Rural Development recently launched a policy to encourage young entrants into the agriculture industry. As a party, we have called for such a scheme to be introduced and welcome the move towards helping to restructure the agriculture industry. This policy requires applicants simply to “have an economically ‘viable’ holding”. They need not be considered as mainly working in agriculture because, I assume, of the recognition that many young people starting out in agriculture will be involved in other employment.

Those young people, who were encouraged to enter the agriculture industry, could now find themselves unable to build a house to live in. Having been told that they were viable farmers by the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development, they are now being told by another Government Department that they are only hobby farmers. It seems that joined-up government is not functioning very well.

I use agriculture as an example because many people find it difficult to understand how this policy could support a vibrant rural economy when it may be detrimental to the agricultural economy. This is a policy that has heavy-handedly tried to solve a problem. As I have said, there may well be a problem regarding development in the countryside, but it will not be solved by Draft PPS 14, which will create more problems.

The Government have not only managed to create opposition to this policy, but, by the way in which they have attempted to drive it through, they have created more and more suspicion. This seems to have been the only Government policy in recent years that had so-called public consultation events for which the public and elected representatives were required to pre-book. Why was that introduced solely for this policy? It does nothing other than create the impression that the Government are determined to drive this through while hearing as little opposition from the public as possible.

Draft PPS 14 will have an impact on other issues. Madam Speaker, there are literally thousands of people on the housing waiting list. There is a housing crisis out there. The Housing Executive has taken its eye off the wheel and has fallen asleep. It refuses to acknowledge that there is a real housing crisis. Can anyone for a moment imagine how Draft PPS 14 is going to exacerbate that whole situation and make it infinitely worse?

Mr McCarthy: The sooner you get back there, the better.

Mr Morrow: I hear what you say, Kieran. [Laughter.]

I have also with me today a copy of the 'Northern Ireland Quarterly House Price Index for Quarter 4 2005'. This was published before Lord Rooker made his Draft PPS 14 announcement. In Fermanagh and South Tyrone, average prices rose by over 30% in that quarter. The average overall price for a home in Fermanagh and South Tyrone is just short of £161,000. That was before Lord Rooker's Draft PPS 14. Can anyone for a second imagine the impact that his policy will have on house prices?

Madam Speaker: I must ask the Member to draw his remarks to a close.

Mr Morrow: Yes, I will. I spoke to an estate agent last week. A former Housing Executive house in Dungannon is now selling at £176,000 and rising. I think, Madam Speaker, we have to agree that people are going to go out of buying altogether. First-time buyers are not going to get a chance.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Ba mhaith liom díriú ar an toradh a bheas ag 'Dréachtráiteas Polasaí Pleanála 14' ar scoileanna beaga tuaithe. Mar is eol do Chomhaltaí, tá cuid mhór dár scoileanna beaga tuaithe faoi bhagairt cheana féin. Tá sé ag cur crua orthu fanacht ar oscailt faoi na cúinsi atá i bhfeidhm faoi láthair.

Madam Speaker, I would like to draw attention to the effects that Draft PPS 14 will have on rural schools. As Members will be aware, many rural schools are already under threat and are finding it increasingly difficult to stay open under present circumstances. The rural school is a unique feature of country life and an integral part of the local rural community. Schools in rural communities play many roles. They are part of the community's shared history and tradition, and a hub for many of the community's activities.

Chomh maith le bunoidéachas a chur ar fáil, is ionad í an scoil d'imeachtaí sóisialta, cultúrtha, spóirt agus gnothaí eile pobail. Tá sé deacair ag pobal maireachtáil mura mbíonn scoil ann. Bíonn an scoil mar shiombail aitheanta de phobal neamhspleách beo.

In addition to providing for basic education, rural schools serve their communities as social and cultural centres. They are places for sports, amateur drama, music and other civic activities. A school is essential to the survival of a rural community.

Ní amháin go gcuireann scoil oideachas ar fáil do phobal, cuireann sí fostaíocht ar fáil i gceantair ina mbíonn easpa fostaíochta de ghnáth: fostaíocht do mhúinteoirí, fheighlithe, chócairí, agus lucht glanta.

Schools not only meet the educational needs of a community; they are a source of employment for residents where jobs are usually extremely scarce — jobs for teachers, cleaners, dinner ladies and caretakers.

Tá pobail tuaithe á gcrá ag dúnadh a gcuid scoileanna le 20 nó 30 bliain anuas, agus is léir titim thubaisteach ar a líon le linn an ama sin. Cuirfidh 'Dréachtráiteas Polasaí Pleanála 14' le luas na titime sin. Tá sé bagartha ag an Státrúnaí Peter Hain agus ag an iarAire Oideachais Angela Smith go ndúnfar tuilleadh scoileanna. Cibé is féidir linn a dhéanamh le scoileanna tuaithe a choinneáil ar oscailt, is beag is fiú ár saothar mura mbíonn na daltaí ann le freastal orthu.

School closures have been the bane of rural communities for many years. The number of rural schools has fallen drastically in the past 30 years. Draft PPS 14 will accelerate the decline of rural schools. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr D Bradley: Both the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, Peter Hain, and the former Minister with responsibility for Education, Angela Smith, have threatened that further school closures are on the way. Whatever we have to do to keep rural schools open, there is little we can do if the pupils are not there to take up the places. This draft policy statement will ensure that they will not be.

Tabharfar ar theaghlaigh feirmeoirí nach mbeidh cead acu tithe a thógáil ar a gcuid talaimh féin dul a chónaí sna bailte móra, rud a fhágfas go mbeidh líon na bpáistí faoin tuath — a bhfuil scoileanna tuaithe ag brath orthu dá mbeo — ag dul i laghad de shíor. Dúnfar níos mó scoileanna dá bharr.

Farming families who cannot build on their own land will be forced to live in the towns, thus decreasing the pool of pupils rural schools have to draw upon. The inevitable consequences will be the closure of more rural schools.

Cé go ndearbhaíonn an Roinn Talmhaíochta agus Forbartha Tuaithe go ndearna sí an tionchar a bheas ag an pholasáí seo ar shaol na tuaithe a mheas, dealraíonn sé go raibh an Roinn dall ar an drochthionchar a bheas ag an pholasáí. Má tá an saol tuaithe le mairstin, caithfear impleachtaí an pholasáí seo a athmheas, go háirithe i bhfianaise an drochthionchair a bheas aige ar scoileanna tuaithe. Mura ndéantar amhlaidh, déanfar slad ar scoileanna agus ar phobail tuaithe.

Although DARD claims that Draft PPS 14 has gone through a rigorous rural-proofing process, many of the negative effects of this policy on rural communities seem to have been ignored. Its effect will be the wide-scale closure of numerous rural schools, which will have a devastating effect on rural communities. It is for those reasons that I commend the motion. Go raibh míle maith agat.

Mr Poots: Madam Speaker, I congratulate you on your appointment. On reflection, I am glad that I was so kind to you when I was Chairperson of the Committee of the Centre, but then I am just an inoffensive individual by character.

I welcome today's debate and the fact that Mr McGlone has brought it forward in a competent manner, unlike last week's lead speaker for the SDLP, whose contribution was inept. I also note the absence of Sinn Féin from this important planning debate. It is fairly good at planning, however; while Bill Clinton was making his first visit here, it was planning on blowing up Canary Wharf. During the 2004 negotiations, it was planning the Northern Bank robbery, so, in its absence, we wonder what it is planning today.

12.00 noon

Mr Weir: Does the Member agree that the party that sits opposite, but is absent today, is much more adept at demolition than at building in the countryside?

Mr Poots: It certainly has an absence of constructive things to apply to Northern Ireland.

We hear much about sustainability. The document must be judged on its sustainability in relation to rural policy. The three measures of sustainability are whether the economy is improved, whether society is helped and whether the environment is protected. Using those measures, the document fails miserably.

I will talk first about the economy. Traditionally in Northern Ireland, there has been a presumption in favour of development. That presumption should remain, and, setting other conditions to one side, Draft PPS 14 has the ability to do that. Countryside policy 11, on rural character, states that:

"Planning permission will be granted for a building in the countryside where it does not cause a detrimental change to, or further erode the character of an area.

A new building will be unacceptable where:

- (a) it is unduly prominent in the landscape; or
- (b) it results in a build-up of development when viewed with existing and approved buildings; or
- (c) it does not respect the traditional pattern of settlement exhibited in that area; or
- (d) it creates or adds to a ribbon of development".

That sets out the generality of rural character. The DUP has no issue with that. The problem is that the Planning Service has not been applying that over the past number of years. There has been a lack of consistency. Because of the Planning Service's inability to apply its own criteria, it is using a sledgehammer to crack a nut by introducing a policy that discriminates against an entire rural community.

The DUP can also live with countryside policy 10, which concerns the integration and design of buildings in the countryside. It states that:

"A new building will be unacceptable where:

- (a) it is a prominent feature in the landscape; or
- (b) ... lacks... natural boundaries...
- (c) it relies primarily on the use of new landscaping."

The DUP has no problem with all those issues. The problem is with the idea of a blanket ban, whereby exceptional need must be demonstrated before development in the countryside is allowed. I know many farmers who will not be able to develop properties on their land for their families. There is a substantial area of green belt in my council area, and I understand exactly what will be applied throughout Northern Ireland.

Mr S Wilson: Does the Member accept that some farmers have, however, abused the system? It is quite common to hear people say that they have six, seven, and sometimes 19 permissions. That is clearly development for more than just their family.

Mr Poots: Absolutely, but those are exceptions rather than the rule. Why should everybody be persecuted because individuals abuse the system? Why should they be persecuted because of the Planning Service's inability to stand up to those who are abusing the system and tell them that they will not get, and do not need, 19 sites? The Planning Service should use countryside policy 11, as set out in Draft PPS 14, against those individuals, because 19 sites on 50 acres of land is not appropriate and would not be allowed if that document were properly applied.

A Member mentioned tourism earlier. We met the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development to discuss the awarding of grant aid. We discovered that around £7.5 million in Building Sustainable Prosperity (BSP) grants had been awarded for rural diversification and tourism. However, £2.5 million had to be handed back because planning permission could not be obtained. Where is the joined-up government when the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development awards a grant because it identifies a good scheme that will help business and tourism and improve the Northern Ireland economy — yet the Planning Service rejects the scheme?

On reflection, that was before Draft PPS 14 was introduced, when 30% of Northern Ireland was green belt. Now virtually all grant applications will be rejected because that policy document will not allow the development of rural diversification into tourism or other business opportunities. That will not help Northern Ireland's economy.

The case was made that tourism is an essential growth area for Northern Ireland. Tourism revenue in the Republic of Ireland and Scotland accounts for 7% of their respective gross domestic product; in Northern Ireland, the figure is between 2% and 3%. How can tourism growth be generated without allowing development? Development is a critical driver. It has helped the Irish Republic's economy, along with foreign direct investment and the establishment of small- and medium-sized enterprises. Development has been a critical aspect of the improvement in the Irish Republic's economy.

Stifling development in this country will lead to an economy that stagnates and suffers. It is critically important that development be allowed to continue in Northern Ireland. The Planning Service has a job to do in protecting the environment and allowing development that is sympathetic to the environment. It is not its job to stifle growth and to create further stagnation in Northern Ireland.

There are many derelict buildings in the countryside that are eyesores, but replacement of them is not allowed. As a result of Government policies, BSE, foot-and-mouth disease and a range of other issues, many farms are derelict and falling down. Ultimately, it would be better to revamp those properties and turn them into rural businesses.

If this policy is implemented, and if the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development continues to implement its current policies, the farming community will be discriminated against. Many farmers have substantial units, and I have been present with farmers when officials from the Department have said that no need for a second dwelling on the farm has been demonstrated.

Madam Speaker: Members will know that the Business Committee has arranged to meet at lunchtime today. I therefore propose, by leave of the Assembly, to suspend the sitting until 2.30 pm to allow the Business Committee to meet at 12.30 pm.

I have had to do very little curtailing this morning, and I thank Members for their co-operation.

The sitting was suspended at 12.06 pm.

On resuming (Madam Speaker in the Chair) —

2.30 pm

Mr P Ramsey: Madam Speaker, like other Members, I congratulate you on your appointment. I wish you well, and I hope that you can make that job much more sustainable for the Assembly.

There was a good debate in the Chamber this morning and a consensus for the way forward on planning. The SDLP would like the Secretary of State to acknowledge, respect and take account of this debate. There is no point in debate unless there is something meaningful at the end of the process.

Draft PPS 14 is an attempt to reverse a pattern of dispersed rural settlements that has characterised the Irish countryside for years. It will have major implications for rural society if people are forbidden to live where they were born and reared and instead are directed into towns and cities.

It is clear— even from a Derry City perspective — that previous planning policies have been harsh on deferrals, and the incidence of planning office meetings in Derry in respect of single dwellings is high. The discussion this morning highlighted the level of inconsistency from town to town and from one planning officer to another. The parties were united in their thoughts on the planning process.

Draft PPS 14 will have a major knock-on effect on rural life, especially in the price of affordable housing and in the quantity of available housing. Members have said that the cost of sites has rocketed since Lord Rooker's announcement. That will be compounded by the effect of industrial derating, particularly in border towns, as was discussed in our first debate on the economy. Existing rural companies and businesses will be forced to move across to Southern Ireland for cheaper rates, and that will have a negative impact on the range and quality of services, such as schools, shops and post offices, available to people in rural areas. The overall effect on rural parishes, including sporting and cultural organisations, is incalculable.

The present chaos in retail planning is having a detrimental effect, and there will be further unforeseen consequences for small businesses, most notably in construction and in local commercial developments. Architects and building suppliers, whose businesses are predominately dependent on single houses in the countryside, are already concerned about the potential downturn in their businesses.

The new Minister should, as a matter of urgency, release a draft retail planning policy with immediate effect. Lord Rooker would have been better placed to make decisions had he put more human resources into the planning process so that the obvious inconsistencies in the various council areas could have been dealt with.

The planning appeals system is not able to cope with demand, as it does not have the human resources to prepare and advance its arguments — unlike some of the bigger developers.

In my own constituency, I hope that the planners will honour their agreement to relocate a number of homes in the Eglinton area that have been affected by the safety works at the City of Derry Airport. The homeowners were promised relocation prior to the introduction of Draft PPS 14, and, although it has been announced that state aid has been resolved, it is hoped that that decision will not be reneged on or delayed any further.

We must engage specialist planning opinion before making a formal response to this draconian ruling by Lord Rooker, who has embarked on a solo run to save planet earth without any regard for public representatives or public opinion.

A fundamental error of judgement is that only farmers should have to justify living in the countryside. The rural community is further made up of many families whose roots are there and who are equal partners in its regeneration. In fact, 80% of the rural community is not involved in the agriculture industry. There has been no formal consultation with the hundreds of stakeholders and groups who have been rebuilding rural communities that have been devastated by decades of decline.

The countryside has become a more attractive place for people to live in recent years, but this policy will price out many rural people. Local councillors are aghast that this moratorium has effectively cancelled the right of rural dwellers — and their sons and daughters — to live in the countryside. It has caused a great deal of anger and frustration among people who have not exploited planning regulations and seek nothing more than for their sons and daughters to live in the area where they were brought up.

The Secretary of State must take into account Members' opinions on planning law. Unless he does, there is little point in the SDLP participating in debates in this Chamber. Other important debates, on a range of issues, are pending. We need a quick response from the Secretary of State to cease implementation of Draft PPS 14.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Berry: First, Madam Speaker, I wish you well in your new role, as many Members have done.

I welcome the debate, and have found it helpful. I support the amendment and wish to record my total opposition to Draft PPS 14 because of the undemocratic way in which it was announced. The Government, and especially Lord Rooker, thrust it upon the community and elected representatives, who have had to bear the brunt of it. The announcement has caused considerable concern, mainly in the rural community.

We do not sympathise with the developers and those who have strangled the rural community over the past number of years, but with those who have been brought up in the countryside, not only in the farming community but those living in single dwellings, with children who also wish to live in the countryside. With Draft PPS 14, the Government are forcing young people from the countryside into towns and villages. That will have a detrimental effect on the rural community: on churches; community halls; schools; and the entire rural system.

Several Members mentioned soaring house prices, which have been at an all-time high in recent years. A developer recently told me that he intends to build 70 houses in a village in my constituency of Newry and Armagh, and 300 people have put their names down for them. House prices will go through the roof as a result, and first-time buyers will find it impossible to get on the property ladder.

A balanced approach is needed. If the implementation of Draft PPS 14 ceased today, I would be seriously concerned that the floodgates would open and developers could throw in applications. On this month's planning list schedule for Armagh City and District Council, one developer has submitted six applications. Those people have caused the Government to force this policy upon us.

Areas of concern in Draft PPS 14 include countryside policy 2, which deals with farm dwellings, and countryside policy 3, which concerns dwellings for retiring farmers, where a farmer must demonstrate that no dwellings or development opportunities have been sold off from the farm holding. That has caused considerable concern for farmers, who have been under immense financial pressure for several years. Some farmers have abused the system, but a vast number have had to sell sites for genuine and financial reasons, just to keep their heads above water. We have been aware of that situation for a number of years.

I know of farmers in my constituency who have had permission refused because of ribbon development and build-up caused by people from the towns buying sites in the countryside. Then when the farmer wants to get a house passed for his son or daughter it is refused because there are too many houses in the countryside. Such issues must be addressed, and the Government must take notice of that.

In summary, Madam Speaker, a common approach is required. The Government must dramatically revise this policy. I support the establishment of a working party in this Assembly. The working party must send a clear message to the Government stating that it does not accept the way in which the process was carried out and how it was thrust upon the community. The proposed working party must also convey to the Government that it does not appreciate the disrespect shown to the elected and public representatives of Northern Ireland. That message must be given to the Government: we do not accept the policy, and it must be revised.

Mr Weir: Madam Speaker, may I take this opportunity to congratulate you and welcome you to the Chair. It is good to see someone from the finest constituency in Northern Ireland appointed as Speaker — a sentiment which will, I am sure, be echoed across the Chamber.

Mr Morrow: That is not relevant to the motion.

Mr Weir: I do not hear the Speaker shouting me down.

The key word in this motion is “balanced”. Clearly there is a need to protect the countryside and our natural resources; the fundamental problem with Draft PPS 14 is that that balance has not been achieved. There is a lack of realism in Draft PPS 14, because it does not take account of the needs of the rural community or of what is beneficial from an economic sustainability point of view, and it avoids the obvious question — where will people live?

According to ‘Shaping our Future’ an estimated 377,000 people live in the open countryside in Northern Ireland. If Draft PPS 14 is to be carried through unchanged into the future, where will the sons and daughters of those people, not just the farmers, live? That is the lack of realism that lies behind Draft PPS 14.

I have been aware of this issue on two levels. First, through NILGA; as Patsy McGlone said earlier, rarely has an issue excited such a level of support across the community — indeed, across councils — as the effect of rural planning. I must express my disappointment that one of the parties that has been concerned about Draft PPS 14 at NILGA has not deigned to be here to express those views.

Secondly, despite the fact that North Down is often perceived as a suburban constituency — as you will know, Madam Speaker — that does not give the full picture. North Down is not simply the “gold coast” of Cultra; it takes in a lot more than that. It is not the urban jungle that people sometimes see it as. There are a reasonable number of farms in the area — indeed, there is a rural community. At local council level, I have seen a number of cases where Draft PPS 14 and an overly restrictive attitude by planners have created problems on a day-to-day basis for residents.

Members should not see this as a rural/urban divide, because — as Members have already said — Draft PPS 14 has a knock-on effect on the whole community. When undue restriction is imposed on building in the countryside, it leads to increased pressure for building in towns and cities, which results in town cramming and pressure to move beyond development limits and build on green belt land. In a general sense, it also leads to pressure on the housing growth indicators, an increase in house prices, a reduction in the availability of social housing, and increased prices so that first-time buyers in particular are unable to afford new homes. It is not simply a question for the rural community, therefore, but for the entire community.

Again, it is an example of the level of imposition that was produced by Lord Rooker — I am sure we are all very disappointed that he has left that post. When local government representatives were negotiating with the Department and the Planning Service on the issue, for example, of site meetings, an imposition was brought down. Similarly, an imposition has been brought down on rural planning. It is yet another example of the failure of joined-up government in Northern Ireland.

My colleague from North Antrim Mr Paisley Jnr highlighted the contrast between Government spin on rural sustainability and the impact of Draft PPS 14, which will actually damage rural sustainability. We have seen the contrast between Government support for the position of low-cost housing and the effect of Draft PPS 14, which will be to increase house prices. We have seen the contrast between the Government complaining that a range of changes had to be made to the Planning Service to clear the massive backlog, while at the same time cutting its funding by 19%. We often accuse the Planning Service of inconsistency — and there are different approaches in different areas — but that simply reflects what happens in Government as a whole.

There has been at times a contrast made between Northern Ireland and England. An article in the 'Local Government Chronicle', dated March 2006, refers to sustainable policy killing villages; to the system causing rural housing shortages; to developers circumventing affordable housing rules by limiting applications; and to young people being priced out of the market. All of those apply to Northern Ireland, although the journal writes about what is happening in England. The problem is that the Government have failed to learn from their mistakes and are imposing on Northern Ireland the same measures that have failed to work in England.

The article gives an indication of the impact on rural schools. I am involved with one of the education boards and am aware, as we all are, of the falling demographics that are likely to lead to pressure for school closures. That is a tough enough environment for schools to operate in, but when schools do not operate on a level playing field, when growth is restricted in an area, when there is an inability to build housing for young families, the death knell for many rural schools will be sounded, and that is a great shame.

We need to strike a balance on this matter. There must be recognition that farming has changed, as indicated by the introduction of the single farm payment scheme and the cutting of the link between agricultural support and agricultural production. A flexible approach is necessary. There must be recognition that a proactive approach is needed with regard to replacement dwellings and a realisation that dwellings in the countryside are not solely for the farming community but for other key rural workers. We must ensure that nurses and doctors are there too.

I am pleased that we are having this debate. I support the motion.

Mr P J Bradley: Madam Speaker, I join with others in wishing you well and hope that we may meet here often and regularly in a official capacity, sooner rather than later.

The ill-considered policies of the current crop of direct rule Ministers, and in particular the decision to put a blanket ban on development in the countryside, must be challenged at every opportunity, and the Secretary of State must be tested on the anti-rural and anti-farming contents of Draft PPS 14.

Everyone present in this Assembly today has views on the document, and from what I have heard this morning and so far this afternoon, it is fair to say that the majority view is that Draft PPS 14 is an anti-rural and anti-agriculture document. My views are in keeping with most of the comments, and I too recognise that something must be done to address the rural problem. The imposition of a blanket ban, however, is not the answer, and if it is implemented, the current housing crisis that applies to young people, urban and rural alike, will increase greatly.

The Department for Regional Development has issued a public consultation document seeking comments on the draft public planning statement 14, or Draft PPS 14, as it is better known. I appeal to every rural organisation, including school committees, church committees, GAA clubs and sporting organisations, rural community groups — indeed, to all groups that depend on the local community for their membership and survival — to respond to the consultation document. A strong rural front cannot be ignored; or perhaps I should say, "should not be ignored", because we have only to look at the Minister's attitude to the review of public administration and his decision to ignore the wishes of three of the four main political parties that have concerns for our rural residents.

I am not opposed to the consultation paper. I agree with its aims and objectives, which are outlined on page 19 of the Draft PPS 14 document, but I am totally opposed to the blanket ban on rural dwellings that the Minister imposed on 16 March 2006.

It is wrong to impose such a ban when no contingency arrangements are in place. It is morally wrong to deny all young rural couples the chance of providing an economically viable home. It is regrettable that the direct rule decision-makers cannot be challenged. I am confident that if we had a Minister of our own, a blanket ban would not have been forced upon us. Do those in the Assembly who put party politics above the needs of those whom they represent — and I ask the same question of those who are absent from the Assembly — know who would gain if the Assembly were up and running? Is it too much to ask that question? Our farmers and rural communities would be among the first beneficiaries.

The Government's decision to change the remainder of rural Northern Ireland into a green belt is short on vision. If the entire countryside is to be formally designated as a green belt, what kind of countryside will we have in the future? I predict that in less than two decades there will be few children to brighten our countryside. The current occupiers of the family home will reluctantly have to say goodbye to their children as they depart for distant areas to settle and raise a family. Time will pass, and the rural owners will drift into retirement and eventually pass away to their eternal reward. The home will most likely be handed on to a son or daughter, who is by then 50 or 60 years of age, and every 20 years or so the cycle will be repeated. Rural Ireland will be denied the vibrancy of youth, and the customary ties that children provide in linking one generation to the next will no longer exist.

Northern Ireland's topography means that it is difficult to devise one-policy-fits-all guidelines. The flat lands of the Ards Peninsula and the level spaces of Fermanagh are so different from the rolling hills and drumlins that are found in most other areas in the North. Nevertheless, I firmly believe that there can be a responsible outcome to rural development matters.

In my response to the consultation paper, I will suggest that where there is attachment, need or family ties to a place, applications that concern that area should be considered favourably. I concede that sites that have roadside frontage have accumulated in many areas to such a degree that action has to be taken. It is therefore important that the Planning Service and the Roads Service give local farmers the opportunity to build on sites that are well back from main thoroughfares and major rural routes or along private lanes or on loanans and boreens. In such cases integration is less likely to be a problem, and seclusion from the eyes of tourists, about whom someone expressed concern this morning, and city-based day trippers would be easier to attain. Thousands of brownfield sites remain hidden in Northern Ireland, but the Government have yet to recognise that.

In my response, I will say that restriction on size and design will be considered acceptable to those whose basic requirement is to build, near to the place of their birth, a modest dwelling in which to rear a family.

I again appeal to those who have rural interests to impress on all rural organisations the necessity to challenge the blanket ban and to join with others in making a pro-rural response to the consultation document. I remind them that the closing date for comments is Friday 9 June 2006.

If Mr Hain and company are listening, I ask them to note that four of the five main parties — the SDLP, the Alliance Party, the Democratic Unionist Party, and the Ulster Unionist Party — are united today in their opposition to Draft PPS 14.

Mr Storey: Madam Speaker, I concur with the words of congratulation on your appointment as Speaker of this Assembly. As the Member for Lagan Valley Edwin Poots said, the representatives of Sinn Féin/IRA are absent. Of course, the Member rightly mentioned that the planning history of that party is something of which we should not be unmindful.

I also draw Members' attention to the republican policy that has left a legacy of ethnically cleansed rural farming communities along the border. Indeed, in my own North Antrim constituency, republicans left a legacy of murdering a member of the part-time Royal Ulster Constabulary Reserve who was also a farmer.

The rural planning policy should contain special provision for those families and give them recognition.

There can be no doubt that Draft PPS 14 will pose the rural community significant problems if it is implemented in its current form. Ours is a fragile rural economy, and it is understandable that those who live on farms have grave concerns about such a policy being imposed on them. Farmers in all constituencies see the rural economy disrupted. The rate of change that Draft PPS 14 proposes will hurt those farmers and their families rather than help to sustain them. In some cases, there are good grounds for claiming that those families' assets will, at the very least, be greatly reduced and that farmers and their families may even be disenfranchised. The farming community believes that it is the key stakeholder in Draft PPS 14, yet it feels isolated and alienated from the process. Indeed, a recent publication by the North Antrim Community Network (NACN) in my constituency stated that the draft policy would impact negatively on many farmers and farm families who are trying to diversify and avail themselves of farm work to maintain the family farm. The network also stated that the criteria cited for farm families were unclear and that the use of the term "hobby farm" was totally inappropriate.

Draft PPS 14 clearly intends to put a stop to the continuation of building in rural areas by introducing what amounts to a blanket ban on planning policy.

It is responsible of the Minister to want to be seen to be protecting the rural environment, but extreme legislation, with excessive conditions, is more likely to hinder than improve the benefits of the countryside. It has come to something when farmers' families can no longer build their homes on family land unless DARD is satisfied that they intend to farm it as well. If the Government were so concerned about maintaining the farming industry, they should have taken firm steps to protect the farming community in Northern Ireland.

Mr Kennedy: Does the Member agree that a major problem for landowners and farmers is that, when DARD is approached for permission for a planning-application site, it often replies that the farm is not viable? That is very unsatisfactory.

Mr Storey: I agree with the Member. One has only to search the DARD website to see that no information on Draft PPS 14 is available. The Department has failed the farming community abysmally on the issue. It has provided a clear example of there being no such thing as joined-up government. It is a misnomer.

I urge the Minister and the Department to look again at the draft policy. Why should we use, as other Members have said, the proverbial hammer to crack the proverbial nut? The draft policy requires review and amendment before it will achieve any reasonable objectives. We should debate further the Department's own figures, as outlined by the Minister, in the House. Any rational, objective consideration of those figures will show that the Department is far off the mark and less than accurate.

The countryside in my constituency, as in other constituencies with a rural community, is speckled with many top-quality rural dwellings. That has led to an influx of many new householders and families who continue to revise the make up of our rural communities. There can be little doubt that that has been beneficial to local economies at a time when the farming industry has been under continual pressure. Why would farmers not want to sell some of their land for new builds if planning permission indirectly encourages it and if the Government's farming policy limits them from exploring other options?

3.00 pm

A more important question hangs over the diversity of the Department of the Environment's agents' interpretations of planning policy. The Department continues to take an alarmingly inappropriate approach, through disproportionate allocation and, indeed, through a draconian interpretation of subjective policy. As Pat Ramsey, a Member for Foyle, reminded the House, that situation is compounded further by the fact that this is not a new project for the Department. The situation with 'Planning Policy Statement 5: Retailing and Town Centres' was absolutely disgraceful. Three years ago, the consensus was that PPS 5 was totally inappropriate and, to this day, the same Department that is pushing Draft PPS 14 has done nothing to improve that situation.

Sir Reg Empey: In an intervention, Ian Paisley Jnr, a Member for North Antrim, said that the countryside belongs to urban as well rural dwellers and that, likewise, people from rural areas share the urban environment. In a sense, therefore, the issue is shared space, so everybody, whether an urban or a rural dweller, has a key interest in the subject. The Ulster Unionist Party has chosen to support the amendment because, although there is significant consensus in the Chamber, more refinement is required to ensure that we are clear on the exact message that we send to the Government.

We have heard the views of those Members who have been in the Chamber today. We do not, of course, know the views of those Members who were absent. However, although Sinn Féin was able to stay away from the Chamber, it could not stay away from the issue. Its spokesperson presented herself in the Great Hall earlier to give television interviews on the subject. That indicates the significance of the matter and that it cannot be ignored.

However, we are anxious about one point: it is not clear how working groups to develop balanced policy and so on are to be established, or if they are to be established. Rather than lose the consensus — or what we think will be a consensus — it might be useful to make the point that, in the absence of a committee, there should be a fall-back position, whereby, on a cross-party basis, Members could discuss the issues and, if necessary, form a joint delegation to meet the Minister. I hope that a mechanism that is consistent with the amendment can be found, and we will support that. However, Members should not lose sight of the fact that if that is not possible, the issue should not be allowed to fall, and we must be allowed to express our opinions.

In moving the amendment, the Member for South Down referred to land values and speculators. There are horses for courses. Mid Ulster and areas that are on the edges of South Down or in the commuter area around Belfast may be affected differently by certain situations. Members know that the rate at which the Department of the Environment makes decisions and the evident inconsistencies in them varies from area to area.

There is an enormous amount of work to do, which is why the amendment provides a less drastic option than the more blunt instrument that is proposed in the motion. Nevertheless, we must make it clear that we should lose no opportunity to send out a message on which all of us agree. If the committee route is not open to us, other mechanisms should be found at an inter-party level. We could then go to the relevant Minister and express our considered opinions.

Mr Dawson: Members across the Chamber will agree that the countryside is one of Northern Ireland's primary assets. It excels in beauty and splendour and is promoted for its unspoilt freshness and environmental excellence. Members will know that my constituency of East Antrim boasts many areas of outstanding rural and coastal scenery.

Undoubtedly, the countryside is appreciated by those who live there and by those who pass through it, either as visitors or, increasingly, as tourists, as my colleague Sammy Wilson pointed out earlier. However, the very beauty and attractiveness that give the countryside its strength may also lead to its desolation and destruction. That issue is at the heart of today's debate.

Across the Chamber, we have heard — rightly — criticism of planning that pre-dates the publication of Draft PPS 14. We have also heard many criticisms of the contents of Draft PPS 14. I do not know of any organisation that is completely happy with the contents of Draft PPS 14. It is not accurate that the debate be expressed as the rural or urban community versus the environmental community, or as the rural community versus the urban community. People outside the Chamber might characterise the debate in that way, but that demeans the argument.

I received a mailing this morning from the Northern Ireland Environment Link, which states that it has identified legitimate concerns among farmers about Draft PPS 14. As Members, it is imperative that we listen to the planning needs of the agricultural community and of those who live in rural areas. We should not allow ourselves to be fooled into thinking that the primary concern of developers is the rural way of life; it is not. Members should also bear in mind that uncontrolled rural development will lead ultimately to increased service costs that we in the Chamber might have to deliver at some stage in the future.

Just as a bungalow in every field cannot be the way forward, neither is a blanket ban on development in the countryside. However, those extreme viewpoints have not been expressed today. Urban and rural policies and developments must be measured against sustainable criteria. Officials who deal with planning and development should be able to demonstrate that they have considered and balanced the competing needs of the economy, societal issues and the environment. One element should not be allowed to dominate the other, and competing needs should be balanced and treated equally. Current rural planning does not do that, and it does not meet sustainability criteria. Draft PPS 14 does not meet sustainability criteria either; it is a very blunt instrument.

It would be easy for us simply to reject Draft PPS 14. However, I see no real benefit in doing that without at least attempting, by way of a review, to come to a common position that we can all support. There has been criticism today of the actions of the direct-rule Minister who introduced and implemented this policy. I see little merit in simply using the Chamber as a "wailing wall" without taking the opportunity to issue advice to another direct-rule Minister as to how he might proceed.

It is for those reasons that I support the amendment.

Mr Dallat: Listening to the debate, I believe that there is no reason for the House to divide on the issue of rural planning. Indeed, it is important that the House does not divide, because we do not want departmental bureaucrats gleefully claiming that there is no agreement among elected representatives on the need to undo the terrible harm that Draft PPS 14 is beginning to inflict on the human rights of rural dwellers.

Just what does Draft PPS 14 mean to the rural dweller? So far, several Members have outlined its consequences, but allow me to focus on one rural community that has been hit hard not once, but twice, by new planning policies. Let us take Glenullin in my constituency as an example. After the launch of the draft area plan, a blanket ban was imposed that deprived many people of the right to apply for planning permission. Glenullin has been whacked for a second time by this panic measure from a planning body that is out of control.

What are the implications for those who live in Glenullin? A primary school that has faithfully served the community may not have a future because a whole generation of young people will not be allowed to build homes on their land.

Mr Shannon: Will the Member confirm that he objected to a development at a fairy tree in Kilrea on behalf of the fairies?

Mr Dallat: I have no recollection of that. Perhaps the Member will tell me about it later.

Even an application for 12 community houses was turned down, despite the full support of Coleraine Borough Council. Those houses would have allowed young people to own their own homes at a reasonable cost, but that was not good enough for the planners.

I am glad that Mr Shannon enjoyed his little intervention.

The staff at a modern, thriving community centre, which was built through voluntary effort and supports football, camogie and hurling teams, are concerned that there will be no new players to replace those who have to leave. A new resource centre, which is publicly funded by various bodies, is providing an excellent outreach facility that is second to none. However, in future, will there be anyone to participate in the courses and activities that it runs? Not in the long term if Draft PPS 14 is to take root and kill the very lifeblood of rural people.

Rural dwellers have been very wrongly and unfairly presented as polluters of the environment. In the rural community of which I speak, the Glenullin and Agivey Conservation and Regeneration Group, a cross-community body, has done much to enrich the countryside for those who choose to visit the area for walks on the hillsides. They have fought to save their bog land and have done much to ensure that the character of the countryside is not spoiled for future generations. I invite Friends of the Earth to meet those people, to join them on environmental trails, and to begin to understand reality.

Finally, although I have focused on Glenullin, there are other similar rural communities that will be badly affected by the draconian efforts of a Department that has fallen hostage to bad decisions and failed to recognise the uniqueness of rural dwellers who have the right to live in their own environment, as they have for generations. They have no intention of being hounded on to reservations on the periphery of some large town with which they cannot cope and where they do not wish to be.

This argument is not about septic tanks; it is about the rights of people to follow a tradition of living in the countryside. If we cannot accept that, it is only a matter of time before there will be campaigns to stop maintaining rural roads, providing rural transport, connecting people to water and electricity, and so on. Indeed, the arguments have already started. How many rural areas have been told that they will no longer have a library service? How many schools are closing this year, or have been threatened with closure over the next five years?

Let there be unity on this issue and let the Secretary of State live up to his promise to deal with this matter. We must not go to him from a divided House, but from one that is totally united in its determination to defend a rural community that feels ever more beleaguered as faceless policy-makers create impossible conditions for staying on what is, essentially, their homeland.

Mr Simpson: I welcome the opportunity to speak in this important debate on the future of rural planning. My constituency of Upper Bann contains significant rural areas, and I am concerned about the implications of this policy on my constituents.

The implementation of Draft PPS 14 will go far beyond the simple question of where people can build houses. It will have an impact on the sustainability of the rural economy and rural communities. The state of the farming industry in Northern Ireland is well known: once, a farm could provide the main source of income; today, many farmers have to find other ways of making money. It is clear what impact this policy will have on the ability of those working in the farming industry to diversify: it is one thing to seek to prevent the exploitation of land simply to make money from selling building sites; it is quite another to have a situation in which economic growth is hindered. That destroys the rural economy and has the potential to ruin the rural community. I do not believe that those who have drafted the policy have thought through the long-term impact of this policy. If the policy results in fewer buildings being constructed in the countryside and the demise of the rural economy, it will not be judged a success.

The need to work in the countryside is not limited only to agricultural enterprises; many other businesses operate in rural areas. Anyone attempting to establish a business in the countryside faces many problems, as planners try to curtail such businesses to towns and villages. Draft PPS 14 will add to this policy, and people will have difficulty proving that they need to live in the countryside near the businesses in which they work. If such an application were to be granted, the dwelling would have to be located on the site of the business. That may well be suitable for some businesses, but the trouble with this section of Draft PPS 14 is that it seeks to impose a one-size-fits-all solution for all rural businesses. There is no scope to allow a dwelling to be built beyond the confines of the business site.

The policy seeks to exclude the need to provide security at a business site by having someone living there, and that seems to show the absolute reluctance of the draft policy to grant any application for a dwelling at an existing business. The policy claims that an application to build a dwelling at an existing business site would have to prove that it is necessary in order for the business to function properly. However, it seems that there are few, if any, circumstances in which the planners would envisage such a situation.

If this policy were to be implemented, there would be severe implications for the rural economy. An urgent review of the measures is required, so that a policy can be put in place that will take account of the needs of the countryside and the rural economy as well as seeking to protect the nature of the rural environment.

I hope that the Government will take account of what is said here today so that, when the policy is finally formulated, the concerns of the people of Northern Ireland — the people who will be affected by this policy — will have been addressed.

Mrs D Kelly: Madam Speaker, I join with other Members in congratulating you on your appointment. I wish you well in office.

As a former health and social care worker, I am only too aware of the needs of people with disabilities and the needs of older people. We live in an ageing society. In recent months, and before the introduction of Draft PPS 14, planners had already refused applications from carers on the grounds of the existing policies.

How can we sustain rural communities and community cohesion if people who work full time cannot live near ageing parents, when the provision of social services, home-help services and help for carers is being retracted? Those people can no longer live beside their families. At the other end of the scale, there are the informal carers — the grandparents — who will be denied the opportunity to help their children to look after their grandchildren. They will lose many of their family ties.

There is a general lack of creativity within the Planning Service. As many Members have said, Draft PPS 14, as introduced, represents a draconian measure and a blanket ban. We have not seen any proposals — nor am I aware of any — to improve efficiency measures for septic tanks, for example. There are efficiency measures for energy, such as the introduction of solar panels. Why could there not have been much greater creativity to meet the demands of the community for environmentally friendly processes?

Some Members have made reference to our absent colleagues. Perhaps they are drawing up a definitive rural planning policy, because — as we have seen in the press in recent days — their policy changes on a monthly basis. Let us hope that there are not too many suspensions, such as that which Mr Molloy had to endure. [Laughter.]

Is it not more apt to describe Draft PPS 14 as a cover-up for the Government's failure to implement their existing policies? I ask the hon Member Jim Wells how many of those approvals of the 42 sites for one landowner, or how many of those 19 approvals, on analysis, would not already have contravened existing policies, had they been properly and consistently implemented.

Is Draft PPS 14 not also a cover-up for the inadequacies and failure of the Environment and Heritage Service? How many enforcement notices have been issued and acted on?

The lack of investment in infrastructure within the Water Service is also well known, and indeed, all parties present are opposed to water charges. However, who are the greatest culprits who pollute our environment? The Water Service.

I contend that Draft PPS 14 is nothing more than a cover-up for failure, inadequacy and inconsistency by a number of Government Departments.

Madam Speaker: I was conscious, Mrs Kelly, that that was your maiden speech, so I did not bring to your attention that, generally, it is not the convention to name another Member, but you will know that in future.

Dr Deeny: Madam Speaker, this is my maiden speech, and I welcome you to your position. Like me, you are in a new position and I wish you a healthy, happy and long time in it, like myself. [Laughter.]

That is in the hands of others, I hasten to add. I am also conscious of time and I am learning, as I get into politics, that I have only five minutes to get my points across. Those of us who are GPs are told that we have 10 minutes to complete a consultation, so I should have no problem in saying what I have to say in five minutes.

I thought that my first speech would concern health, but — as many other Members have said — I am delighted to be allowed to speak on an issue of importance to all of our constituents throughout Northern Ireland. Rural planning — and planning across the board — is connected to health. What issue is not? As a GP, I have seen health problems related to planning, such as family and community break-up, depression, and emotional or mental health problems. Difficulties with planning and people's inability to build their own houses have a negative impact on health.

I have listened intently to all Members, and I take what they have said on board. People come to me about 40-year and 50-year mortgages. That is a horrific situation in which people end up paying four and five times the cost of their house. That is a major task to undertake, particularly for young people who have just got married.

I take on board what the proposer of the motion, my Mid Ulster colleague Mr McGlone, said, and I agree with him. I also agree with the amendment tabled by my colleague from South Down, Mr Wells. There are not too many speculators in my area at the moment, but that day may come.

We have tourism here in abundance, which we deserve. If a settlement can be reached, hopefully we will have more tourism. I worry that places such as Tyrone will become the victim of speculators — those who are looking for planning for the purpose of making money, who will have nothing to do with rurality or maintaining the countryside and the lives of our country folk.

I noticed in both the original proposal and in the amendment the use of the word “balanced”, which many Members have mentioned today. “Balanced” is the important word here. I have been in general practice for 20 years, and it seems to me that when a policy is wrong, we as human beings go full circle. We go into complete reverse. I remember some years ago hearing that we should not discipline children. Now we have gone full circle — we do not discipline them at all — and we have seen the result of that in society. Excuse the pun, but to go from a situation in which we literally have an “open house” policy on planning to one in which we have none at all is ludicrous. The solution must be found in the middle.

During the debate this morning, the Member for Strangford Mrs Robinson talked about medical personnel being involved in planning decisions. That is a very good idea, which brings me to another important point:

like everything else in life, human beings abuse things. That is our nature. I mentioned this to my colleague Mr Berry, whom I welcome to the independent ranks of the Assembly. I do not feel alone any more.

Let me give as an example the Disability Living Allowance (DLA) debate. DLA makes a noble, worthwhile and valuable contribution. It is a necessity, but it is abused, and for that reason many people do not now receive it. The same applies to planning. In the debate this morning we heard examples of people looking for planning — while others entitled to the benefits of rural planning are being denied.

I also took note of the comparisons that were made during the debate, which alarmed me. I am very proud to live in the country, and I love the countryside. We have a wonderful countryside here. I heard about the building going on in Coleraine every year, which is horrific. It was mentioned to me in this House yesterday. To use a medical description, if one looks at Ireland from above — both North and South — it appears to have measles, because there are houses dotted all over the place. We cannot allow that to happen.

It may not be rife in Tyrone at the moment, but it is certainly the case in Donegal. We should not blame the people of Donegal, because if you listen, every second accent up there is a Belfast one. People are buying houses there to make money and to have their holidays.

Mr Kennedy: Leaders of parties. [Laughter.]

Dr Deeny: That is right. I will finish off, as I am conscious of the time. The important word here is “balanced”. I wish to put on record that I oppose the implementation of this draft policy, and I support the proposal while taking on board the amendment. The answer is in balance. We must remember, with no disrespect to my Belfast colleagues, that while 350,000 people live there, 1, 350,000 live outside Belfast.

Mr Hay: Today’s debate has been a lively one. Rural planning in Northern Ireland raises many emotions amongst public representatives. The difficulties, however, have been compounded over the years by the fact that many of us, who also served as rural councillors, have been only bystanders to some of the decisions made by planners. As we know, local government in Northern Ireland has been allowed only a consultative role with planners.

As public representatives, we know that, for a number of years, planners have acted like dictators in relation to many applications. In my constituency of Foyle, there was an unwritten rule that when a planning application was first submitted to the council, a member could persuade the planners to meet in order to resolve issues for the applicant. Local planners now refuse to allow that; they tell us the office meetings and site meetings that they will attend. That is totally wrong.

3.30 pm

We must be mindful that the one community that has really suffered throughout is the farming community, which has been through a difficult time, often through no fault of its own. Many are in such severe financial difficulties that they are bankrupt, and many have become suicidal in trying to resolve financial issues.

Farmers in my area, whose farms have been in the family for generations, have had to sell plots of land to housing developers to resolve serious financial difficulties. Unfortunately, that situation still exists. People continually indicate that the farming community has left that situation behind, but it will be many years before the farming community in Northern Ireland will be back to where it was.

Draft PPS 14 has undoubtedly created greater problems for rural areas than it has solved. This morning, a Member said that Lord Rooker took a hammer to crack a nut; he has taken a very heavy hammer to crack a nut in Northern Ireland. If Lord Rooker is remembered for nothing else, he will certainly be remembered for creating a huge debate about rural planning in Northern Ireland.

Rural schools, already affected, will be more seriously affected by the Minister’s decision. Those of us who are councillors in rural areas constantly see people who want to find out how they might sustain their local schools. The Government are working on a policy to determine exactly the future of rural schools in Northern Ireland. Planning policy compounds an already serious situation in the rural community.

No one is saying that there should be unchecked development in Northern Ireland, or that housing should be dotted practically everywhere, especially in rural areas.

I agree with Dr Deeny that a balanced approach is needed to resolve the issue of rural planning in Northern Ireland.

We can achieve that, but as my colleague from Foyle Pat Ramsey said, we need to make sure that the Secretary of State is listening very carefully to this debate. We must adopt a measured approach. The Secretary of State would be happy enough to see this House divide on the issue, but I think that we are big enough and mature enough to send a clear message to the Secretary of State that there needs to be a serious review of this policy — it needs to be reversed.

Mrs Foster: The effects of Draft PPS 14 are much wider than merely implementing fresh planning policy, and various Members have touched on that today.

However, I would like first to comment on the entirely objectionable way in which the policy was unilaterally introduced. While I recognise the need to cut down on the hugely impractical consultation that takes place in this part of the UK, there is surely a need for meaningful discussion on the impact of such a huge change in policy before, and not after, its introduction. Of course, the Government will say that this is a draft policy; however, we who are in touch with planners know full well that the document is now taken as Holy Writ and has been adopted as policy from the day that it was first announced.

The motion calls for a balanced policy, and I agree with that sentiment. The implications of the strategy go much wider than planning. If this policy persists, it will have a negative impact on rural populations. Consequently, as the Member for Newry and Armagh Mr Berry and my Friend from Foyle have already said, there will be a knock-on negative impact on small churches, schools and social and recreational facilities.

I and colleagues in other rural constituencies are already fighting to keep rural schools open. If this policy goes ahead, that fight will be all but lost. Schools will no longer be situated in country areas but solely in large population centres. One has to ask whether that is good for children and their communities — I think not, Madam Speaker.

The policy will also have an impact on industrial development in rural areas. Since I last spoke in this Chamber, a severe blow has been dealt to Fermanagh and South Tyrone by the withdrawal of Moy Park, formerly Ferne Foods, from Lisnaskea. That closure has had a very negative impact on many local people. In last Tuesday's economic debate, I talked about supporting indigenous entrepreneurs. Draft PPS 14, as it currently stands, runs contrary to supporting those local businesses. New businesses will be unable to pay the rents demanded by the enterprise centres where, under Draft PPS 14, they will be forced to locate and operate. That will inevitably slow down business start-ups, which are already slowing down in the west of the Province, and would be contrary to the policy of the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment — hardly joined-up government from the NIO.

Finally, as with so many other legislative changes, we must set Draft PPS 14 in a European context. Will the introduction of this policy mean that this region of Europe will have a more rigid system of planning than elsewhere? Undoubtedly, the answer is yes. Government and the Secretary of State should be very careful about introducing a policy that places us at a clear disadvantage, in the ways that have been touched on in this debate, as compared to other regions of Europe.

There are many issues to be discussed and debated surrounding Draft PPS 14, not just purely planning issues. Therefore, I support the amendment, which calls for the establishment of a working party, as I believe that will enable us to move forward to deal with those many issues. I trust that Members will feel able to support such a working party.

Dr McCrea: Draft PPS 14 is important for the future development of Northern Ireland, and it is also an important issue for this debate. I congratulate the Member for Mid Ulster for bringing it to the Floor of the House. I also congratulate my colleague Mr Wells for his thoughtful amendment.

I welcome the opportunity to discuss this subject today, and I hope that the debate will not only give Assembly Members the opportunity to voice their opinions on such an important issue, but also that the Government will take account of what is said.

The publication of Draft Planning Policy Statement 14 has caused a significant reaction, especially in rural areas of Northern Ireland. Few Government policies in recent years have a greater potential to change the way of life of the people in those communities. Draft PPS 14 is not just an abstract policy statement for them; it will have a significant impact on their lives and livelihoods. While it is clear that something needed to be done about planning in the countryside, the DUP does not support Draft PPS 14.

If we are to devise a policy for planning in the countryside, it is important to understand the context in which this policy has been introduced. We cannot ignore reality, and it is not possible to continue as if all were well.

Draft PPS 14 did not come from nowhere. It is a reaction — or perhaps, more properly, an overreaction — to the amount of recent development in some areas of the countryside. Anyone who has travelled through certain areas of Northern Ireland will have seen the impact of house building. It is understandable that, in circumstances where farm incomes were unable to keep many people going in the countryside, they would seek to exploit the valuable resource of the land. Although for some this has been a way of surviving, for others it has become a valuable enterprise. The present level of development in some areas is both unsustainable and undesirable. Therefore, doing nothing is not an option.

No one wants to see Northern Ireland's countryside destroyed in the same way as parts of the Republic of Ireland, where it seems, sometimes, that anything goes. One does not need to see the official statistics to know that, in some parts of the Province, building in the countryside has reached epidemic proportions. Therefore, common sense tells us that, in those circumstances, things have gone too far.

The real cause of the problem has not been the individual farmer seeking permission for a house for his son or daughter, but people seeking multiple applications in order to make a profit. Under legislation it is not illegal to make a profit, and it should not be suggested that people do not have that right. People can make a profit in any other business, and remember that farming is a business. However, it appears that Draft PPS 14 punishes everyone.

Another fundamental problem that exacerbates the situation is the inconsistency in planning decisions across the Province. What will pass in one area will be refused in another. Any policy that is formulated must be capable of consistent application. I have been a councillor for 34 years and have dealt with planning, but I am absolutely disgusted to see so many glaring examples of planning inconsistencies. The planning process has been brought into total disrepute. Had I the opportunity to push this further, an independent inquiry would ask those officials to justify what they have done to the countryside through the inconsistent application of their planning policy.

The vast majority of people accept that the situation cannot continue. However, what is the best way to tackle the problem?

The environment, in a narrow sense, cannot be the only consideration when determining planning policy. Robert Atkins, then Minister for the Economy and the Environment, said in his introduction to 'A Planning Strategy for Rural Northern Ireland':

"If Northern Ireland is to develop in a sustainable way, accommodating economic diversity and the conservation of its natural assets, there must be understanding and mutual respect for the differing interests of society. There must be co-operation in reconciling differences and in charting a way forward in the interests of all."

3.45 pm

Draft PPS 14 fails to take account of that, and there is a total imbalance. We must adopt a more holistic approach and consider the nature of development in Northern Ireland and how communities can be sustained. Draft PPS 14 has the balance wrong, and implementing it would result in all kinds of undesirable and unforeseen consequences. We need a system that limits building in the countryside, but does not prevent those who have grown up on a farm from staying in the countryside. That is not an easy balance to achieve, but it is clear that Draft PPS 14 will force many people from rural backgrounds into towns and will undermine our rural way of life.

Equally, there are ruins of old houses in the countryside that are more of a stain on the environment than a new house would be. Greater flexibility should be shown in this area to get rid of blights on the landscape and revitalise areas where people once lived.

The comparison is often made between the number of single dwelling applications in Northern Ireland compared to the rest of the United Kingdom. It is stark, but we must remember that Northern Ireland has a different tradition of settlement patterns than many other parts of the United Kingdom. We do not want a countryside with a house in virtually every field; neither do we want a countryside where those living there are left to stagnate. Rural schools, facilities and shops all need people to survive. We must not strangle the countryside and create a situation where the countryside becomes somewhere that people visit, but cannot make a living.

Significant areas of Northern Ireland are already subject to rigorous limitations on what can be built and in what circumstances. Green belts and countryside policy areas extend over a greater area in Northern Ireland than in recent times. Whatever the various views are in the Chamber about Draft PPS 14 and how it can be changed, this is not the best forum in which we can agree a detailed policy. We must set up a working party to consider the issues and report to the Assembly with some substantive plans. It is not enough to say that we are against Draft PPS 14; we must decide what will be a sustainable future for rural Northern Ireland. We can only do that by sitting together and getting to the heart of the issue, and then going to Government and putting what we believe to be the proper way forward to the Minister.

I hope that the Government will see sense on this issue and find some middle ground on which a wide consensus can be built. After all, it is we in Northern Ireland who will be left with the legacy of any planning decision, long after the Ministers responsible have returned home.

I appeal to the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development, which seems to cut the feet from our farming community when an application is submitted, to show some concern for farmers. It is an insult to call anyone a hobby farmer, because farming today cannot sustain a full family — farmers need other employment as well. We want a consensus of opinion; to see how we can move forward; and put it to the Minister. The amendment proposed by my Friend Jim Wells allows us to take all the good in the motion in the name of the hon Member for Mid Ulster Mr McGlone and put forward our proposal on that basis and find a way forward. I believe that it can be done.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Gallagher: I congratulate you on your appointment, Madam Speaker.

We have heard all the opposition to the present rural planning policy. We have heard from my own party the reasons why the motion should be supported, and others in the Chamber have given reasons why the Secretary of State should be asked to put a stay on the implementation of Draft PPS 14.

The SDLP is conscious that we are sitting in a body created and controlled by the Secretary of State. Our presence is a test for him. We are putting it to the Secretary of State, who said that if a view received cross-party support in the Chamber, it would be taken into account. The motion is well thought out, clear and mindful of what the Secretary of State said. The amendment, however, is not well thought out. There are no details about this committee bar the mention of it. In fact, nobody here apart, perhaps, from you, Madam Speaker, can tell us whether we are entitled to set up such a working party.

The motion focuses on a policy that poses a real and serious threat to rural traditions.

Mr Weir: Will the Member give way?

Mr Gallagher: I will not give way. I am winding up.

The policy poses a real threat to the survival of family farms and the entire rural way of life. As a document — and we have heard it before from all sides — it is deeply flawed. I remind Members that the detailed restrictive policy set out in it will make it impossible to fulfil or achieve its objectives, some of which have been mentioned. One is:

“to manage growth in the countryside to achieve appropriate and sustainable patterns of development that meet the essential needs of a vibrant rural community”.

Another is:

“to facilitate development necessary to achieve a sustainable rural economy”.

We all agree that those are worthy and laudable objectives, but how can they be made real under a policy which, among other things — and we have also heard something about this — defines acceptable use of land and buildings so narrowly that it puts a stranglehold on rural communities? It makes no allowance for the fact that increasing numbers of farmers have to take up part-time employment off-farm in order to survive, and it allows no provision for housing for key rural workers.

As Patsy McGlone said, this policy is modelled on a policy for the English countryside with its presumption against development. It is totally at odds with the needs of our rural communities.

Members must go back to the starting point and begin with wide-ranging consultations that will deliver a planning policy based on a shared vision. Farmers, families living in the countryside, schools, churches, voluntary organisations, community organisations, sporting organisations and environmentalists must all be involved in creating that shared vision.

Last week in County Fermanagh, Moy Park announced its plans to close the Ferne Foods operation and put 188 people out of their jobs. That will be the fourth factory in five years to close in Lisnaskea — a small town in Fermanagh. The company’s offer to some of those workers of jobs in Dungannon or Craigavon is not a viable option for most of them. Those workers and all the others who have lost their jobs in the past five years — and many of them are in our constituencies — have limited options, particularly in the west.

The policy, as it stands, closes down options which some workers may want to explore, namely, to set up a small business of their own, to enter into a small business partnership, or to gain employment in a small business set up by one of their colleagues. There is no provision for start-up rural businesses in Draft PPS 14. That is short-sighted; it is damaging to people’s prospects of employment and to the interests of a sustainable rural community.

Another concern, which I will want to take up again, is the criteria for farm viability that survive from the time when there were large CAP subsidies and the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development encouraged farm expansion. Current circumstances demand a new approach to farm viability, one that recognises equitably the contribution of all farms, large and small, and that acknowledges the contribution that all of those farms can make to sustainable development and care for the countryside. The new approach should take account of farm diversification and agri-environment issues, the promotion of environmentally sensitive areas (ESAs) and areas of special scientific interest (ASSIs), the development of tourism, and the protection of wildlife.

Of course the developers and the speculators should be kept out. The countryside must be protected for generations to come, and the aspirations of people who live there now need to be accommodated.

I call on the Government to withdraw Draft PPS 14 and to embark on a new widespread consultation, with the aim of developing a planning policy based on the needs of people who live here.

I notice that the amendment recognises the importance of sustainable development and the protection of the environment, as does the motion. The difference, Members, is that the motion, if it is passed here and if the Secretary of State keeps his word, will stop Draft PPS 14.

Understandable concerns were expressed by the proposer of the amendment about re-opening the matter, because there will be:

“a tidal wave of speculative applications”.

That was how the proposer put it. Nevertheless the amendment will not stop Draft PPS 14; it will not stop the depopulation and the centralisation that that will bring. As I have said, it is not even clear that we can have a committee.

I recognise something in the concern expressed by the proposer of the amendment. He referred to the rush of applications if we put a stop to Draft PPS 14, but that is not a good enough reason for not stopping it.

The Secretary of State and whatever Minister is responsible should be able to introduce measures and mechanisms, for example, to screen out multiple applications, which was one of the main concerns. If Draft PPS 14 is stopped, there should be a way of overcoming the concerns that were expressed in the amendment.

The motion means withdrawal of Draft PPS 14, and I ask you all to support it.

Madam Speaker: Once again I thank Members for their co-operation and their speeches this afternoon.

Mr Kennedy: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. To your knowledge, were any senior officials present from any of the Departments that were affected by today's debate? If not, could you perhaps convey to the Secretary of State the House's displeasure at the fact that he has provided us with a debate on an important issue, yet his officials are apparently not present to hear it?

Madam Speaker: I was not made aware that any officials would be coming here today. Your comments will be on the record. The Secretary of State will read them, and I will point them out to him.

Dr McCrea: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. Somebody from the Department who would perhaps be known as "Mr PPS 14" was sitting in the Gallery listening to the debate.

Madam Speaker: Thank you.

THE ASSEMBLY

Tuesday 6 June 2006

The Assembly met at 2.00 pm (Madam Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

Madam Speaker: In accordance with the Northern Ireland Act 2006, the Secretary of State has directed that the Assembly should sit on Tuesday 6 June 2006 at 2.00 pm to consider business as it appears on the Order Paper.

I would draw Members' attention to the fact that since the last sitting on 23 May, the Secretary of State has directed a new Standing Order to provide for Committees of the Assembly. Copies of the Standing Order are available from the Business Office.

At the sitting on 16 May, Mr McCartney and Mr Dodds raised points of order on the matter of interventions.

Mr Dodds suggested that there was merit in considering the procedure in the House of Commons through which time may be added to a Member's speaking time to take account of interventions. This followed Mr McCartney's suggestion that unless I limit interventions, Members might not give way.

I undertook to consider the matter at the next meeting of the Business Committee, and I did so on 23 May.

I will address Mr McCartney's suggestion first.

I am clear that the decision on whether or not to accept an intervention should be a matter for the Member who has the Floor, and I do not intend to interfere with that process. A Member should not, however, persist in asking another to give way when the latter has declined to do so, and it may be necessary for me to call a Member to order if that occurs.

I have some sympathy, however, with the view that our convention disadvantages the Member and discourages acceptance of interventions. This becomes particularly apparent when speaking times are restricted, as was the case on 16 May when a five-minute limit was applied.

As suggested by Mr Dodds, I have considered the procedures in the other place, and note that the Speaker is required, by Standing Order, to provide specified extra time when interventions have been taken. If the Assembly is restored in a form that allows it to make and amend its own Standing Orders, Members may wish to consider a similar provision.

In the meantime, however, I believe that interventions can provide a valuable contribution to debate and that I should offer some encouragement to Members to accept them during debate. With the Business Committee's agreement, I have decided that, where speaking times are limited to less than 10 minutes, I will, on a trial basis, exercise discretion in allowing up to one minute of additional time to a Member who has accepted one or more interventions to his or her speech.

This arrangement is effective immediately, but will not apply to today's debate, as it has been agreed that speaking times will not be limited to less than 10 minutes.

Mr Neeson: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. In view of your ruling, would it be in order for me to finish the speech that I was prevented from finishing? [Laughter.]

Madam Speaker: Obviously, it would not, Mr Neeson, but that will teach you a lesson for future debates.

Mr Robert McCartney: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. There appears in your ruling — which, of course, we all accept — to be some misunderstanding as to the point that I made. I was not suggesting that there should be any limitation on a Member's right to take an intervention. However, I was suggesting that there should be some limitation on the length of time that the intervener takes in making his or her intervention.

Madam Speaker: That is sometimes a difficulty, but, unfortunately, that is not a matter for the Speaker. I am sure that the Whips will take that point to their Members.

Sir Reg Empey: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I ask you to consider a point in relation to Standing Orders 8 and 11, regarding the conduct of business in this place. I wish to make a general point in relation to the events of the past few days, which are pertinent to our business. You will be aware that Members have been confronted with a situation in which, first, we were not going to do business, then we were going to do business, then we were going to do business at one time, and then at another time. We learned about today's business only late yesterday evening.

You are in receipt of a letter, dated 1 June, from the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, which begins:

"Given that there was no agreement at the Business Committee as to preferred business for the Assembly next week".

That gives an erroneous impression of what the Business Committee decided. Its minutes show that, with the exception of Sinn Féin, which is boycotting today's proceedings, four out of the five parties at that Committee were clear that business should be conducted in this place, this week. Because people had different ideas as to what business should be conducted, different weight was given to those. However, that is a natural occurrence. The fact was that the parties represented at that Committee that are represented in the House today wanted business done this week.

Is it possible for you to prevail on the Secretary of State to allow you and the Business Committee to decide what business this place conducts and when? We are in the business of restoring an Assembly and a Government with a budget of £11 billion, and all that goes with that, and we cannot even agree a date and time for a debate so that we can prepare our Members. I suggest that you could, as a matter of order, take that up with the Secretary of State and try to resolve this issue so that we are not in the same position again.

Madam Speaker: Thank you, Sir Reg. I have given you leeway, because your point of order is shared by most Members. We had a heated debate about the issue at the Business Committee. Those comments, and your own, of course, will be passed on to the Secretary of State.

Your point of order raises an interesting "issue" — that is a good word to use. People are concerned about the issue, and I will give you quite a detailed answer. The Business Committee has also been concerned about it.

Paragraph 2 of schedule 1 to the Northern Ireland Act 2006 provides for meetings of the Assembly to be held at such times and places as the Secretary of State directs. It is quite clear, therefore, that the Assembly cannot meet unless directed to do so.

What business is then conducted? Section 1(1) of the 2006 Act provides that the Secretary of State may refer two specified matters to the Assembly. One matter relates to the offices of First Minister and Deputy First Minister; the second matter relates to making nominations as Northern Ireland Ministers. The 2006 Act also provides that: may be referred. It is under this third provision that today's motion was referred and will be debated.

"such other matters as the Secretary of State thinks fit"

Standing Orders, as directed by the Secretary of State, are also clear in how they support the Act's provisions. Standing Order 8 requires the Speaker to prepare an Order Paper for each sitting day:

"in accordance with any referral by the Secretary of State".

That is why we cannot issue an Order Paper until a formal referral is made.

Standing Order 11 establishes the Business Committee and provides that it:

"shall make recommendations to the Secretary of State on matters that may be referred to the Assembly and perform such other duties as the Secretary of State may direct."

Standing Orders and the Act, when taken together, are clearly designed to allow the Business Committee to recommend business but also to provide the Secretary of State with the power to decide on the business that will be discussed when he directs the Assembly to meet.

The Member has asked whether it would be in order to ask the Secretary of State to hand over the power for determining business. It would seem to me that the Member has three options if he wishes to pursue his point. The first option is, obviously, to take up the matter directly with the Secretary of State — as, no doubt, the Member may have done. The second option is for his party's representative on the Business Committee to propose that the Business Committee make a suitable recommendation to the Secretary of State. The third option is to table a motion for debate in the Assembly, calling for the Secretary of State to refer the matter, although such a motion would, of course, have to negotiate the very procedures that the Member would like to see changed.

Ultimately, the decision will be the Secretary of State's to make. However, I hope that I have clarified the procedural options.

Mr Robert McCartney: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Thank you for your very lucid exposition of the position here. However, is it the case that the Secretary of State, who has nominated you as Speaker, will refer such business as he decides that this body should debate and will change, at will, the Standing Orders or procedure upon which anything that he deigns to refer may be so debated? Does not that, in composite, make this Assembly nothing more than a puppet show?

Madam Speaker: Members may, to a certain extent, sympathise with what Mr McCartney says. However, as I have said before, the ultimate power lies with the Secretary of State. The only way that we can change that is for us to turn ourselves into a restored Assembly. I hope that that will not be too long in the making.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. Will you inform us whether the Secretary of State can, from now on, say that there will be no more meetings of the Assembly unless he agrees the business? Is that the power of the Secretary of State?

2.15 pm

Madam Speaker: Thank you for your point of order, Dr Paisley. As I have said, all business must be referred to the Secretary of State. However, as members of the Business Committee have no doubt informed Members, we had a full and frank discussion on this matter yesterday, and we have sent a number of motions to the Secretary of State. We have yet to get a referral on that, and I hope that we do. However, I must say, yet again, that Members should be in no doubt that the Secretary of State has the power to decide whether or not we come here and debate issues.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. If that be so, what about the date on which the Secretary of State has said we must finish our business? It would be possible for this Assembly not to meet until November if the Secretary of State says that we are not going to do any business. How can we have a deadline and a date that are meaningless unless this Assembly is meeting?

Madam Speaker: Thank you, Dr Paisley. That is not a matter for this Assembly; it is a matter for Westminster. That is dictated by the Act that was passed at Westminster. I know that you have made representations to the Secretary of State, and I hope that you continue to do so.

Dr Farren: On a point of order —

Madam Speaker: I am sorry, Dr Farren. I think that Dr McCrea was first.

Dr McCrea: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Can you confirm to the Assembly that the Business Committee had forwarded to the Secretary of State a number of motions to be considered for debate on the Floor of the House this week?

Madam Speaker: As a member of the Business Committee, I am sure that you know that we do not discuss the specific business of that Committee here. We refer that business to the Secretary of State, and I have already said that any business that it was agreed to refer for debate has already been referred. We do not need to debate that here.

Dr McCrea: Further to that point of order, I am not asking for a debate. I am asking you to confirm that motions for business were forwarded to the Secretary of State for his consideration.

Madam Speaker: I thought that you had already seen that in the minutes. I can confirm that it is in the minutes.

Dr Farren: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. In the light of the answers that you have given to other Members, am I correct in understanding that the sooner we can restore ourselves to a fully working Assembly, the sooner the kind of idle comments that have been made, particularly about the need for injury time — surely, we are already well into injury time — and the long-suffering electorate of Northern Ireland—

Madam Speaker: Order. With due respect, Dr Farren, take your seat. The Speaker is standing. That is not a point of order, salient as your comments may be.

Mr N Dodds: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Has any notice been given to you by Sinn Féin about the reasons for its continuing boycott of the Assembly?

Members will be aware from press releases that we have been told that Sinn Féin is very anxious to make progress. However, is it not a fact that its continuing boycott of these proceedings is an indicator that it is really holding back progress in Northern Ireland?

Madam Speaker: Order. I am surprised that Members are not sure about what are points of order and what are not. It is up to every Member and every party to make their own decisions about what they do. Sinn Féin has repeatedly stated its position, here and elsewhere.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

Industrial Rating

Madam Speaker: Before I call Mr Dallat to move the motion, I wish to clarify how I propose to conduct the debate.

At its meeting yesterday, the Business Committee agreed that four hours should be set aside for the debate. The Committee also agreed that the proposer of the motion should be allowed up to 20 minutes to move and up to 15 minutes for the winding-up speech. All other Members will be allowed 10 minutes, so I hope that Members remember my comments on interventions. If that is clear, I shall proceed.

Mr Dallat: I beg to move

That this Assembly, pending the restoration of a fully devolved Assembly and power-sharing Executive:

- (a) calls on the Secretary of State to freeze the Industrial Rate at 25%;
- (b) agrees with the Northern Ireland Manufacturing Focus Group that the introduction of full Industrial Rates as currently planned by the Government will lead to devastation in the manufacturing sector and the loss of thousands of jobs; and
- (c) therefore calls on the Secretary of State to deliver on his undertaking to act upon the agreed position of all the political parties, and cap the Industrial Rate at 25%.

I am happy to propose today's motion. It may be our last chance to plead for sanity as regards industrial rating. We must do everything possible to save the very narrow manufacturing base in the North and to ensure that jobs are not lost for ever — and lost they will be if plans to increase industrial rate liability beyond 25% are executed as planned. This will be the final opportunity to protect up to 30,000 jobs that will be at risk if the direct rule Ministers refuse to listen, do not understand or simply continue to demonstrate the levels of arrogance that recently emerged when Lord Rooker was in charge.

It is no exaggeration to claim that the finger is in the industrial dyke, desperately holding back the tide in the hope that common sense will prevail. If it does not prevail, decisions to relocate will come fast and furious, as manufacturers are forced to choose from among the options of downsizing, relocation or closure.

Our manufacturing base is dominated by food and drink, including chicken processing, with 75% of our exports going to Britain. Several of those companies also have plants in the Republic, so it is not difficult to see why any long-term planning will, without doubt, include consolidation in the South, which has 10% corporation tax and long-standing exemptions from rates. Of course, companies can choose to relocate to many other areas, including, increasingly, eastern Europe.

In east Derry almost 400 jobs were lost recently at a long-established chicken-processing plant. Why? The reason is that profits became so squeezed that there was no choice. That is a warning sign that every company faces potential closure if additional pressure is exerted to extract even more money from the existing slim profits. Indeed, the top dozen companies in my constituency are experiencing varying degrees of financial pressure, which directly undermines confidence in future investment. That is extremely worrying.

The pattern across Northern Ireland is no different, and I know of closures that will be imminent if this issue is not sorted out. Companies need to plan for the medium and long term. Their motivation is not solely money; it is investment and creating enough resources to invest in the future, and as most of those companies have a profit margin of no more than 5%, it is easy to see why it is not possible to reinvest in the future.

Where will the money for research and development come from if the industrial rate liability goes beyond 25%? It will just not be available, and one does not have to be a genius to know what the outcome will be if there is no money for renewal or expansion. The money needed for reinvestment and research and development would, of course, be used to pay the additional rates as the whole process escalates.

A short-term gain for the Government would, without doubt, be a long-term disaster for the labour force and the economy. Without investment in plant and machinery and resources for research and development, there can be no growth, and without growth a company cannot remain competitive, so it will go out of business. It is as simple as that.

Those are not my predictions; they are the forecasts of many people involved in manufacturing. It is seriously regrettable that Lord Rooker did not listen to them when he had the opportunity. Instead, he arrogantly claimed that the manufacturers would be better at home looking after their businesses than travelling to Belfast to draw attention to their dilemma. That worries me, as it tells me that direct rule Ministers, up until now at least, have not even begun to understand the severity of the situation. Rooker clearly believed that it was a case of "Wolf, wolf!", but if a decision is not made now, the wolf will come laden with poverty, unemployment, desolation and hopelessness for many of those companies that we depend on.

This debate creates an unexpected opportunity to make one last appeal to anyone who is prepared to listen in the interests of the 90,000 people employed in manufacturing. At least the Government should read their own report, which predicts that the best-case scenario for job losses following the imposition of industrial rates is 10,000; the worst case is a whopping 45,000, with an acceptance that 20,000 is a realistic figure. That does not take into account the ripple effect, which would undoubtedly mean more job losses in the service industries. The Northern Ireland Manufacturing Focus Group (NIMFG) predicts a loss of 30,000 jobs, and that, unfortunately, is likely to be accurate.

This could be the straw that breaks the camel's back. Action is needed now, not in a few months' time when companies will be unable to hold back on decisions that must be made. Confidence is ebbing and with electricity prices going up and companies facing up to 50% increases because their contracts are ending, is it any wonder that there is a sense of hopelessness which politicians should, in a normal society, be able to deal with?

How are we going to stop the roller coaster? We must stop it now, because when it starts it will not stop, and the finger in the dyke will not be sufficient to keep back the tide. When it comes, it will potentially devastate our economy, creating further hopelessness among people who believed that the dark days of the dole queues were at an end, never to return. Today, this Assembly has the opportunity to back the calls from the Manufacturing Focus Group for common sense to prevail.

I do not intend to take up my 20 minutes, so I will end on a positive note. Let the Members of this Assembly do everything humanly possible to bring about a political settlement that will allow us the right to take charge of our own affairs. Unfortunately, that is not likely to happen in the next few weeks, and that time is critical to those who are in this dreadful dilemma. They need a positive decision, and they need it now. With Lord Rooker safely gone, I hope that common sense will trickle through the corridors of power and that a reality check will be conducted so that a new dawn may emerge. I hope that those who have come here today to listen to this debate will not have to return some time in the future to say "I told you so".

I will finish by recalling my own childhood days when my father came home to say, on more than one occasion, that he had been paid off and was back on the dole queue with no idea when he would find work again. I do not want to see that experience, that sense of hopelessness which he experienced as he tried to cope with the reality that he had no job and that he had had his dignity taken away from him and from our family. Today families have serious financial commitments that my parents did not have, so the situation is much more serious. It is vital that the Government do not continue down this road to financial ruination for many companies, particularly when there are solutions to the problem which can be implemented immediately with very limited knock-on implications for other sectors of society.

I am looking forward to today's debate. Let us hope that those with influence are listening to the positive contributions that I expect from this Assembly.

2.30 pm

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: Madam Speaker, I am delighted that this debate is taking place today. From what I have learned here today, and which has been made public, the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland already had this particular proposition for debate in the Assembly, but decided that the Assembly would not meet today and that this would not be debated. That needs to be put firmly on the record.

I was amazed that any Secretary of State, without consultation with any of the parties, would decide that this Assembly would not meet. This Assembly is elected by the democratic vote of the people of this Province, and its Members speak for the people of this Province. Why should this Assembly suddenly be turned off because the Secretary of State has other views that he wants to impose on its Members?

This Assembly is meeting today, however, and I trust that people looking in will see that some of the loudest voices on the matter in hand are not here to speak for the people who sent them — they are strangely absent. They fight for a place in a photograph with businessmen, but when businesses are in jeopardy they are not here to take part in the debate. Those people are loudly condemned by all right-thinking people in Northern Ireland. This is where they should be to be answerable. If they have things to say to us, let them not say it in the quiet comfort of a back room. Let them say it in the open Assembly.

I am delighted to speak in support of this motion. I do not always agree with the hon Gentleman, with whom I have had interesting debates and sword-crossing exercises. I do not know whether the points ever went in during the meetings of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development; that is a matter for the past. Here is something that we should be able to find unity on, because it is the basic right of a person to be employed and to get decent pay for the job that he does. Those are elementary rights in a democracy, and that is what we are standing for today.

The Government's proposals will have a terrible impact on industry. To say, as certain Ministers from elsewhere have told us, that people are crying "Wolf, wolf!" where there is no wolf — well, there are hounds and wolves in abundance, and they are all sniping at the industries of Northern Ireland. We should be here to protect those industries and do everything in our power to see that they are safeguarded. People who have work to do, and who get proper pay for it, are the happy people. Those who are on the dole with no possibility of getting a job are not happy, and Satan finds plenty for idle hands to do.

Manufacturers in my constituency and right across the Province will be affected if the Government's plans on rating are implemented. In the past 40 years in Northern Ireland, business has not had it easy because of the devastation caused by the troubles. Now that we have come to this time in our history, however, it is surely time for us to build opportunities for employment in our industries and to strengthen our Province's employment base.

Traditional manufacturing jobs have disappeared from the Province to low-wage economies in the Far East and eastern Europe. At one time, this country of ours was very important for trades. However, the textile industry and many other industries have disappeared. Where are they today? They are in the Far East or in some of the new member states of the European Union.

With so much against us, we must take stock and take definite action to protect and maintain what we have, and to promote and extend that so that jobs can be secured.

Industrial derating provided Northern Ireland businesses with a competitive advantage, but that is to go. Government policy will strangle the manufacturing industry, making it unable to survive. The Government cannot, and should not, do the job of business when it is clear that they have a responsibility, as a competent Government, to create the conditions in which business can compete and win the day.

We are not asking the Government to take over businesses: we are asking the Government for a level playing field so that there will be fair play. The Government constantly point out that our economy relies too heavily on the public sector, yet at a stroke, the Government that mouth that statement are prepared to introduce rating for industrial premises, thus making it unviable for many businesses to operate. They cannot have it both ways: if the Government say that they cannot interfere in the economy, but they step in and destroy that economy's power to rectify itself, they must take the blame.

It is ridiculous for any Minister to say that people should stay at home, work at their businesses and not come to Belfast to protest. Grotesque language is being used against decent people who, for years, have been holding the ropes at a time of grave crisis for everybody in the Province.

People who have borne the heat and burden of the day resent being lectured to by people who have never experienced such problems in their own areas. It is all right to be told what we must do, but it is totally unfair to be put in a pillory, as if we were to blame.

Mr Campbell: Does Dr Paisley agree that the situation is compounded even further in that the Secretary of State and the Government that are intent on introducing industrial rating are the same Government and the same Secretary of State who indicated that the private sector should grow in Northern Ireland, when this decision means that the private sector will shrink even further?

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: I agree entirely with my hon Friend. During a debate such as this, we are looking at our own constituencies so we have many issues in our hearts and minds. All Members have experienced problems arising from industrial rating in their own constituencies: no constituency is exempt.

I welcome the debate. We must take heed of the motion and ensure that industrial rate liability is kept at 25%.

Dr Birnie: I am pleased to speak in support of the motion, because what it asks for is reasonable. After all, it does not even ask for a reduction in industrial rates or for a return to the old situation from the 1920s until the start of this decade, whereby no rates were paid at all. Indeed, for much of the period, that differentiated Northern Ireland from other parts of the United Kingdom. The motion simply asks that the current process of transition to full payment of rates should be frozen at the level ruling now, which is 25%. Such a capping of industrial rate levels would represent an appropriate response to current economic circumstances.

Since the start of the decade, particularly in the period coinciding with the Assembly's suspension since October 2002, there has been something of a cyclical downturn in parts of the world economy. That has meant that Northern Ireland has received less foreign direct investment than before. It was also previously envisaged that as manufacturing took up the burden of paying a full rates bill, there would at least be some compensating relief from lower electricity charges. The multi-million-pound package, first proposed four or so years ago under the then Finance Minister, Ian Pearson, is still languishing. Although the Brussels Commission is rightly often regarded as a bureaucratic monster, in this case the fault may also lie, to some degree, with London's decision making. Given that industrial energy charges remain substantially higher than those in Great Britain, the UUP sees little support for raising rates at this time.

The motion represents a sound reaction to the fact that the Northern Ireland economy is facing increased competitive pressure, notably from the Irish Republic, but increasingly also from central and eastern European economies. They are all marked out by low rates of taxation on business profits of 15%, 10% and perhaps even lower. The competitive issue is twofold. Some companies here may shut down completely; others may move their factory or branch plant the comparatively short distance to south of the Irish border.

In bringing forward that proposal, it seems that the Northern Ireland Office (NIO) did not carry out a full regulatory impact assessment of all the options that would, of course, include the option of not removing derating. DTZ Piedad Consulting may well have been inaccurate — indeed the balance of probability is that its figures are inaccurate — when it forecast that the impact from full derating on profits would be only 2·7% of profits. Invest Northern Ireland (INI) and others have produced alternative higher, and arguably more plausible, figures.

It is true that rate payments may represent only a small proportion of total business turnover, but they represent a higher proportion of business profits. Examples include Bombardier, which could be paying £2 million annually by 2011, and Harland and Wolff, whose potential bill is £4·4 million. Obviously, those figures must be compared to the size of the profits in those companies, which at various times in recent years have been relatively constrained. Remember that for a company on the margin of viability, it does not take much of a change in its net profits — the profits after taxation — to tip it out of operation completely.

In supporting the motion, the UUP does not wish to indulge in an anachronistic central bias on economic policy-making. A job is a job, whether it involves making something or servicing something.

2.45 pm

It is true that manufacturing represents a small percentage of our economy in terms of gross domestic product (GDP) and employment — perhaps as low as 15%. That means that fewer than one in six people is involved in that sector. Crucially, however, that sector still makes the vast majority of the exports going from Northern Ireland to Great Britain and, indeed, wider afield across the world. Therefore, in recommending the freezing of rates at the current level, we are not indulging in some old-fashioned liking for metal bashing or garment stitching per se. In any case, we would ideally like to see the burden of business taxation reduced on all enterprises that produce exportable products and services beyond the region. That should, and can, include marketing firms, design consultancies, finance and banking and — crucially — tourism. Let us start today with manufacturing.

As Dr Paisley said, the implications of the motion are political, as well as economic. Today, this Assembly — despite the chaotic background arrangements and the imperfections in the Standing Orders that have been applied to Members — is working to an extent. The Assembly is debating something of undoubted substance. I think that there is a fair chance that we will establish a consensus on this motion, perhaps even absolute unanimity. Therefore, the Assembly challenges the Secretary of State, given what he has said, to take note of what we, the elected representatives of Northern Ireland, are saying with one voice.

Finally, I return to Northern Ireland's manufacturing sector. Its current performance is suggestive of the line from Charles Dickens:

“It was the best of times, it was the worst of times”.

Over the past 15 or so years, output, exports and productivity growth here have all substantially exceeded those in the rest of the United Kingdom. At the same time, however, rates of research and development spending, and the extent to which our companies are employing highly skilled and highly qualified technical scientific labour, are still too low, especially when international comparisons are drawn. Therefore, much still needs to be done.

According to this week's 'The Economist', dated 3 June 2006, the public sector here still represents 61% of the regional GDP, only 65 private-sector firms employ more than 500 people, and half of the Province's exports are produced by only 10 firms. However, if we look back at our industrial past, to which reference has, rightly, already been made this afternoon, this is the Province which, among other things, invented pneumatic tyres, Milk of Magnesia — perhaps we might need some of that as the debate goes on — the Ferguson tractor, and many other significant innovations.

Given the progress that has been made over the past 15 or so years, we should not, therefore, recklessly imperil what has been achieved by imposing more taxation on that sector. The best road to a higher tax revenue or tax take on the part of the Government is to have a bigger wealth-creating sector, which should be incentivised by lower tax rates. I support the motion.

Mr Neeson: Madam Speaker, may I first endorse what Dr Paisley and Sir Reg Empey said in relation to the timing of this debate. I learnt about it at 5.00 pm yesterday, and I must say that that is a totally unsatisfactory way to run any political institution. I hope that the Secretary of State takes note of today's remarks.

I support the motion. I was proud to be part of the major rally that took place in the Waterfront Hall where thousands of workers, business people and politicians joined together to support the proposition that is before the House today. I would like to congratulate NIMFG on the excellent work that it has been doing in recent months.

It is due to their efforts that this crucial issue has been highlighted and that we are debating it in the Chamber.

There has been a lot of finger pointing at the Government today. However, a Government, made up of elected Members of this Assembly, should be in the Chamber.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Neeson: The elected Members of this Assembly should be taking the decisions.

Members have referred to Northern Ireland's overdependence on the public sector. It is an issue that must be addressed. We cannot underestimate the importance of the surviving manufacturing base in Northern Ireland. However, as I have said in previous debates, we face many challenges, particularly from the global economy. We have seen the damage that has been done to the textile sector, which has almost disappeared. The discussions that we have had with NIMFG have shown that jobs are at risk in Northern Ireland. It is not, as other Members stated, a “Wolf, wolf!” situation.

I am sure that nobody in the Chamber was sorry to see Lord Rooker go. His whole approach, not only to elected representatives, but to the business sector in Northern Ireland, was nothing short of outrageous.

I remind Members that industrial derating was introduced into Northern Ireland to compete with the low levels of corporation tax in the Republic of Ireland. The irony is that there is clear evidence that investment from Northern Ireland is going to the Republic of Ireland, and also to eastern Europe. I have met manufacturers who are considering the possibility of investing even further afield in countries such as China and India. There is a major competition problem for all of us if we are to deal with this effectively.

The parties represented in the Chamber are agreed on the issue and have met the Secretary of State. He put the ball in our court and said that if we want to deal with the issue — he does not have a problem with us doing that — the money must be found somewhere else. That is the challenge that we face. As my party has stated on many occasions, a great deal of money could be saved in Northern Ireland. The sooner we create a shared future, stop segregation and integrate society in Northern Ireland, the sooner that massive amounts of money will be saved. That money could deal with the issue that we are addressing today.

Sir Reg Empey: Given the Member’s past record, I thank him for giving way.

It is important that this debate takes place now, rather than later in the lifetime of this body, because Departments set their budgets in the autumn. If we were to debate the issue later in the year, with Departments setting their budgets in the expectation of the next step forward, they would tell us that we are too late because they have already set their budgets. That is the significance of having the debate now. This money has not been collected or spoken for; it has been anticipated. It is easier, as I understand it, to deal with that at this stage rather than leave it. That is the significance of the timing.

Mr Neeson: First of all, when he talks about a record, I hope the Member is not referring to a criminal record.

I agree with him. I am not quarrelling with the timing of the debate. It is important that we should have it. However, it is not only industrial derating that we should be looking at. We need to look at other necessary incentives as well.

I am very much aware of the significance of the small business sector, which does not really benefit from industrial derating. Essentially, the small business sector forms the rock on which the Northern Ireland economy stands. It is important that we try to assist the growth of all sectors of business in Northern Ireland.

There is another thing that is important. When we had devolution, Sir Reg was the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment and I was Deputy Chairperson of the Enterprise, Trade and Investment Committee. One thing that we did was oversee the merger of the Local Enterprise Development Unit (LEDU) and the Industrial Development Board (IDB) into Invest Northern Ireland. It has now been in existence for a number of years and, in view of the reports I am getting about its activities — or lack of activities — there is an urgent need to review its workings.

I want to point to one final issue. The enlargement of the European Union has obviously increased greatly the competition for Northern Ireland businesses. Not only that, but we have seen an influx of foreign workers into Northern Ireland. They have made a major contribution to the local economy.

The biggest incentive that we can give to the local economy is to restore devolution as soon as possible so as to create the political stability that is necessary and which, I believe, can only improve the economic climate.

Mr Simpson: This issue affects not only manufacturing industry in Northern Ireland, but the entire wider economy. I am sure that the House will be aware that today we have quite a number of business-people attending the debate. As a businessman in Northern Ireland, I count it a privilege to try to help them fight this cause both in this House and at Westminster, in the mother of all Parliaments.

I was going to say that a lot of them are my friends, but on second thoughts some may have had business experience, so we will not go into that at this stage. Certainly, it is a privilege to represent them and to try to do something to help their cause.

It is vital that the Government take note of what is said in this debate and act on it. I am sure that we will hear a lot from Members today that will be repetitive, but I do not think that we can talk about the issue enough. The message needs to be got out to the Government.

As someone who has been involved in business, I know personally of the impact that these increases will have on the business sector. I speak also from personal and professional experience when I say that the campaign against the Government’s proposals is a campaign to keep jobs in Northern Ireland and to attract new jobs into the Province. As a matter of fact, it is a campaign to support the Northern Ireland economy as a whole.

If the Government really wish to see our private sector grow, they must wake up and finally learn the lesson that they cannot and will not achieve that by taxing manufacturers out of business or over the border into the arms of our nearest competitors. Manufacturing in Northern Ireland has been forced to compete in very difficult circumstances. Surely anyone with the slightest genuine interest in, or concern for, the economic well-being of Northern Ireland must see that whatever advantages we have must be emphasised, supported and promoted.

3.00 pm

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Wells] in the Chair)

One such advantage was the existence of industrial derating, which Government policy now threatens. It has already been pointed out that any chief executive of any company who followed a course that would result in the destruction of that company would soon find himself on the dole. That the Secretary of State seems to want to get promotion on the back of his industrial hooliganism says much about him. The fact that the Prime Minister might reward him with a promotion says even more about the Government.

It is any competent Government's responsibility to create the conditions in which business can compete and win, yet this Government are following a path that actively disadvantages local manufacturing businesses. The Government consistently point out that our economy relies much too heavily on the public sector, yet, as my right hon Friend, Rev Dr Ian Paisley, said, they are prepared, at a stroke, to introduce rating for industrial premises, thus making it unviable for many of our businesses to operate in the Province. Having come through the dark years of a terror campaign that, in part, sought to wound fatally our entire economy, the Government now threaten us with a policy that could do more long-term and Province-wide damage to our economy than the Sinn Féin/IRA night shift could inflict.

The proposed industrial rate will particularly affect a huge number of businesses' profitability and viability. Thousands of jobs will be at risk if the Government drive through the measure. It is unnecessary, it is counterproductive, and it is universally loathed and opposed by the local political parties.

The Government have repeatedly told us of the need for agreement. We have seen agreement across the board in Northern Ireland on industrial rating. The matter is not so much a test of the local parties as it is a test of the Government. It is a test of their commitment to consensus and to cross-community support. If the Government are serious about that commitment, the Secretary of State must make it clear that he will heed this Chamber's voice. Although we might not, at this stage, be able to achieve an industrial rate of 0%, the rate must be capped at 25%, which is a view that now derives support from right across the political divide. Parties in Northern Ireland can unite around the issue and send the clearest possible signal to the Government that they must think again, and this debate gives us the opportunity to do that.

We recognise the danger that the ending of industrial derating poses to local manufacturing businesses right across the Province. Direct rule Ministers, who are currently in charge of governing Northern Ireland, must get the message.

In closing, Madam Speaker, may I congratulate — Mr Deputy Speaker. My apologies; I was looking in the other direction. A sudden transformation has taken place. I shall not say whether it is for the better or for the worse, but you are very welcome to the Chair.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Simpson: He will never forgive me for that.

I congratulate the Northern Ireland Manufacturing Focus Group, and Mr Basil McCrea, who currently looks after that organisation, for all the work that the group is doing, and for the fight that it has shown in its campaign.

I wish them well, and I know that every Member of the House will support them in their endeavours to achieve the 25% levy.

Mr Hillis: I am delighted to support the motion. Without wishing to be alarmist about the future of manufacturing in Northern Ireland, we must be realistic and agree with the Northern Ireland Manufacturing Focus Group that the imposition of industrial rates is a short-sighted and counterproductive policy. Like David Simpson, I compliment that organisation on its demonstration today; its earlier demonstration in the city centre was excellent. It certainly focuses minds, and it is important to keep up the pressure on Government.

Major employers have said that the imposition of rates may well be the last straw for many businesses. Many new manufacturing businesses are based on new technology, and they are to be praised for their innovation and tenacity in difficult times. Do we seriously want to undermine further our manufacturing base by proceeding with industrial rating? That would effectively pull the rug out from under entrepreneurs' feet. If the Government were trying to make it really difficult for Northern Ireland plc, that is exactly what they would do.

There have been many changes since our forefathers had the foresight to construct this Building. At that time, our three major industries of shipbuilding, linen manufacture and agriculture were celebrated in frescoes in the former Senate Chamber. We all know what has happened to shipbuilding and linen manufacturing; changing demands, market trends and, most importantly, price competition from abroad emphasise how important it is to be competitive in today's world.

When I started my working life as an apprentice in Coleraine for the princely sum of £3 a week, I was frequently sent for stock from one of the many shirt manufacturers in the town. At that time, there were probably six of those, and that was representative of the whole country. The majority of those factories have succumbed to a seemingly unstoppable wave of cheap foreign imports.

Obviously, we cannot compete with cheap foreign textile imports. However, at the very least, we must not shoot ourselves in the foot — in Northern Ireland, we seem to be very good at that — by deliberately increasing baseline costs through ending industrial derating for a hard-pressed manufacturing industry.

I certainly do not suggest that we look back; we must look forward. I have had some 40 years' experience in business, and I have learned the hard way. I understand the pressures under which businesses operate. The current Secretary of State and his direct rule Ministers do not have that understanding.

Today's manufacturing businesses are frequently different from those of a number of years ago, but they still operate under the same baseline costs and competition. It was frightening to learn from some of the demonstrators that, after labour costs, industrial rates are the highest cost to manufacturers. That cost, with a bit of common sense, could be frozen now.

As an MLA for the constituency of East Londonderry, which is a mainly rural area with two major towns, Limavady and Coleraine, I must say that the figures for manufacturing job losses since 1999 do not make happy reading. The Limavady borough shows a decrease in manufacturing jobs of 17.1% and the Coleraine borough a decrease of 7.7%, according to Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment statistics, published in mid-February this year.

The proposer of the motion mentioned the job losses at one manufacturer in particular — Farm Fed Chickens, which shed 70 jobs in January 2005 and, regrettably, closed with 380 further job losses very recently. The latter figure was too late for inclusion in the most recent statistics, so they are, in fact, much worse than published. An updated figure for the Coleraine borough could well be something like 13% job losses since 1999.

AVX, a very successful company under considerable pressure in a worldwide market in the microprocessing industry, employed, I believe, something in the order of 1,300 people in 2001. Regrettably, that figure is now 900, but the big plus is that the firm is still there and still working away, and I certainly wish it all the best.

Statistics are not very exciting, but those figures spell out human tragedy. Behind the statistics are real people and real families; there are dashed hopes and expectations. Where there are job losses, there are certainly mortgages, loans and credit card bills that must still be paid, so there is a human cost.

Industrial derating was introduced in 1929 to support the manufacturing sector and was abolished in England and Wales in 1963 and in Scotland in 1995. We are told that we should be treated the same as the rest of the UK. In normal circumstances, I would, as you know, Mr Deputy Speaker, be more than happy to be treated the same as any other British citizen, but there are substantial differences for manufacturers in Northern Ireland. We have a land border with another EU state — an EU state with a very different tax regime. We are on the very edge of the EU, as well as being separated from our biggest market, Great Britain, by the very-expensive-to-cross Irish Sea.

The disproportionately high cost of energy, added to our lack of natural resources, erodes the advantages of cheaper labour costs. Sadly, we must import a large proportion of raw materials. To add to that, we are still emerging from conflict, which did so much to destroy business confidence, although we are a few years on. That all adds up to a very uneven playing field.

We are now in year two of the phasing-out of industrial derating, with full rates due to kick in on 1 April 2011. I am told that the previous devolved Executive always envisaged phasing out industrial derating only when it was related to reductions in energy costs — my colleague Esmond Birnie highlighted the missing millions. That was to ensure that there would not be any disadvantage to our manufacturers in the global marketplace. Where are those energy cost reductions now?

Industrial rating certainly will not help the situation in which Northern Ireland manufacturing currently finds itself. Northern Ireland requires a freeze in industrial rating at the current level of 25% and a commitment by Government to support and facilitate the manufacturing industry through genuine partnership. I support the motion.

3.15 pm

Ms Ritchie: Mr Deputy Speaker, as a South Down constituency colleague, I welcome you to your position.

Momentous decisions are being taken that will drastically change the political, economic and social fabric of Northern Ireland over the next number of years. The people will have no influence on those decisions — unless we give them that influence. We can do that only by using consensus to urge the Secretary of State to freeze the industrial rate at 25%, and, above all, to restore the political institutions. However, our message to the Secretary of State must be simple and straightforward. We support the manufacturing sector: our economy is based on it and on agriculture and tourism.

Consider what is coming down the road for us that will change our economic and social fabric: the Review of Public Administration; water charges; the phasing out of industrial derating, which we have already mentioned; planning policy statement 14, on which some of us agree and others do not; rises in the regional rate and the rating policy review; and the ongoing education board budgetary cuts. Many of those factors could have a pernicious impact on urban and rural communities and could stymie economic growth. However, the removal of industrial derating has the potential to be the body blow for small- and medium-sized manufacturers, who are the backbone of our community in the North of Ireland.

It has been suggested that industrial derating was introduced as a partial attempt to level the playing field with competitors in the Republic, who enjoy a corporation tax of 12.5%. That competition is tougher than ever, and that is why we want a review of incentives that will examine the issue fully. In the meantime, it is imperative that the Secretary of State freeze industrial rating at 25% and support the people who are with us today, inside and outside the Chamber, and who were with us at the Waterfront Hall on 25 April.

It is vital that we maintain a healthy manufacturing sector for a balanced economy. According to research that was undertaken by PricewaterhouseCoopers for the direct rule Administration, the number of people who work in manufacturing in Northern Ireland has halved in the past 20 years to 90,000. That research also revealed that approximately 18,000 jobs are likely to be lost over the next 10 years. Those stark statistics need further examination and require urgent political action to ensure that the manufacturing sector is not subject to further diminution.

The Secretary of State is very fond of lecturing us and the people of Northern Ireland. He tells us repeatedly that our public sector outperforms the private sector, which needs to be pump-primed and developed. That is true; it is important to develop the private sector. However, it is extremely difficult to do that when the policies that the Secretary of State and his direct rule Ministers have introduced and pioneered slice away, undermine and fracture the private sector and, in particular, the rural economy.

The majority of people live in rural areas, which are characterised by small manufacturing businesses that employ tiny groups from their communities. Those communities encompass engineering firms and those who are associated with the cement, tarmac, carpentry and furniture manufacturing industries. All those enterprises have been subjected to the onslaught of industrial rating and have had to lay off staff as a result of the increased pressure that has been placed on profit margins and output. As you know, Mr Deputy Speaker, industrial rating is a tax on the workplace, and further increases in it will simply contract the workforce and lead to job losses, closures, relocation of industry, reduction in investment, a loss of traditional skills, a loss of disposable income and a stagnation in the rural economy.

Do we in this Assembly want that to happen? I imagine that our collective response would be no. However, pending the restoration of the political institutions, does the Secretary of State have the political will to scrap his ill-thought-out proposals and save the economy or, at the very least, to freeze industrial rating at 25%? The answer is clear. He knows what he has to do, pending the restoration of the institutions: freeze industrial rating. We, the parties, know what we have to do. We must ensure the restoration of all the institutions of the Good Friday Agreement by subscribing to the principles of power sharing and partnership government and of policing reform, and by seeking an end to criminality and the creation of a lawful society. We must all adhere to those requirements in order to sustain the rural economy. That is a major challenge to the British Government, to the Irish Government and to all parties. Lest any of us be in any doubt, that is what the people of Northern Ireland want, particularly those in the manufacturing sector who are visiting here today. Everyone here should listen to their plea. Please, Secretary of State, listen to that plea.

Industrial rating will not only disadvantage manufacturing communities but will also severely disadvantage vulnerable members of the community. Those young people who are less well educated will find it harder to gain employment if the manufacturing sector is continually eroded. Do not let that happen. We have already seen examples over the past 20 years of the contraction of the textile industry — no more so than in our constituency, Mr Deputy Speaker. People have been forced to find jobs elsewhere or to join the dole queue because manufacturing companies have found economies that can do the work more cheaply. The people here have suffered, whether employers or employees. We must ask ourselves whether we want that to happen again. We must ensure a future for all the population, fight the negative forces in our society, come to a consensus today and force the Secretary of State to take account of the views of this Assembly.

Members must unite in support of the motion, and I commend my colleague Mr Dallat, the Member for East Derry, for moving it. We must ensure that industrial rating is frozen at 25%, pending the restoration of the political institutions. We must support the manufacturing sector; we must support the people of Northern Ireland.

Mr Shannon: I welcome you to the Chair, Mr Deputy Speaker; it is nice to see you there.

I support the motion. It is an important issue for us all, especially for those who represent constituencies where there have been job losses.

Northern Ireland is being beaten into extinction. The Government have introduced a taxing system that ensures that there will be little or no industrial sector in Northern Ireland, and they have done it by putting the blame on the non-existence of the Assembly. The fact is that they need to look to their own direct rule Ministers, in particular to the Secretary of State, to find where the decision came from to tax the already very shaky industrial sector into oblivion.

Mr Deputy Speaker, as you and Members of our party know, we met the Secretary of State eight or nine months ago. We pressed home the issue of industrial rating and the need to help our economy and our businesses, yet here we are debating the matter today — with little or no response from the Secretary of State. Northern Ireland has been given an economic death sentence with the rating of industrial premises. One wonders about a Secretary of State who says that he wants to see a Northern Ireland that can compete on the worldwide stage in economics and industry, while allowing the industrial sector to disappear under the weight of taxation by the Labour Government. That Government have increased taxation in order to pay for the promises that they made in 1997 on health and education. Members may have read in the papers today that the Labour Party has introduced 80 tax increases during its nine years in power.

The party of taxation is no longer the Conservative Party; it is the Labour Party — with a vengeance. The Government are also fighting wars in two countries, with poorly equipped soldiers, yet they expect Northern Ireland to forfeit the industrial sector of its economy to balance the books on the mainland.

Many small businesses in the Strangford constituency will be dreadfully affected by increased industrial rating. We have already lost textile factories such as Donaghadee Carpets, Carpets International in Killinchy and Bangor, and a plastics factory in Carrowdore. All those losses have incurred the loss of jobs for many workers who even today are still trying to find work. However, jobs will be even more scarce if industrial rating increases, as those who are making only enough to pay the wages in family firms will find that they cannot afford to pay the industrial rates and will go under. The clear message must be: “Cap the rate at 25%”.

In my area, many small businesses have about six to 10 employees. The profit for the person who owns or runs those firms will more often than not be absorbed by the increase in industrial rating. Those people are wondering whether it is worthwhile to stay in business, and whether to continue or to consider the future. Many of them will do the latter. It is not just the small firms in Newtownards, north Down and Comber; it is small firms right across the Province. We have a commendable work ethic here, but, unfortunately, the Government seem to be trying to do away with it.

Another example is of a firm that employs 25 to 35 workers. To comply with health and safety legislation, it was encouraged to increase its factory floor space. The firm did that only to find that it will be penalised with higher rates — all because it did what the Government encouraged it to do for the safety of its workers. Where is the justice in this system?

We may have our differences with Invest Northern Ireland, but one manufacturer stated that it did a great job in helping and supporting business — that could all be undone by increased industrial rating in the next five years. That is the story coming from businesses in my area and right across the Province. The Government already had these companies over a barrel by introducing legislation. They then introduced taxation for industry based upon floor space, as I mentioned. I am told that the extra bills will put the future of businesses and employers in jeopardy. People are being cautious, with so many bills expected and the same limited wages coming in. They are not spending their money in the economy, and, as a result, there are drawbacks for manufacturing. The self-fulfilling circle continues. People will lose their jobs, and all this because the Government are trying to win the jackpot of £40 million to £50 million to pay for their forgotten promises and their wars.

Receipts will be much smaller as more and more industrial businesses hit the wall and put people out of work. Some firms are considering relocating outside Northern Ireland to avoid this taxation by the Government. PricewaterhouseCoopers has stated that 25% of firms were considering relocation. If that is the case, there will be 18,000 more people unemployed and living off benefits — all because the Government are greedy, and oblivious to or — dare I say it? — disrespectful of the need for Northern Ireland people to have jobs.

Some firms have reduced their factory floor space in the hope of reducing their rates. Those are the ambitious businesses; they are run by people who have the ideas and the flair to make Northern Ireland's economy better. By doing away with their floor space they have reduced their ability to employ more people. That is the downside of increased rating.

On a global scale, companies are leaving the developed world at a rate of knots because they can get cheaper premises elsewhere. Strangford has witnessed people go overseas because it is cheaper.

3.30 pm

What incentive do these companies have to stay in Northern Ireland? What incentive do the Government give any business in the UK? Companies could begin to move across the border because the Government in the Republic offer taxation, insurance and rates at much lower levels than the British Government. The benefit of the Irish Government's approach is clear to see; they have a strong economy — at least at the moment — while the UK is struggling to keep its head above water. Even on the mainland, the Labour Government have done little or nothing to stop the loss of jobs in industry.

Would the Government and Peter Hain like to tell us how many companies are making cars on the mainland, and how the industrial sector on the mainland has coped with rating? Would the Labour Government like to tell us just what they are going to do about the fact that there will not be enough money to ensure that all benefits are paid because so many people will be out of work? That will be the future under this policy if this Government keep taxing their people and their industry the way that they are at present. Cap the rate at 25%, and let the business sector get on with the job of doing business, employing local people and boosting the economy. I support the motion.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Before the Member for East Londonderry Mr Hillis got to his feet, I should have pointed out that it was his maiden speech. It is convention in another place that there are no interruptions during a Member's maiden speech. I state that because Mr Gardiner will speak next, and it is his maiden speech.

Mr Gardiner: Mr Deputy Speaker, I congratulate you on your appointment and wish you well.

I support the motion. The ending of industrial derating sends out the wrong signal to the economy, not just in my constituency of Upper Bann, but across Northern Ireland. At a time when we should be encouraging the move from the public to the private sector, the removal of relief on industrial rating will take £201.3 million out of the Northern Ireland economy, moving it from the private sector's hands to those of the public sector.

In the House of Lords recently, Lord Rooker, the Northern Ireland Office Minister in the Lords, replied to my noble Friend Lord Laird by telling him that, over the next seven years, the following additional amounts of revenue would be raised through the ending of industrial derating: in 2006-07, £18.2 million; in 2007-08, £26.1 million; in 2008-09, £38.2 million; in 2009-10, £58.7 million; and in 2010-11, £60.1 million.

That cannot be helpful to the stated Government policy of ending the Northern Ireland economy's dependence on the public sector. How can the weakening of the private sector by what amounts to a tax increase on manufacturing enable its growth? The ending of industrial derating means that we must look carefully at any Government spending on the encouragement of industrial development over the next seven years and deduct £201.3 million from it. That effectively means that existing industry will pay for any Government subsidies to new businesses. This is typical of Government double-think — the taxpayer pays, and the Government claim the credit.

Manufacturing is the base activity of the economy. It is manufacturing that earns the new wealth on which all the service industry rests. People will not have new money to buy services if that new money is not generated in the first place.

Already, just 14.8% of the UK economy is in manufacturing, compared to well over 30% in Germany.

The figure in Northern Ireland is as low as 12%, which shows that we have narrowed our wealth-creating base until it is almost non-existent.

According to the latest research, the number of people working in the manufacturing industry in Northern Ireland has halved to 90,000 in the past 20 years. Another 18,000 jobs are likely to go over the next 10 years. Manufacturing in the Province is fragile, and we are far too dependent on the service sector. However, we are faced with the task of creating over 140,000 new jobs in Northern Ireland over the next decade. In the face of that daunting task and those alarming figures, is this the time to end industrial derating? I think not.

Industrial rating is a Treasury-driven policy in a nationwide Government effort to claw back as much revenue as possible to cover what is referred to in the City of London as "Gordon Brown's black hole" — the underlying deficit in the Government's finances that is estimated at between £10 billion and £20 billion. It has nothing to do with fair play, as the Government claim, or with industrial restructuring. It has to do with the Government's failure to manage their books. The same is true of water charges and rate increases. It is all a Treasury-driven clawback of finances.

Northern Ireland is coming out of more than 30 years of civil strife; it needs investment, not major tax increases. It needs an imaginative peace dividend and not the withering effects of Treasury savings. To end industrial derating is a major blow to one sector, which has the ability to end Northern Ireland's so-called dependency culture, which is criticised by the same Government that are doing little or nothing to replace our overdependency on the public sector. Only manufacturing can allow the economy to come out of the doldrums. I commend to the House policies such as enterprise zones, with major tax breaks for manufacturers in high-value-added enterprises, and not the dead hand of Government clawback.

I support the motion.

Mr Moutray: Mr Deputy Speaker, I echo the words of welcome that have been extended to you.

For nigh on 30 years, business in Northern Ireland was forced to endure a campaign of violence and destruction waged against it. Those who do not have the courage to be in the Chamber today were only too quick to give unquestioning support to those who, under the cover of night, sought to destroy our economy, pull down our infrastructure and condemn entire communities to an economic wasteland. However, what is truly staggering is that where the terrorists failed in their sectarian and fascist-style campaign, the UK Government seem determined to succeed.

The Secretary of State likes to point out that our economy relies too much on the public sector. He is correct, but what is his diagnosis? His solution is to tear down advantages from our business sector and introduce measures that threaten to cripple our private sector, making it unviable for many businesses to operate. When we consider his diagnosis and his prescribed remedy, Peter Hain looks more like the Dr Harold Shipman of local politics than a responsible Secretary of State. Government proposals on industrial rating threaten to damage the manufacturing industry, its profitability and its viability. They also threaten thousands of jobs in the process.

That situation will not have been caused by international competition or internal terrorism, but by a Government charged with helping to ensure our success.

Although manufacturing businesses using large premises may suffer initially, the introduction of the proposed rating policy will have a knock-on effect on the whole Northern Ireland economy. Northern Ireland business is only looking for the opportunity to lead the Province into a better future. No Government with a genuine interest in securing such a future would cast itself in the role of driving businesses into the ground, killing off any chance of recovery.

The Government encouraged many businesses to invest heavily in premises, equipment and human resources and they claim to want to turn Northern Ireland into a world-class economy. If that is true, they should start by showing a commitment to freezing the industrial rate at 25%. Parties are united in opposition to industrial rating. The Government now have a responsibility to think again.

Mr Gallagher: I share the concerns highlighted by Members and voiced by the representatives of NIMFG who are here today. They are also shared by many people in manufacturing from my constituency, who were not able to be present for the debate.

There will be dire consequences for the entire community if the current rating policy is allowed to move to its next phase. As we all know, it has been very difficult to attract inward investment into Northern Ireland over the years, but particularly so west of the Bann. Much of the little that came our way has gone again because many of the large manufacturers centralised their operations elsewhere or have moved out of the country to the cheap labour economies. The leader of the DUP mentioned that earlier, and he rightly highlighted the consequences for people's lives and livelihoods. A recent example of that was the announcement of the closure of the Moy Park factory at Lisnaskea, with the threatened loss of 188 jobs. That is happening simply because the company is centralising its operations, leaving 188 people out of work in a town that has lost four factories in the past five years and a total of 480 jobs.

However, one of the more hopeful features of the economy of Fermanagh and South Tyrone and other places in the west has been the resolve of local business people to overcome challenges and to develop businesses locally themselves. Consequently, those areas now depend highly on several manufacturing businesses to provide jobs and to sustain the local economy. Like businesses everywhere along the border, they are striving all the time to overcome the disadvantages of, for example, currency differences or the more favourable conditions provided by the Irish Government for their business counterparts on the southern side of the border.

It has been clearly set out for Members that a reprieve on this issue is completely in the hands of the Secretary of State today. Yet we have assembled here elected politicians, all supposed to be accountable to those who elected us, including the business community.

3.45 pm

However, here we are and we cannot function as accountable politicians because there are those among us who, both inside and outside this Chamber, highlight only barriers and refuse to engage in attempts to find ways to establish devolved Government.

Yesterday — as we all know — Members could not, or would not, agree a Chairperson for the Committee tasked with finding a way forward. Members can hardly blame the business community or the general public if they are cynical about what is happening in here. The economic and social interests of constituents should take precedence over party-political interests and rivalry for power. All parties must take seriously the responsibilities that they were elected to carry.

To start with, we need a commitment to making the Preparation for Government Committee work to achieve devolved Government, and the rhetoric of today's debate could then be followed by meaningful action — action taken by those elected by, and accountable to, the public. We must resolve to get to that point without delay. I support the motion.

Mr Elliott: I welcome you, Mr Deputy Speaker, to the Chair and wish you well in your efforts and work in that role.

At this stage in a debate, we beg the question: what more can be added to everything that has been said? I have been trying to think of the answer for the past 15 minutes, as almost everything appears to have been said.

However, there are a couple of issues, and my colleague in Fermanagh and South Tyrone Mr Gallagher has mentioned a few in our constituency. Many Members have mentioned facts and figures, and I have no wish to repeat them.

The industrial manufacturing sector has been one of the biggest employers in Northern Ireland for generations and that must be protected. Recently, we became aware of a major issue in Fermanagh and South Tyrone. As Mr Gallagher stated, Ferne Foods has just announced that it intends to shut up its plant in Lisnaskea, with the loss of 188 jobs. That is a serious issue for an area that, in a very short time, has lost businesses such as Adria Ltd, the Sir Richard Arkwright factory and Fermanagh Creameries.

It is the big-business-closure syndrome. Small indigenous local companies progress well within a community, but suddenly they are bought over by big international firms that eventually shut up shop. We have found that in Fermanagh and South Tyrone. Local companies, such as Fisher Engineering, the Quinn Group, and Balcas Sawmill CHP Plant, are run by local people. They started them, progressed them to a significant level and created a big employment base. However, the larger companies, or big international firms, come in and buy up the small companies and, in no time, they are closed.

We must encourage Government to support local indigenous companies. Fair enough, we need the big manufacturers to come in as well, particularly in urban areas, but we must support small indigenous companies that local people build from the ground up.

Many of those companies started with one or two employees, have built up their business and now employ hundreds of people, and that is vital. An example is Fisher Engineering, which is currently listed in 'The Sunday Times' top 100 profit-growth firms in the United Kingdom. The Quinn Group has its headquarters in Derrylin, County Fermanagh.

During 2004, it acquired Barlo Group, a leading manufacturer of sheet plastics and radiators. Two years ago, the Quinn Group was expected to generate a turnover in excess of €900 million. Balcas is another prime example in County Fermanagh.

I wish to talk briefly about the equine sector. I am led to believe that, in Northern Ireland, there will be no rate relief for the equine sector, unlike mainland Great Britain, where there will be industrial derating and relief — it may not be called derating, but it is certainly rating relief. That will not be so in Northern Ireland unless we can pursue the issue and insist that Government provide such relief. Many people ask why the equine sector is situated mainly in southern Ireland. I have given the answer, and things will get worse if that issue is not quickly resolved. There have been several representations made to me on that matter in recent weeks.

At a recent meeting with Moy Park, the company that owns Ferne Foods, I pleaded with it to reconsider the situation at the Lisnaskea plant, where 188 jobs will go. That may not sound much to Moy Park or to its parent company, a large American firm. The number may not be big on an American scale, but it is to people in County Fermanagh, and particularly to people in Lisnaskea.

Mrs Foster: Before the Deputy Speaker left the Chair, he called two Members for Fermanagh and South Tyrone, and I am glad that you are continuing in that trend, Madam Speaker. I wish to add to the comments of those two colleagues about industry in that constituency. I am sorry that my Friend Tommy Gallagher has left the Chamber. I take his points about our taking our responsibilities seriously. However, would it not have been better if the other Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone, the MP for the area, had been here as well — and not only here, but in her place at Westminster — to debate the issues that affect the constituency? Regrettably, that is not the case.

A lobby representing Northern Ireland manufacturing attended an Assembly group meeting some time ago, and its briefing was stark. The lobby said that 30,000 jobs would be lost to the Northern Ireland economy if full industrial rating were introduced. The then Minister, Lord Rooker, whose leaving, as has been said, is not lamented, summarily dismissed that figure. We were also told that many firms would relocate outside Northern Ireland. Lord Rooker said that there was no evidence to back up those figures and added that the manufacturing lobby was using scare tactics to secure an unfair advantage by keeping industrial derating. If he were still here, I would tell him that I have the evidence in Fermanagh and South Tyrone. My two colleagues have already given such evidence, and I can back up those figures.

It will not surprise the House that, as a border constituency, Fermanagh and South Tyrone struggles to maintain an effective industrial base, not only because its nearest competitive rival has a lower tax regime, but because of the lack of investment in infrastructure, which is an additional burden. That is an entirely different debate and one that I hope will come before this House in the not-too-distant future.

We have heard much about Lisnaskea and south-east Fermanagh. Five years ago, Lisnaskea had four thriving medium-sized factories: Coats Viyella at the Sir Richard Arkwright factory, Fermanagh Creamery, Adria, and Ferne Foods. I remind the House that three of those four are gone and that Ferne Foods is earmarked for closure and enduring a 90-day redundancy consultation. I cannot help but think that the spectre of industrial rating was a factor in Moy Park's decision to pull out of Lisnaskea.

I have no proof of that, but I am sure that it was one of the factors that they considered when contemplating the loss of 188 jobs in that area. As my colleagues said, it was a huge blow. For many of those who lost their jobs, this was not their first experience of redundancy. For some, it is their second or third redundancy, having worked in the factories that I mentioned previously.

In the debate on the economy, I stated that our indigenous entrepreneurs need to be the focus of bodies such as Invest Northern Ireland. I reiterate that point and add that if the Government — as they say so vocally — are keen to move from a public-sector-dominated economy to one with higher private-sector involvement, they cannot imply that desire on the one hand and impose industrial rating on the other. The Government — at least, one would think — should try to be consistent in the messages that they send out. However, over the years, that has not always been the experience of my party.

“All things being equal” is a phrase that is often used in economics. It is not, however, a phrase that is applicable to the industrial sector in Northern Ireland. Poor infrastructure and consequent transport costs, the legacy of 35 years of terrorism, the unequal tax regimes with our nearest competitive neighbours, and high energy costs and unfair competition from the Far East mean that all things are not equal. Therefore, I support the motion to cap industrial rates at 25%.

Mr Armstrong: I support the motion, and call on the Secretary of State to freeze industrial rating at 25%. Expansion of the manufacturing sector is essential to a successful economy in Northern Ireland, and the Government need to work with businesses to establish a more favourable climate in which the small businesses and medium-sized companies that drive our economy can prosper and deliver more manufacturing jobs. One of the first steps should be for the Government to announce an immediate freeze on rates for manufacturers.

This is not a new debate. The issue of industrial rating has been ongoing since 2002. The Ulster Unionist Party has thrown its weight against the proposal since then. I refer to a letter that I wrote to the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment in July 2002, before industrial rating was out for consultation. I highlighted my concerns regarding manufacturing output figures for my constituency of Mid Ulster, which appeared to have registered a drop that was double the national average.

Mr Weir: The Member mentioned that he wrote the letter to which he referred in July 2002. The Minister he would have written to at that stage was Sir Reg Empey. I presume that, at that point, the Minister took action and ended the slide towards the end of industrial derating.

Mr Armstrong: The Minister took what action he could at that time. In 2002, I feared that the figures would be repeated in the following years. Then we would have been in big trouble. I urged the Minister that Invest Northern Ireland should employ ways to encourage industry to expand and develop.

Mid Ulster has a strong history of small light engineering firms, many of which employ fewer than 10 people. We regard those firms as our manufacturing seedcorn for the future, and we are confident that, given time and support, a good sprinkling of those companies will turn into medium-sized enterprises. Those home-grown firms usually have roots in the local community that are not easily broken, unlike many of those that have been encouraged to locate in Northern Ireland through inward investment.

However, in late 2002, direct rule brought the so-called consultation on industrial derating, and my office was inundated by pleas for support from numerous manufacturing industries in Mid Ulster and across Northern Ireland. I have continued to consult local companies, such as Turkingtons, Forbes, Keystone, Powerscreen, Dungannon Meats, Moy Park, McEvoy's, McErlain's Bakery, Western Roofing, SDC Trailers and Macrete Ireland, to name but a few. That shows the diversity of products being manufactured and the range of firms facing the huge financial implications of industrial rating.

4.00 pm

Direct rule Ministers have already stated that Northern Ireland is unsustainable with its heavy reliance on public sector jobs and that we must increase the private sector, yet they have failed to assist the existing manufacturing base in the Province. The Government in Westminster have been trailing their feet for years in working with the manufacturing industry. They seem to be more interested in importing. Northern Ireland has a history of being very much self-sufficient, but the Government seem to be set on reversing that trend.

There are various industrial disadvantages that Northern Ireland's manufacturing companies must overcome to enable them to become more competitive in the marketplace, whether our home market or the UK, Europe or worldwide markets. Northern Ireland manufacturers face higher energy costs and higher raw material costs due to the lack of raw materials available here, coupled with the disadvantages of being separated from the rest of the United Kingdom by a sea border, being the furthest region from central Europe, and having a border with the Irish Republic — which enjoys low corporation tax, no industrial rates and an industrial boom over the past 20 years.

The number of manufacturing units in Northern Ireland has fallen each year, and in the past 30 years the number of people employed in manufacturing in Northern Ireland has fallen from 175,000 to 95,000. It is not an exaggeration to estimate that 30,000 manufacturing jobs could be lost due to the imposition of further increases in industrial rates.

The expansion of the manufacturing sector is essential to a successful economy in Northern Ireland. We cannot have a secure, prosperous future based purely on public-sector and service-sector jobs. Many companies — large and small — across Northern Ireland, engaged in many different industries, are now contemplating moving across the border or closing down as a result of the ending of local industry's last remaining competitive advantage.

Over the years, I have witnessed the establishment of many small companies. Through sheer hard work those companies have flourished, offering employment opportunities and contributing to our local economy. They are the companies that will become the backbone of our future industrial base. There are 5,107 companies in Northern Ireland affected by the end of industrial derating. Those companies operate in a highly competitive international market, and it is impossible to pass on the additional costs to their customers.

The loss of many thousands of jobs will cost much more than the estimated £53 million per annum that the Government hopes to raise through the end of industrial derating. The latest 'Economic Outlook & Business Review', published by First Trust Bank at the end of May, states that:

"In overall terms NI does not have a compelling, competitive offering to foreign investors."

According to the report, Northern Ireland's economic conditions weakened in the last quarter of 2005. The report forecasts that, although public expenditure will expand over the next 18 months, spending is unlikely to increase afterwards. It predicts that personal income and consumer spending will continue to grow but will also be hit by the introduction of water charges and higher domestic rates. Cutbacks in some sectors of manufacturing are likely to cause unemployment to increase for the first time in several years.

Direct rule Ministers have reminded us of how much the Northern Ireland economy depends on the public purse, and that in the years ahead local taxpayers will bear an increased burden in support of improved local services and infrastructure, and a cutback in the numbers employed in the public sector.

The present policy of Government to push manufacturing costs up by introducing massive rate bills will further threaten many more jobs and will see more closures. Coupled with a 20% increase in electricity prices from April 2006 and a massive increase in Phoenix Gas prices, this cannot be absorbed by industry as it is working on ever-tighter margins.

In the case of Bombardier, the additional costs of rating will be around £2 million a year when this is fully implemented in 2011. The Government are further disadvantaging industry in Northern Ireland with policies imposing restrictions on planning including renewable energy infrastructure and essential services. In a meeting in October 2003, direct rule Minister Pearson confirmed his complete lack of loyalty to local manufacturing companies when he indicated that, should they be unable to survive when industrial derating was withdrawn, he would have no qualms in securing necessary products from outside Northern Ireland or the UK.

The Government must reverse this lack of loyalty to manufacturing companies in Northern Ireland and instead give them all possible support. The Government must recognise the unique location of Northern Ireland in comparison with other regions of the United Kingdom and offer tangible support to the manufacturing sector, by imposing a cap of 25% as the maximum that industry can afford and by looking to other tax incentives.

I urge the Government to review and assess immediately the impact on businesses in Northern Ireland of the ending of industrial derating after the first year of operation. The Government have already set a precedent where some parts of the freight industry have been offered 75% rate relief because the Government believe that it is not the time to increase costs. Manufacturing should be offered similar terms. Industrial derating was Northern Ireland's manufacturing companies' only competitive advantage. They must be supported to maintain their competitive edge so that they can afford to invest in research and development in order to survive in the modern world. Profitable companies pay tax to Government, and that should more than compensate for any support that is forthcoming from Government.

Mr McGlone: A Cheann Comhairle.

A fortnight ago, this Assembly rightly debated Draft Planning Policy Statement 14. On that occasion there was much consensus in the Assembly that it would be bad for rural society and bad for rural economies. Based on analysis that I presented to the Assembly, it is predicted that such an ill-advised policy will have very negative effects on the local economy with potentially as many as 10,000 direct job losses. We cannot afford such a body blow to our economy, yet we are back today trying to bring the Government to their senses and to avert any potential for major job losses in Northern Ireland.

We have recently seen too many breadwinners join the dole queues and their families hit poverty due to international pressures without adding to those dole queues through a massive economic own goal — for that is exactly what the introduction of rating for manufacturing at the Government's proposed scale will be.

There are many manufacturing businesses in the Mid Ulster area, and my colleague Mr Armstrong referred to a number of them. However, when people who I know well, from places such as Ardboe, Cookstown, Magherafelt, Draperstown, Maghera, Bellaghy and the Creagh, tell me that this will cause grave difficulties for their businesses, I listen very carefully. I trust and believe them and value their judgement deeply, far ahead of that of an academically well-qualified civil servant. The reason is that these people have been there through good times and bad. Many of them have built their family businesses from scratch — in some cases, despite efforts by paramilitaries to destroy those businesses — providing employment for local communities.

These people know what makes their businesses succeed and what has the potential to drag them down. The Government's proposed level of industrial rating on industrial workspace will do just that, causing job losses or closures, relocation of industry, reduction of investment and capital expenditure, consequent loss of disposable income and its effect on the local economy and loss of traditional skills. The Northern Ireland economy simply cannot afford an economic body blow of this extent.

I was very proud to join the local manufacturers' representatives on the day of their protest, to see them come out and articulate their deeply held views and share those views with them. I have welcomed them here today and am glad to see them in the Gallery, from where they can see the consensus — a consensus that the Secretary of State must heed — that has emerged in the Chamber. He must listen to the views that have been expressed in and by this Assembly and to those that small businesses have expressed, both at their protest and on other occasions, and help to build a positive economy for all of us in Northern Ireland. A Cheann Comhairle, molaim an rún. I support the motion. Go raibh míle maith agat.

Mr Beggs: I am pleased that, so far, there has been unanimous support for the motion. It is important that we send that message to the Secretary of State. It is regrettable that some Members have chosen not to attend the debate.

Northern Ireland Office (NIO) Ministers must rethink their attitude to local businesses. Policies that adversely affect local businesses adversely affect local jobs. It is not only about businesses; it is also about jobs and lives. As my colleague Mr Hillis said, it is about how industrial rating will ultimately affect the lives of individuals.

NIO Ministers have been saying that the local economy is not sustainable, yet, at the same time, they have been keen to load additional burdens on to our businesses, thus making the situation even more difficult. Take, for example, the rates burdens that have been loaded on to our larger employers. The rates for Bombardier Shorts have been estimated at £2 million a year, Montupet's at £1 million a year, and Harland and Wolff's at £4 million a year, although I understand that that figure may have been recalculated at £750,000 a year. Each of them faces fierce competition from other companies. Some also face stiff competition from other groups on their sites, so those additional costs will affect the bids that they place and may determine whether they win new contracts. That could have serious, long-term implications for those companies' futures. We should not take that lightly, bearing in mind that each of those companies not only has large numbers of employees but sustains many other employees by subcontracting throughout Northern Ireland.

Industrial rating is likely to have even wider implications for our smaller employers. The rates burden tends to make up a higher proportion of smaller employers' costs; therefore it might have an even greater effect on them.

Several Members have questioned the DTZ Pida Report, which estimated that the industrial rate would be 2.7% of profits. I understand, however, that only 22 of the 100 companies that were surveyed had fewer than 50 employees, yet that group is likely to pay about 80% of the rates. Something clearly went wrong during that survey, and I question the conclusions that the report drew.

I wish to highlight the case of NK Fencing Ltd, which is a company that has a plant in my constituency. The company has 205 employees. It made, according to the most recently quoted figure that I have seen, £630,000 profit. It has a potential rates bill of £163,000, which is more than 25% of its current profit, not 2.7% of its profit. That would have a huge effect on any business's long-term plans, and it is not really tolerable.

Local businesses face many cost pressures: we have additional transport costs as a result of our peripheral location; we have increasing environmental costs in order to meet European directives; and, as others have said, Northern Ireland has suffered from high electricity costs as a result of the botched privatisation, which gave the electricity companies at that time very generous contracts. The Ministers have yet to deliver the £30 million per annum rebate to rectify that situation. Local businesses also face competition from the different fiscal regime in the Republic of Ireland, with which we have a land border. The EU free market makes it easy for people to transport goods and for businesses to relocate.

4.15 pm

As my colleague Norman Hillis said, we must not shoot ourselves in the foot on this issue. The Treasury already loses out because of motorists choosing to fill up with petrol across the border. The Treasury should look seriously at that matter, because it should not want the resultant loss of corporation tax and National Insurance if, because of the adverse conditions that Northern Ireland Office Ministers intend to establish here, companies decide to relocate.

There has been complacency among the Northern Ireland Office Ministers. In a recent statement, the then Enterprise Minister, Angela Smith, indicated a positive outlook for Northern Ireland's manufacturing sector. However, the same document later indicated that employment in the manufacturing sector had declined by half in the last 20 years. A Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment report by PricewaterhouseCoopers in July 2005 stated:

"The projections suggest that the management of decline ... is the task facing policy makers in Northern Ireland".

That is a defeatist attitude. Certainly, that will be the result if the Government continue to load additional burdens on employers. We must create a positive attitude, address the needs of businesses, and ensure that this is a place where business can succeed and where the best of our young people can take on the rest of the world. There are companies that are doing that, and succeeding. I think of Schrader Electronics — I have mentioned it before — which has 30% of the world market in remote tyre-pressure-monitoring systems for cars. FG Wilson, in my constituency, has been one of the best exporters in the United Kingdom.

Why should we spend millions in trying to attract foreign investment, while at the same time taking on board policies that will drive away existing jobs? Invest Northern Ireland and the Government must reassess what they are doing.

I thank the Northern Ireland Manufacturing Focus Group for their work, and I support the motion. It is important that we, as an Assembly, present a united view to the Government, and I hope that the Secretary of State will respond.

Mr P Ramsey: We are indebted to the Member for East Derry for tabling the motion, and I acknowledge the high number of representatives from the business sector who came here today. I notice quite a few from the north-west. It is only as a result of their determination in bringing forward their concerns that the issue is being debated.

Today, the Assembly has the opportunity to speak with one voice in support of NIMFG's campaign, and it calls on the Secretary of State to freeze the industrial rate. That is why the manufacturers are here. They are not here to listen to a talking shop; they are here to make sure that the Secretary of State takes account of the resolution passed in this Chamber. I have no doubt that not only will there be a consensus, but it will be unanimous.

In recent years, my constituency has seen a huge decline in the textile industry, particularly in shirt manufacture, affecting thousands of jobs. We cannot and will not tolerate any further job losses that will, no doubt, result if this legislation is allowed to pass.

The SDLP fully supports the efforts of the Northern Ireland Manufacturing Focus Group to alleviate the burdens on industry. We favour a more reasoned and targeted system of industrial incentives, which would counteract some of the regional disadvantages borne by manufacturers. Moreover, there is a need to bring together new methods of encouraging, supporting and sustaining our existing manufacturing base in Northern Ireland. This issue does not just concern big companies; we support small and medium-sized companies and the new ideas coming from the creative-industry sector.

Businesses in the border region are relocating to the South of Ireland. Companies originally based in Foyle, my constituency, are now setting up in Donegal for higher profit margins and more favourable rates of corporation tax. The issue of industrial rating must be considered in the wider context of the competitive advantage in the South, which must be matched in order to enable businesses in the North to survive and prosper.

We all have a responsibility to ensure that central Government Departments are committed to the development and growth of all businesses across Northern Ireland in order to ensure a balanced and sustainable economy. The SDLP is determined and committed to ensure that manufacturing and business thrive in Northern Ireland, with results that clearly benefit everyone in the community.

The reduction of poverty and the creation of higher levels of employment opportunities must be our top priorities.

It is in that context that I fail to understand why the British Government are intent on pursuing a change that has no mandate from the political parties represented in the Chamber and that will have a completely negative impact across all the communities that we represent. As some of us heard from Basil McCrea this morning, it will potentially lead to a loss of upwards of 30,000 jobs; we cannot tolerate that. It could also lead to businesses closing down, as was mentioned previously, or relocating to the South of Ireland.

If the legislation is fully implemented, it will make an already difficult marketplace even more difficult for businesses to work in. Existing manufacturing companies are facing increasingly difficult trading environments. If industrial rates are not capped in some way, the gap between North and South will widen further, placing Northern border counties on an uneven playing field and at a further disadvantage when attracting investment.

The imposition of industrial rating will throw the manufacturing sector into crisis at a time when it is much harder for businesses to ensure a more sustainable future. We must also consider new business start-ups. What incentives will there be for future generations? What encouragement will be given to young people who may consider starting up their own businesses? Industrial rating will increase overheads and make it more difficult to make profits.

At a time when we are achieving a consensus in the Chamber, we not only hope but demand that the Secretary of State takes account of the motion, which will undoubtedly be passed.

Madam Speaker: Before I call the next Member to speak, I remind Members of the convention relating to maiden speeches.

Mr McCausland: I support the motion. It is quite clear from the debate that there is a broad consensus on this subject that stretches across political parties — with the notable exception of the party that happens to be missing today — across different business sectors and across the Province. Members from the west of the Province, mid-Ulster and the east of the Province have spoken on the issue.

The decision to phase out industrial derating was ill conceived and ill considered. The former Finance Minister, Lord Rooker — recently departed but not much lamented — was in favour of industrial rating. He said:

“There really is no reason why the manufacturing/industrial sector ... shouldn’t pay”.

He was quite fond of the term “no-brainer”, but on that occasion, he was not using his brain, because only someone who has not thought about the matter could actually say that there is no reason.

There are good reasons why derating for the industrial and manufacturing sectors should be retained — primarily, jobs and employment. The point has been made on a number of occasions that unemployment is quite low, so what are people getting excited about? However, the fact remains that, in significant parts of Northern Ireland, many people are economically inactive, many areas have inter-generational unemployment, there are low levels of skills and people seeking work look to the manual or semi-skilled sectors.

When I mention that, I think of my own constituency, because there is a need for more investment, more businesses and more manufacturing there. For example, a few years ago, Invest Northern Ireland spent a considerable amount of money building an advanced factory at Glenbank. It sits across from some of the most deprived wards in Northern Ireland; it is a lovely factory, but it has been empty since the day it was built. It has only ever created one job — and that was the caretaker. Apart from that, they have not managed to create one job; they cannot get anybody to go into it.

Other employment opportunities came along and promised much. The American company Teletech invested in the Northgate centre in Duncairn Gardens and, at one stage, promised 900 jobs. However, it has never created more than a fraction of that, and is constantly under threat. The future of the company is uncertain.

In fact, because the firm is recruiting in places such as Holland and other continental countries so that workers can be brought in from abroad, nothing more than a handful of jobs have been created for the people in the immediate locality. Therefore, the impact on local communities is negligible.

That is why it is particularly important — and several Members have already made this point — that we stress how local enterprises, industries and the manufacturing sector are valuable to the local economy and how they can address unemployment. We should also encourage those sectors. The removal of industrial derating will discourage them, but its retention will encourage them to some degree.

We should be concerned about this matter for the sake of those who have suffered and who continue to suffer from the effects of unemployment. I am therefore delighted that there is such a breadth of support for the motion, and I am happy to support it.

Mr P J Bradley: I welcome the industrialists who are here today, and I am surprised that we are even here together. The message from the Waterfront Hall that day was loud and clear, but, as yet, no one has taken heed of it.

Many different groups are interested in the outcome of the debate. The rating exemption has been enjoyed for almost 80 years and is about to be removed. It is probably unfair to use the word “enjoy”, but the exemption was certainly an encouragement that is now under threat of removal.

The motion is not a call for the continuation of derating; rather, it is a call to freeze the industrial rate at an acceptable 25%. I am aware of over 50 industrial and manufacturing companies, some large, some not so large, but all of equal importance, in my constituency of South Down. Indeed, some of those companies have been creating employment and manufacturing in my area for over 50 years. Those companies are now faced with something that is between economic uncertainty and complete closure.

Our concerns must not stop there. We must think of those firms' employees and their families. The local economy is also under threat, and at a time when many farmers seek earnings to supplement their farming income, it is to such firms that those about whom we have heard so much today often turn when they seek that secondary employment.

I said in my opening remarks that many groups are interested in the outcome of the ratings debate in Northern Ireland. Included, but for a completely different reason — and we have already heard about this from many Members — are the many owners of industrial sites in the Republic of Ireland who would gladly avail of the opportunity to deal with those whom the Government north of the border are forcing out of business.

We know who out there is listening with interest to what is being said in here, but I ask whether the Secretary of State is listening. If he is, he must not ignore the views that have been expressed in this Assembly. So far, 19 Members have expressed their unqualified support for the business people of Northern Ireland. The Secretary of State should also note that four of the five main political parties that were elected to the Northern Ireland Assembly are unanimously opposed to the Government's proposals.

If Mr Hain is a democrat, he will pay heed to what democratic Northern Ireland is saying; if he is a labour-conscious politician, he will share the concerns of employers and their employees; and if he is a believer in common sense, he will recognise that the common sense that has been repeated so often in the Chamber today cannot be ignored.

I support the motion.

Mr Dawson: I welcome the debate, and I support the motion. It is interesting to reflect that, even in the worst days of the terrorist campaign in Northern Ireland, the manufacturing industry employed about 170,000 people. That was despite the efforts of IRA/Sinn Féin to destroy the economy by bombing our businesses, intimidating and kidnapping business leaders and making the country unattractive to foreign investors. During all that time, many jobs were maintained and businesses strengthened.

4.30 pm

I take the opportunity to pay tribute to the business community and to the many companies, large and small, that weathered the storm of 30 years of terrorist violence. Business leaders, during all that period, kept their heads down; they concentrated on their businesses and on the employment and stability that those businesses could bring to local communities. In a time of terror and despair, hope was kept alive in an otherwise chaotic and difficult economic climate by the regularity and routine of business activity and business existence, and often business success, in Northern Ireland.

The business community's contribution to maintaining some stability in that time of general instability has never been fully recognised. The irony of the situation in which we find ourselves today should be evident for all to see. Where is the peace dividend for the business community in Northern Ireland? Having striven and worked to create stability during the entire period of the troubles, the business community could at least expect to be rewarded and protected by the Government as we come to the end, it is to be hoped, of the troubled time that we have been through. There is no peace dividend for the business community and no general peace dividend for Northern Ireland across the board.

Rather than seize the opportunity to capitalise on the possibilities for further stability through the business community, and rather than look for creative partnerships to tackle long-term unemployment and use the strength of an active business community to tackle the figures on those who are economically inactive, the Government's response is and has been to penalise the business community, to reduce its profits, to stop the possibilities of research and development, to reduce investment and, ultimately, to create further unemployment, which may lead to renewed community instability.

If ever a policy was ill thought through, ill prepared and ham-fistedly implemented, it is the one that levies industrial rates on our business leaders.

Today, manufacturing jobs are, sadly, at half the number that they were during the worst days of the troubles. Manufacturing is still competing in that global environment, but more particularly, as Mr Dallat mentioned, it is competing with businesses in the Republic of Ireland, where the overall tax regime is more beneficial. The Northern Ireland business environment is different to that experienced in the rest of the United Kingdom. We are the only part of the United Kingdom that has a land border with a country that operates a different fiscal regime and is within the euro zone. The structure of our economy is, as we know, dominated by and focused on the public sector. Members referred to the energy and transport costs, which are higher in Northern Ireland than in the rest of the United Kingdom.

Manufacturing continues to decline in Northern Ireland. Our economy still needs a period of special measures that are clearly focused on delivering a strong, competitive, outward-looking and confident private sector. Levying uncompetitive rates on the manufacturing sector will do nothing to transform our economy into a private-sector-dominated one; rather it will entrench the dependency culture and will dramatically and negatively impact on the private sector, as has been said many times today. That proposal runs counter to the published 'Economic Vision for Northern Ireland', as set out by the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment. It says little that is positive about the notion of joined-up government. The one thing that has been consistent in all the debates in this Assembly has been the criticism of the lack of joined-up government in Northern Ireland.

The House will unite today, I believe, in opposing the implementation of industrial rates beyond the current 25% level. I draw Members' attention once again to the empty Benches opposite. Outside this Chamber, those who would sit there promote their ability and their confidence in demonstrating for the business community, yet they have nothing to offer in debate on its behalf.

Mr Storey: Does the hon Member agree with me that one of the reasons for the absence of Sinn Féin/IRA representatives in the Chamber is that they have no fiscal policy? In fact, in their proposals for the finance of the Irish Republic, they have actually proposed that those levies should be increased. It is a matter of embarrassment as to why they are not here, and it is a matter of inability because they are not able to deliver on any fiscal policies for the benefit of the people of Northern Ireland.

Mr Dawson: The hon Member is of course right that the Sinn Féin party proposal for the economy of the Republic of Ireland is increased taxation. They are the party of increased taxation, and while they proclaim that they are against increased industrial rating here, in the Republic of Ireland they are saying that rates should be put up. They are bereft of sensible economic ideas. As my hon colleague has said, they have nothing to offer in terms of the bread-and-butter issues facing the Province.

The rest of us also need to be challenged, because while it is good for us to leave this place today believing that we have represented the interests of our constituents in the business community, the plain fact remains that we need to do more to influence Government thinking. In the first debate in the Chamber, on the economy, there was cross-community support for a working party to be set up to look at the range of issues affecting the economy in Northern Ireland. Such a working party would be of more value than a contrived restoration Committee, which has no real business to conduct, but which is designed to provide a political fig leaf to the absentee politicians of Sinn Féin. The need for that working party to explore the real economic issues — rates; tax; how we can benefit the business community and drive a competitive economy through Northern Ireland, tackling the range of issues that needs to be tackled — is urgent.

Today we have expressed our opposition to increased industrial rating. That opposition is all well and good. The pressing need for this House and its Members is to find solutions that will be for the benefit of all the community; solutions that reflect the specific needs of Northern Ireland and challenge the current thinking of the Treasury beyond Northern Ireland and in relation to taxation that is levied here. I appeal to the members of other parties to ensure that that working party is set up, and that we get down to the real business of helping the economy of Northern Ireland in a meaningful way rather than complaining about what others are doing.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Girvan: I am grateful for the opportunity to debate the issue in the Chamber. I say debate; I have heard one side of the debate today. There is unanimity throughout the Chamber. Everyone seems to be united on the stance that the implementation of the rating policy put forward by direct rule Ministers is nothing but economic vandalism upon the economy and the business community. Coming from the private sector, I am only too aware of all that that implies.

Northern Ireland is a different case from any other part of Great Britain in that our energy costs are probably the highest in Europe. We also have to deal with trying to cross the sheugh, because 75% of everything that is manufactured in Northern Ireland has to be exported to GB, and that gives rise to additional costs. Businesses in my area are feeling the pinch already, not only because of corporation tax and the differential between Northern Ireland and the Republic, but because we went through 30 years of vandalism and terrorism, which has had an impact on business.

I note that the Benches opposite are empty — that party would be only too willing to lambast and shout about everything, yet for 30 years it wreaked havoc not only on the lives of men and women, but on the Northern Ireland economy and the economic well-being of this Province.

We must support capping the rate at 25%. I do not always agree with Mr Dallat, but on this occasion I do. I am glad to support the motion. The focus group has done a fantastic job of lobbying and getting its message across, and I congratulate it on that. It has been very positive in its approach. My party is 100% behind the stance that the business economy of Northern Ireland needs to be supported.

Our reliance on public-sector employment was also mentioned. The death nail is not being driven into Northern Ireland by terrorism, but by the British Government and the vandalism of direct rule Ministers. I support the motion.

Dr Farren: In supporting this motion, I believe that the issue posed by the removal of industrial derating goes far beyond whether the rate is justified, too high or affordable at all. The stark fact is that the present state of our economy and the threat to the manufacturing sector posed by the removal of industrial derating have arisen because of an absence of private-sector investment on the scale necessary to create more vibrant, wealth-creating enterprises. In turn, that failure to invest, as many have pointed out, has come about primarily because of political instability, civil unrest and terrorism.

It is critical, therefore, that we grasp the opportunity to create political stability and cease the seemingly endless game-playing that we, to our shame, allow to pass for politics here. We are already well into injury time, and it is time that we realised it — the people out there do — particularly if we are to address the issues that the motion raises.

Important as the removal of industrial derating is, the more fundamental issue is what support systems must be put in place to move into a wealth-creating, wealth-producing economy that retains as much of its manufacturing base as it can, and, where possible, adds to it. Such an economy would also be able to attract investment — whether from indigenous sources or from overseas investors — in the fast-growing tradable services sectors: in software and technology development; tourism; pharmaceuticals and so on.

It must be admitted that there has been a welcome growth in investment from overseas in recent years, but it has been very slow, especially compared to that of our neighbours in the South, as many Members have pointed out, and in comparable regions elsewhere. Aside from the image created by political instability and unrest that long deterred investment, we do not have a competitive investment offering to effectively meet that which others can offer.

It is to that issue that we must apply ourselves, and, in the meantime, take every step possible to ensure that no sector of our economy is made to carry burdens that it cannot bear. We are supporting this motion to allow a breathing space while we develop an agreed investment strategy and package of supports to ensure that the strategy succeeds.

That breathing space is necessary because our manufacturing base is under considerable pressure. However, we recognise that such pressure is not exclusive to manufacturers in Northern Ireland — that industry is under pressure almost everywhere in the Western World, particularly those forms of manufacturing that can be moved easily to places where costs are much lower. As we cannot demand access to other markets if we try to adopt anti-competitive protectionist methods, we cannot expect our manufacturers to be immune or to be unduly protected.

However, the request to peg industrial rating at 25% is not a case of seeking a form of protection. It is a tax that, because it is not income-related, has the potential to increase uncontrollably for the payee. Therefore, although this form of taxation is widely used elsewhere, in our situation, where the numbers involved in manufacturing have been in serious decline, it has the potential to do serious damage very quickly if the escalation of the rate continues. Therefore, a moratorium in its application is essential — at least until a new agreed investment strategy and the necessary support packages are put in place.

Two weeks ago in the first debate in this Assembly, Members began to tease out some of the features of such a strategy and what its support package should consist of. If my recollection is correct, we seemed to agree generally that we want our economy to develop in the way that I have just outlined. We also discussed some of the supports that we believe should be provided: tax incentives to match those elsewhere, such as the frequently mentioned 12.5% corporation tax in the South; incentives to encourage research and development; marketing and training; and reforming our education system to focus more on vocational needs.

Many Members also stressed the clear benefits of an all-island approach in which a joint North/South strategy to attract inward investment could have very positive results in pulling in key overseas investors. We urgently need to apply ourselves to putting that package together, whatever it is. We also need to examine the levels at which industrial rating should be set and how other forms of businesses, apart from those in the manufacturing sector, should be rated. For definitional reasons, there are anomalies in the present situation that exclude many businesses that might now qualify from the present concession. Therefore, it is justifiable for those of us who may put that kind of strategy together to ask how we classify and rate across the whole business sector.

If we are to put together an economic recovery package and seek support for it, we need to ensure that it is comprehensive and that it sets ambitious and challenging targets. It is an urgent task; it is becoming clear that the main driver of our economy in recent years — public-sector investment — can no longer be relied on to continue generating the levels of growth that we have experienced over the past decade.

Public-sector expenditure could well decrease as a proportion of the economy over the next few years, and many commentators expect that it will do so. Therefore, private-sector investment must play a greater role if we are not to experience lower levels of growth, an increase in unemployment and even greater threats to our manufacturing sector than it currently experiences.

We have a responsibility to address this issue. I agree with those who want to see it addressed urgently as part of preparation for Government. Indeed, I have come from a session of that Committee today. There is an opportunity in such a Committee to identify the relevant issues and examine how they might be pursued. It is a responsibility that we must discharge urgently if we are to restore the hope that the institutions should be giving to the electorate.

Mr Storey: I welcome, and concur with, the comments made today by many colleagues. In particular, I endorse the comments made by the hon Member for East Antrim, Mr Dawson. When one comes to this stage of a debate it is always difficult: many of the issues have been covered and the points made. One recurring point seems to be that we are glad to support the Member for East Londonderry, Mr Dallat, for tabling the motion. If nothing else has been achieved today, that is something that we can commend.

Rather than rehearsing all that has already been said, it would be beneficial to come at this issue from another perspective. First, I place on record my support for the motion, but I do not believe that a motion from this Assembly will carry the weight that it should unless we consider some other matters from another perspective. Let me read three statements that we should think about. The first reads:

“The climate for change”

— that is, to restore industrial rating —

“probably exists provided it is implemented incrementally over, say, a period of ten years”.

Who might have said such a thing? Was it Peter Hain, or Paul Murphy or Angela Smith? No, it was not. It was the Ulster Unionist Party.

The second says:

“Without clear evidence of necessity and effectiveness, it is difficult to maintain the argument that other businesses should foot the bill for industry in this country, given the present economic climate”.

Was that statement made by Ian Pearson, or the much-maligned, and rightly so, Lord Rooker, or David Hanson? No. In this instance it was the SDLP.

Finally —

Dr Farren: Will the Member give way?

Mr Storey: No, I will not give way.

The third statement reads:

“The removal of industrial derating will give an enormous boost to the Northern Ireland economy.”

I see some Members beginning to shift nervously in their seats. They can relax, because that last statement is not true; it was made up.

I read those first two statements not to castigate or to embarrass either the Ulster Unionist Party or the SDLP, but to make a broader point. The proposals for the removal of industrial derating were initially discussed and suggested by the previous Executive, partly on the basis of an economic analysis of the subject, and partly because of the promise that alternative arrangements would be put in place. However, it is absolutely clear and evident to us today that it has not been and may not be possible to make such arrangements. From the information provided by the manufacturers who are here today, it seems that a further economic analysis needs to be carried out.

In those circumstances, as well as calling on the Government to freeze the level of industrial rates, I concur with the point that was made about pressing forward with the economic working group that this Assembly decided it would progress. It seems that there is reluctance and dragging of feet on this issue, and there should not be. There should be urgency. Let us put our money where our mouth is.

There is no point in trying to convince the manufacturers who have come to the Assembly today and who have lobbied the political parties over the past few months that we are behind them, if, when they look back, we are so far behind that they cannot see us. They must be able to see from this debate and what we do about it that we take the issue seriously.

The challenge — and I concur with the hon Member from East Antrim, Mr Dawson — is not about trying to set up some fig leaf Committee that will salve the conscience of the party that is absent today, so that we will have some form of shadow Assembly that it can use and abuse. The challenge is to establish the working group and ensure that its proposals are beneficial.

The Preparation for Government Committee must consider the wider perspective and urgently look at issues such as how to provide the best environment for industry; what the likely impact of industrial rates will be at a variety of levels; how to better assess rates for industry; how to make up for the loss in revenue; and where to cut back in expenditure terms. Unless we are prepared to confront those issues, our motion will not be taken seriously even if passed unanimously.

A major problem with direct rule that is often overlooked is that not only are unaccountable decisions taken, but it can lead to unconstructive opposition. That is understandable but it is not desirable. The members of the NIMFG visiting the Chamber today have, more articulately than most of us politicians, identified what those problems are, because they face them daily when the bills arrive and the books have to be balanced. Let us not only identify the problems but, where realistic, let us provide the solutions that will ensure that the economy of Northern Ireland continues to grow and prosper.

Mr Kennedy: Madam Deputy Speaker, thank you for the opportunity —

Madam Speaker: It is Madam Speaker.

Mr Kennedy: Sorry, Madam Speaker. If you had had the day that I have had, Madam Speaker, confusion of that nature would be expected. [Laughter.]

I apologise to you profusely. As you are no doubt aware, I have been engaged with others on the Preparation for Government Committee. I suspect I would have been of more use to my constituents had I been in the Chamber.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Kennedy: No discourtesy was intended for my absence during the debate. I am aware that it was a convention of the old Assembly that Members had to be attentive to the entire debate rather than drift in and out of the Chamber. However, thank you for your understanding.

I pay tribute to NIMFG for the way that it has led the campaign to raise awareness of this issue. It has done so in a commendable and expert manner. Those representations have been listened to, and I hope that that will continue.

Many of the local manufacturers in my constituency of Newry and Armagh have made excellent representations to me in complete support of the view of NIMFG. I pledge my full support, and that of my party, to this campaign.

I had the great privilege to be in the Waterfront Hall — and it is not often that Ulster Unionists have had the privilege to be in the Waterfront Hall.

[Laughter.]

We have often been in the Waterfront Hall, but it was pleasant to be there at the end of April to be part of the public rally organised by NIMFG, to hear its representations at first hand and to see that political support was evident from all quarters.

A compelling case has been made by NIMFG.

5.00 pm

Politicians of all types and from all parties are aware of, and support, that case. There was widespread political support for it in the subsequent meeting with the Secretary of State, who agreed to carefully listen to and consider the points that were made, particularly that of freezing the rating level at 25%. Therefore, it is important that the Secretary of State recognises that, where political consensus exists — albeit that that consensus includes a party that has chosen to absent itself from the Chamber, but still apparently supports the principle of the campaign — he should listen to and act upon those views.

Amid the current uncertainty surrounding the Assembly, the hard-pressed taxpayers and electorate of Northern Ireland might then at least see that it, in persuading the Secretary of State to freeze the rating level at 25%, pending the full review, is capable of achieving something. I make that call and I hope that it will be unanimously supported in the Chamber today.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Like many, I apologise for not being present for all the contributions from Members. As the previous contributor said, there was other Assembly business. Some have described it as the fig leaf Committee, others as the Preparation for Government Committee, and others have said that it is about scoping. Having come from that Committee, I feel that it is like scoping without hope. Nonetheless, I apologise for not being in my place for the whole debate. I welcome the fact that there has been, from the reports that I have heard, a good debate and great support across the Chamber for the motion.

I congratulate NIMFG, which started out some time ago as the North West Group, and as all good things, was founded by a Ballymena man. The group brought concerns to elected representatives, and I congratulate it for keeping that campaign going. It is good that some people who were opposed to what the group was saying at that stage are now very much behind it and appear to be supporting it.

I remember attending a meeting that NIMFG had organised. Two Members of the current Assembly and another who is no longer with us, Mr McClelland from South Antrim, were there, and they vehemently opposed the DUP's call for industrial derating. They told us that it was impossible and that there were all sorts of things in the bigger picture of which we should be aware. My colleagues have outlined some statements that some parties have made. I remember sitting in a meeting one night and being told that industrial derating was nothing more than a perk.

The Member who said that is sitting here today, but I will not embarrass him by naming him. Industrial derating is not a perk. It was a crucial issue for NIMFG.

Other Members have drawn attention to the fact that Sinn Féin is not here and have indicated their disappointment at that, or at least they have been prepared to highlight the fact that its unwillingness to be here demonstrates its unwillingness to discuss the crucial bread-and-butter issues. Many of us will, of course, reflect on its absence in the knowledge that, for years, the Provisional IRA was content to bomb businesses and to murder and kidnap businessmen. Today, it is still involved in robbing banks, in tiger kidnaps, and in an economic strategy that is against the very opportunity about which everyone in the Chamber has spoken today, which is the need for Northern Ireland industry to be a success. Sinn Féin's absence today is probably borne out of embarrassment, as well as political expediency.

Other Members have commented on Sinn Féin's economic strategy vis-à-vis the Republic of Ireland. Again, I put on record that the Provisional IRA and Sinn Féin have no interest in an economic strategy that is about economic success.

Even the Government of the Republic of Ireland have said that they would not have Sinn Féin about the place because of its economic agenda. It is important to bear that in mind.

Many people have poked fun at the person who tabled the motion. I will not do that because it is unfair to him, and I think that Members have found some agreement on the motion. However, freezing the industrial rate liability at 25% is second best for Northern Ireland. It is not our first choice; we would like industrial derating to continue. Today, our message to the Government is that the capping of the industrial rate at 25% is second best. Derating was an entitlement that ought never to have been interfered with by the Government, and signals that they could interfere with this issue ought never to have been sent by the last Executive to the Government. Its removal means that, due to European regulations, we can never return to the cherished position of having industrial derating.

Now that it has been picked over, let us get it capped at this low rate as early as possible — as has already been said. If industrial rating is allowed to increase, it will affect business, employment and opportunity. People have discussed and haggled over how many thousands of jobs will be lost. Some people have said that it could be over 30,000; others have said that it will be more than that; and others have said that it will be less. Let us be clear: if industrial derating continues in the way that the Government plan, it will affect thousands of jobs. Whether that is a few thousand or tens of thousands, we cannot afford the problems that that will bring on our manufacturing sector. It is important to put that on the record and to recognise that the loss of thousands of jobs is thoroughly and totally unacceptable, and that is why the DUP supports the motion.

The introduction of full industrial rates will not only see the loss of thousands of jobs, but it will hinder research and development opportunities. Research and development is the engine room of manufacturing because it allows for that critical progression, growth and development. If growth and development are stymied, productivity and employment are undermined, and we will see the end to many parts of what has been — against the odds — a successful manufacturing sector.

Many Members have spoken to manufacturing sector employers in their own constituencies. With my colleagues, I have met representatives from Wrightbus Ltd, the Gallaher Group, Michelin, O'Kane Poultry Ltd and several others. Those four manufacturers account for almost 6,000 directly employed people across north Antrim and beyond. Those employers have systematically said that the removal of industrial derating would hamper their opportunities and growth potential and see our constituents put out of jobs. That is not acceptable. It must be placed on record that we oppose that, and that is why I reiterate that the DUP supports the motion.

It is unacceptable to tell employers that they must pay somewhere between 2% and 15% of their profit — if they have it — on this industrial rate before they turn the key in their door. The sooner the Government get that clear and certain message, the better.

I have seen other companies in my constituency such as Tyco Electronics being undermined. The company has faced hard challenges from abroad, and on top of that, it is faced with a huge rates bill that it could have done without — indeed, it might have just kept hope alive for certain jobs.

What we need, and what my colleague from East Antrim has quite rightly put forward — as have other colleagues in the Chamber — is an industrial package. The package should not only address the rating issue, but address essential industry-related matters such as duty on transport, fuel and energy costs and pension rights in the workplace. That package of measures must be identified early and put before the Government, and we must insist that they introduce an acceptable policy.

We must send out a message that a complete package will make business flow, not seize up. We do not want to see business seize up in Northern Ireland; we want to see it flow, expand and grow. We have heard in earlier debates in this Assembly that we need to create over 100,000 jobs in the next 10 to 12 years. We shall never do that if measures such as industrial derating are removed in their entirety. We shall never create the opportunities that people wish for if we remove the benefits that our industry has been able to build on, despite its being put at a disadvantage by others.

I, like others, endorse the motion and hope that the Secretary of State is sent a clear and certain message tonight that this House supports industrial derating; calls on him to cap the industrial rate at 25%; and reiterates that he should never have allowed his Government to have removed industrial derating in the first instance.

Madam Speaker: Before I call the final Member to speak before the winding-up speech, I remind Members of the convention to be observed during Members' maiden speeches.

Mr Newton: May I remind you, Madam Speaker, that this is not my maiden speech? I spoke in the debate on the economy.

Madam Speaker: I am sorry.

Mr Newton: That is fine; do not worry. I do not regard it as an insult. I do not consider it offensive in any way the fact that you cut short my contribution to that debate.

Madam Speaker: That is why I want you to say all that you can.

Mr Newton: Thank you, Madam Speaker. The clock has not started running yet, has it?

Madam Speaker: No.

Mr Newton: Like many other Members who have spoken, I pay tribute to the Northern Ireland Manufacturing Focus Group's campaign, which has been very professional and worthwhile. It has highlighted some very important issues.

I know, through contact with some of the companies that are represented on NIMFG and with other companies that are not members — perhaps they fall into the category of smaller businesses — that there is major concern about industrial rating. I also know that the manufacturers are not people who would be easily got out on to the street to protest. They would not normally be willing to drive their lorries to the Waterfront Hall in Belfast to make their protest in such a public way. They are generally conservative in their attitude and pursue their business activities responsibly. They are positive individuals. To go into and to remain in the manufacturing industry today, one must be extremely positive.

We must appreciate that manufacturers are this economy's wealth creators. They are the people who earn the exporting pounds, dollars and euro that bring jobs to Northern Ireland and that keep those jobs here. They have survived more than 35 years of turmoil and terrorist activity. I am sure that many of them can recount stories about the impact that those terrorist days had, and the impact that continuing terrorist-related criminal activity has on their business. It would be wrong to say that the Government do not care about the impact that additional costs have on manufacturing. They certainly care to an extent, but whether they follow that up with a strategy is open to question. It is only a short time since the Government listened to what manufacturers were saying about energy costs. They listened to the extent that, in meeting with the employers and listening to what they had to say about the disadvantage of manufacturing in Northern Ireland due to higher energy costs, they were prepared to consider giving a £30 million package to try to alleviate, in some way, the energy costs that are placing manufacturers in an uncompetitive position compared with other parts of the United Kingdom.

5.15 pm

The Government took the manufacturers up the road and agreed that a subvention of £30 million would be made available and then told them that they were sorry but they could not do so because the EU would not allow it.

That £30 million was for the manufacturers, yet it is not being used in any positive way, because of the EU and because — as I understand from questions that my colleagues and I asked — DETI cannot find a way to put it into the system. It is recognised that there is a problem, but it cannot be addressed.

I am favoured to be a member of Belfast City Council, which is not a body with an irresponsible attitude. The response of the council's development department, which is quite sophisticated, to the Draft Rates (Amendment) Order 2003 was that it considered that the consultation process regarding industrial derating was overshadowed, as it was carried out as part of a wider consultation on the future rating policy in the region. The department was concerned that relevant parties, particularly businesses and trade unions, who might have wished to contribute to the consultation process had no opportunity to do so.

There were serious concerns about the impact that this would have on the businesses of Northern Ireland.

Last year, confidence in the local manufacturing sector was so low that an official Government report urged a programme of action to include the promotion of the message that manufacturing has a future. We are in danger of talking ourselves into the idea that there is no future for manufacturing. 'The Future Role of Manufacturing in Northern Ireland' was the title of the report, which was commissioned by the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment from that well-known consultancy house PricewaterhouseCoopers. It was produced last summer because of the haemorrhaging of manufacturing jobs and the movement of companies to low-cost countries.

The report is impressive, and it now needs to be actioned. Manufacturing needs to see that something will be done as a result of that report. My concerns have been raised since reading it, and Members from probably every constituency in Northern Ireland referred to recent closures of manufacturing companies throughout Ulster. I suppose that a politician does not really understand the impact that this issue can have, and I thank the manufacturing group for raising it and for graphically presenting what might happen.

Whether you accept that there will be the 30,000 job losses that one Member mentioned or whether there will be more or less than that — the figure does not really matter — industrial rating will cost jobs in Northern Ireland.

There is a need for some positive movement on the various issues identified in the report. Employers should, and will, receive the support of this House in their campaign. Northern Ireland had a favourable rates position, but it was small when weighed against the advantages in other parts of the United Kingdom. It was a small inducement to make Northern Ireland an attractive manufacturing place for inward investment.

However, we must not shoot ourselves in the foot by detracting in any way from the impact of industrial rating.

In a Department of Finance and Personnel policy document entitled 'Review of Rating Policy – The Rating of Vacant Property and the Removal of Industrial Derating', a strategy option states that, through the rationalisation of property assets, manufacturers can collectively reduce rates that have been levied on them by up to 15%. However, every business implements a strategy of looking at its costs; every organic business has the right to evolve its strategy and adapt it to prosper in those conditions. Those businesses will do that, and will do it naturally.

I reaffirm my earlier agreement with the report on the future role of manufacturing, which found that innovation is the key to success. Along with my colleagues, I have asked the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment to place more emphasis on research and development activities. At a recent meeting with senior executives of Invest Northern Ireland, I urged the promotion of a better uptake of research and development grants to help local companies.

My party has taken the lead on this issue and has called for an immediate reduction in corporation tax to at least 12.5% or, better still, 10%, in the hope that that will spark a new business culture infused, as we have said over and over, with the spirit of innovation. Fortunately, Tony Blair has announced a study on the potential for tax breaks to boost the Province's economy. We are at the very edge of the European Union, and are, therefore, the most remote part of it, and we need every advantage.

Madam Speaker: Can you draw your remarks to a close?

Mr Newton: I am just coming to a conclusion.

The point has been made that the Secretary of State needs to listen to this debate and to take heed of the points and the good sense of the debaters in the Chamber and of Northern Ireland manufacturers. Manufacturers need our support and encouragement.

Madam Speaker: I am sorry, Mr Newton, but your time is up.

Mr Newton: You are making a habit of this, Madam Speaker. [Laughter.]

Madam Speaker: No, I am not. Every Member has had 10 minutes to speak, and you are the first Member whom I have had to ask to curtail his remarks today.

Mr Newton: It is nice to see unity of purpose in the Chamber.

Madam Speaker: We are now at the end of a long day.

Mr Dallat: This has been a good debate. I was hoping that, with all the plaudits coming across the Floor from DUP Members, the Secretary of State would have no choice but to make an immediate decision to freeze the rates. Unfortunately, Ian junior appeared on the scene and knocked a few dents in this new-found harmony. I am sorry that he did not talk to me earlier; I could have assured him that the Northern Ireland Manufacturing Focus Group agreed with the motion. However, even if he disagreed with the motion, he had an opportunity, until 9.30 am this morning, to table an amendment.

Madam Speaker: Stop the clock. Mr Dallat, I must take a point of order.

Mr Paisley Jnr: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I do not know whether there is anything in the Official Report that will show that I said anything against the motion. I have spoken in support of it.

Madam Speaker: That is not a point of order.

Mr Dallat: He said that there should be no industrial rating at all. Nevertheless, we have had a degree of agreement, and the fact that it happened on the sixth of the sixth '06 is good. Perhaps all the other disagreements in the Assembly will now vanish and, in future, the Chamber will not have empty Benches, but will be packed to the gills with enthusiastic Assembly Members working on behalf of the people who elected them.

Member after Member emphasised the need to act now before budgets are set for the next financial year, a point made very clearly by Sir Reg Empey and Dr Birnie. The motion needed to be debated now — not at some time in the future. The fact that the Public Gallery has been packed with industrialists is a clear sign that the concerns are real. They are not men and women who should be at home looking after their businesses, as Lord Rooker said; they are people who are fighting for the survival, not only of their companies, but of the jobs of the people whom they employ.

I congratulate them on their just and dignified campaign. Indeed, I take hope from the fact that elected representatives and the business community have taken a partnership approach.

My colleague Margaret Ritchie made the valid point that there has been a period of rising unemployment and that during such times, the most vulnerable suffer greatest. Nelson McCausland, speaking from an urban perspective, made the same point.

Here is a simple piece of advice for the Secretary of State: he must listen to the voices of this Assembly and businesses and lay the foundations for a positive future for all our people. He must remember, as Members have pointed out, that this economy is still recovering from the past. For that reason alone, we should not create havoc in industries that have provided jobs in the worst of times and that should be allowed to continue to do so in normal times. We need to convince the Secretary of State that jobs are one of the keys to unlocking a new future that does not look to the past but that has its eyes fixed on a confident future. Perhaps it was a little unwise to draw parallels with Dr Shipman, and I regret that that comment was made.

My colleague Tommy Gallagher rightly mentioned that new employment in the west brings short-term benefits, but those are cancelled out by other job losses in the same constituency. He also reminded us that Members have a duty to resolve their differences. We may not like that, but it is a fact.

His constituency colleague Tom Elliott reiterated the problems of the west and emphasised the need to freeze the industrial rating. Arlene Foster endorsed all those points and expressed disappointment that the Sinn Féin Members for that constituency were absent. Let us hope that the chairman crisis is resolved so that it will be happy families in Fermanagh and South Tyrone.

Roy Beggs reminded us of the loss of income tax, National Insurance and the rising unemployment benefits' bill. Of course, none of that measures the loss of confidence, the shattering of morale and the sense of hopelessness — about which I spoke earlier — that my father experienced all those years ago.

Pat Ramsey spoke passionately about the sense of devastation in the Derry area when factories closed, resulting in hundreds of job losses. The Secretary of State must surely listen. My colleague P J Bradley underlined what others have been saying all day in this Assembly: he must act decisively now.

Towards the end of the debate we had flashbacks to the past, which I am used to, but we cannot live in the past. We must move to the future, together as one voice, representing those who keep the wheels of industry turning. Some argue that the good wine is always kept to the end; and here Dr Seán Farren called for an end to the blame game. He called for support systems to be put in place so that industry can have a bright future. He welcomed overseas investment, but that is much too slow. He called for an end to industry having to carry burdens that it cannot bear. I have no doubt that industrial rating is at the top of the list.

I was a bit sorry that Mervyn Storey did not give way to Dr Farren; we could have had an entirely accurate record of what happened in the past.

Mr Storey: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: If it is a point of order.

Mr Storey: It is. The accusation has been made that I was in some way inaccurate. I have the SDLP's official response to the review of the rating policy, and for accuracy, I will continue to read from it. It states: "We therefore support this proposal".

I may have not had a third-level education, but I can read and understand what that paper says.

Madam Speaker: That is not a point of order.

Mr Dallat: Madam Speaker, I also have a response from Dr Farren, which is somewhat different. At this stage of the day —

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr Dallat: At this stage of the day, we will not fight. We have had a good debate, and I congratulate the DUP for being so well behaved all day. It would be an awful pity if they had problems now.

5.30 pm

The main issue is to send the message back to the Secretary of State that the motion has been agreed unanimously and that he must act on it now, not at some time in the future. This affects the jobs of people who perhaps feel a lot less secure than we do — although, God knows, if politicians should feel secure in their jobs; I am not sure.

In conclusion, I congratulate all the Members who spoke today on their excellent contributions.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly, pending the restoration of a fully devolved Assembly and power-sharing Executive:

- (a) calls on the Secretary of State to freeze the Industrial Rate at 25%;
- (b) agrees with the Northern Ireland Manufacturing Focus Group that the introduction of full Industrial Rates as currently planned by the Government will lead to devastation in the manufacturing sector and the loss of thousands of jobs; and
- (c) therefore calls on the Secretary of State to deliver on his undertaking to act upon the agreed position of all the political parties, and cap the Industrial Rate at 25%.

Adjourned at 5.31 pm.

THE ASSEMBLY

Friday 7 July 2006

The Assembly met at 10.30 am (Madam Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

ASSEMBLY BUSINESS

Madam Speaker: In accordance with the Northern Ireland Act 2006, the Secretary of State has directed that the Assembly should sit on Friday 7 July 2006 at 10.30 am to consider business as it appears on the Order Paper. The Secretary of State has also directed that the Assembly should rise for the summer recess at the close of business today and should return on Monday 4 September.

SECRETARY OF STATE MOTION

Spending Review and Priorities

Madam Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed that a maximum of four hours be set aside for the debate. The Committee also agreed that the first round of speeches should be limited to 15 minutes, with subsequent Members being allowed 10 minutes. I intend to send a copy of the Official Report of the debate to the Secretary of State.

I remind Members that a two-minute silence will be observed across the United Kingdom at 12.00 noon today to mark the first anniversary of the London bombings. It was agreed at this week's Business Committee meeting that I should, therefore, interrupt proceedings at an appropriate moment to announce the period of silence and to allow Members and staff in Parliament Buildings to observe it. If a Member is speaking at the time, he or she will be allowed to continue after the silence with no reduction in speaking time.

If that is clear, I shall proceed.

Mr P Robinson: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. At the first meeting of the Assembly I raised a point of order about the standing of what has become known as the Ulster Unionist Party Assembly Group, which purported, at one stage at least, to be a political party. When might the Assembly expect a ruling on that issue?

Madam Speaker: As Members will be aware, the Clerk to the Assembly has been gathering information on this subject. This has now been provided to counsel and I shall rule on the matter once I have received counsel's further advice. I, like you, regret the delay, but I want it to be an absolutely clear decision. Members will appreciate that the issue must be examined thoroughly.

Motion made:

That this Assembly notes the results of the Spending Review 2004 and the current Comprehensive Spending Review 2007 and their implications for the spending priorities for a Programme for Government to be agreed by a Northern Ireland Executive following its restoration on or before 24 November 2006. — [The Secretary of State.]

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: Madam Speaker, we are surrounded in the Assembly by mystery. We do not know what is going to happen. We are here because the Secretary of State, in his benevolence, has permitted the Assembly to meet today to discuss the comprehensive spending review.

As a Member of the Assembly representing the people of Northern Ireland, I feel that the way the business of the Assembly is conducted from the office of the Secretary of State is absolutely outrageous. All the parties in the Assembly should have had the right to be consulted about what would be debated today. No individual party should be able to dictate the business of the Assembly. We have had dictations right, left and centre — especially from the party that is conspicuous by its absence from this House today.

The time has come when this House needs to consider its own sovereignty in regard to the matters in the Act that set it up. This Assembly has responsibilities and a certain sovereignty. Listen to the Secretary of State and look at the papers we eventually receive from him about the conduct of business in this House — it is absolutely ridiculous. The rules can change within hours rather than days. This Assembly must signal to the Secretary of State that if this is the way that he wants to conduct his business, he can conduct it on his own.

There is no use in pretending that this Assembly has at least some democracy when it has very little, and indeed would have none at all if the Secretary of State had his way. I protest and put on record that Members and parties in this House should be consulted in some way about the business to come before it, especially when that business is not in keeping with the rules of the House in regard to the Business Committee or any other Committee that wants to bring forward business.

The time has come for us to tell the Secretary of State that he cannot simply call a meeting of the Assembly, and, a day or two before it, say, “Here is a bit of paper; get on with it” and then tell us that on a certain day we will be out anyway. That must be brought to an end. The tragedy is that this Assembly meets and seeks to conduct its business while one party that is much involved with the setting of that business refuses to come to the Chamber. Yet the Secretary of State insists that other parties attend the meetings of a Committee that has the authority to bring matters before the Assembly.

Madam Speaker, I do not want to weary the House or to get on your wrong side. I do not worry when you make your own decisions, but I worry when the Clerk whispers in your ear. I was told by an old Member of the first Stormont Parliament that when one sees the Clerk whispering in the Speaker’s ear one should beware. I see that the Clerk is now getting impatient and speaking in your ear.

Madam Speaker: I have listened intently to the Member, but I would now like to hear him address the motion.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: In another place we would call this a “Dan to Beersheba” motion: one can walk over the whole land — whether it be holy land or not. The motion is wide enough for that because it includes everything.

The most important issue at the present time is the security of the citizens of this land. Not only are we living in the shadow of terrorism as terrorists carry out many atrocious crimes, but individuals in the Province are being attacked, especially womenfolk. That is absolutely deplorable, and any right-thinking citizen should be alarmed by the lack of security for the individual. Every day, other matters arise that cause us to wonder whether there is any real security for the people of this Province.

Tied in with that is the agitation surrounding the marching season. Some of us think that the great persuaders in this matter are those who are out to make trouble at various marches. They seem to have so much strength that if they threaten enough, their threats are listened to.

A serious matter has arisen in the village of Dunloy in my constituency. I resent the fact that, at this time, certain Protestants cannot lay a wreath in their graveyard without being told where they should stand so that they will be concealed behind a wall. When a country cannot honour its dead in reverence, it is on the road to anarchy. I feel strongly about that, and about the fact that at that particular incident, which could have become serious, when there was opposition —

10.45 am

Mr McCarthy: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. What has this got to do with the motion on budgetary constraints?

Madam Speaker: I imagine that Dr Paisley will come to the financial implications in due course.

[Laughter.]

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: The hon Member must have forgotten that policing the Province is expensive. Vast amounts of money are laid out on that. Mr McCarthy should recognise that that must interest those who want to represent their constituencies.

Last year, as this particular parade was taking place, there was lawlessness and illegal parking of vehicles to deny the Protestant people peace to remember their gallant dead. Not one person was taken to court or made to pay the price for that lawlessness — not one. Those who have been negotiating with the police and the authorities have told me that the ante is up. Those who got away with illegal acts and lawlessness last year think that they can go one better this year, and the threat is now greater.

Those matters may not interest the Member from the Alliance Party, but they interest me and all right-thinking citizens in the community. There is great expenditure on security. If there were lawfulness in the country, less money would need to be spent.

I do not know whether the civil servant who wrote this motion for the Secretary of State realised that Members could say anything here today and tie it in to the spending of Government money. Although the Clerk may whisper in your ear, Madam Speaker, that does not alter the fact that expenditure on policing must be faced.

We can go to France, stand at the Somme and see the liberty that is given to people of all creeds to pay honour to their gallant dead. Yet, in our own country, those who carry out acts of lawlessness resist that. They get away with it and nothing is done. That is a sad comment on our land today.

Mr Gallagher: Does the Member agree that the best way to address many of the serious issues that he has raised is for elected representatives to assume responsibility for them; in other words, to have devolved government?

Does Dr Paisley recognise that the DUP is one of the parties blocking progress towards devolution, without which there will be endless hot-air debates here? The DUP, as it did at yesterday's meeting of the South Eastern Education and Library Board (SEELB), will take part in hot-air debates in which it criticises everybody and everything, and yet will not accept any responsibility.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: The hon Member is himself engaging in hot-air debate. Does he not know that members of his own party were in that debate yesterday, and voted with the other elected representatives? Or does he think that children in need of special payments for their education should not be treated as they would in any civilised country? [Interruption.]

If the Member wants to make a speech, he should make it in the time given to him. There is no place for the people that the Member wants in a future Government of Northern Ireland. The gunman will not be there, and neither will the people who carry out criminal activities. Those who are associated with terrorism, from whatever side of the country, will not be there with my vote, or the vote of my party.

The Member may vote for them, and work with them, as he did in the past. We will not be working with those people. The way to peace is an utter rejection of terrorist violence and all that goes with it. I regret that the hon Member has expressed those views in this debate, because I thought that he, at least, had sympathy for those who do not want terrorism in Government.

This is an important debate, because it deals with people's lives, their well-being and the well-being of this country. I trust that today, in spite of all the peculiar circumstances surrounding this debate, and the strong eloquence of Benches not sat on, the people of Northern Ireland will know again exactly where the truth lies, and will back that truth with all their might as the party I lead intends to do in this House.

Dr Birnie: I am very pleased that we have been granted this debate. The decree, as it were, has come down from the royal court, and the peasants have been allowed to have a discussion about what crops to plant for the next couple of years.

Mr McNarry: The croppies are not here.

Mr Kennedy: Croppies lie down. [Laughter.]

Dr Birnie: Now, now.

To cut through the convoluted wording of this lengthy motion, it seems to be saying that Northern Ireland is facing something of a squeeze on the growth of public spending. That is undoubtedly the case. We had warning of this in the Budget last December, and no doubt the forthcoming comprehensive spending review will reinforce the point.

Dr Paisley said that this was a Dan-to-Beersheba motion, and I suppose that — to continue the biblical analogies — our situation is similar to the seven lean years following the seven fat years. Beginning in 1999, we have had five or more years of rapid growth in public expenditure; between 4% and 5% on average annually in real terms. For the foreseeable future, that rate of growth is going to drop to about 2%. If, as has happened previously, the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety continues to get a rapid increase, the implication is that many other Departments will face either zero growth or, indeed, reductions in their spending levels.

The crucial implication is that if one thought that the previous Executive of 1999-2002 faced hard spending decisions, any returning Executive this year or at any point in the immediate future will inevitably face a greater host of spending dilemmas.

That is the context. In a tough expenditure environment we have the logic of the comprehensive spending review. To use the jargon, the review is zero-based: no programme can be taken for granted, and everything must be justified against alternative uses of funds.

I wish to turn to some themes that relate to public spending. Aneurin Bevan, Welsh politician and founder of the National Health Service (NHS), said that socialism is the language of priorities. Indeed, given competing demands and scarce resources, all proper politics is about identifying priorities.

There is every indication that the public regards health as a key priority, perhaps even as the top priority. We must continue to respect that. From our experiences either as constituency representatives or from our own families, we know about the human tragedies that result from the avoidable suffering caused by prolonged waiting for operations, or, indeed, the unavailability of certain treatments in the NHS. Those drugs or treatments are often available to people who live elsewhere in the United Kingdom. That is the sharp end of so-called healthcare rationing. Yet we also know that since 1999 the cash available to the Department of Health has enjoyed very rapid growth; in some years there have been increases of 10%. Money has gone in at one end, but there have not always been obvious signs of output at the other.

Several years ago, the Wanless Report considered the future of the NHS across the UK. Wanless reported to the Chancellor that the NHS should continue to provide free treatment at the point of use and be funded out of general taxation. However, the report also issued a warning that sudden increases in public spending on health — above about 7% annually in real terms — were likely to be associated with bottlenecks. Hence, not all the money would be absorbed in a way that would raise standards of patient care. Our experience supports that sorry conclusion: spending grows, but waiting lists remain stubbornly high. Part of the problem is that, notwithstanding the increase in financial resources, the number of staff who deal with patient care — doctors, nurses and other healthcare professionals — has often grown little, if at all.

The recent Appleby Report casts further doubt on the efficiency and effectiveness of the many structures of healthcare provision that we have in what is, after all, a small Province of only 1·7 million people. Many will feel that the current Review of Public Administration (RPA) proposals are an opportunity that has been missed to streamline administration in the local NHS.

In education, there is obviously —

Mr Burnside: Will the Member give way?

Dr Birnie: Certainly.

Mr Burnside: Before the Member continues discussing education as the second priority, will he agree that an allocation of money to the victims of terrorism has been left out of the overall funding spend? That runs across different Departments. Does he agree with other Members and with me that priority should be given to the victims of violence? They are often forgotten and pushed from one Department to another.

Dr Birnie: I thank my colleague for that point. I agree that there is a need for a cross-cutting approach to victims, who are so often neglected.

There is a multimillion pound demand for investment in the school estate. I note that the Government seem to have backed off from the public-private partnership (PPP) route. That is surely not an accident. Public-private partnerships are similar to a 20-year or 25-year mortgage, and it may be that the early PPPs, with respect to school redevelopment, did not represent a particularly good deal for the taxpayer. Many, and not just in my South Belfast constituency, would like to get to the bottom of the why, how and who of the PPP decision on Balmoral High School, which was a particularly extreme case of an unsuccessful PPP.

About five years ago, the Department of Education entered into a 25-year arrangement to rebuild that school, which was to have a 500-pupil capacity. The school now has only 200 pupils and is about to close.

11.00 am

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Wells] in the Chair)

Any consideration of allocations of public spending should not only be about how to divide the cake, but about how we can spend wisely in order to expand that cake in future. Wealth creation must be a priority. In our comments on the current Budget, my party pointed out its concern at the way in which the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment (DETI) budget was being cut. An earlier so-called concordat arrangement to adjust DETI and Invest Northern Ireland spending in line with levels of inward investment seems to have resulted in year-on-year reductions. Indeed, some decisions that have been taken on tourist promotion, or, in practice, the lack of it, similarly show a “penny wise, pound foolish” mentality.

Levels of R&D spending in Northern Ireland continue to place us at the bottom of the league. Therefore, we support anything intelligent that can be done with spending or through tax incentives to boost science and technology in the region. We remain concerned by the lengthy slippage in the writing and publication of the regional economic strategy. It will shortly be a year behind schedule. We are also still waiting, after several years, for the electricity cost reduction package that the then Minister Ian Pearson announced some years ago.

When MLAs speak about public spending, the criticism is often levelled that we are swift to present the begging bowl but slow to suggest ways in which to save money. I have some suggestions as to how the output of public money could be trimmed.

Mr Kennedy: Does the Member agree that, on the anniversary of the London bombings, and given that the Prime Minister has refused a public inquiry into that outrage on grounds of cost, it is a matter of grave concern to learn of the escalating costs of the Bloody Sunday inquiry, which a member of the Cabinet now estimates at approaching £400 million? Does he agree that that clearly represents a considerable drain on the resources potentially available to both the Exchequer and the Northern Ireland block grant?

Dr Birnie: I thank my colleague for that point. It is an interesting comparison.

Mr Durkan: I can inform the hon Member that the figure of £400 million that Tessa Jowell quoted was a complete aberration. She does not know where she got that figure from, nor does anyone else in the Government. The figure is £163 million.

Dr Birnie: I submit, Mr Deputy Speaker, that, even if it is £150 million or £160 million, or £250 million as other sources have quoted, that seems a very large outlay of money for an inquiry that has satisfied very few people.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Dr Birnie: I want to ask some questions about the so-called national stadium. Is its business case robust? The Department of Finance and Personnel and the Strategic Investment Board (SIB) have so far refused to publish the business case and the economic appraisal. Will the necessary infrastructure be provided to make the stadium accessible, wherever it happens to be built? What will be done to avoid any ongoing subsidisation charges on the public purse? Surely one way ahead would be to maximise the private sector's role in the project. That would reduce the drain on public resources and ensure that the stadium would be there to boost tourism and maximise the benefits for Northern Ireland as we approach the 2012 Olympics.

The RPA is a missed opportunity.

Mr Donaldson: I agree entirely with the Member. It is essential that the development of the Maze site be a public-private partnership. Is he aware that the two improvements to the major roads infrastructure in the Lisburn area in the past five years have both been privately financed? Is he also aware that the proposed new Knockmore link into the Maze site will also be privately financed, saving the taxpayer millions of pounds?

Dr Birnie: I am aware that at the moment the so-called national stadium has a budget of more than £100 million. We should bear in mind the examples of stadia in London and Dublin, and indeed of Olympic stadia around the world. We could be looking at substantial cost overruns. We need to consider the detail of any PPP arrangements to ensure that such overruns are borne by the private rather than the public sector.

The RPA is a missed opportunity. The commission appointed by the Government targeted the 26 district councils, which was arguably a soft option, rather than deal with the vast expanses of quango-land and the billions of pounds that are spent there. Sir John Banham recently noted, based on his experience of reform of county and city councils in England in the 1990s, that the merging of councils there did not necessarily save much money.

The architecture of Government Departments chosen in the previous Assembly in 1999 might have been right at that stage, but it may not necessarily be so after 2007. If, for example, Northern Ireland follows the other United Kingdom nations in establishing an environmental protection agency — a subject that I know is of some interest to you, Mr Deputy Speaker — we will have to look again at the relationship between the Department of the Environment and the Department for Regional Development. I am sorry for making that little point.

Mr Kennedy: No, you are not.

Dr Birnie: No, I am not.

We have argued since October 2002 that the North/South bodies should remain on a care-and-maintenance basis. We are concerned that the current Budget envisages a large growth in the capital spend of Waterways Ireland, for example. The North/South bodies should not be shielded from the general financial stringency facing all the other Departments.

This debate will largely focus on spending, but it is appropriate to mention the associated revenue-raising side. We repeat that Northern Ireland's tax revenue would be boosted in the long term if the Government showed much more imagination in relation to corporation tax, the derating of industry, VAT on tourism and the fuel excise differential with the Republic. The wealth-creating sector can be given incentives to grow. This debate will probably force us all to face the uncomfortable reality that any return to devolution will not enjoy the best economic circumstances.

Mr Kennedy: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. In an earlier ruling, Madam Speaker indicated that a Member giving way to interventions would have time added to his or her speaking time. Is that convention to apply today?

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member is correct, but of course it applies only to those who have 10 minutes to speak. The Members making the first round of speeches have 15 minutes, and they are restricted to that.

Mr Durkan: We all need to recognise the phoniness of the exercise that we are engaged in this morning. We are supposed to be pleased to have been granted a debate. The Secretary of State is weaving between two vetoes on whether to grant debates and the terms on which such debates are to take place. He feels compelled to humour the DUP by making sure that there is a debate before the recess, but at the same time he has to convenience Sinn Féin by making sure that the topic of the debate is one from which it can be comfortably absent.

Mr Burnside: Surely the Member has forgotten the third veto. Does he not agree that his party exercises a veto by refusing to create a cross-community coalition to get Stormont up and running?

Mr Durkan: The SDLP is not the party standing in the way of the successful working of the Preparation for Government Committee. We are committed to taking forward the work of that Committee; we have indicated how we would take things forward. All sorts of people are canvassing all sorts of plan Bs for what may or may not happen after 24 November. We pointed out, more than two years ago, a way of restoring this Assembly that would have made sure that both it and the North/South Ministerial Council could be fully functional, even if the parties in this Assembly would not form the Executive.

Other parties have not responded to our proposals and ideas. The SDLP is not standing in the way of the restoration of institutions.

I mentioned the phoniness of this debate — although I do not intend to be drawn into the difficulties and shenanigans of the Preparation for Government Committee. The Secretary of State's motion asks us to address the comprehensive spending review 2007 and asks questions about the spending priorities for a Programme for Government.

The main significance for Northern Ireland of the comprehensive spending review 2007 will be its determination of the overall increase in public expenditure for the UK and, in particular, how that expenditure will be allocated across Departments in Great Britain. The main implication for Northern Ireland is in the Barnett consequential that it produces rather than the implications for the budget lines of individual Departments. Our main interest is the increase in Northern Ireland public expenditure as a result of the Barnett formula. Northern Ireland Departments are not direct participants in the comprehensive spending review in the way that Whitehall Departments are. That is an added phoniness to this debate.

We should work through the Preparation for Government Committee to see how far we can agree in advance the broad policy colours of a Programme for Government. There may be merit in agreeing some of those priorities before restoration so that parties will have discussed strategic priorities and recognised the social and economic implications for the shape and structure of public services. Having agreed those issues before Ministers are appointed and captured and become fascinated cheerleaders for their Departments, we will have broadly agreed some priorities.

In drawing up a Programme for Government we must learn lessons from the shortcomings of earlier Budgets with their problem of short-termism. Because we were only able to produce budgets year on year, we produced annual Programmes for Government. We must produce a multi-annual Programme for Government with real strategic priorities. To do that we need a Programme for Government that is not negotiated just between civil servants in various Departments or between Ministers of various parties in an Executive as a glossy text that can be stuck beside the Budget.

Instead, with the social partners — trades unions, business, the community and the voluntary sector — we must negotiate a multi-annual programme that deals with the necessary long-term public service commitments and which sets out the real patterns of public expenditure that must be pursued if we are to deliver better public services and economic growth and allow the private sector and a strong public sector to grow alongside each other.

That is the lesson of the economic performance change in the South, where social partnership has been at the heart of strategic progress. Social partnership must be based on multi-annual programmes that create clear frameworks so that everyone knows where they stand and where their priorities lie. That way, we will not be ambushed with all sorts of implementation difficulties caused by one sectoral pressure after another.

Parties could do a great deal now, although, unfortunately, they have not got their act together in the Preparation for Government Committee. Too often, business is left to the Secretary of State to determine. I heard Dr Paisley —

11.15 am

Mr Kennedy: Given that the Member thinks that we are engaged in a sham fight, I can confirm that King William's army appears to be in place; King James's army appears to be seriously depleted, particularly those Members with any military experience. [Laughter.] Does the Member not welcome the participation of the political parties in the Preparation for Government Committee and see that as a limited form of progress?

Mr Durkan: I do not know of anybody on these Benches who has ever had a particularly good word to say about King James. [Laughter.] Mr Kennedy might still be fighting that fight, but some of us do not regard ourselves as ever having been part of that fight, and we do not identify with it.

Dr Paisley complained earlier that things are being determined by the Secretary of State. Well, that is the way that the parties are playing it. They are leaving it to the Secretary of State to take decisions. Some people are happy to hop between vacuum and veto, and then complain when the Secretary of State takes a decision. The next minute, those same people try to bend the Secretary of State's ear about the next decision they want him to take. Let us get real about our responsibilities. The Preparation for Government Committee should be doing more work and better work. We want to see that work continue over the summer.

We must create a sense of confidence among the parties and the broader public that restoration is a real prospect. However, the signal that is being sent out is that the 24 November deadline is not real and that restoration is not a real prospect. If we can create a sense of confidence among ourselves, we can then create a sense of confidence with the public. As we scope the main policy pillars of the Programme for Government, we could engage purposefully with the trade unions, the business sector and the community and voluntary sector and reach consensus about the possibilities for progress.

We need to examine a number of issues in relation to the Programme for Government and the comprehensive spending review. In the past, all parties in this Assembly have recognised that there has been a capital expenditure deficit with a cumulative effect on our poor infrastructure and poor public services. In the devolved Assembly, we placed a greater priority on a stronger capital expenditure performance. That is an absolute imperative. We must increase the scale of our capital expenditure and improve our performance.

The Strategic Investment Board has a role to play in delivering that. Direct rule Ministers have not mandated and structured the board in the best way. We had other plans, including ensuring that the board would be a social partnership body, not simply made up of people who supposedly had expertise in private finance. It would have included people from all the social partners who had real knowledge and understanding of public-sector needs, and of the needs of people who rely on public services. It would have taken on board the insights of people who are skilled in delivery, as well as the ideas of people who can come up with good financing solutions, to ensure that we had a strong investment portfolio across our infrastructure and public services. More must be done about the strength of our capital expenditure.

We need to map out in greater detail the equality impact of our public expenditure and public-sector activity. It is interesting that Government are responding so alertly to the case for special funding measures for loyalist areas.

Some of those measures are worthwhile and are welcome. However, the Government, and direct rule Ministers in particular, have failed to respond to the fact that counties in the west and south of this region show up on maps produced by the Equality Commission as having the worst figures for long-term unemployment and as losing out with regard to employment, the distribution of new jobs over the past five years, and the location of Government jobs and public-sector activity.

If the Secretary of State is serious about the scale of our dependence, in gross domestic product terms, on public-sector activity and public expenditure, and having accepted that those maps are pretty stark pictures of inequality, then he must recognise that Government decisions have a lot to do with that. That is why Government reform programmes currently under way, including Workplace 2010, need to be tested for the creation of opportunities for decentralisation and for a greater equality yield and a greater equality outcome across the region.

Mr Hussey: Does the Member agree that in the areas he refers to in the west, the issues apply equally to the Protestant community as they do to nationalists?

Mr Durkan: I referred to counties as a whole in the west and the south; I did not make any other distinctions. The maps in the Equality Commission's booklet are very stark and clear. Decentralisation is in everybody's interest, and that was reflected in this House during the period of devolution. All parties were concerned to see decentralisation. Workplace 2010, however, is going ahead with very little regard for decentralisation opportunities — opportunities for the relocation and redistribution of Government-derived employment.

Other spending issues that we need to address in the context of the Programme for Government are the implications of the continued drop-off in EU funding. There will be Peace III funding, but it will not be as much as in the past, and other EU funding will be dropping off. That is why funds such as the Executive programme funds, which were abolished under direct rule in the comprehensive spending review of 2004, must be restored.

The Executive programme funds were to be our home-grown version of European funds. We also need to ensure that Departments do not just assume that the money is theirs to do with as they wish, and to scrutinise again the need for each Department to have its own separate establishment or separate support. There should be far more shared services and shared support across Departments. That will reduce the costs of individual Departments and do more to reduce the cost of Government than a reduction in the number of Departments.

We remind other parties that at the time of the review of the agreement in 2004, and at Leeds Castle, we proposed a number of changes to the workings of this Assembly. We proposed new Committees in the style of the Public Accounts Committee, with one focusing on the cost of government, that could interrogate any Department on its administrative costs and on its budgeting. Similarly, we proposed that there should be a Committee to deal with the effectiveness and performance of different policies.

All of those Committees would have been supported by the Northern Ireland Audit Office, but this Assembly would have provided a strong role in respect of accountability and scrutiny, a role that the Department of Finance and Personnel cannot provide. People think that that Department polices the spending of other Departments — it does not.

Mr Ford: As other Members have said, today's debate is clearly a complete farce. However seriously matters are taken in this Chamber, we know that this debate was set up for one reason only and that the person who instructed that it should happen will take no notice of what we say.

Had the Secretary of State been serious, he would have taken notice of the Business Committee. Four times the Business Committee has asked for a debate on the Review of Public Administration. I understand that four out of five parties agreed that, yet the Secretary of State did not give us a debate on the RPA, which is clearly the wish of the majority of the Members of this House. Nor did he ask us to debate the work, so far, of the Committee on the Preparation for Government.

Instead, he set up this debate, as has been mentioned already, to try to get round the Sinn Féin version of the veto by giving it a motion that was not what unionists wanted and to try to get round the DUP veto on the setting-up of subcommittees. That does not suggest that it is a good recipe for engagement on serious issues.

Work was done in the Committee on Preparation for Government that would have merited teasing out further in the Chamber. Seán Farren and Alan McFarland — who currently hold the joint gold medal, possibly the world championship, for hours attended at that Committee — could have contributed significantly. However, without all parties present in the Chamber, it is not likely that we will get much from that. The very absence of Sinn Féin in its entirety from the debate calls into question whether it is truly interested in working for the restoration of Government.

Let us look, on the other hand, at an issue on which we indeed had all-party agreement, and not just four-party agreement, but five-party agreement: industrial derating. There was clear consensus in the business community that, in light of the competition presented by the Republic and our inability to vary corporation tax, industrial derating needed to continue. When that opinion was put to the Secretary of State, he took absolutely no notice. It is clear that what we say inside or outside the Chamber, even when there is five-party agreement, is having no effect on the policies of the Secretary of State.

That may explain the low attendance today: it is not only one party that is absent. Many Members have constituency business on a Friday, and others will have thought the holiday period had begun. For the Secretary of State to propose a serious debate on a critical issue on the last available day does not suggest that he is taking the Assembly seriously.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Ford: If he continues with that level of “ad-hocery”, the quality of debate will be affected, because no one can prepare properly without notice. The level of engagement on the bread-and-butter issues, which the Secretary of State says are important, will be so low as to be non-existent. The value of plenary meetings is being devalued, not by those of us who are here engaging, but by the Secretary of State in the way that he is setting things up.

Not only does he not want to hear our opinions on economic and social matters, but he is playing party power games. That is what the debate is about today. It is a massive missed opportunity. The comprehensive spending review merits discussion in a much more meaningful way than this opportunity affords. It should not have been in a cobbled-together debate, at short notice, and purely for image — not the image of the Assembly but of the Secretary of State, showing his machismo and power in telling us to get on with work.

There is much that needs to be said about investment in hospitals, community health and social services, and schools and colleges; about environmental protection and building sustainability in supporting industry and agriculture; about improving the infrastructure and social capital of people in Northern Ireland; and about reducing crime. However, I will confine my remarks to one area that is sadly lacking from the comprehensive spending reviews of both 2004 and 2007, and which was almost ignored in all recent Programmes for Government. It is nevertheless supposed to be a key policy of this Government: building a shared future.

Much of our discussion about the spending review is inevitably on where the money should be spent. A shared future, alongside proper investment in community relations, would release significant sums of money that are currently wasted on segregation. A couple of years ago, the Alliance Party commissioned some low-level research, as a result of which we estimated that £1 billion per annum — roughly 10% of the Northern Ireland budget — is wasted on the cost of segregation. Last September, I heard Mitchell Reiss, speaking on behalf of President Bush, give the same figure. I presume that the US Government have had some additional research done — I cannot imagine that they depend entirely upon our view. The Northern Ireland Office is also commissioning detailed research on the question.

If we are wasting that amount of money, the way in which we recover it and put it to good use is a huge issue for the public purse. We cannot continue to run services in that way, and we cannot continue to fund such segregation with all its human and financial costs. The £1 billion does not include the loss of inward investment, nor does it include the tourism that is lost due to ongoing instability.

11.30 am

I have heard Orange Order spokesmen give estimates about how much revenue is generated by tourists coming to Northern Ireland to see the 12 July celebrations. However, I would love to know how much money is lost every year during July and August due to those celebrations, because when I go to the airport far more people are leaving than arriving —

Mr Burnside: The Member obviously does not understand that people in the Province have always gone on holiday during the traditional Twelfth fortnight. He should attend some orange parades; then he would realise how they can be turned into a great tourist attraction for this country. The Member should stop playing down the tourism industry, which has done extremely well in recent years.

Mr Ford: I was not playing down the tourism industry: it has done extremely well against the background of street violence that has driven people away. If we seriously addressed the costs of a shared future and considered what that £1 billion could do, we could completely negate the effects of the proposed “tap tax”. We could make huge differences to our overall public expenditure by redirecting money more efficiently, by providing more quality services and by preventing, in many cases, two sets of second-rate services rather than one set of decent services.

Recently, the Government gave priority to the costs of the criminal justice system — the costs of maintaining the rule of law — yet little priority has been given to recognising the fact that, in many cases, community relations budgets have been cut by district councils and bodies funded by the Community Relations Council when the costs of dealing with violence and maintaining the rule of law, whether in Whiterock or Ardoyne, have to be met.

In my constituency of South Antrim two schools beside each other are to close; one is controlled and the other is maintained. The North Eastern Education and Library Board is proposing a major capital investment for the controlled school. In the other controlled secondary school in the town —

Mrs I Robinson: Why is the Member in favour of integrated schools, which take a large amount of money from the controlled and maintained sectors?

Mr Ford: I am grateful to the Member for helping me to make my point.

In the case of the controlled secondary school, the North Eastern Education and Library Board is not proposing the necessary renovation of the other controlled secondary school but the renovation and expansion of it to cater for the additional pupils. At the same time, the board is faced with significant costs in transferring pupils from the maintained school, which faces closure, to a maintained school in Randalstown, which is five miles away. A local parents’ group is seeking to establish an integrated college with a building that could adequately cater for the needs of an integrated school. That would make more sense than expanding an existing school that would maintain segregation and put children on buses to take them away from their hometown.

There is a clear financial argument in support of integration, which would deal with some of the problems that the North Eastern Education and Library Board faces and which are being exacerbated by the proposal to close two schools. That situation is being replicated in towns and villages across Northern Ireland. A fully integrated school will not necessarily be the entire model, but, in many places, an integrated school or shared facilities will save significant capital sums. We have to accept the reality that we cannot maintain segregation —

Mr McGimpsey: With regard to the Member’s point about saving serious capital sums, Balmoral High School in South Belfast is a case in point. It was built at a cost of £15 million under PPP, and substantial amounts of land were given over for development.

That PPP project failed because Malone Integrated College was built closer to the catchment area. Pupils who go to that school get free bus travel, whereas children attending Balmoral High School do not. The result is that Malone Integrated College has taken away Balmoral High School’s pupils, and we now have a school that has failed and cost the taxpayer something in the region of £15 million. Those sums do not add up.

Mr Ford: I do not see how failing to recognise the demand for integrated education in south Belfast and proceeding with the extremely expensive PPP scheme for Balmoral High School was necessarily in the interests of either the children of south Belfast or those who pay the costs. That is not an argument against integrated education; it is an argument for those who make the decisions having a rational plan that considers all educational sectors — maintained, controlled and integrated. I have been pressing the last three Education Ministers to do that in Antrim, and it has clearly proven to be necessary in south Belfast. However, I thank the Member for adding to my case. [Laughter.]

It is a simple reality that many of the most popular schools in Northern Ireland are integrated. That is certainly the case in my constituency: one of the smaller controlled primary schools is now the second most popular in Antrim town because it is integrated.

Mr McNarry: Will the Member give way?

Mr Ford: Is this another intervention?

Mr McNarry: It is if the Member so wishes.

Does he agree that in talking about capital, one of the advantages of the integrated scheme about which he eulogised this morning is that it invariably brings a brand new school to an area? It brings not only an educational facility but a building that has the latest and most up-to-date equipment that a school could ask for. Therefore does the Member agree that that building is attractive to parents and teachers?

However, is he asking us to opt for integrated education on the basis that the schools that he mentioned would be part of a merger? They would be part of a merger that had not been given a new building — they would have to settle for second or third best. They would also have to settle for the old crumbling building that has no room for new equipment. Is that fair?

Mr Ford: Will the Member give way? I will not have time to respond.

Mr McNarry: Having been obliged to give way, I am asking whether it is fair that integrated schools —

Mr Ford: Given that my time is limited, how long can interventions go on?

Madam Speaker: Unfortunately, Mr Ford, if you have given way, that is up to you.

Mr McNarry: Thank you, Madam Speaker.

Is it fair that integrated schools use the capital to build new schools? The Member is asking us to settle for crumbling schools in areas in which he does not want schools to mature.

Mr Ford: Clearly, Mr McNarry was not listening to my point. Specifically in the context of secondary schools in Antrim, I said that there was the potential for a new integrated school in one of the redundant school buildings.

I had the pleasure to be recently nominated to the board of governors of Round Tower Integrated Primary School, having previously been on the management committee of Spring Farm School when that was established. Spring Farm School is approximately 28 years old, has had no major renovations in that time, and is extremely popular because of the quality of education that it provides.

Madam Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr A Maginness: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. A very long intervention was made during Mr Ford's speech. A Member cannot simply get up and make a speech and call it an intervention. There must be some rule for interventions.

That is an example of a Member abusing the intervention mechanism in order to make a speech. The Speaker should give some direction on that.

Madam Speaker: We discussed this at the beginning of this session, and a ruling was made — I believe the matter concerned Mr Neeson. The general rule is that Members must try to be careful not to give way if they suspect that the Member to whom they are giving way will make a speech. If an intervening Member begins to make a speech, it is up to the Member who gave way to remind him or her not to do so — as Mr Ford rightly reminded Mr McNarry.

Members give way entirely at their own discretion. However, we did ask Members to show courtesy to those who were speaking. Mr McNarry has not done that, so I now remind Members that if they ask another Member to give way, they should consider that that Member has a limited speaking time.

Mr P Robinson: Further to that point of order, I agree with Mr Maginness. Madam Speaker, I do not expect a ruling straight away; you might like to consider it with your colleagues. However, an intervention is only an intervention if it is very short. If a Member speaks for a longer period of time, then I suggest that the Speaker should intervene and ask the Member to resume their seat.

Madam Speaker: We will take that point on board. I remind Members that we had a full discussion about this at an earlier sitting, and Members were asked to do exactly what Mr Robinson and Mr Maginness suggest. I will discuss this matter with my colleagues and give a ruling, hopefully in September.

Mr McClarty: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. When did the Secretary of State last accede to a recommendation from the Business Committee?

Madam Speaker: This matter can be decided at my discretion. I will examine it again.

Mr McFarland: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. My understanding was that when this matter was discussed previously — and my recollection may not be quite correct — you decided that if a speech was under 10 minutes and a Member allowed a intervention, he or she would be allowed an additional minute of speaking time. By the logic of that ruling, an intervention should last for only a minute.

Madam Speaker: I think that I have made myself clear on the issue. The Member is quite correct; that was the ruling. The discussion arose after Mr Neeson gave way to another Member who then turned their intervention into a speech. We will examine the matter again, as Mr Robinson requested.

Mr Ford: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Will you also perhaps discuss with the Business Committee whether asking a question three times does not go beyond the bounds of normal good manners in this place?

Madam Speaker: I will look at that also. The first round of Members have now spoken, and from now on Members have 10 minutes.

Mr P Robinson: I am pleased to follow the remarks made by the leader of the Alliance Party about the manner in which the Secretary of State is treating this Assembly. One of the key elements of any deliberative Chamber, particularly an elected body, is that it should be master in its own house. It is very clear that in this Assembly that is not the case. There is a puppet-master outside who wants to pull the strings.

The Assembly should attempt to regain control of how it functions, both in the Chamber and within its precincts.

Anyone looking in on today's debate might consider that it is not well attended. It is outrageous for the Secretary of State to have announced in the middle of the week that the Assembly would sit on a Friday. It is not a normal sitting day, and no Member is likely to have assumed that the Assembly would sit. In spite of what the Secretary of State may think about the role of MLAs, most have other constituency duties today, dealing with Ministers and others. That is one reason for the poor attendance. This is not an excuse for what may follow, but Members have had little opportunity to prepare for the debate. We were given the motion only yesterday. I hope that people will take account of that when listening to today's speeches.

Sir Reg Empey: Mr Robinson makes a serious point, and I raised a point of order with you on that very issue at the last sitting, Madam Speaker. Does Mr Robinson agree that the implication of what he said is that the Business Committee will probably have to take decisions via a mechanism other than unanimity? The Secretary of State must let go of the reins and give you, Madam Speaker, and the Business Committee some real responsibility for Assembly business.

Mr P Robinson: I agree entirely. At times, all of us will be sore at the Business Committee for going against our wishes, but if we want to make progress, we must put some trust in the Business Committee and the party representatives that sit on it. If Members, who often have conflicting views, are prepared to trust the Business Committee, surely the Secretary of State should be prepared to do so as well.

Due to the wide-ranging nature of the debate, I want to speak about devolution. Before that, however, I want to comment on the Education Minister's decision yesterday on the South Eastern Education and Library Board. I am not quite sure where Mr Gallagher was coming from. Perhaps he was not aware of what took place at that meeting, or of the background to the situation, when he determined to drag the issue up as a matter of division. It was not a matter of division to the political parties on the South Eastern Education and Library Board. All the elected representatives, from the parties that are gathered here and some that are not, agreed on the issue.

The background to the problem is that a previous board ran up an overspend, not because it knowingly spent the money but because officers of that board had not properly reported to it on its financial circumstances. Only after they had considerably overspent was the matter drawn to the attention of the board, and some personnel changes in the board's officer corps indicate that that was the case.

However, the Minister is now saying that this board is to be punished not only for a previous board's decision, but also, in effect, for the decision of officers no longer on that board. The Minister needs to be better acquainted of the circumstances. The current board should not be punished. Worse still, vulnerable children, with the most to lose, will be punished by the Minister's decision.

Mrs Long: Does Mr Robinson agree that there is a conflict in the Minister's messages on this issue? He has referred to the debacle of previous SEELB overspends. Board members have all been instructed to scrutinise rigorously all proposals from officers, yet yesterday the instruction was simply to rubber-stamp those proposals. Therefore, there is a complete conflict in the messages from the Department of Education on the responsibility of board members for financial programming.

Mr P Robinson: That is right, and it is regrettable, at a time when we are trying to get greater democratisation, that when there is unanimity on an issue from Northern Ireland's political parties, the response from Government is to sweep them to the side and bring in people who will do the bidding of the Minister.

I will move on rapidly from that issue, as I am sure that others will want to make their comments known during the course of the debate. I want to talk about devolution. Via several interventions, it has become clear that the SDLP has a somewhat jaundiced view of what might be described as the "blame game". Apparently, anyone who does not agree with them is to blame. I had always understood that to have agreement it was necessary to have all parties, or at least a sufficient consensus of parties, agreeing on an issue. It is not simply a case of the SDLP saying, "We brought out a document, and there is no progress because you did not agree with it." We could all say that; but it is not the way to make progress.

There has been a lot of talk about the Preparation for Government Committee. The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland set out what seemed to me at the beginning, at least, to be a logical course —

Dr Farren: Will the Member give way?

Mr P Robinson: Just one minute, please. I am in the middle of developing an issue. The Secretary of State set out what was to be a logical progression. There would be a Preparation for Government Committee, which in their terms, would "scope the issues". That, apparently, is the trendy term for attempting to identify what the obstacles were to the return of devolution. The Preparation for Government Committee would attempt to categorise those obstacles, define them in some way, and bring them forward to the Assembly.

The next stage would take place here, where each of the parties would not so much debate the issues, but say where they stood on those issues and the difficulties surrounding them, and would learn from others who would do likewise from their party position. By the time the Prime Minister commenced the negotiating process, we would have scoped the issues, understood other people's positions and, hopefully, been able to outline that for other Members. We would be in a better position to look for a way to overcome those problems.

That is what I understood the process to be. Regrettably, because of the way the Assembly is being set tasks by the Secretary of State, I do not believe that the issues are getting a proper airing. That would help us to move to the next stage of this process. It does no good for the Secretary of State to issue threats, either about the financial losses that we will bear if the Assembly dies on 25 November, or about rigid timetables.

The parties will not take their decisions based on those factors. Their decisions will relate to principle, and to mandated positions; to issues that have been put before the electorate that has endorsed them. As far as my party is concerned, the issues that block the process are widely known. They relate to the requirement for accountability, stability, effectiveness and the operational efficiency of institutions and structures. That goes to the problems that we have had with the institutions and structures of the Belfast Agreement.

We addressed some of those in detail in December 2004. Let me make something clear: my party did not endorse the comprehensive agreement, as it contained many proposals that were not the first choice of the Democratic Unionist Party.

Mr Nesbitt: On a point of information, Madam Speaker.

Mr P Robinson: I will run out of time if I take an intervention.

Unless those issues are properly corrected by legislation, there cannot be progress. We are happy to outline them in any future debate. The critical issues are those of completion — the need for an end to paramilitary and criminal activity. Those issues cannot be washed away, timetabled away, or bought away. They are matters that stand before the electorate. The people outside know what the issues are. If we want to have stable political structures in Northern Ireland, it is absolutely essential that we do so on a basis that can last. Those structures must be robust, stable and workable. That will occur only if we have dealt with outstanding issues.

We have been going through groundhog day for long enough in Northern Ireland. Agreements are reached, but the underlying essential issues are left unresolved.

We get into some form of Administration that collapses because of the unresolved issues. It would be better by far if we took our time to resolve all those issues and ensure that we build from a firm foundation. We can then go forward and not have the collapse after collapse that damage the prospects of devolution in the future.

I trust that the Assembly will be allowed to debate those critical issues so that it can examine the problems and the nuances of the matters that each party identifies as being important for them. I hope also that the Secretary of State will trust the Business Committee so that it can programme debates to allow those kinds of important issues to be determined and real progress to be made.

I make it very clear that my party wants to see progress: we want devolution and we want an Executive to run in Northern Ireland. However, that progress must occur on a basis that the community can support and one that will ensure that the Executive will be workable and lasting.

Madam Speaker: We have about four minutes left, and rather than ask Mr Jim Wilson, the next Member to speak, to start his speech only to have to stop, I ask Members to agree to suspend for a moment. After the two minutes' silence, Mr Wilson will begin his speech. Are Members happy with that?

I will be turning on the tannoy so that my statement about the two minutes' silence will be heard all over the Building so that people can observe it as they wish.

The debate stood suspended.

FIRST ANNIVERSARY OF THE LONDON BOMBINGS

12.00 noon

Madam Speaker: The debate will resume in a moment. I invite Members and all others in Parliament Buildings, to whom this message is being conveyed, to stand, if they are able to do so, and join me in observing two minutes' silence to mark the first anniversary of the London bombings.

Members observed two minutes' silence.

SECRETARY OF STATE MOTION

Spending Review and Priorities

Debate resumed on motion:

That this Assembly notes the results of the Spending Review 2004 and the current Comprehensive Spending Review 2007 and their implications for the spending priorities for a Programme for Government to be agreed by a Northern Ireland Executive following its restoration on or before 24 November 2006. — [The Secretary of State.]

Mr J Wilson: I associate myself with remarks that have been made right around the Chamber on the fact that the Secretary of State continues to call the tune when it comes to the subject matter for debate. It would be better, of course, if we elected Members were calling that tune. We might not agree the same tune, particularly at this time of the year, but at least it would be democratic.

I wish to say a little more about that. The motion is one that was probably totally unexpected. I question its usefulness. Given the wide gulf that exists between republicans and unionists, only the most optimistic will believe that a Northern Ireland Executive will be restored on or before 24 November, although we will try to achieve restoration by that date. We will try very hard. To link that date to the 2004 spending review makes very little sense.

Why did the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland and for Wales determine that that motion should be debated today? The Business Committee did not recommend it to him. I have no reason to believe that any party here recommended it to him, but, if so, I am certainly not aware of the fact.

The Business Committee made suggestions to the Secretary of State. It has a long list of motions — 16 or perhaps more. I shall mention only a few, but they include the Department of the Environment's (DOE) failure to meet European directives. Since we are talking about spending reviews, funding and finance, the DOE risks incurring heavy fines over our heads as we speak. Post-primary education is on the no-day-named motions list, as are water charges, local property tax and assaults on emergency workers. Those are very important bread-and-butter matters for the people of Northern Ireland.

There was one other motion on the list, tabled by my party, and, in case you call me to order, Madam Speaker, this brings me to spending priorities.

It invites the Secretary of State to note:

“that there is no cross-community support for the current proposals on the Review of Public Administration as it applies to local government.”

Any spending review that will, before 2009, have to determine financial resources for a new local government structure that is fundamentally wrong and which is not supported by the four parties in this Chamber will in itself be fundamentally flawed. There is a problem for the Secretary of State. Following a debate in this Assembly on Draft Planning Policy Statement 14, the Secretary of State said:

“I will naturally want to reflect carefully on the Assembly debate ... I will take account of the views where there is cross community support.”

Had there been cross-community support — and I have reason to believe that there could have been — what would the Secretary of State have said or done?

In November 2005 at the Hilton hotel, the Secretary of State said that there would be a quango cull. We know that there was no real cull, just some tinkering at the margins. He said:

“this will cut costs and transfer resources ... to the frontline delivery of key public services like health and education.”

Does anyone really expect that his proposals would lead to savings from a cull on quangos?

He went on to say that:

“the RPA has never been a cost-cutting exercise ... Nonetheless, I do expect the streamlining of structures to result in significant savings ... tentative estimates I have received indicate savings of up to £200 million per annum”.

A colleague of mine remarked that, in a lifetime in politics, he had never seen a review of scale result in savings of any kind.

In another place, Lady Hermon asked the Secretary of State what cost savings were expected from the Government’s plan to reduce the number of local authorities in Northern Ireland. David Cairns replied:

“Savings from the Review of Public Administration (RPA) decisions on local government have been estimated at £54-£73 million.”

They have given themselves some scope to get it right somewhere in the middle, although I do not think that they will even hit the middle target. Here is the line that needs to be read twice:

“The final figures will depend on how the proposals are implemented.”

The proposed structure of local government is wrong. The associated savings are wild guesstimates; they are not based on reality. As I said earlier, today’s debate has been an opportunity missed.

Dr Farren: Like my colleagues in the SDLP, it is with some reluctance — and having participated in the Preparation for Government Committee over the past six weeks or so, considerable disappointment — that I participate in this morning’s debate. It is not the debate with which I hoped we could have concluded this session of our business. I had hoped that some progress might have been recorded in the Preparation for Government Committee. I suppose that having all the parties in the same Committee room is progress, but that is a very low threshold.

Instead, as most colleagues probably know from reading the reports of the business in that Committee, the meetings have been characterised by a considerable degree of vindictiveness and strident allegations — almost personal abuse — on the part of both the DUP and Sinn Féin. If things are not done their way — and their ways are contradictory and exclusive of each other — matters cannot be progressed in the Committee. We are, therefore, left with a situation where the Secretary of State has to decide. It is difficult for a self-respecting Irishman to accept that our business can transpire only as, when and how the Secretary of State determines.

With respect to some of the remarks made by the DUP, since it is present today, Mr Robinson tried to reject the comprehensive agreement a few moments ago —

Mr P Robinson: Will the hon Member give way?

Dr Farren: Well, he may not have agreed them, but the submission by the DUP includes an approving reference to the comprehensive agreement proposals. Among the many conditions heaped by the DUP into their submission, it seems that it is now ready to accept those proposals. It is not surprising, since, in the immediate aftermath of the publication of those proposals, Mr Robinson —

Mr Nesbitt: I see that both Gentlemen are now back in the Chamber. Mr Robinson said that his party disagreed with many aspects of the comprehensive agreement. Does Dr Farren agree that the Leader of the Democratic Unionist Party said that there was only one element that was not agreed, namely the modalities for decommissioning?

Dr Farren: Mr Nesbitt’s memory of what the DUP said is probably clearer than mine. However, it is clear —

Mr P Robinson: Will the Member give way?

Dr Farren: No, Mr Robinson did not give way to me a few moments ago. May I just remind Mr Robinson —

Madam Speaker: Mr Robinson, the comprehensive spending review and the comprehensive agreement are two different things.

Mr P Robinson: Madam Speaker, is it not usual protocol in any debating chamber that if a Member is named he is given the opportunity to respond?

Madam Speaker: You are quite correct.

Mr P Robinson: I am grateful. May I make it clear that the comprehensive agreement was not agreed in any part by any party. It was an agreement between the two Governments, who brought it forward, and was subsequently endorsed by the United States Government. It was not an agreed document. We support many aspects of that document, although not particularly in their present form. We support a range of issues, but the general context is that we have not yet supported the agreement.

Mr Durkan: The comprehensive agreement appeared as proposals put to Sinn Féin and the DUP by the two Governments; proposals which both parties had to accept before 8 December 2004. That acceptance was indicated. Consequently, Peter Robinson described the comprehensive agreement as a remarkable achievement by the DUP. Now he says that the DUP never agreed or accepted it.

Dr Farren: May I continue, Madam Speaker?

While the shenanigans continue in the Preparation for Government Committee, we are faced with a situation where, despite the best intentions — as we might describe them — of the 2004 spending review, we still live in an economy that is considerably unbalanced and seriously in need of substantial regeneration.

Indeed, over the past two and a half years, all the parties participating in the Preparation for Government Committee have been meeting representatives from the Northern Ireland Business Alliance. They have been preparing a basic framework document on which to base plans for economic regeneration; all those parties have agreed the contents of the document. That framework document would have been a more appropriate basis for today's debate. At the behest of the Secretary of State, subcommittees are to be established; that framework document could be further developed in one of those subcommittees.

The Northern Ireland Business Alliance, and the entire business and social partnership community, must be looking on, with despair and disappointment, at our failure to progress those issues. At the outset of this Assembly, just seven weeks ago, the Northern Ireland Business Alliance gave us a detailed presentation, in the Senate Chamber, which was widely and enthusiastically acclaimed. The alliance expected further work to progress quickly.

The establishment of priorities to underpin economic regeneration will require us to take greater advantage of the social and economic levers at our disposal and to seek other levers where necessary. Those levers are in education, training, and research and development. There are also fiscal levers, such as business taxes, that we already control and others that we may be able to acquire. No modern economy achieves success without a strong investment in education and training, especially in vocational and technical training, and in third- and fourth-level education. The people who will lead the research and development of new products and new processes, and those who will manage and develop new enterprises, are educated and trained at those educational institutions.

Northern Ireland still lags far behind other economies in research and development. An overwhelming proportion of local research is conducted in our universities. That research has resulted in considerable successes in business applications. However, we need to address the fact that much of that research does not emanate from the business sector.

The establishment of an all-Ireland research alliance, through a restored North/South Ministerial Council, would be a key initiative to achieving a more effective role for research and development. Such an alliance would mobilise the research facilities and expertise available in all the universities and colleges of technology on the island and link them with businesses, wherever they are located and wherever it is appropriate. That initiative, supported by public funds, philanthropic and research bodies, and the business sector, should be a strategic priority for restoration.

A newly established economic development subcommittee should progress that initiative in order to make our commitment more urgent. We all made that commitment to the Northern Ireland Business Alliance to show that we are determined to contribute significantly to economic regeneration.

Mrs I Robinson: I cannot let Dr Farren get away with some of his comments. I remind him that the Protestant community in Northern Ireland feels that it has not had a fair deal since the 1970s. In 1985, when the Anglo-Irish Agreement was foisted on us, the unionist population of Northern Ireland — one million Protestants and their elected representatives — were totally ignored. When asked why the unionist people were ignored, Dr Farren's former leader Mr Hume said that it was because they would not have gone along with that deal. That comes from a party that is supposedly moderate and democratic. We do not take lessons on democracy from the SDLP.

With regard to the spending priorities, I want to add my voice to the condemnation of the Minister of Education's actions in forcing the members of the South Eastern Education and Library Board to endorse the swingeing cuts that will hit the most vulnerable section of the community — children with special needs. I am delighted that those elected representatives stuck to their principles and refused to rubber-stamp the disastrous ineptness of the former board members, who failed to identify the looming deficit of approximately £21 million. Ultimately, it was the responsibility of the chief accounting officer to draw that to the board's attention. Sadly, children with special needs will be the main losers in this scenario if the Government have their way. Unfortunately, the Government picked independents who are neither accountable nor elected to represent anyone in our community and who failed to stand shoulder to shoulder with the rest of the democratically elected board members. They are a disgrace, and I hope that parents make their views known to them.

At a time when the ongoing Review of Public Administration looms, the general view is that there should be more democracy in Northern Ireland rather than less. Those Government appointees, who outnumber elected representatives, should be done away with, and the voices of elected members should be heard. The elected representatives undoubtedly took the right decision. They took that decision on principle, and I salute the stand that those members took, including, of course, the SDLP representative.

How can we deny those vulnerable children every aid and assistance that will encourage them to reach their full potential? Our party will raise the issue in the House of Commons, and I have sought an urgent meeting with the Minister to include Peter Robinson and Jeffrey Donaldson, whose constituencies are in the board area. I can say, without a shadow of a doubt, that the Minister, following my request and having expelled the elected members, will not be rushing to accommodate those representatives as enthusiastically as she introduced the unelected personnel who will deal with the board's finances from now on.

With regard to the comprehensive spending review, Health Service expenditure in the Province will have risen from around £1.7 billion in 1997 to £3.8 billion by 2008. It now accounts for more than 40% of the Northern Ireland budget. How the Health Service deals with those neuro conditions for which numbers of diagnoses are rapidly increasing will have significant resource implications. Those conditions include autism spectrum disorders and attention deficit disorder, as well as those that result from the impact of childhood abuse. We are part of an ever-ageing population: dementia, strokes and diabetes will use up more and more resources. Trusts are under greater pressure than ever before with the Minister's tightening of the purse strings.

New service development was suspended, and it is proving a struggle for some trusts to even maintain existing front-line services. The escalating costs that are associated with providing services will result in even greater pressures in future.

Government continues to ignore differential need. There is a greater level of healthcare need in the Province than in the rest of the United Kingdom. The health and social care needs and effectiveness study that was published three years ago showed that more than 20% extra spending per capita is required to achieve the same standard of care that exists in England.

Several factors in Northern Ireland can only add to the disparity between standards in the Province and those across the water. Significant extra health costs result from the continuing legacy of terrorism and community tension in the Province. It costs more to provide services to a sparsely populated region, and low levels of subscription to private health insurance result in a substantially greater burden on public finances.

The Northern Ireland population is growing faster than that of anywhere else in the United Kingdom. The most expensive patients to care for are those at either end of the age spectrum. At the same time, 30% of the Province's population is aged under 20 years, compared with 25% in England, and there are 40% more adults who are severely disabled in Northern Ireland.

The respected health economist Professor John Appleby has recognised the disparity in need. In a recent study, he stated that in an attempt to calculate future spending for health, a way would have to be found to bypass the Barnett formula. Appleby also claimed that, compared to that in England, our Health Service was under-performing and inefficient. For instance, he identified that the drug-prescribing practice in the Province has led to an unacceptable waste of tens of millions of pounds. That must be examined, because doctors are writing prescriptions ad nauseam even though other means might be used.

Progress on waiting list totals has been made in recent months, but health trusts are under great pressure to meet Government targets. Sometimes that leads to a conflict between continuing with elective procedures and dealing with unexpected emergencies that come in overnight.

The Review of Public Administration has the potential to make improvements to health structures. Health Service reform that speeds up and streamlines decision-making will be welcomed. A reduction in the number of trusts will undoubtedly mean savings on the basis of economies of scale. The one thing of which we can be sure when considering the comprehensive spending review is that the cost of providing good-quality healthcare will only escalate further over the next few years. That is why we must take every opportunity to ensure that the system within which services operate is as rigorous and efficient as we can possibly make it.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Madam Speaker: If Members are content, I shall now suspend the Assembly for lunch between 12.30 pm and 1.30 pm.

The sitting was suspended at 12.29 pm.

On resuming (Madam Speaker in the Chair) —

1.30 pm

Mr Cree: I hope that the small turnout is not due to the fact that it is my turn to speak, but I will take advantage of that.

I wish to address three issues that feed into the themes of the comprehensive spending review. The first issue that I wish to address is water charging, which has been with us for some time. The people of Northern Ireland have been paying for water and sewerage services through their regional rates and, as no reduction has ever occurred in the regional rates, one can safely assume that we will continue to pay in that manner. Water is essential for life and is a fundamental requirement of public health. We all acknowledge that our water and sewerage system has suffered from several decades of underinvestment by successive British Governments.

The Government's current proposals remain unfair for a variety of reasons: the proposed capital value does not take account of the ability to pay; the proposals do not take account of the amount of water used; and they do not provide incentives to save water as required by European law. Focus must be placed on needs in Northern Ireland, rather than comparisons with the rest of the United Kingdom. We are continually reminded that Northern Ireland pays less for rates and water, but that is a crude and unfair comparison as Northern Ireland's income and expenditure profile is different. Developers should pay for the provision of services to new housing developments. The Government have conceded that point, but there is still no sign of that saving being passed on to the consumer. Road drainage costs should be paid by road users and not by water consumers.

In Great Britain, the Water Service received a green dowry of £1.6 billion to upgrade its water and sewerage services. At the same time, it was agreed that £50 million would be paid annually to Northern Ireland for water and sewerage improvements. That cash was not ring-fenced and appears to have been absorbed into the pot. We are still waiting to see some sign of the Government's peace dividend.

There are other issues arising from the Government's intentions. Water charging will commence next year, and by 2010 the full charges will be applied. Water and sewerage services will then transfer from the Government to the regulator who will decide the charges to be levied by the Government-owned company (GoCo). Some would speculate that the sole purpose of separate charging is to prepare the Water Service for a quick sale.

The experience across the water does not provide much comfort. The water companies wrote off £960 million in bad debts last year, and it is estimated that up to 15% of householders consistently refused to pay their bills. Leakage targets set by the regulator have not been achieved. Thames Water has applied for an emergency drought order. Those are the benefits of 17 years of privatisation.

Although I have no difficulty in supporting private industry as a principle, the Government have left too many imponderables in their plans for water charges for the project to be a success. The Government must cease their "suck-it-and-see" approach to this important matter and return to the drawing board.

The second issue that I wish to address is the reform of the domestic rating system.

The roots of the current system of rating were established in the nineteenth century. Very few Members would have been around at the time — although most would have by 1976 when the last revaluation of domestic property occurred. That assessment was based on evidence emanating from the late 1960s, and few would disagree that the system needs updating.

However, the Government's proposal for a new system based on capital values is again unfair. Basing domestic rates on the capital value of homes is not a fairer system of assessment as it fails to properly reflect an ability to pay. Many householders in Northern Ireland are asset rich but income poor.

In 1995, the average house price stood at £43,826. It now stands at around £140,000; indeed last evening's 'Belfast Telegraph' reported that the figure has now risen to £146,000. This system is not about fairness: it is about Government tapping into a lucrative housing market and squeezing as much as possible out of hard-working families. That is a recipe for disaster for society here, particularly for low-wage earners and the elderly. I acknowledge that the Government have made some gestures in their direction, but much more must be done to affect people on low incomes.

The ratepayer here is already paying far more than previously. In 1998, £166.5 million was collected from the domestic sector. Last year, £346.8 million was levied, and this year the figure will rise by a further £20 million. Government seems to be exploiting the political vacuum in Northern Ireland to impose a draconian system for local government finances.

On 3 July the Minister of State assured us — in fact he emphasised — that the reforms were not about raising more revenue. Rather, he said that they should make the system fairer — by sharing the rating burden among householders — and easier for ratepayers to understand. I beg to differ on that.

My third point relates to Belfast Harbour. Many Members were alarmed to learn recently that the Government are considering the possible sale of Belfast Harbour. The Government's document, out to consultation until 22 September, could pave the way for selling off key parts of the Port of Belfast. The Strategic Investment Board has denied any sinister intent, but it would appear that the Government might be attempting to asset-strip the Belfast Harbour Commissioners' property portfolio by selling key parts for the benefit of speculators.

The Port of Belfast has contributed massively to the economic infrastructure of Belfast and Northern Ireland for many years. This untimely speculation could undermine the port's current £140 million capital investment programme. The port currently handles two thirds of Northern Ireland's sea-borne trade and 25% of that of the entire island of Ireland.

I understand that the previous Assembly rejected any suggestion of a change in status for the Port of Belfast. That was the correct decision, and any idea of a sell-off is sheer foolishness and shows a total disregard for the future of our infrastructure.

Mr Storey: As well as seeking to make savings in health and education services, amongst others, Government must ensure that their own house is in order in relation to financial management and savings. The hon Member the deputy leader of my party referred earlier to the puppet-master Secretary of State, who would like to pull strings to operate this House. It is time that he pulled the strings of those who are in charge of the finances of Northern Ireland.

As an illustration of that, and of the necessity to focus not only on money but on the reform and quality of delivery, let us consider Northern Ireland's waste management strategy and the report by the Comptroller and Auditor General for Northern Ireland. I refer to two specific areas. Earlier in the debate Dr Farren, the Member for North Antrim, told us about the virtues of cross-border initiatives and all-Ireland institutions that could be of great benefit to us all.

Let us look at one initiative that should have been dumped — the fridges fiasco of a couple of years ago. The Department of the Environment negotiated an all-Ireland contract for the disposal of domestic waste, fridges and freezers, but when the bid collapsed before the contract was due to be signed, some councils stockpiled fridges, while others waited for prices from other places. The Comptroller and Auditor General estimates that the delay in putting the contract in place cost the public purse at least £750,000. That money could have been better spent on public services, and on front-line services in particular.

The Comptroller and Auditor General's report makes even more damning comment about the Government's good intentions in promoting recycling, which were undercut because recycling facilities were too often simply unavailable. The Comptroller and Auditor General notes that the Government resorted to the hiring of a consultant — often their first port in a storm. He says:

"A fundamental cultural shift in attitude and behaviour is essential to achieving the Waste Management Strategy's... objectives. In order to encourage this shift, EHS employed media consultants, in December 2001, to drive a £1.5 million public awareness campaign: 'Wake up to waste'".

He goes on to note that because sufficient recycling facilities and other opportunities for avoiding waste disposal were not available:

"these improvements have progressed only to a limited degree, the success of 'Wake up to Waste' may have been limited, in the short term, and will be more difficult to maintain, or expand, in the longer term."

Therefore, whether we are talking about health, education, the environment or waste management, we must take an interest, not only in the money, but in the skill or otherwise with which Government can organise themselves to deliver a high-quality service to the public who pay for it.

The Department of the Environment did wake up to waste; it woke up to the reality that it was time to dump the issue with local authorities, and to have them incur the costs, so that members of local councils — some of whom are Assembly Members — would have to raise the revenue and the finance to do what central government should have done.

When the Northern Ireland estimates for the current financial year were published, they were accompanied by a statement of excess. This related to expenditure in excess of the net estimate provision for the Department of Education in the previous financial year. The excess expenditure was not an insignificant sum; it was somewhere in the region of £123 million. The Department was rightly criticised by the Public Accounts Committee for lacking adequate control mechanisms to prevent the situation from arising. I trust that, to prevent any such recurrence, the appropriate rules are now in place, not only in the Department of Education, but in other Northern Ireland Departments.

Mr Dallat: Does Mr Storey agree that if this Assembly were up and running we would have our own Public Accounts Committee to scrutinise all the issues that he has raised?

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Storey: The Hon Member should recall that the failure and the faults of the previous Assembly created some of the financial crises that we have experienced, so we should not be begging, cap in hand, for the restoration of the failed structures of the Belfast Agreement.

The hon Member earlier referred to the regional rate. It was the old Assembly — the failed Belfast Agreement version of this Assembly — that brought in a 7% year-on-year increase on the regional rate, and the pro-agreement parties supported it in this House. Therefore, the hon Member for East Londonderry should not be giving any lectures about the restoration of a devolved administration for the financial good of Northern Ireland.

1.45 pm

Mr Beggs: Mr Storey criticised the 7% increase to the regional rate incurred during the previous Assembly. Is he more satisfied with the 19% increase that was recently delivered?

[Laughter.]

Mr Storey: The hon Member from the Ulster Unionist Party should also bear responsibility, because his party negotiated the Belfast Agreement and brought about the situation in which the 7% increase was introduced.

The published Department-by-Department figures for the net administrative cost are interesting and bear some scrutiny. Adding up the net administrative costs for Northern Ireland Departments for 2005-06 and comparing those with the costs for 2004-05 and the actual expenditure for 2003-04, there is a consistent pattern: actual administration costs for 2003-04 were almost £803 million, rising to £854 million for 2004-05 and £954 million for 2005-06. Time and time again we hear that Government are committed to cutting out waste, getting resources to front-line services and doing away with superfluous administration. However, there seems to be a contrast between their words and their actions.

The House needs to pay particular attention to the House of Commons Select Committee report that confirmed that the level of fuel smuggling is so great as to warrant a reduction in the tax levy placed on the people of Northern Ireland. That is significant because a Westminster Committee, weighed down with Labour Party representatives, has concluded that such is the extent of the criminal conspiracy in Northern Ireland that it ought to affect the level of taxation.

One of the groups most responsible and associated with those who have threatened and attacked our economy, jobs and investment is the party that is missing from the Assembly today. Today, Sinn Féin stands officially condemned by that report as the public face of pirates, smugglers, counterfeiters and gangsters. It stands exposed as hypocritically demanding places in government to help to run the economy by day and seeking to destabilise the economy by night — to such a degree that the Select Committee recommends a change in Northern Ireland's taxation.

However, one should not be surprised by that. This week, the true face of the abstentionists in the republican movement has been seen. A Sinn Féin Member of the House publicly admitted that he stole flags and bunting in Lurgan, and it was reported in the local papers. He then prides himself that that was an act of valour. A more sinister comment from a councillor in Cookstown shows the true face of republicans. The councillor determined that the Continuity IRA and dissidents are not hardliners because they have not killed any Brits yet.

That says something about the character and the credentials of the party with which so many in this House are keen for the DUP to sign a deal. Sinn Féin does not have the credentials to be in government. It has a long way to go. With regard to the finances of Northern Ireland, I would not trust Sinn Féin with the finances of my piggy bank, let alone the finances of Northern Ireland.

Ms Ritchie: The alleged purpose of today's debate is to define:

"spending priorities for a Programme for Government to be agreed by a Northern Ireland Executive following its restoration on or before 24 November 2006."

That is an act of political contrivance to mask and conceal the real political and economic problems that confront all Members and the wider community.

Those problems cannot be ignored, and they must be tackled if we are to achieve a political resolution that reflects the requirements of all the people.

This morning, the hon Member for North Antrim Dr Paisley informed us that this House was surrounded by mystery. Then, the hon Member for East Belfast Mr Robinson told us that we were not masters of our own house. How can we be, when the DUP and Sinn Féin refuse to allow restoration to take place? It is clear what the DUP must do. It must sign up to a commitment to power sharing and to partnership government. Sinn Féin must sign up to the principles of policing and an end to criminality, as defined by the Northern Ireland Affairs Select Committee report that was published this week.

Dr McCrea: Does the hon Member really believe that the Democratic Unionist Party can sign up to putting into government those who are wedded to a continuation of terrorism, criminality, paramilitarism and extortion? Does the Member really expect us to put those people into government?

Ms Ritchie: The SDLP firmly believes in inclusion. If we want to move forward, and if we want, for example, to correct the funding problems presented by the South Eastern Education and Library Board and counter its unacceptable introduction of commissioners, the political institutions must be restored. Both parties must stop protecting their own territory and get down to the business that the people of Northern Ireland elected us to do. That is the challenge.

Mr Storey: Will the Member give way?

Ms Ritchie: I will not give way. We have already been served a diet of that terrible behaviour in the Preparation for Government Committee. We have been served a diet of insinuation and cruel insult. The people of Northern Ireland are saying that they have had enough. They want us to get down to business and deal with the real priorities. If this was a real debate, we could do that, and be able to define our priorities. We only have to look at our roads infrastructure. For example, one of the key objectives of the Department for Regional Development's corporate and business plan is to:

"maintain the road infrastructure to keep it safe, effective and reliable and to preserve the value of the asset".

We have work to do then. There is extreme concern in the construction and quarry-products industry, as the SDLP and other parties have pointed out, that the financial allocation of £58 million for roads maintenance this year is totally inadequate. To protect an asset, resources should not be reduced. We must continue to invest in those resources. Recent statistics have highlighted a £9.8 million reduction in the budget allocation across the four Roads Service divisions for asphalt and bitmac resurfacing in Northern Ireland.

Mr Storey: Will the Member give way?

Ms Ritchie: I will not give way; I have limited time. If the DUP would get down to the business of government, we would not be dealing with this petty squabbling, to which many of us have been subjected in the Preparation for Government Committee.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Storey: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. The issue that I wished to raise was not an example of petty squabbling. I wanted to raise a matter of fact with the Member. That was why I asked her to give way.

Madam Speaker: That was not a point of order, Mr Storey.

Ms Ritchie: I have already dealt with the roads infrastructure and the roads maintenance budget. However, my party believes that, generally speaking, there is also short-term thinking in the comprehensive spending review. We believe that the British Government are passing the buck to the public, who must pay for the renewal of our infrastructure through additional taxation in the form of water charges. That is not just short-sighted but morally bankrupt.

The direct rule Administration has been responsible for neglecting our infrastructure for decades. They diverted investment towards other purposes, such as security, although we would readily concede that both sides' paramilitaries carried out terrible acts during those years.

It is right that there should be a complete end to all forms of criminality and terrorism. The sectarianism that breeds discontent and terrorism should also end. The correct course of action for the Government would be for them to make good their neglect and make up for past deficits.

If we had restored institutions, we could define spending priorities for infrastructure. There are other issues to consider, including the crucial North/South dimension. If we are to tackle the impediments that partition has caused, we need to deal with the all-island spatial planning strategy, which has come about as a result of the regional development strategy in the North and the national spatial planning strategy in the South. Now that that document has been published, work needs to start immediately.

Other all-island regional development measures must be factored into a comprehensive spending review, and we could do that if there were restoration. Such measures include the creation of an all-island transportation and infrastructural body and the all-island free-travel scheme, which, thankfully, will be implemented next April. For the life of us, we do not understand why that is subject to a consultation here and not in the South. We need a strengthened all-island approach to road safety, given that this week we have seen terrible tragedies, some of which resulted in death.

We also need an integrated approach to road signage, marking, speed measurements and penalties. The benefits of an all-island approach to spending on our infrastructure are already visible as a result of the Dublin Government's investment in the City of Derry Airport and the joint management of the Newry/Dundalk road construction project, which, coincidentally, Roads Service manages.

Fundamental to the debate is a need for the DUP and Sinn Féin to change their political attitudes and mindsets. We witnessed the semblance of a love-in of the Preparation for Government Committee. That attitude needs to be restored, and I hope that we will see some of its benefit.

The obstacles to political progress must be removed so that all our political institutions can be restored. That will ensure that together we can define the spending priorities for a new Programme for Government that will facilitate the renewal and rebuilding of a sustainable economy and infrastructure on an all-island basis.

That includes our social and recreational spheres of life. From a comprehensive spending point of view, we should also look forward to the 2012 Olympics and to what we in the North of Ireland can do to contribute to a greater investment in sport and recreation and to the Olympics — perhaps that contribution can be made on an all-island basis.

Our communities demand the restoration of political institutions, and they demand that we all grow up and politically equip ourselves properly. They want a reinvigorated approach to developing our infrastructure. That can be achieved through making infrastructure a major priority in the Programme for Government and for a new Executive.

The SDLP cannot wait for the day on which the DUP and Sinn Féin wise up to their responsibilities and join with the rest of us in forming that new Executive and in making decisions for people here, so that we do not encounter the problems such as those that the South Eastern Education and Library Board encountered yesterday. We should be able to put financial programmes in place for that board so that it can cater for children who have special educational needs. Concessionary travel passes were removed from children who attend schools in the South Eastern Education and Library Board area, thus marginalising those who live in rural communities. Those passes should be reinstated.

We look forward to defining those spending priorities for a new Executive.

Mr McNarry: It appears that the price that we will pay for this debate will be the formation of sub-committees under the charge of the Preparation for Government Committee. If it is to be believed, Sinn Féin will grace the Chamber to debate the reports of the supposed subcommittees.

However, not one of the subcommittees that the Secretary of State has conceded to Sinn Féin will cover a Programme for Government. Instead, the issue has been shunted here for us to take note of today. Surely the work of a priority subcommittee — directed by a Committee that is charged with preparing for government — would be expected to include a report on the essence of a Programme for Government.

2.00 pm

Perhaps it is deliberate that the instinct of a natural agitator, with form and history of rubbing people up the wrong way, is all too obvious in the choice of motion that he has sent to us to debate today. Perhaps it is his warped, cynical arrogance that, in an effort to find favour with Tony or Gordon, leads Peter to report back and say, “Look at clever me. I have contrived to have the democrats in the Assembly reach consensus.” In truth, the consensus is not to prepare for or restore devolution, but one based on disdain for the Secretary of State for having the audacity and temerity to insult this House with this motion.

The motion draws attention to a Programme for Government. When was it agreed that a proper Northern Ireland Assembly, if restored, would inherit and adopt all the aspects of governance and management that have been introduced and practised under direct rule? If this Hain Assembly threw out its sponsor’s own motion, what effect would that have on Government thinking?

What purpose is there in noting the action of the direct-rule decision process on spending, when the outcome would, more than likely, be entirely different if those spending actions were brought to a proper Assembly by its own Minister? Surely Peter Hain should consider asking this House whether his regime is fit for purpose and fit to govern in the manner that any other part of the United Kingdom would expect, because he is failing to govern in that way in Northern Ireland. I suspect that he knows the answer to that question, and I would be concerned if he did not.

What mark out of 10 would we give him on education, health, infrastructure, fishing, agriculture, closing down crime and protecting the vulnerable from thuggery? We on this side of the House would be hard pressed to give him four out of 10.

Let us set aside spending and look first at the costs involved in education. The Minister with responsibility for education cannot account for the costs of running education in Northern Ireland, because, like her predecessors, she does not know the costs. There is no bottom line, no starting point on expenditure and no monetary or fiscal strategy. The Government are working without a sustainable schools policy. How can someone run a business, a charity, or even a social club, let alone a Government Department, without having a sustainable policy in place? When our community groups put together a funding plan, the first question that they are asked, and the big question that they must answer, is whether their plan is sustainable, yet this Government runs our Department of Education without a sustainable schools policy.

I cannot take note of the motion, Madam Speaker, because that would give the impression that I am content with a spending review that relies on savage spending cuts. The spending review introduces education budgets for the purpose of whipping in punitive measures that act ultimately against children.

However, the Secretary of State refuses to grant us an education debate or an RPA debate that includes education. His arrogance hides his lack of bottle. He knows that in playing the consensus card he sends an open invitation to certain people to use their veto — as they did today and will continue to do until the situation changes. That is what has happened.

Not only does Sinn Féin refuse to come into this Chamber to debate with us, but the Secretary of State now enables it to dictate what will be debated. As a result, he bottles out of approving a debate that was requested by those who show respect to the House, who will attend and who will take part in debates. Instead, we are landed with a Hain motion for the Hain Assembly on the Hain regime spending review allied to the Hain Programme for Government.

It has been said — correctly — that we are all at fault. Although I passionately believe that the objective of devolution is to make elected Members masters of this House, it would be foolish to let that aspiration transpire without first ensuring that there would be a transition period for devolving Departments into the hands of an agreed Executive. What would we take over? We would be ultimately accepting the blame for, and the consequences of, direct rule. The legacy of direct rule will be an inherited shambles, based not on what is best for Northern Ireland and its people but on what the Exchequer sees fit for Northern Ireland and its people in costs only.

It is therefore nonsense to think that I would take note of spending reviews and spending priorities for a Programme for Government unless I had a practical input into agreeing a Programme for Government to be recommended to the people of Northern Ireland. Government cannot be approached without the comprehensive agreement of the vision enshrined in a Programme for Government.

Coming out of terrorist activity and compounded by lamentable direct-rule governance, we need to restore confidence not only through offering a vision for the future but by being capable in this House of delivering the costs of such an agreed vision. It would be irresponsible to do otherwise, and it would be downright stupid to negotiate the restoration of a devolved Assembly on the basis of becoming accountable by default and of inheriting and therefore administering for the foreseeable future not our vision but the policies of the outgoing Government.

Madam Speaker, there was talk earlier about the Preparation for Government Committee. Despite the reference in the Hansard report of a “love-in”, the prospects of consensus in that Committee were not served by remarks identifying some of its members as “the Taliban”. I take exception to that, even though those remarks were not made in my direction. I sat through some 20-odd — and some of them were very odd — hours of intensive discussion and grilling and for one party it was a case of “hear no evil, see no evil, speak no evil”.

We are assembled here. Rather than take note of the Secretary of State’s motion, I ask through you, Madam Speaker, when is he going to take note of the democrats elected to this House, willing — and showing their willingness — to be in their place of work? When will he do so in a manner that denies the abstentionists any more oxygen for their veto?

Will it be better come September? That remains to be seen, and the onus between now and then is on the Preparation for Government Committee. Does that mean that debates will now be regulated continuously by the Secretary of State? Or does it mean that this Assembly will take control of its business and begin to be master in its own house?

Perhaps, Madam Speaker, over the recess, a decision could be reached and relayed to us corporately. If not, look around you. Is the action of the absentees deliberately intended to bring disgrace to this House? If you were a member of the public, what would you think of what you see here today?

It is incumbent upon the Secretary of State to deny the veto process adopted by one party. Otherwise, he is making a shambles of this Assembly.

Mr Shannon: Some specific issues show that the spending review falls down in its delivery to the people of the Province. It is a challenge to outline where it will not meet its mark and where it will not deliver.

One issue, alive in the minds of those of us who represent the east of the Province, is that of children with special needs, particularly in the area covered by the South Eastern Education and Library Board. The boards are under pressure to cut spending, and those cuts will impact specifically on children with special needs. The spending review disadvantages the children of Northern Ireland, especially since the Government are keen to make what they term “efficiency reviews” and savings.

The DUP is, with other parties, committed to helping those most in need — the children. Unions, parents, teachers and elected representatives vigorously oppose the imposition of a commissioner to the South Eastern Education and Library Board. That matter has already been raised in this Chamber, but the point must be made.

Government are enforcing budgets and threatening education and library boards with court action if those budgets are not adhered to, never mind that the needs of the children increase each year. How can parents be expected to cope when two new taxes are imposed, yet their much-needed services are removed because the Government want to save money? It is unrealistic for the spending review to talk of delivering services while, at the same time, taking them away.

The Government seem desperate to shave off money here, there and everywhere, while imposing taxes on the populace at alarming rates. Labour is the party of taxation; some 80-odd taxes have been introduced in its nine years in Government. That says a great deal. Perhaps two foreign wars and the consequent loss of life are taking their toll on the Treasury. The fact that enough decent, modern equipment cannot be supplied to the armed forces is an indication of how bad the situation is, and the Government should be reprimanded for that.

Perhaps this Government have delivered very little on promises to the people of the United Kingdom. If anything, things have gone backwards. If the record is examined, the previous Tory Government are blamed for anything that has gone wrong. However, in nine long years the Labour Government have not delivered; they have passed the buck, ducked and dived. Now they have begun to impose taxes in order to look as if they care about education and the Health Service.

Even under the Tories, nurses were not being sacked because of budget cuts.

2.15 pm

In my constituency of Strangford, and across the entire Province, tourism has the potential to boost the economy and lead to more jobs. It could lead to diversification for the rural economy and the farming community. In times of hardship, the rural community has been held back by draconian planning rules and regulations. We have already debated 'Draft Policy Planning Statement 14' in the Chamber. If planning regulations were eased, tourism could be boosted in the rural economy. That issue should be examined in the spending review.

In the past few days, the financial boost given to 12 July parades has been a topic in the press. That boost to at least one section of the community is welcome and could be replicated across the Province to benefit many areas. That wonderful, colourful celebration of culture is of historical importance, and it has tremendous tourism potential. If the same financial opportunity were afforded to others, thousands of jobs could be created.

Many families in my constituency are already feeling the strain from the lack of investment and spending. Many of my constituents look after elderly relatives without any support from the NHS and social services because the budgets cannot meet their needs, such as one hour a week of respite. Long lists of people need the services of the NHS, but the services are limited because of budget cutbacks and lack of investment. The spending review does not address those issues. Waiting lists in my constituency, and in many other constituencies, show that it is the volunteers — the carers — who look after the elderly and the ill. The Eastern Health and Social Services Board and the Ulster Community and Hospitals Trust do not have the budgets to deliver a satisfactory carer service to the community. The demands will increase because there are more old people. Will the spending review match that? I believe that it will not. For that reason, I have grave concerns.

In 2001, my colleague Kieran McCarthy and I raised the issue of roads. What we said was very clear: the minor roads budget for the Ards peninsula and the Strangford constituency is the same today as it was 10 years ago. How can a roads budget remain at the same level as it was 10 years ago? Those roads are 10 years older and in need of repair. The population has grown and road traffic has increased. There is no logic whatsoever to the roads budget. The spending review does not address the issue of road provision.

Mr Storey: This is a point that we wanted to raise earlier with the hon Member from the SDLP. There has been a £50 million reduction in the Roads Service's maintenance budget. Under the Review of Public Administration, roads provision will become the responsibility of the new councils. Does the Member agree that one of the first tasks for the new super-councils will be to raise the rates in order to fix this basic asset, which will be neglected between now and 2009 because of that financial deficit?

Mr Shannon: After many lean years for the roads budget, the new super-councils — should there be seven, 11 or 15 — will be facing hard times. It is only fair that councillors who are responsible for roads are given a budget to address the issue. The Member is absolutely right.

The spending review should include a job-creation strategy, whether it comes from Invest Northern Ireland or directly from Government, that gives people the opportunity to find jobs.

This week, again, there have been more job losses in my constituency. One small village with a population of 800 or 900 people has lost 120 jobs over the past two years. Across the area, 3,000 jobs have gone. The onus is on Invest Northern Ireland and the Government to deliver a strategy and a plan of action that creates opportunities for people in my constituency and which also creates wealth and gives an economic boost to the area. That is not happening, and I find that very worrying.

With regard to the spending review, farming, fishing and rural affairs have suffered under Governments over time. Farmers tell me that when they apply for grants and premiums, although there is a timescale within which they should receive the money, they often have to wait three months or six months longer for payment. The faceless bureaucrats do not see the hardship on the farms; they do not see that the grant is part of the farm's budget and is needed to keep the farm going and to pay the bank on time. It should be possible in this age, with modern technology, to make grant payments within the timescale. The Department of Agriculture and Rural Development should have a system that is capable of doing that.

The backbone of my constituency is farming and fishing. People working in those industries already face severe hardships under the current spending budget and under this review. I hope that the Government will ensure that the extra taxes that they propose to raise will be poured into the budget of this country for spending in this country, and for spending in our constituencies on issues that really matter, such as children's education, the safeguarding of jobs and doing the best for the people whom we represent. This spending review, set up by the Government, does not deliver that. Therefore, we must register our concerns about, and our opposition to, the review.

Mr Hillis: Like others, I begin by registering my complete dissatisfaction at the way in which we have been expected to debate this motion with less than 48 hours' notice. The Secretary of State continues to treat us with considerable disrespect.

Although the wording of the motion is somewhat cumbersome, and the sentiments perhaps a little presumptuous, it is nonetheless an important debate. Everything hinges on money. Quite a few Members have made important points in the debate, and I am glad that a few Members are left in the Chamber as we continue. In the time that I have, I want to concentrate on the tourism industry and explain why I believe that spending on this area must be high on the priority list in any future Programme for Government.

I sometimes feel that tourism is regarded as something of a bit player in the greater scheme of things in Northern Ireland. It must be emphasised that tourism is a growing part of the Northern Ireland economy, with much potential for further growth. Sadly, at present, income from tourism represents only about 2% of gross domestic product (GDP), which is a big contrast with the Republic of Ireland, or with Scotland or England, where tourism represents between 5% and 6% of GDP.

With imagination and vision, we can build on previously untapped assets. I agree with Mr Shannon, particularly with regard to events around 12 July. For example, we are now in the midst of what some people would call the "marching season", and for years tourists have been told that it is a bad idea to visit Northern Ireland during the Twelfth, presumably because the nasty orangemen would be on the march. The overt message was that something nasty might happen to the hapless tourist. To my mind, that is absolute piffle.

I am disappointed at the negative remarks made earlier by the leader of the Alliance Party. For years others and I have advocated that the Twelfth celebrations be marketed as a major tourist attraction. Why not? It makes complete sense.

It would never threaten the carnival of Rio, but it is unique; there is plenty of colour, music, pageant, culture. Given a chance, it could be a major tourist attraction.

My party and I welcome the fact that money has now been set aside to market the Twelfth as a major festival. My hon friend the Lord Laird of Artigarvan and I find it extremely difficult to understand why tourism that supports Ulster Scots is not more readily available. There are about 22 million Scots Irish living in America, many of whom are anxious to come back to their homeland for a visit. Ulster is the only part of the world where one can get Ulster Scots culture. Why is there not much more targeted funding to allow us to tap into this market? An opportunity awaits us from which everyone — and I mean everyone — can benefit.

Since 1994, the total visitor numbers have grown by 60%, with revenue increasing by 80%. Now tourism is expected to contribute well over £400 million to the Northern Ireland economy. Members will agree that those are positive figures. It would appear, however, that the financial mandarins are intent on jeopardising the excellent work of our tourism industry. I base this statement on the fact that the draft 'Priorities and Budget 2006-08' did not include any resources for some areas of tourism additional to the bid made by the Northern Ireland Tourist Board of £1.5 million — not an enormous amount — for regional tourism partnerships (RTPs).

These partnerships have critical responsibility for regional promotion and for the development of the regional tourism product. They market the regions, sell city breaks, and attract cruise ships, conferences and activity breaks. The co-ordination of effort and resources across local councils and individual industry members means that the RTPs' key successes have helped remedy duplication and inefficiency in the delivery of tourism. Since their creation they have proved a positive example of public-private sector partnership, and now over 2,000 private/commercial sector business members are in partnerships with RTPs.

Much public sector investment in RTPs has to date been from EU funds that came to an end in March of this year. The current Budget made no provision for these partnerships beyond that date, leaving a void when the EU funding ceased. This was filled by the industry, local government and from the NITB funding, leaving less in its already depleted budget.

The Northern Ireland Tourist Industry Confederation explained the gravity of this situation recently in its response to the draft 'Priorities and Budget 2006-08':

"Failure to direct public sector funding to RTPs will be extremely negative to the tourist industry."

The Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment tourism spend has, I admit, risen from £184 million in 2004-05 to £219.5 million in 2007-08. This increase is very welcome indeed.

2.30 pm

Those figures do not include the funding that has been ring-fenced for the Giant's Causeway visitor centre. While I am on that subject, I appeal to all concerned organisations to quicken the pace on the visitor centre. I am glad that a design has been chosen, but we have been without a visitor centre for some time.

The global environment for tourism is highly competitive. I have had the pleasure of visiting the World Travel Market in London on more than one occasion. It is quite frightening to see what is on offer in the holiday market. Eastern European destinations are now posing great competitive pressure, and the EU in general is losing out to the Far East and the Middle East, a trend that is likely to continue. If Northern Ireland is to compete in this environment, it is essential to have an investment structure to meet the needs set out in the Northern Ireland Tourist Board's Strategic Framework for Action 2004-07.

Unfortunately, many of Northern Ireland's departmental budgets and priorities mention tourism as an add-on, rather than as an important sector of the economy. I sometimes think that tourism is the Cinderella of our economy. There must be adequate provision for, and sustainable investment in, our tourism industry in any future Programme for Government. If that does not happen, I will have serious concerns for Northern Ireland plc.

Mr Dallat: I will begin on a positive note and assume that everyone here wants to get back to work as quickly as possible in an all-inclusive power-sharing Assembly. In such circumstances, we need a Programme for Government that has the soundest financial control — public scrutiny. That has been sadly lacking for the past three and a half years of suspension.

Assuming that common sense prevails and a new Assembly can be formed, an audit strategy should be put in place to address issues relating to the management of money and risk assessments. Proper guidelines should also be put in place to show civil servants where their remit begins and ends.

The Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee in Westminster, Mr Edward Leigh, influenced by talks that he has had with United States congressmen, has been calling for improvements in financial scrutiny. Mr Leigh has drawn to the attention of Parliament the willingness of the National Audit Office to support the Committee. From my experience as a member of several Committees in the previous Assembly, we would have welcomed such support and co-operation from the Northern Ireland Audit Office. That would have given us the opportunity to address previous errors and failings.

We have not been allowed to take any interest in the financial affairs of the Assembly, but there is a budget of more than £1 billion of taxpayers' money. It is surely incredible and unique in the world of finance that a corporation, if I may call the Assembly that, is responsible for so much money, yet exercises no financial control over it.

However, it is much worse than that: the 108 Members continue to be paid, while those who refuse to reach agreement to run the Assembly complain about plans to increase rates, introduce water charges and threaten the very future existence of the manufacturing industry. Only yesterday, children with special needs were told that their rights to equality were finished, and today there is a commissioner crawling all over the books of the South Eastern Education and Library Board to do just that.

Several investigations are under way relating to the manner in which public money has been spent. Everything must be done to ensure that any future Programme for Government is not impeded by costly investigations that could be prevented if proper strategies are in place to ensure that Members have the appropriate written and oral briefings from the Audit Office.

How much longer must we rely on journalists to uncover what is wrong with the financial affairs of this Assembly? When will we derail the gravy train that rumbles on bringing direct-rule Ministers, senior civil servants, and other heads of non-departmental public bodies to the four corners of the earth for reasons that are ill defined and poorly justified?

Again, on a positive note, there is an opportunity to enhance the work of the Public Accounts Committee. This is particularly important because we must review the practice where public expenditure is reviewed after the event, rather than before the horse has bolted. In order to achieve that, I would like to see an approach made to the Comptroller and Auditor General at the Northern Ireland Audit Office to ensure that the Public Accounts Committee can play its full part in strengthening financial scrutiny within its current terms of reference. This is vital if we are to address issues relating to risks to future delivery that can be assessed and managed.

A new Assembly must avoid the embarrassments where millions of pounds are wasted on projects such as DeLorean, the sheep annual premium scheme and various other training schemes that did not achieve their purpose. We must bring to an end the scandals of millions of pounds being spent on transatlantic trips of questionable value to the ratepayer.

It is equally important that any future Programme for Government, and the money attached to it, makes clear where it is appropriate, if at all, to accept hospitality such as dinners, galas, days at the races, and so on. Indeed, the whole area of public procurement or contracts, worth many millions of taxpayers' money — has been undermined by scandals relating to hospitality and gifts.

I do not propose to go into any detail because there are ongoing police inquiries, and I would not wish to prejudice those in any way. However, if the Assembly were up and running there would at least be an opportunity to ask searching questions about who is on the gravy train, how much they have benefited from it, and when it will stop.

Mr Storey: Does the hon Member for East Londonderry also agree about, and include in that list, the abolition of the Civic Forum, which cost the previous Assembly and the taxpayers of Northern Ireland over £2 million and delivered absolutely nothing?

Mr Dallat: I am happy to say that the Civic Forum was a splendid organisation. [Laughter.]

The Civic Form took up the issue of literacy and numeracy — a matter very close to my heart — and it produced a splendid report. Given that 25% of the population, or 250,000 people, in the North, leave school with the lowest skills in reading and writing, I do not understand why it is a laughing matter.

All those issues must be worked on so that any new Assembly has the mechanisms ready to roll when it takes over responsibility for the Programme for Government — that is if it is serious about it and does not find it a joke.

In conclusion, one of the first tasks is to draw up the criteria for an effective internal audit mechanism, and the involvement of the Northern Ireland Audit Office is crucial. So, too, is the strengthening of the work of the Assembly's Public Accounts Committee, and this would entail a change in its terms of reference.

The Committee on the Preparation for Government should devote time to examining the current procedures, look at best practice in other jurisdictions and have in place mechanisms that will radically change current procedures, which are more about shutting the stable door after the horse has bolted, rather than ensuring that there are controls in place internally that would prevent scandals, embarrassments and bad practice in the first place.

However, much depends on how sincere we are about taking responsibility for the Programme for Government.

Nothing that I have heard recently indicates that there is any real hope that political morality is about to dawn on this Assembly. In the meantime, credibility is fast going out the window, public patience is at breaking point, and much of what I have said is falling on deaf ears. People refuse to listen, and minds cannot comprehend that we have moved on.

This may be our last opportunity to convince the world that we really care, but I doubt if anyone will be convinced that there is any real desire to take responsibility for what we are paid to do. Perhaps I am wrong; I hope that I am wrong. Many people feel sick at the behaviour of elected representatives who are blocking the democratic rights of people to take charge of their own affairs. Today, we have had a lot of hot air from the DUP and cold water from Sinn Féin.

Madam Speaker: The next Member to speak is George Ennis. This is his maiden speech, so please show him the usual courtesy.

Mr Ennis: Thank you, Madam Speaker, for those kind words.

I welcome the opportunity that this Assembly has been given to discuss the comprehensive spending review. The review covers much too wide a range of subjects for me to attempt to cover in this short speech.

Members have raised many important issues already. In order to benefit the economy in the best way, the comprehensive spending review must be directed at the areas of greatest importance and those that will deliver the greatest return. The case against the removal of industrial derating has been put in the Chamber already, and I fully support that case. Like industrial derating, the issue of corporation tax has been raised many times in the Assembly, and in other forums, in recent months. However, we must continue to discuss the issue. The comprehensive spending review should focus on issues that must be addressed in order to make Northern Irish businesses more competitive. If we are to deliver this world-class Northern Ireland that is often spoken about, we must recognise that corporation tax is a barrier to achieving that most laudable of aims.

Northern Ireland faces many different challenges to those faced in the rest of the United Kingdom, because of the land border. A review of corporation tax levels is needed so that we are not placed at a competitive disadvantage to our neighbours. However, that is not the be-all and end-all; that measure will not miraculously jump-start the Northern Ireland economy. It must be part of a broader plan and a strategic approach adopted in areas such as the comprehensive spending review. That review can target investment at the most important areas and stimulate high-quality investment in the local economy, which will then pay the highest dividends.

Government cannot continue to use the argument of cost to justify any reluctance in this area. We are not asking for a blank cheque or an unquantifiable return from investment. This would be a strategic investment in the future of Northern Ireland, leading to Northern Ireland positioning itself among the best places in the world in which to invest, and bringing in the spin-off benefits that such a position would create.

Some small steps have already been taken. For instance, the last Budget increased the research and development tax allowance to firms above the current small and medium-sized enterprises' research and development tax credit threshold. Such mechanisms will deliver investment to Northern Ireland, but it will be a guaranteed investment, with a high-quality reward. Such investment must be targeted through mechanisms such as the comprehensive spending review.

We must encourage other ventures — for example, knowledge-transfer partnerships. For some time, our universities have been involved with such partnerships, which can deliver information and expertise to the business and private sectors. Those partnerships are of particular use to businesses that previously have not invested in research and development, and Northern Ireland companies are low in research and development financing.

2.45 pm

They are also a way for smaller businesses to make use of high-quality knowledge, with direct benefit to their business. The Department of Trade and Industry currently provides 60% of the funding for knowledge-transfer partnerships for small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs). As much encouragement as possible should be given to SMEs to participate in those schemes and the benefits should be made clear to them. An increase in support to businesses, particularly smaller businesses and those not previously involved in that scheme, could help to encourage further participation.

Similarly, those on the other side of the partnership must be fully supported to enable them to help as many businesses as possible. Support must be given to ensure adequate resources on the academic side of the partnerships to deliver the knowledge and expertise to those businesses that can be encouraged to take up the offer.

Although the main focus of knowledge-transfer partnerships is often through universities, some further education colleges are already involved in such programmes. Different businesses have different needs, and not all will require the high-level expertise of the university sector. Improving the networks between local business and further education colleges can help to bring businesses into the system at a relevant level and on a scale that is manageable for small businesses.

All those proposals could help to increase research and knowledge in Northern Ireland's business sector. Everyone knows that the public sector plays much too great a role in the economy; that will not be turned around overnight. It will require a strategic focus from the Assembly and at least a medium-term investment in those areas that will deliver the best returns for Northern Ireland plc. Outside the political process, the economy is the most important aspect on which Government must focus if any semblance of stability is to be achieved.

I hope that notice is taken of the motion and of this afternoon's debate in the Chamber. We remain to be convinced that previous debates have been taken on board, but we, as elected Members, must continue to put forward our case. I hope too that the correct strategic approach to developing the economy can be put in place.

Rev Dr Robert Coulter: I have learned from my engineering experience that, when it comes to this time in the afternoon, the longer the spoke the greater the tyre.

I support Members who said that this is no way to operate an Assembly. It shows a flagrant disregard for the seriousness of the public business that we are trying to conduct. At the heart of the problem lies a total lack of meaningful consultation, and behind that lies a lack of respect, verging on contempt, for the Assembly. I appeal to all Members to recognise that we have it in our power to end the Secretary of State's control over all those matters that are so vital to the interests of our constituents.

Lack of consultation is also at the heart of what I have to say about the spending reviews of 2004 and 2007. The point is that direct-rule Ministers produced those reviews without consulting the Assembly. Indeed, MLAs were summoned to the Long Gallery to be told the details of important aspects of the spending reviews — and that was after the event had been publicly announced and the details given to the press. That shows scant regard for the democratic process.

There are important items that are not catered for in the spending review, with particular reference to my own party brief, which is health. To begin with, the failure of the Review of Public Administration to separate primary and community care budgets from hospital budgets will mean that hospital budgets will continue to drain resources and starve primary and community care of the funds needed. That, of course, runs counter to Government policy, which is to boost preventative medicine. The best way to do that would be by funding primary and community care separately from the hospitals.

Leaving primary and community care at the end of the queue after hospitals makes it an "Aunt Sally" service, and fatally undermines the whole process of the Review of Public Administration with regard to health services. We should demand that that situation be reviewed at the earliest opportunity, before it is set in stone and we create another service that will go wrong at the planning stage. I call on the Secretary of State to ring-fence primary and community care budgets as a matter of urgency.

Secondly, with the central trauma centre being located in Belfast, extra demands will inevitably be placed on the Northern Ireland Ambulance Service, for which additional provision must be made. I call for the establishment and proper funding of an air ambulance service to ferry seriously ill patients to the new central trauma centre. Northern Ireland is the only part of the United Kingdom that does not have a dedicated air ambulance service. That is an absolute necessity if we are not to abandon whole swathes of rural Northern Ireland to inadequate emergency cover. I speak here of Tyrone, the county of my birth. The western and northern parts of Northern Ireland will not have adequate cover in an emergency. We have not been consulted, and this matter has not been properly budgeted for.

I draw the Assembly's attention to two salient points in relation to health budgets. First, the Bamford Review of Mental Health and Learning Disability (Northern Ireland) spoke of serious deficiencies in investment in mental health in Northern Ireland compared to Great Britain. That underinvestment affects the real lives of real people, especially in view of the suicide rates here among young men.

Thirdly, it is important to note that the Appleby Report of 2004 stated that an additional 7% is needed in general health budgets to meet all needs. The common theme that emerges from these matters is that there is no substitute for the democratic control of public business by this democratically elected Assembly. I appeal, therefore, to the Secretary of State to give the Assembly control of its own agenda. It is only by doing that that some order can be brought into the conduct of public affairs in Northern Ireland.

Mr B Bell: Does the hon Member agree that in any future Programme for Government or any future spending programme, provision should be made by the Northern Ireland Assembly for free care for elderly people, similar to that which pertains in Scotland?

Rev Dr Robert Coulter: When one comes to my age one can identify with those sentiments. My party and I would fully support the idea of free personal care for the elderly.

Mr A Maginness: I had a dream last night. The dream was that we were in this Assembly on 25 November. The Benches were full, but I saw four figures hugging one another, glad-handing and clapping one another on the back. Who were they?

Madam Speaker: I must point out, Mr Maginness, that that day is a Saturday. What about Monday 27 November? [Laughter.]

Mr A Maginness: You have ruined the punchline. It was a dream, so I should be permitted a bit of poetic licence, Madam Speaker.

The four figures were Willie McCrea, Alex Maskey, Mervyn Storey and Gerry Kelly. Where is Mervyn? I see that he is not here. They were hugging one another and patting one another on the back and asking, "What Ministry do you have?" They walked out of the Chamber down the corridor to room 21 to meet with Ian Paisley, the First Minister, and Gerry Adams, the Deputy First Minister.

Dr McCrea: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Can Members really lead us down the path of fantasy? Surely we should be debating reality.

Madam Speaker: That was not a point of order, but I would like Mr Maginness to continue.

Mr A Maginness: Of course, there are historical precedents for such events. Brian Faulkner, John Hume, Gerry Fitt and Paddy Devlin all shared the same Cabinet table in the power-sharing Administrations in which they worked together for the good of the people of Northern Ireland.

That was my dream. Of course it is not true, but come 25 November it could be the reality, and I hope that it will be. However, it will not come true if the DUP continues with its obstructionism and Sinn Féin continues with its abstentionism. We have the two great negatives: the negativity of Sinn Féin and that of the DUP.

You can whinge all that you want today, and you have had an absolutely cracking session of whinging. The Secretary of State has been so badly kicked that he is barely conscious. He has been kicked, stoned and generally derided and ridiculed. Why? It is because he exercises power. You could exercise that power if tomorrow you signed on the dotted line and said to Gerry Adams and the rest of them that you will form a power-sharing Executive for the good of the people of Northern Ireland.

Mr Nesbitt: When the Member talked about our whinging, he spurred me on to ask a question. Although I have just come in, I wish to note —

Mr A Maginness: I was not talking about you.

Mr Nesbitt: I did not say that you were. However, I noted that you praised the Government of the Brian Faulkner era of many years ago. Do you agree that the Government that was formed then, although it was short term, was formed on the basis of a voluntary coalition between the SDLP and unionism?

Mr A Maginness: Let me put it this way: the notion of power sharing is fundamental to remedying a divided society. All the parties, including Brian Faulkner's, accepted that power sharing was fundamental to the future. I do not care whether you call that a voluntary coalition or an involuntary coalition: it was a power-sharing coalition. That is the fundamental objective for all of us if we want to reform this society and create a sustained peace. We must create a power-sharing Executive if we want to create harmony instead of disharmony and tolerance instead of intolerance.

That is the only way forward, folks. We can say goodbye to any form of power unless it is shared. That is the message that the Secretary of State and all reasonable people in the community are sending to you.

Mr Donaldson: With all due respect to the Member, that is not the message that the Secretary of State is sending us. If the message were simply that we should form a power-sharing Executive, we could do that with the Member's party tomorrow.

The message is very different: we can have a power-sharing Executive only if it comprises a range of parties, including Sinn Féin. The Member knows the difficulty that we have with that. We are not against the principle of power sharing; we simply need to know that the criminality, violence and intimidation, which happen in his constituency and in mine, are at an end.

3.00 pm

Mr A Maginness: All the significant elements that make up the political landscape of this Assembly and this society must be included in government — it is as simple as that.

You cannot exclude a significant section of the political community in Northern Ireland. You cannot do that and hope for stability and to progress to a new and dynamic society in which there is real peace and harmony. If you think otherwise, you are quite wrong. You must be mad if you think that the SDLP will suddenly say, “Aha, that is the solution to the problem. We will form a voluntary coalition” — as you call it — “with the unionist parties, and that will solve the problem”.

Mr Donaldson: I remind the Member that, in the previous Assembly, his party sought to exclude the DUP from the Executive; therefore, it is not true to say that the SDLP has been consistent on this issue. Were the SDLP consistent, it would accept the principle that there can be no Executive without the DUP.

Mr A Maginness: The Member is wrong. The SDLP fought long and hard to achieve power sharing. From the early 1970s and right through the 1980s and 1990s, that was our political objective. We fought long and hard to achieve that and to bring everybody together, including the DUP. We never told the Ulster Unionists to exclude the DUP. You should know that, because you were in the Ulster Unionists at the time. Perhaps your memory is fading. However, every significant element of political opinion in Northern Ireland must be included in the power-sharing arrangements.

Mr McFarland: Do I take from the Member’s exhortation that all parties should form a Government now and that his party is comfortable with going into government tomorrow with Sinn Féin, which is clearly not dedicated to law and order and which does not support policing? I understood the SDLP’s position to be that it would not go into government with Sinn Féin until that party supported law and order. Is that still the case?

Mr A Maginness: It is quite simple, Madam Speaker. If the opportunity arises, we in the SDLP would form an Administration with the DUP, the Ulster Unionists and Sinn Féin tomorrow. We have not set preconditions for Sinn Féin or any other political party. Of course Sinn Féin should sign up to the new policing arrangements; it has been disgraceful and irresponsible in not supporting them.

Indeed, in many areas of Belfast and elsewhere throughout Northern Ireland we see the result of the fact that there is a policing vacuum, which has been caused in part by Sinn Féin’s irresponsibility. People are suffering as a result of that vacuum. Yes, Sinn Féin should sign up to policing, and we want it to do that, but we do not make it a precondition to establishing an Executive.

I have no criticism of your raising all the issues that you have talked about today. It is right and proper that you do so, because you are concerned about your constituents and about the future of the Northern Ireland economy. However, if we want to deal with those issues, the only way in which to tackle them is to get to the very heart of the political problem here. How is power to be transferred to you, as public representatives, in a way that includes everyone of significance in this Building and in this Assembly? That is the central issue with which you as politicians must deal. I return to my dream — of course it was a dream. Rev William McCrea said that it was a fantasy, but I do not think that it was.

It could well come true, although perhaps not on 25 November.

Unless you face up to the reality of power sharing, we will not move forward as a community. We will not move forward as politicians and exercise real power. Also, in part, you, by the paralysis that you have brought to the political system, are causing —

Madam Speaker: Please draw your remarks to a close.

Mr A Maginness: In part, you are causing the very things that you are criticising today: the rates increases; the problems with derating; and the difficulties in relation to expenditure and education etc. You are partly responsible for that because of your inability to face up to the political realities.

Madam Speaker: Members should really speak through me and not refer to one another as “you”.

Mr Beggs: In January the Secretary of State launched his comprehensive spending review of Northern Ireland Departments. That review has been repeated in other regions of the United Kingdom and in other Departments that are not controlled in the Northern Ireland block grant. Therefore it is a very encompassing review, and we must bear that in mind.

On several occasions the Secretary of State has highlighted the over-dependence on public sector funding in Northern Ireland. It is right that we re-examine our spending and our priorities in Northern Ireland. However, Government must also examine the wider policies in the United Kingdom that can adversely affect this region in particular.

Ulster Unionists support that reassessment of how Government does its business. We must attempt to reduce bureaucracy in the Civil Service in Northern Ireland so that more money can be spent on front-line services such as health and education, and to enable the Northern Ireland economy to grow and to be sustainable.

As my colleague Esmond Birnie said, that will become increasingly important in future. In the past few years we have experienced relatively large increases in public expenditure, and in future that expenditure is likely to be rather lean.

Public service must be about making a difference to the quality of life in Northern Ireland. It should not be about frustrating the public and the many skilled and hard-working civil servants by requiring high levels of administration and mountains of paperwork to be completed. That was well illustrated recently in the Long Gallery when the Ulster Farmers' Union (UFU) provided a pile of documents that was about a foot high that each farmer must read in order to complete their paperwork. There must be a review of how the Civil Service process is completed in Northern Ireland. It must be sensible, and it must be lean.

The Secretary of State has also criticised the over-reliance on public-sector funding in Northern Ireland. However, that must be set in context. Northern Ireland has suffered from 30 years of violence. That resulted in a loss of investment and in higher policing and security costs. The relatively high levels of organised crime in Northern Ireland inhibit business, and they affect us all. We must support the necessary funding for the police, the Assets Recovery Agency (ARA) and Customs and Excise. Government should also reassess their policies, which on some occasions have created opportunities for criminals.

Although we welcome the increased numbers of customs officers in Northern Ireland, would it not be much better to harmonise fuel duties? Sir Reg Empey suggested that idea in January, and the Northern Ireland Affairs Select Committee recently supported it. That would end fuel smuggling at source by eliminating the profit. A result would be achieved much more simply.

Sir Reg Empey: Does the Member agree that the funding that could be saved from the roughly 164 customs officers, plus all the policing time, could free up some of the Northern Ireland Office (NIO) budget to honour the commitments that it made to provide resources for the new policing college in Cookstown?

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Beggs: All the parties in the Chamber would certainly support that. It is dreadful that such an important decision has been delayed. The future training of officers is being inhibited by the lack of funding. The Treasury must address that urgently.

During the troubles, relatively few private sector investments were made. Many of our brightest young people chose to take their skills elsewhere. We do not necessarily need less public-sector spending, but we do need more private-sector investment and employment. The Government must review their policies, which should encourage and support the private sector.

With regard to taxation, Northern Ireland's land border with another EU country means that it can be more adversely affected by neighbouring fiscal regimes than can other UK regions. I ask that the Secretary of State and the Treasury take that into consideration when determining tax levels in Northern Ireland. Careful adjustment could even, in some instances, increase the Treasury's income from Northern Ireland taxes. For example, the high level of excise duty on fuels means that those who live in border areas choose, legally, to fill their vehicles south of the border. Moreover, the opportunity to deal with fuel laundering is being missed.

There is a need to reduce corporation tax levels and to increase R&D opportunities in Northern Ireland. As other Members have said, that is an area of concern. Research and development is largely being led by the universities, and there is an urgent need to increase the level of funding in the private sector. Without that, the future of our industry is questionable. We must be at the cutting edge; our products must compete in the global market.

The Northern Ireland section of the Irish Congress of Trade Unions (ICTU) recently advocated diverting higher levels of corporation tax in order to fund additional research and development. I believe, as do many of my colleagues, that this idea has much merit; it might overcome the Treasury's apparent reluctance to reduce Northern Ireland's corporation tax levels to those in the Republic of Ireland. Anything to improve Northern Ireland's competitiveness and encourage investment in R&D and investment by industry must be welcomed. I ask the Secretary of State to pursue that vigorously with the Treasury.

With regard to industrial rates, the success of the manufacturing sector is vital to the Northern Ireland economy as a whole. Many service-sector jobs are dependent on money that was initially generated by the manufacturing industry. What would happen if the industrial jobs were lost? It is clear that all those jobs are interrelated.

There is the potential for some companies to relocate to the Republic of Ireland, which is seen as more business-friendly. Why should Invest Northern Ireland be allowed to spend millions of pounds in encouraging inward investment, when the full rates proposed for industrial premises have the potential to export or end many existing industrial jobs?

The Northern Ireland Manufacturers Focus Group's campaign to cap manufacturing rates had the unanimous support of all of the Assembly Members present at the recent debate on the subject. I urge the Secretary of State, even at this stage, to heed that.

I support my colleague Norman Hillis, and many other Members, in the view that we must build tourism opportunities in Northern Ireland. Our gross domestic product for tourism is approximately 2%; we are missing out on the levels of tourism experienced in the rest of the United Kingdom and in the Republic of Ireland, where it is closer to 6%.

The Twelfth of July should be a community festival. It used to be, and there is no reason for it not to be again. There was, of course, disruption, organised for political purposes, and the sooner that Sinn Féin turns off those that it unleashed, the better for everyone in the community and for our entire society.

On electricity, my colleague Esmond Birnie indicated his concern at the lack of an announcement about the cost-reduction package. Northern Ireland suffered as a result of the highly profitable electricity privatisation contracts, which were sold at inflated values to the benefit of the Chancellor. Business users still await the support promised by the former direct-rule economy Minister, Ian Pearson. When will that cost reduction come?

Another report that gave me concern was that produced by the Commissioner for Victims and Survivors.

The report states that, for the past eight years, some £44 million had been used to support victims and survivors of the troubles. The physical and psychological damage inflicted by the troubles must be addressed, given that 3,500 murders and almost 50,000 injuries have been recorded. The individuals and families concerned must be helped. However, there is no long-term strategic plan for victims and survivors, and the current proposals could result in the existing limited support being reduced dramatically. That situation must be rectified.

Although I welcome the opportunity to debate the priorities contained in the spending review, I am concerned about the absence of Northern Ireland Scrutiny Committees in which we would have had a chance to get to grips with the detail behind the Budget. In the absence of those Committees, it is difficult to be fully knowledgeable about the subject. However, I hope that the Secretary of State listens. Regrettably, I fear that he may simply note the Official Report.

Mrs Foster: The SDLP Member for North Belfast told us that devolution of power to this Assembly lies at the heart of the problem. He is not correct, of course. The criminal and paramilitary actions of Sinn Féin/IRA, its inactions in not supporting policing and justice, and the fact that it will not identify the graves of the disappeared are the issues that lie at the heart of the problem. I would have thought that the Member would have recognised that those issues lie at the heart of the problem and that they continue to concern people.

Like my colleagues, I want to register my disgust at the way in which the Secretary of State has treated the House — yet again. He treats the House, and Members, with contempt. By implication, he also treats those who have elected us with contempt. A motion has been foisted on us that is so broad that there has been little continuity in the debate. I regret that.

Money seems to fascinate the Secretary of State, be it the comprehensive spending review or the ability of members of my party to sustain themselves after 24 November if agreement is not reached. I want to put on record — should the Secretary of State take the time to read the Official Report — that he can carry out as many secret assessments as he likes, but he must realise that monetary considerations will have no impact on the decisions to be taken this autumn. The way in which that issue was spun to the media shows that the Secretary of State knows nothing about what motivates me, my party colleagues and, even more alarmingly, the majority of Northern Irish people who vote for the parties here. That is a pretty damning indictment of a man who has been Secretary of State for Northern Ireland for quite some time.

Ethnic minorities face difficulties in my constituency and throughout Northern Ireland. Before I am prevented from speaking for not addressing the motion, I should point out that there is a spending review implication in relation to that issue. Last month in Dungannon, at a meeting of local residents who felt frustrated at the lack of social housing in the town, views were expressed that caused me concern. Houses that are on the market for sale and for rent are being snapped up by investors and developers, resulting in first-time buyers being priced out of the market. Those houses are let to people from ethnic backgrounds who have come to Northern Ireland to work in local factories and to provide employers with quality employees. For monetary gain, those developers pack the houses with 10 to 12 people, which not only exploits the scarce housing situation in Dungannon but exploits those from ethnic backgrounds. Those landlords charge rent per head, and if 10 people are living in a house at £80 per head, per week, it is difficult for young couples to compete in that market.

This, of course, has the knock-on effect of alienating young indigenous people in the local community and causing community tension, something that, unfortunately, as we have seen from recent reports, is on the rise.

How should the Government, and indeed all of us, deal with this? First, I want to congratulate local police for the stand that they have taken and the drive that they have shown in dealing with ethnic tensions. However, Government finance has a part to play. Last year the Government launched a racial equality strategy but, unfortunately, little has been done, and negligible resources have been set aside to deal with what was to be a cross-departmental action plan.

Recently, at a meeting with the Northern Ireland Council for Ethnic Minorities the chief executive of that organisation expressed his dismay at Government will to deal with what has become a large social issue in this country. My colleague Lord Morrow and I contacted the Minister for Social Development to seek a meeting in relation to the ongoing difficulties in Dungannon, in particular the housing issue, which is one of the key causes of problems in the area. We will push on that issue on behalf of those from the ethnic minority community and on behalf of those from the indigenous community who feel frustrated and alienated in their own local area.

Another issue that I wish to address with regard to Government spending — and colleagues would be surprised if I did not mention the west — is the need to see Northern Ireland as a whole and not as two halves. Other Members have addressed the disastrous consequences of the RPA for the west of Northern Ireland. This week, however, I was pleasantly surprised when I attended the launch of the fuel poverty strategy. In the Fuel Advisory Group's report, the first recommendation was that strategies to tackle fuel poverty should be rural proofed. I welcome that realisation and call upon the Government to acknowledge that in their action plan.

Infrastructure deficits are most acute in the south-west of Northern Ireland, and I call upon the Government, when considering the new investment strategy for Northern Ireland, to ensure that due consideration is given to areas such as Fermanagh and South Tyrone that urgently need a huge investment in roads infrastructure. The divisional roads office in the west has submitted new roads schemes for Fermanagh and South Tyrone, and I ask the Government to take due notice of those bids.

The west of Northern Ireland is falling behind, not because of the will of those of us who live there, but because of the Government's unwillingness to look at Northern Ireland as a whole rather than as two distinct halves. If the Northern Ireland Office is serious about sustainability and long-term growth, nothing less is required.

Mr Donaldson: While none of us likes the manner in which the Secretary of State called this debate, nevertheless any opportunity that public representatives have to at least address these issues is welcome, even if we do not have the power, at this stage, to do much about them. It is good that three of the main parties are here — and the Alliance Party was here earlier — but it is a matter of regret that, on an important issue of concern to the public, Sinn Féin is missing. It saddens me that the Secretary of State seems to give a veto to Sinn Féin on certain issues and that the party does not participate in debates in this Chamber, yet it chides other parties, including the DUP, for not seeking to make progress. It talks about the need for engagement, yet it will not engage on these issues. That is highly regrettable. Just as Sinn Féin abstains and absents itself from Westminster, it absents itself from this place. Its contribution on these matters is sadly lacking.

I turn to the issue of sport. With the World Cup coming to a conclusion and Wimbledon well on its way, many people will have been watching sport. That is an area in which we need to do more in Northern Ireland. Throughout the period of the troubles, sport in Northern Ireland was an activity that brought people together and it continues to bring people together across the community. It is something that we need to invest in.

We congratulate Italy and France on reaching the World Cup final, and we look forward to a good game.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Donaldson: Some of my happiest memories are of Northern Ireland doing well on two occasions when it got through to the World Cup finals. We need to invest in sport to get the best out of our sportsmen and sportswomen if Northern Ireland is to get back into the World Cup finals. We need proper training facilities and stadia.

Since my election to Parliament, I have campaigned for a national stadium. I have long believed that Northern Ireland needed a first-class facility. The Government considered all the options about where the new national stadium might be located; they have gone for the Maze site, which happens to be in my constituency. I welcome that prospect.

I wish that the debate would move on from location to the type of facility that we need. We politicians gripe about the need for spending money; the Government are offering the people of Northern Ireland a stadium, yet some people seem to want to look that gift horse in the mouth. I do not; I want to see the money used wisely, not only for this generation but for future generations of sportsmen and sportswomen, and I look forward to the day when the new stadium is open on the Maze site.

I was disappointed and a little surprised that the Member for South Antrim, Mr Burnside — who is no longer in his place — criticised the Maze project and favoured Belfast. The debate on location has moved on, but since Antrim and Newtownabbey, which are in his constituency, will form part of the new council that includes the Maze, I am amazed that he, as a public representative and an Assembly Member, should oppose a proposal that will bring benefits to the rate-payers whom he represents. I am sure that the point will not be lost on the Member for South Antrim, Rev Dr McCrea, who was victorious in the elections in 2005.

Mr Kennedy: Will the Member confirm that all members of the Democratic Unionist Party, wherever they are elected, share his enthusiasm for the Maze site?

[Laughter.]

Mr Donaldson: The Member will know that the DUP, as with all democratic parties, has a variety of opinions. The DUP, unlike the UUP, takes its seat on the Maze panel and is fully engaged in the project because we see the benefit of it for all the people of Northern Ireland. The leadership of the party decided that, since the location of the stadium had been settled, we had to move on. I hope that the Ulster Unionist Party will shortly join us on the panel and get on with the job of creating this facility. The DUP is consistent on the issue and is not sending out mixed signals, unlike the hon Member's party.

Turning now, Madam Speaker, to the issue of education, I join Members who today mentioned the South Eastern Education and Library Board, which is of great concern to me. We talked today about democracy, yet here is an example of dictatorship. The Secretary of State, the education Minister and the Northern Ireland Office have decided that the democratically expressed views of the elected representatives on the board are to be ignored. That is a matter for regret.

There are historical financial difficulties to which the Member for East Belfast sketched the background, as did the Member for Strangford. It is simply not good enough for the Government to introduce a commission into the South Eastern Education and Library Board, without allowing the issue to be more fully explored. I commend the councillors on that board: they have at heart the interests of the people that they represent — especially funding for vulnerable children who have special needs and funding for special-needs schools.

3.30 pm

It is entirely wrong for the Government to proceed in such a way.

Mr P Robinson: Since I last spoke on this issue, I have realised that there is a very set procedure with regard to appointments. There is a process whereby the Commission has to clear appointments and, even in emergency circumstances, where it needs to be informed. Will the hon Gentleman join me in calling for an open statement from the Government as to whether they complied with the appointments system that they set out, and, if they did not, that the appointments that have been made should be dissolved?

Mr Donaldson: The hon Member is absolutely right, and I thank him for making that point. We have asked for an urgent meeting with the Education Minister; that point must be clarified, because it smacks of a diktat. I listened to the Government's announcement last evening, and it was clear that the issue was pre-cooked and pre-determined. They had already decided that they were going to appoint commissioners and who they were going to be.

It smacks of the kind of attitude that we have had from the Government recently whereby, regardless of any political consensus, whether it is on education, industrial derating, water charges, planning laws or other issues, the Government will choose to ignore all that and simply press ahead with their own agenda. They lecture us on the need to achieve political consensus on the way forward, but when we do agree on issues that matter to the people that we represent, the Government choose to ignore it. That is regrettable.

The Democratic Unionist Party is a devolutionist party, and we want a devolved Administration back in Northern Ireland as soon as possible. Mr Maginness said that he would go into government if the opportunity arose — the key issue is how we determine what that opportunity is. There is no difference of opinion on this side of the Chamber about power sharing being the way forward. The hon Member should read the DUP's manifesto. We went to the country on the basis that the only form of government that would work in Northern Ireland is one that has the support of a majority on both sides of the community. We have accepted that, and that must mean that we work together in the Assembly to provide good government for the people of Northern Ireland.

The DUP would like to have moved forward immediately, and we have put to the SDLP the idea of a voluntary coalition supported by other parties in the Chamber. For its own reasons, the SDLP has decided that that is not the way forward. Therefore, if the only way forward is in an inclusive Executive, we need to know that everyone in that Executive meets the requirements for a commitment to exclusively peaceful and democratic means. We cannot afford to have another false dawn where we establish the Assembly and in six months' or a year's time it collapses again, because those who say that they are committed to peace and democracy cannot help themselves and return to criminality and involvement in violence and intimidation.

That is why the DUP wants to finish the job. We want to ensure that this time we get it absolutely right. We will not be tied down by timetables and deadlines.

It is important that we know that those who are in government with us support the police, the rule of law and abide by the rules of democracy. That is all that we ask, and I do not think that it is a big ask of any political party, that our partners in government should comply with the rules of democracy.

Let us work together to achieve that objective. It can be achieved, but it will take a lot more determination than we have seen so far, and it simply will not do for the Secretary of State to tell us to go into government on 24 November and deal with the issues later: we need to deal with them now.

Mr Dawson: I am very disappointed by the SDLP's view that the inclusion of IRA/Sinn Féin in the Executive would, in some way, be of economic benefit to Northern Ireland. That view is not shared by the parties in the Republic of Ireland, who are in no rush to include IRA/Sinn Féin in their Government, partly because of the economic nonsense expressed by IRA/Sinn Féin in their policy documents. For example, their document entitled 'Rights for All' states that everyone has the right to remuneration above the statutory minimum wage.

The damage potentially inflicted on our economy by the comprehensive spending review would be as nothing compared to having Sinn Féin in our Government trying to implement such a policy.

Consider also Sinn Féin's policy that there should be universal public services funded through direct and progressive taxation. That means that Sinn Féin is the party of high taxation. Its loud declaration outside the Chamber that it opposes the imposition of local taxes is laid bare, because it is the party of high taxation. Its stated policy is to increase tax, undermine the private sector and destroy economic advance in Northern Ireland — and, equally, in the Republic of Ireland.

Mr A Maginness: Is the hon Member saying that if Sinn Féin were to abandon its eccentric and nonsensical economic policies, he would be willing to accept it into an Administration?

Mr Dawson: Of course not. I share and am committed to the views of my party. The Member is back in his dream world once again.

It is also true that the only party standing in the way of establishing an economic committee in this House is Sinn Féin, and Dr Farren referred to that earlier. It seems that it has swapped its armed terrorism in Northern Ireland for economic terrorism.

With regard to the comprehensive spending review, one of the pivotal questions that must be answered is not only what services are going to be delivered, but how they will be delivered. We suffer from a huge amount of red tape and bureaucracy in Northern Ireland, and Members have referred to that already.

In his speech to the Fabian Society, the Secretary of State said that if "education, education, education" had been his Government's mantra, Northern Ireland's mantra was "bureaucracy, bureaucracy, bureaucracy". Of course, he failed to point out that it was the same Government implementing the bureaucracy here. I am sure that the Secretary of State would suggest that he has dealt with Government bureaucracy in what he has ambitiously called his "quango cull". However, as they have already said, Members in this House would disagree with him, given that over 60% of the unaccountable quangos will remain in existence even after his alleged quango cull.

Members will share the frustrations we have from time to time as each one of us tries to break through the barriers of bureaucracy, inefficiency, unresponsiveness and, sometimes, downright obstruction.

Mr Nesbitt: I am intrigued by a member of the DUP talking about getting rid of the quango cult and its inefficiency. Perhaps he would explain — and I choose my words very carefully so as to be accurate — why his party agreed in December 2004 that if any of its members became Ministers in an Executive, it would support the creation of an all-Ireland civic forum and an all-Ireland parliamentary forum, which are two quangos. I remind the Member that he was totally against a Northern Ireland civic forum. I would like some clarification on the quango dimension.

Mr Dawson: I am quite happy to respond to that. The hon Member does not point out that in December 2004 the DUP proposed an efficiency commission or panel that would examine all of the efficiency issues in relation to the Belfast Agreement and beyond, and, no doubt, we will return to that in the future.

Mr Donaldson: Does the Member agree that the two bodies that the hon Member for South Down referred to are not quangos? Quangos are non-governmental organisations that have powers, budgets, and so on: these are inter-parliamentary groups and not quangos, and they do not meet the definition of a quango. Did this party, Madam Speaker, not propose an efficiency commission to get rid of all the other unelected quangos that are not needed?

Mr Dawson: I thank the hon Member for his clarification. Given that time is moving on and that I have several other points to make, I will continue.

Whatever our political philosophies or party allegiances, I trust that the House can agree that the role of Government ought to be to deliver first-rate public services. All too often Government perceive that their goal is to invent new bureaucracies, more red tape and increasingly complex ways of governance, regardless of the costs.

Granted, Government acknowledged that there was a problem and set up the Review of Public Administration, but the review, as established in 2000 by the then Minister of the Environment from the Ulster Unionist Party, was fatally flawed because it did not concentrate on the bloated bureaucracy born out of the Belfast Agreement. My party has been alone in calling for a cull of superfluous spending, and a reduction in the size of this Assembly and in the number of Government Departments, along with other elements of our oversized central Government. However, I am pleased to say that in recent times large sections of the business community have risen to support our viewpoint. It is utterly unacceptable that, for no other reason than the appeasement of selfish political interests, the people of Northern Ireland endure an Administration the size and scale of which is unprecedented in the rest of the United Kingdom.

Can it be right, for example, that in a population of 1.7 million, there is an Assembly Member for every 15,700 constituents? Compare that to the Welsh Assembly, where there is a Member for every 48,300 constituents. I appreciate that my remarks may well have a hint of turkeys calling for Christmas — or, perhaps, given the Secretary of State's deadline, turkeys calling for Thanksgiving.

Likewise, with 11 Departments and provision for a twelfth, our Administration dwarfs those of Scotland and Wales. The savings to be made in those areas are far greater than any that will be generated by the RPA. In a written answer to a parliamentary question asked by my party colleague Gregory Campbell, the then Minister of the Environment, Angela Smith, said that the savings from the RPA would be between £140 million and £200 million — although I note from Members' comments today that the Government seem to be reneging on that commitment. We have estimated that by cutting the size of Government and Departments in Northern Ireland the expenditure saving could be in excess of £0.5 billion. The Government of Northern Ireland, whether devolved or direct rule, should be setting an example to the people of the Province. It is unacceptable to demand ever-increasing amounts of revenue in the form of higher rates, water charges or industrial rates to assist in funding for higher public spending while simultaneously doing nothing to curtail the size and cost of the highest tiers of our Government. We want investment in public services, but we do not want that investment to be wasted in bureaucracy, structures and administrations.

First and foremost, the Government must look at themselves before asking the people to pay a single extra penny in rates or water charges. Government have a duty to set an example by ensuring that bureaucracy, red tape and administration are stripped back to the bare minimum. Any restored Administration will face several hard choices: I would suggest that cutting the cost of Government is one of them. That is an easy choice and not to take it would be a dereliction of duty.

I note that we are approaching recess, and, in an effort to encourage new experiences and attitudes, particularly among my colleagues opposite —

A Member: And new dreams.

Mr Dawson: — new dreams and a better community for us all, I wish all Members a very happy, peaceful and enjoyable Twelfth. I assure the Members opposite that they would be very welcome at many of the demonstrations. To aid the tourism in Mr Hillis's area I can assure him that that most unique part of orangeism, the Independent Loyal Orange Institution, will be in Portrush on 12 July. I look forward to seeing him there.

3.45 pm

Madam Speaker: Adverts are not allowed.

Dr McCrea: I listened with care and interest to the speeches from Members on the SDLP Benches, but Mr Maginness's "I had a dream" speech took the biscuit. When I heard the Member for North Belfast utter those words, I thought that he was about to break into a broad American accent. I was not sure, either, whether he was going to continue in English or French, because he is used to speaking both languages — or rather, speaking English with a French accent. Nevertheless, I will continue in such a way that Mr Maginness will understand everything that I say.

The Secretary of State has shown a blatant disregard for Members of this Assembly. Before the summer recess, Members wanted to discuss and address a number of serious motions. However, the Secretary of State cast all those motions aside to enable him to present us with a motion on which he had decided. The motion is so wide-ranging that he knew that it would be impossible to home in on every issue.

However, it is important to mention some of those issues — for example, health. Some hospitals are closing and others are recommended for closure. Acute and maternity services are to be removed from the Mid-Ulster Hospital and Whiteabbey Hospital. The community has serious concerns: trolley waits in hospitals are a disgrace and the waiting lists for operations are unbelievable. The Secretary of State must listen to the voice of the community.

It is interesting to note that the Secretary of State is demanding consensus from all the political parties in Northern Ireland. Even if that were achieved, the Secretary of State, or the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, would continue to do what they wanted to do. There was consensus in mid-Ulster, but they were not willing to listen.

There is supposed to be care in the community, but many older people are blocking hospital beds when they could be in nursing homes in the community. Many elderly people are traumatised because they no longer receive the necessary attention. I pay tribute to all hospital staff who try to give them that attention. However, many staff are overworked and the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety seems to care little for their rights or needs.

The spending review also makes me think of education. The building of a new high school in Magherafelt, a new Rainey Endowed School and a new primary school has been announced. Promises have been made and budgets committed, but I want to know when they will be built.

When the Assembly was up and running, the controlled sector was discriminated against. The Sinn Féin/IRA Minister discriminated against those schools even though they were in his constituency. He was more concerned about providing finances for, and meeting the needs of, the maintained and integrated sectors. He completely closed his heart and mind to the needs of the controlled sector, especially the Protestant and unionist community. That is an absolute disgrace and an indictment on him.

Direct-rule Ministers have announced that those three new schools will be built, and I want to ensure that the money is committed and a commencement date set, so that the rights of those living and being educated in deplorable and despicable conditions are the same as those in the maintained and integrated sectors.

Take, for example, the announcement that the new police college, for which there great hopes and dreams, would be built in Cookstown. It would not only be for Northern Ireland, but would serve an international purpose. Yet, the Government has reneged on the financing of the project. All the promises and hot air from the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland and those in authority will not provide the necessary finance. They must allocate that money, and I appeal to the Secretary of State to listen to this House and ensure that the new police college will be built. The site is excellent, and I am absolutely thrilled that Cookstown was chosen. However, we must have the bricks and mortar; we must get the college up and running so that it can provide the up-to-date police training and services that are required.

We see throughout the Province the lack of infrastructure in roads, water and sewerage. It is a disgraceful situation. It is true that in the past, while England, Scotland and Wales had their infrastructures brought up to a modern standard, in Northern Ireland the money was allocated to dealing with the terrorist threat. We were denied the building of a proper infrastructure, and now that we are light years behind the rest of the United Kingdom, we are being asked to bear the burden of bringing those infrastructures into the modern era.

We have been waiting for the Magherafelt bypass for 35 years. Although there has been an acknowledgement of the need for it — and I am delighted with the work that my colleagues Mr P Robinson and Mr Campbell did as Ministers for Regional Development with the rural strategy to move that forward — it must be put on the programme and given a date for commencement, as must the Cookstown bypass.

We need to face the challenges. There has been no great injection of investment; neither Invest Northern Ireland nor its predecessors sent many investors to those areas. However, instead of complaining, the people there pulled themselves up by their bootstraps. Now they have practically the lowest unemployment rate in Northern Ireland. That is to be commended — but let us not strangle them. Let us ensure that the infrastructure is there to help them to move forward.

There is an urgent need in Northern Ireland for social housing, which seems to have gone by the board. The Government must take that issue seriously, because there are many young people in Northern Ireland who, because of the cost of housing, cannot afford to buy.

Then we think of agriculture, which is the backbone of Ulster life, and which affects every constituency. But because of a lack of urgency in the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development, many payments that should be made to farmers have been withheld. Claims should be settled and the bureaucracy should be eradicated. No one can underestimate or overstate the pain that has been suffered by the farming community.

There are many problems in the community.

I heard SDLP Members say that somehow we could wave a magic wand and devolution would be the answer. Let me make it abundantly clear: when we had devolved Government, the Assembly recommended closing the Mid-Ulster Hospital, the Whiteabbey Hospital and other hospitals in the west of the Province.

Madam Speaker: I ask the Member to draw his remarks to a close.

Dr McCrea: I am doing so.

It was that non-democratic Sinn Féin Minister who recommended the destruction of our good grammar-school education in the Province.

Therefore, we face challenges. We want devolution, but we are not willing to put terrorists, hoods and gangsters into Government. We have to be sure that we will have a restored democratic Government in Northern Ireland and that the day of criminality and paramilitarism is finished completely and that we are moving forward on the solid basis of democracy alone.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly notes the results of the Spending Review 2004 and the current Comprehensive Spending Review 2007 and their implications for the spending priorities for a Programme for Government to be agreed by a Northern Ireland Executive following its restoration on or before 24 November 2006. — [The Secretary of State.]

Madam Speaker: I shall refer the decision of the Assembly to the Secretary of State by sending him a note of the debate and of what has happened.

Adjourned at 3.56 pm.

Observing: Mr Jim Wells

The Committee met at 10.04 am.

(The Chairman (Mr Molloy) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Welcome to the meeting. Could everyone switch off their mobile phones, which may interfere with the Hansard recording?

Apologies were received from Michael McGimpsey, who is replaced by David McClarty; from Alasdair McDonnell, who is replaced by Patsy McGlone; and from Ian Paisley Jnr, who is replaced by Diane Dodds.

Members have the draft minutes of yesterday's meeting, 19 June. I wish to draw attention to the letter sent to the Clerk to the Assembly. We are awaiting a response in relation to the minutes of Friday's meeting, 16 June.

There is a typo at point 5, which should read: "10 am to 12.30 pm", not "2.30 pm".

Are there any other points? Can we agree the minutes?

Members have had time to read the minutes. Are there any points to raise?

Mr McFarland: Does the typo refer to "12.30 pm"?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Absolutely. Are there any other issues? Can we approve the minutes? Are we agreed?

Mr Morrow: I wish to raise a point about the minutes. It seems to be important that we record everybody's coming in and going out, but does that mean that everything stood still between their coming in and going out, because nothing seems to have happened? Why is it so important that we record everybody's going in and out, but we do not record what happened as they went in and out?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Convention works along the lines of who is in the room at the time of interruption. The Clerks take note only of points that had been noted or decisions made within that time. Under the new arrangements for taking minutes, that will vary.

Mr Morrow: The minutes state that Dr McDonnell left at 4 pm and came back at 4.06 pm; that he left at 4.08 pm and came back at 4.15 pm; and that he left at 4.31 pm and came back. Someone reading those minutes would assume that nothing happened while all that was going on.

Mr McFarland: Maurice is right. There is no correlation between Members leaving and the conversations. However, that is now solved because Hansard is here and will be recording minutes all the way through. The time Members leave the meeting will go into Hansard so the problem is now solved. However, it can cause confusion.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): It is the same with council minutes. They record whether people are in or out of the room, and issues may arise after members have left.

Mr Morrow: Yes, that is right. However, they also record what went on between the leaving and returning.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Yes. I will not say that nothing went on, but the conversation was regular within that period, and the rest of the minutes probably reveal that. However, as we deal with new issues, we will have different situations. Hansard is recording now so we will have a record of this meeting.

Is everyone happy?

Mrs D Dodds: Mr Deputy Speaker, I have one item. Do we have any indication when there will be something back from the Clerk to the Assembly?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The Clerk is working on that at the moment and will reply. However, there is no indication at this stage of when a reply will come back.

Mrs D Dodds: We asked yesterday for that to come back in time for this afternoon's meeting. Will that be possible?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Again, the Clerk will respond when a decision has been made. We have asked for that, but there has been no decision, as yet, on that.

Can we move on to the presentations from the parties? As agreed yesterday, that will be in alphabetical order, so the Alliance Party will be first.

Mr Ford: Thank you, Chairman. I want to make it clear at the outset that the Alliance Party wants to see a fully functioning Executive and Assembly working in this Building by 24 November, but we also believe that it is important that we do not seek to merely organise a quick fix over the coming months. We must address a number of fundamental weaknesses that exist within the operation of the agreement and which have been identified at different times since 1998, and ensure that whatever we put in place this autumn does not break down again easily. I think that the people of Northern Ireland would not forgive us if that were to happen.

The Alliance Party fully supports the principles of the agreement: we were a party to it, but that does not mean that we support every detail of the way it operated in its first guise.

One of the key issues for many people relates to the rule of law. We welcome the fact that recent reports by the Independent Monitoring Commission (IMC) have shown significant, though not complete, progress by republicans on the move towards normal, democratic politics. We look forward to seeing a further positive report from the IMC in October which — if it is as optimistic as people hope — will alter the political landscape significantly. However, at this stage, we have not yet resolved many issues relating to the rule of law. It is also a simple matter of fact that those issues affect more than one party — indeed, in current circumstances, they affect more than one party that has the potential to be part of an Executive. That is why Alliance believes that among the important matters to be dealt with is the strengthening of the ministerial pledge of office to include the matters that are generally referred to as “paragraph 13 of the Joint Declaration by the British and Irish Governments” — that which defines the unacceptable behaviour in much stronger terms than has traditionally been the case.

Aligned to the rule of law, another issue which must be dealt with is policing. It seems that that will be one of the contentious and difficult issues that we have to deal with. The Alliance Party believes that it is absolutely essential that any party participating in Government — whether a national Government or a devolved Government — must fully show that it supports the policing structures, the established police service and all other aspects of the rule of law. That will be a cause for future negotiations, but we simply record that as our opinion at this stage.

We welcome the proposal for the devolution of policing and justice powers to the Assembly, but note that there are major issues around the timing of that devolution, the powers to be devolved and the structures and accountability under which devolution will occur.

Subsequent to the publication of our detailed paper ‘Agenda for Democracy’, the recent statement in Westminster has made it clear that the triple lock, which we support, is now in place. Therefore, before there can be devolution of policing and justice powers, there must be a cross-community vote in the Assembly, an appropriate declaration from the Secretary of State, and then an affirmative resolution in Parliament. It seems that that is now relatively straightforward.

Similarly, there is probably an emerging consensus on the precise powers, but I do not wish to go into those at this stage. However, a major concern for us is the issue of the structures in which this power would be devolved. We do not believe that any of the four models proposed by the Government to date would deal with such a sensitive issue as justice in any meaningful way. There cannot be a position where a single party is given untrammelled power over justice matters; nor can two parties each take a bit of it; and neither can two parties be somehow forced to share it without any current model for dealing with the reconciliation of differences — as was shown by the difficulties in the operation of the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister (OFMDFM) during the first Assembly, which also remain to be resolved.

We believe that the only way in which justice and policing can be properly devolved is by having a single Department of Justice in an Executive with a full degree of collective responsibility, which would involve all the parties in the Executive reaching consensus over the operation of those powers. That would also mean that there was the potential for the removal of a Minister in the event of difficulties. The existing structures do not allow for that, and they have major problems within them.

10.15 am

We have also highlighted our concerns about the issue of ‘A Shared Future’. This policy was initiated under the devolved Executive, although the publication of the significant document only occurred under direct rule, but it is now a major article of faith for this Government and, we believe, should also be so for any devolved Executive.

It is absolutely imperative, on both financial and moral grounds, that we end the notion that this society can be run as two supposedly separate, but equal, fiefdoms on issues such as education or the provision of health centres or housing. That idea is unsustainable in every sense of the word, and it is vital that all those who wish to participate in a future Executive should give a commitment to implementing the policy contained in 'A Shared Future'.

Another issue that has generated a lot of discussion in the past is the issue of victims and of how we handle matters such as truth and reconciliation. Probably one of the major failings of the agreement in 1998 was that it did not deal satisfactorily with those issues. As time has gone on, it has become almost impossible to subsequently address them properly. At this stage, there is limited time for progress and that progress is likely to be limited. However, at the very least, we should have something such as a victims' forum, which would allow people to put their stories on the record. It is probably unrealistic to recommend anything beyond that — I do not know how we would approach it.

One of the key difficulties that Alliance has in the operation of what I would regard to be the agreement mark I, and which is covered in our paper, relates to institutional issues. During the workings of the first Assembly, it was established clearly that there were many problems with the way in which the institutions had been set up. The fact that much of it had been cobbled together in the final 48 hours has been shown by the way that problems have arisen recently.

The first point that we wish to highlight will not surprise those of you who have heard us say it over the years: the issue of designations and the associated voting system. Designations entrench division; they do nothing to overcome division. They ensure that there is no equality of votes for MLAs. Those Members who were in the Assembly on 2 and 6 November 2001 will be well aware of the differences in the voting for the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister that were caused by playing around with the designation system. In particular, the designation system is too rigid to take account of changing demography, and designations allow the process to be held hostage by narrow minorities, which, because of the way in which the system operates, may constitute a blocking minority.

Given what happened in 2001, and what happened with the issue of whether the former Deputy First Minister did or did not resign and how that was dealt with, we must get away from the problems created by designation. In accordance with normal democratic procedures, the only way to do that is to cast votes in the Assembly on the basis of a straightforward weighted majority, free from designations, meaning that the two thirds or 65% or 75% or whatever needed for a weighted majority could come from any Member and, as would undoubtedly happen at different times, could come from different coalitions of Members. Anything other than that approach would continue to entrench the divisions that the Assembly is supposed to overcome and would continue to ensure that there is no equality for MLAs, especially — and specifically at this stage — for the seven who signed the Roll for the current Assembly without designating themselves as either unionist or nationalist.

Related to the issue of designations is the formation of the Executive. There were real problems with the workings of the first Executive. There was no collectivity, and it appeared that there was no shared understanding between Ministers over most policies. Even matters such as the Programme for Government appeared to operate at a lowest-common-denominator level. Certainly, it appeared to me, as someone who sat on the Opposition Benches, to be largely ignored in implementation once it was agreed. Effectively, power was divided, not shared, and we do not believe that that is a recipe for moving forward.

There was actually no incentive for Ministers to co-operate. There was more incentive to grandstand and oppose each other. The numbers of people involved in the Executive parties led to a lack of clear understanding between Opposition and Government; the spectacle of Back-Bench Members of parties in Government voting against the policies of other Government parties; of Ministers coming into the Chamber to sit on their hands while their ministerial colleagues voted one way and their party colleagues voted another way. It was not a recipe for good government.

We believe that the only way in which good government could actually operate to a meaningful programme of government is on the basis of a voluntary coalition and a suitable weighted majority. Nobody suggests that in a society like this you can govern on the basis of 50% plus one being adequate to carry contentious legislation, but to endorse an Executive and to endorse its contentious legislation by that same level of weighted majority at around the two-thirds mark gives an opportunity for some coherence, which has been sadly lacking so far.

Those proposals are not seeking to exclude any party from government but to provide better government. They provide the opportunity for all parties to engage in post-election negotiations around a programme of government that could then be implemented by an Executive that could command the appropriate level of support in the Assembly. It is actually the way in which Governments are formed nearly all the time now in Dublin, and on both occasions in Edinburgh. It is a much more open and transparent way of operating than the way we have seen.

Fundamentally we do not believe that inclusion in the process of governance necessarily means that all parties of a particular size have a right by a particular mathematical formula to inclusion in the Government at every point in time. There has to be the opportunity for change; there has to be the opportunity for some parties to grow, and other parties to decrease, in influence and to move in.

There are fundamental issues related to the Executive's operation that may or may not be addressed, but one thing that does have to be introduced is better accountability. We have highlighted the fact that at the moment there is no collectivity, but we could strengthen the ministerial code of conduct. It seems to be generally accepted that we should be looking for a statutory code, which would ensure that there was at least a greater obligation on Ministers to co-operate.

We believe that when Ministers have the power to take decisions, in large measure on their own say-so without recourse to the Assembly, there needs to be a potential power of recall within the Assembly. We see that as solely a power to reverse a ministerial decision if an appropriate weighted majority, or cross-community majority in current terminology, passed a measure to do so. This is not an opportunity to trip up every Minister on every occasion. It is simply that, where there are particular major issues on which a Minister clearly does not have the support of the House, it should be possible to reverse the decision.

We also believe it is essential that any Executive, when it is established, should be the subject of a vote to endorse, collectively, in the Assembly. That is the pattern that applies in, for example, Switzerland, which is probably the closest example we have to the way our Assembly would work. We believe that it is vital that any party that participates in the Executive should be prepared to show its confidence in the Executive as a whole. If parties are not willing to show their confidence in the Executive as a whole, it raises serious questions as to whether they really wish to be part of it in any meaningful sense.

Finally, just a quick point on the mathematics of the issue. If nothing else, the shenanigans since November 2003 in regard to the potential allocation of 10 seats in any Executive or other body by the d'Hondt formula — with people changing party resulting in other entirely unrelated parties eventually gaining or losing seats — shows how poor the d'Hondt formula is in reflecting proportionality when dealing with a small number of places from a small electorate. Only replacing d'Hondt by greater use of the single transferable vote within the Assembly will allow people who have broadly similar aims and objectives to come together in a way that d'Hondt does not allow to happen.

Those are the key points that I wish to make, and I think that I have actually managed to stick within the allocated time limit.

Mr McFarland: I suggest that colleagues ask questions on the fact of what has been said. It is just that if we start having a debate on that, we will end up having the same debate on each one, because there are common points. I suggest that we have factual questions on accuracy, or on what someone meant or whatever, and then perhaps have a debate on the whole discussion at the end.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are members content with that? I suppose that we want to try to be as flexible as possible too with the questions and the discussion.

Mr McFarland: If we have that whole debate now on all its aspects, we cannot have the debate again on each aspect, but we may have different things to say. So it makes some sense to leave the debate until we have heard everyone's submissions and have a proper debate at that stage rather than having five mini debates.

Dr Farren: I want to go on to the substance of how we are going to proceed. I simply want to open questions for the SDLP.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are there any other procedural issues first of all?

Dr McCrea: No, it is probably best if parties agree to answer questions now, rather than leave it until the end. It will break continuity of thought and therefore it is best for questions to be posed now.

Dr Farren: To begin, I thank Mr Ford for his presentation. My question arises from something that will be a general issue throughout the day, which is how we structure questions on what the parties are presenting from here on in. My concern relates to what issues need to be addressed in order to pave the way for restoration.

Does Mr Ford distinguish between those issues that essentially relate to the problems that caused suspension in the first place and those issues, many of which he has mentioned, that arose in the course of the review of the operation of the Good Friday Agreement and on which it is desirable to make progress and indeed to reach agreement on them before restoration, but are not necessarily linked to restoration in itself, in the sense that they were not the problems that brought about suspension?

We need to address the essential issues. It may be desirable to address and resolve other issues, but they are not essential to restoration.

Mr Ford: I fundamentally take a different line from that which was in Dr Farren's line of questioning, because suspension in October 2002 was not the only problem; there were also problems for the workings of this Assembly. Countless other problems arose on the way. I do not believe that the people of Northern Ireland would forgive us if we managed a quick fix that then fell apart again. As I remember, the election of a First Minister and Deputy First Minister in November 2001 was a fairly major crisis. It was resolved in four or five days but it was, nonetheless, a significant crisis, and it was only resolved by playing around with one aspect of the agreement which I have highlighted — the designation voting system. I again put on record my belief that the issue that caused a problem when implemented in good faith exactly as written in the agreement by all parties was the designation voting system.

10.30 am

If we do not deal with those issues, we run the risk of facing that crisis at some point. We cannot afford to not deal with all the outstanding issues, considering how long the Assembly has been suspended. I also think that it is not strictly correct to refer to the review of the agreement that was held, because, as far as I am concerned, that review consisted of one round-table meeting in the Long Gallery in early 2004, and we have not actually completed it. The review is essential to getting this Assembly and Executive functioning.

Dr Farren: Are you going to allow one party to continue for a few minutes? It would be helpful if you did that so that I do not lose my train of thought.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Yes.

Dr Farren: If you reflect on the question that I asked, I did not specify what might be regarded as the essential issue or issues that contributed to suspension. We need to focus on what is essential to restoration — without which restoration will not happen. Otherwise, we will become involved in a huge agenda of work across a wide spectrum of issues. Many of the other issues were being dealt with in the review and, while there might only have been one round-table meeting, there were lots of engagements with the Ministers. On several occasions, I met Paul Murphy and Ministers from the South to discuss matters to do with North/South relations and the North/South Ministerial Council, and so on.

Some of those issues are crucial, but we need to structure our business and avoid getting into a whole range of issues by focusing on the essential issues as opposed to the rest, however desirable and necessary it would be to resolve them in the long or the shorter term. If we can resolve many of them in the shorter term, so much the better.

I am also concerned, and you may care to comment, at the reference in your opening remarks to the Alliance Party's contribution, which I acknowledge, to the negotiations leading to the Good Friday Agreement. At a later point, with a rather loose phrase, you referred to the "agreement mark I", which implies, or may imply — I invite you to clarify — whether we are in an agreement mark II, in the sense of fundamentally moving away in some, or many, key respects from the agreement signed in April 1998.

Mr Ford: Regarding the first point as to what is essential and important at this stage, without going through my entire presentation, we regard nearly everything that I outlined as essential. They are key things that have either gone wrong in the past or have the potential to go wrong in the future. I made the point that we cannot have a simple quick fix that deals with one or two problems associated with getting the two current largest parties into Government; we must ensure that we do not run into the problems of the past.

I also remain to be convinced, based on past experience. Where problems have been highlighted and treated as important but not essential, they frequently never get addressed. That is why I am concerned with ensuring that some of the issues that we have highlighted as problems in the past are addressed.

On my use of the phraseology of the "agreement mark I", I am certainly not here to negotiate a new agreement, but I am here on the basis that the agreement specifies that there is to be a full review of its operation. There has not been a review conference convened by the two Governments with all Assembly parties invited in any meaningful sense, and I have highlighted where the workings of the agreement have gone wrong and what needs to be addressed.

As far as I am concerned, the agreement mark II, which I hope to see, is an agreement within the context of the agreement as was signed — or not signed, as the case may be — in April 1998, but that acknowledges and deals with existing problems. If my terminology of mark I and mark II was unfortunate in that respect, it was intended to emphasise that we wish to make the improvements to the agreement that we believe are essential for it to provide stable and durable Government for the people of Northern Ireland.

Dr Farren: I have one more question. I accept and acknowledge your point that the review was incomplete. Can I therefore accept from what you say that the proposals within the so-called comprehensive agreement of December 2004 are not necessarily proposals with respect to the operation of the institutions that your party accepts, or may not fully accept?

Mr Ford: At the last meeting I had with the Government Minister, David Hanson mentioned the so-called comprehensive agreement. In the opinion of the Alliance Party, it was neither comprehensive as regards those involved in the discussions nor comprehensive as regards the issues covered, nor did it reach agreement even amongst those who were involved.

Dr Farren: I take it that we can come back to that later.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Yes. Do members of the Committee have any other questions?

Mr Murphy: Seán Farren mentioned many of the real issues that David Ford highlighted in relation to the operation of the institutions. David said that there had been one round-table meeting in the Long Gallery, but, as I recall, Des Browne and Tom Kitt chaired quite a few meetings in Stormont House at which the Alliance Party raised many of those issues. Although there was some discussion, the Alliance Party could not pursue all the issues successfully. It may regard the present meetings as an opportunity to revisit some of those issues.

I do not deny that issues around the working of the agreement are important and that we should get them right; however, I do not necessarily consider them to be vital to the restoration of the institutions. They can be worked on through various procedures committees and by examining areas such as the ministerial code.

David took issue with some of the models that are being floated in relation to the transfer of policing powers, but, unless I missed it, I did not hear the Alliance Party advocate a model of its own choice. David outlined his party's support for the transfer of powers, but has his party a model or idea of what level of powers should be transferred and how they should be operated?

Mr Ford: Conor Murphy may recall many meetings during 2004: that is an indication of the party that he comes from. Some of the rest of us do not recall quite so many meetings with the two Governments. That is why I do not consider that we can remit some of these issues to a procedures committee — they are too important to be appropriately dealt with merely by a committee in the Assembly.

I trust that the record will show what I said about the transfer of policing powers. I disagreed with all four models that the Government put forward, and I outlined our view that justice and policing powers can be properly devolved only to a Department of Justice in an Executive that operates with collective responsibility. Collectivity is the only way that all parties in an Executive could have a meaningful say in the operation of a Department of Justice. I thought that I had highlighted some of the difficulties as well.

Mr Murphy: There were discussions between the Government and ourselves in 2004. However, I was referring to the round-table meetings that were chaired in Stormont House, at which, as I recall, all parties were present. At those meetings some of the issues that David Ford highlighted here were pursued to some degree, but they did not receive widespread support. Perhaps this is an opportunity for David to revisit them.

I understand the type of Executive to which the Alliance Party wants policing and justice powers to be transferred, but I am still not clear on what model it wants. Obviously, the party has a view on collective responsibility and enhanced accountability in an Executive, but what specific type of department of policing and justice does the party envisage in an Executive?

Mr Ford: I did not catch the last bit of the question.

Mr Murphy: You said that you disagree with the four models, but, as far as I can see, your point was in relation to how the Executive would operate its collective responsibility and accountability. I understand the points about the Executive, but I am not sure which model of justice department the party wants. Would it consider the same model as all the other Departments but simply with improved workings in the Executive, or a different model for policing and justice?

Mr Ford: Our point was that there should be a single Department of Justice operating on the basis of collective responsibility within the Executive and thereby enabling all Executive parties to take a collective view, which would be implemented by the Department. Given the history of the way in which individual Departments have operated up to now, we do not believe that they have been very successful in many areas. Dealing with justice matters is difficult, so it is essential that there be full collectivity as is the case with any other Government within these islands. We simply cannot operate unless that collectivity exists, but that would be on the basis of a single Department covering the full range of powers to be devolved — justice and policing both under a single Minister within the collective Executive.

Mr M McGuinness: Just to set the record straight, the reason there was such difficulty in getting an inclusive process of discussions through the course of 2004 was the very publicly stated opinion of the Democratic Unionist Party that it was going to negotiate with the British Government. At every stage of whatever meeting Sinn Féin was involved in during the course of that year with both the Irish and the British Governments, we made it clear that all of the parties should be involved. That was made very difficult by the stance adopted by the Democratic Unionist Party. It strikes me that it is one of the difficulties that we are facing at this Committee.

Again, at the outset of this Committee, it has been very clearly stated by the DUP that any negotiations that will take place will take place between themselves and the British Government, and that does present problems for ourselves, the Ulster Unionists, the Alliance Party and the SDLP. It is certainly not how Sinn Féin sees this process of dialogue continuing in a way that will be, hopefully, effective.

I want to ask one question: does the Alliance Party accept that the Executive and the North/South Ministerial Council should be established on or before 24 November this year?

10.45 am

Mr Ford: I think, Chairman, that the record will show that I stated that specifically at the beginning of my presentation.

Mr M McGuinness: OK. Thank you.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are there any other questions?

Mr Kennedy: Mr Ford, thank you for your presentation. I have one quick question on the issue of Executive formation and the reference to a voluntary coalition. While it might seem attractive, in practical terms are you confident that such an approach could work and would you give us a little more detail on it? How do you see it being achieved?

Mr Ford: I think you have to look back at the record of a mandatory coalition, and how we saw it operating over three years, to examine why we believe it is essential to move in the direction of a voluntary coalition. There were all kinds of problems with how the Executive operated. I highlighted some of them: the lack of any collective understanding from Ministers and their parties on policy matters; the lack of any, apparent to me, meaningful work on the Programme for Government; and, indeed, the record showed that a large part of the Programme for Government failed to be implemented.

All those issues showed that putting parties into Government purely on the basis of electoral strength and a mathematical formula, without any shared understanding around policy issues, was not a good way to run a Government.

I would contrast the achievements of our colleagues in Scotland and Wales, particularly when you take account of the fact that Wales has far fewer powers than we did, with the rather limited achievements here — such as the volume of legislation passed, for example — as an indication of the problems that arose within that Executive. That is partly why it is essential that we move towards a voluntary coalition. After both elections, the coalitions in Edinburgh speedily negotiated Programmes for Government and implemented them effectively. Indeed, recent Governments in the Oireachtas have been formed, following Dáil general elections, through inter-party negotiations that led to agreed programmes that were then carried out. These are much better examples of how to run a Government than the practice of giving people power on the basis of mathematics and no agreement.

When you look at the record of debates that occurred in the Assembly, it would be hard to deny that there were many problems that I could highlight, but I shall not — probably relating to each party — of contradictions that occurred between roles in the Executive and attitudes taken by Back-Bench Members. Fundamentally, it was not a good system of government and it did not serve the people of Northern Ireland well. It was good that people were seen to be engaging at some level, but many of the decisions taken were not particularly good. As someone who, with the support of Members of other Government parties, had the pleasure on one occasion of inflicting a significant defeat on a Government Bill, I will admit that it was great fun, but it was not good government.

Mr Kennedy: One problem that I identify with that is that any Executive would presumably have to be formed on the will of the people. That is, the parties that received the most votes and gained the most seats would get the most places. Is that fair enough logic, or are you suggesting a voluntary coalition of those who are more civilised, perhaps, and who will be in agreement with one another, rather than those who are actually more popular with the people?

Mr Ford: I highlighted earlier our belief that you could not form a voluntary coalition on the basis of 50% plus one being an adequate majority, and that we needed to be looking to something in the region of two-thirds, or thereabouts, support, which would in effect be cross-community without being rigidly defined in terms of “sticking-MLAs-into-pigeon-holes” cross-community. At this Committee, I certainly do not think that it is appropriate to use the term “more civilised” about any one party than any other party. I am not sure whether the Member was wishing to regard his own party as falling within that category.

Mr Kennedy: I will make no comment on that.

Mr Ford: As far as I am concerned, we are all here with, I accept, different electoral mandates, but the issue is what coalition can be put together by those who can agree policies, regardless of whether they can agree that they like each other. I am not sure that there are always perfect examples of Governments. Dublin is an example: people do not necessarily have to like each other; they must simply be prepared to work together and implement policies. That seems to me to be the test of a Government.

The blunt reality is that if we implemented something like a voluntary coalition, either in 1998 or now, any three of the four largest parties would, between them, be capable of commanding a majority in the House at an appropriate weighted majority level. It would be up to the parties to see what they were prepared to negotiate to implement a programme.

Mr Kennedy: Thank you.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are there any other questions or comments?

Dr Farren: Yes; just one final question from me. Do I take it from what David has been saying that a resolution to a lot of the issues related to the operation of the institutions — whether it be the manner in which the Executive is formed, or whatever — is now a precondition for restoration as far as the Alliance Party is concerned and that, without a resolution to those before 24 November, the Alliance Party would not see restoration as possible?

Mr Ford: Alliance is possibly not in the position to set preconditions on the way others, including the two Governments, will behave. We are trying to put honestly and straightforwardly on the record that which we believe is necessary in order to provide a stable, durable and lasting Government for the people of Northern Ireland.

Others may believe that that can be done with less — if that is the right term — than we are proposing needs to be done at this stage. That may or may not mean that the Governments may proceed to implement somewhat less than what we believe is necessary and appropriate, but it does not mean that we believe it any the less. We may be in a minority of seven, if you take two Governments and five parties, but we have our view as to how we have seen things operate.

Obviously, we have a slightly different take from those whose parties — in some cases, around this table — contain individuals who were members of the previous Executive and will, therefore, view things, to some extent, from a different perspective than ours. Representing a party with a unique identity, external to the Executive, we see a number of problems that arose, which we are seeking to address.

Mr Murphy: The Alliance's comparison to the situation in Scotland, in the South or in Wales does not recognise the historical experiences here, where people's experience of how democracy operated is very different from that in Scotland, Wales or, indeed, in the South.

Does Alliance not recognise that, if the agreement did not contain the provisions that formed the mandatory coalition Government here, the achievement of full support for the agreement, or a majority support — 69% or 70%, whatever it got here; 84% across the island — would probably not have been possible and, therefore, we would not have had a Good Friday Agreement?

The Alliance's aspirations for people coming together on the basis of common policies and finding common ground to form a Government may well be something that we should be aiming for in years to come, but a recognition of the realities in which we currently operate mean that if we had not secured the ability to buy in by every section here, a voluntary coalition Government would not have been formed in the aftermath of 1998.

Despite all the difficulties that we had with the Government that was formed, and the stop-start nature of that, there certainly would not have been the buy-in across both sections of the community here that there was in support of the agreement without those provisions. The intentions that Alliance outlines may be things that we can aspire to down the road at some stage, but that does not currently reflect the reality of where we are in the Six Counties.

Mr Ford: In the way that we have outlined our proposals for a weighted majority, we have clearly recognised the distinctions between Scotland, Wales, the Republic and ourselves.

I will say it again if necessary: in a society such as this one, 50% plus one is an inadequate majority on which to take decisions. However, the issue that I am being asked to address is whether, because we have particular problems, we set up rigid institutions and talk about dealing with our problems at some indeterminate stage in the future; or whether we seek, as the Alliance Party suggests we should, to overcome divisions now.

We might or might not have had agreement for the mandatory coalition as it operated; however, on the basis of our experience, the mandatory coalition did not provide particularly good government. Given that we are in review — and that is probably review with a lower case “r”, since Governments seem unable to accept that it is an upper case “R” Review — we have an opportunity to set out our vision and proposals and our desire to go forward as a single community, rather than merely balance the interests of two sections of the community. That, as far as the Alliance Party is concerned, is how things were, but we wish to put our aspirations to change this society on the table now, rather than wait for some indeterminate stage in the future when it may be acceptable for others to move.

Mrs D Dodds: Mr Deputy Speaker, the Belfast Agreement, by its own definition, indicated that there must be support from each community for it. Does the Alliance Party accept that the vast and overwhelming bulk of the unionist community no longer supports or consents to the Belfast Agreement? A renegotiation of the agreement — and legislation to make a new agreement — will therefore be essential before progress can be made.

Mr Ford: First, it is fundamentally clear that the Alliance Party does not accept the concept that we are two communities: we are a single community with multiple divisions, not all of which coincide. We are becoming an increasingly diverse community; and we are becoming a community in which those from perceived backgrounds no longer conform to the stereotypes that apply to their section of the community.

That said, I do not accept that the vast majority of unionists oppose the agreement. It is clear, from elections in which people vote under a preferential, and therefore a proportional, system as opposed to casting votes in an “x” vote system, that a modest majority of unionists supports the DUP and can therefore be presumed to be against the agreement. The fact that members of the DUP are sitting in this room discussing those matters with the rest of us is an indication that, pragmatically, they are here, as the rest of us are, negotiating reforms to the agreement — not a new agreement.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We move to the DUP presentation.

Dr McCrea: Mr Deputy Speaker, I want to preface my remarks by stating that I found the charges that Martin McGuinness made against me deeply offensive, hurtful and distressing. They were totally untrue. I am here today because my party has requested that I continue to present the DUP case at the Committee.

In order for devolution, under the terms that the Government have set out, to be restored to Northern Ireland, a significant number of issues must be addressed. It is important that the Assembly not only identifies but debates those issues and that the Government take the necessary action.

Our submission is somewhat detailed, and therefore the DUP’s mind on many of the major issues is before the Committee. The purpose of this Committee, we are told, is to prepare for government, to scope the issues and to identify the obstacles that stand in the way of the restoration of devolved government. The Democratic Unionist Party clearly indicated that there can be no return to all-party Executive devolution in circumstances in which one party — namely, Sinn Féin/IRA — is not committed to exclusively peaceful and democratic means. Others do not like the fact that we are not prepared to take the IRA at face value and accept whatever is on offer. We will not simply accept and implement others’ agenda. We have to deliver our agenda, which is our manifesto that we put before the public. Regardless of the reaction, we will continue to work for our constituents to deliver our manifesto promises and principles.

In order for devolution to be restored, a significant number of issues must be addressed. It has already been suggested in Committee that those are dead issues. As far as the unionist community is concerned, although some may try to kill them, the issues are very much alive. They are significant issues that must be tackled. As the largest political party in Northern Ireland and the largest unionist party, we are mandated to ensure that only those who are committed to exclusively peaceful and democratic means will sit in the Government of Northern Ireland.

Our manifesto indicated that no one — no one — who is associated with paramilitarism or criminality will sit in any Executive in Northern Ireland. Sinn Féin is attempting to distract attention away from its own inadequacies and from its failure to measure up to the standards that are required to participate in government. Sinn Féin must face up to the difficult questions on criminality, decommissioning, disbandment and policing. We heard yesterday that the Exchequer is being denied £240 million through criminality alone. What could that £240 million do for the people of Northern Ireland? Today’s newspapers tell us that the laundering of cigarettes, fuel, and all the rest of it, is a £600 million industry. The republican community and leadership have always been good at blaming everyone else for every problem that comes along, but it is now obvious that the Provisionals are, as they did previously, trying to perpetrate an acceptable level of criminality and paramilitarism, while at the same time being admitted to government.

There can be no tolerance of criminality and paramilitarism as far as participation in government is concerned. Recent IMC reports, and other reports, indicated that progress is being made. Those reports also indicated, however, that considerable work remains to be done. There appears to be little evidence that the Provos are moving to dismantle their vast empire of illegally gained assets, which they have accumulated through bank robberies and other nefarious activities over the years. There is still no sign of the proceeds from the Northern Bank robbery, never mind an acknowledgement of IRA involvement. There is no progress on the McCartney murder — from the very beginning there has been a republican cover-up, lies and deception.

There is still no acceptance by republicans of the need to fully and unequivocally support the forces of law and order in Northern Ireland. The demand for immediate entry into Government by a republican movement that still maintains its private army and is still actively engaged in criminality, spying and retention of arms is shared by very few. At the same time, there is widespread consensus for the DUP’s view that any party aspiring to Government must support the police and fully consent to positive co-operation in the implementation of law and order, as well as in the campaign to defeat terrorism from wherever it emanates.

There is a great challenge to those who were inextricably linked to terrorism in the past: they must completely renounce violence. For them, the path of terror must be consigned to the history books. There must be recognition of the primacy and authority of the security forces. They must support the efforts of the police to uphold law and order and ensure the safety of everyone in the community — everyone equal under the law, and equally subject to the law.

Her Majesty's security forces must, and will, be supported in exercising their legitimate authority to move against and defeat terrorism, from whatever source it comes. People who want us to believe that they have moved away from their terrorist path must support the security forces, the police and the army in their efforts to defeat and bring to book those who are still active in terrorism.

On policing and justice, the DUP is very clear: there is no way that any sensible or reasonable person from either community in Northern Ireland believes that the involvement of an organisation such as Sinn Féin in the administration of policing or justice would be anything other than deeply damaging, divisive and detrimental. There is no evidence whatsoever that Southern political parties have changed their minds that Sinn Féin is unacceptable for Government in Dublin. All those factors point to work that needs to be carried out by republicans. Now is the time for delivery, not for fudge.

The Prime Minister indicated some time ago that there was nothing left to negotiate. The simple question is whether people are committed to exclusively peaceful and democratic means, with all that that entails and implies. That is where the focus needs to be, and that is what the DUP is focused on. The attempts by pro-agreement parties to resurrect the failed structures of the past and to fudge once again the crucial issues that bedevil the IRA and Sinn Féin, will not work.

It is a prerequisite that the Belfast Agreement needs to be changed. That must be done through primary legislation. The Democratic Unionist Party received an overwhelming mandate on the basis of change to the Belfast Agreement and an absolute commitment to exclusively peaceful and democratic means by any party wishing to be in Government.

Republicans must also demonstrate that they are committed to sharing space with their unionist neighbours. The unionist culture should not be a second-class culture in Northern Ireland. While the media and others promote Gaelic sports and the Irish language, it is hugely detrimental at the same time to have the cultural aspects of unionism denigrated and denied the opportunity to flourish.

The parades issue is of crucial importance to unionism and is deeply rooted in our history. The repression of the parades culture, which has been driven by republican elements, must cease. There is no prospect of unionists sitting in Government with those who are actively pursuing an agenda to destroy their culture.

The track of insisting that all parties must be committed to exclusively peaceful and democratic means before being considered eligible for Government is the right one. It is the one that will ultimately produce the stability that is required for effective devolution to be durable and credible.

There are many other issues in this paper— and we have already outlined them — that are of vital importance in progressing effective devolution for Northern Ireland. One issue is accountability of the institutions. We believe that the Belfast Agreement did not provide sufficient accountability for decision-making within Northern Ireland.

Another issue is the stability of the institutions. With four suspensions in three years and no devolution since October 2002, it is clear that the arrangements created under the Belfast Agreement did not provide for stable government.

The efficiency of the institutions is also an issue. The institutions in the past were overtly bureaucratic and costly, and we believe in efficiency in any institution that is brought forth in Northern Ireland.

Another issue is the effectiveness of institutions. We found that, while it was true that many of the decisions taken by direct rule Ministers were totally unpopular and did not recognise the needs of Northern Ireland, many of the decisions taken by the Ministers of the Assembly — on the closure of hospitals, on the change of our education system and on other issues — were also unpopular and extremely bureaucratic. We believe that there is a great need to have effectiveness of institutions and also accountability, where Ministers cannot act as little gods but are answerable to the people through the Assembly and are subject to the scrutiny and the changes that are necessary, which are coming from the community through the Assembly.

We mentioned east-west relationships, and we believe, because of the primacy of relationships between Northern Ireland and the rest of the United Kingdom, that it is important that we strengthen and maximise the advantages of those relationships.

We also mentioned North/South relationships. We want to live as good neighbours with our Southern neighbours. We want, indeed, to prosper, and we want to ensure that we work together on those things that are essential for the prosperity of people, whether they be in Northern Ireland or in the Irish Republic. But, certainly, we do not want the interference of the Irish Republic's Government in the internal affairs of Northern Ireland. We also want those relationships to be subject to the authority of the Northern Ireland Assembly.

There are many issues that I have tried to include, but there is one final thing that I would like to say. I did not mention the issue of decommissioning, but it is the intransigence of Sinn Féin that blocked the unionist community from having confidence in the decommissioning process. I believe that significant PIRA decommissioning did occur. However, I still believe, as the Independent Monitoring Commission (IMC) report says, that there are significant amounts out there that have not been decommissioned. The structures of terror need to be dismantled. There is no need for any so-called army to be sitting in the wings — “We haven’t gone away, you know” — to threaten the existence of a democratic Government in Northern Ireland.

My colleagues and I are not here to negotiate those issues or to bargain with others over them. Our duty is to identify those issues that we perceive to be the obstacles in the way, which need to be removed before we can establish a democratic Government and have restored institutions. Having identified those issues, this Committee should report them to the House.

They should be openly debated in the Assembly. We need transparency and openness; therefore let us not run away from these key issues because they will not go away. They must be dealt with if we are going to engender confidence in the community and bring about a truly democratic devolved Government.

Mr M McGuinness: Obviously I am very much in favour of parties bringing to this body all the issues that concern them. Sinn Féin is more than willing, in the course of its deliberations at this body, to try and reach a far greater understanding between all the parties. There have been considerable difficulties between the Democratic Unionist Party and ourselves for some time. We are here with the sole purpose of trying to establish whether or not the DUP is prepared to recognise the importance — as stated by the two Governments — of restoring both the power-sharing and all-Ireland institutions on, or before, 24 November. I would like to seek an answer to that.

I asked a similar question of the Alliance Party and it was clear in its response. It would be helpful to this Committee if we were agreed that we are working to the effective deadline of 24 November this year.

I also noted with interest William McCrea’s remarks about previous comments that he said I made, and how hurt he was by them. I ask him to cast his mind back a couple of months to his contribution in another arena, the British House of Commons, when he made remarks which I considered to be very, very dangerous indeed. They were also ridiculous and totally and absolutely without any foundation whatsoever.

I also take grave exception to him addressing the Sinn Féin delegation in this room as Sinn Féin/IRA. He is effectively accusing the Sinn Féin delegation of being members of the IRA. None of the three of us is, and we take grave exception to his comments.

The issue of paramilitarism has been raised. I seek the DUP’s view of the recent statement by the leader of the Ulster Unionist Party, Reg Empey, that for over two decades unionist politicians were up to their necks with loyalist paramilitaries, and had for over two decades used loyalist paramilitaries for their own ends. I believe that he was not just speaking about his own party and himself, but also speaking about the DUP.

When we use the term “loyalist paramilitaries” we are not just talking about people who are members of an illegal organisation; we are talking about people who were involved in the murder of Catholics all over the North of Ireland. Essentially, we are talking about unionist death squads. I regarded that statement by Reg Empey as a huge statement with enormous implications for both unionist parties — the Ulster Unionist Party and the DUP — as we face the task of trying to get a Government restored. I would like to hear the DUP response to that, as it is directly related to whether or not the DUP is fit to be in Government, never mind the DUP’s view of Sinn Féin.

Another issue is William McCrea’s relationship with Billy Wright. Billy Wright was well known at that time — when Willie McCrea went to speak on his behalf at a meeting in Portadown — to be the probable leader of the LVF. How does that all fit in with the attempt to portray the DUP as paragons of democracy?

William McCrea said that he believed that significant IRA decommissioning did occur. How does he know that? I would appreciate an answer to that.

The Sinn Féin leadership’s position on, and opposition to, the Northern Bank and the Robert McCartney situations are well documented on the public record as a result of countless interviews done by Gerry Adams and myself at the time of the two incidents, and I think that we gave very clear leadership.

I have got one more question on parades. I believe that there is a mighty responsibility on all of us to give proper leadership in the time ahead. Given the events of last year and previous years, we are facing a difficult summer, and it is incumbent upon all of us to do everything in our power to ensure that this is a peaceful summer. Does the DUP recognise and accept that dialogue between those who wish to parade and those whose areas they wish to parade through is an important aspect of trying to reach a resolution to what is now only a small number of difficult parading situations?

Dr McCrea: First, may I say that Billy Wright was threatened to get out of the country or be put to death because of his political belief. He was threatened by the UVF, not for any action he had taken or any crime that he had committed. I am happy for the public record of the speech that I made on that occasion to be examined; I did not condone any act that Billy Wright or any other had taken. Furthermore, I made it abundantly clear that anyone who had information on any criminal actions for which Billy Wright was liable and on which he could be charged should give it to the police and the case brought before the court. That was what was said on that occasion. I did not condone any act of Billy Wright or anyone else, but he was condemned to death because he opposed the Belfast Agreement.

I oppose the Belfast Agreement. Does that mean that, in this society, I should be condemned to death for my political belief? In a democracy, the answer is no. However, others wanted to pick out what they wanted to pick out and forget everything that was stated. I condemn any illegal or criminal action carried out by Billy Wright. In no part of my speech did I condone any of his actions.

Some people talk about “Protestant” paramilitaries but talk about the IRA without mentioning a religious group alongside it — as heard in remarks made a few moments ago. Let me tell you: if there are “Protestant” paramilitaries, then there is the “Roman Catholic” IRA. They are not Protestant paramilitaries because they do not espouse my belief of the Protestant principles — civil and religious liberty for all.

Mr M McGuinness: May I make a point of order?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We will come back to you.

Dr McCrea: I am responding to — [Interruption.]

Mr M McGuinness: I just want to make it clear that the term “Protestant” was not used by me.

Dr McCrea: The DUP does not believe that we can close our eyes to the fact that there is no unionist majority in support of the Belfast Agreement. The Belfast Agreement has been rejected by the unionist community and relevant and significant changes must be made to it.

Also, do we want devolution? The DUP was a devolutionist party when others had long abandoned devolution. Devolution must be democratic and must work in the interests of unionists as well as nationalists. However, the Belfast Agreement is skewed in one direction, and the DUP does not believe that it can be operated. The Belfast Agreement needs significant changes. We have made that abundantly clear. Therefore, we are not trying to resurrect the Belfast Agreement. We will endeavour to get the changes that are necessary, and it will require primary legislation in the House of Commons if there is to be a movement in that direction.

We want devolved government, but we will not have devolved government that is corrupted by paramilitary or criminal activity or by those organisations who are — in the Government’s words — “inextricably linked”. I know that a lot of personal remarks have been made to me. I did not come to the Committee to make personal remarks, unlike others in their vendettas against me. My remarks have been about organisations and political parties. The Irish and British Governments believe that Sinn Féin has been inextricably linked to the IRA. Therefore, if there is any argument with the information that was given to me, maybe Sinn Féin’s friends in those Governments, and in the United States Government, should be reprimanded for what they believe and have propagated.

Mr M McGuinness: A number of questions that I asked were not answered.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): There was the point of order that you wanted to make.

Mr M McGuinness: The point of order was that at no stage during the course of my comments did I mention the term “Protestant paramilitaries”. I would not insult the Protestant religion by attributing that label to a unionist death squad.

With reference to William McCrea’s response, I had asked a number of questions. One was whether he accepted that it would be helpful to the other parties at the Committee if we knew that we were working to the timescale of 24 November.

Another question was in relation to the comments made by Reg Empey, which I regarded as having huge significance for the Ulster Unionist Party and for the DUP.

Also, in relation to William McCrea’s comment that he believes that significant IRA decommissioning occurred, I asked him how he knew that that had happened.

Finally, I asked him whether he agreed that encouraging those who wish to parade and those whose areas are to be paraded through to engage in dialogue would be a useful contribution to all of us working together to ensure that we have the peaceful summer that people deserve?

Dr McCrea: I stated that as far as the Democratic Unionist Party is concerned, we want devolution.

However, do I believe that by 24 November those who have the responsibility of coming up to the mark of democracy will do so? Do I believe that criminality will be dealt with? Do I believe that verifiable decommissioning is going to be granted? Do I believe that Sinn Féin is going to support the police in their fight against terrorism and instruct its people to work with the PSNI and to give them the information that is necessary to stop the hoods and the thuggery that is going on?

My answer is that there is nothing out there that would encourage me to believe that. Nothing that I see encourages me to believe that, in fact, the republican movement is up to it. Neither does anything that has happened in this Committee. We could not even get a debate this week in the Assembly on those cardinal issues. When I raised the issues of policing, paramilitarism, criminality and decommissioning, I was told that they were dead issues. That was the response when we debated here last week whether we could have a debate in the Chamber on those issues. The very party that blocked that is the party now trying to pretend that it is interested in those issues. They do not want to debate.

As far as I am concerned, this Committee's purpose is to scope the issues. We are to identify the issues. Debate needs to be taken on in the open, in the House. The Assembly is the supreme debating chamber. The issues need to be tackled head on in the Assembly because they are not going to go away.

As far as Reg Empey is concerned, I am not answering for him. Reg Empey can open his soul and he knows his own heart, his past, and all the rest. It is up to him to make whatever comment he wants for himself, his colleagues and those whom he has been associated with.

As regards arms, we stated from the very beginning that when it came to that issue, we would take into account what the IMC said. We also said that we would take into account other sources that are available to us. The Policing Board would give us information on what is happening on the ground, and there is also what we know from our own communities. We said that we would take all of those in and, in the final analysis, we would make our own judgement.

I have made the judgement of the Democratic Unionist Party. Our judgement is that significant arms were decommissioned, but certainly not verifiably and certainly not in accordance with what we had said about it having to be transparent. That was because of the objections of others, yet there was no problem to have verifiability when they were taking down the towers at Newry and along the border; they had to be taken down in the full view of cameras to try to appease and give confidence within the nationalist or republican community. We are saying that these issues will not be bluffed. They will not be fudged, as far as we are concerned, and they will not go away.

As far as parades are concerned, let me make this clear: I believe that this should be a free country. There should be freedom for people to walk on the Queen's highway. The idea that you have to ask a few persons, well, I will give an example. We had a parade after the deliberate agitation from outside Bellaghy, and then the burning of the bread van in Maghera, just a couple of years ago, when we were supposed to have peace. Who was standing in the front line of the objectors and protestors? Leading Sinn Féin persons. Who was behind them? People whom they bussed in to be offended in Maghera.

What we have had is a situation that has been engineered deliberately. So what happened? We had a parade through Magherafelt. After having agitated in Maghera, having agitated in Bellaghy, they then came to us and said that there was a nationalist estate in Magherafelt where the parade goes past every four or five years up to our own church. What did the nationalist/republican community do? They came to the town to agitate on how they could get a committee set up to object. What did the people say? The people said: "Willie McCrea. Whenever we are in need, he is the person we go to. Get back to Bellaghy, get back to Maghera; you are not starting the agitation here." The only ones who stopped them were the local community.

This is not a parades issue, where people really come to be offended. Desertmartin is practically a totally unionist town. There is a parade by the Hibernians every year. Because of the agitation in Bellaghy, I was asked should we stop the parade in Desertmartin. I said no. They have been walking there for years, for generations. It is their culture. Why stop it? And we could have stopped it, because it is a completely unionist community. But we did not. We did not fall into the trap that was set for us.

There are those who know fine well. They made a speech saying that they had got it in Pomeroy, they had got it in Bellaghy and they were identifying other particular places where they would start the agitation. It was not that the ordinary people were objecting to those parades —and this applies also to many of the ordinary people on the Garvaghy Road. I know from my contacts with local elected representatives and others there that the local people were threatened to make them come out and object. In fact, some even received a bullet through their letterbox because they were not compliant.

So let no one come here with a pious idea about parades somehow being an issue between the two communities. The tragedy is that a paramilitary grouping is sitting as a leech on its community, seeking to destroy that community, and therefore seeking to destroy the relationships between both unionist and nationalist and Protestant and Roman Catholic communities. If it had been left to the ordinary people in those towns, there would have been no need for all those commissions and all that dialogue, because there were good relationships on the ground until the agitation took place.

Mr M McGuinness: In relation to the first question that I asked about whether the DUP believes that there will be an Executive and a North/South Ministerial Council up and running by 24 November 2006, his answer was quite open. It gives me some encouragement that if the DUP recognised that important work could be done between us here as political parties on the Preparation for Government Committee, we could address many of the concerns that have been raised.

The difficulty is that the demand to debate all of those issues in the Assembly worries Sinn Féin. And it should worry all the other parties, because it clearly gives the impression that the DUP's only interest is to justify itself to its public by giving the impression that it is involved in important work in the Assembly.

The big question is where all of those debates go. How does an Assembly debate on the issue of arms resolve that issue when many people believe that it has been resolved anyway? On the issue of criminality and policing, for example, if the DUP were able to be sensible about how we resolve all the concerns around those issues, it should take seriously our thoughts that we form a subcommittee of this Committee to deal with the issue of policing.

We are on public record stating how we intend to take this process forward, and there is already considerable common ground between all major parties vis-à-vis the acceptance that powers should be transferred from London to a locally elected Administration. I believe — and I am open to correction — that the DUP has been on public record for a number of years stating that it is also in favour of that. Therefore, it strikes me that a considerable amount of work could be done if we formed a subcommittee.

Would the DUP be willing to engage in that? Failure to engage in such a subcommittee and to consistently persist in demanding debates in what is just a waffling shop downstairs, with direct rule Ministers continually taking all the big decisions that affect our lives, has no credibility whatsoever among the public. People are anxious about whether the institutions will be restored by 24 November. I am saying all that to be helpful.

There is a great deal of tension and difficulty between the DUP and Sinn Féin, but I am trying to tease out whether it is "game on" for dealing with those issues sensibly or whether we will be in a grandstanding session downstairs. We will oppose that tooth and nail because we do not believe that it will get us anywhere. In fact, it would set us back for some time and lend nothing whatsoever to giving people hope and confidence that the parties are, at long last, seriously engaging with one another in a real way to deal with those difficult issues.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Mr McCrea, do you wish to respond? A number of other Members also wish to speak, but we will work around that.

Dr McCrea: I have said in the past that this Committee has a limited remit. We do not believe that should be extended; the rest of the business should be done in, and through, the Assembly. We voted for the motion to establish an economic working group, which is of primary importance, but that has not got off the ground because others tried to remove it from the place it was supposed to be. It was up to the Business Committee to get it off the ground.

The general public want to see that we are genuinely moving forward and that the impediments to restoring democratic institutions are removed. With the greatest respect, I cannot say whether the deadline of 24 November will be met. However, it is abundantly clear that there are parties that are inextricably linked to organisations that are engaged in money laundering, fuel laundering, extortion, tax evasion, smuggling and criminal activity. The most recent IMC report states that there are indications that some senior members of PIRA, as distinct from the organisation itself, are involved in criminality, but that is a cop-out.

When that organisation murders someone, the cop-out is that it was not officially sanctioned. That was the cop-out line when they failed to murder me and my family. I was to be the final act the night before they were to draw the curtains and stop all the shootings. That was to be the last big hoo-ha.

But when they failed to do it, what was their line? That it was not officially sanctioned. That is the line that they take, but it does not bluff anybody; it certainly does not bluff the DUP.

This is what it says:

"there are indications that some members, including some senior ones... are still involved in crime, including offences such as fuel laundering, money laundering, extortion, tax evasion, smuggling."

That is what the last IMC report states; I am simply repeating it.

Recent reports from the Gardaí made it abundantly clear that 10,000 ammunition rounds that it discovered were PIRA rounds and were in no way linked to what are called dissident republicans. The Gardaí said that any link with dissident republicans had been ruled out and that there was a considerable amount of other stuff out there.

Let us not have this pious way of engagement. As far as this Committee is concerned, we are here to scope and identify the issues, which is certainly what we are doing. I hope that other parties will also identify the issues that have been outlined in the papers that we received.

We are speaking about those issues today, but they will not go away. No matter what other impediments there are to a functioning Executive and Assembly, I have mentioned the major issues that must be tackled. The Belfast Agreement is certainly not acceptable and must be dealt with; we must tackle the structures, the efficiency and effectiveness of Government. Those are all major issues that must be dealt with, but there are also other overlying issues.

Dr Farren asked a question of Mr Ford to see whether there was a line between the two and, to be honest, there are overarching issues — on policing, arms and other matters that I have constantly mentioned since I joined this Committee. Unless those issues are dealt with, they will not go away, no matter how they are tried to be bluffed around.

As Mr Blair said, there is really nothing more to negotiate and now is the time to deliver. We are asking those who are involved in criminal activities to deliver. Will they do it by 24 November to the satisfaction of the unionist community?

As far as policing and justice are concerned, let us make no mistake. Policing and justice will only be a reality, and even then only through legislation, when there is confidence in the community that it is appropriate that they are devolved. There is certainly not that confidence within the community at this time.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Naomi Long?

Mr M McGuinness: I am not finished yet.

I suggested that we use this Committee as a vehicle to deal with many of the issues raised between us, as opposed to the DUP approach of taking them to the Floor of the Assembly. I just do not understand where that approach takes us. If you consider the issues of paramilitarism, decommissioning, criminality and the plethora of other issues that have been raised on the Floor of the Assembly, how does doing that resolve those issues, given the DUP's stated position that they will negotiate and take this situation forward only with the British Government? That means that it is a worthless exercise for the Ulster Unionists, the Alliance Party, the SDLP or Sinn Féin to engage in any debate in the Assembly on those particular issues.

It is a source of great concern to me that we are faced with a situation where, in all probability, the Committee on the Preparation for Government is effectively going nowhere, because the DUP see it as a vehicle to get debates in the Assembly, without offering any indication whatsoever as to how we remedy the issues.

I also want to say that I categorically reject many of the allegations that were made by William McCrea, through which he, by innuendo, tried to implicate Sinn Féin.

We need an answer to that question — not just in terms of Sinn Féin, but all the other parties are entitled to get the circle squared around the DUP assertion that the only negotiations that they are going to conduct are between themselves and the British Government. It begs the question of where all the other parties fit in. It raises the issue that all the contributions that have been made thus far by the DUP appear to be designed only to get debates in the Assembly, without giving us any explanation whatever about where the results of those debates will go.

I am sure that not every party around this table is going to end up agreeing with whatever stance is adopted by the DUP in relation to quite a number of issues. Therefore, somebody on the DUP side needs to explain to us how we get remedies to these problems. I am suggesting a way of dealing with the issue, and that is by a real engagement between all the parties here around the issues, and by setting up a subcommittee to deal with the issue of policing, for example, because that will impact on the issue of criminality. We in Sinn Féin are prepared to play our part in all of that. From the outset we have made it clear that our position is that we want to see powers transferred from London to here. That enables Sinn Féin to go to a special conference of our party members from all over the island to deal with the issue of policing in a very comprehensive way, and in a way which I think will find much agreement from many of the parties around the table — unless, of course, the DUP does not want us to go forward to a special conference to deal with that issue.

We could end up spending an awful lot of time here folks on whether we are going to get debates in the Assembly and no time at all on setting about the real work of truly preparing to put the Government into position.

Dr McCrea: I have stated this over and over again, but I will repeat it, Deputy Speaker; it is clear that Sinn Féin members want to bypass the Assembly at all costs. They do not want to debate. That is not their usual forte and their best ground is not in the debating chamber. They expose their total inadequacies — and yet they were elected to debate in the Chamber. That is how they got here. Therefore they want to bypass it, and that is why at all costs they want things to be brought here. They want this Committee to be the place where we do it, rather than have the other Members actively engaged in the issues.

Let me make it clear that we will talk. The Democratic Unionist Party will talk and will negotiate with all totally democratic parties and the parties that we perceive are democratic parties. However, we are not here in the Committee to negotiate, because negotiation is outside the remit of this Committee. I notice that Mr Ford said that he was not here to renegotiate or to negotiate a new agreement. With the greatest respect to him —

Mr Ford: Will you take a point of information on that?

Dr McCrea: Yes.

Mr Ford: Chair, I think that I am being quoted slightly out of context. I said that in the context of my support for the principles of the agreement and my desire to reform the existing agreement, not with regard to the question of whether this Committee was in negotiating mode, which is what Dr McCrea is addressing at the moment.

Dr McCrea: Yes, but irrespective of that, you were making a statement that you were not here to negotiate a new agreement.

We are not here to negotiate, we are here to scope the issues. That was the remit of this Committee — that is what the Secretary of the State told us the remit of this Committee was. Therefore, the negotiations will be done by the leader of my party and with the Democratic Unionist party in a way that they believe is appropriate and proper. They will do it with the Government, and they will carry on negotiations with those parties that they believe are democratic. That is what has happened in the past.

We want debates in the Assembly, and we want transparency, openness and the engagement of Members. We want to see how that Assembly can carry forth many of the issues, because, remember, it is the Assembly and not this Committee that was elected to deal with the issues that the Government is forcing on them at the moment. This Committee was never elected for that purpose; it was chosen for a specific task. All 108 Members were elected to do the business of dealing with the bread-and-butter issues that affect daily life.

Mr M McGuinness: I am conscious that I am in danger of dominating the question time on the DUP submission, and I respect that other parties have questions to ask, so I will stop after this question. I may return to other questions later.

Out of respect for all the parties around this table, the DUP needs to explain how a negotiation between the Rev Ian Paisley and the British Prime Minister Tony Blair will resolve all those problems. Given that Tony Blair has publicly stated that he is well and truly satisfied on the issue of arms, how does a negotiation between Ian Paisley and the British Prime Minister sort that one out?

In terms of paramilitarism, Tony Blair has also stated in the joint statement with the Taoiseach Bertie Ahern that he wants to see the institutions up by 24 November. Clearly, the institutions that he is speaking about are a power-sharing government in the North that consists of the DUP, Sinn Féin, the SDLP and the Ulster Unionist Party. He appears satisfied on that issue.

I think the parties here are entitled to an explanation as to how this negotiation between Ian Paisley and Tony Blair will resolve all our problems, and we also need to know whether there are any problems that we can sort out among ourselves. That is why I am offering, in the course of this Committee, an opportunity for us to deal with these issues face to face and in a real way to try to get a remedy for the difficulties that appear to exist.

Dr McCrea: The Blair principles are those things that he scored on the board at the time of the Belfast Agreement, and certainly they were principles that we believed were very sensible. The promise that he made to the people was that there was to be no fudging those issues. All the paramilitary and criminality issues were to be dealt with, and dealt with to the satisfaction of the community.

I make it abundantly clear: there is no satisfaction within the unionist community that these things have been dealt with. If Mr Blair has to face up to realities as regard the issues, that is something that he will have to deal with. I make it abundantly clear that our party had been very clear and open with the Government. These issues must be dealt with to the satisfaction of our community. This is not a Committee for negotiations; this is a Committee with a remit to scope the issues. That is what we are doing at this present moment.

I can assure you that I am not here to negotiate, and I have no authority to negotiate. Neither do I see it as my place to negotiate because negotiations are to be done by the party through those members who are delegated so to do.

If I were delegated to do it at that time, that would be the appropriate place and the appropriate time, but this Committee has been delegated with the responsibility by the Government to scope the issues, and that is what I intend to stick to, and we are not moving; as far as this Committee is concerned, we are not lengthening its remit.

Mrs Long: First of all may I thank you for your presentation, Mr McCrea, in terms of the paper and your presentation of it. There are four issues that I would like to raise with you initially some of which just require clarification and some of which require a fuller response.

When you addressed issues to do with paramilitarism, criminality and decommissioning you made a specific reference to one party, namely Sinn Féin, and said that it had issues with this. It is quite clear from recent decisions that have been taken by other groups within the Assembly that that is not a fair assessment in that other parties also have links to paramilitary organisations through association with elected representatives who have associations with those groups.

It is not, therefore, at this stage inconceivable that you could have a member of another party grouping as part of the ministerial team who would also have direct links to paramilitary organisations. Given that that is the case, are there any comments that you would want to make in relation specifically to paramilitarism in the more general sense as opposed to focusing simply on the activities of one organisation? What about the wider effects of paramilitarism on the future of the Assembly and also in terms of democracy and the principles of democracy which should apply to all ministerial post holders and indeed all elected representatives?

The second issue is one from your paper and concerns equality and human rights. I think it is on page 3, and you make reference to the unionist community there. The Alliance Party view is clear that the emphasis on rights should be on the protection of the rights of individuals rather than just on collective or group rights. Group rights and collective rights have often characterised some of the least equal societies in the world as opposed to the most equal, and what I want to know is if that reference is simply a concern that individuals in those communities may have suffered from discrimination and that what you are looking for, I suppose, is fair and equitable treatment for all individuals regardless of their background. I am always slightly wary of any reference to rights for particular groups.

The third issue that I want to raise is one in relation to accountability, something that we raised in our original submission. I noted on page 4 of your submission that you had raised it. You have also raised it today, and it seems to be key in terms not just of how government operates but also in terms of the lack of trust that exists, and that without accountability is a recipe for disaster.

In terms of your reference first of all to the Prime Minister's comments about there being nothing more to negotiate and also your reference on page 4 to the Government's comprehensive agreement so-called, are you indicating that you feel that issues around accountability and indeed the other issues which you have raised in your paper have been addressed in that agreement or are there additional issues which you feel were not fully addressed in that agreement? I should like to be clear on that.

The fourth question is in the context of the discussion that we have had so far.

Notwithstanding your express view that the issues that are outstanding are, to some degree, out of your hands and beyond your control, do you believe that it is possible that your party could be in a position where it is sufficiently confident that those issues have been adequately addressed by the 24 November deadline?

Dr McCrea: I will call on Diane to deal with the equality issue, which is the second issue. I will deal with the first of the four issues. As you know, our Government, the Republic's Government and the American Government have determined that one party is inextricably linked to a terrorist organisation, and that party is Sinn Féin. That is why unionists believe that that issue must be dealt with. However, my leader said that the position that the Ulster Unionists have forced upon us has thrown everything into the melting pot, because all parties that have links to terrorist organisations must be treated the same.

I do not know Mr Ervine's position in respect to the Ulster Unionist Party. I am told, on the one hand, by Madam Speaker that there is no Ulster Unionist Party here: there is the Ulster Unionist Assembly Group. Members of the Ulster Unionist Party then said that they are a party in the Assembly. I honestly do not know the answer; it is out of my hands. Are the Ulster Unionists linked to the PUP or is it just an exercise, as the Ulster Unionists say, to deny Sinn Féin a seat in the Executive? It would be interesting to hear from the Ulster Unionists. However, if those two parties are now the one party and are therefore "inextricably linked", then that does lead to the same position. My leader made that clear in the Great Hall.

On accountability, the DUP believes that the primacy of the Assembly must be maintained. Mr Ford told us that, in the past, he could have moved a motion that commanded a majority in the House, but a Minister could defy the House if he wanted because he was totally independent. If my memory serves me right, we got agreement on that, and there was a backdown. The Executive told Mr Foster that there was an issue on which they would not back him if he pushed it, because there was a rebellion in the ranks of all the parties. Therefore Mr Foster had to back down on one issue. Irrespective of who the Minister is, there must be accountability to the Assembly. The DUP also said that the North/South bodies must be accountable to the Assembly as well. The Assembly is paramount.

That is not unusual. At Westminster, a number of parties have defeated a Government with a majority of 66 on some major pieces of legislation. That is not unhealthy — on the contrary, it is a healthy exercise. It proves that a Government, irrespective of who they may be, cannot walk over the Assembly.

12.00 noon

Government Ministers were not elected as Government Ministers; they were elected as Assembly Members. Therefore primacy and authority should rest with the Assembly; it should at least be able to hold the Executive to a vote as a check. The Assembly voting against what a Minister is doing should mean something. The DUP believes in the real accountability of Ministers.

The comprehensive agreement — which, we are told, is not a comprehensive agreement as no one agreed to it — did address some of those issues and faced them down.

I am not saying that those matters were all concluded to our satisfaction, but it did seek and endeavour to acknowledge that there were major problems, such as those of accountability, which had to be faced.

As for the 24 November deadline, we as a party must be convinced that the obstacles to devolution are addressed. Remember that we promised that to our community. We also promised that we would go back to our community, consult widely and seek to bring that constituency with us. We are not doing something behind their backs.

Many of the issues are not within our control, but they are certainly within our judgement. We have the right on the behalf of our people to make that judgement because, remember, in the final analysis, the people will make their judgement when everyone faces them at the polls.

Mrs D Dodds: Mrs Long made a point in her question about whether we believe that equality issues are particular to individuals or to groups within society. I think that they are both of those things. The section that we have included on equality issues is quite small, but I and a number of other people have been working on equality issues for quite some time and, at a future date, we will be happy to scope those issues with the Committee, if it so desires, because they are very important.

We believe in an equal society and that everyone should have a share in our society and in its future. That is vital for progression within this community.

I shall not go into all the details, but I will provide an example of where inequality has been almost institutionalised within some aspects of government in Northern Ireland. Let us look at the issue of festival funding in Northern Ireland and take the example of Belfast. Over the last 10 or 15 years a very lively, well-defined and progressive festival movement has grown within Belfast, but mostly within the nationalist community.

Very little of that festival funding has gone to the unionist community. That may have been because of problems of capacity within the community or all sorts of other issues. However, instead of seeking to address the imbalance and the inequality in funding, the Government Department responsible simply put a moratorium on any future applications. Therefore, until very recently, in the last number of months, there was a situation in which the only festivals that were funded in Belfast were from the nationalist community, such as the West Belfast Festival, the Ardoyne Fleadh, and the Newlodge Festival. Now, we have a situation where everybody and every community can apply for festival funding equally.

That is the inequality; those are the issues that we need to start looking at and addressing so that we have the opportunity for everybody to make those applications on an equal basis.

That is what we mean by equality issues. We want to see more and more of those equality issues addressed. I have a huge equality issue with Belfast Education and Library Board (BELB) where, in terms of Youth Service funding within the Oldpark electoral area of Belfast, BELB spends £264,000 a year within the nationalist community. It spends nothing within the unionist community. Those are hard issues, but they have to be faced and addressed. We need to apply ourselves to addressing those matters because they take us on to perceptions of inequality and tensions throughout the community. So — sorry if this is a bit longwinded — it is actually a combination of both, and those are a couple of examples.

Mrs Long: There are conflicting views on this. Clearly, there is an issue about equality of treatment and that all people are treated equally, and there is an issue about seeking equality of outcome, and that is where you were referring to situations where there is insufficient capacity for people to achieve the same outcomes and, therefore, some investment needs to be made to give people a fair chance.

Those are two slightly separate issues, and they need to be addressed. In terms of referring to group rights — and this is my main concern — human rights is about defending the right of the individual to fair treatment and to be treated equally both under the law and as a full member of society. Therefore to define people simply as members of groups may benefit those individuals but may also discriminate against others who will be less equal if their group is less powerful.

That is the issue that I am trying to raise. I would like to see equality issues and issues about fairness and human rights dealt with on the basis of the rights of the individual as opposed to those of groups. That is not to the disadvantage of any community; in fact, it is to the advantage of all. The point that I am trying to explore is the definition of whether rights are attributed to particular groups because of their association or to the individuals within those groups because of their individual human rights. There is a distinction between the two. Experience shows that, in the least equal societies in the world, the focus has been on rights attributed because of membership of groups, as opposed to individual rights given to individual members of society based on their individual human rights.

I feel that when we are talking about human rights and equality issues, it is important to look at the rights attributed to individuals rather than focusing on group rights and that, where there are inequalities, they are resolved through that mechanism.

In relation to the question about whether or not the DUP believes it possible that it could be sufficiently confident, I phrased the question notwithstanding the DUP's view that many of those issues are out of its hands, because that was made clear in the presentation. I was not asking whether that would be resolved, because at this stage there is no yes or no answer to that.

I am simply trying to explore whether the DUP thinks that is possible, given the time frame that we are operating in. It is important that we know whether the DUP believes it is possible within the period leading up to 24 November that it could be sufficiently satisfied, that it could have consulted with its party membership, and indeed with the community that it represents. So I am not asking for the DUP to say that it is satisfied now or that it will be satisfied on 24 November, but simply whether it believes that it is an attainable goal.

Dr McCrea: My honest opinion is that nothing I have heard from the republican community has given me any confidence whatsoever that those who have got to meet the waterline of democracy are willing to do so. Therefore I honestly have very grave doubts that that can be a reality.

Mr McFarland: I thank William for his submission. I am struck that there is much common ground between our take on the matter and that of the DUP.

I have three questions, which I will deal with individually. They are on different topics, and I do not wish to get them mixed up. All the parties around the table have stated that they want to see devolution. Devolution will come only if there is agreement between the two traditions. The DUP currently represents the unionist tradition. It has the largest vote and is in the driving seat when it comes to whether there is to be a deal. Sinn Féin is in the driving seat in representing broad nationalism, not just republicanism. If we are to achieve any accommodation and get devolution up and running, there will have to be a deal at some stage between the Democratic Unionist Party and Sinn Féin. Do William and the DUP accept those statements as a political reality, whatever the timescale may be, and that, in the end, that will have to be the way in which devolution works?

Dr McCrea: In order for devolution to be restored on the terms that the Government have set out — at present, that is to restore the Executive — significant issues must be dealt with. However, in the House of Commons, the Secretary of State said that restoration was not the only path. He was perhaps challenging certain Members of the House from the nationalist community to take another route — that of voluntary coalition.

Therefore if a party is not willing to deal with the issues that are the impediments to devolution on the terms that the Government have set out, and we cannot move forward, we should form a voluntary coalition. In many ways, I resent the Government's terms, because what they, and the Irish Republic's Government, are saying to us is: "Unless you accept into your Government those whom we wouldn't accept, and are not willing to accept, because we do not believe that they come up to the mark of democracy, you can have no Government."

No other society would accept that. It is totally unreasonable for the Governments to say that a minority of people, who represent less than 20% of the population, could hold back devolution if 80% of the population were willing to form a voluntary coalition Government. Why should 80% of the population not form a Government? If we are supposed to have moved into a new era in which that 20% has turned its back on violence, and in which there are no guns and nothing to threaten devolved government, why would we not move forward? Who would threaten it, other than those who would say: "We will take another path if we can't be in government"?

The truth is that democracy alone has to be the basis of government. With the greatest respect to Alan McFarland, polluting democracy does not provide a foundation for progress or stability. We stated clearly in our presentation that accountability is one matter as regards the institutions, but their stability is another matter. I shall pose a question: there have been four suspensions in three years. What brought the institutions down? Each occasion involved paramilitary activity and the exposure of such deeds.

Say, for example, that we had a devolved Government, and it was found that, in the background, there was a store of IRA arms that that organisation used to train and carry on its activity. What would that do to our institutions and to democracy? People tell me all the time what our people want. Those whom the Democratic Unionist Party represents are fed up with Governments repeatedly rising and falling because of terrorist activity and criminality. They say that they do not want democracy to be polluted; they want to move forward on the grounds of democratic principles alone.

My party leader has said that we should have those grounds and that they should be totally democratic with complete allegiance to democracy and to the authority of the security forces in taking on those who threaten them. It is not enough to say, “We will not have the PIRA being active, but we will close our eyes to the Real IRA or the Continuity IRA”. Did we not see on this morning’s news that the bringing in of a group of weapons, which was a serious threat to the stability of Northern Ireland, was foiled? What others have not been foiled? There is a constant threat.

Is everyone saying clearly to the Democratic Unionist Party that if we had a Government and the Real IRA threatened its stability, every party in that Government would support the PSNI and the Army in taking on the Real IRA and the Continuity IRA and defeating them? Unless they do, they are not wedded totally to democracy.

We state clearly that parties cannot have it both ways. There must be stable institutions, and there are other ways forward if this one does not succeed. However, it will not succeed unless it comes up to the democratic test.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Alan, I will draw your attention to the fact that we must adjourn at 12.30 pm and we have one or two other questions.

Mr McFarland: The background philosophy is interesting and very important to the way forward. William is saying that if the IMC can show beyond reasonable doubt, while making the unionist community confident, that the republican movement, the military wing of Sinn Féin as was — or as is — has gone away and that criminality is down, and if it were believed that Sinn Féin were a democratic party, at that stage, whatever the time frame, the Democratic Unionist Party would go into government with it.

I think that is what they have said before in public, and I am taking it that —

Dr McCrea: May I just correct that. I read this out the other day. Our manifesto says:

“no-one who is associated with paramilitarism or criminality will be in any Executive”.

It goes on:

“Sinn Féin could then only be considered for entry to an Executive after

- Complete visible, verifiable decommissioning.”

— That is an issue that still has to be dealt with —

“- A total end to all paramilitary and criminal activity.

- The community is convinced the IRA has been stood down.”

We cannot have an army sitting in the wings that continues to threaten us. If there were a real renunciation of violence, if there were a real renunciation of terrorism and the path of terrorism and if that were totally wedded to, what would anyone want with such an organisation? I speak right across the community

now. There is no way in a democracy that you can have paramilitary groupings, irrespective of whether they come from the unionist community or the nationalist/republican community, sitting in the wings to threaten any democratic institution. The source of that is our November 2005 manifesto.

Mr McFarland: I want to tease out the voluntary coalition idea. It is quite interesting and one that we have looked at in the past. What I understood William to say was that since they do not accept at the moment that Sinn Féin is a bona fide democratic party, they would happily now go into government with the SDLP and ourselves and that that would be acceptable, despite the fact that Sinn Féin represents the majority of nationalism. I wonder if at a philosophical level he accepts that if, for example, the Ulster Unionist Party believed an IMC report that Sinn Féin was now a democratic party and the DUP did not believe it, that it would be OK for Sinn Féin and the SDLP and the Ulster Unionists to go into government when the DUP did not want to go into government. If it is OK, one could argue, to exclude the majority of nationalism, it should equally be OK, providing the circumstances felt right to the parties, to exclude the majority of unionism. I think in the past they have said on record that they do not believe it is right that they, as the majority of unionism, should be excluded. I am just trying to explore what the ground rules might be with different combinations of parties going into government with different levels of confidence.

Dr McCrea: In direct answer to that, I must say that the Ulster Unionist Party knows that we have difficulties now, and I pointed that out in answer to Naomi’s question. The Ulster Unionists, I believe, have got themselves onto a hook, and unless they get off it, it is going to make it very difficult. If they are linking themselves to a terrorist organisation through bringing in to its membership the leader of the political party that is the front for a terrorist organisation, that makes a voluntary coalition even more difficult. Again, that is not something of our making. We certainly desire an inclusive Executive but on completely democratic lines. We cannot have a Government that is tinged with either one organisation or with the other organisation threatening from the wings to destabilise the community or to bring that Government down. There is only one legitimate authority as regards the rule of law, and that is the police, aided by the Army.

We cannot have any private army sitting in the wings to pollute that. Therefore there is a difficulty. For a voluntary coalition to happen there is now a challenge to the Ulster Unionist Party to remove itself from the unhealthy relationship with a parliamentary organisation that it has through its recent decision. Now that is a decision which we cannot make, but it is one that that party must take.

Mr McFarland: Chairman, my question was that if, for example, we dissolved the UUPAG we might be, in the DUP's eyes, acceptable partners for Government.

Would it be acceptable for the Democratic Unionist Party, the Ulster Unionist Party and the SDLP to form a voluntary coalition and go into government, if we get to the stage in September where an IMC report says that the Sinn Féin leadership is dedicated to democratic politics, criminality is dropped to a level that the police can deal with, and it has somehow demonstrated that decommissioning had been complete or whatever?

Would the Democratic Unionist Party accept as a matter of principle at that stage that — although it might not be able to accept Sinn Féin in government — if Sinn Féin, the SDLP and the Ulster Unionist Party recreated the first Assembly on a voluntary coalition that three parties can go ahead without the major party in unionism? The suggestion is that the other parties go ahead without the lead party in nationalism. Is that a philosophically acceptable thing to do?

Dr McCrea: I suggest that that would certainly not lend itself to stability and I will give you the reason. Surely the Ulster Unionist Party has learned the lesson that it cannot just simply take the word of Sinn Féin/IRA? The UUP was nearly decimated because it jumped and said: "Now jump." Even to make that suggestion shows that there is no learning from the lessons of what has happened at the ballot box and over the last number of months, and I suggest that that would be a very good idea to test with the electorate.

I assure the Ulster Unionist Party that if it felt that it was in difficulties now, it would be in greater difficulties if it propounded that it would remove a democratic party to go into bed with those who have been inextricably linked — the UUP agreed with Sinn Féin's bona fides before. How many times do you have to get fingers burnt before you say: "Listen, I have my fingers in the fire here, I had better take them out."

To suggest that it would be right to throw out a democratic party — and concerning voluntary coalition I did notice that it was suggested here that it would be the SDLP, the Ulster Unionists and ourselves. We did not say that. There is no reason why the coalition would not be wider than that, which certainly would include the Alliance Party as well.

Mr McFarland: Chairman, I was just exploring the philosophy. I have a few more questions that I would like to ask but I see that time has beaten us.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Can we hold all the questions to — [Interruption.]

Mr M McGuinness: Chairman, I do not have a question, but I again take grave exception to the use of the term "Sinn Féin/IRA" in relation to the Sinn Féin delegation.

Mr McFarland: Chairman, can I just confirm that I can lead off after lunch?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Yes. 2.00 pm.

The Committee was suspended at 12.27 pm.

On resuming —

2.02 pm

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We now have a quorum. I have also received some apologies and changes.

Mr Murphy: John O'Dowd is here in place of Michelle Gildernew.

Ms Ritchie: I am here in place of Mark Durkan.

Mr Ford: Apologies from Naomi Long who hopes to join us later, and I hope that Kieran McCarthy will also be here before she arrives.

Mr McFarland: Chairman, I gave you my changes. Unfortunately the other two are not able to be here.

Dr McCrea: I hope that Maurice Morrow and Diane Dodds will join us shortly.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We finished before lunch with Alan and questions, so we will resume.

Mr McFarland: We were having a philosophical discussion before lunch, but I want to get some answers from William on more practical issues.

My next question concerns the status of the comprehensive agreement because we have heard in the media and indeed around the table here that — from what I understand as the SDLP's position, from what Martin McGuinness said yesterday and certainly from what we ourselves agree — we are not tied to the comprehensive agreement. There are bits of it that we fundamentally disagree with, particularly if we, or the SDLP, do not support the Ministers, we get removed from ministerial office leaving Sinn Féin and the DUP in Government together. So some of it is not completely satisfactory.

What is the status of the comprehensive agreement? We have heard in the media from members of the DUP that it is non-negotiable and that it is their part of the deal with the Government. Given that the other parties round the table — and Alliance, I am sure — are not comfortable with it, does the DUP see it being driven through with the Government? Does the DUP consider it as being solid and agreed already given that other parties have not bought into it?

Dr McCrea: We did not waste our time in the talks. They were intensive and extensive, and we certainly did not waste our time going into the talks to discover that we might as well not have been there. We do not intend to go back a base. I do not know what base they want us to go back to, but one thing is sure — we are not going back to the base of the Belfast Agreement.

Significant changes must be made, and while the comprehensive agreement does not address all the changes that we were looking for, we believe that the changes made have brought practical measures that will assist in stability and accountability. As far as the DUP is concerned, those issues that we have agreed with the Government are resolved, and we do not feel that there is any necessity to return to them.

Mr McFarland: So as far as the DUP is concerned, the changes are inviolate; they have been agreed by them and the Government even though none of the other parties have agreed them. Is that correct?

Dr McCrea: It depends on the position that one holds on these issues. We were told by the Government that others agreed with them. I do not know if that was window dressing by the Government, but those others are perhaps now trying to back off from what was in the comprehensive agreement. We do not intend to back down from what we agreed with the Government; likewise, we do not intend to back down from our principles. Whatever we intended, we agreed and we held to our principles.

One must remember that the Government will have to give the green light before the institutions can be restored. We believe that these are issues that must be addressed. If the Government want to move away from the comprehensive agreement, one must ask where they stand on that. Did they mislead us and other parties into believing that a comprehensive agreement was in place? Not only the Government but, I am led to believe, the Dublin Government and the American Government — thus showing it had international acceptance — had a clear understanding that it would provide a way forward to progress devolution. We would expect the Government to maintain that position.

Mr McFarland: Chairman, I will round this off.

Dr McCrea: Remember, this is an area that we are negotiating with the Government. We said that this is not the place to talk about such matters; we will discuss them with the Government. We will talk frankly to the Government about any issue they wish to raise with us again.

Mr McFarland: The part under the First Minister and Deputy First Minister section, for example, that the SDLP and the Ulster Unionists would be excluded from Government — is that still inviolate in here or do you see matters like that being re-examined? Are you having other negotiations with the Government, which we are not seeing and which are not in the comprehensive agreement?

Dr McCrea: We are in constant contact with the Government, and that is correct, as we are the largest party in Northern Ireland and certainly have a point to put forward. It is up to other parties how the Government deal with them and talk to them. I am not dictating to the Government how they deal with anybody. However, we are constantly meeting the Government and believe that the agreements that we reached with the Government before the comprehensive agreement are something that they will stand by. When does an agreement not become agreement? The Government must say where they stand on it.

Mr McFarland: I asked that question because — and this goes back to my earlier point — ultimately, if there has to be agreement between the lead voices of unionism and nationalism, it takes two or more to have an agreement. It is difficult to agree with oneself; I am just pointing out that there is an issue there.

My next question, on criminality, is slightly philosophical. I am trying to tease this out, but there is continuing difficulty with criminality — the IMC reports have set that out. An Organised Crime Task Force report published yesterday states that there has been a decrease in the level of criminality from the previous IMC report. Another IMC report on normalisation is due at the end of August, which will give a threat assessment that will presumably cover matters such as criminality. The next IMC report in October, which may be brought forward to September — will set out the position at that stage.

There is mafia-organised crime in America; and a relatively high level of organised crime is now endemic in society in eastern Europe, Russia, Europe and Great Britain. That is why the organised crime task force was set up and why a new FBI organisation is being set up to deal with serious organised crime — a sort of Serious Organised Crime Agency (SOCA) for the whole of the United Kingdom. It is recognised that there is an ambient level of organised crime throughout society. By how much would organised crime have to be lowered before it was acceptable to the DUP? Organised crime will never be eradicated, as it is endemic in all parts of society across the United Kingdom. What level would criminality have to reach before it became something that the police have to deal with rather than politicians?

Dr McCrea: There is a difference between organised crime and organised crime that is carried out by those who are connected to political groupings. They are totally different. The Government said that Sinn Féin and the IRA are two sides of the same coin — “inextricably linked” were their actual words. That is unacceptable in a democracy. Things will not change overnight, for criminality is endemic in certain parts of the republican movement and has been in their psyche for many years. They feel that it is good to rob the Government, to launder money, to take from society, not to pay taxes, and to take £245 million and not pay taxes on it to the Exchequer.

Paragraph 3.20 of the most recent IMC report states:

“PIRA continues to raise funds and we also believe that it looks to the long term exploitation of the proceeds of earlier crimes, for example, through the purchase of property or legitimate businesses. Some senior members are involved in money laundering and other crime. Money has become a key strategic asset. There has been some restructuring in the finance department, possibly in reflection of the changing circumstances. PIRA also seems to be using experts and specialists able to assist in the management of illegal assets.”

We cannot close our eyes to what would not be accepted in America or in any other society. The most recent IMC report cannot give a clean bill of health to the IRA because the truth is that its criminality runs deep. The IMC talks about what it knows to go on on the surface. This is a quote from the most recent IMC report:

“There are indications that some members, including some senior ones ... are still involved in crime, including offences such as fuel laundering, money laundering, extortion, tax evasion and smuggling ... We have no reason to amend our earlier view that money is a strategic asset and that the organisation will look to the long-term exploitation of discreetly laundered assets which were previously gained illegally.”

It cannot be suggested that that will change in a short time — the report states that criminality is actually done strategically. The members of the commission believe that the PIRA has been using experts and specialists to manage its illegal assets.

We must be satisfied that criminality is over. Those who are in Government cannot be associated in any shape or form with those — from whatever part of the community — who are living off criminal assets. For example, the £20 million from the Northern Bank robbery has never been found, and yet it was said that that money was supposed to be the Provos’ pension fund.

2.15 pm

A pension fund should not be based on criminality and £20 million bank robberies. There must be transparency and the DUP has to be convinced of that, as we cannot allow ourselves to move away from what the community thinks. The community must be convinced that criminality has been dealt with and is over for good. Paramilitarism and the total decommissioning of terrorist weapons must be concluded, because we cannot have a two-way process or ride both horses.

Mr McFarland: Chairman, can I ask William how he sees the issue of loyalist decommissioning being resolved? He has said that it must be resolved.

Dr McCrea: Decommissioning must be resolved in the same way as decommissioning from any grouping is resolved. We have not been uneven-handed as regards our demand for decommissioning. There is a famous quote that “murder is murder is murder” — it does not matter whether it is one side or the other. There is no place in civilised society and in a democratic society, which is the basis of a civilised society, for paramilitary groupings to threaten the stability of the state. Decommissioning must be dealt with effectively, and the community must be assured that it has been dealt with. Across Northern Ireland there are people who purport to belong to paramilitary groupings, and they live off the grief of others and act as dictators in estates throughout the community. That must be tackled and brought to a final conclusion.

Mr McNarry: William, if all other issues were resolved except loyalist decommissioning, would that keep you out of Government?

Dr McCrea: We made it abundantly clear in my statement. The DUP manifesto states that no one who is associated with paramilitarism or criminality will be in any Executive in Northern Ireland. There are groupings that are not totally democratic parties, and they will not be in Government. That is a challenge for those who are linked with those paramilitary groupings. Our manifesto is clear that no one who is associated with paramilitarism or criminality will be in any Executive. There is no equivocation there, and in a democratic society the community can equate with and applaud that.

Mr McNarry: I understand that, and there is no equivocation. However, the point that I am trying to grapple with is whether, if loyalists failed to decommission, that would prevent you from entering into government.

Dr McCrea: I said earlier, and Mr McNarry was not here, that tragically the line has been blurred. In many ways Sinn Féin has been allowed off the hook on this issue, because when the Ulster Unionists linked up with the PUP, which is the political face of the UVF, they completely blurred the clear lines that had been there for many years.

As far as the DUP is concerned, until now the Ulster Unionists did not have that link, so their participation in an Executive would not blur that line whatsoever. That, therefore, would not stop the establishment of an Executive if every other grouping were based on democratic lines alone. If all parties had renounced violence; supported the police; ensured that decommissioning had taken place; ensured a stable society that builds on the foundation of democracy alone; we could certainly move forward.

There is ground to move forward and to give us a stable Assembly. Then, no matter what forces come against us, we must, as a body, say that irrespective of whichever paramilitary group threatens, whether from one side of the community or the other, the security forces have the backing of that Executive to defeat terrorism. There can be no equivocation on that. They must back the security forces in ensuring that terrorism, from whatever source, is defeated. Because if we do not have that and people start saying, "Ah, well now I know those boys", and the line that they are former associates or friends and they know their families comes into it, quite honestly democracy is being polluted.

Mr McNarry: If you would indulge me, Chairman, may I go back to the issue of criminality and stretch it widely? What would Dr McCrea's take be if vigilantes spontaneously organised, or were organised by a political grouping, as in the past, and were doing so to combat everyday crime that affects us and to protect the vulnerable and the elderly? Given that there is a genesis and a history of this, it is important that we have an assessment regarding vigilantes and the action that they may enter into now.

Dr McCrea: First, that is a hypothetical situation, and I do not honestly believe that that is the remit of this Committee in scoping the issues. We cannot set up little groupings that take over different communities. That is a very dangerous road to go down. There is one police force, one group of law and order in this country, and that is the PSNI in the Province.

One cannot start allocating responsibility for the maintenance of law and order to any other grouping, however well meaning it may be when it starts. Unfortunately, in the past there were those who came in and turned sour what was then said to be reasonable and rational and was intended to be about looking after the local community, and they took over communities. We should not abdicate the authority from the one legitimate authority — the police force and the security forces in Northern Ireland — to maintain proper law and order and deal with crime. That is where we should leave the responsibility.

Mr Morrow: Mr Deputy Speaker, we need a ruling because we are going to run into trouble here, with Members coming in not having heard previous discussion and having no knowledge of it. Some of the questions that I have been asked have been asked and answered before. Unless a Member is fully up to date, I am doubtful that he should be allowed to cross-question and cross-examine. We are going to have a whole rehash of this with different people coming in and out at different intervals.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): It is limited and the additions are along the lines of creating a discussion more than anything.

Mr McFarland: Chairman, that would be a fair enough comment if in fact the entire delegation had changed, but I have just asked Mr McNarry to ask those questions. I could ask them if Mr Morrow wants, but we do not want to get silly about this.

Mr Morrow: I think that Mr McFarland should ask the questions. He has a better understanding of what has been said.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We are probably moving into a new situation now. Patsy McGlone is on next.

Mr McGlone: I have heard and listened to the concerns of the DUP. William McCrea said that, subject to matters around security and criminality being addressed, there is ground to move forward to a stable Assembly. I would like a wee bit more clarity on that insofar as he will be aware that there is a perception out there that the DUP is not interested in moving to agreement. In terms of either allaying or addressing that perception, may I ask William, in the interests of wider public confidence in the political process, to clarify: does the DUP object to an inclusive power-sharing Executive?

Dr McCrea: At the beginning and at the end of my statement I made it clear that the Democratic Unionist Party was a devolutionist party before some other parties sitting around this table. We have always been a devolutionist party, while others abandoned devolution, therefore we do believe that that is important.

However, I must say that it must be a pure democracy and not one that is definitely, clearly, openly polluted for everyone to see; polluted by paramilitary activity, by criminality and by failure to accept the forces of law and order in the defeat of crime. Therefore we are up for devolution. But make no mistake about it: we are not up for devolution at any price. Devolution at a price that destroys democracy is not for the people of Northern Ireland, and we shall certainly not be giving credence to it.

Mr McGlone: I hear exactly what you are saying William. So, subject to those issues being allayed or addressed, the answer is that you do not have any objections to it.

Dr McCrea: We have no objection to devolution.

Mr McGlone: Who specifically?

Dr McCrea: I am not going to pretend that I like the devolution that is being proposed by the Government. That would be a foolish statement, because I genuinely believe that no one would believe me if I did say that. I am certainly not here to try to pretend anything, give some false impression or put on some false face. What you see is what you get when I am making my submission or trying to address the issues that have been addressed to me.

Whilst it is not the devolution that I like, because I certainly believe that it is an unacceptable position to be told that there will be no Executive unless it has all the Members sitting round, with Sinn Féin in it. I do not believe that any other party in the United Kingdom, and it is certainly not the case in the South, would accept it. They have had their problems in the past as well, and they are still telling us that they would not have Sinn Féin in government. They are still telling us that to this day, not only the opposition parties but the Prime Minister of the Irish Republic, who tells us what we have to do to get devolution here.

But, as far as we are concerned, we believe that we can have a devolved government, and we are up for a devolved government that is based solidly and solely upon democratic principles, and that no party and no one who is associated with paramilitarism or criminality will be in an Executive in Northern Ireland. That is our bottom line.

Mr Murphy: That neatly brings us on to my question that teases out a little bit about the position of the UUP Assembly Group (UUPAG), which is the title that they have adopted for themselves.

William McCrea said and repeated very firmly that no one who is associated with any of these issues and does not satisfy the DUP would be in government. I just wonder does the DUP make a distinction between for instance David Ervine being in government and another member of the UUP being in government. I asked this question the other day: is there a distinction in the DUP's view between any individual member of the UUPAG being in government or does that apply only to some individual member whom the DUP considers to have such linkages?

William focused very much on ministerial accountability in his presentation, and he referred to Ministers in the previous Executive acting as little gods. Does he agree now that ministerial accountability or collective responsibility in the Executive would mean that no Minister could refuse to attend the Executive and that no Minister could refuse to represent the Executive on other institutions that are appropriate to their remit? The sort of behaviour that happened in the past would not be acceptable in the future.

2.30 pm

Dr McCrea: There is a basic necessity, and that is that the unionist community has no confidence in the Belfast Agreement. That is fact, not fiction. That issue has to be resolved. There has to be a resolution of the matter so that an agreement and the way in which we are governed not only benefits the nationalist community but the unionist community too.

At the end of my presentation I stated that devolution must be democratic and that it must work in the interests of unionists as well as nationalists. As far as the previous Executive was concerned, they did not have the backing of the majority of unionism — neither did the Belfast Agreement have the backing of the unionist community. As time has passed it has been totally divorced from the Belfast Agreement and therefore those changes are needed.

As far as accountability is concerned, the major fundamental issue is this: there has to be a mechanism by which Ministers are accountable, in the final analysis, to the Assembly. In Westminster, Ministers are accountable to Parliament, and Ministers recently found that to their cost whenever they refused to accept that accountability. In fact, many of them lost office because they tried to push through unacceptable positions and policies that made their position untenable. There has to be accountability for everyone, and if we were in government our Ministers would have to be accountable like every other Minister. We have never run away from accountability because we believe that it is an essential ingredient of moving forward. Therefore I have no problem whatever in making that clear.

I am making no further comment other than to say that our manifesto states:

“that no-one who is associated with paramilitarism or criminality will be in any Executive in Northern Ireland”.

That is the position of the DUP, and it is on that basis that I have been elected, and I am giving you clear understanding of that.

Mr Murphy: Now that we have the benefit of Hansard we can note that that is about the third time that that question has been fudged by the DUP in relation to the specifics — whether this applies specifically to David Ervine or to the UUPAG group as a whole.

I wish to pick up on the comments that Diane Dodds made on equality. I am interested in her and the DUP's criteria for the allocation of funding on an equitable basis. She referred to festival funding in Belfast. In the overall public spend it is but a drop in the ocean; nonetheless, it is important to those communities to which it is given. She appeared to advocate that rather than be allocated on the basis of objective need, such funding should be allocated on the basis that if a nationalist area gets a certain amount of funding, then a unionist area should get an equal amount.

How does she see that that would follow through in relation to Government procurement and Invest Northern Ireland — when the big money is being spent, not just the thousands of pounds that are allocated to festival funding? For instance, if it spends £2 million in attracting businesses to East Belfast, should it spend £2 million attracting businesses to West Tyrone or to Newry and Armagh? Is the basis for equitable distribution of public funds that what goes to the unionist communities must also go to the nationalist communities, or vice versa? Is that the basis on which the DUP argues for equality or is it on the basis of objective need? It would be helpful to have that clarified.

William McCrea remarked this morning that there was no confidence within unionism in how decommissioning was handled in relation to how the IRA dealt with its weapons. Does he feel that the way in which the Loyalist Volunteer Force (LVF) dealt with its weaponry in the full glare of the media gave any confidence to the nationalist community? Does he suspect that that is the case?

To correct him: he claimed that it was insisted that demilitarisation be given the full glare of media coverage. Sinn Féin did not insist that the TV cameras accompanied the dismantlement of any army watchtowers. That was something that the British Government felt was beneficial to themselves. Perhaps he can make some helpful suggestion on this, but removing a 50-ft tall structure that is the size of a small village from a mountain top without somebody noticing is a very difficult proposition indeed. It certainly was not Sinn Féin's request that such actions be captured on camera.

I would like to know whether he feels that the LVF's very public method of dealing with its weapons gave any degree of confidence to the nationalist community or, indeed, to the unionist community.

Dr McCrea: First, I totally deny that there has been any fudge. In fact, I am delighted that there is a proper record, which will give a clear understanding of what we said, not what some with seemingly selective hearing are willing to believe that we said. The record will stand in its own right.

Secondly, as regards decommissioning, the truth of the matter is this: it is a fact — whether people want to accept it or not — that there is no confidence whatever in the manner in which decommissioning took place. In fact, we had different reports from different persons. Some suggested that all weapons were gone; others suggested that it was dated weapons; and others did not want to say — they wanted to take what they did or did not see to their grave.

As far as the community is concerned, it must be satisfied. There has to be verifiable decommissioning.

Therefore as regards the LVF, as far as the loyalist community is concerned, once you divide the weapons up and cut them into pieces, it certainly would be hard to put Humpty Dumpty together again. However, I am not suggesting that that way gives confidence to all the unionist community. The point that I will make is that the LVF will not be in government — that is one thing for sure — and it certainly will not be in any Executive.

linked to, terrorist groupings. Certainly there has to be confidence within the unionist community that decommissioning has been carried out in a verifiable way. I am sure that it is clearly known where these weapons are, and so there can still be visible and verifiable decommissioning. We do not even know how the weapons were decommissioned or how many of them were. In fact, I am told that had we known how few weapons were decommissioned the first time, it would have been a common joke within society. Even on this occasion, we are told by some of the witnesses that none of the up-to-date weapons were decommissioned. So there has to be confidence.

As regards equality, we believe that there must be confidence within the community. The community has identified what it believes to be issues. There is total inequality, and that has even been acknowledged by Europe, and it is now trying to get within the unionist communities to address that. When Europe accepts it, no one should close his eyes to the reality of funding here, not only with European funds, but with other funds as well. Those issues have to be seriously addressed.

Mrs D Dodds: I just want to make a quick addition to that. I quoted the example of the Belfast Festival fund because it is a very good example of inequality being institutionalised by Government. Prior to the embargo, a number of festival groups had applied for funding. As it happened, on that occasion all the groups were from nationalist communities in Belfast. What the Government did, by imposing a moratorium on the festival spend and on any other groups applying, was to actually institutionalise the inequality. They embedded the inequality further.

What I am saying is that equality is for everyone. Just because you do not like someone does not mean that they do not have the right to have equality and be treated in an equitable manner within our society. It is for everyone. That is the point that I was making. What had happened on that occasion was that the Government Department in question had actually managed to institutionalise the inequality by saying that the groups that had applied would continue to be funded and that nobody else need apply while we discussed and debated a new festival policy among ourselves. That that took us two or three years to do was neither here nor there.

Now we have more openness and transparency and anyone can apply. Whatever way it is handed out, it is handed out. I do not even have the figures on that with me today.

Mr Murphy: Just to finish with a couple of observations. First, in relation to clarifying the issue, William still has not clarified whether, if everything else in relation to Sinn Féin and everyone else was satisfied in the morning and the UUPAG as currently constituted was ready to go into government, that would be acceptable to the DUP as a group, or if its sole objection in relation to that would be David Ervine. He has not clarified that.

Also, can I make the point that when he talks about the verification of the destruction of arms, Ulster Resistance weapons are still out there somewhere. I am not sure where they are, and I am not sure whether people that William knows are sure where they are. That is an issue that has yet to be dealt with.

Finally, I thank Diane for her answer but it was me, Conor Murphy of Sinn Féin, who asked the question. She chose to give her answer to the SDLP group, and I am sure that it has an interest in it, but it would be helpful if we could have a bit of respect for each other and address each other when we ask questions.

Dr Farren: I hope it is not too soon to say that while I am pleased to hear what I am hearing — and I am not in agreement with everything that I hear — at least we are moving into some kind of more open engagement that is helping to clarify in some respects.

My main question is essentially the same one with which I began this morning's questioning of the Alliance Party. If we are to make progress, we need to distinguish between those issues that are essential to restoration and other issues which, however desirable it might be to arrive at a resolution of whatever the problems are, are not essential. Obviously if we could identify, clarify and resolve everything before 24 November that would be great, but it seems to me that our agenda could be such that the burden would be too heavy for us in whatever format we agree they should be addressed in order to reach that resolution.

I seek some clarification because I find, throughout the document that the DUP has submitted, the phrase "must be resolved" or "needs to be addressed prior to restoration to devolution" — that second one is in relation to a number of issues under the heading of policing and criminal justice. It begins with, for example, the "discriminatory fifty-fifty recruitment policy", and the paragraph finishes by saying that "these issues need to be addressed prior to the restoration of devolution". Is the DUP saying that that is an essential issue to be addressed?

On the parades issue: "it is vital that this issue is addressed now before devolution is restored." On the question of equality and human rights, I am interested in the kind of points that have been made. There is not such a strong demand made, but the DUP says that "it is critical that these issues be addressed as a matter of urgency to allow the necessary political progress to be made", which could be interpreted as meaning they have to be resolved before restoration.

With respect to the reference under “accountability of institutions to the comprehensive agreement”, it seems to me that the DUP has fully accepted what the comprehensive agreement contains. Certainly, we have very strong reservations, to the point where we reject the comprehensive agreement.

While there were discussions, as I said this morning, between the parties on the review matters — which to some extent you might say are addressed within the comprehensive agreement — in the final analysis, in the final run up to the comprehensive agreement, parties were excluded. These matters deal with the manner in which we should relate to each other within the new institutions, yet the DUP seems to be saying that any resolution to the problems of how we relate within the institutions should only be addressed in negotiation with the British Government.

The British Government are not going to be present in the Executive. The British Government are not going to be present in the North/South Ministerial Council. They may be present in the east-west institution but the other institutions require some engagement with us, and I am certainly not going to abdicate to the British Government, or indeed to the Irish Government, matters that are essentially to do with the relationships between the parties around this table.

So, I need to get some clarification — and I think, out of this initial round of discussions and engagement on the papers we have presented, we all do — and some sense of the essential issues to be addressed; how we are going to address them; and the issues on which we might make some progress, even to the point of resolution, but which are not absolutely essential in order to enable restoration to take place on 24 November. That is a question that I will come back to in all of the discussions here until we get some kind of way forward. It is only by answering that key question that we can really move in some meaningful way to involve the Assembly.

Although the DUP says that matters have to be resolved on the Floor of the Assembly, at the moment all that we could get would be some indication as to what Members of the Assembly think the priorities are for this Committee, and while that might be helpful, it would almost bring us back to the point where we are at the moment. We would need to sift through what the Assembly might say in such a debate and sort out the essentials from the non-essentials — and by non-essentials I do not mean issues that do not require to be addressed.

I beg your pardon for that lengthy question, but my question is about the essentials and non-essentials.

Dr McCrea: Well, I have said from the word go that my colleagues and I see that this Committee is not for negotiations. We are here to scope the issues. When I asked what the word “scope” meant, an NIO dictionary expert said that it meant “identify the issues”.

There is a danger in having a twin-track approach. It is dangerous to say that if all this was resolved then everything could possibly fall into line, because there are issues in all of these things that are cardinal and important and have got to be resolved.

There are major issues concerning stability, such as the undermining of it by terrorist activity and criminality and all the rest of it. On the other hand, there is instability by not having a system of government that will not be stable in its own right. Therefore, I do not think that the twin track approach will necessarily resolve the situation.

There are issues that only those parties that are associated with terrorist organisations can resolve. They must come up to the democratic mark. That is a fact. And, although Seán rightly says that parties felt that they were left out of substantive negotiations on a comprehensive agreement; that was not by our request.

To the best of my knowledge, at no time have we ever refused to talk to the SDLP and put views on what was going on. We have not taken that stance, because we accept its democratic bona fides and credentials. Therefore there was no desire that the SDLP or any other party that we believed was simply and directly a democratic party should have been left out of that loop. I was at Leeds Castle, and to the best of my knowledge, my colleague, as Chair of the party, and I, as Vice-Chair, did not know of that being done.

How the Government deal with parties is a different thing. For example, the Ulster Unionist paper that was put in front of us really said that it does not have to deal with these issues; there was no need for them. You cannot have it both ways. Let me read exactly what it says.

Dr Farren: Can I make an intervention? I hope the “you” did not refer to the SDLP.

Dr McCrea: No, it referred to the Ulster Unionists. They stated:

“There is a political reality that all of us would do well to bear in mind. With the threat of repartition from the RPA, the potential destruction of our education system, extra taxation . . . This can only happen if there is a deal between Unionism and Nationalism.”

They go on:

“The DUP now represent the majority in unionism and, whether they like it or not, the majority of nationalism is represented by Sinn Féin. Thus, the deal needs to be done between the DUP and Sinn Féin . . . It would be useful for other parties if the DUP and Sinn Féin could identify their terms for a deal.”

So, that says that we step out of the game here, but you cannot – there are parties objecting because they were left out of the comprehensive agreement; on the other hand they say they should be out of it.

I know that that is not the SDLP position. All I say is that that was the position of some of the other parties.

We certainly did not leave any of those parties out with regard to the comprehensive agreement, and we did not believe that they should be left out. In my opinion, the Ulster Unionists, the SDLP, the Alliance Party, were essential ingredients in what should have been a comprehensive agreement.

However, as regards devolution and dealing with issues, we deal on negotiations with our Government. That happens to be the British Government, and they can tell us here what to do or what not to do. Therefore, if they are so much in control, we should be the people to deal with. They are the people we want to negotiate with.

And while there are those parties that have a clear record of being inextricably linked to a terrorist organisation we do not accept their democratic credentials. We have said that ad nauseam. This is not something new, said by me or by some folk representing the DUP. Right from the top of our party, our leadership has said that over and over again, and I am not in a position in this Committee – neither do I request it – to negotiate.

Dr Farren: That response still leaves the key question to which I am trying to get an answer, unanswered. I cannot see us making headway if we have to address everything with the same level of urgency. In a sense what is being suggested by the DUP is that equality issues – and they are important – are as important as the many other issues with regard to policing, to assurances and with respect to ending paramilitarism and criminality, and so on. We have to face up to this question in some form or other.

I totally reject the suggestion that we should be excluded or that we ever attempted to exclude ourselves. We certainly did not, and we made our representations very clear in the strongest possible way that I can recollect us ever doing, before the two Prime Ministers at Leeds Castle, about the manner in which discussions and negotiations were being conducted. I find it disappointing that the DUP still prefers to engage in a direct channel with the British Government. The British Government have a role to play, but they, as I said previously, will not be part of the Executive or part of the North/South Ministerial Council. It is the parties round here that will constitute those institutions and that have to be dealt with. Until we have some resolution to the central question, I do not see us making an awful lot more progress, interesting and useful as the exchanges we are engaging in here are.

I have one or two specific questions. One relates to the whole question of partnership within Government. Just as the DUP makes the case that confidence has to be built within the unionist community as to the democratic credentials, as it puts it, of parties that would be part of any Executive, so too is there an obligation on the DUP to build confidence within the nationalist community that it would operate within the spirit of partnership. When I look around for examples, and I do not have to look very far, given the constituency that I represent, of how DUP representatives conduct themselves with respect to relationships with the nationalist community, both in district councils and, indeed, with the wider nationalist community, when it comes to matters related to the issue that Diane raised – the allocation of grants to various organisations located within the nationalist community – I do not find always a great deal of reassurance on this particular issue. While it has not been referred to specifically in the DUP's submission, I just ask if the DUP accepts that there is an obligation with respect to confidence building in this regard as far as the nationalist community is concerned.

Dr McCrea: First of all, I did not want to give the impression when I used the illustration of the Ulster Unionists that I equated that with the stance that the SDLP took during the Leeds Castle party talks. If I gave the impression that you personally absented yourselves or agreed to not being part of those intensive negotiations and the comprehensive agreement, I certainly did not want to do so.

The clarification that Mr Farren has already given is on the record, and I concur with that. They did not absent themselves or request to be absented from the detailed discussions.

However, all I did was point out that there were others who say today that they should have been part of it yet take a completely different stance in these papers. I also said that, to the best of my memory, we sought several meetings with the SDLP during the Leeds Castle talks and we found them helpful. That does not mean that we always agreed, but at least we accepted that we trust each other's credentials as regards informing each other of where we were coming from.

With regard to partnership in Government, Seán Farren mentioned the vexed situation in district councils. It would be best for the SDLP and everybody else if they sometimes stayed away from that issue. I shall give you a bit of history. In 1973, I went into local government, so I am in my thirty-fourth year there. Since 1981 the DUP has been the leading unionist party in Magherafelt District Council. For most of that time, the SDLP was the leading nationalist party. From 1981 to 2002 — 21 years — the DUP was denied chairmanship of that council. For most of that time, we were also denied the vice-chairmanship of the council. Yet, we were the leading unionist party, with at least double the votes of the next biggest unionist party. I was the subject of that discrimination for all those years, so it would not necessarily be the best thing to throw what is happening in North Antrim in my face.

At the same time, there was not a great history of DUP chairmanship or vice-chairmanship in Down District Council. It would be interesting to know when over the past 20 years DUP members became chairman or vice-chairman in that council.

3.00 pm

Therefore one should not start to throw these things around as regards those who are genuine in partnership. We had another example of it last night in Magherafelt's annual meeting, which was supposed to be conducted under d'Hondt. Sinn Féin took the position of chairman. As last year, the vice-chairmanship was to be for the DUP because it was the leading unionist party. However, what did we find? Sinn Féin instead made a call upon an Ulster Unionist — I am led to believe made a visit and a contact certainly — offering a particular Ulster Unionist the seat. Sinn Féin also clearly stated that if that Ulster Unionist did not take the seat, the SDLP would get it and that no unionist would be either chairman or vice-chairman.

It is amazing how underbelly dealings and the truth come out. The truth is that Sinn Féin proposed the Ulster Unionist for the chairmanship, he turned it down, and the SDLP took the seat. The SDLP said that it was sad that the positions were not cross community. My response was that if it was so sad about that, all it had to do was refuse the position and the seat would have automatically come to us. However, he did not refuse it.

Therefore when it comes to lectures about all of this, let us have none to those who have suffered discrimination in local government for over 20 years. I am probably the longest-serving district councillor around this table today, so I know for how long that discrimination has gone on. If we are talking about real partnership, it is important that other parties that try to undermine and pick out certain areas know that their cupboard is clean before they start pointing the finger about partnership in Government.

Dr Farren: I suppose I should have warned myself about making the point, because the last thing that I wanted to invite was a rehearsal of all the wrongs that have been enacted on whatever side in our district councils. All I was doing was saying that on both sides, we need reassurances — that was the main point, and it was for the future.

It is so easy, of course, to jump immediately and point to the mote in the other person's eye. I take credit on the SDLP's behalf for promoting the whole concept and practice of partnership — maybe not always with the best results, but nonetheless it was characteristic of our attempts to work local government in a new spirit.

However, I have not heard the reassurances that I sought. Perhaps the DUP would reflect on that and take on board the need to provide those. I cannot speak for anybody else, but if we are to re-create our institutions, they have to be characterised by a working relationship that reflects a concept of partnership in a positive rather than an acrimonious sense.

There are one or two other points that I would like to make. The first is on what was said about our contacts with the DUP. I do recall being at one of the late-night meetings at Leeds Castle, where we presented a lengthy series of recommendations to the DUP in respect of matters under the review of the operation of the Good Friday Agreement. To the best of my knowledge the DUP has not yet come back to us on those submissions, and I would be anxious to hear about that. Maybe because it endorsed the comprehensive agreement it does not want to come back to us on those issues, but we certainly do not accept the comprehensive agreement as an appropriate working document here.

I have another question, related to the confidence that the DUP says the Unionist community needs with respect to paramilitarism and all of that. Who, in the view of the DUP, are the arbiters in terms of providing that confidence, at least in a factual sense, to the Unionist community? Is the DUP going to second-guess what is reported by such bodies as the Independent Monitoring Commission, or indeed, the decommissioning body? Those agencies were set up under Government authority with the brief to carry out various tasks in respect of decommissioning and the ending of paramilitarism and criminality. Yet the progress that is made is at best grudgingly acknowledged and is never enough. My question is a simple one — when is enough enough, and who are to be the arbiters of enough?

Over the next few months we are going to be faced with a number of reports from the IMC in particular. Are these not going to be enough? If it is clear from what they report that certain facts exist on the ground, then that will be there for all to see. However, I am very concerned at the response that the DUP has almost programmed itself into making towards these reports — that enough is never enough.

Dr McCrea: As regards the councils, we are looking to the future. In actual fact, the Magherafelt situation was last night, and that was as close to the future as you could possibly get — that was done at 6.30 pm.

I am not going back into history. I am certainly not going back to some of the previous situations, but I would ask the Member to please take heart and remember that the unionist people did put our friend in Larne in as mayor. Do take heart from some of the positive movements forward and also in Belfast. Larne is a situation where there is a large unionist population, so, as I said in the Business Committee when there were parties talking about frustrations, we are coming with a positive attitude — we are positive about what we are doing — though that may not be looked upon as positive by others. We know exactly what we are doing, and we know exactly where we are going, so we are positive. That may be looked upon as negative by nationalism.

Dr Farren: I would certainly regard Larne as a positive move.

Dr McCrea: It was a positive move.

Mr Morrow: Castlereagh.

Dr McCrea: Castlereagh as well. Let us therefore please bring this positivity into this whole situation rather than try to take away from it. You may actually be trying to bite the very hand that is trying to feed you. We are trying to work together, but we get no thanks for it. It is just thrown back in our faces. In actual fact the words I am going to use are: when is enough enough? That is what you said a moment ago: “When is enough enough?” It seems to me that there is no satisfying your needs or sometimes your greeds. It works both ways, you know. I was posed the question: “When is enough enough?” We have asked the question about policing: when is enough enough? It was not enough to have fifty-fifty with regard to policing: there had to be discrimination against the unionist community.

When is enough enough? This hand always seems to be out; it is a one-way process. Well, the unionist community has seen one thing after another being handed away by the demands of, especially, violent republicanism, and we are fed up with it. In actual fact the unionist community is saying: “Enough is enough. We are not willing to accept the eroding away of every aspect of our Britishness and democratic rights in this society.” I am glad you asked: “When is enough enough?” I will just ask you the same.

With regard to who: in the final analysis it is the people, the general public, who will decide. We were threatened so many times by: “Let us have an election, and we will see that the DUP does not have the support of the people.” We are happy to test it at any time with the people. I do believe that the general public will be the arbiters, and we will be asking our community, the unionist community, just exactly whether they are satisfied. We will take account of the statements of the police. It is important to hear what the police have got to say. It is important to hear what the Army has to say and the security forces and services. It is important to hear what the IMC has got to say.

Concerning the decommissioning body, if ever there was an expensive exercise, it certainly was that. It is costing millions of pounds. On one of the occasions it was very clear that Gen de Chastelain was totally embarrassed by what he was asked to do — to come out and try to tell us that we had real, genuine decommissioning when in actual fact he was totally embarrassed and so were the Government at the end of the day. After the recent round of it, we found out that there was not one barrack-buster in any of the decommissioning, yet that was certainly one tool of terrorism that they had, not only to murder people within the barracks but also to destroy and demolish the security bases. We found out that not one — not one — was actually in this. So we do need to get an inventory, and we do need to hear exactly what is happening. In the final analysis, we believe that our voters, as well as others, will decide the issue.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Margaret Ritchie is next. Perhaps we could begin to wind up because we have spent two hours on the DUP submission, and we need to move on to the next one.

Ms Ritchie: I wish to provide clarification, first of all, on Mr McCrea’s comments about Down District Council, of which I have been a member for 21 years. I must say that, since 1973, the SDLP has pioneered and participated in a power-sharing arrangement between the two main traditions.

Cognisant of and recognising the fact that minority parties were not represented on the statutory committees, we ensured, on an incremental basis, that power sharing was built in from the mid-80s onwards. The DUP has benefited from that. In fact, the SDLP ensured that the DUP and Sinn Féin obtained positions on the statutory committees, and I know that my colleagues and I ensured that.

A very telling comment is that your colleague, who chairs this Committee on occasions, acknowledged the power-sharing arrangements that were pioneered by the SDLP in Down, and he also acknowledged our generosity. I, as a member of Down District Council, would like to put that on the record because this issue is raised on various occasions by the DUP in another House.

3.15 pm

As late as last year, during the chairmanship of my colleague in Down, we also ensured that the DUP obtained recognition in that it was given responsibility in attending functions and, in fact, represented the chair of the council in London at several meetings to do with Trafalgar. To record the words of the Member's colleague in Down, we made his day by letting him go.

Mr Morrow: Was that Mr Wells?

Ms Ritchie: Mr Wells was the one who acknowledged that we were generous in Down towards the DUP, and he acknowledged that publicly in the council chamber. That was also acknowledged by the UUP on many occasions. I would like to put that issue to bed.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Could we move away from local government?

Mr Morrow: Mr Deputy Speaker, could I just ask one question on that? I know that Margaret gave me the date, but I have missed it. Could she give me the date when the DUP was in the chair in Down?

Ms Ritchie: The DUP has not been in the chair, but it will be in the chair. I have to explain this, Mr Deputy Speaker. We extended full d'Hondt last year, and the DUP group leader in Down attended the leaders' meeting, which was convened by the clerk of the council, and the DUP members agreed that they would get the vice-chair, according to the proportionality arrangements under d'Hondt, in the final year of this current mandate.

Mr Morrow: There was no opportunity during the past 30 years to do it; I accept that.

Ms Ritchie: I am not saying that. I am saying that you got your proportionality according to membership, which varied from two to three over the last 34 years, out of a council of 23. I think that we have been fair and generous when I compare that to arrangements in other areas, whilst acknowledging that there has been movement this year to my colleagues in other councils.

I shall move on to North/South relations. I note that the DUP has said in its paper:

"For unionists to give such support, it is necessary to ensure that such relations are based on what is in the practical interests of the people of Northern Ireland."

I am mindful of what the deputy leader of the DUP stated to the Small Firms Association in 2004 — that he could see areas where North/South co-operation could make sense. I am also mindful of what the Member of Parliament for Lagan Valley said on Radio Ulster some months ago about the benefits and the great construction work that was done on the Belfast-Dublin corridor, and the great expedition of that work, and the economic benefits that it would bring to the North of Ireland.

Could I ask the DUP whether it could specify and name the areas where North/South co-operation could make sense, and whether it would be willing to sign up to those and, I suppose, in the final analysis, to the North/South Ministerial Council?

Dr McCrea: I will not go down the road of the position of south Down. To the best of my knowledge, however, neither the chairman nor the vice-chairman — and I have been in politics for 34 years — of Down District Council has come from the DUP. That is a matter for scrutiny. All the protestations are a wee bit — [Interruption.]

We are looking forward to progress in that field in several councils. Let us move in that direction.

As for the North/South bodies, I wholeheartedly concur with my deputy leader that there are areas in which it would make sense to have co-operation — that is what neighbours do. However, I will not accept interference in the internal affairs of Northern Ireland; that is what neighbours do not do. In the past, there has been interference in the internal affairs of Northern Ireland. It is a wee bit of a cheek for a foreign Prime Minister to tell us what Government we can or cannot have in our own country — this is a part of the United Kingdom.

There are areas for co-operation; that is what North/South bodies are for, but those bodies must be answerable. As we have stated in our paper, for relations to be effective, accountable and to prosper, it is necessary that they receive support across the community. There is discrimination against the unionist population in the make-up of the North/South bodies, and there is discrimination in the religious makeup of the North/South bodies. North/South co-operation must be on a solid basis: there must be no discrimination and the traffic must not be all one-way. I believe in co-operation. It makes sense, for example, to have co-operation in agriculture, transport and electricity, and co-operation on those matters has been going on for years.

The North/South bodies should not exist to threaten somebody's identity; they should exist for the furtherance of good government for the people of Northern Ireland and of the Irish Republic. That is what good neighbourliness is all about. Make no mistake about it, however: I will sign up to nothing until we see what the package is. There are major parts of the package to which we could not agree. We will not sign up to the extension of North/South bodies to take over Executive roles or to interfere in the internal affairs of Northern Ireland.

Mrs D Dodds: I agree with the point that William McCrea made about respecting the position of Northern Ireland and accepting that the majority of people here have clearly stated that Northern Ireland is British and that they want to retain that identity.

For quite some time, I have been chasing bits and pieces of information from Tourism Ireland. It is a very mystic body — perhaps that is because it is a Celtic creation — to grapple and to come to terms with. Recently, I managed to get a hold of a videotape of the ‘Narnia’ advertisement that was played in cinemas throughout America and the rest of the world. Not once in the advertisement — and I saw the film ‘The Chronicles of Narnia’ with my daughter in London — were the words “Northern Ireland” said.

That is what I mean about accepting the reality of identity and the fact that we need to accept and respect that and move on. Tourism Ireland states that its remit is to promote the island of Ireland; therefore, there were pictures of east Belfast — “somewhere in the island of Ireland”, to quote from the video; the picture of the Giant’s Causeway was “somewhere in the island of Ireland”. North/South bodies must get back to the fact that this is Northern Ireland, and they must respect that identity. Tourism Ireland is one such body; although the body has the expertise to do the promotional and marketing work, it must also respect the identity of the country and the people who live here. That is just one example of where North/South bodies need to be pulled back.

May I give you another example? No right exists to see the minutes of the meetings of the North/South bodies. Anybody can see minutes of meetings under the Freedom of Information Act 2002; they are published quite openly on the Internet. When I asked why these bodies did not publish minutes of their meetings, it was confirmed to me that no right exists. We need to reach a position where there is not only a respect for identity but transparency about what happens in North/South bodies. Ultimately, those bodies, and the Ministers who attend their meetings, must be accountable to the Assembly.

Ms Ritchie: At a recent conference on an all-Ireland infrastructure matter in Dundalk that Mr Farren and I, among others, attended, many attendees from Northern Ireland — or the North of Ireland — represented unionist businesses. Those attendees quite clearly demonstrated not only to us but to the wider conference that immense benefits could be gained by wider North/South co-operation and by taking the North/South Ministerial Council out of care and maintenance. They were anxious to do that so that both Governments could pursue collaborative strategies for the economic, social and practical benefit of the people throughout the island. Will Mr McCrea give further specifics about co-operation in agriculture and transportation?

Dr McCrea: I can understand the difficulty that some people have with this issue. I can also understand why some of the North/South bodies have a difficulty. We know that some people and politicians in Northern Ireland have an awful fear of saying the word “Northern”. They just cannot say the word. It would actually burn their tongues if they said “Northern Ireland”; it is the “North of Ireland”. They seem to not understand that this is a different identity: Northern Ireland is a part of the United Kingdom; it is the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

I respect the identity of the people of the Irish Republic. I respect their right to have their own Government and their way of life. I hold no ill will whatsoever towards those people, towards their Government or towards the policies that they wish to follow. However, I ask that that respect be reciprocated. I have said in the past, and I say it one more time, that I do not believe that good neighbours interfere in each other’s internal affairs. Good neighbours work for the benefit of each other; they do not try to overturn politically or to remove one neighbour from his territory to that person’s detriment.

As regards the businesses, it really is rather alarming, because I did not know that any of the businesses that went down to the Irish Republic did so as unionists or nationalists. I would have thought that businesses tried to keep out of that field and went down as business personnel to see how they might encourage further business, even if that meant encouraging business away from the Irish Republic and bringing the jobs to Northern Ireland. That is healthy good business life, but it is a strange idea that they should go down and be noted as unionist businesses. That is a new one for me.

3.30 pm

Dr Farren: There were several useful points made there with respect to the operation of North/South bodies. If what has been said is that we should have more transparency and more accountability, there is no difficulty as far as the SDLP is concerned in exploring how that might be achieved.

With respect to how we operated in the short period in which we were running the North/South bodies, all of the Ministers who attended meetings of those bodies came and gave a full report to the Assembly and were subject to questioning by Members of the Assembly. We can learn from the experience — good, bad or indifferent — with respect to improving the operation of those bodies and identifying where more co-operation might be achieved. Regarding operational matters, I do not see any significant difficulty in trying to address the concerns that have been raised about transparency, accountability, efficiency and so on.

Dr McCrea: So that there is no ambiguity in the situation, I am speaking about those bodies that are clearly working for the benefit of the people of Northern Ireland and the Irish Republic — not furthering a political agenda. We will not be part of anything that smacks of a political agenda to take away

Northern Ireland from its rightful position within the United Kingdom.

I did sit in the Assembly when the Ministers came back, and I remind you that we could not change one iota: not one dot; not one comma; not one stroke on the t of what the Minister had done could be changed. Why? Because they were unaccountable. Ministers, whoever they may be, should be going there for the benefit of Northern Ireland plc to ensure that Northern Ireland continues to prosper and live as a good neighbour with the Irish Republic. However, those who go with a political agenda must be brought to book and to account by the Assembly, and they must be answerable. This is an accountability issue.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Members, I am in your hands time-wise, but please keep your questions short.

Mr M McGuinness: First, I must agree with Séan Farren. He and I are probably the only people in this room who attended North/South Ministerial Council meetings, and those were undoubtedly to the benefit of people of the entire island. There could not have been more transparency in what we were trying to do. After each meeting we reported and allowed ourselves to be questioned by the Assembly, and in the debates and question-and-answer sessions that I was involved in, there was very little contention, even from the DUP, notwithstanding their overall position in terms of the institutions at that time.

One of the great sadnesses for me as Minister for Education was that we agreed to establish between North and South a centre of excellence for the education of children with autism at Middletown. That was well over four years ago, and the project still has not seen the light of day. The only people to suffer from that are children from our entire community, be they represented by the DUP, SDLP, UUP, Alliance or Sinn Féin. That was my interest as Minister: to provide within the resources available to us on the island the best possible education system. People sometimes flag up concerns that are not really substantial.

I would like to ask a couple of questions about the contribution made by the DUP. On a number of occasions William McCrea has talked about “pure democracy” and “the waterline of democracy”. There is a very clear message from the British Prime Minister and the Taoiseach that these institutions should be up this year. It is obvious that every other party — the Ulster Unionists, the Alliance Party, the SDLP and ourselves, other smaller parties in the Assembly, the two Governments, and indeed the White House — want to see these institutions up. It really comes down to whether the waterline of democracy is beyond the reach of Sinn Féin as far as the DUP is concerned. I would like an explanation of what the “waterline of democracy” actually means — is that a different type of democracy from that being asked for by the Taoiseach, the British Prime Minister, the Ulster Unionist Party and the other parties here?

On a number of occasions William McCrea has said that the Unionist community has no confidence in the Belfast Agreement and that there have to be changes. I think it would do the Committee a service if he would tell us what those changes need to be. In his last contribution he talked about “major parts of this package” that would have to be changed. Given that we are in this fairly unusual situation where we have a Preparation for Government Committee but one of the parties on the Committee is saying that it is going to negotiate only with the British Government, it would be very useful from an information point of view if he would tell the rest of the Committee what these major changes are that the DUP is seeking.

I also want to put on the record something that I raised this morning that is pertinent to the DUP’s position on who is entitled to be in an Executive and who is not, vis-à-vis this whole issue of paramilitarism. Reg Empey made what I thought was a very courageous statement some weeks ago on the issue of unionist leaders using unionist paramilitaries — and we all know that we are not talking about the Girl Guides or the Brownies. I went on ‘Inside Politics’ after that and referred to what he had said, and I referred to it again this morning. Never on any occasion since Reg Empey said that has any member of the DUP, to my knowledge, contradicted him — and it might come after I say this, and in all probability will do, but I will still be interested to hear the DUP’s response. Not once has any member of the DUP who has done any interview contradicted Reg Empey. That raises very serious questions about the issue that Reg Empey courageously identified some weeks ago.

Essentially that is it. I would be very pleased if we could have an answer to those two questions.

Dr McCrea: I want to make a couple of comments. As regards the North/South bodies, we have made it abundantly clear that practical co-operation is of vital importance. What we certainly do question is the value of the overly bureaucratic bodies that are part of the North/South system that now stands. We do not support the bodies that were set up by the Belfast Agreement. We believe that if there were an Executive and a Government here, they should have the freedom to set up their own bodies if they so wished and believed it essential for the development of good neighbourly relationships between Northern Ireland and the Irish Republic.

There is no need whatsoever for a bureaucratic system to be set up. Quite often it wasted public finances that could have been spent on serious issues, such as autism, that I personally take an interest in as well. I have a keen interest in that. If we had some of that wasted money, and if we had the £240 million that is not paid to the Exchequer because of the extortion rackets and criminality that are going on, that would certainly aid a number of those people who are suffering.

It ill becomes anybody to say that they have a passion for those things; if they had, they would also have a passion to stop the problems that hinder progress in this community.

Our document also points out that the primacy of relationships is between Northern Ireland and the rest of the United Kingdom. The east-west relationships have not been utilised to maximum advantage. There is great potential for developing those relationships, and I am delighted that Scotland desires to aid us in that respect. The National Assembly for Wales is also interested in how such relationships might be developed. It would be a natural home. England and the United Kingdom as a whole is a very large market with which we could work to develop relationships. That is vital.

I will not, as I said before, negotiate in this Committee. We will open negotiations with the Government, and other parties can do the same. As in the past, we have no desire to fail to bring other democratic parties on board and to negotiate with them. There is, however, a waterline for the vast majority of the unionist population as regards Sinn Féin. We have heard claims today about what the British Government and the Irish Government have said. Remember that when the British Government were asked whether they would have Sinn Féin in Government under the present terms, they did not bounce up and down to do it. The Irish Government were asked whether they would accept Sinn Féin as partners in Government. The answer was no. I asked the American Government whether they would bring in groups that were inextricably linked to terrorist organisations, and they said no. Of course, they also said that although they would not do it, they would make us do it. Democracy should not be soiled in that way. Therefore negotiations about the changes that we would make to the Belfast Agreement will not be conducted in this Committee — this is not a negotiating Committee.

I appreciate that Reg Empey may want, because of recent difficulties, to bare his soul. He may feel that he has something to confess. That is for him to decide. I am sure that when the Ulster Unionists present their paper, they will be asked that question. We need to find out, from his party's representatives on the Committee, what Reg Empey wants to say. I am not here to answer for Reg Empey; I may be answerable for many things, but another political party's presentation to this Committee is not one of them.

That is where we stand.

Mr M McGuinness: The DUP needs to understand that as the 24 November deadline approaches — and it will come very quickly — it will find itself increasingly at odds with both the British Prime Minister and the Taoiseach and probably with the full weight of international opinion, led by the White House, on the issue of going into Government. As a representative of a party directly affected by this — along with two parties here, apart from the DUP, that are entitled to positions in the Executive — I would like a straight answer to the question of whether the DUP envisages, in the course of the work that we are involved in, being in Government with Sinn Féin under any circumstances whatsoever.

Dr McCrea: We have heard the threats and so forth from the Governments and others, especially Sinn Féin, about 24 November. We have made it abundantly clear that we want devolved Government, but if those who have the power to remove the obstacles do not do so, we cannot and will not accept any blame for those who impede our path to progress.

For example, we want debates in the House to which we were elected. One party is unwilling to do that. We are willing to deal with issues such as water rates and the RPA and put those to the Government. That is all that we can do. Nevertheless, one party stands alone; it stood on its own last week when we tried to get an interim report at least discussed in the Assembly. That party ran away from that because it does not want to be tested by or exposed to public debate that would show that it is unwilling to face the real issues at the heart of the whole problem.

3.45 pm

For those who are there to face it, the truth is that 24 November will come and go. However, it is in the hands of those who can remove the impediments to do so. They can come up to the democratic mark — the waterline — and prove to the public that they have renounced the path of violence, turned their backs on paramilitaries and condemn their actions, and support the security forces in defeating anyone who threatens, whether they be the Real IRA, the Continuity IRA or some loyalist organisation. They will actively support the security forces in ensuring that any threat to the democracy and stability of Northern Ireland will be supported by the Executive and the Assembly. That is not in our hands; it is in the hands of others. Those who put the impediments there had better come up to the mark and remove them.

With regards being at odds with the Westminster Government, we do not want to be at odds with anyone. However, I remind members that there is one group with whom we will not be at odds and from whom we will not walk away: the people who elected us. We believe that the ballot box has supremacy in Northern Ireland. We believe in the authority of that ballot box, and we keep faith with the people who elected us on the seven principles that we outlined in the past. We were the only party that came up front and put down the test and the line for ourselves. We were willing to do that and to stand over it.

It is not true that we walk away from others. Although others have been elected to the House of Commons and do not sit, I do attend, and I know of no party, including that of the Government, that believes that a stable Government is possible unless criminality, paramilitarism, decommissioning and such issues have been dealt with.

The Government may say different things to others, but I assure you that, even when some of the on-the-runs legislation was being debated in the House of Commons at the behest of Sinn Féin, the Secretary of State, who laid the Bill, did not have even two MPs to back him up. They all cleared like snow off a ditch. He had no backing whatever on the on-the-runs issue. There was a unity in the House. I was elected to the House in 1983, and I cannot remember such unity there. Every opposition party stood, man and woman, and were counted with many in the Government. On leaving the Lobbies, many in the Government apologised, because they had been Whipped into the voting lobbies to vote for their own legislation.

Let us be frank. We are not at odds with the thrust of democratic principles. We stand on the basic principles of democracy — the rock foundation of democracy — and I assure you that you will not sink if you stand on solid rock; you will sink only if you stand on sinking sand. Our principles are certainly not sinking sand.

Mr M McGuinness: Notwithstanding your total misrepresentation of the position of both the British Government and the Irish Government vis-à-vis Sinn Féin's suitability to be in government, is it fair to say that under certain conditions the DUP is prepared, and is willing, to go into Government with Sinn Féin?

Dr McCrea: We are making it clear —

Mr M McGuinness: Could we get a yes or no answer to that question?

Dr McCrea: With the greatest respect no one is going to tell me what to say. Who do they think they are that they are telling you what you are or are not going to say? I will be able to answer as far as we are concerned. No one who is associated with paramilitarism and criminality will be in any Executive in Northern Ireland. If it is that we are at odds with the Irish Government, could I find out on what date — because maybe I missed it — did Bertie Ahern decide to go into Government and believe that Sinn Féin was a willing partner for Government in the Irish Republic?

I have never heard that yet, but perhaps I missed either the press cutting or the public statement.

Mr M McGuinness: The Taoiseach has made it absolutely clear in the course of the past 12 months that the only reason that he would not go into Government with Sinn Féin is because he differs from Sinn Féin on the issue of Europe. That is another debate, but he told 'The Irish Times' that that is the reason that he would not go into Government with Sinn Féin.

This is important, William. It is important because as a political party representing the majority of nationalists and republicans in the North of Ireland it would be very helpful to us — and I presume it would be helpful to the other parties around the table — to know whether there are any circumstances under which the DUP is prepared to go into Government with Sinn Féin. Thus far, we have not received an answer to that question.

Dr McCrea: Our general election manifesto 2005 is clear:

"Sinn Féin could then only be considered for entry to an Executive after

- Complete visible, verifiable decommissioning.*
- A total end to all paramilitary and criminal activity.*
- The community is convinced the IRA has been stood down."*

Therefore, if it comes up to the mark of democracy — and we have stated what we mean by that—the Democratic Unionist Party has said that it will go into Government with democrats. However, there will have to be a clear end to association with paramilitarism and criminality; there will have to be complete, verifiable and visible decommissioning; and there will have to be a convincing of the unionist community that the IRA has been stood down; in other words, that no so-called army is threatening the stability of Northern Ireland. I have heard nothing from Sinn Féin since coming to this Committee that that is on its agenda or radar system at all — in actual fact I was told that those are dead issues.

Mr M McGuinness: The reality of the situation is that the DUP is going to find itself increasingly at odds with the full weight of public opinion within this process as we march towards the 24 November deadline.

From Sinn Féin's perspective, and, indeed, from those of the other parties, although I cannot speak for them, it would be hugely beneficial if we could find ourselves during the course of our deliberations in this Committee in a position where we were convinced that we are dealing with a party that is serious about joining us in a power-sharing Executive at some stage later this year.

There is a very strong belief in the broad nationalist and republican community that the DUP is not interested in sharing power or taking its positions on the North/South Ministerial Council but is really interested only in frustrating the efforts of everyone else to see the institutions restored.

As Seán Farren mentioned earlier, at some stage in the process and in our deliberations, the DUP needs to convince the elected representatives of the SDLP and Sinn Féin that it is contemplating seriously the restoration of these institutions at some stage. I have been around for long enough to know that we will all have to undertake considerable work and that if people were working in good faith, we would have to be committed to being involved in all sorts of engagements over the summer to move forward the situation. I was surprised to learn today — and this is not a criticism of the SDLP; it is actually interesting — that the DUP and the SDLP held late-night meetings at Leeds Castle. Obviously, we were excluded from those meetings; we did not have the benefit of sitting down with the DUP leadership to discuss how we should take forward the situation.

I presume that all Committee members have given a commitment to continuing with this project over the coming period. If we are to spend our time in rooms such as this — and this has been a very long day — we would like to think that we would get a result at the end that will benefit all the people whom we represent. Therefore I hope that the DUP will consider it so that we can be in some way successful.

Something of a dilemma exists. It has been said in the past that if the IRA brought every single rifle, barrack-buster — as William McCrea calls them — and round of ammunition and placed them at Ian Paisley's feet at the door of Parliament Buildings, it would still not be enough. The danger with these contributions to the Committee is that people will go away thinking that that is precisely our position: republicans will never be allowed to reach the waterline of democracy as outlined by the DUP.

Dr Farren: Mr McGuinness made a point about the SDLP meeting the DUP at Leeds Castle. I totally reject any implied criticism of whom the SDLP meets; the SDLP meets whomsoever the SDLP decides to meet.

Mr M McGuinness: I made it clear that there was no criticism.

Dr Farren: You expressed surprise that we had met the DUP.

Mr M McGuinness: I expressed an interest; I did not express surprise, and I did not utter one word of criticism.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Please speak through the Chair.

Dr Farren: I think that we met all the parties that were present at Leeds Castle, and, as with any of those parties, the purpose of that meeting was to discuss our proposals on the review of the operation of the Good Friday Agreement. It was not the only time that we met the DUP; we met that party before and, indeed, since, but not very often. However, we will continue to engage with whomsoever we think will engage with us to any useful purpose that we think that such a meeting would serve.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Mr McCrea, do you want to respond?

Dr McCrea: There certainly seemed to be surprise at the fact that the DUP met the SDLP. The DUP met the SDLP at Leeds Castle and Stormont, and we constantly meet its Members at Westminster. I find nothing in that at all; that is certainly the process of normal democratic parties. There is nothing untoward in any of that that causes either surprise or the idea that the meeting should not have happened.

The DUP is willing to see Government formed and be a part of an Administration that is based on democratic principles alone. Every party must decide to come up to that mark and renounce the path of violence. We have made it abundantly clear that only those who use exclusively peaceful and democratic means can be a part of any Executive.

4.00 pm

That is no surprise whatsoever — we have said that both in Committee and outside. This Committee alone will not solve the situation, because the people who need to be dealt with are the boys outside this room. They must be stopped, and they must be brought to justice. We must see that criminality and paramilitary activity have stopped. Those who are involved in criminality and paramilitary activity must be stopped, and they must face justice. We could go round in circles many times, but that issue will not be resolved in Committee. With the greatest respect, we could debate the issue until we are blue in the face. However, having scoped the issues, we say that those who can deliver, because of their associations with paramilitary groups, have a responsibility to do so in order that the only politics in Northern Ireland are democratic ones.

I have been quite open, and I have spoken for long enough in this debate. No one could suggest that anyone shied away from any of the questions that were asked; however, I would like to hear some of the other submissions.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I want to allow Mr McFarland and Mr Ford to speak during the remaining hour.

Mr M McGuinness: My final question is on the Ulster Unionist Party's acceptance that it has a responsibility to do everything in its power to deliver loyalist paramilitaries. As a result of Reg Empey's work on that issue, the party has nailed its colours to the mast. I ask the DUP whether it, as the largest unionist party, also has a responsibility to assist in that work.

Dr McCrea: I am neither going to get involved nor will I answer any question about the Ulster Unionist Party. It has assumed a mantle and formed an association with the PUP, which acknowledges that it is still the public face of the UVF. I genuinely cannot understand how Mr Ervine can still say that he is not a member of the UUPAG but of the PUP, and that he is the leader of the PUP. To belong to two political parties at the same time may prove difficult for some people, but, of course, a person as capable as Mr Ervine must feel that he has no difficulty in wearing those different hats.

The DUP offers the people a democratic alternative to paramilitaries. We say the same about other paramilitaries as we say about the IRA — they must not only cease their activity but also get rid of their weapons. Their weapons must be verifiably decommissioned, and they must retain no paramilitary grouping that threatens the stability of any future Government.

Mr M McGuinness: My question was —

Dr McCrea: The Ulster Unionists will stand by what they have decided to do, but I will certainly not add —

Mr M McGuinness: Let us put the Ulster Unionists to one side. Does the leadership of the Democratic Unionist Party have a responsibility to engage with loyalist paramilitaries to bring about an end to their criminality, their weapons and their attacks on people?

Dr McCrea: As far as the DUP is concerned, we have not engaged with the IRA in order to bring about an end to its paramilitary activity. The onus is on those paramilitary groups, and on the Government, to ensure that paramilitaries do not continue to exist in Northern Ireland and that Northern Ireland is not a breeding ground for paramilitary activity in future. We will use our influence and whatever power we have to offer the parliamentary rather than the paramilitary alternative.

Mr McFarland: I am much encouraged by comments that William McCrea made earlier this afternoon, and, briefly, I want to tease something out. He said that the DUP is open for engagement with other democratic parties. We have been trying to engage with the DUP for some months, but this is our first engagement with the party since November 2004.

In the light of Dr Paisley's recent public statements — on several occasions, he has said that he will not negotiate with other parties; he will negotiate with Downing Street directly — do William McCrea's comments about the DUP's willingness to engage with other parties reflect its current position, or is Dr Paisley's position extant?

Dr McCrea: As regards engaging with other parties, we are negotiating with our Government. The main negotiations that we will have will be with the Government. Dr Paisley has made that abundantly clear. Certainly, as we have stated in the past and has been made clear by Dr Paisley, we will engage with other democratic parties and with those that are not linked to terrorist organisations.

As Mr McFarland will know, the recent decision taken by his party does not make that situation any easier. In fact, it has blurred the line and, in many ways, his party — certainly not mine — has let Sinn Féin off the hook as regards its dealings with the IRA. It is sad to say that the UUP's decision has blurred some of the clear distinctions that had been made in the past. My party is under the direction of its leadership, and whom it will or will not speak to has not been decided and will not be decided by me sitting at this table. My party leader will decide.

Mr Ford: I am sure that in this newly found spirit of sharing and partnership, which we have discovered, at least, at local council level this afternoon, William McCrea would wish to take the opportunity to praise the role of the Alliance Party in those power-sharing arrangements, notably in Larne, Belfast — I have to say that while Naomi is sitting beside me — and Castlereagh. I add my congratulations to William McCrea's colleagues on having discovered the virtues of power sharing in Newtownabbey and trust that he will persuade his colleagues in Antrim of the same.

On a more substantive point, William McCrea referred to "parties" in the plural as having complained of being excluded from the negotiations in 2004 and, therefore, not wishing to take on any key roles at this stage. He quoted from the Ulster Unionist paper. He acknowledged to Seán Farren that he did not mean the SDLP. I trust that he will acknowledge formally that that is not the Alliance Party's position. In fact, he should acknowledge that "parties" should have been in the singular.

I want to check the DUP's position — I do not want to go on to the agenda item; I want to get the DUP's assessment — on a working party on the economic challenges. William McCrea and his colleagues feel that we are not yet at the point where there is a realistic role for his party to sit down with the other four parties, the Northern Ireland Business Alliance, trades unions and the other social partners to examine the challenges ahead in the preparation for devolution. This is part of the question of how far the DUP is prepared to engage —

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We will come to that subject.

Dr McCrea: I acknowledge that, in a number of councils, we have endeavoured to work with the other parties. We trust that we will be able to continue to work with the other parties to ensure that we have stable administrations in local government. We have never run away from the challenges that that brings to us. However, we take each situation as it comes. I am delighted that in my constituency of South Antrim, the councils in Newtownabbey and Antrim are seeing certain steps in that direction.

Mr Ford: Just half of your constituency.

Dr McCrea: It is a large part of the constituency, believe it or not, because both those areas are mainly in South Antrim. However, we will leave that to the side.

We are coming to the issue of economic challenges. Today, we found out in a letter from the Secretary of State that he acknowledges that the proper and appropriate place for a decision to be made on the working group on the economy is the Business Committee. Any views expressed by this Committee must go back to the Business Committee. The Secretary of State wrote:

“I would intend to do so immediately and to invite the Business Committee to determine membership and arrangements for chairing the Committee”.

Therefore, it is a matter for the Business Committee, which is why I do not think it needs to be discussed by this Committee.

In actual fact, we wanted this Committee to move the working group on the economy forward through the Business Committee before now. The working group should be up and running by now. The agreement on its creation was sent from the Assembly on 15 May 2006.

Mr Ford: I just wanted to establish the DUP’s view on co-operation, and that was an example. I appreciate what has been said.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Unless there is urgent business to be discussed, do members want to take a comfort break for five minutes?

Mr Morrow: Perhaps 10 or 15 minutes?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): If we are quick about it.

Mr McFarland: We should establish how colleagues envisage the day closing. For example, what is our anticipated finish time? Are we meeting tomorrow morning? If tomorrow runs like today, will we meet on Thursday?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I suggest that we do not hear the Sinn Féin submission during this session. There are two items of business from Madam Speaker and the Clerk. I suggest that we deal with them after the break and then decide on the arrangements for tomorrow.

The Committee was suspended at 4.10 pm.

4.25 pm

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): First, I propose to deal with the letter from the Speaker in relation to the working group. Everyone has a copy of in front of them.

Mr McFarland: Mr Chairman, could you remind us of the subject?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): It is the letter from the Speaker in relation to the working group on the economy.

Dr McCrea: Mr Deputy Speaker, this matter came from the Assembly and went to the Business Committee. For some reason it has slipped out of the Business Committee's business and into the Preparation for Government Committee's business.

The letter from the Secretary of State to Mrs Bell clearly indicates that this matter is the business of the Business Committee, which is to determine membership and arrangements for chairing that Committee. I believe that that is the appropriate place for it to be, and that the Business Committee should take it forward. We certainly do not believe that that should be under the authority of a subcommittee of the Preparation for Government Committee.

Mr Murphy: In discussions on this matter, a view was represented in the Business Committee — given that members were presenting issues that they thought were of importance — that this issue would need to be worked on as part of preparation for Government at this Committee. This matter may well fall into that category because, in nearly all of the parties' presentations on paper, practically all of the parties identified economic regeneration, a peace dividend, a financial package — whatever way you wish to describe it. Certainly, work in relation to economic matters and some financial arrangements to underpin the restoration of devolution were identified as a key item that parties see in relation to restoration of Government.

The Secretary of State's letter to Eileen Bell suggests that it would be helpful to have a view from this Committee on whether the working group should be set up as a separate group or as a subcommittee of the Preparation for Government Committee. If there is a preference for a separate Committee, obviously communicated from us to the Business Committee, then the Secretary of State would ask the Business Committee to make those arrangements.

This issue has been identified by all of the parties — the Alliance certainly referred to it in its verbal presentation, if it was not in its written presentation, and the DUP has identified it as an issue which is one that they presented to this Committee as an issue of preparation for Government. Therefore, I suggest that it would be illogical for a separate Committee that contained people who were party spokespersons or party experts on this issue to go off and do separate work without any reference to a matter that has been flagged up by all of the parties to this Committee.

Therefore, the most logical course would be that we nominate Members either from this Committee, or from our parties who deal with these issues, and have a Committee or a subcommittee report back to this Committee. I do not think that that would necessarily take a very long time. They could report back to this Committee with recommendations or views and make a report to us that we could consider. It may well then be the case, as was the normal practice with other Committees when the Assembly was functioning, that such a report goes to the Assembly for its views.

That would be the most logical course because we have all identified this matter as an area of work and interest for us. To ask the Business Committee to set up a completely separate Committee, with no reference to us, to deal with that would not make very much sense.

4.30 pm

Dr McCrea: This working group proposal emanates from a debate. [Interruption.] This emanates from the Assembly, which proposed that a working group be set up. It would therefore be totally wrong to take that group away from the Assembly, as participants from the various parties would be on it. The working group is not in the remit of this Committee: we are to scope the issues that are preventing Government. That is sufficient for us; there is no reason why the economic working group could not go forward under the authority of the Business Committee, as it would sit very comfortably there.

I have said from the word go that the remit of this Committee is quite sufficient, and I do not believe that it should be extended. The DUP believes that the working group should be in the hands of the Business Committee.

Mr McFarland: Mr Chairman, we are getting rather good at this. My sense is that we will not get consensus on the Committee, given that one of the parties we have heard from thinks that the working group should come from here, while the other thinks that it should be in the hands of the Business Committee. Rather than go all around the Wrekin and have another hour of generous debate, I suggest that the Chairman finds out whether we are likely to get consensus. If not, we have other business that we might reasonably proceed with.

Dr Farren: Like Alan, I sense a stand-off coming over me, although I hope that that will not transpire. Since the proposal for the Committee came from a debate in the Assembly, and since most of the parties in the Committee have referred in their submissions to the need for a programme of economic regeneration, why can we not marry both the suggested ways for taking this forward? In other words, parties could ensure that there is an overlapping membership of at least one between this Committee and a working group that the Business Committee would appoint as a result of the Assembly resolution. There could be liaison between the two, as we are all working to the same end, I trust, on this issue, if on no other. Surely, it is not beyond our wit to find a way of evading a standoff and of taking the issue forward.

Mr Ford: Before we broke, I asked the DUP about its willingness to engage with the other parties and with other bodies — business, trades unions, and the social partners, in a wider process. If the Business Committee recommended such a process, it would be inappropriate for it to be a subcommittee of this Committee, as this Committee has been established for a very specific purpose. The Assembly resolution calls on the economic working group to make recommendations to a restored Executive, which seems to be beyond the remit of this Committee.

I am not sure whether it was deliberate, but I noticed that the last sentence of the Speaker's letter asks whoever it was addressed to to seek the views of this Committee. It seems that we will soon have at least five views on this issue. Perhaps all that we can do is report those views. There is considerable merit in what Seán Farren said about seeking a degree of overlap in the membership so that people are informed about what is going on. However, that is different from being constituted as a subcommittee.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do we have proposals?

Dr McCrea: It is up to the party leaders to propose members of their parties for a committee. Such decisions are not in our gift; neither should we take that authority upon ourselves.

We have responsibility for those issues, and I propose that the Business Committee should take them forward. The Business Committee does not have a very hefty programme of business. If someone were to have attended this afternoon's meeting of the Business Committee, they would have found that members were looking for some encouragement and would be willing to take on some challenges. Some Committee members acknowledged that they were frustrated that there was no business. This is an issue that they could get their teeth into.

Mr McFarland: I wonder whether there is some scope for accommodation. Suppose, for example, the Committee were to agree with Sinn Féin that we set up a subcommittee to examine economics; Sinn Féin could have a bit of a win there. I wonder whether Sinn Féin would agree that the other parties that wish to conduct a debate on the Review of Public Administration (RPA) on the Floor of the House would be able to do that. Everybody gets something that they want. In return for a subcommittee examining economics, the DUP and the other parties get a debate on the RPA, which we are all desperate to have before the summer recess so that those issues can be aired.

Mr Murphy: There is nothing to stop the other parties from making proposals to debate the RPA on the Floor of the House. The other parties made proposals for debates to which Sinn Féin objected, but those debates were, nonetheless, agreed to by the Secretary of State. It is not in our gift whether the RPA is debated; it is in the gift of the Secretary of State.

Mr McFarland: My understanding is that the Secretary of State is stating that motions for debate in the House must come from this Committee; he is not seeking motions for debate from the Business Committee. That is a problem because there are no debates. In return for setting up a subcommittee, this Committee would agree, with Sinn Féin's consent, to conduct a debate on the RPA in the House. The Secretary of State will go for that. If the proposal comes from this Committee, it will be latched on to in about 30 seconds. Everybody would get something out of that deal, and it would take us forward in a positive way.

Mr M McGuinness: Other members of the Committee should reflect on Conor Murphy's proposal. Sinn Féin clearly states that it believes that this work is related to preparation for Government. If such a committee were formed, I envisage that it would take it a very short time — not months, not weeks, only a few days — to produce a report that could be brought back to this Committee. Members of this Committee could then recommend that the results of their work be put forward to the Business Committee, with our support that there be a debate in the House on what is clearly an issue for preparation for Government.

We are dealing with the difficulties that Alan McFarland has highlighted. The DUP obviously has a difficulty; it is mad to have all sorts of debates in the House. People have to appreciate that we have a difficulty insofar as, from the beginning, we have outlined that our presence here relates to preparation for Government, and to do that by the earliest possible date this side of 24 November.

I would like to hear from the DUP whether it can facilitate us and we, in turn, facilitate the DUP.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Will the Business Committee put together the structure of this committee?

Mr Murphy: Only if there was a proposition for a separate committee.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): In relation to a subcommittee, is that not the proposal?

Mr Murphy: Peter Hain's letter states:

"If the preference is for a separate committee".

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): There are different propositions floating around.

Mr M McGuinness: I am hoping that we can find common ground with the DUP.

Dr McCrea: I have made a proposal that I believe is in accordance with the wishes of the Assembly. I agree with most of Mr Ford's remarks that the Business Committee would be natural place for it to be. I think that the Business Committee should take forward this issue. I am really surprised to hear that this could all be done in a few days.

What kind of report are we going to have? Will there be no proper scrutiny of all of the issues to ensure that we have something sufficiently competent to take forward? I honestly think that this is not a matter of days. There are many issues, and it is important that they are taken forward.

We will not have agreement on all of the issues across all of the parties, but we must ensure that there is assistance for the business community — a matter that was debated in the Assembly. This matter comes directly from the Assembly, but others have hijacked it in order to try to form a subcommittee of this Committee.

In my opinion, the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, by sleight of hand, tried to exercise his power by not referring this matter. Once again, that was done to placate a particular party. It was not done for the betterment of the business community, or of industry, or to have a proper economic debate. That was because one party declared that it would not agree to a debate, or to go through the Business Committee. That party would not give credence to the fact that the Assembly brought forward something solid, wanted to progress it and wanted to get the issue dealt with. My proposal still stands.

Dr Farren: This morning, I attended a meeting of the Northern Ireland Business Alliance. David Ford was in attendance, as were representatives of the other parties. It is obvious that the business community and others in the wider network of social partners are anxious to contribute to and support an initiative along the lines that are being proposed.

This work will not be completed in a very short time. A certain amount of consideration by and engagement with social partners is needed in order to create a credible set of proposals. However, I do not think that the kind of stand-off that is emerging will be greeted with any welcome whatsoever among the people that the parties met this morning or, indeed, among the wider social partnership, if they find that we cannot agree on how to put together a committee.

Earlier, I said that, out of what has been submitted, nearly all of the parties have been explicit in respect of discussion on the establishment of a committee to deal with economic development. That suggests that we need to find a mechanism to take that matter forward. Surely that must mean some form of committee or subcommittee.

Given that there was a debate in the Assembly that recommended the establishment of a committee, and we have work relating to that, it should not be beyond our wit to find a way to marry the two proposals so that we can get down to business. Grandstanding on prior positions will not have any credibility within the community, which wants to see us addressing all of the issues that relate to economic development.

Mr McNarry: I was quite surprised to sit here this afternoon and be treated to a good discussion, which pleased me. I am now not pleased because, on a pedantic issue, with respect, it starts to go off the rails. That is, perhaps, the course of things.

In the early days, captains of industry came to the Senate, and to the best of my recollection all parties were represented to hear what the captains of industry had to say. They had a good message that was followed up.

We are talking about the differences between us. It seems to me — and it is difficult for me not to relay this to the people outside — that some people want to diminish the Assembly. Not only that, but they want to diminish the Business Committee, which has been legitimately set up. Last night, I had a conversation with a Ms Jackson from Peter Hain's office who tried to explain to me why we cannot have a debate on education. At the time I did not know that I was coming here today. She proceeded to tell me that deciding topics for debate used to be a matter for the Business Committee, but that that had been superseded by this Committee. However, she could not tell me which Committee would make the decision. We are at risk of getting bogged down with Committees and subcommittees when the objective should be to get across a viewpoint and, where possible, a consensus that represents this Assembly.

My colleague Alan McFarland made a proposal that would involve the Review of Public Administration. I do not know about Sinn Féin — because RPA is a live issue with it — but there is a general consensus with all the other parties that a debate on it would be useful. I sat for a number of hours listening to everybody in the belief that I was taking part in an enabling process. However, I now find that there is still a desire to try to stifle development and that there are those who do not want to enable. I am now discovering that some people want to take charge and that there is — as has been shown by colleagues elected to this House — a plethora of motions that people would like to debate. However, they are being obstructed. There is no clarity.

Judging by this letter, the Secretary of State is all over the place. He is the guy who insulted me — and it is up to other members to decide whether they were insulted — by saying that I was not earning my pay. However, when there are opportunities for me to earn my pay, he prevents them. I find it difficult to get my head round that. I would like to see unanimity among the parties to establish the authority of our membership and what we want for this Assembly, rather than have it dictated by the Secretary of State only for him to weasel out of it.

Forgive me for not knowing from where the request came that subjects for debate should be decided by this Committee. However, if that is what the Secretary of State wants, then he makes the Business Committee redundant. If he does that, the Assembly is left to those who grace this room, because there is no other place to grace; there is no other place to go. Quite frankly, I will not take too kindly to any Member who would take that away from me. We could reach a consensus on the basis that at the first available opportunity this Assembly — whether it is called the Hain Assembly or given any other name — could choose to give decision-making to the Business Committee. That Business Committee is now being prevented from carrying out its duties, and that frustration is flowing on to the Members.

In all reasonableness, this Committee should not seek to have placed upon it any responsibility for the business that the Secretary of State wants to place on it. That should go back to him if Members cannot agree. The Business Committee was designated to take care of that matter, and it should be left to do that. It is an erroneous responsibility for this Committee to take on. How on earth, in two or three days, would one pay tribute to the businessmen who asked us to consider matters that would help the economy of Northern Ireland? If we could do that, we would be multimillionaires.

Mr McGlone: With regard to item 3 on the agenda, which concerns the working group on economic challenges facing Northern Ireland, the pedantics of what we get up to and how we deal with that is of little concern to the people whom I know from the business community. Their concern is that we just do it. Either we do it here this afternoon or we do not, and we go out that door and explain to people why we did not, or, more positively, why we did. That is why I am here — to work the positives and to work the mandate that I have been given, because I am held accountable in my community to ensure that progress is being made in the best interests of that community. It will be some reflection on us all if we leave here today without even agreeing on how we set up a working group on the economy.

Mr Ford: Seán Farren referred to the meeting with the Northern Ireland Business Alliance that we attended this morning, along with representatives from the other three parties. At that meeting, it was clear that there was a willingness on the part of the Business Alliance to engage with the five parties in whatever direct way seemed appropriate. There was more than a willingness; there was a keenness to get involved in assisting the Preparation for Government Committee. There was a recognition that we would also need to involve other social partners alongside the business community, and there was a recognition that it would take some time to do that job well.

Patsy McGlone made the point that the precise structures are irrelevant. The important thing is that MLAs are engaged in making preparations with those who have a stake in the economy. If we cannot agree on how that is done in this Committee, surely we can at least agree that it should be done. If that is the lowest common denominator of a consensus decision, can we at least agree this afternoon that it should be done, and that we pass that view to the Speaker?

Dr McCrea: I have listened and I agree with Mr McNarry's remarks. In many ways, the Secretary of State, by sleight of hand, has undermined the authority of the Business Committee, and that is a tragedy. It is also a travesty of the proper process of this institution, and he is doing it to placate one grouping.

There is no lack of willingness from the Democratic Unionist Party to engage in such an exercise with all the parties. The Business Committee ought to take it forward, but I am led to believe that Standing Orders were not in place in time to allow that to happen. If the present Standing Orders were in place, the matter would have automatically gone through the Business Committee. Therefore, as this proposal came from the Assembly, it ought to go through the Business Committee. Sinn Féin's position is that the matter ought to go through this Committee, although it was never referred by the Assembly to this Committee, but was taken out of context by the Secretary of State for his own reasons. However, to be helpful, it states on the first paragraph of the second page of the Secretary of State's letter to Eileen Bell:

"If the preference is for a separate committee to be set up by way of direction from me, I would intend to do so immediately".

I invite the Business Committee to determine membership, but not take it forward as the Business

Committee or, if it is the mind of this meeting, to ask the Secretary of State to separately set up a committee to take the issue forward and, therefore, each party could send Members to that.

If that is a helpful way forward, I am certainly saying that the DUP would be willing to accept it. It is not what we wanted, but if that is what assists in ensuring that it is not through the Business Committee of the Assembly but directly under the direction of the Secretary of State, there is no reason why a separate committee under his direction could not be set up to which each party could send representatives. If that gets over the hiatus in the whole thing and is helpful, I am willing to assist in that way.

Mr M McGuinness: If that issue is not dealt with by this Committee, somebody needs to explain to me who will deal with all the other issues, such as policing, etc, etc. This is the Preparation for Government Committee. All parties have brought forward papers on a wide range of issues that they want to see addressed. It appears to me that the only sensible way to proceed is through this Committee.

With respect to David McNarry, I do not think that standing in the Assembly and having a waffling session around RPA or anything else is earning his money. The purpose of the Assembly was to govern, to produce an Executive, to legislate and to bring about change to people's lives through the different ministerial portfolios that all parties entitled to be in Government would have.

The DUP strategy has been clear for some considerable time. The DUP wanted a shadow Assembly, and it wanted that to last for two years. That is not acceptable to Sinn Féin. Whether it is acceptable to the Ulster Unionists, the SDLP or the Alliance Party is a matter for all of them. It is not acceptable to us. We are not going to play the DUP game, because that is what debates in the Assembly are all about. They are not about seriously preparing for Government.

We have been here almost every day, and I accept that Mr McNarry has only just come into the Committee today, but it has been a fairly horrendous experience being in this room and trying to ascertain whether the DUP will take the opportunity through the existence of this Committee to begin a real engagement with Sinn Féin. Thus far we have not seen any of that. I do not give up. I hope that over the course of the coming period that better sense will prevail and that the DUP will recognise that there is a job of work to be done.

Sinn Féin is not going to play the DUP game and will not be bullied by the DUP into setting up a talking shop downstairs that has no credibility whatsoever with the electorate who sent Mr McNarry, or indeed me, here. The electorate knows that at the end of all those discussions, the people taking the decisions come from somewhere else. They do not come from within this Building.

Mr McNarry: Chairman, if I may just respond. I am not terribly interested in any games. As regards my electorate and its judgement on earning my money, I never made such statements. The Secretary of State has rammed it down my throat, and I take offence at that.

I am sitting here and listening to Mr McGuinness, and I am not impressed. Fair enough.

Mr M McGuinness: Will Mr McNarry take a point about the impression that he gives?

Mr McNarry: I am not —

Mr M McGuinness: The impression that he gives is of standing down there and engaging in a debate, sending a message to the public that he is earning his money.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): One at a time.

Mr McNarry: I am not impressed, Chairman, with what I have heard as the reasoning. I accept it nevertheless, but I am not impressed. But for Sinn Féin to join with the Secretary of State in expanding the veto as to what I can and cannot do does not really augur well for the outcome that I would genuinely like from this Committee.

5.00 pm

For Sinn Féin to compare the intricacies and the involvement of what it needs to declare on policing — because I do not know its policy on that — as opposed to what it needs to declare on economics, its policies on which I have a certain knowledge, are two entirely different things.

I would like to hear both of those espoused in the Assembly under any circumstances. However, for the purpose of what we are discussing, all I can say is that the issue of economics has a very wide audience. That audience will be aware, as Patsy McGlone said, that this Committee may have stumbled on it, and the reason for it stumbling does not augur well for it being able to get over the hurdles of other equally significant major issues.

I hear what Martin says. I am not impressed by it. It is the same sound bite that I hear any time he does not want to do what he does not want to do. In terms of concessions or giving anything, it is the same stuff. He does not give anything. The worst aspect of that is that he is not even prepared to consider another person's point of view. That is all I that I have asked him to do.

Mr M McGuinness: I have suggested what I think is a sensible way to proceed. It is obviously not going to find favour with the DUP. If it did then it would all be a matter of form, everybody else would fall into line — we know that. Maybe I am wrong, but I think that is what would happen.

The DUP needs to reflect on whether or not in the course of our deliberations at this Committee we are, at some stage, going to make some connection with one another, recognise each other's difficulties and come to some agreement vis-à-vis how we move forward.

I am saying very clearly that I believe that the work of preparing for Government should reside with this Committee. There is a whole plethora of issues that must be dealt with. They have been identified by all of the parties. I do not agree with all of them, but we have a duty and responsibility to discuss them.

We have to find a way to take this work forward. It appears that many people place a huge value on going to the Assembly Chamber and having a debate. Obviously the reason for that is to show that this place is working and that people are earning their money and effecting change. The reality is that they are not effecting any change whatsoever, because British direct rule Ministers will still take the decisions whatever happens and whatever the content of those debates.

Debates do not bring us any quicker to the restoration of these institutions. In fact, one can make the argument that to fall into that trap is to prolong the agony. Clearly a situation will arise whereby the DUP, if it gets its debates in the Assembly, will say: "Well, everything is hunky dory, let us continue on until November of next year." Sinn Féin will not continue on until November of next year. If other parties want to do that, that is a matter for them — well, they obviously will not be able to do so until November of next year, but until May of next year. That is not a game that we can play. We have come to this Building to set about the serious work of preparing for Government.

We have all been around long enough to know that if there is no connection made between the DUP and Sinn Féin in terms of taking this work forward, Members can go down and debate in the Assembly from now to kingdom come, but they will not have the institutions restored. That is the reality that we are dealing with.

Since we came in here I have, on a number of occasions, made proposals and suggestions that I hoped would find favour with the DUP, which would allow me to go back to Sinn Féin and say: "Well, I think that something important is happening here and that, because of the deadline and everything else, the DUP is recognising the need to engage in the real work of putting the institutions back and that we are involved in the serious work of preparing for Government." However, even as we sit here today — and Mr McNarry has only just come here this afternoon — we have not had any sense whatsoever that we are even on that road.

To expect Sinn Féin to play that game — because as far as we are concerned, it is a game orchestrated by the DUP — is to do a great disservice to the work of trying to implement the institutions of the Good Friday Agreement.

Mr McFarland: It is after 5.00 pm, and we have had a long day, but I think it has been a good day. It is probably one of the most encouraging days, in spite of things, that we have had in the Assembly with all the parties here.

The DUP has taken a bit of stick over the past few days about intransigence, and now we are just having a bit of intransigence from Sinn Féin. I made a proposal earlier to try and find a way through, which I now withdraw.

There is a reality, which is that the Northern Ireland Assembly, the Hain Assembly, or whatever you want to call it, had a debate. That debate came, as colleagues have said, on the back of a long discussion with business leaders, meetings in the Senate Chamber, etc, and all sorts of tick-tacking outside over a period of months about the importance of the economy and the rates issue etc.

We had a debate — and I know that Sinn Féin did not take part, but everyone else did — and the collective voice from the majority of people in the Assembly was that we get on with creating some sort of committee to look at this in detail with the business community. That was the will of the majority of people. I know that Sinn Féin do not necessarily want to do that — and I cannot understand why, because businessmen who associate with Sinn Féin will be equally as disturbed about this as everyone else.

If we cannot agree on this, which we clearly cannot, then it needs to be referred back. Let us do that now and let the Secretary of State get on with producing whatever needs to be produced.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We will have three more DUP speakers; Maurice Morrow will be first.

Mr Morrow: Mr Deputy Speaker, when William McCrea was putting forward the DUP paper he was cross-examined — and indeed some of us would say that he was interrogated — by everybody around this table. That is fair game and we have no problem with that.

Martin McGuinness looked across this table and said, "We don't know whether we are dealing with people who are genuine or not." Well, perhaps he does not know.

William McCrea has put forward a proposal with which he is not entirely comfortable. However, he did it to move the whole thing forward. Martin McGuinness stamped on it. I suspect that if anyone else had proposed it he may have just tramped on it but not stamped on it. The message that Martin McGuinness is giving us here today is, “You will do it our way or no way; we will make absolutely certain of that. We will not give a millimetre; we will not budge one inch; we have nothing to give and we are giving nothing. We will bring this house crashing down around you if you do not do it our way.”

Mr McGuinness may have come from an organisation that was quite prolific in that respect. Let me say this to him. He can tramp and stamp all he wants and he can be as intransigent, belligerent and dictatorial as he wishes, but I want to say to him in all sincerity that he is going to find that the difference between these negotiations and last time is that the Unionists this time are different. Why are they different? They are different because they have lived through the past four or five years and have seen a process that has been just one way — not most of the time, but all of the time. It was a process in which what Sinn Féin asked for, it got, and if it did not get it it said it would bring the process down.

He may threaten that here today — and I suspect that that is his threat. The message I get quite clearly from him is that it is going to be his way or no way. If that is his attitude then he can be assured that it has been it has been well noted.

Mr Deputy Speaker, I find myself generally in agreement with David McNarry. The losers today will be the business community and the people out there who need us. We are being castigated for not doing the job for which we are paid. No matter what differences I have with anybody sitting round this table — and I have many differences with them and they have many differences with me — I believe that most MLAs take their work quite seriously at constituency level, and they do a fair job. However, I suspect that there are people out there who think that we are a bunch of malingerers and dodgers who are on the gravy train. The Secretary of State and Sinn Féin are going to make absolutely certain that no opportunity is given to local politicians to try to prove to the outside world that we are up for it and that we want to be seen to be doing — and not only seen to be doing, but actually doing — the job that we have been elected to do.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We have a proposal. This is a winding-up situation, and we need to move fairly quickly.

Mr M McGuinness: I urge Maurice not to misrepresent my position. He should also resist the temptation to speak for me because what he has just said is a total and absolute misrepresentation of where I am coming from. I am trying to find common ground with the DUP vis-à-vis how we take this situation forward. I do not think the DUP is up for it. However, because I say that, do not try to portray me as someone who thinks that it is my way or no way. I have suggested ways and compromises since I came into this room on the first day, and I have done that to ascertain whether we are dealing with a DUP that, at some stage, will engage with us, and work sincerely and genuinely in preparing for Government.

Maurice can put on whatever sort of sweet talk he wants for the sake of Hansard, giving the impression that the DUP is open and listening to ideas and suggestions, but the bottom line is that I do not think that the DUP is up for it. I want them to prove me wrong, but I have not heard anything since I came into this room that would indicate that they are even thinking about doing the business with the rest of us. If we were to reach a point where we were getting some sort of a signal from any one of the three DUP Members that there was a possibility of the business being done, then we would be in a completely different ball game, but do not be under any illusions about where we three are coming from. We do not believe that the DUP is up for it, and we are not going to play the DUP game.

At some stage, everybody in this room will have to make an assessment as to whether this is going anywhere. I have talked to people who are connected to some of the parties represented in this room and they have told me not to worry about what is happening now, as it does not get serious until September, October and November. I wonder if some people are living on a different planet from the one that I inhabit. As far as I am concerned, it is serious when supporters of all the political parties think that their politicians are a crowd of tubes who could not get their act together in a million years. I deeply resent that and would be surprised if there were not many MLAs in all of the parties who also deeply resent that. At some stage there will have to be a connection between the DUP and Sinn Féin. Thus far we are not getting it. Do not interpret William's proposal as sending a signal to Sinn Féin, because that is not the way I see it. The DUP will have to send a stronger signal.

Mrs Long: I do not want to lengthen this discussion, but it is not the Alliance Party's position or its role, nor I suspect that of the Ulster Unionists or the SDLP, to fall into line with any party around the table. We have made our positions clear on how we think this should be taken forward, and if we are going to move this forward that needs to be respected by all the other parties at the table. There was no intent on our part to suggest that we would simply have fallen into line had the DUP not taken a contrary position to the one that Sinn Féin put forward, and I do not think that that is particularly helpful.

5.15 pm

We are now into the realms of debating the merits of whether we should have debates in the Assembly Chamber, which is not actually what we have been asked to do. We have been asked to give our views on whether we should set up an economic working group. I accept that it was introduced into the discussion in a genuine attempt to resolve the impasse that existed, but we need to focus on setting up an economic working group.

If we cannot agree this afternoon, would it not simply be sufficient that, as David Ford suggested earlier, we record our willingness to set up a working group, and refer that view to the Business Committee? There is no dissent on the view that the work needs to be done or that the group needs to be set up. If that is the lowest common denominator that we can reach, can we not simply refer that opinion, whether to the Secretary of State or to the Business Committee, so that that can actually happen?

The danger is that we walk away again, after days of time-wasting over who would chair meetings, not having been able to deal with the issue. Members of the business community will take a close look at that because they expect the people round this table to be serious about dealing with the issues that they have raised. We ought to try to find a way in which we can at least, on the minimum amount of agreement, move this issue forward as far as we can.

Dr McCrea: I have been trying to address the issues before the Committee. Naturally, the matter should have gone to the Business Committee and should never have arrived here. However, it is here, and having stated that, I cannot understand how it is linked to the debates in the Chamber, because that is not what is being asked.

It has been suggested — it is not my preferred option — but the Secretary of State said:

“If the preference is for a separate committee to be set up by way of a direction from me”

He is not suggesting a debate in the Chamber, rather a committee set up by the Secretary of State to deal with the issue, and to deal with the business personnel.

I will not take any lectures about how the Executive fell. Our party did not bring the Executive down. That was the fault of those who, on the one hand, said that they were riding a democratic horse but, on the other hand, were riding a completely anti-democratic horse. Therefore, we will take no lectures about that.

We are trying to find a way forward. I sat through four hours of what Maurice Morrow said could be called interrogation. Our delegation put itself forward for that, but at the end of it, what were we told? At the end of both the Alliance and DUP presentations, Martin McGuinness said:

“It was a very horrendous experience to be in this room.”

Mr M McGuinness: With respect, I was talking about my experience from the first meeting until now. I was not talking about —

Dr McCrea: The record will clearly state —

Mr M McGuinness: Well, I will correct the record now.

Dr McCrea: Martin McGuinness said that:

“It was a very horrendous experience to be in this room.”

That is insulting. Nevertheless, I am quite used to insults from that direction.

Mr M McGuinness: Well, it is another misrepresentation of what have I said.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Can we move to a conclusion?

Dr McCrea: There are people here who are losing the plot and losing the head.

I intended my proposal to be helpful. We should refer the matter back to the Secretary of State so that he can set up the Committee and allow the issues to be trawled. There is serious business, and I do not believe that it would be a few days work.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We have two proposals at the moment. William McCrea proposes to ask the Secretary of State, by direction, to set up the working group on the economy and to invite the Business Committee to determine the membership and arrangements for chairing the Committee. Do we have consensus on that one? No, I see that we do not.

The second proposal from Naomi Long is that the Committee records its willingness that a working group be set up. Do we have consensus on that?

Mr Morrow: Could we have clarification, please?

Dr McCrea: Is that not the same as what has been —

Mrs D Dodds: How does that take us forward?

Mrs Long: Perhaps on this occasion clarification is not helpful.

Mr Morrow: Let us live with ambiguity.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do we have consensus on that?

Mrs D Dodds: That is what we did with the Belfast Agreement.

Mr Murphy: This is not just simply about an issue to do with the business community — important as that may be. This issue goes to the heart of this Preparation for Government Committee and how it is going to do its work.

If the first issue we meet that needs further work done is farmed off — or we do not farm it off, we disregard it, and it goes off somewhere else — then the next issue we meet and the next and the next, indeed all of the issues we have listed, will all go elsewhere, and that goes to the very heart. This is not simply an issue for the business community and the relationship and the issues that confront them. This is an issue of how this Preparation for Government Committee will work not only now, but in the future.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do we have consensus? Is that right?

Mr M McGuinness: Could I ask the DUP a question? Is the DUP —

Dr McCrea: I have answered enough questions today. I am not starting to go round that.

Mr M McGuinness: Is the DUP totally and absolutely opposed to the establishment of any subcommittees whatsoever under the auspices of this Committee?

Dr McCrea: We are not dealing with that issue. We are dealing with a specific issue that is before us, and we have made our position absolutely clear.

Mr M McGuinness: I think that is a fair question.

Mrs Long: The Sinn Féin objection to this as stated by Conor Murphy is that if we agree that we do not deal with this as a subcommittee of this Committee, then we will subsequently come to other issues. This was not raised formally as an issue at this Committee. That is not where this direction and this letter originated. It was raised on the Floor of the Assembly, debated there and agreed through the Business Alliance when it came to discuss it with us.

Mr M McGuinness: Yes, but this Committee did not exist then.

Mrs Long: We have had our view sought only on a proposal that has already been discussed elsewhere. I do not believe it sets a precedent for how we discuss other issues that will be raised in this Committee to simply assent to the fact that that working group should now be set up. That is just to clarify my position.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Your proposal is for the Economic Working Group to be set up?

Mrs Long: That is correct.

Mr Murphy: There is no proposal as to how it is.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I beg your pardon?

Mr Murphy: There is no proposal as to how it is set up — set up by whom or where? Everybody agrees that work to address the economic package for here —

Mr Ford: I am sorry, Chairman, Conor says that everybody is agreed, but we have not actually agreed.

Mrs Long: We have not actually agreed, and what I would like to do is to establish formally that we are agreed.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): One at a time.

Mr Murphy: In my own representation I made it clear that it was in everybody's agenda. Now it was not — when this proposal was first discussed in the Assembly there was no Preparation for Government Committee. That is clearly an issue which cuts across the work that every party here has identified as an issue for Preparation for Government. There was no Preparation for Government Committee when it was set up, and that is the logical reason for referring it here because it is quite clearly identified as an issue which is of importance to here.

Mr McFarland: Chairman, I spoke about five minutes in, but my sense is that we are not going to get consensus on this issue. It is nearly half past five, everybody has had a long and, in my view, good day. We are all tired, and if we are not going to get consensus, you should establish that consensus is not available, and we can all go.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are we agreed that consensus is not available at this stage?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The next issue is the response from the Clerk. If you want we can deal with it tonight or note it tonight and deal with it tomorrow.

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The other issue is the time of meeting tomorrow.

Mr McFarland: Chairman, I think we suggested last Friday that we would meet on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday from 10.00 am to 5.30pm. Providing everyone is happy, we should do the same as we did today. It was quite a useful day, and we have got three more parties to come.

There is an issue in terms of having a take at some stage tomorrow given that we had two parties today and we have three more to go. So, logically, if we are doing two parties a day, we will not get through everyone tomorrow. It would be useful, as early as the Committee can tomorrow, to identify if we are going to have to shuffle up on Thursday because there are diary issues to be had here. We could push forward tomorrow to try to get all three parties through in good time for 5.30pm.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are Members OK for a 10.00 am start tomorrow?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We will try and get through as much as possible. Thank you very much.

The Committee met at 10.06 am.

(The Chairman (Mr Wells) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Wells): All parties are represented, so we can start with the preliminaries.

First, this is not a new meeting. This is a resumption of yesterday's meeting. We will continue the questioning today.

Some members may not be aware that there is a Business Committee meeting at 12.00 noon. I understand that at least half of this Committee are involved in that in one way or another, so we will adjourn at 12.00 noon for that meeting, which will be in the usual room. I propose that we resume when the Business Committee has finished or at 1.30 pm, whichever is later.

Mr Murphy: I understand from the Business Committee yesterday, and you can correct me if I am wrong, that there was provision made for a 12.30 pm meeting if it was deemed necessary and that we would be informed during the day whether that was required. It is not exactly clear whether there will be a Business Committee meeting.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I understand that there will definitely be a meeting at noon. That has come directly from the Speaker's Office. I became aware of that only 10 minutes ago. Unless you hear otherwise, take it that we will have to adjourn, as so many of us are involved in that. Does that cause anyone difficulties?

Mr Dallat: Chairman, the only difficulty is that we have not been told about this meeting at 12.00 noon.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I can ask Mrs Dunwoody to check, but that is the word from Mrs Bell.

Mr Dallat: That would make sense.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): If there is any change, I will inform members, but take it as read that we adjourn at 12.00 noon. We will come back at 1.30 pm, not at the end of the Business Committee meeting, which may last only half an hour. There is a very nice lunch provided at the Business Committee, but of course not everybody will have the opportunity to avail of that.

Mr Ford: Is that an invitation?

Mr Paisley Jnr: Mr Deputy Speaker, may I make a statement, please?

At the last meeting of this Committee that I attended, a very serious slander was made against me.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Paisley, I will give you an opportunity to make your statement. I just want to complete the procedural arrangements, and then I will come straight to you. Is that OK?

Yesterday, there was a long series of intensive questions to Mr McCrea and Mr Ford. Both have assured me that they are none the worse for the experience. Therefore, to be fair to everyone, today we will allow exactly the same latitude in the intensity of the questioning of each member who presents.

I understand that Dr Farren will present for the SDLP and Mr Murphy will present on behalf of Sinn Féin. We may only get through the SDLP and Sinn Féin presentations today, but if questions flag and it is apparent that we may be able to get all five parties finished today, we will attempt to do that. We will know as things develop.

I also remind members about mobile phones. Before Hansard started recording, mobile phones did not present a difficulty when on silent or vibrate mode. Now there is a difficulty when they are on at all, particularly if they are close to the microphones. So, either turn them off completely, please, or else set them well back from the microphones if you wish to take messages, texts and e-mails. When we break, I will check with Hansard staff to see if those arrangements are working.

I am sorry, Mr Paisley; I interrupted you.

Mr Kennedy: Sorry, Chairman. Is there any indication yet as to what the Committee is likely to do or if there will be any further discussions for the remainder of the week?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Thank you for raising that issue. I should have pointed out one other procedural matter. Today, I will chair the morning session, and the other Deputy Speaker, Mr Molloy, will chair the afternoon session. Should we meet tomorrow, we will reverse those roles, just in case anyone feels that there is an imbalance there.

Mr McFarland: Does that indicate that the Deputy Speakers' enthusiasm is flagging?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): No. Unfortunately, I have a very important meeting this afternoon, and I will be slated in the local press if I do not attend. Mrs Dunwoody has kindly organised alternative cover, and it is hoped that the balance will be resumed tomorrow. I am sure that the Committee will be happy enough if, as long it is balanced, we continue to do things that way. Yesterday was absolutely fascinating; every word was extremely interesting. The Deputy Speaker is not flagging.

Mr Kennedy: Your nose is getting longer.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Kennedy has reminded me that this is the longest day of the year. Let us hope that it is not the longest meeting of the Committee.

Are we agreed that if we do not finish the questioning today, we should not begin the next presentation? If we are not going to complete it today, we will not start it. Are we happy enough to meet tomorrow? Does that cause Members any practical difficulties?

Mr Morrow: Every day causes us practical difficulties.

Mr Ford: For some of us, tomorrow morning might be possible, but tomorrow afternoon and Friday are very difficult, given that we will have had three intensive days of meetings this week.

Dr McCrea: We do have constituency work to do.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is there consensus that tomorrow morning is a possibility, but tomorrow afternoon and Friday are completely out? Is that the general view?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I think that in sitting for three and a half days we will have given it a fair crack of the whip this week. There is consensus on tomorrow morning only.

Dr McCrea: If it is necessary to finish off the presentations.

Mr Kennedy: If we could complete all the parties' presentations today, we could avoid sitting tomorrow.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Looking at yesterday's events, that is unlikely. We have to give the same latitude to all the parties as we did yesterday.

I understand that Mr Paisley wishes to make a statement, and, therefore, I feel that it is appropriate for me to read on to the record the paragraph on privilege in the Northern Ireland Act 2006, which covers both the Assembly and this Committee. Under paragraph 6 of schedule 1 to the 2006 Act:

"A written or oral statement made by a member in or for the purposes of the Assembly is to be privileged from action for defamation unless it is proved to have been made with malice."

That privilege also extends to meetings of this Committee. Members should note, however, that privilege does not extend to press conferences or to statements made to the press.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker. In this Committee on Friday, a very serious slander was made against my colleague and me. I know that my colleague has had the opportunity to speak to the Committee since then. I have not, and, as I understand that the minutes of that meeting are disputed, I want to reiterate that I reject totally and absolutely the slanderous allegations made by Martin McGuinness. I note that Martin McGuinness is not in his place today. As is the traditional form of the IRA, he has run away. He is obviously not prepared to face the issues.

You have read a statement about the issue of privilege and how it operates within these confines. Someone who makes a statement that, if it were printed, would be a criminal libel, would obviously be expected to back that allegation up with hard evidence that proves that, in his words, there was a determined effort to have him killed, and that certain people were part of that effort.

I would like to know whether Sinn Féin has any evidence to that effect. If so, I believe it is obliged to present that evidence of a crime to the Police Service of this country. Sinn Féin would be obliged to present it at this Committee to back up the claims that it made. I do not believe that it has any evidence, because I know the claims to be slanderous and untruthful. Given that that is the case, there is only one interpretation that I can put on the claims that have been made, and that is that those claims have been made in a malicious way and for a malicious reason.

10.15 am

If Martin "Malicious" McGuinness were prepared to be a man and be here to defend his comments, prove his point and present the evidence, then perhaps we could have this argument not only in this place but in another place.

However, the fact that he is not here — and I doubt that his party will even try to defend his comments or demonstrate that it has evidence for them — means that only one conclusion can be drawn: that his comments were malicious and that they were made solely from that position. It is incumbent upon him to admit that those comments were malicious, to admit that they were a lie, and to withdraw them.

I note that he has not taken up the challenge issued to him at the Committee meeting to repeat his comments outside this room. He has run away from doing that, obviously because he has no evidence to back up his claims. Therefore, I reiterate that his comments were made from solely a malicious position. It is important that the Committee notes that, and I look forward to seeing whether there is any response whatsoever from him or from any of his sidekicks.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Paisley, your comments are now on the record. We also gave an opportunity yesterday for Mr McCrea to make his comments. This is not a matter for the Committee; it is a matter for the individuals concerned. The rules of sub judice apply, and because of that, and in the interests of caution, I do not intend to allow it to become an issue for discussion.

Mr McCrea, I see that you are trying to get my attention.

Dr McCrea: It is in many ways a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. Why did the Chairman not protect me and Mr Paisley Jnr? Under Standing Orders, the Chairman is there to protect Members. In any debating chamber in which I have been, and certainly in the House of Commons, the Speaker calls a person to order or asks them to withdraw their comments. Why was the protection of the Chairman not granted to me when such a malicious statement was made? I request that Martin McGuinness does clear up the matter.

It was said here. You say that it is not a matter for the Committee. The malicious slander was said in the Committee, and if there is evidence it should be brought to this Committee. I assure you that the reason he cannot bring evidence is that there is none. Therefore, the malicious nature of it is established, and I hope at least that the person who made the comments will have the guts to come and withdraw them.

It is serious, but, sad to say, I had no protection whatsoever from the Chairman. I ask Madam Speaker to look into the matter, as the Deputy Speakers are there to protect the members of this Committee.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Could I just point out that although the Chairmen of this Committee are both Deputy Speakers, when we are in the Chair we are bound by the same rules that apply to all Chairmen, rather than by those that apply to Deputy Speakers in the Chamber. Different rules apply.

Mr McCrea, you have raised a point, which we will refer to Madam Speaker, on your views of the protection that was given to you. I will refer that to her and, hopefully, report back at the next meeting.

If anyone is going to repeat the allegations or comment specifically on them, I will have to stop them.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I do not wish to comment on the allegations per se; I want to ask a question regarding something you said. You said that it was no longer a matter for this Committee because matters were sub judice. What draws the issue of sub judice to your attention?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): An impression was given by members of the Democratic Unionist Party that this may well end up in the courts under defamation.

Mr Paisley Jnr: But the matter is not sub judice until it is in the courts.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Speaker, on the Floor of the Assembly, ruled that if there was a likelihood or possibility of something coming before the courts we should exercise caution and not debate it in Committee or in the Assembly. On that basis we are proceeding with considerable care.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I do want clarification. If the Member has the bottle to come back here and has the guts to withdraw his slanderous comments, would you allow that to take place?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes. The clear direction from the Speaker is that we would allow Mr McGuinness the opportunity to do that. We will seek the direction of the Speaker on that issue.

I will permit Mr Murphy to speak if it relates to procedure, but if he wants to speak about the actual comments I will not allow it.

Mr Murphy: It is procedural; it is a question for Mr McCrea. He talks about the protection of the Chairman in relation to comments that were made, but was he called to order by the Speaker of the House of Commons when he made the initial allegations against Martin McGuinness that sparked this whole conversation? Was he told that he was out of order, or was he challenged or asked to withdraw those remarks? In relation to Ian Paisley Jnr's comments about bottle and guts — I will ignore the provocation. His father has made a career out of naming people under privilege in the House of Commons.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We are in grave danger of drifting into areas that are not the responsibility of this Committee. Is everyone content with the procedure that has been adopted on this? It will be referred to the Speaker. Mr Paisley Jnr and Mr McCrea have had a full opportunity to refute. If Mr McGuinness, at a subsequent Committee meeting, decides to take the opportunity to withdraw the allegations, he will be given that opportunity. Is everyone happy?

We have received confirmation that there will be a Business Committee meeting at 12.00 noon in Room 106. The usual arrangements apply. I think that will involve the bulk of this Committee in one shape or another.

Yesterday we received evidence from the Alliance Party and the Democratic Unionist Party. The procedure that we have adopted is alphabetical order, so the next party to give evidence is Sinn Féin. Mr Murphy has indicated that he is giving evidence on behalf of Sinn Féin. I note that one of his representatives is not here. Does he wish to continue in his absence?

Mr Murphy: Yes.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Murphy, you have up to 20 minutes to give your party's view on the paper that you presented to the Committee on Friday.

Mr Murphy: Thank you, Chairman. I do not think that it will take me 20 minutes to present the paper. We have described it as a preliminary paper, and we outlined some of the issues and some of our approach to the work of this Committee and some of the issues that the Committee could usefully get down to in preparation for the return of the devolved institutions. The title of this Committee is the Committee for Preparation for Government, and that is the direction in which we have endeavoured — through a number of propositions since the Committee first met — to get it moving.

In the context of the Hain Assembly, we have been given an initial cut-off date of the end of this month and a further cut-off date of 24 November to resolve the issues that will bring about the restoration of the institutions. Sinn Féin is firmly of the view that that can be achieved much sooner. We believe, and we have long argued — and we have put this view to other parties when we have met them and have argued it with the British Government — that the suspension legislation should have been lifted, and the Assembly could and should be restored within a matter of weeks. We have said that the Executive could be established and the North/South Ministerial Council could become fully functional. That opportunity lies before us, and there is no reason why we cannot seize it. We agreed to participate in the work of this Committee and this Assembly on the basis that their primary function be the restoration of the Executive and the institutions.

We all have a duty to work together in that regard, and this Committee provides us with an opportunity to do that. There have been a number of troublesome and trying meetings in relation to getting business done at this Committee, but nonetheless it provides an opportunity to get some work done on the issues that people feel should be addressed before the restoration of the institutions. The Committee gives an opportunity to advance some of those issues and get some work done on them.

If there is a political will among all of the parties, then there is no reason why that work cannot be completed fairly speedily, putting us in a position for an early restoration, well in advance of the 24 November deadline.

This Committee was set up to carry out the necessary preparatory work for government, not to do the work of a future Executive. Therefore, the Committee could usefully address a number of issues, which we have listed in our preliminary paper. They include the transfer of powers for policing and justice. That issue undoubtedly lies before us on the restoration of any Executive. Not only are there implications for how such powers would be exercised and what accountability mechanisms there would be, but there are implications for the creation of a Department for policing and justice, in whatever shape or form that it takes.

A number of models have been proposed for the creation of such a Department, and the Alliance Party gave its view yesterday on four of them. Its creation will have implications — whatever model we may agree to — as will the policing and justice powers that would be devolved. However, there are also implications for the rest of the Departments, given that, under the Northern Ireland Act 1998, there can only be 10 Departments.

Obviously, the creation of a Department or Departments to deal with policing and justice would have an impact not only on that Department, and how those powers would be exercised, but on other Departments. We are firmly of the view that this Committee could discuss that issue and examine models for a potential Department, and also consider the knock-on implications of the transfer of policing and justice powers.

We have also identified a proper peace dividend as an issue. Others have identified, if not the same issue, then similar issues in papers submitted to the Committee on areas such as economic regeneration packages or financial packages to assist the return of devolution. We have described it as a peace dividend. Essentially, it all boils down to the same issue, which is that, given the underinvestment here for many years, the current economic situation, the widely acknowledged economic difficulties in this part of Ireland, and the lack of investment in infrastructure and other services, there is a clear need to get sustainable and stable institutions functioning here. A clear case can be made for that, and all of the parties have a clear opportunity to achieve that.

I have never heard resistance from any party to the idea of a peace dividend or a financial package. There is a clear opportunity for all parties to co-operate with one another, and with others who have an interest, to identify how such a package could be put together and the areas to which it could be directed, and to make a clear case for such a package. I regret that such an opportunity was missed when Gordon Brown visited on Monday. The party leaders could have initiated that type of work and created a climate in which the parties could have come together to do some serious work on an economic or financial package or a peace dividend.

The Committee could also usefully identify priorities for Government. There is a differentiation between that and a Programme for Government. A Programme for Government is the work of an Executive and involves a degree of interaction between Ministers and senior civil servants in Departments on current priorities, what is possible under current operational programmes, and the priorities that the parties want included.

Priorities for Government would be a useful forerunner upon restoration to guide the development of a proper Programme for Government among the parties that make up the Executive. It would provide an opportunity — particularly for the Alliance Party, which may not be part of an Executive — to have an input into what are considered the priorities for Government. It would also be a useful exercise for Members to identify their key areas.

It was often the case in the previous Assembly that priorities such as targeting social need and investment in the most vulnerable areas found favour among all parties. I do not doubt that, if we put our collective wit together, we could come up with priority themes for government that can then be readily and quickly formulated in a Programme for Government upon the restoration of the Executive.

10.30 am

Another issue that we raised here — and people may not consider it to be within the remit of a Preparation for Government Committee, but it is undoubtedly the case that anything that is done in this institution, even as it currently exists in its very vague format, has an impact on how business is conducted outside. The fact that with all our difficulties we have managed to meet, managed to get a Chairperson or Chairpersons and managed to start to get down to some of the work that was identified has a positive impact, even though people are exasperated by some of the antics that have gone on in this Assembly generally, rather than just in this Committee.

Although it may not necessarily be a part of the remit of the Preparation for Government Committee, any issue that we tackle as part of preparing for the restored institutions does have an impact on how communities interact on the ground. I do not think that anyone can dispute that our ability to create a peaceful summer, devoid of all the tensions and violence that we have had over the last number of summers, will have a significant and beneficial impact on our ability to do business if and when we come back here in the autumn.

So I think it is an area of interest for this Committee that we identify ways in which we can contribute to making our own work in the Committee easier in the autumn by engaging on what could be done in order to encourage dialogue and interaction between people over the summer, which would reduce the possibility of community tensions and violence and dispute over the summer.

Those are some of the issues we have addressed. We made an argument — and I regret that it was rejected — that although each of us here is a senior representative of our party, and we all bring to the table the issues that we feel are priorities for that party that need to be addressed in relation to returning the Executive and the institutions, undoubtedly there are within those priorities fairly specific areas of work that other members of our party and, indeed, other members of the other parties, have responsibility for.

Within the parties we can identify the spokespersons, for instance, on policing and justice matters, and we can identify the spokespersons on economic matters. There is a clear need, if we have identified those as areas of work that need to be addressed by this Committee, for us to free up those people within our parties who have responsibility and expertise on these matters to go off and do the necessary work on them, to scope and identify them, and to bring those issues with some suggestions and reports back to this Committee so that we can continue the business of preparation for Government, which is after all the name of this Committee.

There has been argument over allowing us to nominate other people to get down to more detailed work on the issues that most of us have flagged up. In our case, we have described our submission as a preliminary paper. The DUP suggested yesterday that it had further papers that go into more detail on some of the issues. With the best will in the world, while all of us have some competence in all of the issues that are being talked about here, there are others within our parties with a much greater degree of competence in these issues. There is an opportunity for people to go off to other meetings and do much more detailed work on these issues and bring back reports to us. They may well find themselves, as is normal with Committee meetings, with reports that this Committee could agree could be submitted to the Assembly for debate and discussion and the continuation of this Committee's work.

Those are the challenges that lie ahead of us. There is an opportunity for real engagement in this Committee, but it takes all the parties to want to engage properly in the work that is preparation for Government. Other people have other issues that they have brought, that they have identified as priorities for them.

We are quite happy to discuss those priorities. If this Committee is to achieve anything more than circular discussions about various issues, and if we are to get down to addressing those issues to try to give some satisfaction and to advance other issues to a position whereby an incoming Executive is ready, with some guidance and agreement, to take those issues on board and run with them, the Committee must get down to proper work. That is the challenge, and it will take a proper political engagement and will for that to happen.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): No one has indicated to me that they wish to ask questions. Is no one else speaking on behalf of your delegation, Mr Murphy?

Mr Murphy: No. There are three of us here, and we are happy to share responses to any questions.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Dr Farren has given his name. Are there any others who wish to ask a question?

Mr McFarland: We want a go, but we were giving priority to other parties.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will start with Dr Farren, Mr Ford and Mr McFarland.

Dr Farren: Yesterday, when I was questioning the Alliance Party and the DUP, I started off with a question regarding what those parties might be able to indicate about the essential requirements that need to be met in order to enable restoration to take place. Am I right in understanding — from what Conor Murphy has said and from what is stated explicitly in paragraph 2 of Sinn Féin's submission — that Sinn Féin does not believe that there is any essential requirement standing in the way of the immediate restoration of the Executive and the Assembly?

If that is the case, how does Sinn Féin intend to address the huge lack of confidence, given what is very obvious in here and outside? That lack of confidence has been represented acutely here by the nature of the exchanges and the atmosphere that has persisted from the beginning. In a sense, that lack of confidence is also represented by the way in which we are seated round this table, between the upper end of this side of the table and the other side of the table.

Confidence is needed before parties on that side of the table would be ready to assent to the full restoration of the Executive and all the institutions. How does Sinn Féin believe that that confidence can be built to a sufficient level to enable that to take place?

Mr Murphy: Yesterday, Seán Farren made the point that many matters, particularly in relation to institutional issues, that have been outlined in discussions are best resolved by the parties sitting around this table. Those matters do not necessarily need to be resolved before the restoration of the institutions. If Seán casts his mind back to the situation in 1998 that led to the formation of the first Executive in late 1999, he will remember that the degree of interaction between the parties at that time was similar to the level of interaction now. Nonetheless, Sinn Féin believes that the experience of operating the institutions, although it had its difficulties — and we are undoubtedly sitting here today because of those difficulties — was an important factor in building a degree of overall confidence in people's exchanges and how they would work together.

I am sorry, Mr Chairman, I am being interrupted. I am trying my best.

There may well be confidence issues to be addressed. As Seán Farren and Martin McGuinness pointed out yesterday, there are two-way issues with regard to confidence. There is a substantial lack of confidence among the broad nationalist community, which the SDLP and Sinn Féin represent, in relation to the intentions of the DUP with regard to power sharing and a genuine engagement with any other party. That issue has to be addressed.

Yesterday you asked some of the parties whether there were issues that are prerequisite to the Executive being established. It is Sinn Féin's view that there are not. The Executive can be established in the morning if there is the political will to do so. The confidence issues that other parties have outlined would be addressed in a much more positive fashion in a genuinely working institution — not a shadow or talking-shop institution — where people are sharing power and taking decisions together in the best interests of the people of this part of Ireland and interacting with the Administration and institution in the other part of Ireland. In our view, that would have a much more positive impact on addressing what some people claim to be, and perhaps from their perspective are, confidence issues.

However, as you rightly pointed out yesterday, there are two-way issues in relation to confidence, and they are best addressed in a working institution rather than in this vacuum where people sit back, hope that issues will arise that reinforce their position that they cannot do business with anyone else, and hope that others who are disinclined to provide any positive advice about other people's intentions will whisper in their ears and encourage them to continue in a very negative stance. If people wish to go down that road, that sort of advice and guidance will be provided for them for the next 10 years. The best way to build confidence is to go in to working institutions with each other and start to build that degree of confidence between the parties.

Dr Farren: How are we going to proceed: by allowing several questions from a particular person at the one time?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes.

Dr Farren: It is up to others to say that they have reached a sufficient degree of confidence to allow them to enter into institutions. Obviously, engagement with each other is going to contribute significantly to that. However, the evidence is that that alone will not be sufficient. Therefore I am pressing the point as to whether, over and above engagement, there are other matters, let us say, related to policing or to ensuring that there is no activity associated with paramilitarism or criminality, that need to be addressed in order to help to build a sufficient level of confidence. We could engage a great deal here, but there are still gaps in my reading of the situation. Does Sinn Féin believe that, on the issues I have mentioned, there is any contribution that needs to be made either by itself or by others or by itself and others?

Mr Murphy: The position we have outlined on policing is very clear. We have stated that we wish to be part of the policing arrangements here. There are several matters that we feel need to be resolved to allow us to play our part. We have endeavoured to work diligently with both Governments, and particularly with the British Government, on that. We have engaged with Dr Farren's party and the other parties regarding the policing matters that, as far as we are concerned, are outstanding.

I presume that Dr Farren is talking about the IRA issues. I would argue that the initiatives that have been taken by the IRA in relation to its own existence and to its weapons have had a substantial impact in growing confidence so that this peace process can be bedded down. There will always be things that republicans can do and things they can examine to see how they can contribute to achieving a better atmosphere and a better scenario to enable people to work together and give that degree of confidence. However, we have to ask the question at times: will the DUP just sit back and wait?

William McCrea talked yesterday about the democratic waterline and a wait to see whether that could be met. Martin McGuinness argued that the democratic waterline as set by the DUP is designed never to be met. If it is the case that a Bill Lowry-type figure or some other cold warrior-type figure from the old RUC days would whisper in DUP ears about what is going on and what is advisable for them to do, the DUP will always find a reason to have a lack of confidence in moving forward with the rest of us.

Perhaps we have to ask whether people are genuinely seeking confidence or are seeking reasons not to have confidence. It is my view that, to date, people have been seeking the latter. We will continuously examine whether there are areas in which we can move to build confidence. Since this process started, republicans have not been behind the door about taking initiatives. We will address the policing issue as soon as we possibly can, but there is only so much that a party, an individual or a group can do. However, others have to ask whether they want to find reasons not to engage properly with the rest of us. If they want to find reasons not to go into these institutions they will find reasons; someone will whisper a reason in their ear.

Until about three weeks ago, I could have looked out of my window any morning and found a reason not to come here and do business with anyone else. The British Army was camped, looking through my window for the past 21 years. I could find reasons now — its helicopters are still flying over my house, and it is still stopping people on the roads around where I live. I could find reasons not to come here and do business. Instead, I go into my area and talk to people; I call meetings; I explain to people who are frustrated with the pace of development in this process that they are as well keeping faith with the peace process and that this process will deliver a genuinely better future. This is despite the fact that often, all of the reasons that stare us in the face — particularly in the south Armagh area — tell us otherwise.

Therefore we are genuinely trying to work to bed down this process; we are trying to find reasons for making progress here. Others are trying to find reasons why they cannot. There will always be those in the old guard of the RUC or any other spooks or spies that are about this place who will give them whatever reasons they wish. The question for them is: when will they have the confidence in themselves to go into a working institution with the rest of us and stand on their own mandate alone and not on the advice of some spook or spy?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The next questions come from Mr Ford and Mrs Long of the Alliance Party.

Mr Ford: First, Mr Murphy talked about a cut-off date for this process at the end of this month. Now that we have finally got down to engaging on issues, the Committee may need to look at its plans for working over what would otherwise be a rather long summer holiday, potentially of two months. That would also apply to other working groups or Committees that might exist, whether or not they are subcommittees of this particular group.

I do not think Mr Murphy mentioned the so-called comprehensive agreement of December 2004 in his presentation. I would be interested to know what Sinn Féin's current position is on the status of that particular document.

He spoke of sustainable and stable institutions, and then talked at some length about the issue of confidence. As I understand it, the Sinn Féin position is that confidence will best be established in working institutions. However, it seems to me that there are real issues of concern that if the institutions have not been established in a way that guarantees stability and sustainability, it is unlikely that that condition will be satisfied.

Although Mr Murphy questions whether some people are seeking reasons not to be confident, other parties represented in the room have at different times in the process sought to aid the momentum that Sinn Féin has shown at times. However, concerns remain on the part of some of those parties, and certainly on the part of the Alliance Party. The most recent IMC report, which clearly indicates quite significant progress, does not indicate that we have yet reached a place where criminality on the part of official republican organisations is at an end. Can Mr Murphy tell me how he can build that confidence so that the institutions become sustainable and stable?

Mr Murphy: In relation to the cut-off date, I was referring to the basis on which this Assembly was set up, if not in legislation, certainly in the declared intention of the British Government. When Peter Hain was setting up this Hain Assembly, it was understood that it would operate on the basis of what was contained in the Good Friday Agreement and in the 1998 legislation. The parties would be called together and have a six-week opportunity to elect a First Minister and Deputy First Minister.

The British Government then stated that if that was not the case, the parties would be called together in the autumn for two further six-week periods — obviously based on the period of six weeks stated in the legislation, where if the Assembly were recalled, tried to elect a First Minister and Deputy First Minister and was unsuccessful, then there would be a six-week period in which to do that.

That is what I was talking about — the cut-off point, which was six weeks from 15 May. That was the clear rationale underpinning the approach of a six-week period followed by two six-week periods, which essentially became a 12-week period up to 24

November. That is the rationale that provided those dates for us. We did not agree with that rationale, but nonetheless that is the case.

In our view, suspension should have been lifted, the six-week period left to run, and things let to run their course. However, we have always been clear: if this Committee is getting down to genuine work, and if people are making an argument for us working over the summer, we have no difficulty with that. We will be working over the summer anyway — in our own party, in the various interface areas in the North, trying to keep the peace and trying to ensure that it is a quiet summer. We will be dealing with all those issues on the ground right across the summer. We have no difficulty in coming to places such as this if there is genuine work to be done. So that is where the cut-off dates came from.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There are still people in the room with their mobile phones on vibrate rather than silent, and they are close to the microphones. In the interests of the hard-pressed Hansard staff, please take your phones well away from the microphones because they cause interference.

Mr Murphy: Martin McGuinness made our position clear yesterday on what was described by the NIO as the comprehensive agreement.

We went into the formal review talks on the Good Friday Agreement with all the other parties. We put forward issues, which in our view could improve the working of the Good Friday Agreement. Some of those issues concerned the removal of suspension legislation; our requirement on Ministers to attend Executive meetings, which was a definite, certainly in the last Executive; automatic entitlement for Ministers, where appropriate, to attend North/South Ministerial Council meetings — again, that was abused in the last Executive by the First Minister — the creation of a requirement on Ministers to respect the joint nature of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister's office; putting the Committee of the Centre on a statutory footing with the other Committees; and giving the ministerial code a statutory basis.

Those were some of the issues that we brought into the review and which we raised in discussions with the British and Irish Governments. Martin made it clear yesterday, and I reiterate the point, that at every meeting we had with them, we argued that this should be an inclusive process and that all parties should be involved in it.

The discussions with the two Governments and the other parties then came to a point in December 2004 when a comprehensive agreement package was put forward. We considered it on the basis that we wished to see improvements to the working of the Good Friday Agreement. The Government presented issues to us that could have had the institutions up and running, and an Executive restored within a matter of weeks, and we considered them on that basis.

That context is gone, because the Ballymena speech was made by Rev Ian Paisley, and the rest, as they say, is history. The two Governments then came to us at the start of this year and asked where we stood in relation to matters that had been outlined in their paper, which were proposals for a comprehensive agreement. We reiterated the issues that we brought to them during that review — issues that we felt should be identified and tackled to improve the working of the Executive and the Good Friday Agreement. That is where we currently stand in relation to it. The comprehensive agreement, as outlined in 2004, was in a completely different context. That context no longer exists.

There are a couple of other matters in relation to stability of the institutions. This carries on from the last point that I made. In our view, the greatest factor in causing the instability of the institutions was the suspension legislation. Every time the former First Minister decided that he might want to walk out of these institutions, the British Government rushed in and suspended them.

In our view, and I think we successfully argued the point, the removal of suspension legislation would lead to greater stability in these institutions, so that people no longer have the choice of walking out and having the British Government provide a safety net. Their choice would be either to walk out and go into an election or to stay in the institutions and make them work, through whatever difficulties we may face.

That is a factor in relation to the last question about confidence. There will always be issues that will cause us difficulties. You have to examine whether genuine and strident efforts have been made to create conditions that will grow confidence. I think it is undeniable that those efforts have been made to create conditions in which confidence can grow. People may still have issues; we have issues with other parties and how they do business. We certainly have issues in relation to how the British Government are conducting their business in this part of Ireland, but we will continue to engage with these people because the only way to address all of those issues is through a genuine engagement and, in our view, through a working institution.

Mr Ford: Mr Murphy said that the biggest issue acting against stability was the suspension legislation. Does he really believe that it was only the existence of the suspension legislation that led to unionists taking the actions that they have in the past? It seems to me that the institutions are not stable if there is the potential that they can be collapsed at any stage by the removal of one or more parties, and the way that they are set up requires the participation of those parties to make the institutions work. It would be interesting to know what Mr Murphy's definition of "stability" is in that sense and whether he sees the blame lying solely with the British Government and their legislation.

Mr Murphy: I do not think it lies solely there. There are issues in relation to how all the parties engage with each other and do business and the political will to do business and to see through difficult issues and to give leadership in their own communities.

I do not think there is any doubt that the safety net provided by suspension legislation meant that a party could walk out of the institutions with little consequence to itself. The only consequence to the institution was that we were not actually exercising power. The temptation to use that device created a much greater instability in the institutions. If there were a stark contrast facing people, either to work through issues or to go back to the electorate every time an issue caused them difficulty, then the impetus would be on people to try to work through the issues.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mrs Long, do you want to come in? Then we will move on from the Alliance Party.

Mrs Long: There is an issue I want to follow up with regard to suspension. In other societies that have similar divisions to our own, the tendency would be for people simply to continually return to the electorate, and you see the collapse of Governments over and over again. That is not a confidence-building process; in most cases that leads to much more instability rather than stability. Although I accept that constant suspension is an issue, I think that to blame the suspension legislation for that instability is to look at the symptoms rather than the cause. There is something there that must be addressed. It is quite clear that the alternative to suspension would be collapse, and that in itself is no more stable than suspension.

The other issue that I want to raise concerns point 5 of the summary paper that Sinn Féin provided. It suggests that the remit of the Committee is not to do the work of a future Executive. However, point 6 raises the issue of developing priorities for Government. That was expanded in the presentation this morning — for example, the Alliance Party would be able to put its issues on the table along with everyone else. The reality is that it is not the job of this Committee to prepare a Programme for Government. That is an issue for an Executive.

11.00 am

Although the Alliance Party welcomes parties listening to its views, I doubt very much, given that we would be going into an opposition role in the Assembly, that either of those parties would want to do that or that there would necessarily be consensus on all issues that would be raised. I wonder whether priorities for Government are part of the remit of this Committee, or whether that is something for down the line when we get to the point where people have the reasonable prospect of Government being established.

I want to clarify another issue. At the outset, Sinn Féin said that it believes that there are no barriers to restoration. I am not saying that that is its view of where other parties stand, but it is the party's view that there are currently no barriers to restoration. Sinn Féin identifies three issues in paragraph 6 of its paper as those that need to be addressed: the peace dividend, policing and justice issues, and the priorities for Government. Does Sinn Féin see those issues, for example policing and so on, as having to be addressed in advance of restoration? Or does it see those as issues that would be addressed after restoration?

Given that Sinn Féin has said that it has no particular objection to immediate restoration, what I want to know is, having heard in the discussion so far that other people do have objections, what is its response to that? And does Sinn Féin feel that there is something that it has to do in order to address other people's issues, or does it simply want to reiterate the position that there are no barriers and that restoration should proceed?

Mr Murphy: In relation to suspension, I suppose that it is a chicken-and-egg argument, because of the fact that suspension legislation meant that people were more likely to walk out of the institution rather than work through the issues that faced them. Whereas, if the consequence for people walking out of the institution was to go back to the electorate and explain to it the reason that they had brought down the institution, perhaps that would provide a more stark choice.

As to whether that provides confidence, there is an argument as to whether going back to an election in 2002 — the last time the Ulster Unionists walked out of the institution — or sitting in suspension from then until now would have created more confidence in the community than the situation from 2002 right up to now. That situation not only drains confidence but interest, and it creates apathy and a disregard for the attempts of people to get politics working here. There are arguments that we could debate among each other for quite some time.

On priorities for Government, I made the point that there is a practical difficulty in this Committee working on a Programme for Government. It would take interaction between people who are to be in Government and senior civil servants and heads of Departments to get a Programme for Government put down on paper.

I understand and accept the Alliance Party's rationale that if its intention is to be in opposition, it might not necessarily want to be involved in discussing priorities for Government. However, if this Committee is to prepare for the return of the devolved institutions, it seems to Sinn Féin that a useful area of work that it could be getting down to is starting to scope those issues that would be a priority for an incoming Executive, so that rather than start into that discussion after restoration, people could have a degree of that work done and hit the ground running when an Executive returns.

On the question relating to barriers to restoration, I do not deny that there are barriers. The question is whether addressing those barriers is a prerequisite to restoration. People have concerns that are big issues for them. None of those issues are so big that they could not be addressed within a working Executive and a working institution. They have to be addressed before that can be achieved. So, there is a difference in opinion. Of course, in answer to the question that Seán Farren asked, Sinn Féin has issues that, if it wanted to take them as such, could prevent it from doing business with anyone, certainly the British Government. However, Sinn Féin took the decision a long time back that the best way to move all those issues forward is through genuine engagement, and that is what Sinn Féin is trying to achieve here.

So, there are barriers, and there are contributions that we, as Sinn Féin, can make to try to address some of those issues, and part of what we attempted to do in this Committee was to have a genuine, across-the-table engagement with the DUP. So far we have not managed to achieve that, because the members of the DUP speak through the Chair. They do not engage directly with us at all. They do not speak to us outside this room; they do in certain council chambers, but certainly not in this institution. They do not seem to want to have a direct engagement with Sinn Féin in relation to those issues. Some of the issues that are barriers for the DUP could be addressed in a direct engagement with Sinn Féin, but I regret that we have not got to that position yet.

We are willing to play our part in addressing whatever issues the DUP has. In the first instance, it has the most issues, and it is refusing to go back into an Executive on the basis of those issues. The other parties have issues as well.

However, we are quite happy: we meet with Mrs Long's party, the UUP and the SDLP, and we talk over any issues. We try our best to address matters that concern other parties in relation to us and matters that concern us in relation to other parties. That is the way to do it. Although there are barriers, in our view they should not deny us the ability to get back in charge of this institution and start taking decisions for the good of the people who have elected us.

Mrs Long: I have questions on the policing and justice issue that has been raised during the discussions in the last few days. First, what is Sinn Féin's preference for the structures, and, secondly, given that party's association and history, and recognising that things have changed in the past few years, how would it intend to build confidence right across the community, so that if a Sinn Féin Minister were to hold the post of Minister for justice or policing, those duties would be discharged in the best interests of the entire community? How would that party build that confidence, given that it has been expressed already in these discussions that such confidence currently does not exist?

Mr Murphy: I point to the experience of Martin McGuinness and Bairbre de Brún exercising ministerial power for the good of the entire community. People may have taken issue with some of their decisions: people took issue with some of the decisions taken by all of the Ministers. However, unless you want to be pig-headed about it — and some people may want to — I do not think that people could argue that they took decisions in the interests of one community rather than the other. They looked at the issues, and they operated their ministerial authority to the best of their ability in the interests of the entire community, and that is the approach that any Sinn Féin Minister in any Department — be it policing, justice or any other Department — would take. Not only that, those Ministers would be accountable to the Executive and the Assembly for that approach.

We have had preliminary discussions with other parties in relation to the models for policing and justice. We do not have any firm or fixed view, and we are open to discussion and debate with the other parties. That is why this is one issue that this Committee could usefully get down to detailing to people — in our instance, maybe Gerry Kelly or Alex Maskey, and for the SDLP, Alban Maginness, Alex Attwood or whoever the policing spokesperson happens to be for the other parties. Those people could clear away a substantial area of work, and the implications from that, and the knock-on effect for the other Departments, is an issue for the preparation for a return to the Executive and restored institutions.

We do not have any preference at present, other than to get the best arrangements that would give that degree of confidence. Sinn Féin would also have confidence issues if the DUP were to have the position of policing and justice. For example, a contentious parading issue could arise in which a Minister for policing and justice would have some input, and if someone from the DUP, who was a member of a Loyal Order such as the Orange Order were responsible, that would raise confidence issues.

Rather than leave ourselves at the mercy of an individual, we should work together to build the right structures so that we would have confidence in a policing and justice structure that would deliver impartial results.

Mrs Long: I welcome that response. It is a matter that we raised, not only with Mr Murphy's party, but also with other parties, discussing how their influence over policing and justice could be an issue where confidence could not be established right across the community.

Mr Murphy said that he has no fixed view on policing and justice. However, we have given our view on a number of models that were outlined. Does he have any view on which of those models he feels would be more appropriate or less appropriate? Does he have any preferences, or does he have another model in mind? Has he considered, for example, some of the issues that we raised in relation to collectivity, because, although he referred to Ministers being accountable to the Executive and the Assembly, that is not quite accurate. Although they may have to justify their decisions, those decisions, at this stage, are within the remit of the individual Minister and cannot, under the current institutions, be checked in any shape or form.

Has Mr Murphy given any thought to that, and to how greater accountability across the Executive and the Assembly would add to confidence in those situations?

Mr Murphy: In relation to ministerial accountability, Sinn Féin made propositions under the review on the ministerial code and its status.

I do not have any preference for any of the models, and I am at something of a loss about that. That perhaps reinforces the point that I made at the start of the presentation, that there are people in our parties who have done substantial work on those matters. I have knowledge in relation to the policing and justice issues, but I do not have an expertise. For instance, I would not claim to have done the same degree of work that Gerry Kelly has done.

In order to advance these discussions to the level necessary to prepare for the return of the institutions, the people in the parties who have responsibility for those areas should sit down together to discuss models and accountability measures, and how the policing and justice department would be operated. That is the necessary preparatory work for Government, and that argues for the people in the parties who have that knowledge and expertise getting together to do that work, and bringing the findings of the reports — whether or not they are agreed — to us for our consideration, and to an Assembly for debate. That is the natural way that this Committee should operate if we genuinely want to carry out preparatory work for the return of the institutions.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We now move on to Mr McFarland, and I see that Mr McNarry and Mr Kennedy have also indicated that they wish to speak. Would it be helpful to members to speak as a team, or would they rather speak as individuals? I notice that the Alliance Party contributed as a team.

Mr McFarland: If we could speak in turn — I would like to speak first, and then we could hear from Mr McNarry and Mr Kennedy.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Dallat gets left out of the loop, so I will come back to him.

Mr Dallat: I am well used to that.

Mr McFarland: I want to deal with several issues in turn. These issues affect the unionist confidence in the good faith of Sinn Féin, and it would be useful if we could tease them out.

I was encouraged by yesterday's meeting and, in particular, Martin McGuinness's comments that he was interested in genuine and open discussion and engagement with the other parties.

For some years, Sinn Féin has been the voice of the republican movement, and there has been a general acceptance that Sinn Féin and the Provisional IRA are inextricably linked and that, in fact, there is duality — or was duality — between senior members of the IRA and senior members of Sinn Féin. Most of my questions are directly related to the IRA and Sinn Féin and where it is all going, because those are the issues that affect unionist confidence.

The most recent IMC report went into a fair amount of detail and, unlike the Independent International Commission on Decommissioning (IICD) — which reported that decommissioning of the weapons that they had seen was complete — reported that the Provisional IRA had held back weapons. It is generally accepted that there will always be weapons lying somewhere, either in a hide that somebody has forgotten about, or possibly because individuals, against the understood orders from the top, have held back trophy weapons or personal weapons that they have had for years. I would be surprised if those involved in organised crime have not kept back some weapons for personal protection or protection of their empires.

My first question is: does Sinn Féin accept that there is a strong probability, as described by the IMC, that individuals or groups — perhaps against orders — have held back weapons, and that, as reported by the IMC, weapons were not decommissioned in the way that they should have been?

I would like those issues to be dealt with in turn, otherwise they get mixed up.

Mr Murphy: Generally, I do not have any confidence in the IMC, its reporting mechanisms, how it gathers its evidence, how it reports or the individuals involved with it. It is important to say that. It is a matter of public record. Mr McFarland made a statement about Sinn Féin being the voice of the republican movement. I have to say that the IRA has its own voice, which it has used quite well over the years. Sinn Féin is the voice of Sinn Féin.

I am sorry that I do not have the section that was read with me, because despite my difficulties and differences with the IMC, I nonetheless read the reports. I have conducted a court case against the IMC, so it is important that I do that. If I recall that section correctly, it states something along the lines that someone unidentified has suggested that it might be the case that some members may have kept some weapons. The quantities and calibre are unspecified. If this were to be the case, and if they have been kept in the numbers that might have been suggested, it may have serious implications.

How can anyone respond to such a vague and unsubstantiated allegation — that someone suggested that someone might have something and that it might have implications? That was the basis of the IMC report, and it underpins our experience of the IMC to date, which is that, like the DUP, it has the cold warriors whispering in its ear about what may or may not be the case, and it brings its own particular baggage to all of this. I do not think that the IMC has any useful function to play.

The mechanism by which the UUP, Sinn Féin and all the other parties — apart from the DUP — agreed to deal with this issue was Gen de Chastelain. Not only was there the de Chastelain mechanism, there were additional witnesses. As far as the Governments are concerned, and as far as we are concerned, the issue of IRA weaponry — whatever about anyone else's weaponry — has been dealt with to the satisfaction of the IICD, and there it lies.

Someone can whisper in the IMC's ear for the next 10 years that somebody might have something, and we are not sure what it might be, but if they do, it might have implications. We could sit here for the next 10 years trying to answer that type of unspecified and unsubstantiated allegation on behalf of another organisation. I do not think that that is a very constructive way to go about it.

I do not know how confidence can be given in those regards, because people could say that they have done the business, and people can either accept or not accept that. Republicans are always willing to see how they can talk to people, convince people and offer explanations. At a certain point, it becomes more difficult to do that, when that type of allegation is being dealt with.

Mr O'Dowd: I am surprised that Mr McFarland is sitting here talking about unionist confidence, and then he mentions IRA weaponry. Since the collapse of these institutions, 26 members of the Protestant community have been murdered, every one of them with the use of loyalist weapons. Four members of the Catholic community have been murdered with the use of loyalist weapons. I seriously doubt whether members of the unionist community sit in their homes at night worrying about IRA weapons.

If someone were living in a working-class Protestant area, he or she would be worrying about Ulster Defence Association (UDA) weapons, Ulster Volunteer Force (UVF) weapons, Ulster Resistance weapons and all the other weapons that are out there being pointed from within at the Protestant community. To be honest, this concern, this smokescreen, about IRA weapons is exactly that — a smokescreen. I have no right to speak on behalf of the unionist community, but I seriously doubt whether IRA weapons are a major concern for the unionist community.

Mr McFarland: My question is specific and is based on the issues of openness, honesty and good faith. Does Sinn Féin accept, for whatever reason, that it is possible that some of the IRA weapons were not decommissioned? It is just an acceptance that for whatever reason — and I have covered the reasons — people may have hides that they have forgotten about, or individuals may have disobeyed orders and kept trophy weapons, or people with organised-crime empires may have kept back personal protection weapons. Does Sinn Féin accept that some of the IRA weapons may not have been decommissioned?

Mr Murphy: There is a difference between what Mr McFarland is suggesting and what the IMC was suggesting, which was vague and unsubstantiated. The IMC reported that some portion of weapons was kept back deliberately and, if that were the case, the implications were that those weapons were being held back for a specific purpose.

Is Mr McFarland's suggestion that there might have been a rifle hidden in a ditch 40 years ago that somebody forgot about, or that the person who knew about it had died? Is that the case? Could that be the case? It could well be the case. I do not know, because I do not know what weapons were decommissioned or what weapons existed.

What I do know is that there was an agreed mechanism for dealing with this, which the parties signed up to in 1998. That agreed mechanism was Gen de Chastelain's Independent International Commission on Decommissioning. It had additional witnesses above and beyond the agreed mechanism for dealing with the issue, and they have reported that they are satisfied that the issue of IRA weapons has been dealt with. The two Governments have also stated that they are satisfied. If other people are seeking additional satisfaction above and beyond that, then that goes above and beyond the Good Friday Agreement, and it certainly goes above and beyond what any other Sinn Féin representative or I can give.

Mr McFarland: Is it possible that units, a brigade or individuals may have disobeyed orders to hand in their weapons, which would account for the fact that the IMC is reporting that not all weapons were handed in? I am not blaming Sinn Féin for not handing them in; I am asking whether it accepts that some members of the Provisional IRA could have disobeyed orders. I presume that the IMC is not reporting that wilfully or deliberately telling lies and that it has indications from whatever sources — Sinn Féin may not believe them; they may be securocrats — which it believes in order to put that in the report. The commission is made up of quite an international bunch. It is not a bunch of ex-RUC men who are saying this.

Mr O'Dowd: It is headed up by a former member of the Alliance Party.

Mr McFarland: There is also a former senior member of the CIA and an ex-senior member of the Irish Civil Service. They have not made this up. Does Sinn Féin accept the possibility that members of the IRA have, for whatever reason, not handed in their guns?

Mr Maskey: Conor Murphy has dealt with that matter at length, and much of what we have said is on the public record. We also dealt with the matter in bilaterals with Mr McFarland's party. For the record, we have absolutely no evidence to suggest that any of what Mr McFarland outlined has happened, we have no indications that it has happened, and we have certainly no reason to believe that anything that he has outlined has actually happened. Therefore there is not much more that we can say on the matter.

Mr McFarland: My next question relates to policing. Recently, there has been a slightly esoteric link between policing and parades. At Tullamore in 1994, Gerry Adams told us that it had taken him three years to engineer the parading row and to get people to turn out. In recent years, it seems to have evolved from a parading issue into one where republicans object to a parade and then get the police on the street, and that has led to riots and petrol bombings, etc.

My understanding is that there is a process of discussion in the republican community on the future of policing. The word on the grapevine is that an Ard-Fheis will be held soon to try to get some resolution to the issue, but it is a bit like a tanker. Yesterday, the officers in uniform were filthy, dirty, collusive ex-RUC men, and tomorrow a young republican from Crossmaglen will be encouraged to join the PSNI. Presumably, Sinn Féin will also join the Policing Board. If this is to be solved — and there needs to be a resolution before we get stable Government here — how can this tanker be turned round in such a short time? Yesterday, the PSNI was the enemy and tomorrow young republicans will be asked to join it. How does Sinn Féin see that evolving? It is a key part of the confidence building and of the understanding that is required to get Government up and running here and to get a potential deal with the DUP in the autumn. How can Sinn Féin get the broader republican movement and young republicans to switch off from the fact that yesterday the PSNI was the sworn enemy and that tomorrow it wants them to join it?

Mr Murphy: I could be facetious and say that Sinn Féin could take a lesson from the Ulster Unionist Party. Yesterday — and, perhaps, even today — Sinn Féin was the sworn enemy of Ulster, and, yet, there is a possibility of the Ulster Unionist Party sharing power with my party as it has done in the past. Therefore, we all have historical experiences with which we must deal.

Mr McFarland is operating on the incorrect premise that republicans created the parading issue and he misquoted a speech that Gerry Adams is supposed to have made in Tullamore. I was told that the speech was made in Co Meath. However, regardless of which county the speech was made in, it is incorrect to assume that republicans created the parading issue. The Committee should know — and Alex will verify this — that it was about 60 or 70 republican activists who stopped trouble at the Tour of the North parades. In doing so, they took quite a substantial degree of personal and physical abuse. There was no one there from the DUP, neither were there recognisable figures from the Ulster Unionist Party to keep people quiet and at bay. Therefore, republicans are in communities preventing trouble during parades.

This situation goes back as far as — take your pick — hundreds of years. In the current climate, it goes back as far as Obin Street in Portadown in the eighties. There has always been a tension around parading issues, and Sinn Féin is — I would argue — working harder than any other political party to resolve parading issues at community level.

Sinn Féin's attitude to policing was referred to. Yes, that issue must be resolved. It is not simply an attitude that republicans have to policing. The republican community's attitude to policing is borne out of its historical experience of policing in this state, which, to this very day, continues in the same vein in many republican areas. If Members were to ask young people in Crossmaglen, Ballymurphy, or any other nationalist community in the North about their experiences of policing — not the republican community's view of policing, but its actual experiences — they would be told of continued harassment and continued attempts to recruit young criminals to provide evidence and information and to spy on their neighbours.

That is a continuing experience. Therefore, it is not simply a matter of turning the juggernaut that is the republican attitude to policing. It is a matter of trying to get policing structures in which people can have confidence that what they experience, not just through their lifetimes, but those of their parents and grandparents, changes to become a genuinely responsive and accountable policing service.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I think that Mr Maskey wishes to add to that.

Mr Maskey: With all due respect to Alan McFarland, sometimes the questions that are asked depend on who is in the audience. He is not doing himself any great service. Notwithstanding that, our fundamental approach to this issue is that we will give leadership in our communities. When we conclude on the basis that Conor Murphy outlined earlier in respect of policing, for example, we will have no difficulty taking the decisions to our party and our communities in order that people can buy into them. Leadership will be central to how we take the matter forward. It is not a case of turning the tanker round or one of what was good or bad yesterday could be good today. We will give leadership — as we normally do — at that time.

Mr McFarland knows well the efforts that my party has made in many difficult situations, whether at the Tour of the North or any other interface areas. Indeed, a small number of my colleagues has been proactive in preventing difficulties in those areas and in maintaining the peace despite sometimes-difficult circumstances. I reiterate the point that just last week, 12 of our colleagues were injured in assaults by members of the nationalist community along parts of the Tour of the North route. The stewards who were trying to maintain calm, keep the peace and prevent any trouble bore the brunt of the ill feeling. That will give Members an example of some of the difficulties in those areas, whether from disaffected or alienated youths or from people who are disgusted by some of the Parades Commission's decisions or the nature of some of the parades.

Mr McFarland will be aware of the efforts that Sinn Féin is making. It is ironic, therefore, that he has questioned us about policing when his party recently brought on board David Ervine of the Progressive Unionist Party. Less than a year ago, his associates in the UVF were involved in some of the most serious violence against the police — with gunshots, blast bombs and petrol bombs — in this city and beyond, but particularly in this city. Therefore, Mr McFarland does not appear to have found it difficult to support the police while welcoming to his party grouping in the Assembly representatives of people who have attacked the police and, for a variety of reasons, are openly anti-police.

Mr McFarland will understand that, for Sinn Féin, it will be a question of leadership. He will argue also that he is involved in leadership, and that is fair enough. Sinn Féin will deal with the issue of policing through the integrity of its leadership.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Ford, you indicated that you wish to speak: is it specifically on policing?

Mr Ford: It is specifically on the point raised a few minutes ago on the IMC.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It will have to be short because I am conscious of the fact that I am interrupting the Ulster Unionists, and the SDLP has sat very patiently for quite a long time.

Mr Ford: I appreciate that. I want to establish one quick point of clarification. During that exchange on the IMC, John O'Dowd said that the IMC was:

"headed up by a former member of the Alliance Party."

I just want to know whether I am to take it from his tone of voice that he regards this as proof of bias on the parts of both the IMC and the Alliance Party.

11.30 am

Mr O'Dowd: I was calling into question the independence of the IMC; that was what the comment related to.

Mr McFarland: Chairman, thank you, and thanks for the answer. Can I move on to another issue that again is in the IMC report and is of genuine concern — organised crime and criminality.

About two months ago, I was very heartened by 'Let's Talk'. When Martin McGuinness was pressed on his attitude to criminality he said:

"If there's criminality, let the authorities deal with it."

I remember being surprised and encouraged at the time that this was an approach that, to my understanding, had not been previously there from Sinn Féin. This was followed a few days later by Gerry Adams who said the same thing:

"If there's criminality, let the authorities deal with it."

Now that is an approach that we would all be able to identify with.

Around the same time, the Assets Recovery Agency, the Garda Síochána and the PSNI arrived at, and had an enormous raid on, the property of Thomas "Slab"

Murphy in south Armagh, where they found €200,000 under a haystack, a computer with records, and they confiscated petrol tankers.

This, as I understand it, is the same family that was involved last year with the 200 houses under family names in Manchester and Birmingham. The allegation was that this was some form of organised criminality — and, of course, Mr Murphy is an extremely senior member of the republican movement and has been for many years.

As I said earlier, there is a close link between Sinn Féin and the IRA. This link is clearly still there: the houses are still there, and I have no doubt as we go through this there will be a substantial amount of other evidence that there is direct relationship between the IRA and organised crime.

Given the links between Sinn Féin and the IRA, and given the clear evidence — and I know they keep denying it, but it is quite clear that these are organised crime empires — how does Sinn Féin see itself being able to distance itself from the IRA and this organised crime so that the unionist community and the general public will believe that there is no longer a link and that the allegation that Sinn Féin benefits from the proceeds of these funds can no longer be substantiated?

How do you unstitch, unhinge or stand down this enormous crime empire in time for Sinn Féin to be viewed as being an acceptable partner on the Policing Board or, indeed, in Government?

Mr Murphy: It is interesting that Mr McFarland's party has encouraged us to join the Policing Board since it was created, long before the IRA took any initiative last year in relation to its existence or weaponry, yet these are now issues for the UUP.

Alan McFarland is almost asking us to prove that republicans are innocent. He spoke about the enormous evidence. Let the evidence take its course, if there is enormous evidence. I could say that there is enormous evidence that the UUP is up to all sorts of shenanigans in America with hidden bank accounts and that it is a corrupt party, hiding business from the Electoral Commission, and that it should be thrown out of Government on that basis. Let the evidence take its course and see what shapes up.

The reality is that the IRA issued a statement last year that outlined its attitude. As far as it was concerned, the armed struggle and the conflict were over. It instructed all its volunteers to engage in no further activities whatsoever and dealt with the issue of its weapons. For me, the issue of the IRA is substantially dealt with. I realise and accept that other people will have ongoing issues that they will have questions about.

To cobble together everything that Mr McFarland has mentioned and say that it is an enormous weight of evidence, that republicans must prove themselves to be innocent and that Sinn Féin must go further and prove itself to be entirely innocent, and that there might then be some confidence — I am afraid that it will not work that way.

It is like the point that I made in relation to the DUP. If you want to find something to give you a reason for not doing business, you will. I could find something any day I wished to give me a reason not to do business, but my party believes that the best way to advance peace in this part of the world and to get the institutions bedded down is to get in and start to work them. Through that, issues that cause a lack of confidence on all sides can be further addressed — I would argue that many of them have been addressed to date.

I will not stand here and defend Tom Murphy or any other individual, because a number of allegations have been made against him; that is not my job. I am here to represent Sinn Féin. I am quite happy to stand over how we raise all our money — and I hope that everyone else feels the same — how we spend it, where we keep it, and to make our accounts open to anyone who wants to scrutinise them. As I said, I hope that all the other parties are the same.

Mr McFarland: The IRA, as I understand it, has said that the war is over, has decommissioned the bulk of its weapons, had a medal ceremony in Dublin for its volunteers and had a gathering in Dublin — I am just going on newspaper reports; Mr Murphy can tell me whether it is true or not.

Mr Maskey: Were you the guest of honour?

Mr Murphy: It was at Tullamore.

Mr McFarland: The IRA has had a gathering of the families of the bereaved in Dublin — there were pictures of that in the paper. There are strong indications that the IRA, as regards its former existence, is stood down or is in the process of doing so. However, it is still there. Is it possible to get some indication, given that Mr Murphy is close to the IRA in philosophy, as to where the IRA sees itself going? If it stays in existence and views itself as an army — there is only one reason for an army to exist, and that is to fight. Why would anyone wish to keep a standing army, albeit temporarily disarmed? We all know that a group of us could return from eastern Europe tomorrow with a plane-load of weapons, if we had the money.

Mr Murphy and I have spoken about this at length. The decommissioning was not about the weapons; it was about indications of good faith as to why people wanted to hold onto weapons if they were no longer offering us violence. The question is why, if it is to remain in existence, but not turn itself into a republican equivalent of the British Legion, does it wish to stay in existence? An army exists only to be ready to fight.

Mr Murphy: That is a question for the IRA. The IRA has been in existence since the early part of the last century. I do not even know the date on which it was formed. It has always been in existence. At times, it has been something that has exercised unionists; at other times it has not. As with any organisation, its intention, ability and willingness to do certain acts are more relevant than its actual existence. The statement made by the IRA and the initiative taken by it are of huge significance for the future of this entire country. We have a responsibility to build on that.

We could try to poke holes in it to convince ourselves that it is somehow not genuine, or we can take advantage of it. It is the same situation with all of the issues in which I do not have confidence concerning other parties and the Governments. I can build on what I have or poke holes and provide myself with a further lack of confidence as a reason for not moving on. Whether we take advantage of it or not, the initiative taken by the IRA last year was hugely significant, as time and history will prove. It is a clear, firm statement of what was already a trend of development in the IRA's existence and activities. That was confirmed last August.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I want to cover a procedural issue. Yesterday we timed the questioning of the DUP submission at four and a half hours. Therefore, in the interests of fairness, Members will be given the opportunity to question Sinn Féin for that length of time. That will take us from 1.30 pm until 4.00 pm. It is clear that Members will use that time — we have taken an indication of questions, and they are quite lengthy and thorough.

To be realistic, on that basis and because of the problem that has arisen with the Business Committee, we must take it almost as read that there will be only one submission today. It is not worthwhile starting the SDLP submission at 4.00 pm. I am in the hands of Members on that. Do you wish to stay here until 6.00 pm or 7.00 pm?

Mr McFarland: Logically, if certain questions have been answered, they should no longer trouble Members. I have no doubt that many have not yet been asked. It is hard to see how to judge, because there could be two or three more topics to discuss, in which case we could finish earlier; however, perhaps it is worth —

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I am just alerting Members, because I sense a slight frustration in the two parties who have not yet got their teeth into questioning.

Mr Paisley Jnr: We should perhaps just play it by ear, and see how it develops. I would be happy with that.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do we agree that if we still have not completed this at 4.00 pm, there is no sense in starting the SDLP submission?

Mr A Maginness: We should play it by ear and be flexible. However, I have a difficulty this afternoon, and I wondered if I could ask Mr Kennedy a question now.

Mr Kennedy: I do not think Mr Kennedy was going to be called.

Mr McNarry: I too have a problem this afternoon. It depends on the answers, but I do not intend to be lengthy.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Can we try to sort out the gist of a question, Mr Maginness and Dr McCrea, before we all adjourn at 12.00 noon? Dr McCrea is in a similar situation, so we will try to squeeze the three of you in before 12.00 noon.

Mr McNarry: As long as we get the answers that we look for.

Mr O'Dowd: There is no guarantee of that.

Mr Murphy: We are happy to stay here, should it be 4.00 pm or beyond, to answer questions for as long as people have questions for us to answer.

Mr McNarry: I would like to think that if the DUP was grilled for four and a half hours, and I have a certain empathy with many of its points, that we would do a similar job on the republicans.

Mr Murphy: We have been grilled for more than four and a half hours, I can tell you.

Mr McNarry: I am sure that you have, but on those occasions you did not have as much light as you have in this room.

11.45 am

Mr McNarry: Conor Murphy mentioned his concerns about a DUP Minister of justice being an orangeman. That was insulting to orange brethren, irrespective of party allegiance. It may have been a sign of ignorance on his part, but I trust that he will read Hansard and reflect on what he has said. Neither a DUP orangeman nor an Ulster Unionist orangeman is likely to take the Ministry of policing or justice. An orangeman possibly, but there is a distinction. I am sensitive to what he said, and I hope that he understands that.

Mr Murphy also mentioned his hope, which I share, for a peaceful summer. He said that it might be a key to what happens when this Committee meets after the recess. He spoke of his ability to encourage dialogue to reduce community tension. That could, of course, be taken as something of an admission that he also has the ability to discourage peaceful activity. On the positive aspect of that, it would be key to my party and me to know whether those who Mr Murphy encourages would settle for peaceful protests at all times, and that peaceful protests would be just that. His colleague Mr Maskey mentioned Mr Murphy's recent work in that area, which is acknowledged.

Continuing with the theme of encouragement, what could Mr Murphy do to encourage the Government with which he is pally to remove the veto position that they allow him, so that parties could, in principle, establish the right to form a voluntary coalition in a restored Northern Ireland Assembly? That principle would be key to democracy, and it is an open secret that Members from my side of the House believe that, as there is no way that he would enter a Government other than by being pally with the two Governments, Mr Murphy will cling to the veto principle and perhaps deny any other parties the right to form a coalition. He will appreciate that it is normal to do that in a modern European democracy.

Mr Murphy: Normal in a normal democracy — I would contest whether there has ever been normal democracy in this state.

I accept Mr McNarry's point about orangemen in the DUP. I was pointing out the broad nationalist view that there may be a conflict of interest were such an issue to arise and a member of the DUP, or, indeed, a member of the UUP, were to become Minister for justice and happened also to be a member of the Loyal Orders.

Mr McNarry: If I may interrupt, Mr Murphy is not attacking the parties; he attacks the Orange Institution, which is not represented here.

Mr Murphy: I was interested to read a statement the other day from a former leading member of the Orange Institution — I think that he currently is a member — who criticised disciplinary action being taken against other members. He was quite clear that the Orange Institution that he joined had changed very much and was morphing into a very political organisation. However, that debate is ongoing within the Orange Institution. From a nationalist perspective, there could sometimes be considered to be a conflict of interest in relation to those matters.

As Alex Maskey outlined, we can give leadership to try to encourage a peaceful summer. It does not suit our communities in the Ardoyne, or wherever else, for there to be conflict. We give leadership to try to ensure that, although people have issues with Loyal Order parades going through certain areas, they do not become issues of violence. We try to give leadership; leadership was lacking in the aftermath of last year's Springfield Road parade. Leadership is what we try to give.

It is not in my gift to speak for every area. Parading issues are, in the first instance, matters for those people who live in the areas through which parades pass. We try to give leadership to ensure that, if people dispute the rights of Loyal Orders to parade through certain areas, in certain fashions, at certain times, there is a peaceful resolution.

I can assure the Committee that we will continue to give leadership in that regard. I cannot say here and now that that will always be successful; however we endeavour to be successful in that regard.

On the subject of a voluntary coalition, the experiences of nationalists in political institutions in this state were such — we can get into a long historical argument, but I am conscious that we only have five minutes to answer Mr McNarry's question — that clauses and guarantees and checks and balances had to be built into the Good Friday arrangements to ensure that the abuse of power that had been practised in this statelet was no longer continued in the new institutions, and that the Good Friday Agreement marked a genuinely new beginning to political institutions and the political experience of people in institutions in this state.

The Good Friday Agreement recognised the fact that this was not a normal democracy and that there were not normal democratic proceedings. People had to be able to buy into the political institutions, and therefore their position in the political institutions had to be guaranteed. I wish for it to be otherwise, but that is the historical reality that faces us as we try to work these institutions. Therefore, we would not give away our rights to be represented in a power-sharing Executive in this institution, given the historical experience that we have had at the receiving end in this state when power was exercised in an untrammelled fashion.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Can I ask you to bring your remarks to a close?

Mr Murphy: Yes.

The intricate measures that were built in were a recognition of the experience of nationalists in this state and of the necessity to get nationalists to buy into genuine power-sharing arrangements with all of the other parties. Therefore, it would be foolish of us to give up and to try to undo and ignore that historical experience. We have a right to be in the institutions as they are defined in the Good Friday Agreement, and we will defend that right.

Mr McNarry: Is it fair to say —

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr McNarry, I have promised five minutes to each Member. If you have a point, give it to one of your colleagues to ask later on.

Mr Maginness, you have five minutes strictly and then Mr McCrea has five minutes.

Mr A Maginness: Thank you very much, Mr Deputy Speaker.

I am trying to understand the position of Sinn Féin on policing, and to put it as succinctly as I can, in an attempt to understand it, whenever policing and justice powers are returned to Northern Ireland — to the Northern Ireland Assembly — Sinn Féin will, at that point, support the police and join the Policing Board. Is that an oversimplification or is that the position of Sinn Féin?

Mr Maskey: It is perhaps an oversimplification, and again I cannot understand why that is the case, because our position is very clear. We are working towards the opportunity for ourselves to be part of policing arrangements. We were involved substantially in the discussions on policing and many other matters that led to the Good Friday Agreement. Therefore, we signed up to policing arrangements as per the Good Friday Agreement. We have not yet attained those arrangements. We are working diligently to achieve them.

Obviously, the debate has moved to a point at which we are looking for, as are others, the transfer of policing and justice arrangements back here to an accountable Executive, Assembly and institutions. We have said very clearly that when we are at that point we will put those proposed arrangements to our party and seek to convince it and our wider constituency that it is time to become involved in policing arrangements. We have our benchmark. We have discussed it with yourselves fully, regularly and bilaterally. When we secure those areas, we will go to our party and get leadership on that issue.

Mr A Maginness: Therefore, Mr Maskey is in general agreement with the statement that I have made. I do not want to misinterpret his position, because I am genuinely trying to clarify what Sinn Féin is saying. In effect, if there is a transfer of powers, Sinn Féin will go to its party and, in a proactive way, seek its support for the new policing arrangements.

Mr Maskey: We have said very clearly, as I think Alban will appreciate, that we want to see the transfer of policing and justice arrangements. We want to look at the modalities. We want to agree a time frame. Having settled on those matters and having got them resolved, we will most certainly go to our party.

Mr A Maginness: In the absence of the transfer of powers, which is dependent on cross-community support in the Assembly, what will Sinn Féin's position be in relation to policing and, in particular, to the PSNI as it is currently constituted? I am interested in that issue, because on 11 May 2006 'The Irish Times' published an interview that Frank Millar had conducted with Gerry Adams. In that interview, Gerry Adams stated:

“Policing may be a necessary element in the resolution of the outstanding matters to do with the Assembly.”

However, policing must be dealt with in any case. That comment by Gerry Adams suggests, to me, that there is an alternative Sinn Féin position. I would like Sinn Féin to comment on that statement.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): You have two minutes to respond, Mr Maskey.

Mr Maskey: Thank you, Mr Chairman.

For a substantial time, in all our discussions at bilateral level and with the Governments — particularly, as Conor Murphy said, with the British Government — Sinn Féin has focused extensively on the question of policing. We are not working for an absence of accountable institutions; we are involved in a serious and sustained effort to re-establish the accountable institutions, which will include the transfer of policing and justice. That is what Sinn Féin is working towards, and I hope that we can secure that transfer. We are working for a successful outcome to this process, no matter how sceptical some of us may be about it. We are working for success as opposed to failure.

Mr A Maginness: The point that I am making is that Gerry Adams is hinting at an alternative. What is that alternative?

Mr Maskey: All that I can say is that we are not working for failure; we are working for a successful outcome to this phase of negotiations.

Dr McCrea: Mr Deputy Speaker, as far as the unionist community is concerned, paramilitarism, criminality and decommissioning are vital ingredients if we are to move forward to devolved government. As far as we are concerned, if those issues are not satisfactorily resolved, there will be no devolved government.

Does Sinn Féin accept the fact that those issues must be resolved before devolved government is restored? Does Sinn Féin accept the fact that that is the unionist standpoint?

Mr Murphy: Sinn Féin acknowledges that that standpoint has been the DUP's public position, William. In Sinn Féin's view, there are no outstanding issues to prevent the restoration of the institutions. DUP issues, Sinn Féin issues and the issues of the other parties can best be addressed and resolved among all the parties at this table. First, that can be done through direct engagement, which, to date, the DUP has refused to engage in. That direct engagement should extend to Sinn Féin and all the other political parties. Secondly, it can be done through the working of these institutions, where a general degree of confidence in one another's good intentions can be built up.

I accept the fact that the DUP has issues about activities, weapons and organisations. I note that the DUP normally zeroes in on the IRA, despite the activities of loyalist paramilitaries. There is severe doubt among many others, not just among Sinn Féin members, about whether the DUP's mark for satisfaction could ever be met and about whether it genuinely wants the issues to be addressed and resolved to its satisfaction, or to something that it thinks is a barrier, which means that the DUP will not have to share power with Sinn Féin in any restored institution.

Dr McCrea: Confidence is a major issue, and the unionist community does not trust the IRA. The unionist community does not have confidence in Sinn Féin's stance of being inextricably linked to the IRA.

I was asked a direct question about Billy Wright. I will now ask a direct question. Will the Sinn Féin delegation tell me, and confirm, that Martin McGuinness was a commander of the Provisional IRA? When did he step down from that position? Or did he step down?

12.00 noon

Mr Murphy: Martin McGuinness gave evidence to the Bloody Sunday Inquiry. It is a matter of public record. The Member may refer back to that. I cannot remember the exact dates that he gave for his involvement in the IRA and when that involvement ceased.

In reality, the DUP may have no confidence in the IRA, but it is not being asked to share power with the IRA. The DUP has no confidence in Sinn Féin. Sinn Féin has confidence issues, as do the SDLP and probably some of the other parties, with the DUP. How do we resolve those confidence issues, William? We are sitting in a small room, face to face, in Parliament Buildings in Stormont. We can start to resolve those confidence issues through direct engagement, and we could resolve many of them very well through having a direct working relationship with each other, as a result of which we could start to deal with issues of importance to you and your constituents. Yesterday you mentioned the autism issue, which Martin McGuinness tried to advance across the island, as a matter that was important to you. There are many other issues that we can work on together to try and build a general degree of confidence in each other's motives and motivations, and in where we each are coming from and going to.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Gentlemen and ladies, it is 12.00 noon. Mr Molloy will be in the Chair at 1.30 pm, and discussion of the issues raised this morning can continue until parties are satisfied that they have had a good hearing.

Mr McFarland: Mr Chairman, I do not know how many other colleagues are involved, but the Special Olympics opens this evening, and a number of us have received invitations. I understand that the launch is now at 5.30 pm, not 6.30 pm, so there is a flash-to-bang time here. Perhaps we might leave here at 4.00 pm to allow us to get home, change and get down to the Odyssey for 5.30 pm.

Mr Murphy: That is for those of us who live close to here.

The Committee was suspended at 12.01 pm.

On resuming —

1.32 pm

(The Chairman (Mr Molloy) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): OK, members, we have a quorum. We want to close the meeting at 4.00 pm because of the Special Olympics. Is everyone agreed on that? And on tomorrow morning's starting time?

Mr Morrow: Mr Deputy Speaker, I know that tomorrow morning probably suits a lot of people, but not tomorrow afternoon. It may not be possible to get through the two remaining presentations from the Ulster Unionists and the SDLP. Is there any possibility of putting those off until Monday?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): What way are other members fixed for tomorrow?

Mr Ford: Is Maurice suggesting that we hold no meeting at all tomorrow?

Mr Morrow: Yes.

Mr Kennedy: I suppose that we could live with that.

Mr McFarland: Could we meet tomorrow, Mr Chairman, because if one presentation runs into Monday, and that will be the Ulster Unionist one, my sense, given the past two days, is that it may be lengthy? [Laughter.]

When the presentations are finished, we will clearly need to have a discussion, and I suspect that that may take some time before we go on from there. If we go too far into next week, we are into the visit of the Prime Ministers and all sorts of weird and wonderful things. A sitting tomorrow morning would probably be helpful, although it would not be end of the world if both presentations continued on into Monday.

Dr Farren: I do not know about other parties, but we usually have our Assembly group meeting on a Monday morning. Although my colleagues and I are happy enough to attend the Committee then, we would prefer that Monday afternoon be devoted to the UUP, if the SDLP's presentation is tomorrow morning. That arrangement would be eminently suitable to the SDLP, but if there is pressure not to meet tomorrow, I welcome that. Nonetheless, the other option may be more convenient for us as a party.

Mr Murphy: In the original discussion about running into tomorrow, there was almost an assumption that we would get through the three remaining presentations, starting this morning. That quite clearly will not be the case. We will be fortunate to get through Sinn Féin's presentation. We are happy to come back in the morning to finish our presentation if we do not finish it before 4.00 pm today. That is the context in which we were talking about coming back tomorrow. I am not sure, given the length of time that presentations are now taking, whether we would get through even the SDLP's presentation in a morning, although we may do so. We cannot really legislate for that, given the way proceedings have been going to date. We are happy to come back in the morning if that is what people require, or to get a run at this on Monday and Tuesday.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): What way is the DUP fixed?

Mr Paisley Jnr: We are happy to do something tomorrow, if that is what it takes. We can facilitate a meeting on Monday as well and indeed on Wednesday. On Tuesday, there is a problem and we cannot provide a delegation.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): If we meet tomorrow morning from 10.00 am to 12.00 noon or 12.30 pm and see if it is possible to deal with one submission, we could then look at Monday. Are we due to meet all day on Monday?

Seán has expressed an interest in the Committee sitting on Monday evening.

Dr Farren: I am expressing a party preference, because we have our group meeting on Monday, and that is an opportunity to report back and keep colleagues informed; otherwise they do not hear directly what is going on.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Does 12.00 noon on Monday suit everyone?

Dr Farren: Yes, that would be fine.

Mr Kennedy: If we meet tomorrow morning and, hopefully, on Monday from 1.30 pm until about 4.30 pm, that might allow time for the final two presentations to be tidied up.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): There are a few solutions. If we meet at 1.30 pm on Monday, it will be well into the evening before we get going, whereas a 12.00 noon start would give time for party meetings and for the Committee to begin its discussions.

Mr Murphy: It may be better to make a judgement at the end of tomorrow's business, when the presentations may have been made.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We will start at 10.00 am tomorrow and deal with one presentation.

Mr Kennedy: I want to explore some of the issues that emerged from Sinn Féin's presentation. There was some discussion about the comprehensive agreement, and I think that Mr Murphy said that the context no longer existed. Does that mean that, as far as Sinn Féin is concerned, it is dead, or that it is not possible to resurrect it in any shape or form? What is Mr Murphy's view of the comprehensive agreement? Is it a beaten docket now as far as he is concerned?

Mr Murphy: One context of the comprehensive agreement was that the IRA would go off and do certain things. Those things have been done, so that context went in 2005. The IRA has issued a statement about its intentions and dealt with the issue of its weapons, so that context has gone. We brought issues to the table as part of the review, which carried through to the Leeds Castle talks, and into what the Governments then came up with as a proposal for a comprehensive agreement. Those proposals arose in the context that existed at the end of 2004, but that context no longer exists.

At the beginning of this year, all the parties attended meetings here, and the Governments asked us what issues of concern we had. We labelled those issues that we wanted to see addressed and that we felt would lead to the improved working of the Good Friday Agreement institutions. We also outlined those issues this morning. In 2004, the Government drafted proposals for a comprehensive agreement in a certain context. First, the agreement never happened, and, secondly, the context has changed absolutely since that time.

Mr Kennedy: Mr Murphy will, however, have heard in presentations, or in cross-questioning, the clear indication from probably both unionist parties that there are issues of concern that remain and that, presumably, relate to what was to have taken place as a result of the comprehensive agreement. Does he accept that it is unfinished business? It may not be unfinished business in his eyes, but there may be unfinished business in the eyes of other parties in relation to those events.

Mr Murphy: I assume that Mr Kennedy means in relation to events involving the IRA.

Mr Kennedy: Yes.

Mr Murphy: That may be the case, but I remind Mr Kennedy and his party that they signed up to the Good Friday Agreement in 1998. In that agreement, they signed up to a mechanism whereby the issue of IRA weapons would be resolved. The body that was set up to deal with that issue has reported that it has been dealt with to its satisfaction. If Mr Kennedy wishes to revisit that part of the Good Friday Agreement and express some degree of satisfaction with how that mechanism operated, that is another issue.

I do not doubt that unionists have issues with the IRA, and with republicanism generally. As I said this morning to William McCrea, in our view these issues are best resolved through an open and honest direct dialogue among the parties, and the atmosphere would be greatly encouraged by a direct working relationship within these institutions.

Mr Kennedy: Does the Member take the view that the IICD has no further work to discharge in relation to IRA weaponry?

Mr Murphy: The IICD took that view, as far as I am aware.

Mr Kennedy: Does the Member take that view?

Mr Murphy: That is the group that my party, Mr Kennedy's party, the SDLP and the Alliance Party agreed would carry forward this piece of work. Its report says that it is satisfied that that work in relation to the IRA has been dealt with. I am satisfied, from that report and from what the IRA has said, that that issue has been dealt with.

If unionists have ongoing issues with that, then the Ulster Unionist Party departs from the previous agreement about how the IICD would do its work — that is an issue between themselves, the IICD and the Good Friday Agreement. I remind Mr Kennedy that it was not just members of the IICD who were witnesses; there were additional witnesses, and their presence did not form part of the Good Friday Agreement discussions. However, as far as I am concerned, the IICD has done its work in relation to the IRA.

Mr Kennedy: The Member has already outlined his position on the IMC report, but clearly the IMC's findings are important to many of the other political parties. When the IMC indicates that not all IRA weaponry has been decommissioned, the IICD should be concerned. Does the Member not share that concern?

Mr Murphy: I have made my position clear on the IMC, its mechanisms, its methods, the individuals involved and the vagueness of the allegations that it made — and the seizure upon that vagueness by parties that I believe wish to seize any opportunity to refuse to go forward in co-operation with the rest of us.

The IICD and the IMC appear to be at odds over each other's interpretations of events, and I presume that that is something for them to resolve between themselves. The IICD was a product of an agreement between all the parties here — with the exception of the DUP — and the two Governments. The IMC was a creation of the two Governments, at the behest of Mr Kennedy's party leader, and, therefore, in our view it does not have the same status — or any status — in relation to any agreement from the parties that signed up to the Good Friday Agreement.

Mr Kennedy: Yes, but does the Member at least accept that, given the public interest in IMC reports and what they highlight — and the expression of that interest by political parties — that there is unfinished business, to put it mildly, in relation to IRA weaponry and decommissioning?

Mr Murphy: I would accept that other parties might hold that view, but I do not. I do not think that there is unfinished business. Whether it be an IMC report or the whisperings of some senior police person or other person in the security services, if people are seeking reasons not to engage, to be concerned, or to create blockages, then people will provide them with those reasons, because other people have their own agendas.

Similarly, if I were seeking not to engage with the Ulster Unionist Party or with the Democratic Unionist Party, I could find reasons. The berating that I get from people every day of the week would provide me with enough reasons not to engage, but the responsibility on all of us is to move this process forward. We have agreed, under the terms of the Good Friday Agreement, ways of dealing with the issues of weaponry. As far as I am concerned, the only people who have fulfilled the requirements under the terms of the Good Friday Agreement are the IRA. The IICD has reported to that effect that it is satisfied. It is my view that the two Governments have accepted that report. If other people wish to take issue with that, it is a matter for themselves. However, I do not accept that there is unfinished business for the IRA in relation to the use of its weapons.

Mr Kennedy: Mr Chairman, an issue that causes a degree of wonderment and surprise in the eyes of the pro-Union community is the very presence of Sinn Féin in a Preparation for Government Committee, which would lead to the re-establishment of political institutions in Northern Ireland under the Union, with the clearly enshrined principle of consent in place, and a partitionist settlement.

There is a view that Irish republicans would not want such things. Can the Member, as an Irish republican by background and ideology, convince me that his pathway is clear on those issues? Can he convince me that he wants to be part of a partitionist settlement, under the Union, in this place?

Mr Murphy: I would not try to do that, because I clearly do not want it. All of my life — and Mr Kennedy knows me well — has been dedicated to ending partition. We were clear in our view that the Good Friday Agreement did not represent a settlement but a space — an arrangement — that allowed us to engage with one another and chart a way forward out of this conflict.

We are not in this Building or this process as part of a settlement; republicans have not accepted the constitutional arrangements as such. We have accepted that we need to come into this space to work with unionists. We have a legitimate right, as have other parties, including the SDLP, to pursue our ideal of a united Ireland that is not connected to the Union, and we will continue to do so.

We feel, for a variety of reasons that have not been outlined, that that is the best way forward for all of the people on this island. If any republican has tried to convince the Member that this is considered a settlement and that republicans are in this business to settle in the United Kingdom as part of the current constitutional arrangements, then he has been sold a dummy. I have always been clear, and no one that I have listened to in my party has ever been anything but clear, that we view this as a transitional arrangement that allows us to pursue our ideal of a united Ireland.

Mr Kennedy: Where is the principle of consent in that context? What is the Member's understanding of that? Is he prepared to accept or continue to accept it, or does he now reject it, saying that he is not interested in it or that he does not see it as a priority or as a fixed tenet of the Belfast Agreement?

Mr Murphy: The principle of consent was part of the Good Friday Agreement, and our parties signed up to that. It expressed the view that if 50% plus one — the majority of the people in this part of Ireland — wished to be part of a united Ireland, the British Government would legislate for that. That is part of the agreement, as I understand it and, I am sure, as Mr Kennedy understands it. I expect that, if those circumstances arise and the majority of people in this part of Ireland wish to be part of a united Ireland, that will be facilitated, and that those who proclaim to be democrats, or those who proclaim to have supported the Good Friday Agreement, will accept that. That is what we expect to happen and we have worked steadily towards that, not just in this part of Ireland but across Ireland as a whole.

Mr Kennedy: Even in Mr Murphy's most private moments he must accept that there is no likelihood of that consent being achieved — certainly not for at least a couple of generations. The population figures, the census and all of the indicators show that, as far into the future as we can reasonably see, there will always be a majority in favour of the Union.

Mr Murphy indicated that he has no allegiance to the institutions of state in the Union. How, then, can he be expected and trusted to play a meaningful role in those institutions?

Mr Murphy: If that is Mr Kennedy's attitude, it is something that his own party should have figured out before it signed up to the Good Friday Agreement. The republican position in relation to the Northern Ireland state has always been clear since republicans have been on this island. Our position in relation to the union between Ireland and Britain and, subsequently, to the union between this state and Britain has always been clear — it is our desire to end that union. It is our desire to work within these institutions under the arrangements of the Good Friday Agreement, and not just to work in the interim period for the betterment of all who live in this part of the island, but to work towards the restoration of Irish unity. That has always been our position.

The UUP's time factor, whether that is a reasonable time factor in its view or not, is its opinion. I have devoted all my adult energies to working towards a united Ireland, and I will continue to do so. I anticipate that those endeavours will bear fruit. I am not going to get into a timescale for that, other than to say that the arrangements that the UUP signed up to, and that I signed up to, allowed my party and the SDLP to work these institutions, and also to work in good faith towards our preferred outcome for the future constitutional arrangements of this part of the island as part of a united Ireland.

The Good Friday Agreement allows us to do that. It does not question our fitness to work in one institution while pursuing the ideal of a different constitutional arrangement, nor does it question the bona fides of the SDLP in working in this institution while pursuing a different constitutional arrangement. It recognises, by the very arrangements that were drafted under the Good Friday Agreement, that there is space for everyone to pursue their constitutional preference within these working institutions, and that is what we intend to do.

Mr Kennedy: It is now clear that Sinn Féin is trying to achieve unity by political means. Does that not beg the question, what was the last 40 years all about?

Mr Murphy: We can get into a long, historical debate about the causes and the outcomes of the troubles if we want, but we would be here for quite a time. It can beg the question, what were the 70 years previous to that all about? I can go down that road if the Member wants, but what it has to do with preparation for Government is another question. It might be preparation for a history lesson.

Mr Kennedy: I am happy at least to highlight the question, and that question lingers in the minds of quite a few people — not all of them unionists.

The other aspect is the lack of allegiance to political institutions within the Union. How does the Member react to the clearly expressed view, and the general democratic practice, that members of any Executive — as part of any Government — would give their allegiance and full support not only to the institutions of Government, but also to the civil powers such as the police? Can he reasonably expect to have a position where he can somehow refuse to give political support to those institutions and refuse to give political support to policing, and yet expect Executive positions?

Mr Murphy: Again, those arrangements were agreed under the Good Friday Agreement. There was an oath of allegiance for ministerial office. It was not a requirement that people support policing.

Mr Kennedy: The transfer of powers for policing and justice would change that argument slightly, would it not?

Mr Murphy: Our argument is that if we move to a stage where there will be a transfer of powers on policing and justice, then we will have moved quite a long way to resolving the outstanding issues in relation to policing — as far as we are concerned. There is no requirement currently on any Minister to declare anything other than to work in good faith in the office to which they have been nominated. There is no requirement to swear allegiance to anyone else or any other institution, be that the monarchy, policing or the judicial system.

I may be incorrect in my timescale, but when the Executive was first formed the SDLP had not yet signed up to policing arrangements, because those arrangements were not available.

There was an arrangement that pertained under the last Executive whereby people came in and did the job as best they could under the circumstances. We were clearly in difficult and not normal democratic circumstances. People can refer to other democratic norms, but the fact that we had the Good Friday Agreement, with all of its intricate provisions to secure the support and allegiance of every sector of this community, recognised the fact that we do not operate under the democratic norms of other societies. It recognised that we needed special arrangements so that people could come in and begin to work together. It also allowed for the fact that democratic norms could begin to take hold in such a society, and it may address some of the issues that the Alliance Party has raised in relation to designation and cross-community voting.

Those were all allowed for under the terms of the Good Friday Agreement — that is why Sinn Féin could sign up to it. We felt that it created a space where the difficult issues that we all face and the difficult pasts that we have all endured and experienced could be resolved under the auspices of that agreement.

Mr Kennedy: During this morning's discussion, Mr Murphy outlined his party's position in respect of policing and what would have to take place, and that once Sinn Féin was satisfied, it would have a special Ard-Fheis. What is the sequence there? Does Sinn Féin have all of those sorted? Will it hold the Ard-Fheis, party gathering, IRA convention or whatever, and then enter the Executive, or will Sinn Féin expect to take its position in the Executive before that even happens?

Mr Murphy: I remind Mr Kennedy that we had a position in the Executive a few years ago, before these discussions even took place. Sinn Féin's position on policing is that there are a number of outstanding matters. When we are satisfied in relation to those, the party Ard-Chomhairle — not an IRA army convention, and I shall ignore the provocation — will discuss the issue. Our party leadership has clearly stated its intention to try to ensure that it recommends that a special Ard-Fheis be called to address the policing issue. It will be put to the party membership to endorse the policing arrangements. That is the sequence of events.

In our first answer this morning, we clearly stated that there is no reason why the Executive could not be up and running now or in a few weeks. That does not have to pre-date the operation of an Executive; the Executive can be established next week, if there is the political will. All we have to do is go into the Chamber on Monday and vote to elect a First Minister and a Deputy First Minister.

Mr Kennedy: What are the outstanding issues as regards policing?

Mr Murphy: There are outstanding issues in relation to accountability mechanisms and the role of the Policing Board vis-à-vis the Chief Constable and the Secretary of State. There is more detail to be worked out in relation to all that, which is why I said at the beginning that it would be a useful development of this Committee's work, particularly in relation to the devolution of policing and justice matters, for the people responsible for those issues within their respective parties to meet, as they have done before, to discuss those issues in the proper detail.

Other than that, we can highlight and headline the issues. In many regards, we are merely skimming the surface on particularly complex and detailed issues such as policing, the devolution of policing and justice powers, the powers that might be involved in that, what powers the British Government will try to retain, and the role of MI5 in relation to intelligence-gathering. I could headline a whole range of issues, but I am not in a position to go into any more detail, because it is not my responsibility within the party.

Mr Kennedy: Nevertheless, it would be at least helpful to the rest of us if the issues were headlined. Mr Murphy has produced a list; it may not be exhaustive, but is there anything else that he would like to add to it at this point?

Mr Murphy: I would add nothing other than that the key issues are accountability mechanisms and outstanding issues in relation to Patten. We have published documents on those matters that I can make available to Mr Kennedy if he wishes. The transfer of policing powers is also an issue, not only for Sinn Féin but for other parties; there are issues in relation to intelligence-gathering and the operation of MI5 in this part of Ireland and, quite possibly, the rest of the island as well.

Mr Kennedy: Does restorative justice feature in the list?

Mr Murphy: We have made the case for restorative justice. Again, none of these issues is a barrier to the restoration of the Executive. We have supported community restorative justice projects. Others have their view, but our view is clear: such projects are a very useful way of dealing with certain issues, which may not otherwise be dealt with, at a community level.

Mr Kennedy: Is it not fair to say that those projects may have their uses but that they will have little or no use if there is no cross-referencing or full participation of the lawful civil power — the police?

2.00 pm

Mr Murphy: Well, again there is a recognition among those people who operate restorative justice projects that they do so largely in areas in which there is great difficulty in dealing with the police. And there is an historical experience — and not just an historical experience; there is a current one too — in relation to how policing is carried out and the role and the attitude of the police in those areas, which means that people have little or no confidence in policing or its ability to look after their interests or to deal with them in any impartial fashion.

They recognise the reality of that situation, and they try to do their business accordingly, and I think that has found acceptance among a wide range of groups, both official and unofficial, and at a Government level as well. Other people and other parties have difficulties with that and would like to put preconditions in front of groups about acceptance of policing structures and policing involvement. That would create a difficulty for them working in the communities that they are trying to work in. You have to ask yourself whether that is genuinely trying to help those communities or is trying to make a point about policing those groups that are trying to deal with issues in their communities.

Mr Kennedy: Do you ever envisage Sinn Féin providing leadership in those communities and, once policing issues are resolved, taking its place on the Policing Board and giving support to policing institutions? Would you actively encourage groups like that to co-operate with the PSNI?

Mr Murphy: I envisage a situation in which we give active leadership in relation to positive developments in policing. I also envisage that it is going to be a very difficult exercise for us, given the community's experience of historical, as I say, and current, policing practice. I do certainly envisage us giving positive leadership in relation to policing developments.

Mr Kennedy: Can I just move, probably lastly at this point, to the issue of criminality, which is of serious concern throughout the community. You and I are both south Armagh men, and first of all we are aware of the culture of that particular area, which we have the honour to represent and about which we will not make disparaging remarks. You are also aware of the practicalities, on a day-to-day basis of the amount of illegal activity, the black economy and all that. It is something that greatly concerns, in particular, the population in the rest of Northern Ireland. You would accept that presumably.

Mr Murphy: I would accept that there is certainly an impression which is popular and, I suppose, kind of romantic in a way that this is particularly prevalent in the border areas and south Armagh in particular. I listened to an interesting discussion on the radio as I was coming here yesterday. People were talking about the black market and the sale of illegal cigarettes and DVDs around various areas of Belfast and in other markets within a 20-mile radius of Belfast. But the media perception is always zeroed in on south Armagh, and that is quite often aided and abetted by political commentary on the area. If the proper crime statistics were looked at for south Armagh, you would find that there is no more criminality there than in any other rural area and probably much less than in an awful lot of the urban areas across the North and, indeed, across the island.

It may be a focus and a particular source of attention, and I do not doubt that people have grown up there as they have in other nationalist areas and other areas right across the North with a particular attitude to authority, which will take a substantial degree of shifting, but the people whom I represent in my area and the people you know in our area are not a lawless people. They are not bandits; they are not people who thrive on criminality.

As a matter of fact, they are the people who most want to see the end of the border, which is supposed to be the source of all economic advantage in that area. The people who most want to see the end to the border are the people who live in the south Armagh area and, generally, in the border areas. So, the myth is somehow sustained; sometimes it is a political argument, sometimes a romantic view or an exciting view, or something that excites some column inches in papers.

That is not the reality of the place that I know, where I was brought up and live. The people there want a peaceful and lawful future. They recognise that there are difficulties with the type of law that we have at the moment. I have heard no differences of opinion about the outstanding issues of policing at meetings in south Armagh, Derry, west Tyrone, or west Belfast. I hear about the same issues and the same desire to get those issues right.

Mr Kennedy: I am not sure that I share the view that the removal of the border would meet with widespread acceptance by a great many people. I accept that some of the black economy is operated on a cross-community basis, but I see no great desire for that to end from many people. Aside from that, there is the more serious point that criminality reaches right into the republican movement. There is the matter of its funds and how it achieves its funding, of what it does to extort money through the use of illegal fuel, cigarettes, and so on. All of that has been directly traced back to individuals and groups who are either known republicans or republican activists in some shape or form.

Sinn Féin may dispute that, but it is a very real issue of concern to a great many people, particularly those from a unionist background. How will Sinn Féin deal with that issue?

Mr Murphy: Again, that is one of those issues that you do what is reasonably possible to address, if it is a matter of concern. There may well come a stage where that is an issue that is sought as a blockage to progress, rather than an issue of genuine concern. Republicans have to go as far as they possibly can to address any concerns that emanate from any other section, not just the unionist community.

We also have a responsibility to ourselves and to the people whom we represent to try to get the institutions working again, and to try to judge in that attempt whether issues are a genuine blockage or a reason for refusal to engage.

I make the same response that I made to Alan McFarland this morning, when he asked a similar question: if there is evidence — the member says that there is a huge amount of evidence — let that be produced and let people go before the courts. It is not enough to say that something is a fact because everybody knows that it is a fact. I accept Danny Kennedy's point that some people around the border may not want it to go, but I was referring to the people whom he may consider to be lawless or — as unionists sometimes say — not right-thinking people. Right-thinking people are always those who agree with us. The very people that Mr Kennedy and unionism generally would demonise as a community engaged in widespread illegal activity are those who most want rid of the border — that general community. If there are accusations in relation to those matters, let the evidence be gathered and brought forward.

In relation to Sinn Féin, I reiterate the point that our accounts and the way that we raise and spend our money are open to scrutiny and have been well scrutinised. The same cannot perhaps be said for all political parties, but our accounts are open to scrutiny.

Mr McNarry: There was a moment when I thought that Conor was approaching constitutional republicanism in his responses to Danny. On that point, can Mr Murphy subscribe to a form of constitutional republicanism?

Mr Murphy: It depends what is meant by that. If it is constitutional republicanism as espoused by Fianna Fáil, I do not see Sinn Féin or myself as being in the same mould. However, I am not that interested in labels. Coming into this institution and the institutions of the Good Friday Agreement has involved a huge amount of compromise for Irish republicans. Sometimes that is not recognised.

The DUP made the point yesterday, and perhaps today, about a one-way system of concessions. The process has involved a huge amount of compromise for Irish republicans.

I never envisaged the day when I would sit in this Building; I did not see this Building until the day before the Good Friday Agreement was signed; I had never even been in this part of Belfast. We never had any inkling of being involved in these institutions, and coming into them under the present arrangements has involved substantial compromise on our behalf. That has impacted on the constituency that supports us. We have compromised, but we retain our principles and our primary goal of a united Ireland. We have mapped out a peaceful way of achieving that, and we intend to pursue it with all our vigour.

Mr McNarry: I appreciate your answer. Unionists understand constitutional nationalism now, and we respect and appreciate how hard a party such as the SDLP has worked. You prefer to be called republicans, but sometimes you want to be called nationalists as well. Constitutional nationalism has assimilated itself into institutions such as these and it is respected for that. However, I was wondering whether a form of constitutional republicanism is developing. I accept what you said.

If Sinn Féin were back in Government would it foresee a conflict of interest between the North/South aspect and the east-west axis due to possible policy differences between the Government of the United Kingdom and the Government of the Irish Republic?

Mr Murphy: Such a conflict might well arise. Yesterday, on my way home from here, I listened to an interview with the Rev Paisley on agricultural matters. The interview touched on the conflict that almost exists between British Government policy on agricultural matters, as it impacts on the North, as opposed to Irish Government policy on such matters. The Rev Paisley was asked whether he was envious of the Irish Government's much more proactive policy on agricultural matters. He said that he was frustrated, as many in the agricultural community are, with the British Government's approach to agriculture, which may suit Britain but does not suit the North.

In all issues, whether North/South or east-west, the solution may not be the British one. The British Government's approach will, inevitably, be in their own interest. They will act in the interests of the people in Britain who vote for them. At times, that is in conflict with the interests of this part of Ireland. However, experience has shown us that reasonable people can work the North/South or east-west arrangements in a mature fashion and do their best in the interests of the people whom they represent.

The Minister of Agriculture in the last Assembly had to deal with an outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease, which could have proved a conflict of interest between Britain and this part of the United Kingdom. She took a decision that was in the interests of the people of this part of the island. No one attacked her for doing that; they recognised that she had taken the sensible decision. Martin McGuinness and Bairbre de Brún, in carrying out their ministerial portfolios, acted in the interests of those whom they represented; they had no particular axe to grind in relation to North/South or east-west arrangements.

Mr McNarry: I heard you say that type of thing yesterday. I want to get back to the question of allegiance, on which unionists require assurances. There are doubts, because of your past performance in the House, about where your allegiance lies on a matter of conflict — I understand that that question applies to all parties, but we are dealing with Sinn Féin. Does your allegiance lie with the Northern Ireland Executive inside the United Kingdom or with the Irish Republic?

2.15 pm

Mr Murphy: You are getting into a hypothetical situation. Unless the United Kingdom declares war on the Irish Republic I would imagine that the question of allegiance is not one that might tax people. What I am saying is that, very clearly, people work to the best of their abilities within those arrangements. People swear a pledge of office, and we have argued that items such as the ministerial code should be put into legislation so that people are obliged to act under a description of their responsibilities to the office to which they have been appointed, after election into the Assembly.

Given past experience of how our Ministers operated, and indeed how all of the Ministers operated, I do not anticipate that that sort of conflict of interest would arise.

Mr McNarry: There has to be some leeway on hypotheticals, you will appreciate, because you will not answer any specific questions about criminality, decommissioning etc. I am trying to take a route around that as to the answers that have come to pass, because we are talking about preparing for Government here.

On the question of "jointery", do you accept that there is an operational and a status difference between the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister acting in office, and that "jointery", which was a common word used in the past, really was a figment of the imagination of the civil servants who serviced those offices?

Mr Murphy: No. Can I first just say for the record, given that we are on the record, that I do not accept that I have not answered the previous questions.

Mr McNarry: You have not answered them satisfactorily.

Mr Murphy: Well, that depends on your view of what is satisfactory. It is almost like Eric Morecambe saying: "I am playing all the right notes, but not necessarily in the right order." It depends how you like to phrase things.

Mr McNarry: I am surprised you remember Eric Morecambe, but anyway —

Mr Murphy: It shows that I am older than I look. In relation to "jointery", I do not accept that there is a difference in status between the First and Deputy First Ministers. The Good Friday Agreement was very clear that it is a joint office. Perhaps the operation of it between the previous incumbents might have made it seem to be somehow a separate office, but it is in fact a joint office under the terms of the Good Friday Agreement and I would not accept that it is anything less than that. There is not a First Minister and a second Minister; there is a First and a Deputy First Minister. I think there was a recognition of the joint nature of that office.

Mr McNarry: I would be interested to have you enlarge on that for me, but not today. I have had first-hand experience of working in the Office of the First Minister and obviously have a clear insight into how it operated. It would be interesting if you could perhaps expand on that at a later date in a short paper.

Conor, you talked of a peace dividend — something compacted into a financial package. Do you intend that Her Majesty's Government and Dublin would both contribute to that package, and if so, in what proportion would you envisage Dublin and London, shall we say, contributing? How would you see a package distributed, if you were making a bid for it? Obviously this is something that would need to be done before an Executive is formed. Would it be confined to Northern Ireland Departments, in that it would be a package coming into Government here, or would it have a broader usage?

Mr Murphy: I would envisage both Governments making a contribution; the proportions are obviously going to be a matter for negotiation between the Governments.

Mr McNarry: Would that be a matter for negotiation between those parties, having entered into an agreement to form an Executive, with the Government separately, or jointly?

Mr Murphy: This is why we advanced the notion at last Friday's meeting that a very useful and clear signal of intent in this regard would have been for party leaders to meet Gordon Brown jointly when he was here on Monday. That would have set a marker that all parties here agreed that there should be some form of financial package to help underpin the restoration of these institutions. We believe that the Irish Government should contribute to that.

The best case scenario, as far as we are concerned, is that the parties here would come together, involving the relevant spokespersons and others, to work out the details of an arguable and productive financial package, bring that to both Governments and make a case for it. If that were done in that fashion, we would have a very strong case to make. Whether the money is spent entirely within the Departments or some of it is spent outside on direct intervention in various projects is a matter for negotiation among the parties.

We have our views on that. We have written papers that we can present if we get into further discussion. It falls into line with our argument about this Committee. One of the key areas of work that all the parties have identified relates to a financial package, or peace dividend, or economic regeneration. The very obvious and logical course of events would be for the Committee to send people off to work on that.

Martin McGuinness suggested that it might take days; others rubbished that idea. I do not think that it would take a long time for people to come back with ideas. Prior to restoration — and to underpin restoration — a compelling case could be made to both Governments, and if it were done on that basis, it would be warmly received. If the parties decide on that, the outcome could be reported to the Committee and could be endorsed by the whole Assembly in a debate. Unanimity among the parties would make a powerful case for a financial package to underpin restoration.

Mr McNarry: I do not want to go back to yesterday's business, where agreement and consensus was not attainable. I understand that the same result happened in the Business Committee. Is the Member saying that he would be in a position to identify a sum of money, which would focus minds on a financial package, and that he would be prepared to work with others to identify what the contribution would be from the Republic of Ireland and from London?

Mr Murphy: Yes, that is what we are saying.

Mr McNarry: Does the Member have a sum in mind?

Mr Murphy: From the notes that I have been given, some people have suggested a sum of £10 billion.

Mr McNarry: What?

Mr Murphy: The suggestion is £10 billion, in a peace-building strategy over 10 years. That is our view. What we have proposed in relation to the work of the Committee has been identified as an area of interest to everyone. I am reading from a note written by Mitchel McLaughlin, who deals with these matters in our party. We feel that people should go away, bring views together and produce a report agreeing the way forward for all the parties. The Committee could endorse that and it could be debated in the Assembly.

It would be a powerful signal, not just in trying to secure the financial package, but for the confidences that people are talking about — confidence for a quiet summer, and confidence that the politicians in this Building are getting their acts together and starting to address issues seriously. That is why we have argued that, as it is an issue that has been identified by all the parties on the Committee, it is an issue that we could take forward.

Mr McNarry: I accept what the Member says, but I am sure that he would appreciate that there would be absolutely no point in an Assembly debating £10 billion or any billions until such times as the obstacles to progress presented by his party are overcome, and that the issue was debated on the basis that a Government would be formed. In preparation for that — and I do not want to go back to yesterday — it seems to me to be bad practice that the view of the Assembly cannot be transmitted because the Member's party has stood in the way of that progress. I wish the Member would rethink that.

Mr Murphy: I would suggest that a degree of work needs to be done on this. The Assembly stands up and gives at least five different views at the moment, without taking the independents into account. There may even be a variety of views within parties about what is needed and where it needs to be spent. That is a good argument for people getting together to work on the issue and present a case. It would also present a clear signal that we were getting down to the proper work of engagement.

I accept the fact that Mr McNarry says that there are obstacles to devolution to be overcome, and they have been presented to us. It is a chicken-and-egg situation; if we do not start to work on some of those issues, we will not be in a position to go back into a restored Executive.

At the first meeting of this Committee, and at practically every subsequent meeting, we have asked the DUP, in particular, to give us a clear indication that it is working towards the 24 November deadline to resolve these issues. If we propose to get down to the serious business of working out a financial package, that is not simply an exercise. In Sinn Féin's view, if we were to go to the Assembly now to debate such a matter, without an indication of a serious intent to resolve these issues, we would not be sending a clear signal about the restoration of the institutions.

Mr McNarry: I will end my remarks now, rather than take up other people's time.

The Assembly has had its debate. The Assembly asked the Business Committee to form a Committee to deal with this issue. Sinn Féin has blocked that. That is where we are stuck. Although Mr Murphy and I have had an extremely interesting and beneficial discussion, it just goes round in circles. This matter might just as well go out the window because no one will deal with it. Will Sinn Féin reassess that issue, and reflect on the Business Committee dealing with the matter, so that we can progress to the stage that Mr Murphy is talking about where the situation is clearer?

Mr Murphy: For the record, I want to say that the view that this work is best carried forward by a group attached to this Committee was shared by the SDLP at the Assembly Business Committee meeting today. It is a legitimate and logical view that, if people are serious about this work — not about grandstanding in debates in the Assembly, not about appearing to members of the business community that we are getting down to issues that concern them — we need a clear indication, from the preparation-for-Government work, that this issue will be carried forward in a serious fashion.

Mr McNarry: I am grateful for that information. I did not know that the SDLP spoke with one voice on this Committee and with another voice on another Committee.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): John Dallat has been waiting a long time to ask a question.

Mr Dallat: This question is set in an all-Ireland context. Recently, senior republicans participated in the Easter Rising commemoration in Dublin. Does that mean that the strained and unfortunate relationship in the past between the Irish Army and the guards has now softened and that there is only one Óglaigh na hÉireann now?

Mr Murphy: We were invited to participate in those commemorations in Dublin at Easter. We have a working relationship with the guards in the various neighbourhoods that Sinn Féin represents across this island; we have always had that relationship.

I am not sure about the seriousness of the question. We have outlined very clearly what we are trying to do about the policing issue. We are trying to advance that.

We have indicated that we intend to take our responsibilities seriously. We intend to provide leadership on that issue. That is how we will advance.

Mr Dallat: The question is serious and, I hope, positive. I have spent a good part of my working life on both sides of the border and am very aware of the difficulties. I hope that that softening of relationships will spill over into the North and will solve the problems with the PSNI.

My second question relates to partnership. The Sinn Féin document puts great emphasis on partnership. Does Conor accept that, in the next few weeks or months, it is important that the principle and concept of partnership is retained, that we avoid the temptation of Governments entering into side deals, back-room deals or deals from which people are excluded, and that we push forward the concept of partnership, as defined in the Good Friday Agreement, in a collective way, so that the entire community can take ownership of whatever agreement is reached?

Mr Murphy: I restate for the record that in every meeting with the Government on any issue that we have discussed with them, particularly in the lead-up to December 2004, we have argued that all parties should be involved. We have never practised or argued for an exclusive negotiating process. John Dallat talked about the partnership arrangements that came out of the Good Friday Agreement, and I remind him that when there were negotiations to establish the number of Departments and the range and remit of the all-Ireland bodies, Sinn Féin waited patiently for involvement in those. We were informed only by seeing it on the television or by hearing it on the radio in this Building that the negotiations had concluded.

Therefore we are all for — and always have been for — inclusive arrangements and negotiations. We are probably unique in this gathering by being a party that does not have a history of practising exclusion by treating other political parties differently. We will continue to advocate a partnership approach to any of the matters that we are trying to address in relation to the restoration of Government.

Mr Dallat: I welcome that, and it is because of past difficulties that we want to avoid future problems.

Finally, day and daily there are disturbing news items about the re-emergence of paramilitary groups on both sides. I was interested in the positive approach towards policing and justice that we heard today. Does the potential for a new crop of paramilitary groups make it imperative that we reach agreement on policing and justice as quickly as possible so that the whole community can avoid another Omagh or some other atrocity?

Mr Murphy: Our experience of policing — and bad policing — over generations is the primary driving force in trying to resolve that issue. The imperative that drives us on is that our community needs a proper, accountable and professional police service, and we have always wanted and still want that.

In relation to dissident republicans or loyalist groups, we do our best to encourage people to support the process in which we have engaged so far as these institutions, the Good Friday Agreement and the peace process are concerned. To a fair degree, we have been successful in keeping people on board with regard to that process. We are not responsible for other organisations, and the best way of dealing with any of those groups is to prove that the political system that was set up under the Good Friday Agreement is working and that the institutions that we have created in this Building and in the North/South bodies can and do work. Any of the issues that people feel may concern them can be resolved through dialogue in rooms such as this.

Dr Farren: A great deal has been said, particularly this morning when we began questioning Sinn Féin, about confidence building and the measures that need to be taken to do that. In the light of a lot of what has been said, will Conor and his colleagues not at least recognise that, fundamentally, suspension was not a function of the legislation that provided for it or, indeed, the result of the threat of parties to withdraw from the Executive without cause? Will they recognise that it was about the lack of confidence that had arisen due to the lack of progress with respect to the question of the ending of paramilitarism and the decommissioning of paramilitary weapons, particularly in the timescale that had initially been indicated in the Good Friday Agreement? It was only several years after that that the IICD was able to report that decommissioning had been completed to its satisfaction.

Since time does not stand still and parties, observing the lack of progress, cannot be expected to suspend their judgement and their reaction to that lack of progress, it is not surprising that the lack of confidence that precipitated suspension in the first place magnified over time, particularly as other events diminished confidence. Paramilitary involvement in criminality, and more direct paramilitary activity, such as surveillance, the apprehension and trial of people involved in various forms of paramilitary activity — not least attempts to procure arms — and what happened in the South, as well as in the North, all reduced confidence.

That underscores the point that I made at the very beginning: we must almost overreach ourselves in trying to make good the confidence deficit. One concrete way that Conor and his colleagues might do that is by adopting a qualified approach to involvement in the Assembly. The parties are under absolutely no obligation to attend any or all the debates in the Assembly. If a party were to judge that a motion on the Order Paper was unlikely to contribute to preparation for Government or to restoration, it would decide not to participate. However, attending debates could be seen as a gesture or move to build confidence.

I accept all the objections that can be made to participating in Assembly debates: people would use them to express, stridently and otherwise, their grievances, their accusations and lack of confidence and the ill will that exists towards others. We had a great deal of experience of that in the last Assembly; indeed, we have seen evidence of it here over the past fortnight.

Nevertheless, a qualified participation could help in our immediate circumstances to bring the work of the Assembly and of this Committee together. Although the SDLP would prefer any subcommittees to deal with the issues to be the children of this Committee, yesterday I tried to see whether we could find a way through the two seemingly irreconcilable positions. If we are serious about restoration, we must perhaps overreach ourselves, and that goes for those on all sides of this table, not just one side.

I put it to Conor and his colleagues again that they might begin to address issues in a practical way, at least to reduce the confidence deficit.

Mr Murphy: As I said earlier, confidence measures go both ways. Republicans have always been prepared to examine and consider action that we could take to enhance confidence.

We will have to agree to differ on whether suspension was an inevitable outcome or whether it encouraged people to adopt the stances that they took. I recall the former Deputy First Minister, Séamus Mallon, resigning his position and expressing frustration at the lack of movement among unionists in getting the institutions fully functioning. Confidence and frustration and the approaches to the procedures of this institution were all a feature of the last Assembly.

We will have to agree to differ on the current debates. The Hain Assembly is not what we wanted, and I am sure that it is not what the SDLP wanted. It approaches the type of Assembly that the DUP is on record as saying that it wanted — a shadow Assembly in which it could debate issues without any responsibility for taking decisions. We suspended our scepticism about what may be going on and about people's serious intent as regards getting the institutions functioning again. The primary focus of the Hain Assembly, as described by the Governments, is to get the institutions restored by 24 November 2006. We suspended our scepticism and came in here to try to do business with the DUP and with the other political parties. We went to what we considered the only purposeful Assembly business in the Chamber — the attempt to elect the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. That was not successful, but not by our doing.

We have engaged in this Committee and we have asked the DUP to engage. We have asked the DUP time and time again to show some serious intent that it wants to do business in this Committee. It does not want subcommittees formed; it simply wants to identify the issues that it considers obstacles to devolution. Having done that, it considers the Committee's work to be done. We see this Committee's work as preparation for Government, and that is why we want not only to identify issues that are important for preparation for Government, but to get down to some serious work on them. That would be a clear signal from the Democratic Unionist Party that it is intent on getting back into Government before the 24 November deadline and that it wants to work with the rest of us in addressing issues that are of concern to us all. As yet, we have not seen that.

We have had no direct engagement with the DUP in this Committee; we engage with its Chairman, but that is under a different guise. We have had no indication, despite repeated requests, that there is an intent to get down to business or to get proper engagement going in order to get the institutions up and functioning again by 24 November. We made it very clear that, although others expect the real business of this institution to happen in the autumn, we expect to see signs before the summer that this institution is getting down to business. We will judge over the summer — and there was a sceptical approach by many republicans — our experience here to date.

Therefore I will have to agree to disagree with Seán in relation to the impact that Sinn Féin's turning up at a plenary debate may have. We have tried in earnest in this Committee and in the Business Committee to work in good faith with other parties, yet we have seen no sign that others are prepared to debate anything other than the positions that they stated publicly on coming into this institution: shadow Assembly arrangements, in which we could play at politics without having any responsibility for engaging in them in any serious fashion.

Dr Farren: I do not have any lengthy comment to make on that. When faced with a stand-off, we should try to find ways round it rather than leave it as a trap for us; we seem to be very good at that. I hope that we can move forward.

I indicated the SDLP's preference for, and understanding of, what should happen with this Committee, but we are faced with a stand-off, and I certainly do not advocate a compromise towards what the DUP has been proposing. We must try to find a way around it, so that we can really get into what Mr Murphy emphasised as most important, which is engagement and not another series of stand-offs. However, each party judges whether it can move.

2.45 pm

Mr Murphy: Just for the record, I remind Seán Farren that Sinn Féin has made a range of proposals since it first came to this Committee. Martin McGuinness described some of those as compromise proposals, many of which have been rejected. Sinn Féin has engaged; it has not come to this Committee with a position to defend to the last, but it has genuinely tried to seek ways of moving forward on issues that have blocked this Committee since the minute and hour that we walked into this room. We have sought ways to try to move business forward, but that has been against the backdrop of no firm or clear indication from the DUP that it wants to get down to business with the rest of us.

Ms Ritchie: I want to ask Conor Murphy and his colleagues for an explanation in order to tease out some points in the Sinn Féin document. Point 5 states that:

"The work of this Committee is to carry out the necessary preparatory work for government, not to do the work of a future Executive."

Point 6 refers to "a number of key issues", one of which is "priorities for Government".

My perhaps limited understanding, not having been here under the previous mandate, is that the Executive dealt with issues of Government and matters forthcoming from Ministers. Perhaps Conor Murphy could further explain the preparatory work for Government and priorities for Government, if that is not to be the future work of an Executive. People in the community want the institutions up and running and an end to stand-offs, and they want us to try to achieve that for which we were elected.

Mr Murphy: I concur with Ms Ritchie's view. People do want that, and that view is not confined to the nationalist community, which our parties broadly represent. I answered a similar question from Naomi Long this morning on the difference between a Programme for Government and priorities for Government. A Programme for Government is largely worked out by the parties and the Executive, with close working co-operation with senior civil servants and officials from the various Departments on current programmes, the available budgets and what can be done under a Programme for Government.

I suggested that this Committee, in preparing for Government, could usefully identify a number of themes that may be priorities for the Government, which would inform the work of a Programme for Government in the Executive. I gave a fuller explanation this morning, but that is essentially the difference. The parties could do some useful preparatory work that would lead to a Programme for Government discussion in the Executive.

Ms Ritchie: Mr Deputy Speaker, I thank you for your indulgence. I have a supplementary question for Conor Murphy. What does Sinn Féin perceive to be those priorities for Government? I apologise if he has already answered a similar question.

Mr Murphy: We have not detailed what Sinn Féin believes to be the specific priorities for Government. Sinn Féin has its own priorities such as poverty, targeting social need, infrastructure and investment. Those are priorities for us all in trying to get the economy working in the interests of everyone who inhabits this part of the island, and in the all-Ireland working arrangements with the rest of the island.

It would be useful for the parties to try to agree a number of common themes that would inform the necessary work of crafting and creating a Programme for Government. That would involve a much more detailed look at available budgetary allocations, current priorities, the priorities not met by the last Executive and whether those needed revisited, or whether things had moved on substantially and new priorities should be addressed.

The Alliance Party expressed a view that a party that would not be in the Executive may not want to participate in that type of discussion because it may want to keep its independence and its ability to be in opposition, and that is fair enough. However, the four parties who make up the Executive could agree on some themes that could govern the Programme for Government discussions.

Ms Ritchie: Does Conor agree that, as part of trying to eliminate poverty and targeting social need, there should be support for ending criminality? I live close to the family who were imprisoned as a result of the Northern Bank robbery, and I know the terror and trauma that they have suffered. That family and the community that I represent want an end to that and want all parties to subscribe to an end to that.

Mr Murphy: I will repeat my response to a question that specifically focused on south Armagh. The people we represent want a proper policing service. They are lawful people who want to live under normal peaceful circumstances with a proper democratically accountable professional policing service, and that is what we have been working towards for some time.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I have a series of questions, but I will preface them with these comments. It is difficult to take seriously the submission that has been made, given that it can only be described as “Sinn Féin lite” — light in substance but not generating light of the other kind — when people have been probing for most of the day to try to get answers. We have certainly had a lot of flannel, but we have not had many answers.

Yesterday, there were over four and a half hours of interrogation of the Democratic Unionist Party’s position. During that time, a number of obstacles were probed and identified, and I would have assumed that Sinn Féin’s submission today would have at least tried to address some of those obstacles. However, Sinn Féin appears only to be able to dismiss those obstacles.

I want to ask some questions that, hopefully, will start to address the issue of confidence on matters that unionists believe are essential. I am setting this test for Sinn Féin that if it says it is essential for parties to engage with this Committee, I assume that means that it is essential for parties to answer questions. Although answering questions is a voluntary process, the failure to answer questions will be an indication, in the DUP’s view, of significant bad faith. We will examine that test and decide for ourselves whether Sinn Féin is just talking the talk but not actually walking the walk.

Throughout questions today, Sinn Féin has given a standard answer on the issue of obstacles. In response to the question that I think Seán Farren asked about the legitimacy of the issues that have been raised, Sinn Féin appears to accept that it is OK for issues to be raised. Does Sinn Féin accept the legitimacy of the obstacles that the DUP has identified in its paper?

Mr Murphy: I will preface my remarks by saying that my party members and I have endeavoured to answer fully any questions that were put to us. Ian Paisley Jnr’s approach to all of this is to seek to find reasons to further his viewpoint, which is that his party should not do business with Sinn Féin. That has been his consistent position. No matter what answer I give to Ian Paisley Jnr on any of these issues, he will seek to use those answers to reinforce his previously held viewpoint that his party should not be doing business with Sinn Féin. The only reasons that guide the DUP’s participation in this Committee are to refuse to engage on a meaningful basis, to take as much offence as possible and to use its experience on this Committee to further reinforce its position that it should not be doing business with Sinn Féin.

I will endeavour to give as honest an answer as I can, but I do so in a strong belief that any answers that Michelle Gildernew or John O’Dowd give to Ian Paisley Jnr or to the DUP delegation will be interpreted and used to reinforce its position, which is that it should not be doing business with Sinn Féin. I agree that the DUP has legitimate concerns in relation to what it considers to be difficulties in entering into power sharing arrangements with Sinn Féin and the other political parties. I agree that republicans and members of Sinn Féin should work with the DUP to address its issues of concern.

In my own view, there are certain issues that the DUP does not wish to be convinced of, and it has a world view that under no circumstances should the DUP do business with Sinn Féin. However, I will suspend that judgement and argue my party's approach, which is that we should work with the DUP to try to address issues of concern.

I happen to think that some of the issues that the DUP considers to be of concern have already been addressed through the Good Friday Agreement and the arrangements of the IICD. Mr Paisley Jnr happens to think that they have not been addressed, and there is a difficulty in resolving that. However, I am prepared to sit down in any room with Mr Paisley Jnr, and with members of his party, to discuss all those issues. I am prepared to discuss them here.

I would like to see a proper engagement with Mr Paisley Jnr, but to date I have not seen that engagement. I am not in here setting tests or trying to be provocative to Mr Paisley Jnr or members of his delegation. I am merely stating my experience to date. The Member's position — stated publicly and privately in this room — appears to be that he wishes not to find any elucidation of any of these issues and not to be convinced in relation to his position on them, but rather wishes to seize whatever answers we give him, and, in many cases to date, misrepresent those answers, to further reinforce his own position, which is that he should not be doing business with Sinn Féin.

If the Member has genuine concerns, and I accept that he may have, then let us sit down and talk about them, not by setting tests or putting it up to each other, but by making a serious attempt to address those concerns.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Mr Deputy Speaker, this is not about me. This is not about my view, my world view or anything else. This is about Sinn Féin answering questions and addressing issues. Our paper put forward numerous issues, including paramilitarism and decommissioning, on which Sinn Féin's paper did not comment. Does Sinn Féin now accept that they are not legitimate concerns, but legitimate obstacles, and that those obstacles have to be addressed principally by Sinn Féin?

I just want a clear answer that these are legitimate obstacles for us to consider.

Mr Murphy: Could Ian clarify whether they are obstacles to the restoration of devolution or obstacles, in his party's view, to political progress?

Mr Paisley Jnr: I am not here to answer questions. There was enough questioning of the DUP yesterday, and that needs to be made very clear; we are here to scope these issues. I will put the question again, but it concerns me, Deputy Speaker, that we cannot get a straight answer to a very straight question. Does Sinn Féin accept the legitimacy of the obstacles identified by the Democratic Unionist Party?

Mr Murphy: I appreciate that Ian has avoided any direct engagement with us to date. That may well be his continued position, and that is regrettable.

I ask the question because these could well be obstacles to the DUP's ability to do business with anyone. Do I consider the issues outlined in the DUP's paper to be obstacles to the restoration of devolution? No, is the straight answer. Sinn Féin has said that there is no reason why the institutions cannot be reinstated tomorrow. There was no reason why, when Mr Paisley's father gleefully rejected Gerry Adams's proposal in the Chamber, we could not have had a First Minister and a Deputy First Minister elected and the institutions restored. In our view, the issues that the Member has outlined are not obstacles to the restoration of devolution. They may well be obstacles to the DUP's ability to do business on a genuine basis with our party, but they are obstacles that can be worked through with a genuine engagement between our parties and the other political parties.

3.00 pm

Mr Paisley Jnr: It is important that the record shows that Sinn Féin does not believe that they are legitimate obstacles. That calls into question the credibility of the process in which we are engaged. Certainly it has exposed Sinn Féin's position on that point. If it does not accept the legitimacy of the obstacles that not just my party, but any party, feels should be addressed, it is not just dismissing the party, it is dismissing the credibility of this Committee to scope what it feels are legitimate obstacles.

It requires a degree of arrogance and a certain mindset for one party to determine what is or is not an obstacle for all parties. If a party brings issues to the table, they are obstacles and must be scoped and addressed.

I turn to issues that were raised earlier, but which are important in relation to decommissioning. There have already been some questions about it, but it is important to put on the record what the IMC said in its February report:

"We have ... received reports that not all PIRA's weapons and ammunition were handed over for decommissioning in September."

These reports are not able to indicate precisely what is the nature or volume of any remaining weapons but suggest two things: first, that there is a range of different kinds of weapons and ammunition; second, that the material goes beyond what might possibly have been expected to have missed decommissioning, such as a limited number of handguns kept for personal protection or some items the whereabouts of which were no longer known."

Setting aside the source of the information — because we have heard today that Sinn Féin totally dismisses the IMC — I want to know from Sinn Féin if it believes it would be possible for that scenario to be correct.

Mr Murphy: No, I do not believe that it would be possible. Mr Paisley Jnr quoted from that report, but he stopped short. The IMC did not find that to be so; as I remember, the report went on to say:

"If this was to be the case".

The IMC did not come down on whether the suggestions from unnamed sources were accurate.

When the IRA said that it had dealt with the issue, and the IICD was satisfied, all of us — apart from the DUP, and I accept that — agreed and were satisfied that the issue had been dealt with. I am satisfied that the issue was dealt with.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I say again that we have a situation in which Sinn Féin does not accept the IMC. Perhaps it accepts what the 'Sligo Champion' said two weeks ago:

"Up to 10,000 rounds of high velocity ammunition have been uncovered by Gardai at an arms dump in a wooded area near Clifffoney ...The ammunition, which was found in a pipe that was sealed at both ends, would have been there for some time and would have belonged to the IRA according to sources."

Again, I put it to Sinn Féin: does it believe that this material could have belonged to the IRA? If not, who does Sinn Féin think owned it?

Mr Murphy: I am not sure; I do not read the 'Sligo Champion'. I am glad to see that you put such strength in its reports. I do not know to whom the material belonged; I repeat that the IRA has stated that its material has been dealt with. The IICD and both Governments are satisfied with that, and Sinn Féin is satisfied that that is the case.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Again, if the guards are dismissed as a source — and it was not the RUC whispering in anyone's ear, but the guards who indicated that this was IRA material — I want to know whether Sinn Féin expects unionists also to dismiss the word of the guards.

Mr Murphy: The guards believe and state that that is the case. That is their view. The guards also believe that unionists were involved in the Dublin/Monaghan bombings, and that the security services here, to which you give such allegiance, were up to their necks in shooting, killing and bombing people all around the border area and as far down as Dublin. Do you believe the guards when they make that assertion, or do you selectively quote from the guards to reinforce your own position — as you selectively quote from us in this Committee to reinforce your own position?

The guards may well believe that, and that is a matter for them. I am satisfied that the process of dealing with arms — as described under the Good Friday Agreement — has been dealt with to the satisfaction of the IICD, the Governments and ourselves. That remains our position.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Mr Deputy Speaker, once again for the record, this is not about me. It is not about the Democratic Unionist Party. It is about whether Sinn Féin, to use its much-trotted-out phrase, is serious about engagement, and in its terms I assume that engagement means answers, not flannel.

It is not about me. Again, I pose the question: should unionists believe the guards on this issue?

Mr Murphy: That is for unionists. I cannot answer for unionists. Unionists can weigh up everything that they see in front of them and make their own judgements. They can weigh up the attitude of the republican movement over the past 10 years, they can weigh up the historic events of last August, and they can make their own judgements. Undoubtedly Ian Paisley Jnr will tell unionists that which he thinks will excite them most and cause the most negative reaction within unionism. Not just the Member personally, although he has quite a strong role to play in all of that, but his party generally will tell unionists that which it thinks will excite them most to be against co-operating in a meaningful institution with the rest of us.

Unionists may make up their own minds. All we can do is present our case and hope that wiser counsel prevails. However, given our experience in dealing with the DUP in this institution to date, that may be a forlorn hope. Nonetheless, we will continue to turn up to these Committee meetings and try to make them work.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Mr Deputy Speaker, I accept that unionists can make up their own minds. Given that, how would Sinn Féin advise republicans to make up their minds? Should they believe the guards on this issue?

Mr Murphy: Republicans will believe the republican movement. It is not the first time that the guards have got it wrong. That is their assessment. It may be an honest assessment or it may not be, but republicans believe, in my view — as many people outside the republican movement believe — that the issue of weapons has been dealt with to the satisfaction of anybody who wants to be reasonably satisfied under the terms of the Good Friday Agreement.

If there are others who do not wish to be satisfied, I have no doubt — as I have stated here several times today — that they will find reasons, or others will provide them with reasons not to be satisfied, and to reinforce their own world view or their party's world view of how things are and how they should progress or not progress. If that is the case, so be it. We will endeavour to engage in good faith. Anybody who supported or endorsed the Good Friday Agreement and the arrangements for dealing with the issue of weapons — and I note we are only talking about IRA weapons and not Ulster Resistance, UVF or UDA weapons — must be satisfied that not only were those conditions met, but additional witnesses were allowed to give additional confidence that those conditions were met.

Mr O'Dowd: In continuation of Mr Murphy's point, I would be surprised if many members, or the majority of the members of the unionist community, are sitting in their homes worried about IRA weapons, considering that since the Democratic Unionist Party came to the fore within unionism 26 members of the Protestant community have been murdered by loyalist weaponry. Even in Mr Paisley Jnr's own constituency, nationalists in isolated villages such as Ahoghill will be more concerned about what sort of summer they will have at the brunt of loyalist violence. It would be more beneficial to the community that it represents if the Democratic Unionist Party were to use its influence in those matters, instead of wasting energy worrying about weapons that may or may not be there.

Mr Paisley Jnr: There is no point in me questioning Sinn Féin about UVF weapons, UDA weapons, UFF weapons or Ulster Resistance weapons or anything else like that, because if Sinn Féin cannot answer in respect of IRA weapons, it will hardly be able to shed any light on those matters. I would not expect them to. Therefore, I want to focus on issues on which, as spokespersons for the republican community and the republican movement, Sinn Féin may be able to provide some answers. Let the record show that Sinn Féin does not want to answer those questions; it wants to divert to other issues.

Sinn Féin had all day yesterday to ask the DUP questions on those issues, and questions were asked on a number of issues. If Sinn Féin did not get satisfaction yesterday, it should have continued questioning, because the DUP was here all day yesterday to answer questions. Today, however, it is Sinn Féin's turn.

It is interesting that there is hostility that these issues are being raised and there is hostility that unionists should be at all concerned about those matters. Well, unionists are concerned, which is why questions are being posed. I will not ask questions about loyalist guns, because Sinn Féin is clearly not in a position to answer. However, that party is in a position to answer questions about IRA weapons. I want to know, for the record, whether Sinn Féin believes that any of the weapons mentioned in the newspaper article that the guards contributed to could have been IRA material? If it is not IRA material, whose material does Sinn Féin believe it to be?

Mr Murphy: Mr Paisley Jnr has already asked that question. I have no idea whose material it is. I state for the record that Martin McGuinness asked William McCrea yesterday to give his view on Sir Reg Empey's comments that all unionist parties had engaged with and used loyalist paramilitary groups over the past 20 or 30 years and to give the DUP's attitude to those comments. William McCrea did not answer that question.

The DUP may well have some knowledge of, responsibility for or view on weapons — particularly those of Ulster Resistance, but perhaps also on UVF and UDA weapons. We did not get any answers to those questions yesterday; we probably did not expect any, but we could not even get a view on Reg Empey's comments that all unionist parties had engaged and used loyalist paramilitaries at some stage.

Mr Kennedy: As a point of clarification, it is important that Sir Reg Empey's remarks are not misinterpreted or misrepresented. I must caution Conor Murphy about that.

Mr Paisley Jnr: There was some failure yesterday by Sinn Féin to ask the right questions or to probe and get the right answer. That was Sinn Féin's problem. Today, we are trying to get answers from Sinn Féin. So far, the tests have been very clearly put to Sinn Féin, but it is not really living up to those tests. Sinn Féin does not really want to engage; it wants to flannel and avoid the issue.

I want to ask some specific questions about the decommissioning process. That is a legitimate obstacle because it affects unionist confidence, which is crucial for us. Was anyone from Sinn Féin present at the decommissioning process?

Mr Murphy: Not that I am aware of.

Mr Paisley Jnr: So there may have been?

Mr Murphy: I am not aware of who was present, apart from Gen de Chastelain and the two ministers.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Let us be absolutely clear: you will not go on the record and say no.

Mr Murphy: I am not aware of who was at the decommissioning process, apart from Gen de Chastelain and the two witnesses. That is as much as has been made public as to who was involved in that process.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Does Sinn Féin feel that it is in the dark on this issue?

Mr Murphy: Sinn Féin's only interest in this issue was that it was dealt with under the terms of the Good Friday Agreement as we agreed with the two Governments and the other political parties. The terms of the Good Friday Agreement specified that the IICD would deal with that issue; they did not specify that political parties, or their representatives, should be present.

The agreement specified that the IICD would directly engage with those who held weapons and deal with their disposal. The IICD has reported that it is satisfied that that is the case in relation to the IRA, and the IRA alone. Sinn Féin is satisfied that that is the case.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Would Sinn Féin be able to find out whether any of its members were present at the decommissioning process?

3.15 pm

Mr Murphy: The issue has been dealt with to our satisfaction, and we have no further interest in how it was done, who was there and who might have witnessed it. However, the point in relation to the DUP's protestations around this issue and desire for photographic evidence is that this was the part of the deal in which Ian Paisley Jnr and his father ended the possibility of agreement in 2004.

The point has been made to me on various occasions by various people not from the republican movement that if his father had been present at that process and had taken photographs, at the end of it he would have had to ask the representative from the IRA: "Is that it?" The representative from the IRA would have had to say: "Yes." And Ian Paisley would have had to accept or not accept that. So, while it is the case that no one knows exactly how many weapons were in the possession of the IRA, at some stage people have to accept its word that the weapons have been dealt with. The IICD has accepted its word, and that is the process by which all of the rest of us agreed that this would be dealt with. We are satisfied that IRA weapons have been dealt with in a satisfactory manner. We have no further interest in who happened to be there or not there.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Mr Deputy Speaker, once again we go back to the issue that although Sinn Féin may not have an interest in this, the unionist community does. It is an obstacle for it. While Sinn Féin may be able to take the word of the Provisional IRA, unionists cannot. That is not rocket science; it is pretty straightforward stuff. On that basis, I ask again: although Mr Murphy may not have any interest in it, would he be in a position to find out whether anyone from Sinn Féin was at the decommissioning process?

Mr Murphy: No, I would not be in a position to find out.

Mr Paisley Jnr: But you cannot clearly state for the record that members of Sinn Féin were not there?

Mr Murphy: I have no idea who was at the decommissioning process other than Gen de Chastelain and the two witnesses.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Sinn Féin claims that the IRA has decommissioned all of its weapons. I want to know if it is aware of when the organisation decided in principle that it would completely disarm. When was that decision taken in principle?

Mr Murphy: I have no idea.

Mr Paisley Jnr: You do not believe that it is important that you try to build unionist confidence about that decision?

Mr Murphy: Perhaps the best way, if you have specific questions in relation to that, would be for yourself and representatives from your party to go and engage with the IRA leadership and put that range of questions to it. You can put that range of questions to us, but I am afraid that I am not in a position to answer them, because I do not have the knowledge. I presume that people in the leadership of the IRA would have the knowledge, and if there are issues in relation to that, and if you genuinely want to satisfy yourself in relation to some of those issues, you would be best talking to the people in charge of the process.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Mr Deputy Speaker, again I want to know if Sinn Féin would support the unionist confidence; would it support the early publication of an inventory of the weapons that have to date been destroyed?

Mr Murphy: What we did support are the arrangements made under the terms of the Good Friday Agreement. That is what all of the parties and the two Governments signed up to. Now, with regard to the sort of conditions that Ian Paisley Jnr and the DUP had wanted in those arrangements, it is quite possible we would never have been able to get to the stage where those arrangements were satisfied. That may well have been the desire of the DUP, because I understand from reports at one stage that members of the DUP advised the loyalist paramilitaries not to engage in any ceasefires or decommissioning acts, but it may well be the case that the DUP wanted such clauses inserted, so that this process would not have been possible at all.

I contend that we are in a much better place now than we have been since the start of the Good Friday Agreement. The issues of the IRA weapons and activities have been dealt with. If that is not the DUP's view, it might want to take up matters with the leadership of the IRA. The issues have been dealt with under the terms of the Good Friday Agreement. We are satisfied. We also believe that they probably could not have been dealt with under any other terms, and they have now been dealt with under those terms. The focus of people who have genuine concerns about the issue of illegal weaponry should be to try to ensure that the rest of the illegal weaponry, which is out there, is dealt with under the same terms. I have no desire to see inventories of UVF, Ulster Resistance or Third Force weapons, if there happened to be any, but I want to see those weapons out of circulation. I would not have it as a precursor or as a prerequisite to the DUP's coming into Government, but there should be a genuine desire among people who want to move forward in a more peaceful society to see all of those weapons dealt with.

First, in relation to inventories, the DUP could help to speed that process along by getting involved in encouraging loyalist paramilitary groups to decommission. My understanding of that process is that no inventory will be published until all decommissioning has taken place. Since it is up to loyalist organisations to move, if the DUP wishes to see those inventories published, it has to go down that road.

I wish to make it clear that there is no hostility towards the point of view that the unionist community has serious concerns about decommissioning. I am questioning whether it is the main focus of the unionist community's attention, or whether it is a deal breaker for that community. I am not diminishing the need for that. However, I imagine that if you were sitting in Newtownabbey, the Rathcoole estate, the Shankill or Ballymena, you would not be concerned about IRA weapons. The UDA and UVF weapons that are being used against the community would be the main source of concern.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Once again, Mr Deputy Speaker, I will be the best judge of what my community wants, but let us focus today on what questions Sinn Féin is prepared to answer, if any.

I am not asking whether Sinn Féin supports the Belfast Agreement or its terms. Sinn Féin seems to be clinging to the Belfast Agreement with its fingernails. I want to know whether it would support — in order to build unionist confidence — the early publication of an inventory of the weapons that have, to date, been destroyed.

We know that not only IRA weapons have apparently been destroyed. Very publicly, LVF weapons have been destroyed. I want to know whether Sinn Féin supports the early publication of an inventory in order to address this issue in a way to engage and to ensure that there is unionist confidence and to speed up the dawning of the day when an Executive is re-established in Northern Ireland.

Mr Murphy: That was interesting in relation to LVF weapons and the public dealing with those. I asked William McCrea yesterday whether he felt that the way that the LVF had dealt with some of its weapons had given any degree of confidence to the nationalist community, and he did not answer that question.

We support the arrangements that were outlined under the terms of the Good Friday Agreement. John has outlined some of the arrangements in relation to publication of inventories, and we support that process.

The best thing for the DUP to do is to encourage that process among loyalist paramilitaries, rather than abdicating any responsibility to deal with that. Again, if there are issues of a technical nature that DUP members wish to talk to the IRA about, they should raise those with the IRA.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Mr Deputy Speaker, this perhaps goes to the heart of the matter. If Sinn Féin is absolutely satisfied that the process of decommissioning is a settlement — a signed, sealed and agreed package — but believes that on the big political and constitutional issue it is only a space or a halting point toward greater things, I do not understand how it can have that double-headed position. One matter is a moveable object, but the other is hard and fast.

Again, I put the question: in order to assist and develop unionist confidence, which is an obstacle to this process moving forward, will Sinn Féin support the publication of an inventory of IRA weapons? After all, they have been destroyed, so who is being hurt by this? We may as well know what has been destroyed. We may as well find out. Why do we have to be kept in the dark? What is the secret?

Mr Murphy: I am happy to acknowledge that the Member has acknowledged that the IRA weapons have been destroyed. I think that that is a step forward. There is, as I say, a process for dealing with that. I am not quite sure how he can try to marry the constitutional issue, under the Good Friday Agreement, with the dealing with weapons, which is a by-product of that agreement.

The Good Friday Agreement allowed people to pursue their own constitutional preferences in relation to this state. We are entitled to do that, as are others. The agreement outlined how weapons would be dealt with, and, in our view, they have been dealt with under those terms in a satisfactory manner.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Could I turn to the issue of paramilitarism, which is included in our submission? I want to know whether the Sinn Féin delegation believes that the IRA has been involved in any paramilitary activity whatsoever since the IRA statement of last July.

Mr Murphy: No. I believe that the IRA statement of last July, which instructed all volunteers not to engage in any activity whatsoever, has been held to. That is my experience from the area in which I live, and from hearing from people on the ground in republican areas right across the North.

Mr Morrow: I want to ask a supplementary question. Sinn Féin says that decommissioning has been carried out to its satisfaction. Does Sinn Féin accept that it was not a question of whether decommissioning was carried out to its satisfaction but of its being carried out to unionists' satisfaction? It was unionists who lacked confidence in the decommissioning process. Furthermore, would Sinn Féin accept the publication of an inventory if it served to boost unionist confidence?

Mr Murphy: Mr Morrow is wrong on both positions. Decommissioning does not have to be carried out to our satisfaction or to his: it has to be carried out to the satisfaction of the arrangements that were agreed under the terms of the Good Friday Agreement — the arrangements of the Independent International Commission on Decommissioning. The commission has expressed itself satisfied, as have both Governments, with the decommissioning process; and Sinn Féin is satisfied with that. There was no requirement to satisfy Sinn Féin; neither was there a requirement to satisfy unionists. In our view, the requirement under the terms of the Good Friday Agreement has been met.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Sinn Féin indicated that it does not believe that the Provisional IRA has been engaged in any paramilitary activity whatsoever since last July. I want to look at intelligence gathering by paramilitary organisations. I refer the Committee to paragraph 3.19 of the IMC's eighth report, which said:

"We referred in our last report to intelligence gathering. We believe that the organisation continues to engage in it, and has no present intention of doing otherwise. This is an activity which we believe is authorised by the leadership and which involves some very senior members. While some of it may be for defensive purposes, it is predominantly directed towards supporting the political strategy. It involves among other things the continuation of efforts to penetrate public and other institutions with the intention of illegally obtaining or handling sensitive information."

Does Sinn Féin accept that that fact alone blows out of the water any credibility that unionists could give to an organisation that, on the one hand, wants to engage in what the IMC report has found it to be engaged in, while, on the other hand, wants to be in an Executive with the Democratic Unionist Party? Does Sinn Féin see that as a legitimate obstacle that it must address? If so, how does it intend to stop the intelligence gathering that undermines the institutions of the state?

Mr Murphy: I have outlined our view of the IMC and its reports on more than one occasion already today. That is the IMC's view. However, I have raised numerous caveats about how it conducts its business, its personnel, the people to whom it speaks, the standards of evidence that it uses — indeed, the IMC uses no recognisable standard of evidence — in producing its reports. I suggest that Ian Paisley Jnr and other members of the DUP regularly receive intelligence from people in the security services. Members of the DUP may make such intelligence public — William McCrea attempted to do so in the House of Commons several months ago. Ian Paisley Jnr's father has often done the same. The DUP has often shown documents and similar intelligence that it received from people who gathered it on behalf of the British Government.

The IRA statement of last July stands: its volunteers have been instructed to engage in no activity whatsoever. In my view, that instruction has held firm. A great deal of intelligence gathering goes on among political parties — and outside them — in this part of the world. I do not believe that the IRA is involved in it.

Mr Paisley Jnr: If the IRA were involved in any intelligence gathering, would you accept that that would be a breach of the July statement?

Mr Murphy: If the IRA were involved in any activities whatsoever, it would be a breach of the July statement; however, I believe that its statement has held firm. It is clear that the Democratic Unionist Party has received, deployed, leaked and exposed intelligence material and raised it in the House of Commons. The DUP's question time is over, but perhaps that party might reflect on the effect that such actions have on the confidence of the nationalist and republican community in the policing and intelligence services — services to which the DUP asks us to give unqualified allegiance.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I want to check one thing. Was it said that any activities whatsoever by the Provisional IRA would be a breach of the IRA statement?

Mr Murphy: The IRA statement instructed its volunteers to engage in no activities whatsoever. If volunteers have engaged in activities, they would obviously be in breach of that statement.

3.30 pm

Mr Paisley Jnr: Again, this is an issue that I want you to reflect upon before you answer. Are you suggesting, not only to this room but to the unionist community, that it should believe the IRA on these issues rather than the IMC. Remember just for a moment how the unionist community that I represent actually views the IMC. We certainly do not view it as our buddies. We certainly do not view it as our hand-picked people. We view it as people who have been put there independently of us — people who have been prepared and who have cross-examined. But it is a monitoring commission independent of our political party and therefore independent. We have to therefore view its reports, not with scepticism, not from a position where we dismiss them out of hand, but seriously.

Sinn Féin seems to be coming from the position of complete hostility to the IMC and its membership — to one because he is often described as a British Lord, and to another because he came from the security services. We want to know whether Sinn Féin seriously believes that the unionist community should believe the word of the IRA on these issues rather than that of the IMC. Unionists are not going to believe the IRA, so who else should we believe on these issues?

Mr Murphy: Well, unionists have a variety of sources from which to draw their conclusions in relation to all of that. Some of it is their own experience, and some of it is the declared intentions of people. They can judge the journey that has been made over the past 10 or 15 years in trying to develop a more peaceful future. We have expressed our view on the IMC's membership, on the way it gathers its information and on the sort of people who feed it information — the same people that feed your party its snippets of intelligence and documents — and their purpose in feeding that information to the IMC. It is similar to the purpose they have in feeding you and your party that sort of information. It is not to enhance the peace process or to allow us to move forward in a productive fashion together, but to block progress.

It is not for me to say that the unionist community should believe the IRA as opposed to the IMC. People can draw their own conclusions from a variety of sources, and from observing what has happened on the ground. Sinn Féin is endeavouring to develop the most positive atmosphere and framework possible in order to get the institutions reinstated. If all the other parties adopted that approach, it might go some way to achieving that.

Mr Paisley Jnr: The issue of criminality is cited as an obstacle. We believe it is important, and we expected Sinn Féin to at least attempt to address it. Earlier today “Slab” Murphy's name was mentioned. I just want to confirm for the record — is “Slab” Murphy a relative of anyone in the Sinn Féin delegation?

Mr Murphy: Well, he might be a relative of someone in the DUP. He is not a relative of anyone in the Sinn Féin delegation.

Mr Paisley Jnr: That is interesting. OK. If, as has been stated by the Guards and by the police that it is clear that “Slab” Murphy is wanted for very serious organised crime, would Sinn Féin welcome “Slab” Murphy's arrest? Would it call for him to hand himself over for investigation by the police?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I urge caution. Some of these issues may be sub judice because of ongoing investigations by the Assets Recovery Agency and the police. It is just a wee word of caution in answering questions, because I was criticised earlier today for not cautioning and not protecting people.

Mr Murphy: Well, allegations and accusations have been made. You say that the Guards and the police say that they want to arrest that gentleman. Let them present the evidence and arrest him, and let the law take its course.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Well I am not really interested in that. I am interested in whether Sinn Féin would do the community leadership thing. Would it go out and show leadership, not “followship”, by calling for this person, who is wanted on both sides of the border by the lawful authorities of Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland, to hand himself over to the police for investigation?

Mr Murphy: I am not clear that he is wanted by the lawful authorities on both sides of the border. You state that that is the case. If that is the situation, the lawful authorities can deal with the case. A substantial degree of hype surrounds evidence and information in relation to this and several other issues. When a case is brought to court, quite often there is hype but very little substance.

Sinn Féin has a jaundiced view about agency personnel turning up to arrest people accompanied by TV cameras, as they turned up, ostensibly, to raid this Building, accompanied by TV cameras. Our experience is that they never searched the offices in here at all. We are sceptical. The onus is not on the individuals that the authorities claim to be seeking but on the agencies that claim to have evidence to put up that evidence, arrest the people, charge them and bring them to court. A trial should not be conducted through the media. If the agencies are sure that they have the evidence to convict someone, surely they can arrest that person and not arrive, as they did in this Building, with TV cameras, only to find that the entire case that they had puffed up had collapsed around their ears.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I take the view that the police should do their duty. However, I am not asking the police that question; I am asking Sinn Féin. Would it behave in a community-spirited way and call for people who are wanted by the lawful authorities to hand themselves over for investigation? That is a legitimate question that addresses the issue of whether unionists can be confident that they could form a partnership with Sinn Féin. It is important that that question is answered.

Mr Murphy: As you said in relation to your community, I would not dare to speak on behalf of it. You would not wish to speak on behalf of the community that I represent. The community that I represent has a healthy degree of scepticism when the police come calling with TV cameras and when aspects of their investigation are conducted through selected journalists. My community has a healthy degree of scepticism about whether that is part of a genuine investigation or is part of a political frame-up. If people claim to have evidence, let them present that evidence. I would not advise anyone to do anything based on the manner in which the police and other agencies have presented their case in the media and have not presented it in court.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Gerry Adams is on the record as describing “Slab” Murphy as a respected businessman and a republican. Is he a member of Sinn Féin?

Mr Murphy: Not that I am aware of.

Mr Paisley Jnr: So he could be a member of Sinn Féin, but you may not be aware of it?

Mr Murphy: I do not have the membership for all the people in north Louth who are members of Sinn Féin. I am not aware that he is a member of Sinn Féin.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Would you be aware if he has ever made a contribution to Sinn Féin’s election programme?

Mr Murphy: I am not aware of that.

Mr Paisley Jnr: So he could have made a contribution?

Mr Murphy: Again, I am not aware of that. People can buy tickets and make all kind of contributions at all levels across the community. I do not have access to that type of information.

Mr Paisley Jnr: So he could have bought tickets to assist Sinn Féin’s election campaign?

Mr Murphy: I have no idea.

Mr Paisley Jnr: It was you who brought tickets into the equation. He could have bought tickets to assist the Sinn Féin election machine — is that right?

Mr Murphy: Ian, you are trying to make the point that “Slab” Murphy has been successful in business, and somehow that benefits Sinn Féin substantially. I reiterate: how Sinn Féin raises, lodges and spends its own money is all open to scrutiny. That issue has been scrutinised and has been found to be above board. If you have specific allegations about the way in which Sinn Féin operates its money, as opposed to how other parties operate their own banking systems, you may as well make those accusations rather than dance around the issue about whether someone has bought a ticket in a lottery.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I am certainly not dancing around issues. I am looking at someone who is dancing around answering questions.

Let us take the discussion away from Thomas “Slab” Murphy and ask a specific and generic question about criminals. Would Sinn Féin display leadership and public spirit by calling on those people who are wanted by the Police Service of Northern Ireland for serious and organised crime to hand themselves over to the police?

Mr Murphy: I am not aware of who is wanted by the police for serious and organised crime. If the police operated on case-by-case basis, we could try to make a judgement.

We stand against criminality in our communities. We have put forward and support arrangements through which other people can work to address issues of criminality, given that the reality is that we deal with an unprofessional and partisan policing service. We have tried to work with that reality. We have no qualms whatever about standing by our record of dealing with criminality.

If Ian Paisley Jnr wants this to be an exercise of asking whether people will stand up publicly and call for others to support policing services and structures in advance of working out the proper arrangements, mechanisms and outstanding issues on policing, he is barking up the wrong tree. We have issues on policing that we intend to resolve. We want to see a lawful and peaceful society. The communities that we represent and the people who vote for us want to see that. We endeavour to help people, and we call on people to stand together to resist criminality. We will do that, and we will continue to struggle as best and as quickly as we can to address the outstanding policing matters.

However, you can try to poke at this all that you want to find some snippet with which you can run back to the media or to the Democratic Unionist Party meeting in Ballymena and say: “Here we have it: Sinn Féin will not do this or will not do that.” Our issues on policing are quite clear: there are outstanding issues, our community has difficulties with policing, and we will give leadership in trying to address those matters. You can try to poke through it to find some further reason for reinforcing your party’s world view of why it should not go into any further arrangements. You can describe the issues as ones that you genuinely want to see resolved to give you confidence. I happen not to believe that; I believe that you are searching for more issues to identify as obstacles.

However, we can go through this exercise, and I am quite happy to do that. Our position on policing is clear. Our community has difficulty with policing and with people who were previously handed over to the police as a result of their criminal activities only to re-emerge as informers with impunity to carry on with those activities. All those experiences exist, and we are trying to deal with their legacy. We are not dealing with a policing service that has had — or still has — a clean record in its dealings with our community. However, we are trying to deal with the issues.

Mr Paisley Jnr: We will come to the Police Service in a moment.

Mr O'Dowd: I agree with Conor Murphy that it is unfortunate that the DUP has presented criminality but does not want to explore it in such a way that it can be resolved. However, criminality occurs throughout Western and Eastern society. I know that the DUP does not want to answer questions, but perhaps it could outline how it deals with criminality in areas such as Ballymena. Ballymena has the highest incidence of drug use in Ireland; it is the hard-drugs capital of Ireland. It has more heroin users than any other town in Ireland, and it is very sad that we have so many drug users in that area.

Ballymena has a DUP-dominated borough council. At Assembly level it is dominated by the DUP —

Mr Paisley Jnr: Mr Deputy Speaker, this is not an answer to a question; this is a series of questions. We are here to get answers to specific questions.

Mr O'Dowd: I am exploring it in the sense that if the DUP has a resolution on criminality that it could present to us at the end of this, we would be more than happy to listen to it.

We have a place that is dominated by the DUP, yet criminality still exists. How do you resolve that situation?

Mr Paisley Jnr: It is important that paramilitaries, no matter where they are, stop selling drugs, stop bringing them into this society and stop gaining from the sale of drugs and giving that money to political parties. However, we have tried to explore matters today on a case-by-case basis. One case is that of Thomas “Slab” Murphy, which Sinn Féin does not want to talk about. We have also tried to look generically at the issue; it does not want to talk about that, but it wants to talk on a case-by-case basis.

Therefore let us look at crime generically. Does Sinn Féin believe that it has a responsibility to address crime? Does it have a responsibility to address unionist confidence in it as potential partners in Government? If a person is raped in west Belfast or robbed in south Armagh, or if a shop is raided by criminals in any part of this country, does Sinn Féin believe that if it knows who was involved in those crimes, it should hand them over to the police so that they can deal with them? Will it call on people to hand those people over to the police?

Mr Murphy: We recognise that the community that we represent — in fact, it is probably broader than the community that votes for us — has little or no confidence in policing. We recognise past experience, when names have been given to the police only for them be taken in and repackaged as low-level informers in their own communities with impunity to carry on with their criminal activities including rape, robbery, and raiding shops. Recognising all of that, Sinn Féin has nonetheless asked people, if they have information about serious issues of this nature, to make it available to people in whom they have confidence to treat the issue seriously. That recognises the very difficult policing reality in our own communities.

Obviously, there is also a difficult policing reality in the community that the Member represents, given the level of crime and drug-taking that goes on in it. We recognise the difficulties about policing in our community and have tried to give leadership. We help people who want to have serious issues dealt with, and try to find mechanisms to do that, while recognising that the very police whom people might have turned to in the past have allowed criminals and others to prey on the community.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Is that advice not to go to the police, to go to the police, or a fifty-fifty bet?

Mr Murphy: That advice is that, if people have confidence in the police, they should go to the police. The reality that we recognise, and in which we work, is that a substantial section of the community that we represent does not have confidence in going to the police because of its experience of criminality in its community, and of who has been directing and facilitating that criminality. The police have benefited from that criminality. Our approach recognises that experience and takes it into account. We tell people that if they have confidence in the police, they should certainly give their information to the police. If they do not have confidence in the police, we tell them to bring that information to reputable people who can progress it in a proper way.

Mr Paisley Jnr: If people have confidence, the Member is clearly happy for them to go to the police. Would he then take the next logical step, to provide leadership and call on people to go to the police when they are aware of people in their community who are involved in rape, robbery and other serious and organised crime? It is a logical step. Would he take it?

Mr Murphy: I have already advanced what we do in the current circumstances. Let me advance what we will do in leadership. We lead our community — we do not ask our community where they are and then decide to adopt that position. As best we can, we will advance the policing issues that we see to be outstanding. Some of that involves getting into power with the DUP. We will advance that, and then, in that situation, we will recommend to our party that it endorse policing arrangements. We will give leadership in our community and try to bring it to terms with policing arrangements too.

That is giving real leadership. Real leadership does not mean standing on a soapbox or appearing on TV, making a call for something and then going back to your constituency, regardless of the consequences. Real leadership is trying to work the issues through to a solution, to find a proper solution to policing, to deliver that solution within your own community and to give leadership on that solution — not asking your community where they are on an issue and adopting that position.

Mr Paisley Jnr: There appears to be a dichotomy between what Alex Maskey said earlier in the Committee and what is now being said. I want to clear that up. What comes first in the chicken-and-egg scenario of policing and justice? Will Sinn Féin fully support the policing and justice system prior to the devolution of policing and justice powers, or will it wait until the devolution of those powers is complete?

Mr Murphy: There are a number of issues concerning policing. Some of those will be resolved under the transfer of policing and justice powers, which is a key issue. There are other outstanding issues on which the British Government have promised to produce legislation. We have yet to see that legislation, and we have yet to see the passage of that legislation through the Houses of Parliament, which on two occasions undid previous legislation that was to reflect Patten. Therefore, there are still issues we must satisfy ourselves on. If and when we are satisfied, we have made a public commitment to go to our party and our community and argue for acceptance of those policing arrangements.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Mr Deputy Speaker, it is well known that it would take, at best, 18 months to two years to fully devolve — if there was agreement — the matters of policing and justice to the Northern Ireland Assembly.

What I want to know is whether Sinn Féin is saying that it would take it two years, until all of that works itself out, before it would fully support the police and the justice system. Again, it is an evens bet that Sinn Féin might support it, but not until it sees the entire workings of the devolved process.

Mr Murphy: In relation to the timescale, I suggest that if it had not been for yourself, Ian Paisley Jnr, and your father, this timescale could have kicked in in December 2004, and we would be well on the way to achieving these goals, if not already there. I am not sure what the time frame will be for the transfer of powers on policing and justice. What I do know is that with political will those time frames can be speeded up considerably. We have the political will to address those issues, and we look to you to have the same political will.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Mr Deputy Speaker, there is a failure to answer the very obvious question: will Sinn Féin support the policing and justice mechanisms prior to the full devolution of policing and justice powers or is it waiting until after? This morning, Mr Maskey indicated that it was waiting until that was complete. There appears to be some fuzziness as regards when Mr Murphy believes his party will support the policing and justice mechanisms. It is important that we get clarity on that.

Mr Murphy: As I said, there are a number of issues outstanding. Some relate to the transfer of powers on policing and justice; some relate to measures that the British Government intend to introduce into legislation. We will judge those as we see them. When we consider that we are in a position to make an argument, to our party in the first instance and then to our community, that what has been achieved to date on policing issues is enough to allow us to go forward, then we will make that argument. We will make that judgement when we see that.

We are not now in the position of specifying time frames or dates that may or may not suit the DUP. We have a judgement to make, and when we consider that enough has been given to allow us to make that judgement, we will make it. I would argue that if a deal had not been scuppered in 2004 we could well be beyond that time frame now. However, we are in this time frame now, so let us take it forward as fast as we can from there.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Again, there is no clear answer, which is very discouraging. We need clarity about what Sinn Féin actually means. On four occasions today Sinn Féin has said that if people have evidence they should go to the courts. Does Sinn Féin therefore accept the legitimacy of the courts as currently constituted? You are encouraging people to go to the courts if they have evidence. Do you accept the legitimacy of our court system?

Mr Murphy: If the policing service and other services that gather evidence have evidence, let them go to the courts that they use. Do I have confidence in the courts as currently constituted? Not a lot. That is an honest answer. However, people use the court system here. We are part of a process that is trying to work through criminal justice issues to improve the working of the courts. We are in this institution. I do not have a lot of confidence that it will work, particularly given the experience over the last number of weeks.

Nonetheless, we took the decision to engage in institutions and to try to work them in the interests of the people whom we represent and the broader number of people on this island, and also in the interests of a better future for all our people. So we will engage in institutions as we find them. We will try to improve those institutions. There are other matters that need to be dealt with before we can engage in a policing institution. We will take that forward as we find it.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I am not concerned whether people have confidence or no confidence. It is their entitlement and, indeed, their right to have confidence or to not have confidence in something. What I want to know, Mr Deputy Speaker, is: does Sinn Féin believe that the court system here is the legitimate court system?

Mr Murphy: It is the legitimate court system of this state. The question is whether Sinn Féin believes that this state is legitimate.

The answer is no. Sinn Féin wishes to end the existence of this state. We operate the court system of this state because it is the authority of this state. However, it is Sinn Féin's clear intention to end the existence of this state and move to a new constitutional arrangement on the island.

Mr Paisley Jnr: That is the third time today, Deputy Speaker, that Northern Ireland's legitimacy has been called into question.

Mr Murphy: It is not the first time in its history, that is for sure.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Post 1998, someone expressed the view that Northern Ireland was recognised as a legitimate part of the United Kingdom. Does Sinn Féin hold to that position?

Mr Murphy: I am interested to know who expressed that view. Certainly no one in Sinn Féin said that Northern Ireland was a legitimate part of the United Kingdom; we have always contested that, and we will continue to contest it. Our very existence as Irish republicans contests that notion. We will work in a peaceful and political fashion to end Northern Ireland's position in the United Kingdom. Sinn Féin stated that objective, as did the SDLP.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I want the record to show that, in answering some questions today, Sinn Féin failed to support the legitimacy of the state, the police and the courts. Yet Sinn Féin says that it wants expedition in getting into Government with a party that endorses the legitimacy of the state, the police and the courts. I have not heard anything in Sinn Féin's answers about how it wants to address that huge quantum gap that is between us. It is important that Sinn Féin at least attempts to address that. However, it is unfortunate that it has failed.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): There was reference to the notes of the meeting. I will clarify for the record that Hansard staff are recording all the time, so although the Clerks are not taking details of proceedings, those will be recorded in Hansard.

Mr Paisley Jnr: What time will we break today?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We had planned to break at 4.00 pm, but that is in the hands of the Committee.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I have another 25 questions on criminality and further questions on some of the political policies that have been identified in the Sinn Féin paper.

Mr McFarland: The Committee had a good day yesterday and is having a good day today. There is nothing to stop the Committee continuing that movement tomorrow morning. Parties will take their turns when it shuffles out. It is encouraging stuff, so to cut it short or not to allow the DUP to explore its questions —

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We do not want to cut any party off from exploring or asking questions and engaging in dialogue. We can adjourn at 4.00 pm and continue tomorrow morning.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I am happy to adjourn now, because if we came on to a new issue, we would only be getting started.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I am advised that it is called suspending, not adjourning.

Mr Kennedy: Deputy Speaker, when will the Hansard report be available? I have not seen it yet, but perhaps that is my fault.

The Committee Clerk: We hope to have yesterday's transcripts available in draft tomorrow; Hansard staff have been given a 48-hour turnaround. Members may have thought that there was an overnight turnaround, but the turnaround time for Committee is longer than for plenary. That is because Hansard staff do not have access to the visual commentary, which they do for a plenary. Therefore they have to wait until they get the tape before they can transcribe.

Mr Kennedy: Can I presume that the Hansard report of today's hearing will be available on Friday and will be sent to members over the weekend? Is that optimistic?

The Committee Clerk: If there is a plenary on Monday, it will take longer, but 48 hours is the time that we have been given.

Mr Murphy: Just for the purposes of diary arrangements, what time did we say that we would meet tomorrow?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We planned to meet from 10.00 am to 12.30 pm.

Adjourned at 3.56 pm.

COMMITTEE ON THE PREPARATION FOR GOVERNMENT

Thursday 22 June 2006

Members in attendance for all or part of proceedings:

The Chairman, Mr Jim Wells
Mr John Dallat
Dr Seán Farren
Mr Danny Kennedy
Ms Patricia Lewsley
Mrs Naomi Long
Dr William McCrea
Mr Alan McFarland
Mr David McNarry
Mr Maurice Morrow
Mr Conor Murphy
Mr John O'Dowd

The Committee met at 10.05 am.

(The Chairman (Mr Wells) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We need to decide future business. We have taken the decision not to meet tomorrow, as that is most people's constituency day, but there is a view that we should meet on Monday. Two parties have stated that they have group meetings on Monday morning, so the question is, do we meet on Monday afternoon and for how long?

Mr Kennedy: There was a suggestion that we could meet at 12.00 noon and 1.30 pm was also suggested. Tuesday has been ruled out because the DUP will be unable to attend, as Mr Morrow is to be elevated.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will remember to refer to him by his proper title from Tuesday onwards. It is important that we do not get hauled before the Woolsack. Can we agree a time on Monday and then look at Wednesday?

Mr Murphy: What are the plans?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We are talking of meeting on Monday afternoon at 2.00 pm.

Mr Kennedy: What about 1.30 pm?

Mr Dallat: If we meet at 1.30 pm, the meeting will run late, which leaves it extremely difficult to attend anything else in the evening, and I have a district policing partnership (DPP) meeting in Coleraine at 6.30 pm. Perhaps we could start at 12.00 noon and have a working lunch with a few sandwiches and then get on with the work, but I will agree to whatever decision is made.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I suggest meeting from 1.30 pm to late.

Mr McFarland: We could finish between 5.00 pm and 5.30 pm. In theory, if we take today that leaves half a day effectively, and that will probably finish Sinn Féin off. [Laughter.]

Mr Murphy: You wish.

Mr Kennedy: We have been saying that for 35 years.

Mr McFarland: We then have the SDLP's submission, which could last all day if the other submissions are anything to go by. We could be well into Wednesday for the next submission. I think that 5.00 pm to 5.30 pm would suit. I have to be in Tyrone by 8.00 pm, but my colleagues can carry on if the mood of the Committee is to run later.

Dr Farren: We need to decide what has to be completed by next Thursday, as that day has been pencilled in for the Prime Ministers' visit. It would be good if the Committee had not only completed its questioning but had some discussion on how we want things to be taken forward. As I understand it, our first task is to scope things, so we must identify those things and agree on how they will be addressed without getting into the argument about whether they are addressed here or elsewhere before the Prime Ministers' visit.

It would be helpful for their officials to know that we had given that question some thought. We should find some time on Wednesday to address that, so we need to work back from that and ensure that we give sufficient time between now and Wednesday to have completed this business. I know that I asked for the later start on Monday, but I am happy to consider starting at around 11.30 am to give us a run-in before lunch to ensure that we do not just finish with this business and not address the second question that I have raised.

Dr McCrea: We all have practical difficulties, and we will try to work around those. If 12.00 noon on Monday is practical for the SDLP and others, there is no reason why we could not try to be helpful.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is there consensus on Monday at 12.00 noon? That allows everybody to have their group meeting. We will sit until 5.30 pm.

Mr Kennedy: Will we work through from 12 noon to 5.30 pm or break briefly for lunch or sandwiches?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): As it is a closed session we can have sandwiches and bring them back to our tables.

Mr Kennedy: We do not have to bring our own?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Thinking of very nice lunches, there is no hint of a meeting of the Business

Committee on Monday; it will be Tuesday at 12.30 pm. That can be arranged so that we can sit through until 5.00 pm. Vegetarians or vegans can let the Clerks know their requirements. Hopefully that will allow us to polish off the examination of the papers.

There seems to be a problem with Tuesday due to the elevation of Lord Morrow. It looks as if it is ruled out.

Mr Morrow: I do not expect the world to stop, you know.

Mr Kennedy: That is very humble of you.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Lord Morrow, I think that the entire Committee would see that as one of the most important events of next week, and we are all hoping to be there.

Mr Morrow: Is there anyone here who thinks that?

Mr Kennedy: There are Members of the Commons who may even wish to introduce you.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We would not want to spoil Mr Morrow's day.

Bearing in mind Dr Farren's comments about the PMs' visit, are we free on Wednesday as a group?

Mr Murphy: Chairman, I know both Martin McGuinness and I will probably have difficulties for at least some part of Wednesday, but we will make sure that we are represented here anyway.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Does anybody else have problems with Wednesday?

Mrs Long: Only in the morning.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Wednesday is the key day.

Mr McFarland: Wednesday is the key day because we need to finish remaining business by that stage and have the discussion that Seán mentioned. We need to have some idea where we are with all this before the Prime Ministers arrive on Thursday, if they intend to come.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): To bring the chairmanship back into balance, I propose that Mr Molloy chair Monday and that I chair Wednesday. Monday's meeting will take up only part of the day.

Mr Kennedy: Chairman, do you envisage that Wednesday will be an all-day session, from 10.00 am to 5.00 pm?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes, because we need to draw some conclusions.

Mr McFarland: Chairman, we should perhaps order sandwiches again on Wednesday to give us a complete run — obviously, we might need to take the odd break for food. Otherwise, business will become backed up — the SDLP's submission may take a day and a half, and we will need time for ours. We do not want to leave ourselves with no time to clear up business before Thursday.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is everybody happy? Mr McNarry has arrived; that is nicely timed. This will be an instance of the pot calling the kettle black, and I know that we are totally wedded to our mobile phones, but please turn them off. If they are on silent mode, keep them well away from the mikes, otherwise the Hansard staff will complain.

Mr Kennedy: Chairman, can you tell us what, if anything, is available yet from Hansard?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We are expecting Tuesday's report today. It is not the normal sequence that you have in the Chamber, where you expect it to be in the pigeonholes for 11.00 the next morning. There is a 48-hour delay.

Are there any other procedural points before we resume questioning the Sinn Féin paper?

10.15 am

Dr McCrea: Who gets the Hansard report?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Committee.

Dr McCrea: Each Member of the Committee?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): A copy is available for each Member. At some stage a decision must be taken as to what we do with the Hansard report, but the minutes are entirely in-house and private. It will go only to the three official party nominees; then it is up to the parties if they want to distribute it to their substitutes.

Unless there are further procedural issues, we will resume questioning on the Sinn Féin paper. I understand that on adjournment yesterday Ian Paisley Jnr was questioning, and the DUP has indicated that it wishes to continue. Mr Morrow wants to take over where Mr Paisley left off. Presumably we are on the last round of questioning on that; everyone else has had their go.

Dr McCrea: Surely that is open. If it is similar to what happened before, it allows other groupings to intervene if they have questions.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes. There is nobody on the list, but if anybody wishes to draw that to my attention or that of the clerks, please let us know. The field is very much with the DUP delegation to finish off their questioning.

Mr Morrow: We turn to issues surrounding criminality. Does Sinn Féin believe that the IRA statement of July 2005 is an instruction to its members not to be involved in criminal activity?

Mr Murphy: The statement was a clear instruction to IRA members to be involved in no activities whatsoever. I presume that that covers every conceivable range of activities.

Mr Morrow: Including criminal activities?

Mr Murphy: That depends on whether you want to get into a debate about whether you consider the IRA to be a criminal, a political or a revolutionary organisation — that is a different debate — but the statement instructs its volunteers not to engage in any activity whatsoever.

Mr Morrow: Including criminal activity?

Mr Murphy: I refer you to my previous answer. You may consider the IRA to be a criminal organisation — I do not. However, the instructions are quite clear about all activities.

Mr Morrow: What is Sinn Féin's understanding of the term "criminality" or "criminal activity"?

Mr Murphy: It is hard to give a pat answer; there are many definitions of criminal activity. I tend to think that it is activity that is against the law and has no political motivation whatsoever but is merely intended for the self-gratification or benefit of the individual or individuals carrying out the activity.

Mr Morrow: Theft, robbery, extortion, smuggling, piracy, money laundering — would that be criminal activity?

Mr Murphy: If it was geared towards those ends, I would consider it so, yes.

Dr McCrea: What does that answer mean: "If it was geared towards"? What was the actual wording — "Theft, robbery, extortion, smuggling, piracy, money laundering" will be regarded as criminal activity only if they are geared towards personal gain? What kind of an answer is that from any democrat? Could we therefore have an explanation of what that means?

Mr Murphy: To answer William's question, there are Governments throughout the world, including the Government to which he gives allegiance, who engage in murder, intimidation and setting people up to be murdered and who engage with all sorts of unsavoury elements in order to pursue their own agendas. The Member may consider that to be criminal activity or he may not, because it happens to be carried out in the name of his Government — or any other Government in the world. Governments everywhere have killed, tortured, kidnapped and intimidated people and have robbed, bribed and bullied them. In my view, if activities such as that were carried out for the personal gain of the individuals involved, then I would consider it to be criminal activity.

Other groups may, in many people's views, have legitimate rights to wage campaigns against oppressive

Governments and engage in various means to do that. The Member might consider that criminal, but someone like myself might consider the activities of people that he gives allegiance to — the UDR, the RUC, the British Government and its agencies and armies here — to have engaged in widespread criminal activity against my community.

We can debate all that until the cows come home, but because the Member happens to consider himself a democrat, and because the Government have the legitimate powers of the state invested in them, any activity that they carry out cannot be considered as criminal — from the Member's point of view — but for those in my community on the receiving end of that activity, it is considered to be very criminal.

Dr McCrea: Once again it has to be recorded that that answer is no answer. The DUP specifically asked the question: does Sinn Féin regard theft, robbery, extortion, smuggling, piracy and money laundering as criminal activity? The answer was sidestepped, because the reply was, if it were for personal gain.

The IRA can carry out theft, robbery, extortion, smuggling, piracy and money laundering, but it is not criminal activity. Is that Sinn Féin's position?

Mr Murphy: I have outlined Sinn Féin's position. It might not be the answer that the Member wants, but he is not facing up to the fact that people that he has given allegiance to and associated with have been engaged in criminal activity against my community. If the Member has difficulty facing up to that, that is his view. I am clear about what, as a republican, I would have considered to be revolutionary activity and what I consider to be criminal activity, which is the pursuit for personal gain of any of those things that he outlined. Perhaps the Member has difficulty with that as he happens to thrive on righteousness, but the reality is that the people that he has associated with and the Government that he has given allegiance to and the agencies, armies and militias that he has lauded over the years have engaged in all of the activities that he outlined, and yet he defends their right to never be described as criminal.

There are a lot of grey areas in the conflict that we have emerged from, William, and if you want to get down to definitions of it, we can spend — and I am happy to spend — the next couple of weeks here talking about it. However, you will not get me to accept that the republican movement was a criminal organisation. Too many people died defending their right to be classified as political. The Governments recognised their classification as political when they were released under the terms of the Good Friday Agreement. That is my answer. It might not suit, and you might not like it, but that is the answer.

Dr McCrea: There is a significant point here, Mr Deputy Speaker. I hope that all the parties sitting round the table listened to that answer. The people that we are asked — or supposed to be asked — to put into Government do not believe that theft, robbery, extortion, smuggling, piracy and money laundering are wrong unless it is for personal gain. That is a serious indictment, and it is not a bit of wonder that I constantly state “Sinn Féin/IRA”, because that is the biggest indictment of any so-called political grouping that expects to go into Government. How, therefore, do they expect to be in charge of policing and justice, as they suggest, when they do not believe that any of those things are criminal activity, except it be for personal gain.

How could anyone at this table suggest that that political party, with its links to an organisation that it believes is in no way criminal — the party clearly stated that that organisation was not criminal in any way, shape or form — is fit for Government? Each delegation had better realise that, on the basis of that admission, that party is asking unionists to put those who believe in that kind of lifestyle into power. That is not a democratic lifestyle.

I will therefore ask the question again, but Sinn Féin will not answer. I am not answering questions; I answered questions for four and a half hours. Stop the evasion; stop playing around with words — Sinn Féin is good at that. However, the fact is that Mr McGuinness did not come back to answer any questions, yet he asked practically all the questions before. It speaks volumes that the leadership of that organisation is unable to be here, because it would feel uncomfortable answering some of those questions.

The fact that, even though it is Sinn Féin’s time to be questioned, there are only two members to answer questions shows the disdain and contempt in which they hold this process. In actual fact, it shows that it is not willing to answer the question, so I will ask it again: can any political party in Government — not across the world, but in Northern Ireland — accept that those who are involved in theft, robbery, extortion, smuggling, piracy and money laundering are not criminals? Can any political party accept that as a tenable position for Government?

Mr Murphy: I am not sure whether Mr McCrea’s question was directed at me or at all the political parties.

Dr McCrea: One group is being questioned but is not answering those questions; it is trying to evade the seriousness of this. If that group cannot say that the police should be supported and effectively engaged in bringing to justice those involved in theft, robbery, extortion, smuggling, piracy, money laundering — whether they be IRA or anyone else — and that it is proper for such persons be brought to justice and that those activities are criminal, irrespective of the organisation that carries them out or whether it is for personal gain, that group is certainly not fit for Government. I am asking a straightforward question.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Murphy, this is the fourth time that a question of this, or a similar, nature has been put by Mr McCrea. Can you deal with it one last time? We need to move to a different question.

Mr Murphy: I preface my answer with the same remarks I made to Ian Paisley Jnr yesterday, when William McCrea was not here. I note that there are only two members in the DUP delegation today, so we are perhaps treating each other with equal contempt.

The purpose of the DUP questions is not to elucidate, gather information on or address any of the issues about which it claims to be concerned. Rather, the DUP is trying to find further reasons and cobble together answers and bits of answers to further reinforce its members’ personal views and the party’s views and to attempt to reinforce the views of its community that it should not be doing business with Sinn Féin. That has not been the purpose of the other political parties, which have tried to tease out the issues in the parties’ papers and get some understanding of them in order to move this process forward.

Nonetheless, I will continue to answer. I refer William McCrea to my previous answer; I also refer him back to the IRA statement of last July, which instructed IRA volunteers not to engage in any activities whatsoever. I repeat my view that I do not consider the IRA to be a criminal organisation. I repeat my view that people with whom William has associated in the past — and, for all I know, with whom he may still be associated — in the various agencies of the British Army and British Government forces have been engaged in all sorts of activities that would not fall within the definition, as William would see it, of lawful activity.

10.30 am

So if we want to debate the idea of what has been criminal throughout the course of this conflict and what has not, then we can engage in that debate. That is my answer.

Dr McCrea: With the greatest respect, these are important questions. There is no confidence in the unionist community that Sinn Féin/IRA is fit for anything, and certainly Sinn Féin is not fit for Government. There is no confidence there. If it is trying to impress that community, and we are trying to elicit answers, it is on the record and will certainly tell that community whether Sinn Féin is fit for Government or not. I think it is an indictment of any political party that it does not regard those involved in theft, robbery, extortion, smuggling, piracy and money laundering as criminals. Therefore, I ask one other question: does Sinn Féin believe that the IRA or its members have been involved in any of those activities since last July?

Mr Morrow: Perhaps we should just say that Mr Murphy should not feel under any pressure if the answer is going to embarrass him.

Mr Murphy: You keep speaking behind your hand, and it is very hard to hear what you are saying.

Mr Morrow: I did not have my hand up when I spoke.

Mr Murphy: Go ahead.

Mr Morrow: What I am saying is to assist you. You should not feel under any pressure to answer the question if the answer is going to embarrass you. That is what I said.

Mr Murphy: OK. I can assure the future Lord Morrow that I have been interrogated for many days by many people more adept at their job than he, and I do not feel under any pressure whatsoever.

Dr McCrea: Here we go again.

Mr Murphy: The IRA instructions to the volunteers last July were very clear, and I believe that those instructions have held.

Dr McCrea: Is Sinn Féin saying to us that no member of the IRA has been involved in such activities since July, and that if anyone was, and was proved to have been, that would make him a criminal?

Mr Murphy: Anybody who disobeys the instructions of the IRA of last July, which was to involve himself in no activities whatsoever, moves himself clearly outside the terms of that organisation.

Dr McCrea: Would that make him a criminal?

Mr Murphy: Well, it depends on the activity that you happen to suggest. You are into the realms of speculation and hypothetical situations. If a member of the DUP was engaged in a sexual assault on a council worker, would that make him a criminal? It possibly would, but we are into all sorts of hypothetical situations here. If anyone disobeys the IRA instructions of last year, he moves himself outside the terms of that organisation and will no longer benefit from any political direction that that organisation is giving.

Dr McCrea: Let me give an example: the vodka heist in the Republic of Ireland. If it is found to be that the people who were involved in that heist were members of the Provisional IRA, would Sinn Féin accept that they are criminals?

Mr Murphy: Which heist was this?

Dr McCrea: The vodka heist. It is well known in the Irish Republic. Certainly it was well reported. Of course, again, if you do not want to answer, you can say that you do not know anything about these things. I suppose you did not know anything yesterday. I am sorry that a death prevented me from being present for that part. I suppose there was no knowledge of “Slab” Murphy or anything else, but let us keep to the vodka heist in the Republic. If the persons involved are found to be members of the Provisional IRA, will Sinn Féin now accept that they are criminals?

Mr Murphy: If that activity was carried out since last July, the persons involved were not acting on behalf of any organisation. They were therefore acting on their own behalf, and therefore they were engaged in criminal activity.

Dr McCrea: Are they criminals?

Mr Murphy: I am surprised that you have difficulty understanding. If the action that you are talking about took place since last July, the people involved were not acting on behalf of the IRA. Therefore they were engaged in criminal activity. Is that clear for you?

Mr Morrow: If they had been acting on behalf of the IRA, would that not have been criminal?

Mr Murphy: They would not have been acting on behalf of the IRA if it took place after last July.

Mr Morrow: Can we move on to the most recent Independent Monitoring Commission (IMC) report? It states that:

“there are indications that some members, including some senior ones, (as distinct from the organisation itself) are still involved in crime, including offences such as fuel laundering, money laundering, extortion, tax evasion and smuggling.”

Do you believe that the IMC got it totally wrong?

Mr Murphy: I have already answered the question on the general nature of the IMC about four times. I have no confidence at all in the IMC and its membership, in the way that it gathers its information, or in the standards of evidence on which it relies to produce that information.

The entire IMC — how it produces reports and who it takes its intelligence from — is completely tainted. I am currently challenging all of that in the courts.

If the IMC report refers to any activity that was carried out by individuals after July of last year, that activity was not done on behalf of the IRA. It would therefore fall outside the terms of that organisation.

Mr Morrow: Setting aside your own personal views about the IMC —

Mr Murphy: When I am asked to comment on something that the IMC has produced, it is very hard to set aside my views on its members and their backgrounds, on the way in which they gather their evidence, on the people who give them that evidence, and on the standards on which they rely to reproduce that evidence.

Mr Morrow: Very often there are organisations, groups and political parties in whom I do not have a lot of confidence. That does not mean that every utterance they make is wrong. Do you accept that?

Mr Murphy: That may well be the case for you; you are expressing your own personal view. I am expressing a general view about an organisation that carries its own political baggage into all of this. It gathers evidence from sources that are highly suspect, and it reproduces that evidence. It has accepted, in conversations with our legal people, that it applies no normal standards of evidence to any of the information that it gathers, and yet it reproduces that information as fact. Under those conditions, it is very difficult to treat any of the IMC's utterances with any degree of seriousness at all.

Mr Morrow: Mr Deputy Speaker, to get this clear: all utterances from the IMC, as far as Mr Murphy is concerned, are at best suspect, and most likely illogical or wrong.

Mr Murphy: They are certainly tainted, and that makes it very difficult to differentiate between what might be correct and what might be incorrect.

Mr Morrow: Why would they be tainted or wrong, in your opinion?

Mr Murphy: I have just outlined that. The nature of the people involved means that it is not independent. The means by which it gathers evidence and the sources from which it gathers that evidence, and the evidential standards of proof that it applies, all make the reports tainted.

Mr Morrow: Suppose that the IMC was — by accident or by chance — right, would the people mentioned in its reports be criminals? In your estimation, the IMC never gets it right, but what if, for some unknown reason, it got it right for once?

Mr Murphy: I am not saying that it never gets it right; I am saying that its reports are tainted. If anyone is found to have engaged in any activity after July last year, they fall outside the terms of the IRA. They are not engaged in any activity on behalf of the IRA, and, therefore, they enjoy no protection from the political nature of that organisation.

Mr Morrow: I know that you have no confidence in the IMC, and you think that it is all a conspiracy theory. I was a bit surprised that you did not go on to claim that the securocrats were up to their necks in it, because that is the usual theme. However, in its February report, the IMC stated that:

“members and former members of PIRA continue to be heavily involved in serious organised crime, including counterfeiting and the smuggling of fuel and tobacco.”

I have listened to what you have said. Are you saying that the IMC is wrong on that matter as well?

Mr Murphy: I will repeat the answer, lest you have difficulty in understanding me.

Mr Morrow: Perhaps you could shorten it this time.

Mr Murphy: Let me repeat it to you.

Mr Morrow: Yes or no.

Mr Murphy: Let me repeat it to you again. When such a body, with all of the flaws that I have outlined, gathers evidence on the basis that it has and produces a report, you can only consider that report to be tainted. Therefore to try to differentiate in that report between what may be true or not, or between what may be accurate or not, is a fairly moot exercise because the report, the way that the evidence is gathered, and the way that the evidence is produced and relied upon is entirely tainted. Therefore it is difficult to distinguish what in the report is accurate and what is not.

Mr Morrow: A shortened version of what you are saying is no.

Mr Murphy: I am saying that we cannot rely on IMC reports. I suspect that the day will come, possibly in the near future, when the DUP will no longer rely on IMC reports.

Mr Morrow: Hold on. I do not know why we have to keep reminding you that the DUP is not in the dock today. We were in it the other day; you had your chance then.

Mr Murphy: I do not consider myself to be in the dock. However, that choice of word is an interesting revelation of how you see this process: we are supposed to be analysing one another's position papers and asking one another to explain them. That you consider this a judicial process says a great deal about your attitude towards the Committee.

Mr Morrow: If you were more precise in your answers, less analysing would be needed.

Dr McCrea: Sinn Féin says that we cannot believe anything that the IMC says because the IMC is tainted. Therefore when the IMC says that a significant amount of IRA weapons was decommissioned, we cannot believe it.

Mr Murphy: With due respect to the Reverend McCrea, there is an organisation that all the parties around this table, apart from the DUP, agreed would rule on decommissioning. All parties and the Governments agreed to it. That organisation agreed that the weapons of the IRA have been dealt with to its satisfaction. The two Governments have accepted that the weapons have been dealt with.

Dr McCrea: I —

Mr Murphy: Please let me finish. The IMC had no part to play in the process of decommissioning; it was not involved in the weapons issue at all. Therefore, as with all its other findings, there is little credibility in anything that it has to say on the issue.

Dr McCrea: Let us take that a step further. Most people in this room would accept the IMC as a credible organisation; the two Governments have stated that they believe it to be a credible organisation; and the American Government have stated that it is a credible organisation. Only Sinn Féin does not believe the IMC to be a credible organisation. It expects us to believe that decommissioning has happened because it tells us so — as if the information had come down from on high. Sinn Féin believes that because it dismisses the IMC's credibility, everyone must do the same. However, when a body, such as the Independent International Commission on Decommissioning (IICD), gives credence to what Sinn Féin says, Sinn Féin expects us to believe it.

Accepting the premise on which Sinn Féin is building its argument, would it not be right for the DUP to be suspicious of an organisation that Sinn Féin and the IRA believe to be credible?

Mr Murphy: That is a matter for yourself. You are here to ask me questions, not to offer your own point of view. May I make a prediction: in the future, the DUP will have difficulties with IMC reports, and then it will fall back on its old ploy of consulting its information sources in the PSNI to sustain its objections to going into Government with the rest of us. I would be very careful if I were you, William, of basing too much on the IMC. I predict that, probably in the near future but certainly in the middle future, you will be at odds with IMC reports.

Dr McCrea: With the greatest respect, the DUP has never tied itself to the IMC. The IMC is one of the information bases on which we, and the unionist community, will make our judgement. We do not believe that the IMC speaks out of badness or vindictiveness; we believe that it gives us an honest assessment of matters. We have other sources of information on which to make a judgement, as does the unionist community. We will not be embarrassed by an IMC report, nor will we bow in submission to it. What we will not accept, however, is the Government pretending that the IMC says that all is well when the IMC reports say that all is not well.

Mr Murphy: I am glad that we can find agreement on that.

Mr Kennedy: Mr Murphy, you indicated your fairly unhealthy view of the IMC; you describe it as tainted. Are its views on the IRA and republicans alone tainted, or are its views on loyalist paramilitaries tainted as well?

10.45 am

Mr Murphy: I am glad that the DUP now shares some of our reservations about the IMC. As I said in my answer to Maurice Morrow, when the people involved — given their lack of independence, their standards of proof and the sources on which they rely — publish a report that they stand over as fact, it is very hard to pick out what may or may not be accurate. We do not rely on IMC reports for any proof on any organisation, whether the IRA or any other organisation or individuals.

Mr Kennedy: For the avoidance of doubt, do you regard the IMC's reports on loyalist activity as tainted?

Mr Murphy: We regard all of the IMC reports and all of their content as tainted. Therefore we are unable to distinguish what might be accurate or not.

Mr Morrow: Can we ask Sinn Féin whether, to the best of its knowledge, the IRA has ever made a statement that later turned out to be untrue?

Mr Murphy: That is probably correct; yes.

Mr Morrow: So you are saying yes?

Mr Murphy: Yes, I am sure that that has happened.

Mr Morrow: Do any instances come to mind?

Mr Murphy: Not off the top of my head, but I know of certain instances —

Mr Morrow: What about any other part of your anatomy?

Mr Murphy: You are the one asking the questions. If you want to ask a question about a specific IRA statement, ask a question about that statement. I know that, on occasions in the past, the IRA has issued statements, followed by further statements with additional evidence, correcting what it previously said. That has happened on a number of occasions. If you have a specific incident in mind, perhaps you would care to put the question.

Mr Morrow: Since you cannot remember a specific one —

Mr Murphy: I can remember plenty of them, but do you want me to list them? If you have a specific one in mind, perhaps you could —

Mr Morrow: No. I asked whether you could remember any, and you said that, off the top of your head, you could not.

Mr Murphy: I can, yes. I said that there had been a number of occasions, and I can remember them.

Mr Morrow: Would a bank robbery carried out on 26 July by IRA members be a crime?

Mr Murphy: If it was after the IRA statement was issued — I cannot recall the date — yes, I would answer in the same way that I did earlier: it would be outside the terms of that organisation.

Mr Morrow: So if it happened after the IRA statement, it is a crime, but if it happened before the IRA statement, it is not a crime. Is that what you are saying?

Mr Murphy: Well, let me explain it for you again. The IRA issued an instruction from the head of the organisation to all of its volunteers.

Mr Morrow: Sorry; say that again.

Mr Murphy: The IRA issued an instruction from the head of the organisation to all of its volunteers not to engage in any activity whatsoever. That is the current order under which it operates. If anyone breaks that order, they will no longer enjoy the political benefits of belonging to that organisation. Therefore anyone in that situation would fall outside the terms of the organisation, and any activities in which they engage would be for their own purpose.

Mr Morrow: Just so that I get it clear, a bank robbery carried out after 26 July by IRA members would be a crime?

Mr Murphy: I will repeat the answer to you again. If anyone engaged in any activity —

Mr Morrow: If you could indulge me —

Mr Murphy: I have been indulging you for some time.

Mr Morrow: That is fair enough, and I hope that you can condescend. Would a bank robbery carried out after 26 July by IRA members be a crime, and would a bank robbery carried out before 26 July by the IRA be a crime, in your opinion? I am asking it that way.

Mr Murphy: If the IRA engaged in any activities before it issued that instruction, I would not consider that to be a crime, no.

Mr Morrow: Right. So the IRA is the sole arbiter of when a crime is a crime?

Mr Murphy: I am giving you my opinion on that.

Dr McCrea: If a political party that wants to ascend to positions in an Executive states that if the IRA says that it is all right, then it is all right? If the IRA — not society, not the courts, not anyone else — says that it is all right, then it is all right? Mr Murphy has said that it is not a crime if the IRA says that it was done in its name, but if it was not done in its name, without its authority, it is a crime.

Mr Deputy Speaker, does Sinn Féin really accept the IRA being the arbiter of, and authority on, what does and does not constitute a crime as a tenable position in any democracy? Mr Murphy must come clean. Those statements are on the record. There should be no pious words from other political parties to try to cover up what he meant or did not mean. I am sure that Martin McGuinness and Gerry Adams will regret sending him to this Committee to answer questions because Sinn Féin is digging a bigger hole than ever before. If we had forgotten our doubts about Sinn Féin's acceptability to be in Government before this questioning, I can assure you that the record of this meeting will guarantee that that party is totally unacceptable.

I am asking a straightforward question. The IRA states that if something is done without its authority, it is considered a crime. That is what you said, Mr Murphy. If the IRA states that something is done with its authority, it is not considered a crime. Does Sinn Féin believe that that is an acceptable position in any democracy?

Mr Murphy: We do not live in a normal or acceptable democracy. This state to which you hold an allegiance has never been a normal or acceptable democracy. There have been times when you, your followers and your party have challenged the authority of this state. There have been times when you have organised people, in a military fashion, to challenge and threaten the authority of the state. As recently as last summer, your party leader threatened that a spark would be lit that would cause a conflagration and threaten the authority of the Parades Commission, which, whether you like it or not, is a lawful authority of the state.

You are no stranger, William, to threatening and challenging the authority of the state or to forming organisations that have made threats. Those organisations have imported weapons illegally and still hold them; those weapons have never been dealt with under the terms of the Good Friday Agreement or any other terms. You are no stranger to all of that. You cannot sit in a position of moral authority, as you try to do, and define what is, or is not, morally lawful under the terms of the state.

We are trying to emerge from conflict. We do not live in a normal democratic society. The reason that we have the Good Friday Agreement, with all its checks and balances, is a reflection on the fact that we do not live, and never have lived, in a normal democratic society. This society must change, and we are playing our part in trying to ensure that that happens. You are playing your part in trying to ensure that this society goes backwards. That is regrettable. Nonetheless, we will keep at our task to try to create a better future, and not the type of past that you wish to live in.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Kennedy has indicated that he wishes to enter the discussion.

Dr McCrea: I am certain that Mr Kennedy can come in.

When one realises the seriousness of this issue, Sinn Féin's answer is both pathetic and a joke. The Sinn Féin attitude towards a £20-million bank robbery, if it is carried out in the name of the IRA, is to say: "Bully for you, boys. You can have your pension funds; you can have whatever you like, but it is all right."

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr O'Dowd has indicated that he wants to come in on the same point.

Mr Kennedy: During exchanges in the past few minutes, Mr Murphy used a certain phrase on two occasions. If an incident occurred after the publication of the July 2005 IRA statement, Sinn Féin would regard it as criminal activity, and members would no longer enjoy the "political benefits" — I hope that I am quoting him accurately. He has used that phrase — "political benefits" — twice, and it is an interesting phrase. Will Mr Murphy outline the political benefits of, presumably, IRA membership?

Mr Murphy: People involved in IRA activity over the past 30 years, who were arrested for that activity and claimed to be part of that organisation, were considered, at various stages by the Governments of the North and the South, and certainly by the community from which they came, to be political prisoners. People engaged in activity outside the terms of the IRA do not enjoy any of those benefits.

Mr Kennedy: Are you saying that it is political in a broader sense, rather than in the sense of being peculiar to Sinn Féin?

Mr Murphy: It is political in the broad sense in that people have been categorised, classified and released as political prisoners. If they were part of that organisation, their own communities considered them political prisoners; if they were outside that organisation, they were not considered for any of those benefits.

Mr Kennedy: Are we wrong to assume that any political benefits that an IRA member would enjoy might not necessarily be linked to Sinn Féin?

Mr Murphy: No; none whatever.

Mr Kennedy: How else would they benefit politically?

Mr Murphy: I have just outlined how people benefit politically. That was not in reference to Sinn Féin; I was talking about the general situation with regard to how they are treated by both Governments and by their own communities.

Mr Kennedy: Are you also saying that it is neither possible nor desirable from your point of view that IRA membership be dualled with some form of political membership attached to your party?

Mr Murphy: Given that the IRA is a secret organisation, one would not know who its members are. Sinn Féin is an open political party whose members are paid up and registered. If I am given the lists, I know who the Sinn Féin members are in any given cumann. Therefore the question does not arise.

Mr Kennedy: Does that mean that you do not know any IRA members who are also in Sinn Féin? Is there no dual mandate as far as you are concerned?

Mr Murphy: Given that the IRA is a secret organisation, its membership is a secret.

Mr Kennedy: Are you not aware of dual mandate?

Mr Murphy: No.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Two procedural points have emerged. First, I would normally allow one question in interventions, but Mr Kennedy got five.

Mr Kennedy: You indulged me, Chairman.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Members should normally intervene immediately on a point that has arisen.

On a couple of occasions, Committee members have drifted on to issues that could lead them into difficulties. First, there was reference to a Mr Murphy. That is a south Armagh issue that the police and the Assets Recovery Agency (ARA) are investigating. Given those investigations, I would be grateful if members did not mention specific cases in future questions.

The police are investigating the bank robbery, and, indeed, there have been arrests. Therefore I would be grateful to Committee members if they spoke in general, rather than specific, terms about criminality and alleged incidents. That will keep us right.

Mr McNarry: I am not being picky, but are hundreds of unsolved cases not under investigation? How far do you want us to —

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There is no problem in mentioning cases in general terms, but if Committee members start to name specific individuals who are under investigation or specific cases that are before the courts, I will have to call them to order.

Mr McNarry: Before the courts?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): In so far as the Assets Recovery Agency is involved, those cases are quasi-judicial, but there have been arrests in the Northern Bank case. Therefore we cannot go into the specifics of those cases or even name them, in my opinion.

Mr McNarry: That is OK, but the Assets Recovery Agency is usually allowed to take over a case because no proceedings are being taken by the statutory agencies. As those cases are also quite well known, do you not want us to mention any of them?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Specifically no.

Mr McFarland: I understand that Mr Paisley Jnr trained in the law, and yesterday —

The Chairman (Mr Wells): No; he has a history degree.

Mr McFarland: Does he? Mr Paisley Jnr advised us yesterday that it was a problem when an issue was “before the courts” — I think that he used those words. It might be worth clarifying this with our own legal people. There is a difference between discussing cases that have been passed to the ARA because criminal conviction through the courts is no longer possible and talking about those cases that are before the courts. Clearly, if a case is before the courts there is a problem. My understanding is that if a case is not before the courts there may not be a problem. Could that be clarified?

11.00 am

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There is clear guidance on that in the current Standing Orders. Standing Order 25(c)(i) states:

“in the case of a criminal case in courts of law, including courts martial, from the moment the law is set in motion by a charge being made”.

That applies to the Northern Bank issue.

Standing Order 25(c)(ii) states:

“in the case of a civil case in courts of law, from the time that the case has been set down for trial or otherwise brought before the court, as for example by notice of motion for an injunction”.

I would interpret Standing Order 25(c)(i) as applying to the Northern Bank. The Murphy case would be covered by Standing Order 25(c)(ii).

Mr McNarry: I understand that, Mr Chairman. However, if we move from criminality into the annals of murder, where do the cold cases that are under scrutiny sit? In the meetings that I have attended, we have not talked about victims. It would be difficult to discuss victims without mentioning why they are victims and without referring to specific cases.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is a valid point, Mr McNarry, and a very understandable one. The ruling made in the Chamber by the previous Speaker was that, if there was any possibility of any individual case coming before the courts — and with the cold case review procedure, that is a possibility; indeed, cases have come before the courts as a result of that process — Members should exercise extreme caution. I do not wish to restrict Committee members. You are perfectly at liberty to mention global cases of Assets Recovery Agency work. However, if people refer to specific cases, I will have to call them to order. Equally, if they refer to cases that we know are before the courts, I will immediately call them to order. I raise that point because we are moving into territory where that will arise. I am not being difficult, but Standing Orders are very clear on this issue.

Mr Kennedy got away with it, but I will call people to order if they persist in going down the line of four or five additional questions. Mr O’Dowd has been waiting for a considerable period, so I will ask him to make his point, and then it is straight back to Mr McCrea and Mr Morrow.

Mr O’Dowd: My point is in answer to some of the questions that have been put to some of the Sinn Féin delegation in relation to criminality. The majority of the parties sitting around the table have at one time or another come into conflict with what is known as criminal law, which the state has established. During the civil rights period, the SDLP and Sinn Féin came into conflict with that. The UUP, down through history, and the DUP, through the history of the state, have come into conflict with criminal law. Indeed, Eileen Paisley and Rev Ian Paisley have both served jail terms. I have no doubt that those two individuals do not believe that they are criminals.

Mr Kennedy: Eileen was never in jail.

Mr O’Dowd: I think she was. If I am wrong, I am perfectly happy to correct that.

Mr Kennedy: She may have visited.

Mr O’Dowd: If I am historically inaccurate, I am happy to have that corrected. I would like to have that little bit of history checked.

I doubt that any of those individuals from the SDLP, the UUP or the DUP who ended up behind bars because they stood against authority — whether over the civil rights movement, the Anglo-Irish Agreement or the street protests that took place around Drumcree for a number of years — believe themselves to be criminals. They believed that their political convictions forced them into a conflict that in any other circumstances they would never have come into, and they ended up in front of a judge or behind bars or in police custody. They are still out there, as political people, serving their communities. They do not see their past as criminal; they were forced into a position; they had no choice. We can all tic-tac back and forth across this table about criminality — it will get us nowhere.

I find the unionist approach to criminality very interesting. I take on board the Chairman’s point about not mentioning individual cases, otherwise I could go on all day.

The vast majority of cases with which the Assets Recovery Agency is dealing are happening in loyalist areas. Seventy-five per cent of the assets recovered by the Assets Recovery Agency have come from loyalist Protestant unionist areas. Even with our concerns about what the agency is about and some of the political manipulation that goes on within it — even with all that weight on its shoulders — when its officers go looking for criminal activity, they find it in unionist Protestant loyalist areas represented by the people across the table.

Yesterday I used the example of Ballymena, a town which is plagued by the abuse of hard drugs peddled not by republicans, but by unionist paramilitaries. The council is controlled by the DUP, at Assembly level the area is controlled by the DUP, and there is a DUP MP, yet all that criminality continues. When I hear unionist politicians complaining about criminality and saying that republicans must do something about it, I want to see what is being done in unionist areas. If they can give us the model of how you end criminality, we will be happy to examine it and see if we can learn from it.

However, if we are going to continue debating criminality all day, we will not get the chance to debate the future. That is what the Preparation for Government Committee is about. It is about debating the future. Conor and I are happy to sit here for the next four or five days answering silly questions, but we will miss the opportunity to talk about creating a new future.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr O'Dowd, I will have to make another procedural point. I did not detect a question —

Mr O'Dowd: With respect, Mr Chairman, I am answering questions. The DUP has already told us that we have no right to ask questions.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): You are all experienced individuals. All you have to say is: "Is it not the case that ...", and away you go. We have had a series of speeches here. Equally, while Mr Kennedy accepted five points, people who continuously try to string five points into one intervention will also be brought to book.

Mr Morrow: I take great exception — although I think it is par for the course — to anything we ask being "silly questions". It is a bit like when unionists go out to celebrate their culture. We are castigated for it. Nationalists are allowed to celebrate their culture, but when unionists go out to do similar, it is a different mission.

Here we have it again from Sinn Féin Members: the DUP is coming up with "silly questions". That is the contempt in which they hold those opposite them.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I am content that all the questions that have been asked have been entirely in order.

Mr O'Dowd: I can assure the delegates across the table that I do not hold them in contempt, if that clarifies the position for them.

Dr McCrea: There is a vast difference, and surely Sinn Féin sees that. We did not ask about any of those other things. We asked directly about crime. It is not about a person going out and standing in the middle of the road or having a genuine conviction. We are asking about criminal activity: fuel laundering, money laundering, extortion, piracy, smuggling. All of those things are deliberate crimes in any civilised society. What we were told in answer was that if the IRA sanctioned it, it was not a crime, but if the IRA did not sanction it, it was a crime.

Let me put something on the record. I know of no elected representative who thinks that drugs in Ballymena, Newry, Londonderry, Magherafelt or any part of the Province are acceptable or any grouping is acceptable, whether it is done by a paramilitary organisation or not. In fact we have demanded that the police tackle this issue and find the guilty persons, as in my constituency where people were caught with £3 million of drugs at the airport yesterday. That is to be condemned unreservedly. It is criminal activity.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Please come to your question, Mr McCrea.

Dr McCrea: I have to put it like that because it is so important. Here is a direct question: does Sinn Féin believe that anything the IRA did during the troubles was a crime?

Mr Murphy: The IRA engaged in a lot of illegal activity during the conflict. If you want me to say that I believe that the IRA was a criminal organisation, clearly, I will not say that. It is clear that the IRA, and individuals within it who were in prison, went to extraordinary lengths to prove to world that it was not a criminal organisation, but a highly politically motivated organisation. Perhaps the DUP does not accept that. I will not sit here, regardless of what questions you ask — you may ask me any question that you like — and state that the IRA was a criminal organisation.

Dr McCrea: So the murder of a mother, because she was looked upon as a British agent, was not a crime? Is Sinn Féin saying that when the IRA murdered a mother and hid her body, it was not a crime?

Mr Murphy: I am saying that the IRA was not a criminal organisation.

Dr McCrea: Was it a crime?

Mr Murphy: I am not getting into individual cases on the advice —

Dr McCrea: No. The Chairman, with the greatest respect, spoke about cases that could come before the courts. Was the murder of a mother a crime? I did not identify the mother. Quite honestly, I could identify individuals — make no mistake about it. I have waited for more than 30 years to hear anything about two of my loved ones, who were 16 and 21 years of age when they were blasted to bits by the IRA. Was that a crime? Who killed them?

Let me keep to the subject of the mother, who was perceived to be friendly towards the security forces. If the IRA murder her and hide her body, is that a crime?

Mr Murphy: I do not know the specific case, but I tell you now that the IRA was not a criminal organisation.

Dr McCrea: So it was not a crime?

Mr Murphy: You can beat your chest about victims, William, but I could bring you lists and lists —

Dr McCrea: Was it a crime?

Mr Murphy: Mr Chairman, am I allowed to answer a question?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes.

Mr Murphy: You can beat your chest about victims, but there are victims on all sides. You try to create a hierarchy of victims within which the people for whom you feel emotionally are somehow at the top, and people on the republican side are somehow not to be considered victims. I can assure you of the pain of people who were shot by members of the forces to which you give allegiance. Those people were murdered, set up to be murdered, and their details were passed on to other illegal organisations to carry out those murders. Their pain is the same as the people for whom you feel pain.

There were a lot of activities and a lot of hurt caused by all sides. I acknowledge that the IRA carried out brutal activity and that it hurt people. Sinn Féin is trying to find a better way out of all that. If you want to revisit the past on every occasion, that is fine. We will discuss it for as long as you like. There was hurt on every side. There are victims who feel as bad on the republican side as those on your side. At the end of the day, the suffering is exactly the same. People who visited that pain on them engaged in the same sort of killing that causes you a problem.

Mr McNarry: You have acknowledged, Conor, the IRA's activity and the hurt that it caused. Accepting that no one should have a monopoly on victimhood, can you tell me how you intend to specifically address the hurt caused to victims of IRA activity? I ask that your answer is not about other activity. Specifically on IRA activity, how does Sinn Féin intend to address the hurt inside my community, particularly that caused by murder?

Mr Murphy: The best way to try to address that is through open engagement and honest discussion. Sinn Féin has published a number of papers about truth and truth recovery processes and is quite happy to debate that issue. That involves the IRA as much as all the other protagonists in the conflict. That is the best way forward.

There is no easy, one-solution-fits-all scenario, because I have met people on what you might like to classify as the nationalist side, and they have different expectations and desires for the outcome of any process to address their pain. Some want convictions, some want acknowledgement, and there is a range of options in between. There is no particular solution for any particular community, but the best way to try to deal with that is through an open and honest engagement, through dialogue and through some form of truth and reconciliation process to which everyone can subscribe. We have published papers on that, and we are open and willing to discuss them with anyone who is genuinely interested in discussing them with us.

11.15 am

Mr McNarry: Do you see part of that encouraging the IRA to make a statement regarding the hurt that it has caused?

Mr Murphy: The IRA has already made a statement on that, and that has found a degree of hearing in some quarters, but in many other quarters it has probably found no degree of hearing whatsoever.

Mr McNarry: Because it was insufficient.

Mr Murphy: Well, it begs the question as to what sort of words or deeds or gestures from the IRA would be sufficient — rather than people stumbling forward with what they think is sufficient to do the trick — because this thing will not be resolved by any easy gesture or statement from anyone. There is too much hurt in this community for it to be resolved by that. It will not be resolved, but it will be dealt with and eased by genuine dialogue. For me to be prescriptive and say that if the IRA said A, B and C, the people who have been on the receiving end of its campaign would be satisfied would be naive.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We now go back to the DUP questioning.

Dr McCrea: Once again, we have to establish that the answers given are serious, that the illustration I use of its not being a crime to abduct a mother is a very serious situation.

Mr Morrow: Mr Deputy Speaker, did I pick Mr Murphy up correctly when he said that the IRA statement of last July was an instruction not to be involved in criminal activities?

Mr Murphy: It was not to be involved in any activities whatsoever. I am quoting the words of it. You and I may interpret it differently, and anyone who reads it may have a different interpretation. I do not have the statement to hand, but the actual words as I recall them were “not to be involved in any activity whatsoever.”

Dr McCrea: Criminal or otherwise?

Mr Murphy: Any activity is any activity.

Dr McCrea: You may have great difficulties with the second part of my question.

Mr Murphy: Let me hear it, and I will decide.

Dr McCrea: Do you accept that having possession of money, which was previously illegally obtained, is a crime?

Mr Murphy: If someone were in possession of something that was considered to be engaged in an activity, then it would be clearly contrary to the IRA’s instructions.

Dr McCrea: So, would it be a crime?

Mr Murphy: Well, however you view it.

Dr McCrea: I do not know where you are coming from here, because you are saying that the IRA is the sole judge of what is a crime. You said that previously.

Mr Murphy: No, we are talking about the outworkings of the IRA statement as I recall, and the IRA has instructed its volunteers not to engage in any activity whatsoever. If anyone breached that direction and became engaged in any activity, should that be in possession of something or engaged in some activity, he would clearly be in breach of that instruction and, therefore, would fall outside the terms of the IRA, as I understand it.

Dr McCrea: Let us assume that that is the case. Would you then urge anyone who had possession or knew of such funds or money or information to give that to the authorities either North or South?

Mr Murphy: I am not aware of anyone who has possession of such things.

Dr McCrea: I am not saying that you are aware of anyone — I am saying if you were.

Mr Murphy: It is a hypothetical question. I would not urge anyone to engage on this side of the border with an organisation in which I have no confidence and with which I would not engage. I would not urge anyone to do anything that I would not do. I am not aware if there are any materials, because, as far as I am concerned, the materials have been dealt with under Gen de Chastelain’s remit. I am not aware of any of the suggestions that you make, and you are back again into the realms of a hypothetical situation, but I would not encourage anyone to give information to any organisation in which I have confidence.

Dr McCrea: Would you see any conflict or difficulty in a political party being in Government that took that stance? We want to be in Government, we must be in Government, but we are not co-operating with the authorities of law and order while we are in this Government — do you see any difficulties with that?

Mr Murphy: We were in Government when we had that stance.

Mr Morrow: We are talking about the future, not the past.

Mr Murphy: I am not quite sure of the time factor, but the SDLP may well have been in Government before it endorsed the current policing arrangements.

As we said yesterday and over the past couple of days, we envisage a successful outcome on policing matters. We envisage that when the institutions are restored we will be well on the way to resolving the outstanding policing issues and to securing the transfer of policing and justice powers.

Had your party not regrettably scuppered the arrangements in 2004, we could have been beyond that point at this stage. However, that is history; we have to face what is happening now. Nevertheless, we envisage a successful outcome on outstanding policing matters. Therefore I anticipate that those matters will be resolved in a future Administration here.

Mr Morrow: My recollection, and the recollection of most parties that were at Leeds Castle, is that it was Sinn Féin members who walked away. We understood afterwards why they had to walk away — because there was a matter being planned at that time that would have been a serious embarrassment to them — if you could embarrass them.

Dr McCrea: Could we get this right, Mr Chairman? I believe that Sinn Féin Members said this morning that they were in Government while they did not support the police and that that was acceptable in their eyes. They are telling us that, even though policing has not been settled, it would still be acceptable for them to be in Government without supporting the due forces and processes of law and order. Is that a correct understanding of their position?

Mr Murphy: Can I remind William that he engaged with our Ministers when they were in Government and did not support what he considers to be the forces of law and order? There are outstanding matters in relation to policing and justice. We intend to have those resolved; we do not envisage being in Government without those matters being resolved. Our intention is to try to see that happen.

We were in Government at a time when we still could not endorse the policing arrangements as they pertained here and when Patten had still not been fully delivered on. Although DUP Ministers might not have sat in the Executive, they were in the same Government that we were in. DUP Members in the Chamber interacted with our Government Ministers in the way other Members in the Chamber interacted with them. It was not a problem for them then; I wonder why it has become one now.

Dr McCrea: I am rather confused by this, Mr Chairman, because we have been constantly told — and I think it will be in the record — that the problem with the DUP over the years is that we have not engaged with Sinn Féin; now we are told that we did engage with them. Talk about a muddled mind! However, I suppose that that is as confusing a process as would be appropriate for Sinn Féin/IRA, which does not know whether it is a party or what it is.

Let us take this a step further. Are Sinn Féin Members telling this Committee that they would not instruct their members to call the PSNI if their house was burgled?

Mr Murphy: We do not issue instructions to our members about house burglaries. However, if I were asked to give advice to a party member whose house had been burgled, and if they wished to claim insurance for items burgled from their house or for damage that had been done to their house, I would say that they had no alternative but to report the issue to the PSNI. If I were asked —

Dr McCrea: Oh —

Mr Murphy: May I answer the question without interruption? If I were asked whether I would give information to the PSNI that I did not have to give for insurance purposes, I would answer that, as I do not have confidence in that organisation, I would not give the information. I would not ask anyone to do that which I would not do myself.

Dr McCrea: Therefore it depends on monetary gain. If monetary gain is at issue, you use the police; if not, you abuse them.

Mr Murphy: There is an old saying about unionists: they have often been more loyal to the half-crown than to the Crown; that cap fits both ways.

Mr Morrow: That is rubbish.

Dr McCrea: With the greatest respect, as a party and a group that has drawn more from the public purse than most, Sinn Féin might not be loyal to the Queen, but it certainly loves her head on a £20 note.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr O'Dowd has indicated that he wants to make a brief point.

Mr O'Dowd: Perhaps the DUP could help us in our deliberations on policing.

What quantifies unqualified support for the police or policing arrangements? During the riots in Belfast last September, 150 high velocity rounds were fired at the PSNI and the British Army, and dozens upon dozens of bombs were thrown at them. Hundreds of officers were injured and millions of pounds' worth of damage was caused across unionist areas of Belfast. After that the DUP, under the instructions of the North and West Belfast Parades Forum, which contains members of the illegal UVF and the illegal UDA, left a district policing partnership. What is unqualified support for the police? What does that mean?

Dr McCrea: As one who is not answering questions today; perhaps I will ask another question. I noticed "the illegal UVF" and "the illegal UDA". Will Sinn Féin now tell us, clearly and without equivocation: is the IRA an illegal organisation?

Mr Murphy: Yes, of course, it is; it always has been. The problem is that you did not have the same degree of concern when the UDA for many years was not an illegal organisation. I never heard of you calling for it to be specified. The IRA has always been an illegal organisation; I have no difficulty with that or with describing it as such. Your query, and the previous 20 or 30 questions, were around whether you considered the IRA was a criminal organisation, which was a different matter.

Dr McCrea: I say that the histories of the two go together, but nevertheless, Sinn Féin says that it does not recognise the police and that it will give no information to the police. Why then do some of its representatives shake hands with the police?

Mr Murphy: I am not aware of any representatives who shake hands with the police.

Dr McCrea: Why then did the chairman of Magherafelt District Council shake hands with a divisional commander of the police?

Mr Murphy: That is a matter for himself. I do not recognise the British Government's authority in this part of their jurisdiction, but I have shaken hands with Tony Blair on many occasions.

Dr McCrea: So you do not recognise British authority. Who does Sinn Féin recognise? It does not recognise the DUP; the other day Martin McGuinness practically told us that it was a horrendous experience to be in the same room as the DUP. So who has the right to exist, other than itself?

Mr Murphy: I assure you, William, that you have a right to exist, and I would be very happy to shake your hand at any time.

Dr McCrea: I can assure you that, as far as the answers that have been given today are concerned, that is certainly a long way off. Nothing that has been said here today shows that Sinn Féin is worthy for Government or any other position.

Those are the usual platitudes of Sinn Féin, and others may be beguiled by them, but I assure you that the DUP will not be beguiled by any of its pious words. As I pointed out the other day, as a bit of a public exercise it proposed Dr Paisley, whom it has gutted and condemned all these years — and still does — for First Minister. It certainly stuck in its throat; nevertheless none of us fell for that disguise either.

At the last exchange on Friday, the mask fell as regards what it really thought when it came to Mr McGuinness and some of the rest of us.

Setting aside Sinn Féin and the IRA, does Sinn Féin, as a matter of principle, believe that it is reasonable that to be in Government a political party should not be inextricably linked to a paramilitary or criminal organisation such as the IRA? I ask Sinn Féin to answer the question it is asked.

Mr Murphy: I do not consider the IRA to be a criminal organisation; therefore the question has no validity. We have reservations about those with whom we share Government — including yourself, your past, your own activities and associations, the organisations which you have helped to found and the misery which they have visited on members of my community. Nonetheless, we base people's entitlement to be in Government on the mandate they receive from the electorate.

You have received a substantial mandate and we have received a substantial mandate. We recognise and respect your mandate and we only ask that you do the same for ours. We ask that you do not treat the people who vote for Sinn Féin as, somehow, second-class to those who vote for you or any of the other political parties of which you approve. Democracy is not about accepting the voters that you approve of and who meet your standards: democracy is about people having equal rights under the ballot box.

People vote for us and, therefore, we are entitled to be in the Government under the terms of the Good Friday Agreement and under the d'Hondt mechanism, on which we base our entitlement to Government.

We have serious reservations and confidence issues around the DUP and its attitude to the people who vote for us. That was reflected in your previous answer that the community that we represent was more inclined to get public money — as if they were all dole spongers or something like that. That racist attitude permeates the DUP, and we have serious reservations about all of that.

Nonetheless, your mandate entitles you to be in Government and our mandate entitles us to be in Government. It entitles the UUP and the SDLP to be in Government, and we respect that. We operate on that basis.

11.30 am

Mr Morrow: It was Mr Murphy who said that unionists were more loyal to the half-crown than to the Crown. The inference was first of all directed at us.

Mr Murphy: It was in response to the Rev William McCrea saying that we were interested in monetary gain, and I was making a remark that has often been the broad view of the nationalist community. However, the remark that our community were more likely to be in receipt of public moneys is a somewhat racist view; that somehow people in the nationalist community were more likely to be in receipt of benefits and somehow less of a person or a lower standard of community than the community that you represent. That racist view has permeated the thinking and utterances of the DUP since its existence.

Mr Morrow: Is Mr Murphy saying that his remark about my community being more loyal to the half-crown was not racist?

Mr Murphy: No, I do not think that it was racist.

Dr McCrea: No, No. Can I say, Mr Deputy Speaker —

The Chairperson (Mr Wells): Mrs Long has —

Dr McCrea: There is something that I must say before lunch and then I am happy to give way to Mrs Long. I want to put something on the record. There is a certain amount of malice in the answers given because they are personally directed at me — “you, you, you”. I make it abundantly clear that I have never been a member of any illegal organisation — never a member of any illegal organisation. The charge that has been laid against me is one of deliberate malice.

However, I ask a direct question of Mr Murphy, through you, Mr Deputy Speaker: was Mr Murphy ever a member of the Provisional IRA?

Mr Murphy: Yes, I was. When I refer to you, Mr McCrea, you are here representing your party, the DUP —

Dr McCrea: There were times that it was deliberately —

Mr Murphy: Can I finish my response?

You are here representing your party, and there are people who you have associated with who have heaped misery on the nationalist community — particularly the community that John O'Dowd represents. People who you have publicly associated with have heaped misery. It does apply to you personally, but it also applies in a general terms to your party and to the people that you have associated with, the groups that you have helped bring into existence, the weapons that they have brought into this country, and the people that have been killed as a result of those weapons.

If the cap fits, either personally or collectively, then that is a matter for yourself.

Dr McCrea: That is deliberate malice, Mr Deputy Speaker, because the only time that I ever was associated with, or stood on a platform, was at a time when a person was condemned to death and to be murdered for their political beliefs. I did on that occasion, and I do so again, unreservedly condemn the murder of anyone by either the individual person, Billy Wright, or others associated with him.

Therefore, I direct one further question in return. Does Mr Murphy unreservedly condemn the IRA murders of the likes of Robert and Rachel McLernon? Not a hierarchy or anything, but does he unreservedly condemn the IRA murders of the last 30 years?

Mr Murphy: I am not in the business of condemning —

Dr McCrea: Stop equivocating. Do you condemn those murders or not? I have unreservedly condemned murders of members of the Roman Catholic population and the Protestant community. I ask whether you unreservedly condemn the IRA murders. That is a direct question.

Mr Murphy: And I will give you a direct answer. I am not in the business of condemning the IRA; I never have done, and I will not do so now.

Dr McCrea: That says more about —

Mr Murphy: To finish my answer, regardless of your own personal attempt to get out of your association with Billy Wright, your appearance —

Dr McCrea: I have no association whatsoever with Billy Wright.

Mr Murphy: Your appearance on a platform with Billy Wright gave great comfort to him and his organisation; it sent a very strong message to the community —

Dr McCrea: That nobody should be condemned to death for their political beliefs.

Mr Murphy: Can I finish my answer, Mr Speaker? I did not interrupt Mr McCrea.

Your appearance with Billy Wright gave comfort to him and to the organisation of which he was head at the time — an organisation that was murdering not only Catholic people, but also Protestant people in that area. To the community that I represent, your appearance gave a very strong indication of your views.

Dr McCrea: The pious belief of a person who will not condemn any murder shows that they have given succour to the IRA, of which Mr Murphy has admitted membership. I also put on record that the IRA murdered more Roman Catholics in this country than so-called loyalist paramilitaries did.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mrs Long has been extremely patient, so I will let her speak and we can return to the DUP's questions.

Mrs Long: It is extremely unusual for Mrs Long to be patient. On this occasion, the debate has moved on, so I will let it proceed.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Can we try to conclude this particular strand of questioning and move on? We have been dealing with one area for quite a long time.

Mr Morrow: Mr Deputy Speaker, is Sinn Féin aware of anywhere in the world, which is a fairly big place, where a party in Government does not support the police force of that country?

Mr Murphy: I am not aware; I do not have that type of knowledge, but I must say that the DUP often begins, or sets in context, its questions by referring to "normal democracies". We do not live in a normal democracy. We are emerging from a situation where this statelet has always been contested, where the policing service has been used to uphold and protect the constitutional status quo and has been used to murder people, and set people up to be murdered, in my community. We are not in a normal society, so to compare it with any other country is a false comparison.

This is not a normal society. The policing service here was never a normal policing service. The fact that, under the terms of the Good Friday Agreement, policing had to change and there had to be a new beginning to policing acknowledged that there was never a normal policing service here. In our view, we have still not achieved a new beginning to policing. We are well on the way, but outstanding matters remain. I anticipate that we will achieve a new beginning for policing.

To make a comparison between here and anywhere else in the world, wherever you may be thinking of, it must be compared with some other abnormal democracy where policing was used for political purposes to repress one section of the community. If you point out such a society to me, I could perhaps make a valid comparison, but none springs to mind at the moment.

Mr Morrow: I did not prefix my question by referring to normal society. I simply asked a question. Mr Murphy, for reasons best known to himself, prefixed his answer with the term "normal democracy".

I ask Sinn Féin a question that Seán Farren asked of the DUP yesterday: when is enough enough?

You were asked a question yesterday by Ian Paisley Jnr in relation to the Belfast Agreement, and you said that it was to give everybody space; it was not the solution, because the Belfast Agreement was interpreted by some as a process — I suspect by you as well. For others it was a solution or it was a decision. When is enough enough? Is it only enough when you get your way and have a 32-county, all-Ireland republic? Is that enough? Is that what you call enough?

Mr Murphy: As a political party, we are entitled to strive for our objectives. That is the purpose of political parties. The DUP's political rationale or raison d'être is to maintain the Union, and that is a legitimate quest for the DUP. We have a legitimate quest, which is to strive for a united Ireland. We want an agreed Ireland; we want an Ireland in which all of the people of this country can agree to live together. That is our quest.

Should we stop doing that because the DUP does not want us to do it? Should we abandon the idea that we are Irish people? Should we abandon any aspirations that we have to create unity on this island? Should we agree with the notion that the political intervention of Britain in this country over the decades, never mind the centuries, has been good for the people of this island? Why would we abandon all that? That is our belief, and we are entitled to pursue that belief.

We are happy to work with you in this institution and to work with you on creating a better future despite our misgivings about your party and your track record and your intentions for the future. We are quite happy to engage and work for the betterment of all our people.

Enough is enough when people meet their aspirations. You have your aspirations. They are satisfied at the moment because you are constitutionally part of the United Kingdom, but we have an entitlement under the Good Friday Agreement, as has the SDLP, to pursue our aspirations democratically and politically, and that is what we intend to do. Why should we stop that? Would it give more comfort to the DUP if I were to sit here and lie and say that republicans have given up on the aspiration of a united Ireland, but we will achieve it by stealth? Would that give more comfort to unionism?

Unionists always value direct, blunt talking. They give the impression that they value direct talking, that you know exactly where you are coming from with no shilly-shallying about. Well, I will let you know where we are coming from: we want to create a united Ireland. We want to end the Union with Britain. We will devote all our political energies in a peaceful and democratic fashion to doing that. I will not give up on that until such times as I have no political energy left.

That is blunt and direct talking. Unionists, I am told, value blunt and direct talking. That is our aspiration, and Sinn Féin as an organisation and party right across this island, not just in the North, intends to pursue that aspiration with all of its vigour.

Mr Morrow: So, Mr Deputy Speaker, when Bertie Ahern says that, as far as he is concerned, the constitutional position is a settled one, Sinn Féin says that no matter what is settled before 24 November, that is very much an interim position, and Sinn Féin will continue until it has defined that "enough is enough". We now know that.

Mr Murphy: I have to profess some surprise that Maurice Morrow would feel, with all he knows about Sinn Féin, that somehow we would have settled for the constitutional position that we currently find ourselves in. If it is news to him now that Sinn Féin is pursuing a united Ireland and that we will use all our political energy to pursue a united Ireland, I wonder where he has been for the last while. That has always been our position, and, as far as I can see, it will always be our position until such times as we can reach that goal.

Our intention is to work with others to try to convince them of the merit of that goal, to try to work with people in the interim to provide in the best possible way that we can for the people whom we represent collectively in this room. That is our goal, and why that is surprising to you I am at a loss to understand because it has been stated often for as long as Sinn Féin has been a political organisation, and that is 101 years.

Mr Morrow: Mr Murphy may treat me as naive or as far below his standard of ability. That does not hurt me in the slightest.

My community has been on the receiving end of the paramilitary wing of your party. We are under no illusions whatsoever; there are too many tombstones out there that remind us of the capabilities and ruthlessness of your organisation.

If the IRA, tomorrow, instructed its members — contrary to its instructions to cease all activity — that, from a precise date, that instruction no longer stands, would you support it?

Mr Murphy: I and my party have made the argument that there is no longer any rationale for armed struggle. The IRA has accepted that argument, and I do not anticipate that it will change its mind.

We have argued quite clearly for the last period that there is no further rationale for armed struggle, and the IRA has accepted that. You are getting into the realms of a hypothetical situation, but I can assure you that, from my understanding of my community and of republicanism, the war is over. The armed struggle is over. The IRA has said that clearly. That is the fact on the ground as I know it in my community.

It might be some source of comfort to you to always have the enemy on the hill, ready to come over; the enemy at the gate, ready to burst through. That is how the DUP has sustained its position in unionism for the last 30 years. The enemy has always been at the gate.

Let me tell you clearly that the armed struggle is over. Republicans are going to pursue their aims by political and democratic means. The armed struggle is over. You may wish to tell your community that the enemy is still at the gate, bursting to get in, that its intentions are still of malice to your community.

We have suffered. We have been in many graveyards as well. We know the bitter cost of conflict in this country very well, but I can assure you that the enemy is no longer at the gate. It is now a political enemy that you face.

Mr McFarland: I accept Conor's aspirations, which are perfectly acceptable, to seek a united Ireland by peaceful and democratic means, but does he accept that the only way in which he can achieve a united Ireland that is stable and sustainable is with the agreement and acquiescence of more than one million unionists on this island, who are not going to go anywhere?

Mr Murphy: Given our experience of being corralled into a state against our wishes, I am fully aware that to try to corral and coerce people into a political arrangement against their wishes is not the best way to create stability or a peaceful and prosperous country.

Obviously, the best way to a united Ireland is with the agreement of people from every part of this island on what type of Ireland they wish to see — one that protects all of their rights, identities, aspirations and that protects their future.

I am quite aware of my own experience of the failed experiment of unionism in the North of Ireland, which tried to corral a minority here, to treat them in a certain fashion, to expect them to put up with it, and to have a normal, stable and democratic state. That did not work, so I do not consider that that could work on a 32-county basis.

Dr McCrea: We have heard that the war is over. Can Sinn Féin tell us why guns were stopped from being brought in by the republican movement just this past week?

Mr Murphy: The questions that I have been asked up to this point have been in relation to the IRA. If other organisations or individuals who do not belong to the IRA are attempting to do things, that is a matter for them. We have taken a stand against those people in our community, not just by what we have said publicly, but by what we have done in the community. That stand has probably threatened the lives of very many of our party members. That is perhaps more of a threat than that presented to our party members in recent times by the people that you have supported.

We have taken a stand against those people, and we will continue to take a stand against them and to say, publicly and privately, that they are completely wrong in trying to start or reignite an armed campaign. They have no support in our community; they have no strategy or direction. We have made that clear.

If you are trying to associate those people with the party that I represent, you are a long way off the mark: they probably represent more of a threat to me than to you.

Dr McCrea: I did not know that the bomb that was being made in Lurgan was for Sinn Féin or for the —

Mr O'Dowd: Mr Chairman, can I ask for a ruling? People are in custody and being questioned.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr McCrea, Mr O'Dowd raises a point of order, which I must take.

Mr O'Dowd: People are being questioned about the accusations that William McCrea is making. Two people are in custody in relation to allegations concerning the finding of components of an explosive in Lurgan.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I have made it very clear, Mr McCrea, that Committee members must be extremely careful in dealing with matters that are before the courts.

Dr McCrea: I accept your ruling. Although the point was made that recent activity was a greater threat to members of Sinn Féin than to my community.

Mr Murphy: I was talking about — go on ahead and finish your question. Sorry.

Dr McCrea: "It is a matter for themselves", we are told; with respect, those are no credentials for a democrat. It is not a matter for themselves if the Continuity IRA or the Real IRA are threatening people. Will Sinn Féin support the security forces in defeating that terrorist threat?

Mr Murphy: I go back to the remarks with which I prefaced all my answers to the DUP's questions. Rather than use answers to elucidate or gain information, the DUP would snatch at answers or half-answers or parts of phrases to justify or reinforce its own view. I said very clearly in my answer that the intent of those organisations probably poses as much — or more — of a threat to people in Sinn Féin that it does to William McCrea.

Dr McCrea: But —

Mr Murphy: Sorry, will you let me answer the question, if you do not mind? That is the general view. For the past day and a half in this engagement, the DUP representatives have cobbled together bits from parts of answers to reinforce their view. No doubt, the DUP representatives will trawl through the Hansard report to pick out bits and pieces to reinforce their own world view and represent it to their party and community. However, that is a matter for themselves.

I made clear the stance that Sinn Féin has taken, publicly and privately, against dissident organisations, and some people have disagreed strongly with us on that. We have also endeavoured to manage the frustration among our own supporters to ensure that nobody gives support to those organisations, and we have been largely successful in that. Those organisations regard us with even greater contempt than you do, William.

As for giving information to the police, I repeat what I said previously: I do not have confidence that the PSNI would treat such information in a normal policing fashion, and the numerous revelations concerning the intelligence agencies' handling of the Omagh bomb show that attitude to be justified. I have no confidence in the PSNI, and therefore I would not recommend anyone to do that which I would have no confidence in doing myself. I will continue, publicly and privately, as will my party, to confront those who support a renewed armed campaign to try to dissuade them from that course of action.

Dr Farren: Do we finish at 12.00 noon?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We finish at 12.30 pm.

Dr Farren: A real issue arises from this morning's discussions.

Let us assume — and it may be a big assumption to make — that we were to have our institutions restored along with an inclusive Executive, and the issues around policing and justice were resolved, so that full participation and support — in the form that is generally understood by those words — was forthcoming from all political parties. I wonder, Conor, what would Sinn Féin's attitude be, particularly within the Executive, but generally politically, towards the likelihood that many cold cases could come before the courts — some of them involving loyalist paramilitaries and others from the IRA and, indeed, state agencies? What would Sinn Féin's attitude be towards the pursuit of such cases, given your answers to questions about past acts of criminality and that you accept that some activities might not or would not be deemed criminal and therefore should not be pursued? Would they be pursued? Would there be approval, acquiescence, or indeed, support for the pursuit of those cases?

That is a very real issue that could test all of us, given the attitudes that have been expressed towards particular incidents, some major atrocities, indeed, and others, not involving killings, but bank robberies and other forms of what in a normal situation would be regarded as illegal and criminal.

Mr Murphy: I believe that the cold case review team is concerned only with killings, but besides that, you are outlining a hypothetical scenario.

Dr Farren: With all due respect, I do not think that it is.

Mr Murphy: Please let me finish. You are outlining a scenario in which the Executive has been formed, policing and justice powers have been devolved, and people have a confidence in and an acceptance of the policing arrangements. If policing arrangements are carried forward, then they obviously have the confidence of the parties who signed up to that.

Dr Farren: There are cases that might end up in court involving activities that you and your colleagues, the whole Sinn Féin republican movement, have regarded as non-criminal. Would there be full support for the pursuit of those cases? It might well be that a Sinn Féin MLA could hold a position in a department for policing and justice, or a ministerial portfolio. He would have membership of the policing board, of a district policing partnership (DPP). Would there be campaigns for certain cases not to be proceeded with?

In one sense you can say that I am being hypothetical, but if ongoing investigations are to continue — and I cannot imagine any agreement that they should not — we could well be faced with the scenario that I have outlined. It would be reassuring if you would accept that those matters should be pursued in the normal sense within the policing and judicial systems.

Mr Murphy: Again, this does not just apply to Sinn Féin. It could well apply to your own party.

Dr Farren: I have asked the same question of other parties.

Mr Murphy: I noticed that the current Lord Mayor of Belfast was previously a member of another organisation.

Dr Farren: It is not a question for us. Do not duck the question.

Mr Murphy: You are outlining a scenario again — and I will repeat the answer — in which people have resolved the outstanding policing and justice issues and have given their support to policing arrangements. So that is a situation in which people are confident that those arrangements are carried forward in a professional and accountable manner.

12.00 noon

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is 12.00 noon. We are due to suspend at 12.30 pm. At that stage, discussions on the Sinn Féin paper will have lasted six and a half hours. We need to move on and attempt to complete discussions by 12.30 pm.

Mr Ford has indicated that he wishes to speak. I am going to ask Mr Morrow to move his questions on.

Mr Ford: I thought that Mr Morrow had moved on, which is why you had gone to Dr Farren.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We need some continuity. There have been many interjections during the questioning. Could I ask Mr Ford to speak, and I will try to give the DUP a good continuous run to finish off?

Dr McCrea: We are nearly finished.

Mr Ford: I am happy to wait my turn.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I will allow Mr Morrow and Mr McCrea to finish their questioning.

Mr Morrow: I have listened, Mr Deputy Speaker, to Sinn Féin. One thread runs through everything its members say: it is always someone else's fault; it is never their fault. Mr Murphy said that Sinn Féin's goal is a united Ireland. In response to Mr McFarland, he said that Sinn Féin had no desire to coerce the people of this country into a united Ireland. For the past 30 years, we could be forgiven for misunderstanding that there was an attempt to coerce us.

I ask Mr Murphy whether he would like to comment on something. At the time of partition, the Protestant population in the South of Ireland stood at 12%; today it is 2% to 3%. That situation came about because of marginalisation, humiliation and discrimination, and the Protestant population left. Since partition, your population here has increased and grown to its present strength. It has doubled, at least, since partition. You never felt that this "statelet", as you call it, which has been festooned in discrimination, was so bad that you would do what the Protestants did in the South — get out. You never felt that you were so badly done by that you wanted to cross the border and live in the promised land. How do you think that Protestants feel when you say that you have no desire to coerce us into a united Ireland?

You also said that you could not, or would not, support the PSNI. Do you accept, whether you like them or not — you have told us often enough that you do not like them, but you told us the same thing about the RUC, the British Army and the UDR; you just do not like —

Dr McCrea: And the DUP too.

Mr Morrow: We always suspected that you did not like us. I do not know how we drew that conclusion, but we did suspect that. We suspect that you despise the very ground on which we stand.

Bearing in mind that the PSNI is the most monitored police force in the world, what more does it have to do to enable you to endorse the force? Is it yet another case of the RUC not being acceptable and the PSNI not being acceptable and that we must have a force that is acceptable to your organisation?

Mr Murphy: I do not despise the ground on which you stand, unless Tyrone is playing Armagh, when I have some difficulty.

We can travel through the mists of time, but I never considered the promised land to be on the other side of the border, even though I live only five or six miles from it. Partition has failed both states on this island. The Northern state failed because it did not deliver what unionists wanted, and the Southern state did not deliver what, for me as an Irish republican, my grandfather wanted when he fought in the war of independence. Both states delivered the "carnival of reaction" that James Connolly predicted. There was a reactionary Catholic Southern state and a reactionary Protestant Northern state. Each did a disservice to those who lived in their confines. That is why republicans want to create an entirely new country on this island. We have never held up the 26 counties as a model of good practice.

There are a variety of views on the demographic changes that Maurice Morrow outlined, and I have heard Southern Protestants offer a completely different view from his. However, that is an argument for another day.

As for policing, we happen to be sticklers for agreements; you may condemn us for that if you wish. However, when people promise a new beginning to policing, we like to see it. The Patten Report brought in a series of proposals and Peter Mandelson messed them up, but we would like to hold the British Government to the proposals in that report. There are outstanding issues on policing. I do not have them here chapter and verse, but we would happily provide you with a copy — we have printed and published them, talked about them and made them available. We have said clearly that we would like satisfaction on those issues.

We never get as personal as hating individuals or organisations, because that is a waste of emotion and energy; but, given our historical experience, we are trying to change things for the better. We are trying to create a policing service that is responsive and responsible to our community and to your community. That is our objective, and I think that we will be successful. However, there are outstanding issues, and I will make them available if you wish to read them.

Dr McCrea: We have been told that anything that was done under the IRA's instructions over the past 30 years — murder, extortion, counterfeiting or smuggling — was not criminal.

Let us accept the scenario that Dr Farren put forward and say that under a restored Executive it was found that leading members of Sinn Féin — possibly even MLAs — had been involved in those cold cases and were brought before the courts to be charged with criminal activity, whether murder or one of the other crimes that I mentioned. Would Sinn Féin support the Administration in taking those cases forward?

Mr Murphy: I will repeat the answer that I gave to Seán Farren. You describe a situation in which the outstanding policing issues have been resolved and when people have confidence in the handling of policing and judicial matters. If people have confidence in how those matters are handled, they will have confidence in how they are handled. If we are digging into the past, the same scenario may arise for the DUP, the Ulster Unionist Party and the SDLP. However, people will have to have confidence in how policing and judicial matters are handled.

Dr McCrea: Sinn Féin has told us that it does not believe that those activities were criminal, as they were done under IRA instruction. Therefore whether Sinn Féin accepts the police or not is not the problem. The problem is those actions that were carried out under IRA instruction. Mr Murphy is clearly stating that if people involved in such cases were to be investigated and charged, Sinn Féin would support them.

Mr Murphy: As I said, if we have confidence in the arrangements, we will have confidence in the arrangements. You have to remember that the British Government — your own Government — decided that anyone who was convicted before 1998 was considered a political prisoner and was released under the terms of the Good Friday Agreement. I have no doubt that if the situation that you outlined pertained to a DUP member, they would be as likely as anyone else to invoke the 1998 early-release scheme.

Dr McCrea: Once again, we have heard no answers. Earlier, it was stated that those involved in such cases were not criminals. How could they be charged with a crime if they are not criminals? We are used to hearing no answers and nothing but gobbledegook. However, the minutes will reveal what Conor Murphy said to this Committee. Let us therefore find out. We have dealt with the Executive set-up.

There is a threat from the Real IRA and the Continuity IRA. Will Sinn Féin support the forces of law and order in crushing the terrorist threat from the Real IRA and the Continuity IRA or whatever other grouping is out there?

Mr Murphy: If Sinn Féin has confidence in the policing arrangements, it will give them whatever support they need. The situation pertains currently that we do not have confidence in the policing arrangements. If we get to that stage, then I would imagine that we would have confidence that the police are accountable, free from political intervention and responsive to the community. I would also envisage in that situation — and I know that you like to play up the threat of the enemy at the gate — where we are able to make political progress, we would have gone a long way to ending the likelihood of any campaign from any armed group, whether a dissident micro-republican group or a loyalist group. That is a challenge for us; it is a challenge for me and a challenge for you. If we have confidence in the policing arrangements, we will have confidence in the policing arrangements for handling those matters.

Dr McCrea: Certainly, the answers that we have received do not, in my opinion, hasten that day, because there is no confidence in Sinn Féin and the answers that it has given today.

Mr Murphy: We did not expect that you would get any, to be honest.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr McNarry, who has not much of an opportunity, has indicated that he would like to come in on this point.

Mr McNarry: This is a follow-up to what William and, earlier, Seán Farren said. I am unhappy with the response, so I would like to try it another way, Chairman.

Conor, if as a result of investigations into cold cases, members of the IRA are sentenced, in your book are they exempt from the ramifications you outlined were activated by the IRA's July statement?

Mr Murphy: My understanding is that if the actions with which they were charged and sentenced were beyond July 2005 —

Mr McNarry: They are not; we are talking about the cold case review.

Mr Murphy: Then I presume that anyone made subject to the law as a result of the cold case review, providing it is prior to 1998, would have the same provisions applied as anyone else sentenced before 1998.

Mr McNarry: I am asking where you think they sit within the IRA statement.

Mr Murphy: The IRA statement is in relation to its own volunteers, post whatever date in July the statement was made. The cold case review that you are talking about probably goes from that right back to the early 1970s.

Mr McNarry: If in that intervening period — and I know it is hypothetical, but it is important — Sinn Féin had not accepted policing, but the courts had accepted through the process of law and order that certain people were guilty and found them guilty of a crime committed during the time covered by the cold case review, where does the statement from the IRA sit in relation to that?

Mr Murphy: I am struggling to understand that logic. The IRA statement related to the activities of volunteers beyond a point last July. If anybody is convicted out of the cold case review it is obviously at a time previous to last July, probably right back in the 1970s or the 1980s, perhaps in the 1990s. If he was part of the IRA, he would benefit from the same arrangements as anyone else who was part of the IRA prior to 1998 in relation to activities before 1998 — that is, the early-release scheme under the Good Friday Agreement.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): You have obviously been watching Mr Kennedy very carefully and picked up the tricks of the trade. There were actually three interventions there with Mr McNarry. Mr McFarland, you can have one minute.

Mr McFarland: I have one question, and it is key to a number of issues here. As Conor has said, offences committed in the period up until April 1998 are covered by the Belfast Agreement. Republicans after last July fall outside the cover of the republican movement. What happens to a republican who has been involved in activity, of whatever sort, after April 1998, where they are not covered by the Belfast Agreement get-out-of-jail-free card, but not after last July, and therefore it was sanctioned IRA activity, but not covered by the Belfast Agreement? How do you see yourselves and your followers dealing with a cold case review that finds that a senior republican has committed a crime, is before the courts and will spend life in jail, because there is no get-out-of-jail card here? How do you deal with that?

Mr Murphy: I am not aware of any cold case review cases post-1998. As far as I am aware, there are not —

Dr Farren: Or any case.

Mr McFarland: The cold case reviews are right up to the moment. They are reviewing all cases up to when the review started last year. The Historical Enquiries Team (HET) covers all the way back.

Mr Murphy: I am not aware of any post-1998, I have to say.

Mr McNarry: We are not allowed to mention them, unfortunately.

Mr McFarland: Suppose there are cases. Suppose you have a case from after 1998, so it is not covered by the get-out-of-jail-free card, and it is sanctioned activity because it is before July of last year. How do you see yourselves dealing with that if you are in Government and supporting the police?

Mr Murphy: Again, as I have said, if we have confidence in the policing and judicial arrangements, then we will have confidence in those arrangements to deal with those matters. That is simply the way it will be. I am not aware of any such cases, so we are getting into a hypothetical situation about what might or might not happen. There are currently people in jail serving their sentences for offences post-1998. If we have confidence in policing and judicial arrangements and are back in an Executive here, then that will be the case. We will have confidence in them and in all the current processes.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I am now going to allow the DUP an opportunity to finish its questions uninterrupted, and then Mr Ford.

Dr McCrea: To be fair to Mr Ford, I do not want to deny him his chance. To say it as quickly as I possibly can, there has been a statement from Sinn Féin at this Committee that it did not expect us to get confidence out of today. If there is no confidence, how does Sinn Féin expect us to move forward? Certainly the answers Sinn Féin has given were not given in order to give confidence to the unionist community at all. They have been evasive and empty and have only given credibility, succour and encouragement to republicans who have done things in the past with the cover that they were done in the name of the IRA. It will give great succour to them. I am sure that the unionist community will find no succour from that whatsoever.

I would have thought that the purpose of the answer session was to at least try to give some confidence to the community that there is a way forward, because if there is not that confidence then there will be no way forward. Mr Murphy's response is most revealing.

As for this reliance on the get-out clause, families who have had their loved ones murdered, whether on the nationalist or unionist side, want justice. They will be sickened to know that there is a reliance on this get-out clause, hoping that it covers all the cases that will cause the IRA some discomfort. I really feel that that in itself has been most revealing.

Here is a direct question: since the war is over, when will the IRA's structures be demolished?

Mr Murphy: I will preface my answer in the same way as William McCrea, and I repeat what I said at the start of this question, and have said several times since: my clear understanding — and nothing has been said to change it — is that the DUP did not enter this examination of Sinn Féin's issues paper, which is what we are here to discuss, with a view to getting information to satisfy some of its concerns. Rather, its aim was to pick through our answers to reinforce the view that it already holds, and to strengthen and reinforce that view among its supporters.

That is what the DUP has been about since it came to this Committee. This is not, and never has been, a genuine attempt to engage with Sinn Féin and the other political parties and to move forward in preparing for Government. Rather, it is an attempt to list obstacles, to reinforce and build them as high as possible; and where obstacles cannot be found, the DUP will invent them. That has been the DUP's approach, and that was why I said that I did not expect that it would gain any confidence from our answers.

Mr McCrea posed a question on the continuing existence of the IRA. I am not sure on what date the IRA was formed; I presume that it was formed in the early part of last century, and it has been in existence ever since. At times, that has exercised unionists; at other times, it has not. Unionist Governments have engaged in early release schemes for IRA prisoners before. In the 1940s, 1950s and 1960s, they released IRA prisoners when they considered that the IRA no longer posed any threat.

The IRA will go out of existence when it decides that it is time to do so. I have stated clearly that the armed struggle is over and the issue of IRA weapons has been dealt with to the satisfaction of the commission set up to deal with it, the two Governments and most political parties. The future intention of the IRA is clear. Its instructions to its volunteers are clear. That, for me, represents an enormous opportunity to make progress.

Others will somehow try to find opportunities to frustrate progress. If they do not find them within the IRA, they will look to dissident organisations to try to find them, because they thrive on the enemy at the gate. That is how they have sustained their political careers and their political platform for the last 30 or 40 years, but that will not serve their community well in the future.

This state is a failed political entity. Partition has failed both states on this island. If we want to create a better future for our community in this part of the island, and for the community across the island, we should seize opportunities, not try to find the negative in any opportunity presented to us.

Mr Morrow: I think that the DUP has said this before, but from start to finish, we have heard from Sinn Féin that it is always, always someone else's fault: the Brits, the DUP, the PSNI, the Army, or securocrats. Is there anything, but anything — no matter how minute — that Sinn Féin could do that might give a signal to the unionist community that it is for real?

Mr Murphy: It is not always everybody else's fault. Republicans are as responsible for the conflict as everyone else who took part. We do not absolve ourselves of any responsibility. Republicans took actions that caused hurt, and we accept responsibility for those actions. It is not everyone else's fault apart from ours. That is a childish way to broach things. A complex political and historical problem has caused conflict in this country. It is the responsibility of anyone who wants to provide leadership to try to work their way out of that.

I would go with you to an Orange Order hall in Dungannon or Tyrone, or any other hall or gathering that you arranged, and talk to your community.

Last summer, I shared a platform with Arlene Foster in West Belfast, and I invited unionists to Camlough in South Armagh, where I live, to speak to people in my community and express their view of how things can move forward. Invite me to speak on a platform in your constituency, Magherafelt or South Antrim, and I will talk to members of your community. If that does not give them confidence, then at least we will have tried. At least a wider audience could hear what Sinn Féin has to say, rather than the filtered version of events, the snatches out of Hansard that you, William McCrea or other Members of the DUP may present to them.

I am willing to speak to any audience in any DUP constituency, to answer any questions and explain and articulate our perspective on where we want to go in this country. Most people feel that dialogue is a clearer way of trying to resolve our problems than simply presenting each other's view and the worst that we can find in each other to our own communities.

We make provision and arrangements wherever we can for unionists to come to our community. I sat in Pilot's Row in the Bogside in Derry when Gregory Campbell spoke to republicans, and I have sat with Arlene Foster in West Belfast. I have invited unionists to speak on platforms in South Armagh, and they have done so. Let us get some of that engagement in the unionist community, and then we will see what happens. Perhaps it will not generate anything, but it is certainly worth trying.

Dr McCrea: There is nothing globally that Sinn Féin could do to send a message out to the unionist community.

Mr Murphy: I am offering you an opportunity.

Dr McCrea: We have not had a straight answer in six and a half hours, so I doubt that we ever will get one.

Mr O'Dowd: It is worth trying surely.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Ford has been waiting patiently. We will leave him to ask the final question. He has seven minutes.

Mr Ford: I will not take seven minutes, but Conor Murphy might take seven minutes to respond. We have spent several hours establishing the lack of confidence between Sinn Féin and the DUP. Sinn Féin Members have made it clear that they object to the IMC, its personnel, its methods, even its very existence, so I do not wish to revisit those points except to state that the Alliance Party proposed the body which has become the IMC because we believed that it had the opportunity to provide confidence, and it is starting to do that.

Given that the bulk of questioning that Sinn Féin has been subjected to over the past couple of days has been from the DUP, does Sinn Féin accept that there are people in this community — and they are not all unionists — who have genuine concerns about the continuation of paramilitary activity since the signing of the agreement in April 1998? Those people sought to work with Sinn Féin and to move the process forward; they accept that decommissioning has occurred and that time had to be allowed for change to occur and for paramilitarism to come to an end, yet they have a nagging concern that there is still a level of paramilitary activity.

Sinn Féin talked about other parties' links with violence, and it specifically exempted the Alliance Party this morning but, in fairness, that probably ought to apply to the bulk of the SDLP and even to a few decent people who still vote Ulster Unionist. Do you accept that there are people who are genuinely seeking to move the process on but who, at the moment, are not confident that all paramilitary activity has ceased? I say "all paramilitary" conscious of the fact that that I can ask you about only one particular paramilitary group. How can Sinn Féin provide reassurance to those people, if it believes that other people are here almost seeking not to be reassured?

Mr Murphy: That is a useful distinction. I would caution you against falling into the two-party problem trap, which Alliance seems to readily jump into on every occasion, that the problem is a confidence issue between the DUP and Sinn Féin. There are lots of confidence issues between all the parties.

Mr Ford: I was merely highlighting the confidence that has failed to be shown over the past few hours of this discussion.

Mr Murphy: That is fair enough, but there are a lot of confidence issues between all the parties.

Mr McNarry: For the record, if Mr Ford failed to pick that up, and to reassure him of our position, the Ulster Unionists do not have great confidence in what we have heard either.

12.30 pm

Mr Murphy: I accept that you do not want to be out-DUPed by the DUP, but that is fair enough.

In answering David Ford's question, I address you as well. There are people who do have genuine issues and I accept that. The best way is through genuine dialogue, which will help to address those concerns. You rightly point out that the DUP approach, rather than trying genuinely to address those concerns and have some degree of confidence grow from that — because we have issues of concern with other parties, agencies and organisations — has been to try to find further reasons for a lack of engagement and to try to reinforce the world view that we have already heard. This is probably the first lengthy exchange that we have had across a Committee room with members of the DUP. I had hoped that it would have been a positive experience.

Perhaps somewhere in it there will be nuggets that they can cling to that might help them to change their view on issues. However, I suspect that their purpose in this exercise was not to prepare for the restoration of Government but to try to find further obstacles to the return of devolution — I am afraid that that has been reinforced by the nature, not just of the questioning, but of the commentary that went with it.

While all parties have genuine concerns, the best way to address them — as we have been doing since 1998 and before — is through bilateral meetings and open dialogue with all the other political parties.

You are quite right; there are some who do not wish their concerns to be addressed because their very reason for existence is based on those concerns being sustained.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): You have two minutes, Mr Ford.

Mr Ford: Mr Murphy appears to imply that if devolution of justice occurs Sinn Féin would have confidence in the police service. Until we reach that point, who is responsible for dealing with any criminal activity on the part of IRA members that might have come to light since the statement of July last year?

Mr Murphy: The people who are responsible for dealing with any matters of bringing people before the courts are those in the current policing and judicial system. We must be able to go to our party with confidence that we can work with the arrangement and we must ensure that they have confidence as well. Then we will have to convince the community who support us that there is sufficient in the policing arrangements to allow us to have confidence in them. When we reach that stage, the outstanding policing matters will be resolved.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will adjourn the meeting until noon on Monday. There will be lunch, and we will hear details from the SDLP's paper, which, I understand, Mr Farren will take the lead on. Mr Molloy will be in the Chair.

Adjourned at 12.33 pm.

The Chairman, Mr Francie Molloy

Mr John Dallat

Mrs Diane Dodds

Dr Seán Farren

Mr David Ford

Ms Michelle Gildernew

Mr Danny Kennedy

Mr Kieran McCarthy

Rev Dr William McCrea

Dr Alasdair McDonnell

Mr Alan McFarland

Mr Martin McGuinness

Mr David McNarry

Mr Maurice Morrow

Mr John O'Dowd

Mr Ian Paisley Jnr

Observing: Mr Jim Wells

The Committee met at 12.08 pm.

(The Chairman (Mr Molloy) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I welcome Committee members to this morning's meeting. I have some information about apologies and deputies.

The Committee Clerk: David McNarry is deputising for Michael McGimpsey; John O'Dowd is here in place of Conor Murphy; John Dallat is deputising for Mark Durkan, and Kieran McCarthy is here in place of Naomi Long. David Ford is at a funeral, but will be here in about an hour.

Mr McCarthy: That is correct, Mr Chairman.

Mr Molloy: The other issue is about Hansard. Members will have received a copy of Hansard, and there was some discussion about the length of time it took to come back. We are trying to get it back as quickly as possible, and to get a turnaround of 24 hours. If members have corrections, they should contact Hansard directly so that the matter can be dealt with. OK. That covers the Hansard of 21 June.

Mr Kennedy: Mr Chairman, are you saying that members with a concern about something that was said or interpreted should deal directly with Hansard within 24 hours of publication?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Yes. If we allowed any longer we would be in recess before the corrected version came through.

This morning we will continue with the presentations.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Will we deal with the minutes?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We will take the presentations first and then deal with the minutes.

Mr Paisley Jnr: But there are inaccuracies in the minutes.

Dr Farren: The minutes are on the agenda.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The minutes are item 4 on the agenda. As happened at last week's meeting, we will go directly into the presentations and then come back to the minutes. Any inaccuracies, or questions on the minutes, will be addressed at that stage. OK?

Mr Paisley Jnr: I have another question. At Wednesday's meeting I raised an issue regarding a slander that was made against me by Sinn Féin representative Martin McGuinness. I note that he was not at the meeting on Wednesday. With regard to those slanderous comments, I asked the Chairman who was present — Mr Wells — if Martin McGuinness would be in a position to withdraw them if he returned to the Committee meeting. As I have said before, there is no evidence to back up the content of those slanderous comments. If there is evidence that a "determined effort" was made to kill him in the last two weeks, and that certain people in this room were part of that effort, then I would like to hear it. If there is no evidence to back up that slander I would like the remarks to be withdrawn. As the Member is here he can take the opportunity to do that now.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Martin, I give you the opportunity to respond.

Mr M McGuinness: I was not here on Wednesday, so I do not know what discussion was held on the matter. I have just been given a copy of Hansard, and I would prefer to look at that before I make any comment.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We move on to the SDLP presentation, which will be made by Seán Farren.

Dr Farren: The SDLP submitted a fairly slim submission initially, and I will explain and expand on the points that were made in that submission. Therefore Members may want to refer to it as the basic document, and then regard my comments as a gloss or an elaboration on the background and the issues that are raised in it.

It will come as no surprise that the SDLP regards the Good Friday/Belfast Agreement as the essential basis of the work of this Committee and of all that has to be done in order to restore its institutions. We would argue that the agreement allowed us to work together — albeit not in perfect harmony — during the brief period of its implementation between December 1999 and October 2002. Sometimes when I listen to commentators, I am forced to reflect that I cannot think that there is a single Administration — be it one party or be it a coalition — that ever works in perfect harmony. I suppose that it can be said that some work in greater harmony than others and some in lesser harmony. However, bearing in mind the background from which we came in order to create the Executive and the institutions, we do a disservice to ourselves when we attempt to suggest that there was absolutely no harmony or positivity in any of the institution's working relationships in that brief period. I ask myself whether it could have been otherwise, given the nature of the background.

We did work together in ways that at least began to demonstrate that together we can tackle an economic, social and cultural agenda in ways beneficial to the electorate. We also began to address similar issues on an all-Ireland basis through the creation of the North/South Ministerial Council and had begun to do likewise — admittedly, to a lesser extent — on an east-west basis through the British-Irish Council.

Comments are made to suggest that the North/South Ministerial Council and some of the bodies created from it have been cumbersome and ineffective in their operation. However, if one considers their background and the fact that they were started from almost a greenfield-type situation, then one will see that their achievements have been considerable.

I draw Members' attention to the work of InterTradeIreland. Its Acumen programme has contributed significantly to the development of marketing expertise. Networking between companies North and South, again under the auspices of InterTradeIreland, has led to increased business, and other programmes have assisted in technology transfer. None of that was happening before InterTradeIreland was established, and I do not think that any of those initiatives could have been expected to be established or grow and achieve what they have achieved were it not for the institutional support of InterTradeIreland.

I also draw attention to the work of Tourism Ireland, which came under some severe criticism last week. There has been significant growth in the number of overseas visitors, because Tourism Ireland is able to market the whole of the island in a very effective and productive way, availing of a greater number of offices in international market places than was available to the Northern Ireland Tourist Board (NITB) when it was functioning in this respect on its own. Therefore, we need to see the positives in those institutions and seek to build on them, but if there is a degree of over-bureaucracy associated with them, or if they are inefficient and ineffective, we need to weed that out. The point that I am making is that in the short time that we did operate, significant progress was made with respect to matters in Northern Ireland and in the whole island.

We had begun to promote matters on an east-west basis through the auspices of the British-Irish Council. For various reasons — and I do not think that unwillingness was one of them — that was to a lesser extent, but progress was being made there too.

Also, matters relating to police reform — the creation of new policing arrangements through the establishment of the PSNI, new recruitment procedures, the Policing Board and the district policing partnerships (DPPs) — showed that progress could be made towards a more acceptable form of policing. In addition, we should bear in mind that some progress was also made on the human rights agenda, the equality agenda and on cultural matters in relation to language and other aspects of our different cultural traditions.

I know that people will be quick to criticise and point to gaps — and I can acknowledge the gaps and the fact that some criticism may be due with respect to what was done or not done under the various initiatives — but there is much that was positive. Indeed, in so far as it has been possible since suspension to promote the work related to those issues, it continues to have a number of positive dimensions to it.

We acknowledge that the progress made on those and other matters was not even. However, in the SDLP's view, the failure to sustain the Executive cannot be directly attributed to weaknesses in the institutions established under the agreement, but rather to a failure to honour commitments, which, if they had been honoured at the time, would have helped to build the necessary confidence to create sufficient trust among the parties in the Executive and thereby to sustain the Executive and the other institutions. That is why the first item mentioned in the SDLP's submission is the need to demonstrate understandings and undertakings that would serve to maximise confidence in the restoration of the institutions and their subsequent stability.

We say that because we do not believe and do not accept that new pre-conditions can be introduced at this stage. If it is shown that the failures to honour commitments that resulted in the suspension of the agreement have now been addressed, then there should be no further impediments to restoring our political institutions. These commitments were in respect of the decommissioning of paramilitary arms and the cessation of all forms of paramilitary activity, including paramilitary-directed criminality.

Reports from the Independent International Commission on Decommissioning (IICD) and from the Independent Monitoring Commission (IMC) are the key sources to which the SDLP believes we need to turn for guidance on whether such commitments have been honoured. However, they are not the sole sources. For example, the SDLP would take particular account of what the Garda Síochána had to say — in recent years it has frequently been in a position to attribute various incidents and activities to paramilitaries, when it has had the information necessary to do so.

As we prepare for devolution it is also essential that we develop confidence that partnership within government will be honoured. I refer back to a discussion that we had with the DUP in particular last week. While I acknowledge that recent developments in some councils have been positive, the experience of SDLP councillors in a number of DUP-dominated councils had been other than positive up until now — and even now the positive steps that we have recorded recently have not been taken in some councils. I am not simply referring to the allocation of office within these councils, but also to the general attitude and the attempted actions — prevented only by reference to the threat of legal action under equality legislation — against organisations associated with the nationalist tradition; in particular, the Gaelic Athletic Association (GAA).

We could go back over the history of that, but, in future, we need to seek assurances that, for the good of us all, we will have clear, forthright and determined commitments to work in partnership; in government, if we succeed in restoring the institutions, or in whatever form of authority we find ourselves representing the people, and in councils, in whatever form they will take — although they are not an immediate issue of concern. However, we must reassure one another that we are committed to partnership. I take the point that it is not a one-way street; if we are to have a partnership all sides must make commitments and honour obligations to one another.

My comments should not be taken to mean that the SDLP, in the light of its experience of working the institutions of the Good Friday Agreement, does not recognise and accept that other issues — aside from those essential issues that led to suspension and which must be addressed before restoration is achieved — should not also be addressed or that priorities for the restored institutions should not be identified, discussed and, where possible, agreed on.

In the course of the review of the operation of the Good Friday Agreement, the SDLP identified and discussed issues with Government and with all the other parties round this table. In one way or another, we engaged with them on review matters so that, if the institutions are restored, they will operate more efficiently, more effectively, will be more accountable and will have a greater sense of collective commitment and responsibility. Matters relating to the pledge of office, the ministerial code, etc all need to be addressed, and there are also issues surrounding the operation of the North/South Ministerial Council and the British-Irish Council.

The SDLP is happy to table details of our proposals as the business of this Committee progresses. However, it is important to appreciate that, certainly from our perspective, we do not regard it as necessary to have all such matters firmly resolved before restoration. Nor do we regard the recommendations contained in the so-called proposals for a comprehensive agreement in December 2004 as acceptable outcomes to the review that was being conducted up until then. I have stressed before, on behalf of the SDLP, that whatever conclusions people thought had been arrived at on review matters, they were not arrived at in an inclusive way. Certainly, the SDLP never agreed to them and has very serious objections to many of the proposals, not least because they include, for example, a recommendation for the automatic exclusion from office of parties that do not assent to the proposed membership of the Executive.

There are other proposals relating to the procedures of the North/South Ministerial Council, for example, to which we also take exception. Those have led us to reject the set of proposals as a useful basis for discussion within this Committee or in any respect with regard to the restoration of the institutions. However, we are happy to table our proposals and to review and engage with those of other parties, whenever and wherever that can happen.

The next matter, listed in our initial submission, is the question of the devolution of justice and policing, which will present us all with serious challenges in respect of the powers that are to be devolved, the portfolio structures into which they should be devolved and the general manner in which an Executive would discharge responsibility for those powers. It is also a key confidence-building issue and one on which there should be no further prevarication as far as the position of any party is concerned. The SDLP is particularly concerned about the attitude and approach of Sinn Féin. A police service, and there will probably be general agreement on this point, must be accepted as an independent service subject to clear operational criteria and ultimately accountable to the society it serves through its representatives

It is critical to have a clear understanding of the parties' approaches to this whole area, and, therefore, it is important that the issue be addressed in ways that will provide the necessary reassurances and confidence.

12.30 pm

Finally, we have referred to issues in a general sense that could be part of a Programme for Government, or, as some put it, priorities for Government. That should not mean a set of issues that necessarily have to be fully debated and agreed as a condition for restoration; but it would be helpful if some progress could be made, especially on such cross-cutting issues as economic regeneration, matters relating to victims, and how we create conditions for a shared reconciled society. We all have a contribution to make, and if we can achieve progress on how those matters should be tackled, it would be helpful and positive in moving the agenda forward to ensure restoration.

There is a considerable degree of interest and support for us in tackling economic regeneration. We need to see how we can move forward and tackle that issue. As I said last week, the business community, the trade union community, and the voluntary and community sectors, would be gravely disappointed if we continued to fail to create the mechanism whereby we could begin to get our teeth into this whole question. We must address economic regeneration with a considerable degree of urgency and recognise that there is support for that. However, that support would wane into disillusionment and complete disinterest if we were to fail to take up this responsibility.

That is a gloss; as I said, my remarks are intended as an elaboration on the main points in our earlier submission. I am happy to take questions or hear comments.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): If Members are content, we will proceed in a similar way to before: the party that starts off questioning will continue its line of questioning, and we will then move on to the next party.

Can I have the first line of questioning?

Mr McFarland: In the absence of anyone else wishing to, Chairman, I will start. Can I tease out the issue of extending North/South areas of co-operation? During the first Assembly it was agreed that there would be six cross-border bodies and six areas of further co-operation with a view to expanding those. However, the essential logic behind them was that they would be in areas of mutual benefit and that they would not be brought in simply for political reasons. Therefore there was a logic to them — they were beneficial to both sides of the border and so, logically, they were sensible areas for co-operation.

During the talks at the comprehensive agreement stage, there was a sense that the SDLP was bashing on and trying to rapidly expand such bodies into a large number of areas. Some of them looked as though they might have been there for political reasons rather than for logical, common-interest reasons. Will Dr Farren expand on how he sees that whole area of the expansion of cross-border bodies and areas of co-operation developing?

Dr Farren: In general, we should not be doctrinaire about the establishment of North/South bodies or whatever other forms of mechanism for co-operation might suggest themselves to us. After all, we fully subscribe to the phrase in the Good Friday Agreement:

“where there is a mutual cross-border and all-island benefit”.

As long as we can make a clear — one could say, business-type — case that such bodies deserve to be established, they should be established. Certainly, given the period of time in which the bodies have been in operation, and allowing for the fact that they have been on a care-and-maintenance basis during suspension, it would not be inappropriate to conduct a review. If there are bodies that have, as it were, reached the end of their usefulness, they could be replaced. If there are other bodies that seem to be worth establishing, they should be established.

It would be true to say that not all the bodies have worked with the same level of efficiency and effectiveness; they have not all made the impact that would make them household names to people North and South. However, most of them have achieved a positive outcome. The Foyle, Carlingford and Irish Lights Commission is in difficulties because of the east-west nature of the statutes in which it works, and because it could not be made to function within the terms of a North/South body, there is a clear need to replace it. However, that difficulty was realised and acknowledged soon after the commission was established. Therefore, if we can make a justifiable case for something else, the gap to be filled is there.

The SDLP is anxious that greater forms of co-operation be created and developed, particularly with respect to research and development. Across the island, there are nine universities, each with limited research capacity. The emphasis on R&D as an essential ingredient to economic regeneration is widely acknowledged. Although our Northern Ireland universities are UK universities — I know the situation with some degree of familiarity from my professional background — they do not have the same close relationship with other universities in Britain as those universities have with each other. That is simply because of the remove at which they are located. Therefore, it makes a great deal of sense for them to pool some of their research expertise, not only with universities in the South, but with universities wherever it is appropriate to do so.

There is, however, a particular pertinence about a case for North/South co-operation in that area. We have seen it to some extent with the development of spatial planning through US involvement from Harvard University with the University of Ulster, the University of Galway and the Athlone Institute of Technology. Also, we have seen it through work that Alasdair is familiar with in cancer research.

There are other areas in which there is considerable scope. At a function the other evening, I spoke with representatives of Bombardier, and only recently, a conference was held here — the first of its kind — which brought together people conducting research in avionics across the country.

People from Bombardier told me how surprised they were at the extent to which there is research in some aspects of avionics in the South — for instance, research work into composites for aircraft construction. They want to exploit that.

People hit on those things accidentally. Why not have a much more strategic approach or this kind of co-operation? That would be part of the case that we would make.

My answer, in short, is not a doctrinaire approach, but one that is essentially guided by the need to ensure that we mobilise and exploit the capacity of what exists on the island, North and South, to the mutual benefit of people in both parts of the country.

Mr McNarry: Seán, you mentioned economic regeneration, which we are all interested in. When asked about this matter, Sinn Féin, interestingly, stated a figure of £10 billion over 10 years as a contribution from both London and Dublin. I wonder whether you have a figure in mind for dealing with economic regeneration in the broadest sense, which would be a contribution from London and Dublin. Do you have a proportion in mind? Would that be an equal contribution from both Governments?

Dr Farren: Since one party has said £10 billion, why do I not say £20 billion? I am not interested in a headline-grabbing figure. I think that it is far better and more effective if we make the case for what we need to do, how we would do it and the resources that we need with which to do it.

Economic regeneration is not essentially linked to having finance available to us. It is linked to having plans that we can implement with some assurance that they are going to achieve the goals of creating the kinds of employment that we need, creating the kinds of enterprises that will make that employment available in our society and that will enable us to reach targets of achievement that are much greater than we have at present in terms of productivity, general gross national product (GNP) and gross domestic product (GDP).

If we are not able to indicate what those plans are likely to be, whatever price tag we put to them is meaningless. Built into that, we must have a clear idea of the kind of investment that we need to make in order to tackle disadvantage in our society, in order to address the infrastructural deficit and in order to create a more modern health and educational estate, together with the facilities that they require. If all that adds up to £10 billion, I will go for £10 billion. If all that adds up to £20 billion, I will go for £20 billion. It is not the price; it is the plan that is essential.

I must say that I read with a certain amount of cynicism the sums that are mentioned when I do not see what lies behind those sums.

Mr McNarry: The coalition that you talked about working within was enforced, although your party voluntarily entered into that. Do you see the Assembly wedded in perpetuity to an enforced coalition, or would you envisage a time when parties would be able to form a coalition voluntarily and that they would be free to do so? Do you envisage that time soon, or do you see it on the long finger?

12.45 pm

Dr Farren: There is a statue at the top end of O'Connell Street — many Members may have passed it — of an Irish patriot, Charles Stewart Parnell. He had close Ulster connections, for those interested in any background to the man. The inscription on the plinth behind the statue begins:

"No man"

— and I suppose, were he alive today, he would be obliged to say "no woman" as well —

"has a right to fix the boundary of the march of a nation."

I quote that to emphasise that the SDLP regards the Good Friday Agreement as it views any constitutional framework or settlement: a living thing that is capable of evolution and development according to circumstances and according to the agreement and consensus that can be reached. Whatever changes may be made to the agreement will be made because those engaged in it have agreed to them.

I am not saying that our march will take us in one particular direction or directions. However, if the Good Friday Agreement is not the basis upon which we can grow as we work together and make whatever changes we think necessary, it is not the agreement that I think it is. I hope that the SDLP's stance shows that we are open-minded about where the future lies. Any movement towards that future must be by consensus; that is the essential requirement of the Good Friday Agreement.

Mr McNarry: I accept that, and I find the frankness of your answer refreshing. Would the agreement be worked out between the parties or would you wish the electorate to indicate a clear preference about how it would like parties to enter into a voluntary coalition?

Dr Farren: The parties would have to come to some sort of agreement on what form of Administration they would be prepared to accept, since they will have to work it. The agreement gives parties the right not to enter — or to opt out of — arrangements if they find that it would be better for them to adopt that position. You will recall that the SDLP raised the issue about whether it would serve in an Administration under certain imposed procedures, such as those that emerged from the proposals for a comprehensive agreement. We stated our position directly to the two Prime Ministers and subsequently made it known in public.

That is one way in which a different composition could be arrived at in forming an Administration. I am not sure how you could clearly interpret the wishes of the electorate if such matters were put before it. The electorate would need clear guidelines on how it should state its preferences, and such guidelines could only come from an inter-party consultation of some form or other, so the matter would end up before the parties anyway.

Mr McNarry: Putting the matter before the electorate might be in a manifesto that sought a mandate for such a move.

Dr Farren: We are getting very hypothetical about things now.

Mr McNarry: Different things emerge from the manifesto about the things you stand for surely.

Dr Farren: Oh yes. If you put it into your manifesto, you will get your support for it. If we do not put it into our manifesto there will not be support for it from the people who vote for us.

Mr McNarry: You will not know.

Dr Farren: No, exactly; but a manifesto consists of a whole lot of recommendations. It has to be a single, clear-cut issue if you are to get any useful guidelines. What do people vote for on a party's manifesto? Some vote for what a party says on education; others vote for what it says on the constitution; others vote for what it says about something else and so on. We all quote our manifestos, but, to a certain extent, we are not very clear about what the electorate has always supported in those manifestos as opposed to something else.

Mr McNarry: My final point is this: I am sure we all welcome the peaceful passing of two recent walks in Belfast, and I am sure we recognise that a lot of credit must go to the organisers and to the protestors for achieving that. Would you say that it would be helpful to the political process should the recent example of the protestors be followed in all cases?

Dr Farren: Not being familiar with the situation and not having been there, I am not sure that I want to comment directly on that. If any of my colleagues have any closer knowledge of it, I am sure they will. My approach is that if people are protesting, they should protest peacefully, and if they are marching, marches should be conducted in a peaceful and respectful way. Where supporters are supporting a march, the onus is on them too. We have had too many examples of all three not being conducted in peaceful ways.

Mr McNarry: I am just posing the question in the light of the efforts and the achievement that have clearly been made. If it can be done peacefully, then can that not be replicated elsewhere and is it not clear that the manner in which people approach a protest is key to the outcome of a walk? Recognising the old adage that it takes two to tango, nevertheless if a walk is based on the knowledge when starting off that violence against it is unlikely, that is clearly helpful for the process in which we are all engaged here.

Dr McDonnell: What particular attribute of the behaviour of the protestors were you referring to?

Mr McNarry: The peaceful attribute.

Dr McDonnell: In this case there was dialogue even though it was somewhat indirect, and it appears to have largely worked. It did not work to everyone's absolute satisfaction, but it worked substantially. My view, and the broader view of the SDLP, is that if there was some degree of honest and honourable dialogue, a lot could be achieved, and the difficulty appears to be in obtaining and maintaining that dialogue in an atmosphere of mutual respect. I feel that that could achieve quite a bit in most contentious situations.

Mr McNarry: I accept that you from your side of the table call it a march.

Dr McDonnell: Yes, or a parade. Terms are used, sometimes not —

Mr McNarry: In a sense, that is a bit emotive. As one who goes on a walk, I enjoy the walk.

Dr McDonnell: Chairman, I withdraw the term, and to accommodate David's sensitivities I will refer to it as a parade or a walk.

Mr McNarry: I am grateful for that, Chairman. A bit of progress has been made this morning already.

Mr M McGuinness: On a point of information, what walkers' club to which you are aligned are you speaking about?

Mr McNarry: The Walker club, as I know it, is the Apprentice Boys. [Laughter.]

Mr M McGuinness: I thought they were ramblers or something. [Laughter.]

Mr McNarry: With some of the detours they have been asked to take, Mr Chairman, you would think they were ramblers. [Laughter.]

Mr M McGuinness: Very good.

Dr McDonnell: Chairman, now that we have established that it was a walk and not a march, for the record and for completion, that benign interpretation can often be somersaulted and interpreted with some difficulty by those who feel they are being walked all over. The interpretation is the thing.

Mr McNarry: Yes, I think so. Generally I could not for the life of me see how anybody could become so passionately involved in violence over a walk, but I can when the connotation comes up that it is a march or a parade and therefore sounds adversarial to those who cannot come out as spectators.

What is interesting about this is that when we come to a certain time of the year, reasons are offered for politics to close down: not because of the walking season, but because of the marching season. Therefore, I would have hoped that from your side of the table, you would encourage those whom you can to try to maintain what we have established over recent weeks in terms of their protest. I know there is an onus of responsibility on people on my side of the table as well.

Seán mentioned the tourist industry. We could rid society of the trap that it has fallen into, the notion that the summer season is coming so we have to close down a lot of things. If we can get over that mentality — and I am asking you to share in that — it augurs well not only for the political process we are all involved in, but for all aspects of society.

Dr McDonnell: Chairman, I have no difficulty in agreeing broadly with the sentiments expressed. David referred to Sean's comment on tourism. July is normally the peak of the year from that perspective. It is tragic that, because of contention, controversy and worse around the walking season, in our case July is the slump month of the year. I can reflect on Belfast more than anywhere else: the city almost closes down for the month of July. A lot of economic benefit is sacrificed to the walking and the contention and difficulty that arise from it. The sooner we get solutions and resolutions to the contention, the better. For our part, when the opportunity has arisen we have worked extremely hard to do just that, and we will continue, where we have influence to bring to bear, to try to ensure that the difficulties are resolved and reconciled.

Mr Kennedy: In the course of his presentation, Dr Farren said that he would not accept any "new preconditions", which was, I think, the term he used. What examples would he use to describe those?

1.00 pm

Dr Farren: There were many examples of new preconditions in the parties' presentations last week. The DUP submitted preconditions. The Alliance Party focused its preconditions on what I would broadly describe as review issues such as d'Hondt, collective responsibility and the ministerial code. The SDLP recognises that some of those issues need to be addressed, but they do not need to be signed, sealed and delivered before restoration. Those issues did not cause the collapse of the Executive.

The DUP put matters such as parades and equality into the mix. The DUP may have a case about the parades issue that needs to be addressed, but this is not a forum for addressing that issue; it may have a case about the allocation of funds, but this is not a forum for addressing that issue either. Coming closer to issues that need, at least, to be considered, the DUP put the question of fifty-fifty recruitment to the police into a paragraph on policing as if it were, to them, a precondition to be resolved before restoration.

We must get real about our tasks, and the SDLP has tried to tease those out in its questioning of other parties. What do the other parties really believe are the essential matters that need to be addressed and resolved? Those issues need to be addressed, if not resolved, and we need to be confident that they will be resolved expeditiously after restoration.

Had the institutions been up and running, we would have been in review mode and would have resolved — or not resolved, as the case may be — some of the concerns raised about matters under review. However, those issues would not have stopped the institutions from functioning, because there is a provision for ongoing review. To say that those issues are now preconditions lengthens the agenda in a way that makes restoration less, rather than more, likely.

Mr Kennedy: Is the SDLP leaving open the prospect of some changes being made to the workings of the Belfast Agreement, but it is not open to introducing, in Dr Farren's terms, preconditions to the Belfast Agreement?

Dr Farren: The review process has been under way for some time — in fact, for many years. Indeed, some aspects of the review were being conducted, if Mr Kennedy recalls, while the institutions were still functioning. Among those matters was the designation issue — if I may call it that — and the position that the Alliance Party adopted in order to ensure that the institutions could continue to function. Any party is free to suggest proposals on those matters, and I have instanced just a few of them.

We can address the questions of collective responsibility, accountability and efficiency, and whatever those terms might mean. However, they are not preconditions in the sense that, without their being resolved, restoration could not be achieved. We could progress those matters until 24 November, if restoration is to be achieved then, and continue to address them if they remain unresolved. Those matters concern the operation of the institutions established under the Good Friday Agreement; they do not concern the achievement of restoration.

Mr Kennedy: Likewise, would issues of interest to the SDLP, such as an increase in North/South cooperation and the number of North/South bodies, also fall into that category?

Dr Farren: Of course.

Mr Kennedy: They are not preconditions either?

Dr Farren: Well, they are essentially review matters. The one gap that we would expect to be resolved is the Foyle, Carlingford and Irish Lights Commission situation; we have, in a sense, five and a half institutions, rather than the six institutions of a North/South kind that we had agreed. So there is a gap to be filled. Whether we arrive at agreement in respect of changes to any of those, or whether we arrive at agreement in respect of additional bodies, has to be a matter that we negotiate and agree to together. That is the way it was envisaged in the agreement.

I neglected to bring a copy of the agreement with me; we should have one handy so that we can refer precisely to what is in it. It refers to additional bodies being created with the agreement of the Assembly and the Oireachtas in the South. That is the way it is supposed to work. It is the way we accept. We are not going to accept one bit and not others.

Mr Kennedy: Yes, but just to be absolutely clear: you are not making a precondition out of your desire to increase the number of bodies?

Dr Farren: No, I did not say that. I made myself very clear with respect to what are the issues at the heart of suspension and what are the other issues to be resolved that are, in that sense, only desirable.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): There is a copy of the agreement here if anyone wants to read it.

Dr Farren: Thanks very much.

Mr Kennedy: Here is one we made earlier.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Several of them.

Dr Farren: OK, fine, thanks.

Dr McDonnell: Chairman, I think it is worth going back to this issue. Any improvements or additions that the SDLP is seeking are improvements that will be of mutual benefit to the people of the whole island, North and South. Obviously we are particularly interested in benefits for the North.

Mr Kennedy: But your main focus is to get the institutions up and running rather than see them delayed as a result of a wrangle over an increased number of bodies. Is that a fair reflection of your view?

Dr Farren: If we said anything to make you believe otherwise, then we should not have; but I do not think we did.

Mr Kennedy: There is another issue that has been touched on by others. Can you foresee any circumstances wherein the SDLP would enter an Executive as part of a voluntary coalition, not including one or more of the parties represented in this room?

Dr Farren: That is not how the inclusive principle in the Good Friday Agreement is to be understood. If parties absent or exclude themselves — withdraw from, or do not make themselves available for nomination to, an Executive — that is entirely a matter for them. But if they are entitled to, and want to exercise their right to so do, then, as the Good Friday Agreement says, they are entitled to whatever the formula allocates to them within the Executive. We are not departing from that.

We ask ourselves: why have we got an inclusive proposal within the Good Friday Agreement? Last week several attempts were made to suggest that we are an aberration and that, therefore, we should move closer to what is normal practice in the formation of other coalitions. I would not describe us as an aberration.

We are coming out of a long period of conflict, division and political instability. We must shore up and create a sense of common ownership, or ownership all round, of the new institutions — something that we have never had in Northern Ireland's long history since 1921. We have never had any common sense of ownership of representative public institutions, and we must create that.

We must move forward inclusively, otherwise we risk sacrificing that sense of common ownership whereby a firm basis in society can be laid for the operation of these institutions. Exclusion has not worked in the past, and in the immediate aftermath of conflict where we are trying to get this common sense of ownership, it will not work if we try something else at this time.

The case has to be understood in those terms. Appealing to the practice in the South or in England, Scotland, Wales or anywhere else only ignores that very clear reality, and it is not part of the game plan for getting us moving forward.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I remind Committee Members to switch off their mobile phones because they interfere with the recording equipment. If the phones are switched on or are close to the microphones they actually interfere with the signal going out of here.

Mr Kennedy: So the SDLP's view is that parties would effectively only exclude themselves; the SDLP will not be excluding anybody. Is that what you are saying?

Dr Farren: I am making the case for the inclusive principle contained in the Good Friday Agreement. It is essential at this point that we strive to our utmost to re-establish all the institutions on that same basis. Otherwise I do not believe that our political institutions will have stability, and they will find it difficult — if not impossible — to gain the allegiance of the electorate represented by the main political parties in particular.

If that is what we want — and I think it is essential — then any attempt to sidestep it will prove unhelpful, useless and, in the short term, never mind the longer term, unworkable.

Dr McCrea: I thank Seán for making the presentation on behalf of the SDLP and leaving himself open to questions. It is appropriate that he has done that, unlike others who appear for cross-examination of other parties but, when it comes to presenting their own case, run away and leave others to do the presentation. Some of the scrutiny of their self-examination would have been essential to have on the record. However, that did not happen that way, but at least Seán made his presentation. I am sure he will not be surprised to know that we have a number of questions for him.

Let us go straight to the situation as it is. Seán, do you accept, and does the SDLP accept, that the unionist community has a problem with the Belfast Agreement?

Dr Farren: Just as I would accept that any party with a mandate says that it has a problem with something, then I accept that the unionist community has difficulties with the way in which things have proceeded — or not proceeded — since the Good Friday Agreement was adopted and endorsed.

If, however, you are suggesting that those difficulties are inherent to the agreement, that would have to be more clearly demonstrated to me than it has been hitherto, because I do not accept that that is the case. However, I do accept that difficulties have arisen out of the implementation or non-implementation or, more accurately, the non-honouring, of commitments made with respect to the agreement.

1.15 pm

Dr McCrea: Do you accept that there are many in the unionist community who believe that the Belfast Agreement is fundamentally flawed and, therefore, in their eyes it is not the basis for a stable democracy in Northern Ireland?

Dr Farren: I have almost answered that question in what I have just said. It is probably an attractive proposition, when one finds difficulties with the way in which something operates, to say that the thing itself is inherently flawed and that, therefore, we need to throw out the whole apple cart, together with the apples, and start afresh. However, that is not the position that the SDLP adopts towards the agreement.

We believe that the agreement is essentially the instrument that we need to address the problems, the crises and the conflict that we have been through.

Changes may need to be made to its operation and commitments may need to be honoured, if they have not yet been honoured, to ensure that the institutions created under the Agreement can work. However, I have often made the point that if we were to start again, we would end up very close, if not in an identical position, to where we arrived at on Good Friday in 1998.

Dr McCrea: If the people of Northern Ireland were offered the opportunity to vote in a referendum on the Belfast Agreement today, would you be confident that it would gain the support of the unionist community?

Dr Farren: As there have been operational difficulties with the agreement and with the commitments made under it, people might be inclined to agree with what they would be told by their representatives: that we should start again. Quite a few people would probably respond positively to that message. Some of those who gave their support to the agreement in 1998 would not give it today, or certainly not with the same degree of enthusiasm.

Again, what you are trying to suggest is that we start from scratch, but we do not have time to do that. The two Governments have made it clear that the Good Friday Agreement is the basis upon which we must move forward. I am convinced that it is the basis upon which we must move forward, and we must seek our accommodation within the terms and principles of that agreement, recognising that there have been difficulties with some aspects of its operation. I have been through that argument several times.

There are also commitments that should have been honoured but were not honoured in time to sustain the institutions. However, I am certainly not conceding that the Belfast Agreement is not the kind of agreement that we need in order to move forward.

Dr McCrea: Irrespective of how anyone could convince the electorate, remember that the basis of our democracy is the ballot box — so test it at the ballot box. Surely the basis of the Belfast Agreement was that it would have the support of a majority of unionists and a majority of nationalists? Seán, if you are not sure that, if put to the test, the agreement would be supported by a majority of unionists, then how can you suggest that they should be forced to establish a government when they do not believe the premise on which it has been built — other than to force them to do it, which is the opposite of democracy.

Dr Farren: William, through the Chair, I take it that the purpose of us being here is to try to work through the issues that need to be worked through to ensure the restoration of our institutions. I am confident that if we can do so people will endorse the outcome of that. Putting the Belfast Agreement to the people today to see whether or not they agree with it would be a needless and unhelpful exercise. I am not going to go down the road of engaging in a debate on that because, politically, it is not the road that we should be going down. Why should I go down that road if I do not believe that I should?

Dr McCrea: While you may regard it as needless and unhelpful, surely the purpose of our Committee is to scope the issues? Whether you feel that it is needless or unhelpful, do you not accept that a large proportion of the people, and a majority of unionists, do not believe that it would be needless and unhelpful — rather they believe that the foundation of any devolved government should be fundamentally correct?

Dr Farren: I take it that we have a responsibility to identify the issues that we all believe need to be addressed to ensure that our institutions can be restored. We must ensure that if we do reach an agreement on how to resolve those issues we can confidently progress and meet whatever test we put to the electorate. That is my answer. The principles and the key institutions and procedures of the Good Friday Agreement provide us with the means of moving forward, subject to addressing the issues and making progress on matters regarding the operation of the institutions. That is our remit, and that is what we should be about.

Dr McDonnell: As the SDLP and many others would see it, the Belfast Agreement was endorsed in 1998. It was supported by the two Governments and supported in referendums North and South of this island. We recognise that the DUP have — and had — some difficulty with it. You can second-guess public opinion, or speculate as to what it might be, but the referendums were held in 1998, and nothing we can do changes that.

Dr McCrea: So you are saying —

Dr McDonnell: Sorry, let me finish.

Dr McCrea: Sorry, I did not realise that you had not finished.

Dr McDonnell: We can move on from there, but we cannot, with all due respect, move back in time. Our party is keen to move on, and to probe, to listen to and to accommodate, where possible, the views, not just of the wider unionist population, but of the DUP as a political party.

However, the SDLP does not believe that those views can be accommodated by attempting to find a reverse mode that takes us back through the last 10 years. This Committee, and our efforts here in general, are about finding a forward pathway and a forward gear that takes us through whatever modifications are required to the function of the agreement in order to accommodate. However, we do not see any way in which we can reverse and rewrite, undo or airbrush history.

Dr McCrea: Let me get this right: you are saying that when the UK went into the EU, for example —

Dr McDonnell: No, sorry, Chairman. I was not talking about the EU.

Dr McCrea: Sorry. I am asking the question, so I will allow you to answer. The tables were turned before, but now —

Dr McDonnell: I am answering your question: I was not talking about the European Union.

Dr McCrea: Please, just allow me. You are saying that it is impossible, for example, for a Conservative Government to take the United Kingdom out of the EU.

Dr McDonnell: Chairman, I thank Dr McCrea for making my point for me, because although many of those involved in politics across the UK may huff and puff about the European Union, I do not believe that, in practical terms, the day will ever dawn when Britain, or British Governments, will be foolish enough to withdraw from the European Union. They realise that the game is to make the best of the situation, to move forward and to attempt to remedy whatever flaws they find in the European Union from within, rather than adopting a dog-in-the-manger position from outside. Because the penalties for that are ridicule and all sorts, and that would make for bad politics.

Dr McCrea: Although I accept your great knowledge and your right to think —

Dr McDonnell: Chairman, the sarcasm is blinding.

Dr McCrea: No. I did not ask you to think. I asked you, could they, in a democracy, decide to come out of the EU if they wanted?

Dr McDonnell: Chairman, I am finding it difficult to answer, because when I give an honest answer to the best of my ability, I am bombarded with sarcasm and condescension.

They possibly could, but the practicalities of implementing or effecting that would be so far-reaching that, before they went down that road of trying to get out, they and the public would realise the folly, and they would reverse.

In our case, quite honestly, if we are pushing that far, the problem with the Belfast Agreement, and any failure that one might accept was associated with it, was a failure to properly and fully implement the agreement, rather than any inherent failure. With all due respect, Chairman, I will always allow unionists to think for themselves, but there were far more benefits within that agreement than the DUP perceived and far more opportunities, if they had worked at them. Therefore, my humble thesis is that the failure that Dr

McCrea is trying to imply and to attribute to the Belfast Agreement, or the Good Friday Agreement, was a failure to implement and work it, rather than an inherent failure in the agreement.

Dr McCrea: So, what you are saying, Alasdair, is simply this: that the people should not be allowed to vote on it just in case. No, you acknowledge that the unionist community would not support it, so you just deny them the right to vote.

Dr McDonnell: Chair, we are extrapolating and nit-picking and taking angles. Dr McCrea is free to interpret: his angle has been that this is only about the unionist people. Fortunately, or unfortunately for him, other people are involved. Some are nationalists and others are neither unionists nor nationalists. Quite frankly, other people must be taken into the equation. People in the south of this island, in the Republic, and people in Britain have an interest here. With all due respect, we cannot set up some sort of political cocoon here that ignores the rest of the world.

Democracy allows us to regulate our affairs, but those affairs must be regulated in harmony with our neighbours and those with whom we are associated politically in one way or another. For unionists that means the greater part of Britain; for some of us it means the rest of the island.

1.30 pm

Dr McCrea: With the greatest respect, that was a long way of saying that, no, you do not want them tested at the ballot box. You know what the result will be, since there is no confidence in the unionist community. You are clearly stating that you do not want to put it to the electorate. That is all right; that can go on the record.

Dr McDonnell: I have never refused to recognise the results of a ballot box, but —

Dr McCrea: Would you agree then —

Dr McDonnell: Chairman, if I may finish. I agree that the DUP has worked very hard for eight years to wreck the Belfast Agreement — the Good Friday Agreement — the agreement that the rest of us worked hard to put in place, and I agree that it is entitled, if it so wishes, to continue its wrecking expedition. However, it is not entitled to dress that wrecking expedition up as progress or creativity or to dress it in clothes that would allow its expedition to be construed as other than what it is: a wrecking expedition.

After having wrecked the agreement for eight years, the challenge for the DUP is how to square the circle and move on. I do not want to deny the ballot box. There were always ballot boxes. We could extrapolate as far back as 1933 when Hitler seized power in Germany, which allowed him to manipulate events to wreck the continent of Europe.

We must be realistic and face up to the facts, and the fact is that we are where we are. Perhaps some Members would prefer that we were not starting off here, but we are; we have to work with what we have.

Dr McCrea: Therefore partition is a reality and it cannot change. That is what you are saying. That is an interesting —

Dr McDonnell: Mr Chairman —

Dr McCrea: Sorry, with the greatest respect, I have not finished —

Dr McDonnell: Mr McCrea —

Dr McCrea: Please, you must not get worked up. As a doctor you should know that it is not good for your heart.

Dr McDonnell: I am not getting worked up. We were discussing Europe, among other things, and then someone moved on to partition. I have no difficulty in defining the SDLP's attitude to partition: we do not like it, we would prefer another system of Government on this island, and we will work for a modification of the present system of Government. The reality is that we are stuck with partition and we work within it whether we like it or not.

I ask Mr McCrea to work within the Belfast Agreement as he refers to it — I call it the Good Friday Agreement — until such times as he can modify it. Nothing could be simpler. He gave me the perfect example of what I was trying to say to him for the past five minutes. The SDLP does not like partition and would prefer a different system. However, we will work as constructively and democratically as we are allowed to within that system, and we beg him and the DUP to get on board and work within the agreement until he is able to persuade others to change it.

Mr Morrow: Will you accept partition and live with it?

Dr McDonnell: The SDLP accepts it for now; we tolerate it.

Mr Morrow: What is the “for now” bit?

Dr McDonnell: We will tolerate it. There will be opportunities in future for dealing with it.

Mr Morrow: Does the SDLP see the Belfast Agreement as a vehicle? Is it a settlement or a process?

Dr Farren: I refer to the quotation from Parnell. There is a statue in O'Connell Street in Dublin on which is the quotation:

“No man has a right to fix the boundary of the march of a nation.”

Things can evolve and change, and we will all bring our hopes and aspirations for the changes that we seek within the institutions that we are trying to get up and running again. If we can do that, we will. If we cannot, we will bring them to whichever other fora are provided to allow us to do so.

The DUP has its aspirations, and we have our aspirations. However, that should not stop us working together. Therefore, I am not going to deny that my aspirations include the creation of a united Ireland. It would be dishonest of me to say otherwise. As long as I do not seek to impose my aspiration or to force or coerce anyone, either directly or indirectly, into that situation, what difficulty does that present to the DUP or to anyone else in working with me? I certainly disavow any of those methods, as I have done throughout my three decades in politics. I do not believe that such methods will ever achieve the objective. They are a futile and inherently immoral political approach to adopt.

Therefore, on the basis of such an honest expression of my aspirations and my willingness to work within the institutions, such as we can agree them here, I do not think that I pose any difficulty or threat to the DUP working with me or me with its members. That is the basis on which all honest and open politics should proceed.

I refer to the question that led to this set of exchanges. I read with interest the DUP's submission. Apart from a rather fleeting reference — I hope that that is not a deprecating way to describe it — to its belief that the arrangements created under the Belfast Agreement do not provide for a stable Government, all other matters that the DUP referred to, and it should be borne in mind that this is the very last one that is listed, could well be addressed and resolved within the context of the Good Friday Agreement.

The first issue is paramilitarism. The SDLP believes that that needs to be resolved; commitments were made that were not honoured in time.

Mr Morrow: Has that issue been resolved? You said that it can be —

Dr Farren: Let me finish my point, and I will come back to that. I am making a different point.

Mr Morrow: The rest of us, no matter what party we are members of, have subjected ourselves to cross-examination —

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Let Seán finish his point.

Dr Farren: I did not think that there was any limit on the amount of time that is available to us.

Mr Morrow: I know that we are here to 5.00 pm, but, honestly —

Dr McDonnell: This is guerrilla warfare.

Dr Farren: I am all right, Alasdair.

Dr McDonnell: My colleague is entitled to finish his comments.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Let him finish.

Dr Farren: I have been as open and honest as I possibly can in my answers, and I will answer every question put to me if I am allowed to complete the answer to Mr McCrea's earlier question on the nature of the Belfast Agreement.

I was simply pointing out that the list of issues in the DUP's submission begins with paramilitarism. It then lists criminality; decommissioning; policing and criminal justice; parades; equality and human rights issues; a financial package for Northern Ireland; and accountability of institutions. The last issue listed, with only a brief and fleeting reference that is not explained — it does not even say that the DUP rejects the Belfast Agreement — is the stability of the institutions.

Now, in light of the DUP's submission, I believe that —

Dr McCrea: Can I give the Committee a point of information?

Dr Farren: — the answer that I gave about identifying and resolving the issues that are in the way of restoration reflects what this Committee is about. The path that Mr McCrea was trying to lead me down was extraneous to his party's submission, unless, of course, his party's submission was incomplete. Obviously, he, rather than me, would have to take responsibility for that.

1.45 pm

Dr McCrea: On a point of information, I accept that Dr Farren was answering the questions as we put them to him. I do not doubt that at all. I am not saying that I was satisfied with his answers, but that is a different issue.

Nevertheless, we all said that this was not a comprehensive paper. We made comments when we were presenting our paper — we will be judged on those as well. I have copies of the presentation, and I made matters abundantly clear when I said:

"The attempts to resurrect the failed structures of the past, and to fudge once again the crucial issues that bedevil the IRA and Sinn Féin, will not work.

It is a prerequisite that the Belfast Agreement needs to be changed. That needs to be done through primary legislation."

In the next paragraph, we went on to say:

"The Democratic Unionist Party received an overwhelming mandate on the basis of change to the Belfast Agreement and an absolute commitment to exclusively peaceful and democratic means by any party wishing to be in Government."

I then expanded on those answers. I gave myself four and a half hours of questions, and I would have been happy to answer any others on that. However, as you know, we have now moved on to questions to the SDLP, not questions from the SDLP. That is why we are dealing with that now.

Mr Morrow: To get a clear definition, do you see the Belfast Agreement as a settlement?

Dr Farren: I see the Belfast Agreement as the settlement at which we arrived in 1998. As I have said in response to several questions, I regard the Belfast Agreement — the Good Friday Agreement — as a living agreement, in the sense that, as we grow and work together, and learn from the experience of working together, we can agree whatever changes, if any, we believe might be beneficial, within the context of the principles that that agreement set out.

Mr Morrow: That is slightly different to what you said earlier.

Dr Farren: If I did not make myself clear earlier, I apologise.

Mr Morrow: You said that unionists had no right to change it — that the Belfast Agreement was an agreement, and that was that, and that we were the bad boys for seeking change, and making it a failed agreement, and all the rest.

We did not have to make it a failed agreement. It was a transparent, failed agreement. Do you accept that if there is to be a way forward in Northern Ireland, any institutions, whether inside or outside the Belfast Agreement, must have the majority support of both communities?

Dr Farren: It must have a sufficient degree of support to enable those institutions to become stable, in order to set down roots, and in order for both communities to work together in a spirit of partnership. Those are the essential criteria that we must try to meet.

We are here because of failures with respect to commitments that were entered into, and not honoured. Therefore, we must resolve the issues that we agree are impeding the way to restoration. With respect to other matters to do with the operation of the agreement, many need to be addressed and can be addressed. Some of those could well be addressed before restoration; if not, then they could be remitted to the institutions after restoration. That is the clear position of the SDLP.

Mr Morrow: If there had to be changes to the North/South bodies, if unionists were not participating in them and not prepared to work them, could those be changed as things trundle along into another disaster like we had last time?

Dr Farren: We need to know what it is that people are seeking by way of change. For perhaps far too long, we have been indulging in generalities, and have therefore been unable to give clear meaning as to what we are seeking. Therefore, we get tied up in those generalities in an unhelpful way.

When you hear me say that certain matters need not be resolved until after restoration, you may think that I simply want to shove them into the long grass and forget about them. That is not the position that I am adopting; it is certainly not the position that the SDLP is adopting. We want the matters that can be resolved to be resolved. Frankly, however, we do not have time to resolve all the matters concerning the operation of the institutions. We need wider consultations.

After all, some matters involve the two Governments, yet they are not represented round this table, even though it would be helpful to know their views. The agreement was, in part, an international agreement. Therefore, if you want to renege on some or all of it, you would have to make the case not just to us but also to others. We need to get on with the business of identifying the issues and how we can resolve the essential ones before restoration; we can have a clear timetable for resolving other issues after restoration if necessary.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Ian Paisley.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker. Seán, you invoked the memory of Charles Stewart Parnell; he is an interesting character for a member of the SDLP to choose from the pantheon of nationalist leadership. He was, as I am sure you know, implicated in the Phoenix Park murders; he was involved in what was commonly described as “felon setting” in the nineteenth century; and his political career was brought to an abrupt and scandalous end by his affair with Kitty O’Shea. No doubt, we find that he, like all our heroes, had feet of clay.

In the onward march of the Irish nation that you describe, would you accept — and I think that you do — the legitimacy of Northern Ireland as a state? The SDLP accepts the legitimacy of the Police Service of Northern Ireland and of the Court Service. However, it is clear from the toing and froing in the Committee last week that Sinn Féin does not accept the legitimacy of the state nor of the police, and it would not recommend the Court Service. Is that a huge obstacle to progress?

Dr Farren: I am sure that anyone whom I quoted, whether from British or Irish history or from the history of any other nation, could prove controversial. I could quote St Paul and talk about the persecution that he wreaked on Christians before his conversion on the road to Damascus to show that he, too, had feet of clay. No doubt, anyone who was familiar with Parnell’s biography would know that he had feet of clay — like all of us round this table, were we humble enough to admit it. I quoted him to highlight the point that he made in the quotation, not to trawl through his biography or to invite a commentary on any other aspect of his political career. You have pushed things out of my mind by such questions.

The SDLP accepts, as the Good Friday Agreement indicates, the status of Northern Ireland, and it accepts the conditions under which any change to its constitutional status might be effected. That is sufficient answer to the points that you make. It is up to Sinn Féin, or any other party, to answer for how it regards —

Mr Paisley Jnr: I accept that it is up to others to answer for their own position. However, do you accept that a party that wants to be a major party in Government but which views the state as illegitimate, does not recommend the police and dismisses the courts as unacceptable is a quantum obstacle for us to address? Nevertheless, we must address it if we are to resolve our difficulties.

Dr Farren: I am sure that Sinn Féin will correct me if what I am going to say now is incorrect from its point of view. I accept, acknowledge and recognise that Sinn Féin was a party to the Good Friday Agreement and, therefore, that it accepts the obligations and commitments that it entered into under the agreement. That is all that I have to say on that matter.

Mr Paisley Jnr: The SDLP submission referred to the problems of sectarianism and division in our community. Could we digress for a moment to discuss some practical areas? You will know that for the past 33 years the SDLP has been the major controlling faction in Down District Council. Can you tell us why you think that no Democratic Unionist Party councillor has been fit to share power with on that council? I am talking about the top two posts.

Dr Farren: This answer is not a cop-out; it is simply stating my ignorance of the details of the operation of power sharing in Down District Council. I am not familiar with the council, but I do know that representatives of the unionist community have been involved at various levels and, I think, even to the highest level in it. Margaret Ritchie answered charges made against her council when she last attended this Committee; she has been a member of the council for over 20 years and was able to answer in more detail than I am. Perhaps you were not here.

I think it is unhelpful for us to keep stoking up the history of these matters. The point that I was making was that we needed reassurances for the future, because we cannot rewrite the past. I also said that power-sharing partnerships might not always have operated in the best possible ways, but that people work within the parameters set by the conditions and circumstances in which they find themselves. As members of the SDLP, and knowing the general discussions that had taken place on the issue of partnership down through the years, we attempted to put into effect, in whatever circumstances we found ourselves, what seemed to be the best possible approach to realising partnership.

Circumstances varied from council to council. By pointing to one council and comparing it to another, you may well find that we were remiss and that we were not operating to the same principles and procedures in all of the councils. However, circumstances and partnership evolved over the years, not according to any overall strategy but as a matter of principle. Efforts were made to work out that principle in the circumstances in which one found oneself.

The SDLP has certainly stood by the notion of partnership right from the reorganisation of local government in 1972. Our record in that regard is one of which we can be very proud. I think that it has been exemplary in many respects, with due regard to the problems that can arise in particular councils.

You represent the same constituency that I do, and you know yourself that your colleagues in Ballymoney Borough Council have operated in the past — though not in recent years — a more positive approach towards the involvement of my colleagues, indeed to the point where I have heard some of them say that they would get a better deal out of the DUP than they would out of the UUP.

However, that is certainly not the tune they would be humming when it comes to Ballymena Borough Council, where the very reverse is the case. It was only under the influence of a UUP-majority council that an SDLP councillor was nominated to the post of deputy mayor, very much against the opposition of the DUP. The DUP is now the dominant party in that council, and it has almost excluded even the UUP, where possible, from any co-responsibility or sharing of responsibility. My colleague John Dallat reminds me that the DUP abstained when an SDLP councillor was nominated for the post of mayor in Coleraine.

We have a lot to point at should we want to score points against one another. However, the main point is the reassurances that can be given with respect to the future, as we cannot rewrite the past.

Mr Paisley Jnr: You indicate that this was perhaps an unhelpful discussion. I certainly accept that it is possibly very unhelpful to the SDLP's position, because although you are talking the talk of partnership, the facts in Down District Council have shown 33 years of exclusion of partnership — especially if partnership should mean the Democratic Unionist Party. In Down District Council there is nothing to describe as exemplary practice as far as the representatives of unionism are concerned.

To speak bluntly, Seán, I view your answer as a cop-out in that regard. The areas of great nationalist bias that you mention are Ballymena and Coleraine. If you were to look at press reports, you would probably throw Lisburn and Castlereagh into the equation.

Dr Farren: Yes.

Mr Paisley Jnr: That appears to be an SDLP trend. However, figures in those areas of great nationalist subjection prove that the nationalist population is growing; the nationalist electorate has increased and is not being subjugated whatsoever. In areas such as Strabane, Newry, Londonderry and Magherafelt, on the other hand, the unionist population is being excluded and driven down — and out — in numbers as an electorate and a community. That cannot be dismissed as simply being a rising sectarian headcount, because the Roman Catholic birth rate has also fallen in all those areas.

It may be easy to talk the talk of partnership and to point the finger at Protestant Ballymena or unionist Ballymoney, but on the other side of the equation the picture is not as pretty or as rosy as you suggest.

Mr Dallat: Mr Chairman, perhaps Mr Paisley would take some information about power sharing. His submission today is based on a statement made by Gregory Campbell over the weekend.

At present in Coleraine Borough Council the SDLP has the chairmanship of one committee. For the past two years, we had no participation in power sharing at all. The only external body that the SDLP was allowed to be involved in was the Northern Ireland Housing Council, and I was removed from that this year and replaced by Dessie Stewart. In 33 years, the SDLP has never had representation on the education and library board, the health boards or any other boards. This is a very poor example of power sharing.

The one electoral ward highlighted by the DUP in Coleraine in which the Catholic population has increased is Coleraine Central. The reason for that is that 200 attacks on Catholic families in other parts of the town caused the population to cluster in that particular area.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Although that was a point of information and may have been of some succour to the SDLP, the offices that have been given to the SDLP in Coleraine Borough Council significantly outweigh anything that has been given to the Democratic Unionist Party in 33 years in Down District Council. My point is that unionists have given more than nationalists have in areas in which they dominate.

2.00 pm

Dr Farren: I was tempted to do what I had cautioned against, which was to revisit the past and take our eyes off the future. Returning to the fundamental point, we need reassurances because, however good or bad we have been at trying to be inclusive and to involve each other's community through its representatives, we have not yet succeeded in convincing each other that we really mean what we say, however sincere we are in our own convictions. Therefore, the reassurances must essentially be about the future and putting mechanisms in place, in so far as we can, that will ensure that we can convince each other that, by working together, we can create a proper spirit of partnership.

The debate has perhaps been helpful in that it has posed a challenge to us — a challenge that is very much underlined by the point that Ian Paisley Jnr made. It cannot be denied that, in certain parts of Northern Ireland, the demographic composition has changed and that some, and perhaps much, of that change has been a result of pressures that we have applied to one another.

In my constituency — Ian Paisley Jnr and other Members can relate to this — even where there has been little or no conflict, a concentration of one side has resulted in some villages almost changing their complexion as regards religious affiliation, if I may put it like that. That is particularly so in villages that are mixed in ratios of 60:40 or 70:30, with the 60% and 70% on the increase and the 30% and 40% on the decreased. That has happened on both sides of the community.

Twenty years ago, I canvassed certain areas because they were mixed. Now, apart from a quick leaflet drop to show that I was there, I can honestly put my hand on my heart and say that I no longer canvass those areas. The resources at my disposal are not enough to devote the time, and I do not believe in deathbed conversions, in that no one will change from being a supporter of the DUP to a supporter of the SDLP, or Seán Farren in particular, in the last two weeks of an election campaign. We can all see that happening, and that is regrettable.

In some areas, the pressures have been direct, where there has been a high level of paramilitary activity, whether that emanates from a loyalist or a republican source. It has also been indirect, where issues around parades or walks — or however we describe them — have made people feel uncomfortable. The display of flags indicates ownership of places. That makes those who do not feel part of that place, or who do not have any allegiance to the flag on display, very uncomfortable, with the result that they leave that area.

We all share responsibility for that, and there is no point in one side blaming the other and not accepting responsibility for at least indirectly contributing in some way. That needs to be addressed when we talk about a shared future. Will our future be two separate futures or a shared future? Will there be some element of co-ownership of the institutions so that there can be co-ownership of the places where we live, or will we condemn ourselves to perpetual segregation on an almost South African apartheid basis?

Is that the future that we envisage? It is certainly not what I envisage. Whatever the problems are, they must be addressed, and we need to come up with strategies to tackle them.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I would agree with everything that you have said about villages changing character. It is probably a pattern that can be seen across Ulster. I can certainly identify with Dunloy and Rasharkin, which have changed considerably, and I am sure that you could identify with other areas. Even in the north end of Ballymena there has been deliberate putting-up of flags by republicans and dissidents trying to paint a particular picture there, and it does not help — you are absolutely right. I am sure that we could point to all sorts of things.

On the issue of co-ownership, I am sure that you would agree that for it to work the one thing that we require is trust. The Belfast Agreement, which you have quoted from, indicates that the majority of both sections of the community — the majority of unionists and the majority of nationalists — must agree. It is pretty clear that the majority of the majority community do not agree with the Belfast Agreement anymore. Let us not discuss whether they ever did. I have not heard anything yet from any of the presentations about how you propose to win the support of the majority of the unionist community for a failed agreement that failed to build on trust?

Alasdair was very straightforward when he said today that there has been a failure to implement the Belfast Agreement. That failure, with all due respect, was not the fault of the Democratic Unionist Party.

Dr McDonnell: It was.

Mr Paisley Jnr: The Democratic Unionist Party did not vote for the agreement. It worked against the agreement, and, as you rightly said, has been determined to undermine the agreement. The failure to implement the Belfast Agreement, which I assume you were really pointing at, was by those parties who were signatories to it. First of all, I would like to know if you accept that the failure to implement the Belfast Agreement was the fault of the parties who were its principal signatories. If so, how would you persuade them to identify the obstacles that were not overcome the last time, and how on earth would they address them this time? The same obstacles seem to be there; they are the obstacles that we have identified in our paper. They appear to be the obstacles that other parties were very concerned about over the past eight years.

Dr Farren: If we were clear about the issues to be addressed, we could get down to the business of addressing them. However, in general, the DUP submission contains many issues that are not unimportant but are marginal to the agreement itself.

Mr Paisley Jnr: But Seán, they were enough to wreck it.

Dr Farren: Pardon?

Mr Paisley Jnr: They were enough to stop it working.

Dr Farren: Issues around parades? Issues around inequality?

Mr Paisley Jnr: All of the issues, including the absence of trust, and all of the issues that have been identified as obstacles have been significant enough, collectively, to wreck the implementation and operation of the Belfast Agreement.

Dr Farren: We are either into a realistic exercise here, or we are simply going to engage in exchanges that do not seem to get us anywhere fast. If we are going to work towards restoration, we need to have a clear sense of what has to be addressed and whether those issues are essential to full restoration — I keep coming back to this point — or whether they are issues that might not have to be fully addressed before restoration takes place and could be put on a timetable for after restoration.

We are not getting close to that, and yet, if we are talking about trust, we need something that we did not have while the institutions were working, which is full confidence that commitments were being honoured. Quite obviously, if we find ourselves in a position where any party around this table, or indeed the two Governments, makes commitments that are essential to the effective restoration of the institutions, they have to be seen to honour them. Only in honouring commitments can one begin to build confidence.

It is out of confidence that we have in each other that trust comes. Trust, as most people now recognise it, is not the ingredient that one starts with. If I make a contract with somebody to do a job for me, I make a down payment, perhaps, because the person has signed the contract for the job. However, what confidence do I have that he will do the job until he starts to do it? When the job is complete, he receives the balance of the payment.

We are not that different. We are signing a contract with each other, a contract that contains commitments that are based on certain principles that we have agreed are essential to the full implementation of that contract. Therefore we have every right to expect that all parties will honour the commitments immediately — if that is what the agreement says — or within prescribed timetable if that is what is set out. It was the clear failure to do that that led to the breakdown that caused suspension.

Mr Paisley Jnr: May I fast-forward to 24 November? Let us imagine that all parties are ready to form an Executive, but on 23 November the SDLP discovers that one of the parties entitled to be in government continues to be engaged in criminal and/or terrorist paramilitary activity. Would the SDLP consider forming an Executive without that one party?

Dr Farren: I attempted to answer that question earlier. The problems created by something of that magnitude would throw many issues back into the melting pot, and they would have to be addressed. However, I will not give a definitive answer to the Member's question in the terms in which he is seeking it. If any party fails to honour commitments, and that failure is attributable to the party in such a way that shows it to be at fault, then, of course, there is a major problem. There was a major problem in 2002 when we failed, after several hesitant starts, to achieve full decommissioning. It was the increasing lack of confidence that progress would ever be made on that issue — which all sides considered to be fundamental — that led to the current suspension.

Mr Paisley Jnr: If you have a contract or a deal — irrespective of having trust — and someone breaks the deal in good faith or bad faith, I would assume that there would be a penalty for such an action. The penalty would surely be the scenario that I have outlined to you: if it was discovered on 23 November that one of the parties to the contract was not fully doing what it was supposed to do, it would be excluded, and we could count on your support, if it was required, to ensure that that party was excluded, and we could move on until that party became ready, grown up and mature enough to be part of an Administration.

Dr Farren: Ian, I do not think that the issue would be as easily resolved as that, because we are not working for failure; we are working for success. Therefore to start anticipating all possible contingencies only begins to create an expectation that someone might prefer one contingency to another — and perhaps over what we all would regard as the best possible outcome. So let us go forward.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I am going on form, Seán; I am not going on semantics.

Dr Farren: The circumstances now are that all parties are around the table, and there is the prospect of the two Governments becoming involved. You absented yourself for a considerable time in the negotiations in 1997 leading up to the Good Friday Agreement. You dipped one toe in and you kept another toe out in the operation of the agreement; you used the operation of the institutions to your advantage in a manner that I would describe as dishonest. However, leaving that aside —

Mr Paisley Jnr: Thank you.

Dr Farren: At the risk of someone jumping in to say why it was not dishonest, that was the attitude and approach that the DUP adopted. We are all round the table here. Let us make the best of this opportunity to get the best solution. If we do not get the best solution, we will have to address the problems that arise from that. It would be foolhardy in any negotiations to start to draw up a list of contingent possibilities, because they would then become the more attractive approach to some. That is certainly not an avenue that the SDLP is going to go down.

2.15 pm

Mr Paisley Jnr: I agree that it would be foolhardy, but surely you accept the philosophy of “fool me once, shame on you; fool me twice, shame on me”. There are things that one learns from history and from past political events where people may have been fooled, conned or taken in big style, as some people once described it. It is important that we get this issue resolved. Democrats and the unionist parties need to know where the SDLP stands on this crucial issue. If one of the parties defaults, do we move on without it, or will it be ultra-cautious again and try to get that party back on board? At what point does the SDLP take the crossing of the Rubicon to be a point of no return?

Dr Farren: However attractive the DUP might find the idea of my enunciating another approach, I am not going to do so, no matter how often you ask the question. I am here working with my colleagues, and the party generally, to successfully resolve the issues that are blocking the restoration of the institutions. That is the objective, and we will work hard to reach that point. If we do not succeed, that is when whatever possibilities, if any, are open to the parties here to address. I will not go any further than that.

Dr McCrea: A resolution of the issues involves facing the issues, so there is no point in us running away from any of the issues. If they are an impediment, we have to face them and deal with them. That is how one endeavours to at least seek a resolution. I want to ask you a straightforward question, Seán. What do you think brought down the Executive?

Dr Farren: As the SDLP sees it, the fundamental failure that brought down the Executive was the failure to honour, within the timeframe laid down by the Good Friday Agreement, the commitment to full decommissioning of all paramilitary weapons, as that section of the Good Friday Agreement required. Several efforts had been made, before and after the establishment of the Executive and other institutions, to make progress on the issue. Progress was insufficient and not likely to be sufficient in the manner in which it was being made at the time. Progress of a considerable kind has been made since, but I am focusing on the issues that led to suspension. There were significant contributing factors, not least the continuing campaign to destabilise the institutions that were conducted by the DUP.

Dr McCrea: We knew you would have blamed us somewhere.

Mr Morrow: We have been waiting for that.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): No interruptions, please.

Dr Farren: In a way it was dishonest. I would have had far more respect for the DUP had it decided from the outset of the Good Friday Agreement, which it had not been party to negotiating, that it was such a terrible agreement that the only honest way to behave was to stay outside the institutions and become an opposition, rather than take ministerial posts where they were half-in and half-out.

That would have been an honest way forward, and the way that any party of integrity should have taken. However, your party failed to take that route, and instead worked within the institutions, in all kinds of ways, to destabilise them. How could greater confidence be expected to grow in the unionist community when your party's approach to participation in the institutions was as dishonest as it was?

I regard decommissioning as the fundamental factor, although I am perhaps not in a position to make a judgement as to how possible it was. I have often felt that if some degree of decommissioning had taken place in the immediate aftermath of the referendum in 1998 — on all sides, both loyalist and IRA — decommissioning could quickly have become a less significant issue because people would have seen what it was really intended to be — a sign that the campaigns were over. Everybody accepts and recognises that just as whatever crowd down in Lurgan and elsewhere have been trying to do in recent days, getting weapons is not that difficult if one is determined to get them. However, it would have been a sign of, as the agreement says, a: “commitment to exclusively democratic and peaceful means of resolving differences”.

However, the failure to move seems to have been wilful, and some of the things that were said — “not a bullet, not an ounce” was the often-quoted phrase from some spokesperson — contributed to the impression that decommissioning was not going to happen. Of course, even when it was attempted and steps were taken to see if it could happen, they were not enough, and that brought about the inevitable collapse. Obviously, incidents intervened to determine when precisely the collapse would take place, but, unfortunately, it was on the cards much earlier than that.

Dr McCrea: I acknowledge your acceptance of the success of our tactics. At least it is encouraging to know that when one has a good tactic, one should look at it carefully. As regards blame, when I asked you what you thought had brought down the agreement, your response was really that it was the DUP, because it was successful in its tactics.

I notice a greater flow of the terminology of condemnation when it comes to the DUP rather than Sinn Féin. You are very cautious in your words. When you read Hansard, you will find that you mentioned dishonesty and lack of integrity, but you will notice that Sinn Féin is not mentioned in there — it is all directed towards the DUP. That says more about you, because your party should be the last party to go on about dishonesty and integrity. Was it not your Deputy First Minister who was in position and then out of position; he was like your boy in ‘Dallas’ in the shower and came back into the Deputy First Minister’s post again. Dishonesty and integrity would certainly not be terms that you should think of.

May I ask you to reflect on whether any blame was attached to the SDLP for that? You mentioned that when you enter into a contract, you expect people to meet their commitments under that contract. Are there not penalty clauses in a contract too? Seán, was there not a penalty clause for those who did not divvy up to the contract, for those who signed, and were completely committed to, the agreement? They should have been moving the agreement forward, and yet they failed to do so. They did not give up their weapons and all the rest. Was there not a penalty clause that they could be voted out of position? Did the SDLP carry out what it had promised to do should such a thing happen? Did it exercise the penalty clause?

Dr Farren: First, there is no clear penalty clause in the procedures of the Assembly or the Executive that the SDLP could have exercised. One thing that the SDLP might acknowledge about the Good Friday Agreement is that there was a clear expectation that commitments on decommissioning would be honoured. However loose the terminology in the section of the agreement that deals with decommissioning, those of us who were there recognised the positions of the different parties. If we are being honest, we have to acknowledge that there was a clear expectation that decommissioning would be delivered sooner rather than later, or at least that the process would start.

Let us remember that the first significant steps — and they turned out to be not that significant — were not taken until after the agreement was approved and the institutions established at the end of November 1999. The first engagement between Gen de Chastelain and representatives of the republican movement, in particular, could hardly be described as an engagement, as far as I can recollect. The clear understanding or expectation that decommissioning would happen was, unfortunately, not recognised. I have no hesitation in saying that those who were responsible for that failure stand indicted for the responsibility that it carries, because it ultimately brought down the institutions.

Significant attempts were made under various auspices to try to progress the matter. The parties in the Executive accepted steps and initiatives that they hoped would be successful, and time was allowed to test that. They were not successful, and we ran out of time. Perhaps it is an understatement to say that that was regrettable. It was a calamity as far as the SDLP was concerned, because it undermined, for the time being, the hopes, the expectations and some of the progress that we were beginning to make by working together. I do not intend my comments about your dishonesty to be seen as any more critical than my comments about the republican and loyalist movements' failure on decommissioning.

In fact, if you read the newspapers of that time, you will find not only comments in press releases, but opinion pieces that I wrote on behalf of the party clearly expressing the SDLP's criticism of those who had failed on decommissioning. Although the member may choose to use some of my words to show that I am less critical of some than others, that is certainly not my position.

2.30 pm

Dr McCrea: Is the SDLP satisfied that the Provisional IRA has decommissioned all its weapons and ammunition?

Dr Farren: The SDLP does not have any sources or resources to verify that one way or the other. It relies on what Gen de Chastelain and his colleagues reported and what the two Governments believe took place when the final act of decommissioning was said to have happened. The SDLP accepts what the decommissioning body said and believes that that body has integrity and no ulterior motive. The decommissioning body is there to report as factually as it possibly can on what transpired. Knowing, and having met, the members of that body over the years, I fully accept their integrity.

Matters of concern have arisen since the establishment of the decommissioning body, particularly the highlighting of the degree of paramilitary involvement in criminality. The decommissioning body was not charged to deal that, so the Independent Monitoring Commission (IMC) was established. That, and other sources, became the means or mechanism for ongoing reporting on the levels of paramilitary involvement in criminality and the levels of any ongoing paramilitary activity. We must place some degree of trust and confidence in what the IMC reports.

As I said in our presentation, the SDLP has other sources to which it can turn. The views of the Garda Síochána are well placed, and it has no ulterior political motive. It is in a position to indicate what is happening. Where else can we turn to see evidence of ongoing paramilitary activity?

Dr McCrea: There is a discrepancy. Dr Farren said that his evidence came from two sources: the decommissioning body, which the two Governments accept, and the gardaí.

On 9 June, a gardaí spokesman made a statement about the discovery of 10,000 bullets. He is quoted as confirming that they clearly belonged to the Provisional IRA. At the end of his statement, he said that:

"there is a lot of stuff still out there unaccounted for".

Are you satisfied that the IRA has decommissioned all its weapons and ammunition? The decommissioning body stated that the weapons that it saw were decommissioned — although nobody else has proof of it, but let us accept that. However, Dr Farren's other source is the Garda Síochána, which has clearly stated that there is a lot of stuff still out there unaccounted for.

What confidence does that give to any community that all the Provisional IRA's weapons and ammunition have been decommissioned? How could you suggest that all of that was decommissioned?

Dr Farren: I do not have any clear answer to the last part of your question, other than to accept the word of the agencies that were established to make the judgement that you are seeking. I think — and this is a personal comment that many other people could make as well — that having come through a conflict, we can go back over the decades. Ulster Volunteer Force (UVF) rifles from 1912 and 1913 could well be discovered in working order in somebody's thatch somewhere across the length and breadth of the North, and perhaps elsewhere as well. Would that be evidence that that body was still active because it had armed itself at that particular time? Pikes from 1798 have been found, and, indeed, all kinds of weaponry have been found going back over many centuries.

Dr McCrea: Perhaps, to assist you, Seán —

Dr Farren: Perhaps I am being a bit facetious in order to make a point. I was never involved. I never wanted to be involved and, except for what I read in books, I have absolutely no knowledge of the ways and means of a paramilitary organisation. Therefore, all I can offer is my observation of the situation. Just as they are still digging up bombs from the Second World War in cities in Britain, there may well be pipes stuffed with all kinds of ammunition and weaponry here, which have long since fallen off somebody's inventory or never were on anyone's inventory. Really, though, I am not sure —

Mr Morrow: Well, then it would be helpful —

Dr Farren: I am not sure that —

Mr Morrow: I want to fast-forward the discussion from 1798 to —

Dr McDonnell: To go back to 1690?

Mr Morrow: We did not take the discussion back to that date. I hope that you noted who did.

Does the SDLP have any views on who murdered Denis Donaldson? That murder did not happen that long ago.

Dr Farren: No.

Mr Morrow: You have no views on that at all?

Dr McCrea: I wish to stay on the subject of weaponry. The two supposedly independent witnesses — at least one of them, Fr Alex Reid, was very open — acknowledged that no modern weaponry was decommissioned. Those are not weapons from way back. We can forget about weapons from the 1700s; we can forget about the 1800s and even the early 1900s. We should concentrate on recent times because it was suggested that no modern weapons were decommissioned. Therefore, with regard to all the weapons that are known to have been brought in recently — the guns from Florida, and so on — we have been told that none of those were decommissioned. Therefore, how can the SDLP be sure that the IRA has decommissioned all of its weapons and ammunition?

Dr Farren: I do not know, and how can you be sure, if I can put the question back to you? However, since you are asking me the questions, I can only answer.

The serious point that I was making with my historical allusions was that weapons from any period, if they are still in working order, can be as destructive as the most modern weapons. Perhaps Fr Alex Reid has knowledge about weaponry that I do not have, but I am not in a position to distinguish between modern and not modern weapons. Armies are probably still using weapons that were manufactured in the 1950s and 1960s.

Indeed, I have read that the US still has battleships in operation that were commissioned during the Second World War. However, I am referring to the destructive capacity of those weapons, not their modernity or their age.

Dr McCrea: I would need to be convinced because I represent those people who would probably be the recipients — as we have been in the past — of the effectiveness of those weapons. Therefore, it is important that we be convinced.

Is the SDLP satisfied that the IRA has ended all paramilitary activity?

Dr Farren: That is a question on which I can make only a non-definitive comment. In so far as I can judge, it seems that there is no desire — and certainly no appetite — in the communities for a return to violence. Therefore, any intent that might exist, however latent, does not have any support at present.

Dr McCrea: Mr McCartney was murdered after the ceasefire. There is much debate and speculation by all parties, not just the unionist parties, concerning Mr McCartney's murder. Are you clearly stating that the IRA had no part in the McCartney murder?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I would underline that a court case is ongoing.

Dr Farren: I am not sure how I can usefully answer that question because it could imply — you would have to tell me whether this is the case — that that was part of a concerted campaign. It does not seem to me to have been part of a concerted campaign. The judicial proceedings will reveal — or not reveal — whether the people involved had some association with a paramilitary organisation. Therefore, until that happens, I am not in a position in this forum to offer any definitive answer to your question.

It seems to me that people who were associated with the republican movement had some involvement, in some form or fashion, in the incidents that took place. However, I cannot go over and beyond that. I rely on newspaper reports that are already in the public domain.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I remind members that this is sub judice because a case is ongoing. Members must be careful.

Dr McCrea: Is there a case on Mr Donaldson?

Mr Morrow: No, there is no case.

Dr McCrea: Mr Donaldson — Denis Donaldson, as he would be known in this place — was murdered. Is it acceptable to say that when a person murders someone, all he or she has to say is that it was not carried out with the official sanction of the leadership? Do you accept that kind of cop-out?

Dr Farren: Are we talking in general terms? I could only answer that question in general terms, and not with respect to any particular incident.

There are all kinds of speculation in the press. I have absolutely no knowledge about who may have been responsible for the murder of Mr Donaldson.

Dr McCrea: He is dead, anyhow.

Dr Farren: William, I am not going to enter into that issue in this particular context. If we are having a casual conversation outside, we can discuss all kinds of speculation that has appeared in the press on this or any other issue. If you want to formulate the other part of your question more clearly, I will try to answer it, with respect to people being under, or not under, direction from the leadership, but I cannot and will not comment on an individual case.

Mr Morrow: One thing is very noticeable in all your answers today. You are afraid to name the elephant in the room, unless that elephant is the DUP. You are quite vociferous, direct and deliberate in naming the DUP as being dishonest, belligerent or not up to the mark. However, when it comes to Sinn Féin/IRA or to what would be termed the nationalist side of the community, you seem very reluctant to give direct answers. Do you have a problem with that, or are you selective in your condemnation?

Dr Farren: I have no such problem.

Mr Morrow: You seem to have.

Dr Farren: The Hansard report will show —

Mr Morrow: It will.

Dr Farren: — that I have referred directly to Sinn Féin; that I have mentioned the IRA and the UVF and loyalist paramilitaries; and that I have used the general term “paramilitaries” to cover all paramilitaries. If you want to write my script for me —

Mr Morrow: No, I do not.

Dr Farren: — in your terms, you are welcome to have a go. I will answer the questions in the terms that seem appropriate to me. I have no difficulty whatsoever in pointing out shortcomings when I see them. I have done so.

Mr Morrow: You have not done that.

Dr Farren: When is enough enough?

Mr Morrow: That is my view, and I am entitled to it.

Dr Farren: Is the DUP going to put words into my mouth continuously —

Mr Morrow: I am not putting words into your mouth.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Gentlemen, you must speak one at a time, otherwise the Hansard reporters will hear nothing.

Mr Morrow: We hear nothing but weasel words all the time.

2.45 pm

Dr Farren: To describe what I say as “weasel words”, as Mr Morrow does, is very unhelpful to what I regard as the essential nature of the way forward. I am trying not to be confrontational for most of the time; however, when I feel that it is necessary to confront the issues, I will confront them and will name names.

Mr Morrow: But not today.

Dr Farren: I must say that I deeply resent that. You are trying to suggest that I am not prepared to call a spade a spade where necessary.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Dr Farren has been asked questions, and I must let him answer.

Mr Morrow: He is being evasive.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Members may answer questions in the way that they want.

Mr Morrow: That is all right; he is allowed to answer in that way.

Dr McDonnell: There must be some protection for my colleague, who has been honest, open and frank.

Mr Morrow: And transparent.

Dr McDonnell: And transparent, as Mr Morrow says, in all that he has said over the past hour or more. It is important that that be recognised. There is no point in badgering one another; it gets us nowhere.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): When a question has been asked, all we can do is expect an answer. However, people may answer the question in whatever way they see fit.

Mr Morrow: That is fair enough, but we are allowed to have our view.

Dr McCrea: I understand Alasdair’s very protective attitude to his colleague, but I did not hear that same call for protection when some of us were accused of being complicit in murder over the past two weeks. I heard no protests from the SDLP on that; in fact, there was dead silence. I am glad that protection of Committee members is now an issue. Let us go on from there —

Dr McDonnell: I must answer that. I was not in the room when those comments were made, but I can assure you that if Dr McCrea is attacked on another occasion, I will jump to his defence.

Dr McCrea: That is very reassuring. Is the SDLP satisfied that the IRA has ended all its criminal activity, provisionally? The last IMC report states that IRA members, and former members, continue to be heavily involved in serious organised crime, including counterfeiting and the smuggling of fuel and tobacco.

Dr Farren: We are very concerned about the involvement of any paramilitary organisation, including the IRA, in criminality. Evidence that such involvement is continuing creates huge difficulties for the exercise in which we are engaged. That is why we stress the need for clear understandings and undertakings to be made on all the key issues that stand in the way of restoration. If a paramilitary organisation that is in any way associated with a political party continues in criminal activity, issues will have to be addressed.

Dr McCrea: Yes, but I asked specifically whether the SDLP is satisfied that the Provisional IRA has ended all its criminal activity. If it has not, and the last two IMC reports say that it has not, should Sinn Féin be permitted into an Executive? The two Governments and the two Prime Ministers, the President of the United States and the international community say that the IRA and Sinn Féin are inextricably linked.

Dr Farren: I return to the point that I have made several times about working to create the conditions in which it will be possible to have restoration on an inclusive basis as far as the formation of the Executive is concerned: that is the task with which we are charged; that is the task to which we should address ourselves, and we have to assume that the conditions can be created. If the conditions essential for restoration cannot be achieved by the 24 November deadline — and we have been involved in this exercise for only three weeks — we will be faced with a new scenario, and the Governments have indicated, in general terms, the direction in which that scenario is likely to take us.

Dr McCrea: Seán, are you suggesting that we wait? The last two IMC reports stated that the IRA is still up to its neck in criminality — fuel laundering, money laundering, extortion, tax evasion and smuggling. We may get an IMC report that says that that is not happening, but, as you know, the IRA has a wonderful way of turning violence off and on when it suits, as we have seen with parades. Therefore, if an IMC report says that IRA criminality has ceased, does the SDLP expect unionists to accept that as the final word? Because IRA activity is not going on at a particular moment, does that mean that it has ended?

Dr Farren: Time will tell whether that turns out to be the case, but we must have some guidance from an authoritative source on the ongoing situation. Politically, we are charged with trying to create, so far as we can, the conditions whereby restoration can be achieved. Some of those conditions will be directly under our control and influence; others may not. Where particular activities impinge on our business, the responsibility lies with those who are behind them either to take note of their effect and do something about them or not. If the leaders of paramilitary organisations — and there are paramilitary organisations on both sides, and in saying that I also accept the particular responsibility for those who are associated with Sinn Féin — choose to continue their involvement with criminality, they must realise the impact that that will have on the political process.

Our task here is to do what we can. We can say that these are the conditions, and this is how we address them to ensure that they are met. If others choose to behave in ways that undermine those conditions, responsibility for the political effects of their behaviour rests on them. I acknowledge your doubts and suspicions, and those of your colleagues, William; nevertheless, let us use the time available to apply our influence and power to create those conditions.

If others undermine us, well, they undermine us — but they had better know that they are undermining us.

Dr McCrea: Does the SDLP believe that support for the police, the forces of law and order, and the justice system should be a condition of entry into government or a term of a Pledge of Office?

Dr Farren: Yes, a Pledge of Office must make it clear that all parties to an Executive support all the institutions that are under, or are likely to come under, the Executive's control. I imagine that that includes all policing and justice systems.

I do not believe that the issue has to be made a precondition in the strict sense of the word. However, we do have to have clear undertakings and understandings with regard to what steps Sinn Féin — the only party to withhold support from the policing arrangements — will take to ensure that that deficit is made good.

Devolution of policing and justice is an essential part of making our new political arrangements a success. We must have wholehearted support for, and commitment to, the police and hold them fully to account. The SDLP has taken that step, not to give blind support to the police but, as politicians, to ensure accountability of the policing service. That is the step we want to see everyone taking. There should be no question of some existing attitudes towards the police being allowed to persist longer than is necessary. Certain attitudes are evident in many places and are cultivated directly by supporters of Sinn Féin to ensure that the police are given the worst possible name and reputation.

Dr McCrea: But it is a fact that none of your colleagues, or anyone associated with the SDLP, has been shooting the police for the last 30 years.

Dr Farren: We never were.

Dr McCrea: I acknowledge that. Therefore, it will take more than undertakings and understandings when it comes to a party that was connected with an organisation that has been shooting and blowing up the police for the past 30 years.

Dr Farren: We need to recognise that we require those understandings and undertakings. If their nature is not to your satisfaction, you will be able to say so when they are being provided. Let us see what they are before shooting them down.

Dr McCrea: What objections does the SDLP have to the institutional aspects of the comprehensive agreement?

Dr Farren: I instanced some of those earlier. One objection is the mechanism whereby any party that did not assent to the full membership of the Executive would be excluded immediately. After all, Executive members are nominated by their parties; they are not subject to any kind of veto, direct or indirect, by other parties. Therefore, the proposal that any party would be excluded because it did not agree to the members nominated by other parties is ridiculous one and runs contrary to the spirit of inclusivity. It should not be accepted.

I understand that your colleagues may have been reconsidering that proposal, among others, in the comprehensive agreement since it was published. I do not have the full document in front of me, but that is one of the most concerning proposals it contains.

Dr McCrea: If the institutional aspects of the comprehensive agreement were legislated for, would the SDLP take its place in government?

3.00 pm

Dr Farren: I have said repeatedly that the SDLP rejected many of the proposals. There are some to which we would not strongly object and some to which we would not object at all. However, as a package, the SDLP does not accept the comprehensive agreement as a basis on which to achieve restoration. If, however, the DUP or any other party suggests proposals, some of which are contained in the so-called comprehensive agreement, we are, of course, here to consider them and try to resolve any outstanding difficulties that we have with them. The suggestion by Mr Hanson in a recent debate that, because of its mandate, the DUP's demands had to be met without recognition of the other parties' positions seems to be an outrageous position for any democrat to adopt.

Dr McCrea: Is the SDLP prepared to consider alternatives other than the structures of the Belfast Agreement?

Dr Farren: I am not sure what the member meant by "structures".

Dr McCrea: There are plenty of structures in the Belfast Agreement.

Dr Farren: You are asking the question; you tell me.

Dr McCrea: And I want you to answer me. Are you willing to consider other alternatives?

Dr Farren: William, if I do not understand the question, I can hardly be expected to answer it. I do not understand what you mean by "structures". If you were to spell out some proposals, I might be in a position to take note of them.

Dr McCrea: Is the SDLP willing to consider alternatives to the Belfast Agreement? Does that help?

Dr Farren: Introducing the SDLP presentation this morning, I said that the SDLP regards the Good Friday Agreement/Belfast Agreement as the basis on which we need to move forward. We stand by that position. If the new arrangements or modifications that the DUP wants are spelled out, the SDLP is prepared to consider those. We must be prepared; it is not a gratuitous preparedness. Among other things, we are here to consider the difficulties that prevent restoration.

In so far as I understand them, and even though the SDLP did not agree with many of them, the DUP's proposals were essentially cast within the context of the Belfast Agreement/Good Friday Agreement. However, after that late-night meeting in Leeds Castle, the DUP never responded to the SDLP's recommendations. I also underline that many of those issues are review issues and do not relate to the fundamental difficulties that prevent the restoration of the institutions.

Dr McCrea: What issues does the SDLP believe need to be addressed under the review of the operations of the Belfast Agreement?

Dr Farren: I outlined some issues that we need to discuss, such as: ensuring greater collective responsibility, accountability and efficiency; procedures with respect to the North/South Ministerial Council; the ministerial code; the Pledge of Office; and so on. That should not be taken as a complete list. The SDLP prepared papers on those issues, many of which we exchanged with the DUP. If you talk to your colleagues Nigel Dodds or Peter Robinson, you could ask them whether they have any recollection of or, indeed, retain copies of our proposals.

Dr McCrea: We have copies, so do not worry. We exchange copies of all those things.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): It is after 3.00 pm, and there are still a number of members who have to put their questions.

Dr McCrea: I have one more question for Seán. If the SDLP were satisfied that the IRA — the Provisionals — continued to engage in paramilitary and criminal activity, would it consider forming an Executive without Sinn Féin?

Dr Farren: Again, this is a question that has been asked in various ways throughout the last hour, and my point about the inclusive principle stands as the response. If the Member wants me to rearticulate what I mean by that, I will, but I think he will find that the answer is adequately covered in responses to himself or his colleague — I think it was Ian who raised the question. David or Danny raised a similar point. So the answer is there. However, I am prepared to go back over the issue if the Member wishes.

Dr McCrea: That is OK.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We will take a 15-minute comfort break at this stage, and we will resume the questioning when we come back.

Mr Morrow: That will start with me?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Yes.

The Committee was suspended at 3.06 pm.

On resuming —

3.24 pm

Mr Morrow: There is a widespread perception in unionism that the SDLP really does not want a Stormont settlement, that its long-term aspiration is a united Ireland, and that anything short of that would contradict what its former leader Mr Hume said at one time, which was that it was “a united Ireland or nothing.” How would the SDLP answer that allegation?

Dr Farren: I wonder where the basis for that perception lies. That comment from Mr Hume was a response to a question that he was posed following the incidents on Bloody Sunday in Derry. He had been asked what people in Derry were saying. He was reflecting a sentiment that was being expressed on the streets, not necessarily his own particular view at the time.

Let us fast-forward to the present. I do not think that you can find any statement by the SDLP, at the time of the agreement in 1998 or since, which says other than that as far as the future is concerned it is for the people of Northern Ireland to determine the constitutional status of Northern Ireland if they are called upon to do so.

Equally, as far as a united Ireland is concerned, the SDLP regards the institutions and the principles of the Good Friday Agreement as institutions and principles that are eminently transferable to a changed constitutional status such as would arrive after a referendum that determined that the future of Northern Ireland should be within an all-Ireland context. The protections and guarantees, and indeed the institutions, would persist into that new arrangement.

Arriving at such a situation would be the product of working together and the partnership that would be created between our two main communities, transferred through to the electorate. It would, therefore, be a process whereby people were ultimately persuaded of the value — not just the desirability but the value — and the case for constitutional change. A change towards a united Ireland constitutional status would be the product of the Good Friday Agreement.

In that sense, I do not think that the SDLP regards the Good Friday Agreement as simply a transition to be left behind. As I said earlier in response to other questions regarding changes to the operation of the Good Friday Agreement within our current constitutional status within the UK, the agreement provides us with what could be loosely described as a living constitutional framework. It is open to all to influence its future direction, provided that we do so on the basis of clear democratic principles and peaceful means — as they would not be democratic if they were not peaceful.

The quotation from Parnell that I gave earlier in the meeting is again apt:

“No man has a right to fix the boundary of the march of a nation.”

Europe was mentioned earlier. Members may be familiar with European history in the immediate post-war period of the early 1950s and the agreements that were entered into over important, but relatively trivial, matters such as the supply of coal and steel between France and Germany. Those agreements developed into today’s European Union; William, states are knocking down doors to join the EU rather than to leave. Even within living memory, situations can change if people want them to change and if there is democratic assent to the proposed changes. Although our situation pales by scale in comparison to the European situation, nonetheless that situation could act as a role model as to how the democratic process can work to achieve almost unimaginable kinds of change in a relatively short period of time.

I am not saying that that is how the situation would develop here; I am simply saying that democracy and peaceful means should be allowed to take their course. You never know where we might end up.

3.30 pm

Mr Morrow: Mr Deputy Speaker, is there anything that the SDLP could say or do that might further convince unionists that it is for real as far as the devolution debate is concerned, or does the SDLP feel that it has done it all?

Dr Farren: Maurice, that is demonstrated by the way in which we addressed our different tasks in the Executive, the Assembly and the North/South Ministerial Council during the short time in which we had an opportunity to display our goodwill. Perhaps he does not wish to personalise the issue, but if he can point to anything that I did as a Minister, or that any of my SDLP colleagues did — or, indeed, Sinn Féin colleagues, whom he would see as being more inimical to unionist interests than he is suggesting that the SDLP is — I would try to take account of what he says.

Like other colleagues in the Executive, I had the privilege of visiting many different parts of Northern Ireland and talking to communities in east Belfast, north Down, south Down, south Fermanagh, mid-

Ulster, west Tyrone, Derry and in Larne in my own constituency. In every location, I was impressed by the warmth of the reception that I received and the goodwill that was expressed to me and my colleagues for what we were trying to do. At no time — unless the usual political issues were being discussed about whether we should adopt this or that scheme — did I meet any opposition or hostility. That gives me hope and convinces me that if we can get back to a position — I should not say “back” because I have been resisting going backwards all afternoon — if we could progress to a position where the inclusive institutions are working again, that commitment could be demonstrated even more.

I hope that that would convince the sceptics in the Member’s own electorate about my bona fides. We must all meet that test, whether it is in our own community or in the other community. Let us hope that we do that.

Mr Morrow: Mr Deputy Speaker, Mr Farren is right; we must all meet tests. The DUP does not have to meet the test of whether it thinks that there should be devolution; the DUP has met that test.

The Member stated that when he was a Minister, he travelled the length and breadth of this country, into unionist and nationalist areas, and he felt warmly received. I am sure that he was totally bewildered as to why councils such as Down District Council could never find it in their hearts to be as warm towards the unionist community. However, I know that the Member is not responsible for that.

Having said that, Dr Farren posed the question to us, and I will pose the same question to him: when is enough enough?

Dr Farren: I posed the question to Mr Morrow in a particular context and with reference to a particular issue. We posed a general question, so if the Member needs to specify what —

Mr Morrow: The nationalist community.

Dr Farren: Sorry?

Mr Morrow: I am asking Dr Farren, as a representative of the nationalist community: when is enough enough?

Dr Farren: Enough of what?

Mr Morrow: When do the demands stop and people start to work? We hear about people fighting and dying for Ireland, but we do not hear about many of them working for Ireland. Would it not be far better if work took over from demands?

Dr Farren: I cannot answer for those who claim that they were fighting for Ireland, because “fighting”, in the military sense, was never part of my agenda, for reasons that I have —

Mr Morrow: That is probably why you are still alive. You do not get my drift. Go ahead.

Dr Farren: I am not really sure how I can answer the question, except to repeat what I said a moment ago. However, I shall not repeat all that I said or demonstrate ways in which I proved my bona fides as a politician. I say the same about the way in which Alasdair and John worked. Indeed, all our party colleagues in the Assembly wanted to demonstrate their bona fides, both to their electorate and to the entire electorate. The concerns and issues that we dealt with extended to those that people on all sides of our community considered important.

Mr McNarry: I wanted to ask this question earlier, Mr Chairman, but obviously we have changed how questions are to be taken today. To return to Seán’s detailed response to Willie on the Executive’s collapse — if Seán can remember what he said — what is the SDLP’s interpretation of the Secretary of State’s powers of exclusion? Was he disappointed that the then Secretary of State turned down requests to exclude? Does he agree that the default mechanisms proved inadequate and that, if we are to move forward, default mechanisms must be improved if they are to be effective?

Dr Farren: Much needs to be improved, and we may need to deal with exclusion methods — if parties want to discuss them. I understand where David McNarry and the UUP and our colleagues from the DUP are coming from when they express some scepticism. To ask for sanctions or exclusion seems to be a way of dealing with the concerns that lie behind their scepticism.

Yes, it may be necessary to look at sanctions, which would apply to whomsoever; however, my point, which I have made several times, is that our main role in Committee is to find a way to deal with the issues. If we cannot do that, all the sanctions in the world will not help us. I have said several times that I believe that inclusivity is a necessity and that we need to try to ensure that we can move forward together. We should not be tempted down the track of looking at sanctions too much at this point, because that would take us away from the main issues.

If we do not, other scenarios present themselves to us. However, we are not at that point. We have been given a challenge; let us meet that challenge and see whether we can come up with the necessary and essential answers to it before 24 November.

Mr McNarry: Mr Chairman, I want you to understand that, perhaps more than any other party, we do have justifications, having been through what we have been through and considering the manner in which we have been cheated and let down. We are probably rightly justified in raising the issue of sanctions and, perhaps, in seeking improvements in sanctions if this Assembly is to be restored.

The detail of confidence that my colleagues in the DUP have laboured on this morning is a reality. We have lived with that and had our confidence beaten down. The sanctions that we believed were there proved not to be there. So if I ask for sanctions next time, it is not on the basis that we have got it correct and that there would be no need for them. The unfortunate reality is that we need the protection of sanctions. That is what I am asking you to accept and, perhaps, support, if it came to that.

If we had had that Russian referee who officiated at the game between Portugal and Holland last night and broke the World Cup record for issuing yellow and red cards, we would have had this sorted out a long time ago.

Mr Morrow: You would have run out of red cards.

Dr Farren: We might all be expelled. Sent off.

Mr McNarry: It was the failure to issue red cards when the public and the electorate expected them to be shown. That was out of our hands and yours, but it was in the hands of the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. We were probably criticised for believing it, but we had no reason not to until it happened. We all thought that the Secretary of State would dish out the red cards, but he did not. He left this place in a terrible situation.

I have raised the issue of sanctions because it is important. I understood that the SDLP was privy to requests for exclusion. That is why I asked about being disappointed when exclusion did not materialise.

Dr Farren: If David's party has proposals around issues of concern, let us hear what they are. I do not have precise details — or, at least, they are not coming back to me with a great deal of precision — but I can recall an exchange between Mark Durkan and the Prime Minister on this during which no clear assurance was given as to where the British Government stood on the matter that he has been talking about. Therefore, we need a wider forum in which to discuss any such concerns.

Fundamentally, the kind of mindset that concerns us, and which seeks to have apparently strong sanctions set in statute and then invoked, sets us on a different line of thinking altogether with regard to the exercise that we are engaged in here.

As I said earlier, it begins to set up contingencies down which some parties might feel it more attractive to go than the road which we should be on and which we have been charged with being on: that is, to see how we can find a way to restore the institutions on the inclusive basis that they operated on before.

3.45 pm

Therefore, at this stage, that is as clear an answer and a guideline as we require. Nothing that I have said prevents parties making their own proposals. However, I am not tempted by or attracted to the big-stick approach forcing us to lay conditions in order to work together. There is no need to have big sticks behind our backs with which to beat each other.

Mr McNarry: It was not just that, Chairman. Dr Farren, you made much in your earlier responses about a contract. You said that you may put down a deposit, but you would not know whether the work was going to be done until it started. I am sure that somewhere in that contract you would have some sanction to protect yourself. It seems to me that unless all the parties are clear and at one on the necessity for safeguards against a possible default, we should say so or we should say that we are not. If there is dissension on this issue — something that you seem to be uncomfortable with, judging by your answer — it needs to be looked at and worked on for the future.

If people think that they can be in breach of a contract that they hold with the SDLP and not be sanctioned because you have no power to sanction them, they will try to do what they have previously got away with — be in breach of anything that they feel is of no use to them. That is where the thing becomes unhinged. Perhaps you would be interested in safeguarding the integrity of what you have agreed to.

Dr Farren: I am not opposed, in principle, to the concept of safeguards. We need safeguards, and that is one of the issues that must be addressed in the attempts to complete the review of the operation of the Good Friday Agreement. Parties will have views on what safeguards are the most effective. The notion of built-in safeguards is inherent in any contract. I am not trying to duck the issue, but I will not give precise views on the nature of safeguards that might be required, because we have not yet got into that discussion.

This part of the exercise is to identify and agree the issues that must be addressed, resolved and progressed to a point where restoration can take place. We also need to engage with the two Governments on many of the issues, because they will have to be party to the final outcome. We will not jump all the hurdles at once; let us tackle the issues that have to be addressed.

Mr McNarry: You said that the basis of these discussions or negotiations is the Belfast Agreement. Do you agree that the safeguards within that agreement proved inadequate and that therefore there is validity in seeking to improve them?

Dr Farren: Strand one of the Good Friday Agreement contains five safeguards. Perhaps not all of them cover all the issues that we have to address.

Mr McNarry: With respect, there are no safeguards in there that would have covered people cheating, going back on their word, reneging on promises and bringing the Government down.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): A question has been asked, so let Seán answer it.

Dr Farren: I said that if parties had proposals with respect to safeguards in the context of reviewing the operation of the Good Friday Agreement, we would not be in a position to — nor would we want to — impose any prohibition on making such proposals. It is impossible; we could not do it, so we would have to listen to you whether or not we agreed with you. At the end of the day, it would be a matter for how we conduct our discussions here or wherever.

Mr M McGuinness: I have a couple of questions for Seán, and I want to thank him for his presentation and his answers.

First, I take exception to the comment from the DUP vis-à-vis Sinn Féin/IRA. I regard it as a malicious and vindictive comment, which has no place in the debate and discussion in which we are currently engaged.

I would also like the Chair to make a ruling on the DUP assertion that this Committee is about the ability of one party to interrogate an individual who represents another party. My understanding of this process is that parties make submissions, and other parties then question the parties on their submissions. That remark by William McCrea was totally and absolutely out of order.

If DUP Members want the opportunity to question an individual — particularly an individual such as myself who was not here at a time last week when they now say that I ran away — I am sure that such an opportunity can be provided. Certainly I can arrange to be here, if you feel so much in need of that facility. However, I would like a ruling on whether or not this is about the DUP having the right to interrogate an individual member of a party or about a party making a submission and other parties being able to question that party.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Basically, the parties make submissions and the questions then come across in different ways, as interrogation or as questions being put in a fairly strong way. Each party has done the same type of thing to other individuals.

Mr Morrow: Exactly, he was not here for it.

Dr McCrea: He ran away.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Certainly, if Members have bigger issues, then Hansard is one way of checking that. The main thing is that the parties make the submission, and it is then open to the other parties to cross-examine them.

Mr M McGuinness: With respect, I think you misunderstand what I am saying — clearly, the DUP misunderstands what I am saying. Hansard will show that earlier today William McCrea made a contribution to this meeting in which he talked about the DUP having questions to ask. I believe that he was specifically referring to me and to the fact that I was away on other business, and he indicated that he had not the opportunity to question me. He was not talking about the ability to question Sinn Féin; he was talking about the ability to question me as an individual. I would like a ruling as to whether this is about parties making submissions and being questioned on the basis of their submissions as opposed to the right of parties to question an individual.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): My understanding is — and we can check with Hansard — that parties make their submission and are cross-examined by the other parties on that submission; it is not about the individual who is making the submission. Individuals have represented parties at different times and at different stages. Sometimes meetings ran on and people changed over. I know that some Members wanted to ask questions this morning, but we have adopted a mechanism whereby when a party starts to ask questions, we continue on with that party. However, it is not about the individual being cross-examined; it is about the party's submission.

Mr M McGuinness: That is clear, so the DUP's remarks were out of order.

I have a number of questions for the SDLP. The SDLP says that the Committee will play a key role in building the confidence necessary to achieve a full return to government. I want to talk about that for a moment, and I also want to ask the DUP to explain specifically what it means in relation to east-west matters.

I am increasingly of the view that the Committee is in some sort of Alice-in-Wonderland scenario or never-never land in relation to its work, which was supposed to be about preparing for Government. Increasingly, we find ourselves listening to DUP contributions at these meetings. Alasdair McDonnell, for example, described the DUP as wreckers in relation to the Good Friday Agreement, and I do not disagree with him at all.

The DUP talked about the Good Friday Agreement being finished —

Mr Morrow: True.

Mr M McGuinness: The DUP talked about the Good Friday Agreement being finished. It says that it has failed, that it has no support, and it talks about changing the agreement. Maurice Morrow has just said that that is true, so I am not misrepresenting what has been said.

That makes it all the more pertinent that we establish whether we are engaged in a time-wasting exercise or whether we are working towards re-establishing the institutions on or before the deadline of 24 November. I am seeking the SDLP's assessment of whether we are dealing with people in the DUP who are seriously engaged with the Ulster Unionist Party, the Alliance Party, the SDLP and Sinn Féin to try to get these institutions up and running. At some stage, the pro-agreement parties must decide whether we are involved in real work or merely sitting through gruelling session after session of nonsense that takes us nowhere.

That question is for the SDLP, but it is asked in the context of the DUP's submission to this Committee. At no stage does that submission mention wrecking the Good Friday Agreement, that the Good Friday Agreement is finished or that the Good Friday Agreement has failed. In fact, the submission describes the Governments' proposals — and these are my words — for the comprehensive agreement that never was. The submission states that the comprehensive agreement set out a mechanism to deal with the accountability of the institutions and how essential it is that such proposals — and I assume that it means the proposals in the comprehensive agreement — are implemented.

Is the SDLP as confused as Sinn Féin and some of the other parties in the room are on where the DUP stands in relation to those matters? At some stage, those parties that are making a genuine effort to try to restore the institutions must make an assessment and decide whether we are involved in real work. From today's contributions, I get no sense whatsoever that we are involved with a political party, namely the DUP, that has any intention of really engaging, not only with Sinn Féin but with all the other parties, vis-à-vis the Good Friday Agreement institutions.

Essentially, I am asking the SDLP for its assessment of where it thinks all this is going.

Dr Farren: Through the Chair, I thank Martin for his question. In brief, it is too early to make that assessment.

This is the first time in my experience, and I think that it has to be the first time in everybody's experience, that we have all the main parties around one table. Whether they have all come here with the same purpose is a different matter. However, we are all here.

4.00 pm

We have engaged in almost two weeks of procedural wrangle — out of which we have been extricated — and have engaged in exchanges, for better or for worse, since last Tuesday. If, like ourselves, you are committed fully to the Good Friday Agreement — and I have no good reason to believe that you are not — and you believe that it is the best way forward, providing the best context in which we can relate to each other in the North and build relationships between the North and the South, and allows us through the British-Irish Council to further improve relationships and developments on an east-west basis, we have a clear obligation to pursue this to the point where we have exhausted ourselves, and we have not reached that point yet.

The prize is too great to begin to make the kind of assessment that you are suggesting. I would be disappointed if I thought that you wanted to make a very early assessment along the lines suggested. I do not know what would be gained by making such an assessment, which would lead to your exit from the process at this stage, and, therefore, I do not share the assumptions. I believe that however negative the messages exchanged across the table are, this is the beginning of an engagement that could end at first base and never get beyond it, or it could have the potential to get us beyond it. That is why it is worth persisting, and we have been given until 24 November. However, it should become clear long before then whether we can agree on something positive.

We have met for one week only — in effect three meetings — and I would not recommend to my colleagues that we pull stumps at this point.

Mr M McGuinness: I never mentioned the word “exit”. I was seeking the SDLP's assessment as to whether we are facing a DUP delegation that is seriously engaging in the work of this Committee to restore the institutions of the Good Friday Agreement. I cited my questions on the contributions made by the DUP representatives, which appeared to me — on the face of it — to be totally hostile to the restoration of those institutions.

The British Prime Minister and the Taoiseach arrive on Thursday, and we then move speedily into the summer period. We will be in a situation where, whatever the good intentions of everybody, many people will go off on holiday and there will be very little opportunity for any sort of engagement. It is incredible that we could expect to come back to all this in September, and to find that the DUP has suddenly, over the summer, had the Damascus-type conversion that Paul had, and come back with a new spirit of the need to engage with the rest of us to restore the institutions.

This is a matter of urgency, and if the DUP is seriously contemplating engaging with the rest of us to restore the institutions, it would be much better doing it sooner rather than later.

Dr Farren: I do not disagree with your last point. I have been involved in several engagements or initiatives over the past 15 years or so, beginning with the Brooke-Mayhew talks in the early 1990s. During that time I did not see the issues, or attitudes towards them, change; but I recognise that we have come a long way from the days of majority rule, which go back earlier than the Prior Assembly. I have seen the change to an acceptance that some form of partnership is needed. Today's agenda is different: in the past, the North/South dimension was to be, at best, an arms-length, almost inconsequential exercise, and equality and human rights did not need to be addressed because, in the eyes of some, there were no issues to be addressed. Considerable progress has been made.

We have engaged in this exercise to hear one another out. Although what we have heard and what has been implied and said could lead us to make negative judgements, it is necessary for us to conclude this part of the exercise and determine where we go from here. Therefore I will not rush to judge whether any party's contribution in the Committee is an indicator of future progress or not.

I want to make progress. I know what the prize is. I hope that we can share the same concept of the prize and that we will work together to achieve it. Therefore I am afraid that I have to leave my judgements, and those of the SDLP, on the DUP to one side for the moment.

Mr M McGuinness: What about east-west issues?

Dr Farren: What is the particular question on east-west issues?

Mr M McGuinness: In your contribution you stated that there are east-west matters that need to be discussed.

Dr Farren: I was making the case that there could be a more enhanced, effective basis to the manner in which the east-west body — the British-Irish Council — would operate. The SDLP has proposals in its review submissions to ensure a more effective basis for that institution. Essentially, that is all that we have at the moment. I do not want to go into the agendas that the body might have, although we are prepared to be indicative about those as well. I was referring to an issue that many had pointed out: the need for a more effective structure and operation for the British-Irish Council, nothing more or less than that.

Mr Ford: I apologise to Seán and to the SDLP delegation for my absence earlier. I was at a funeral. Therefore I shall restrict myself to two or three questions on points that arose during the cross-questioning.

Seán said that we could not resolve everything in the time available until November.

He also talked about remitting some problems to the institutions upon restoration. What problems does he feel that we must deal with at this stage, and what problems could be remitted to the institutions subsequently?

Dr Farren: The essential issues are those that arose around why we have been suspended. Those relate to the question of paramilitarism. A very significant issue that has emerged since the agreement was reached in 1998 is that of paramilitary involvement in criminality. Reassurances and undertakings on that question are necessary.

After that, the issues that could be dealt with, and that might be resolved, or that might have to be remitted to the institutions if not resolved, are those that relate to the review. As members know, the review concerns the operation of the institutions under the agreement. Obviously, any party is free to suggest areas in which they see the need to improve the operation of the institutions. That agenda could be fairly lengthy, depending on what the parties want to see reviewed. However, it could be short, as it may be possible to resolve the issues.

I am not saying that we should not resolve those issues, if we can. However, they are not preconditions — as I understand that term, in this context — to restoring the institutions.

Mr Ford: I am not quite sure what Dr Farren's understanding of "the review" is. We have made it quite clear, from our point of view, that the review has not happened, despite a meeting being held. Other parties seem to think that the so-called comprehensive agreement was something to do with the review.

If he is saying that there are issues that are related to the review that have yet to be resolved, how do we determine what they are? What needs to be done by 24 November?

Dr Farren: In theory, given what I have said, none of the issues that comes under the heading of "the review", whatever that means to parties, must be resolved before then, because it was not those issues that led to suspension in the first place.

If Mr Ford is under any misapprehensions as to how we regard the question of whether the review was concluded, I said several times — in making our presentation, in questions to other parties, and in responding to questions from other parties — that we do not regard the review as having been completed.

A form of review took place, in the sense that parties met the then Secretary of State, or the Minister who had responsibility for political development, from time to time. We discussed issues concerning the review, and, from time to time, we talked to political parties around this table about our concerns and about our proposals to deal with those concerns. However, I have no recollection of a review having been formally completed, and, certainly, with respect to what is in the so-called proposals for a comprehensive agreement, I do not think that that so-called agreement means that the matter is closed.

Mr Ford: In the context of his party's paper on collective responsibility, Dr Farren referred in an earlier answer to greater collectivity. He has explained his concerns about aspects of the comprehensive agreement that would involve the validation of the entire Executive by a vote of the Assembly. Can he tell me of any other democracy in which the executive is not required to be validated by the legislature in some form or another?

Dr Farren: I did not express any opposition to the Assembly's endorsement of the Executive. I expressed the opposition of our party, or any other party, to the nominees from those other parties that would make up the Executive. That is what is required.

4.15 pm

We need to be careful about the way in which we regard the right of the parties to nominate, or otherwise, to an Executive and not to try to circumscribe that in the manner in which the comprehensive agreement tries to.

Mr Ford: Therefore you do not see the question of validating the Executive as any part of increasing collectivity?

Dr Farren: I am not sure that it necessarily would have that effect. Collectivity relates to how the Executive would deal with matters on a day-to-day basis so that we could achieve the highest degree of agreement around the Executive table for what was being proposed. Not only that, but the subsequent support for what the Executive would agree would obviate some of the difficulties that we encountered when Ministers did not enjoy the support of their colleagues. Indeed, sometimes Members actively — and, on a few occasions, passively — influenced their colleagues to vote against proposals that came from a Minister from another party.

We have to achieve greater cohesion in our Executive while at the same time not completely denying or undermining the right, particularly of Committees, to play a role in policy-making or in making alternative suggestions. I am not proposing definitive solutions to those matters; I am giving pointers to the kind of issues that we need to address and, to a certain extent, why we need to address them.

Mr Ford: I appreciate the point. Thank you.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do Committee members have any further questions for the SDLP? If not, we will come to the end of its submission. We were to move to the UUPAG's submission, but we are unlikely to start that at this time of the evening. Therefore, since we have no meeting tomorrow, I propose that we start the UUPAG's submission on Wednesday morning at 10.00 am.

Can we propose the minutes of 20, 21 and 22 June for agreement?

Mr Kennedy: I have a question not so much about the minutes, but about the Hansard report. It would be helpful if, at the outset of each session, an attendance list could be provided. Is that possible? I know that such a list is provided in the minutes and that we can read through it, but, for ease of reference, it is desirable to have one in the Hansard report.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): That could be arranged.

Mr M McGuinness: Do we know, at this stage, exactly what the Committee will be dealing with on Wednesday, apart from the Ulster Unionist Party's submission?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): No. I was going to ask about future work when we have finished with the UUPAG submission.

Mr McFarland: Mr Chairman, it is unclear how long our submission will take, as it depends on the questioning. However, at some stage on Wednesday, we would need to have a discussion about where we go, having heard one another's submissions. At that stage, the way forward will need some mapping. There was a suggestion that we would produce an interim report for debate in the Assembly, although it was not clear whether all the parties were comfortable with having a debate in the Assembly on those issues. That is the sort of discussion that, presumably, the Committee will have to have when our questioning is finished.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We had started to deal with the minutes.

Mr McFarland: Sorry.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Before we get bogged down in the next stage, we should agree the minutes so that we can deal with the issues as we come to them.

Can we deal with the minutes of 23 June?

Mr M McGuinness: Are those the minutes that we were given today in the white envelope?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): No, that is the Hansard report.

Mr O'Dowd: I am sorry, Mr Chairman, but I was not given a copy of the minutes. I was given the Hansard report, but no minutes. Thank you.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Has everyone else got the minutes?

Mr Kennedy: Just to confirm, is that the one that is headed 'Minutes of the Meeting of Tuesday 13 June.'?

Dr Farren: It was a continuous meeting.

Mr Kennedy: Tuesday 20 June, 21 and 22 June?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Tuesday 20 June, 21 and 22 June. It ran as one meeting right through. Do members want a minute or two to read through them?

Mr Kennedy: It is really just a record of those present, who left and who came back.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): OK, so do members agree the minutes? OK. Then we move to the matters arising. There is the letter dated 20 June from the Clerk to the Assembly.

The Committee Clerk: This was about the minutes of the earlier meeting that the Committee was unable to agree. We wrote to the Clerk asking about the procedures for minutes. That letter was copied to members last week, although I suspect that many of you will not have that letter with you.

I have a copy of the minutes that were in contention. The Clerk has written back and has basically said that it is for the Committee to determine its procedures and that includes what it wants to have included in the minutes. It is a matter of whatever consensus you wish to reach. We have since started to use Hansard, so the issue should not arise again. The issue is that on the day members wished to have some matters recorded but could not agree a text. The Committee has to agree a text or else we do not agree the minutes, and those minutes are never published.

Mr Ford: On a technical issue, Mr Chairman, surely we have agreed the minutes already except for three paragraphs.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Those are highlighted in bold, and we have to agree them or not agree them.

Mr M McGuinness: Which minutes are we talking about?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The minutes of 16 June. The section of the minutes up to “Mr McGimpsey rejoined the meeting at 4.47pm” has been agreed.

Mr M McGuinness: What was agreed and what was not?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Up until “Mr McGimpsey rejoined the meeting at 4.47 pm” — that was agreed, and then the Chairman proposed that the rest be agreed.

Mr M McGuinness: So we are talking about from “Mr McGuinness” on?

The Committee Clerk: Do you see “Mr McGimpsey rejoined the meeting at 4.47 pm”?

Mr M McGuinness: Yes.

The Committee Clerk: Everything to that point was cleared. Then, from “Mr McGuinness” and over the page down to “The Chairperson pointed out to members that the meeting was not being taped.” has not been agreed.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We have passed it back and forward to the Clerks and the Speaker, and basically everyone has said that it is up to this Committee to decide how it deals with it. We need consensus, and either we agree the minutes or we cannot agree the minutes, in which case they are really abandoned — it is in the hands of the Committee.

Mr M McGuinness: I do not think that we can agree the minutes because they do not give a complete picture of the comments that I made in the course of my contribution. I was responding to an issue raised by the DUP vis-à-vis the issue of trust and in the context of comments made by the DUP to which I took exception. To have this in the minutes out of context does me a grave disservice.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We now have Hansard recording all that is going on, whereas this section is there because it was asked that it be noted. Are there any other comments?

Mr Kennedy: Chairman, there is no Hansard record available of the exchange that was contentious.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): No. That is right. There is no Hansard and no tape of that.

Mrs D Dodds: Mr Deputy Speaker, it is worth noting for the record that a fairly accurate minute was taken by the Clerks who were here. When the Clerks were asked to note the exchange, this is what they came up with from their notes. It is reasonable to assume that this is exactly what was said in the meeting, even though there is no exact verbatim report on the matter. We should not be running away from that.

Mr M McGuinness: I disagree. It is certainly not an exact record of what I said in the course of that discussion.

Mr McFarland: As I recall, the Committee spent two and a half hours on this issue and could not agree. It is hard to see how we are going to get another Damascene conversion on one side or the other to allow any agreement to take place.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): There is also a question about accuracy where it says that Mr Dodds had been shot at. That has been corrected at that place. We could dance round this again for another hour, but if we do not have consensus on the minutes, can we agree that there is no consensus on the minutes of 16 June 2006?

Mr McFarland: Chairman, as I understand it, we did agree, and there was consensus, on the bulk of the minutes. There was no consensus on that passage of the minutes. These are draft minutes and cannot become minutes proper until they are agreed. We have had agreement on the sections we agreed on the last day, so technically those are no longer draft minutes; they are minutes. Technically, therefore, the section that we are talking about has no consensus and does not form part of the minutes. Are we saying that the minutes now are what we agreed before, less the contentious passage?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Give me a proposal on that and we will vote on it.

Mr Ford: I agree with Alan. Surely we previously agreed sections of the minutes, and therefore if we have no consensus on the remaining three paragraphs, we actually have an agreed minute of that meeting. We are in no position to add anything further to it since there is clearly no consensus.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The proposal is that there is no consensus on that section. The minute would therefore leave that section out completely. That is agreed.

Mr M McGuinness: Are we now dealing with the minutes of 21 June?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We have agreed those.

Mr M McGuinness: There is a mistake.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): All were taken together and agreed.

4.30 pm

Mr M McGuinness: Let me point out a mistake: paragraph 7 states that I made the presentation on behalf of Sinn Féin and took questions from the other parties; it was Conor Murphy.

Mr McFarland: These are the minutes of 20 June; not 21 June.

Mr M McGuinness: I am correcting the minutes of 21 June.

Mr McFarland: I beg your pardon. The minutes for the three sessions are all in the one document.

Mr M McGuinness: I am correcting a paragraph in the minutes of 21 June.

Mr Kennedy: Chairman, are the notes taken by the minute takers discoverable? I asked that in general terms, but especially for those meetings that were not reported by Hansard.

The Committee Clerk: Do you mean discoverable under freedom of information or in court cases?

Mr Kennedy: Yes, in the event of proceedings in another place.

Mrs D Dodds: As it now seems that everything until the paragraph starting “Mr McGuinness” will be deleted, will something be inserted in the published minute to show that the Committee did not agree the remainder of the minute of the meeting of 16 June?

The Committee Clerk: Before the vote was taken, I clarified that that would be removed and there would be nothing there. The minutes will run from “Mr McGimpsey” to “The Chairperson put the proposal”. That was what was agreed.

Mr Kennedy: Surely any minute would have to deal with the contentious nature of the meeting and the lack of agreement? It would be confirmed, in some shape or form, in the minutes.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The document before us is not the Official Report from Hansard.

Mr Kennedy: So, the reference to the fact that there was no agreement will be published at some point, albeit on a different day from when it took place.

Mr M McGuinness: Diane Dodds asked a question — or perhaps Danny Kennedy asked it — about the discoverability of the minutes. Is there a complete minute of that meeting?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): There is not a complete minute.

Mr M McGuinness: Is there a complete minute from the notes that were taken by the note takers who were present?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Diane asked whether the notes were available. The response was that they were notes that were not of relevance but were just a record. Am I correct?

The Committee Clerk: There is a minute of the meeting, and different people in the room have taken their own notes, but those notes are not published; the minutes are published.

Mr M McGuinness: That raises a question as to why only a certain section of what I said ended up in the minutes and why there was not a complete record of my contribution in that debate.

The Committee Clerk: There were no verbatim reports until Hansard began to report the proceedings.

Mr M McGuinness: Are people saying that these minutes are a verbatim report?

The Committee Clerk: No.

Mr M McGuinness: So what standing does it have if it is not a verbatim report?

The Committee Clerk: It has been removed.

Mr M McGuinness: What is the standing of the minutes as regards discoverability? What is their legal status?

The Committee Clerk: A legal opinion would have to be sought on that.

Mr M McGuinness: Given that the DUP is indicating a certain course of action, and Danny has asked a question in relation to that, an important issue is raised about the context in which those remarks were made and why only those remarks were recorded and why the context has, for some reason, disappeared.

The Committee Clerk: My understanding is that, if there were any legal proceedings about that or, indeed, any other matter, all the papers would be made available. That would include those papers, our handwritten notes — if anyone could read them — and the notes of everyone who was here. I do not know whether it would apply to members, but it would apply to Committee staff.

Mr M McGuinness: I am not talking about all the people who were here; I am talking about what was said during the meeting.

The Committee Clerk: There is no verbatim report.

Mr M McGuinness: So these three paragraphs are not a verbatim report?

The Committee Clerk: No, because Committee staff do not provide that.

Mr M McGuinness: I understand that. I know that the minutes are not verbatim, but is there a report of that context?

The Committee Clerk: No.

Mr M McGuinness: So there is none?

The Committee Clerk: No.

Mr M McGuinness: Why was no note taken of that?

The Committee Clerk: At that time, the Committee had decided that all proceedings were to be in private, so there was no one else in the room except the members. The only people who can take verbatim reports are Hansard staff, who were not there at that time. That is why there is no verbatim report.

Mr M McGuinness: Essentially, this is not a verbatim report either.

The Committee Clerk: It is not a verbatim report.

Dr Farren: Is it not true, Mr Chairman, that what was in the draft minutes resulted from a request by a Committee member to have something noted? The note takers' interpretation of that request appeared in the minutes.

That leaves room for debate about whether or not it was a full account of what should have been noted. Nonetheless, it was the result of a request by a Committee member to have something noted.

Mr M McGuinness: It comes down to what and how much we actually note.

Dr Farren: That was why we went for a Hansard report.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We had that discussion at the last Committee meeting: at what stage did the member ask for notes to be taken and what was actually noted? Was the report to be from that stage on or was it to include part of the previous discussion? That was when we asked Hansard to prepare a report of everything that is said.

Dr McDonnell: Can we move to item 6? Some of my colleagues are keen to know where we are scoping forward.

Mr M McGuinness: We are not finished yet, Alasdair.

Dr McDonnell: Sorry. I thought that people were getting ready to leave.

Mr M McGuinness: I have already recorded my view. Does anyone know who briefed what they believed to be the content of the Committee's meeting to the media? There was some suggestion that it might have been Jim Wells, although I do not know whether that is true. Does anyone here know who briefed the media on that weekend? Some stories relating to this Committee appeared in the media. They certainly did not come from Sinn Féin. I do not believe that they came from the Alliance Party, the SDLP, the Ulster Unionists or from any official in the room. Therefore I ask the DUP directly whether Jim Wells spoke to the media.

Mr McFarland: Chairman, there is an issue here that relates to that point. Mr Wells, I think it is correct to say, was quoted in an interview that he gave to a newspaper. Members of delegations can give interviews if they wish — they are asked not to, but it does not stop them. On that occasion, Mr Wells was an observer at this Committee in his role as Deputy Speaker. There is an issue about whether a Deputy Speaker should be giving interviews to a newspaper — and since he was quoted, he presumably spoke to somebody — on Committee business when he is not actually at the Committee other than as an observer at the back.

We left the matter the last time, but it is an issue that the Committee may need to think about: the propriety of a Deputy Speaker who is an observer at the Committee allegedly giving interviews to the press. That is notwithstanding the content of what he said.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Is this on the same issue, Diane?

Mrs D Dodds: Yes, Mr Deputy Speaker. Before coming to the meeting on 16 June I was in the city hall where I looked at the early edition of the 'Belfast Telegraph'. Lo and behold, an article in it quoted you as indicating the business for the meeting of that day, and in particular indicating that the Committee may be preparing a draft report. I would like a ruling on that as well.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are you asking whether observers should give interviews on any issues at all?

Mr McFarland: In the past, Speakers and Deputy Speakers tended not to be at the forefront of political interviews or interviews about business. It appears that a Deputy Speaker who was in the room, and therefore privy to the information only because he was observing while waiting to take the Chair, gave an interview outside. We cannot stop members of delegations leaving here to do interviews; that is a political issue and they will speak for their parties on their political viewpoint.

Mr Wells was in the room only in his guise as Deputy Speaker, therefore technically neutral. Whether he should be out giving interviews is at issue, and the same logic would apply if you, Chairman, were giving interviews, because, technically, Speakers and Deputy Speakers have remained neutral and above the politics of the situation.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): What is the Committee's feeling?

Mr Ford: Given that two separate incidents appear to be cited, it seems logical that our Clerk should be asked to report this to the Speaker. She might then speak to both Deputy Speakers and agree a way in which the Chair's neutrality might be dealt with. We must also recognise that any suggestion that information is not going to go out of this Committee in greater or lesser detail via one or more of the five delegations is whistling in the wind. However, there is an issue about the role of the Chairs of this Committee being seen as distinct from the political wrangle.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I was not aware of, and I have not read, the 'Belfast Telegraph' article that has been quoted.

Mrs D Dodds: It was the city edition of the 'Belfast Telegraph' of Friday 16 June; the early edition.

Mr McFarland: Perhaps the Clerks could compile a short report, including at annexes A and B the extracts from the said offending articles.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): My own view is that it is better not to give interviews on the business of this Committee.

Mr Ford: Stick to the RPA, Francie. [Laughter.]

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Let us not go down that road. I certainly have not given interviews in relation to the business of this Committee.

Mr Kennedy: You cannot let light into magic.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): So we shall ask the Clerk to do a report?

Mr McFarland: A short resumé of what has happened here.

Mr Kennedy: You have all day tomorrow to do it.

Mr Morrow: Yes, you have a day off.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Let us move on to the future work of this Committee. One suggestion was that, once submissions were finished, we should look at this draft table, which was put together by the Clerks as a resumé of the submissions. Do the parties want to add to it, or to create a new one?

Mr McFarland: I suggest we discuss this on Wednesday, once the submissions are finished. We will then have Hansard, which is a full and comprehensive note of what everyone has said. That draft table was put together on people's initial submissions, and parties have said that it was a very broad outline, just a quick flavour, and that they would expand it when they spoke to their submissions.

The parties' views, and their views expanded through questioning, are written into Hansard. On Wednesday afternoon we might wish to send the team off to compile the essence of Hansard. My suggestion is that we get through the next questioning; we will then know where everyone stands and all the issues involved, and will be in a position to discuss how we take it forward. How we do that will dictate which bits of paper are prepared.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Members can think about it between now and Wednesday and be prepared for that. The copy of last Thursday's Hansard is available for Members as they leave. Check it and go back to Hansard within 24 hours if you have any comment or questions on the accuracy of what you said — not of what someone else said.

4.45 pm

Mr McFarland: We received the first Hansard on Friday; we have had a weekend, so some people may have been diligent but some people may have left it in their pigeonhole until today. We have then received the second one today, and we are receiving the third one today. Logically, we would be asked to comment on all three within 24 hours' time.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): It would certainly speed up the process. Go directly to Hansard.

The Committee Clerk: Some Members who were present at the other meetings are not present today. We will be posting the reports out to them, so they might not get them until tomorrow morning. As soon as you can would be great.

Mr Kennedy: In reference to my earlier point, is it possible to read the attendance list into the Hansard report for ease of reference?

The Committee Clerk: Yes.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Any other points of order or information? No? Thank you very much; the meeting is closed.

Adjourned at 4.46 pm.

COMMITTEE ON THE PREPARATION FOR GOVERNMENT

Wednesday 28 June 2006

Members in attendance for all or part of proceedings:

The Chairmen, Mr Francie Molloy and Mr Jim Wells
Mr John Dallat
Mrs Diane Dodds
Dr Seán Farren
Mr David Ford
Ms Michelle Gildernew
Mr William Hay
Mr Danny Kennedy
Mr Kieran McCarthy
Mr Alan McFarland
Mr Martin McGuinness
Mr David McNarry
Mr Alex Maskey
Mr John O'Dowd
Mr Ian Paisley Jnr
Ms Margaret Ritchie

The Committee met at 10.08 am.

(The Chairman (Mr Molloy) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We will begin our meeting. I remind Committee members to switch off their mobile phones. They interfere with Hansard and make it difficult to pick up what is being said, even when they are in silent mode.

Lunch will be here at 12.30 pm, and we will have a short break at that stage. It will be a working lunch, and we will continue right through.

Are there any apologies or changes?

Mr M McGuinness: Conor Murphy will not be here, and John O'Dowd will be here later.

Mr Kennedy: Mr McNarry will replace Mr McGimpsey.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Is anyone coming in from the DUP?

Mr Paisley Jnr: There are no apologies from them.

Mr Kennedy: They never apologise.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Margaret Ritchie is in for Alasdair McDonnell.

Ms Ritchie: John Dallat is in for Mark Durkan.

Mr Ford: Apologies from Naomi Long, who is unwell; Kieran McCarthy will join us later.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We move on to the Ulster Unionist Party Assembly Group (UUPAG) presentation.

Mr Kennedy: Chairman, there is a prior issue. Members will be aware that on the BBC's 'Newsline 6.30' last night, the political correspondent Mark Devenport was able to refer to, and produce a copy of, the Hansard report of one of these meetings. I do not think that it would be productive to launch an inquiry into how, and from whom, he received it. However, it is unsatisfactory to the members of this Committee and, indeed, to Members of the Assembly who are not present at these meetings but who are undoubtedly interested in them.

Given that the press have been made aware of the reports, we should consider circulating the full text of the Hansard reports to each Member of the Assembly. Clearly the press are in a more advantageous position to assess these matters than the Members of the Assembly.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I agree.

Mr M McGuinness: I agree with Danny. Sinn Féin was anxious from the beginning that this Committee would try to create circumstances that would see parties engage with one another in a meaningful way around the business of preparing for Government. The vast majority of our people, represented by all the parties here, would like to see that.

The fact is that someone went out of this room and gave away a copy of the Hansard report, against the express wishes of the Committee. We all received a note that said:

"Please note that the Committee has agreed that the attached Report should not be made available to anyone outside of the Committee".

It begs the question as to whether anybody in this room is prepared to admit that they were responsible for breaking that agreement and giving the report to the media.

People are entitled to as much information as possible. I would prefer that we were in a situation where we were able to give as much information as possible about the agreements that are shaping up among us to show that real progress is being made in the important work of preparing for Government. However, if we find ourselves in the situation where these reports will be distributed, then it will undoubtedly work against the prospect of any real engagement taking place in the future. That leaves us in serious difficulty. We must be clear exactly what the ground rules are and whether or not everybody is prepared to sign up to those ground rules.

Was the Democratic Unionist Party responsible for giving the Hansard report to the BBC's political correspondent, Mark Devenport?

Mr Paisley Jnr: As Danny has raised the issue, I agree that the Hansard reports should be made available, as should the minutes. There should be nothing to hide in these sessions. The DUP's consistent position has been that these meetings should be in public. The press should be involved and the public should be allowed in. We have no difficulty with that.

However, I am not here to answer questions. I note that Martin McGuinness has run away for three days from answering questions. Now that he is back, he thinks that he is here to ask questions, but the DUP is not here to be interrogated by anyone — and will not be.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): If the Committee decides that Hansard should be made available to the public, should it be the uncorrected version or the corrected version? Members have the right to correct Hansard within 24 hours. It is important that if matters go public, it should be the corrected version.

10.15 am

Mr McFarland: It has to be the corrected version; we cannot have an uncorrected version out there.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): What is the view of the Committee as regards making Hansard available to all the MLAs? Is there consensus on that? Agreed? So the corrected version of Hansard will be available to all MLAs.

Mr McFarland: Chairman, you were giving us a few days to get all of the Hansard reports because of the weekend business. Perhaps we could decide when they can be released as a block, giving people enough time to read them. The round of questioning should be finished today and, hopefully, that will produce some idea of the way ahead. It would seem to make some sense, notwithstanding the fact that some reports are out there already, to give members 24 hours after issue to confirm corrections. The workings of the Committee so far could then be officially released.

The Committee Clerk: Can I just clarify; we will not release any of the Hansard reports from last week yet?

Mr McFarland: My understanding was that they have not yet been corrected, and they cannot be corrected because different members received them at different times. We had a discussion yesterday afternoon about this. Some members who might have got them last Friday did not because their post was stuck in their pigeonholes here.

We should make absolutely certain that everyone has had the opportunity and the time to make corrections. It would make sense for there to be a control over how we do this, notwithstanding the fact that somebody has dished some of them out already. After the Committee's business today we would have a package that comes together so that people can actually follow the logic in Hansard. They could sit down this weekend — for those political anoraks among us — and work their way right through the deliberations of the Committee, providing that by Friday we agree that they should be issued, and that people have had an opportunity to correct them.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Hansard would have to be involved as regards the corrections and Committee members having the right to correct. Members have been advised that they can have 24 hours from receipt of the report to make corrections.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Does that include the release of minutes as well?

The Committee Clerk: Once the minutes are agreed, they are published on the website.

Mr M McGuinness: I think that the Preparation for Government Committee will draw its own conclusions from the answer given by Ian Paisley Jnr to my question as to who was responsible for giving the copy of Hansard to the BBC and effectively breaking the agreement that was made at this Committee.

Also, it is important to register that none of the political parties in here, bar the DUP, has run away from any questioning whatsoever. All of the political parties have provided very senior leadership figures in the form of leaders and others who are at highest level of the political parties: the Ulster Unionist Party, the Alliance Party, the SDLP and ourselves. None of the leaders at the highest level of the Democratic Unionist Party has appeared at this Committee to subject themselves to the type of questions to which other parties have been subjected. It is important that that be noted.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Further to an issue that I raised on Monday: as recorded on pages 1 and 2 of the Official Report, I said that there was a serious unwarranted slander issued against me by Martin McGuinness, that that slander was malicious, that there was no evidence for that slander, and that it should be withdrawn. I understand that there will be some consideration given to that, and I want to know if that slander will now be withdrawn.

Mr M McGuinness: I deny absolutely that there were any malicious remarks made by me in the course of any of the meetings. All of my contributions have been, I think, constructive and very honest. Any suggestion that my remarks were malicious is absolute nonsense.

Mr Paisley Jnr: If a thing is not malicious, then there must be evidence to back it up. Once again, I cite what was said; that in the last two weeks there had been a concerted and deliberate effort made by certain people, including me, to kill Martin McGuinness. That is what was actually said. If it is not malicious, there must therefore be evidence. I would like that evidence produced.

In the past two weeks, how did I try to kill Martin McGuinness?

Mr M McGuinness: In a number of recent interviews I have made my position on the Democratic Unionist Party absolutely clear. Vile, despicable and dishonest lies were levelled against me by a number of people. Some of those people are associated with the old RUC; some may be current members of the PSNI, members of the Democratic Unionist Party and other British intelligence operatives. They claim not to be — but in my opinion probably are — working for elements in the British intelligence service hostile not only to Sinn Féin's participation in this process, but to the entire peace process. I will not be subjected to interrogation by Ian Paisley Jnr. The allegation that my comments were malicious is absolute nonsense, and I refute it.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I reiterate the point that if a comment is not malicious, there is therefore evidence to back it up. If you make an allegation, there is therefore evidence. What I am asking for — and there has been a failure to produce it so far — is evidence. In the past two weeks, how did I make a concerted effort to have a person killed? That is what was said. Where is the evidence to show that I made a concerted effort to have someone killed? If there is no evidence for that, just the allegation, then the allegation is malicious of its own nature. If Martin "Malicious" McGuinness cannot produce the evidence, then it is a malicious comment and he should withdraw it. Otherwise, he should go outside and repeat it.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): There has been much toing and froing during this discussion, and, obviously, there has been no change in positions. We will now proceed to the Ulster Unionist Party's presentation.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I simply want it confirmed that no evidence has been produced for what has been said.

Mr M McGuinness: I do not have anything further to add. The quicker we get on with the attempt to conduct real business, the better.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I simply want it noted that no evidence has been produced.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Hansard is taking a note of all the meetings.

Mr McFarland: The past weeks have been the first time that all the main Northern Ireland parties have sat around a table to discuss issues that affect the future of the people whom we represent. During 1997-98, the Ulster Unionist Party went through the talks process without meeting with Sinn Féin. Looking at what has happened in the intervening period, that may seem silly, but it was what was most comfortable at the time and thus the way that it was done. In the most recent talks process, between 2004 and the setting up of this Committee, parties have had meetings with respective Governments and relied on them to transmit views and demands to others. As we discovered in the past, this is a dangerous system, because what a party tells the Government is not necessarily what is being passed on, and confusions, deliberate or otherwise, can arise.

My colleagues and I have been heartened by the genuine, although not necessarily warm, engagement over the past few meetings. Speaking to each other across a table allows all of us to identify and clarify issues important to others and to make judgement on their bona fides through attitude and body language. Aside from scoping the issues, this engagement will slowly build confidence and trust. Perhaps we need to examine whether there are ways in which some of the easier issues can be dealt with. It would surely increase confidence throughout the community if the parties around this table could produce solutions, as well as identifying problems.

There is no doubt that whatever the failures in implementing the Belfast Agreement, Northern Ireland is a better, safer and more prosperous society than it would have been had the hard decisions not been taken. The Prime Minister has reiterated on many occasions that the agreement is the only game in town, and it is clear that the November 2004 comprehensive agreement is the Belfast Agreement with modifications to hide the DUP's embarrassing U-turn. It has adopted Ulster Unionist policy, and thus unionism is broadly united on the way forward.

Similarly, if Sinn Féin manages to clear the outstanding issues outlined in the past few days, it will be a de facto constitutional nationalist party, uniting nationalism on a common policy. Perhaps the future is brighter than we thought.

The UUP believes that four main areas need to be sorted out. Our submission begins with the first — the major issues of policing and criminality. As background to that, I will recap briefly on where the last agreement between parties left us. That was the agreement in 2004 between Sinn Féin, the Governments and the Democratic Unionist Party. As you are well aware, the SDLP, the Alliance Party and the Ulster Unionist Party were not directly involved in that and have issues with it. I want to reiterate what was said at the time: Sinn Féin's statement on policing, in Annex F of the comprehensive agreement, is interesting:

"As a result of our discussions we now have a commitment from the British Government and the DUP to the transfer of powers on policing and justice to the Assembly as soon as possible, a DUP commitment to a speedy time framed discussion on the departmental model and the powers to be transferred with a view to agreement by the time the Executive is established”.

That is quite encouraging. At that stage, there was some agreement between the Governments, Sinn Féin and the DUP on how policing should be taken forward. However, a stumbling block remains — one that the UUP and the Democratic Unionist Party have already covered — and that is Sinn Féin’s inability to deal with policing. A party that is not committed to the rule of law cannot be in government. The UUP sees policing as a major issue, and tied in with that is the issue of criminality.

The Independent Monitoring Commission (IMC) reported that there was ongoing criminality among senior republicans. The other day, I noticed an Organised Crime Task Force (OCTF) report indicating that the level of that criminality has dropped somewhat. That could be connected with the Assets Recovery Agency (ARA) and the raid by police on both sides of the border on Mr Murphy’s farm in south Armagh.

As far as we can gather, vibes from the IMC suggest that its next report may indicate a reduction in the level of organised crime. Clearly, that is to be welcomed. It must surely reach a stage where the level of organised crime is commensurate with that elsewhere in the United Kingdom and where those involved in organised crime are not connected with the republican movement, although they may be republicans. Under those circumstances, perhaps the police can be left to deal with those who cannot bring themselves in.

However, currently that seems not to be the case, and Sinn Féin must examine seriously how it deals with the residual criminality that the IMC reports, and its refusal, so far, to engage in policing. The UUP considers those to be two major issues.

The Democratic Unionist Party has made decommissioning a major issue. Decommissioning clearly took place, and the record of Hansard will show that both William McCrea and Ian Paisley Jnr accepted that. The IMC reports that there are some outstanding weapons issues and believes that there may be some weapons out there. It is a judgement call as to whether those weapons have been held back by those who refuse to comply with orders from the IRA; whether they are individual trophy weapons; whether there are lost hides; or whether the republican movement has a serious problem and has lied to everyone about its decommissioning being complete.

We will wait to see how the IMC reports on that next time, because at the moment there is a conflict on decommissioning between the Independent International Commission on Decommissioning (IICD) and the IMC.

10.30 am

The next major issue is unionist confidence. It can be of little surprise that unionist confidence has taken a battering since the agreement. We need to show that the parties here can agree and produce something forward-looking: but that can only come when republicans sort themselves out.

Likewise, we cannot leave loyalist paramilitaries twisting in the wind — out there, uncontrolled, still causing chaos — if we get to a stage in the autumn where there is some form of agreement. As you know, we have been working to provide those who wish to come in from the cold with a way in. Those who do not wish to come in from the cold will have to be left to the police, the courts and the Prison Service, and they can be locked up.

There is an unfinished issue on parades. It is well known — because Gerry Adams described it all in a speech in Tullamore in 1994 at which an RTÉ journalist was present — that it had taken the republican movement three years to stir up the parading issue and produce community groups to object to those things. It was a useful war by other means: the movement was supposedly on ceasefire and then in talks, but it was a way of conducting the war by other means and of attacking unionism and unionist culture.

It seems to me that it evolved then into a useful tool for beating up the police, because it became a method by which, if you objected to a parade, you caused a bit of a row, the police turned up and you had a ding-dong battle between the police and republicans. Parading got caught up in all of those things.

It is clear that there has been some sort of political decision recently that they will back off parading for a bit. I welcome the efforts that have gone into keeping the parades peaceful and keeping republicans back from being offended at a level at which they attack people. I was quite encouraged until last night: I see that we are back into the same old game at Glengormley, where people are clodding stones and golf balls at a parade. That has got to be dealt with. Republicans must allow unionists to enjoy their culture and to have a peaceful parade without being under attack. That must be dealt with before we can have any peaceful way forward here.

As political parties, we should have some thoughts on how to deal with the past. It is an enormous issue, and it cannot be dealt with quickly. The police’s Historical Enquiries Team is attempting to provide some closure. It was set up to examine historic cases to see whether families could be given more information as to what happened, and whether it is possible, in the light of new technologies, to bring someone to book for crimes committed over the past 30 years. Hopefully, for some families, it will bring a degree of closure. It is an enormous issue, but the political parties, by and large, have stayed away from it, and it is time that there was more engagement from the political parties on how we deal with the past.

Of course, there are issues for republicans. The question of the disappeared remains unresolved. There are still people whose sons and fathers are lying buried in a bog somewhere. It would be clearly advantageous to sort out the issue of the disappeared, and to get those families their loved ones back and some degree of closure.

The other enormous outstanding issue is that of exiles. Republicans and loyalists have been exiling people from their communities. Although these are not necessarily things that we can tackle directly, they are all issues that will haunt any future Government here while they are unresolved. The disappeared and exiles must be included in the mix.

I want to turn to some issues in the comprehensive agreement that we are uncomfortable with. This is the deal that was nearly done between Sinn Féin and the DUP in November 2004. In particular, I want to look at the issue of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister.

The comprehensive agreement said that the two roles should form a collective post. If, as was suggested recently in the Assembly, Ian Paisley and Martin McGuinness were appointed to those posts, they should have been voted for jointly, as was the procedure for the SDLP and UUP candidates for those posts in the first Assembly.

That was clearly a difficulty or embarrassment for the Democratic Unionist Party. Its negotiators appear to have negotiated an issue that concerns the parties that represent each of the tribes. The lead unionist party would propose the First Minister and the lead nationalist party would propose the Deputy First Minister.

Interestingly, the original system allowed each community to have a say in whom the other community elected. For example, if unionism in the Assembly was neuralgic about Martin McGuinness's being Deputy First Minister, the system allowed unionism to say that it was not happy with him. Therefore unionism in the Assembly, rightly or wrongly, had a veto. Likewise, nationalists might have been uncomfortable with Ian Paisley, and, because the office was a joint one, they could have said no.

The cunning piece of negotiation that is the comprehensive agreement, however, will remove any unionist say in whom Sinn Féin appoints and any nationalist/republican say in whom unionism appoints. The joint ticket that everyone bought into in the first Assembly will have been removed. I would not mind if there had been logic to its removal, but it has been removed to avoid DUP embarrassment at having to put its hand up for Martin McGuinness.

The system has been further confused by another cunning bit of negotiation to the effect that, having voted for the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, d'Hondt would be triggered and each Minister would have to vote for all the other Ministers. Therefore if the SDLP or the Ulster Unionists were to object to the First Minister or the Deputy First Minister or to any of the Ministers who had been elected, we could not register our objection. If we did, we would be removed from government for the entire Assembly session. That is, all the Ministers of an objecting party would be removed from the Executive.

That cunning piece of negotiation would create what I understand to be a nightmare for the DUP: the DUP and Sinn Féin in government together; and the SDLP and the Ulster Unionist Party being excluded from government. That must be the most amazing piece of negotiation that was ever seen. We take strong objection to those proposals in the comprehensive agreement.

Turning to the review, several issues came up in it as a result of parties examining procedures in the first Assembly to see whether they could be improved. It is perfectly logical to examine what happened in the first Assembly in order to make improvements to it. For example, all the parties are agreed that we need some form of ministerial code. Indeed, the Executive were on the verge of producing one during the first Assembly, but it had not reached the Floor of the House before the Assembly was suspended.

Such a code would be a good thing, and the Committee might like to consider it. It would be easy to get agreement around this table on the need for, and the details of, a ministerial code. It could be a victory for the Committee if the parties agreed something. In any case, a ministerial code that provides protection needs to be produced.

Next, where power is vested may be an anorak issue. However, Northern Ireland is strange in that, when the state was set up in 1921, power was vested from Westminster in the Departments.

Throughout the history of the Northern Ireland Parliament, and since, power has never been vested in Ministers. In a way, there is something unhealthy about power not being vested in the Assembly and given to Ministers from the Assembly. That means that we can be stood up, stood down, removed, sacked or whatever, and that has no effect at all on where the power lies. The power lies with each of the Departments and the permanent secretaries. The issue is not a deal breaker, but it concerns what is sensible for Northern Ireland if it is to have a working Assembly. Power should be vested in that Assembly and vested from the Assembly to the Ministers.

There are also issues concerning the North/South bodies. We probably would not have any objection to increased reporting back from Ministers and their having much greater interaction with the Assembly on what is happening North/South. Although Ministers did report back to the Assembly, it was not something that the Assembly could do anything about. Therefore, we should examine what to do about making the North/South areas more accountable.

We had a great reversal on the British-Irish Council because it did not even have a secretariat, and while the North/South aspect is certainly up and running properly, I am afraid that the east-west issue has been left behind; we must get it up to speed.

The reform of public administration also raises issues. This may be a matter for another day, but it affects whether we have seven councils, with or without an Assembly. On a broader scale, those issues go to how Northern Ireland is governed, and they are perhaps worth some form of discussion. Members will know that we have tried to secure some sort of debate on the Floor of the House about the future of the Review of Public Administration (RPA) because it directly relates to how the Assembly would govern Northern Ireland if we ever reached agreement.

We have never discussed the issue of the number of Departments. If we are to create a Department — or two — to deal with policing and justice, there would have to be some amalgamation, as the Northern Ireland Act 1998 states that we are allowed 10 Departments. That issue would be better dealt with before we get to another election or set up another Government, if possible, so that we can fire up the Assembly on the basis on which we wish to proceed.

Seán Farren talked about areas that were essential and areas that were desirable, and I can understand that, but I would argue that it is worth spending some time getting the new Assembly right before we fire it up again, rather than firing it up, and then getting into an inter-party wrangle as to what details should change. There is a logic to sorting all of this out first.

If we ever get a Government up again here, there is a difficulty about dual and, indeed, triple mandates. Triple mandates have been sorted out in that, under the RPA, one cannot be a councillor and a MLA. However, the idea that one can be in Westminster, the Assembly, and in a council, all at the same time, seems absolutely daft and is inherently unhealthy. In Scotland, the media applied pressure to separate MSPs from MPs, and we need to examine that issue here.

I wish to make a couple of final points, Mr Chairman. We have a difficulty in the comprehensive agreement's setting up of another civic forum on an all-Ireland basis, given that the one that we had here did not perform very well. In fact, its use was extremely limited, and the view of people who sat on it was that it was extremely limited.

The issue outstanding from the review about a Bill of Rights needs examination because, at the moment, we have a large number of groups across Northern Ireland who are fired up to believe that they are going to get socio-economic rights included in such a document. That includes the right to particular medical treatment, even should it cost £10,000 a day. People believe that.

10.45 am

The agreement was quite clear about the bill of rights: it should contain rights that are specific to Northern Ireland. So what is it that is specific to Northern Ireland? Leaving out socio-economic rights — where the money goes is a matter for the politicians; it is not a matter of human rights — the only right that the UUPAG can think of is the right to parade. That is the only one unique to Northern Ireland. There may be disagreement about whether parading is a right, and we can discuss that, but it is the only one that jumps out as being peculiar to Northern Ireland.

Finally, there is the issue of the Programme for Government. There was a drama the first time around. When the Assembly went live in November 1999, we had no Programme for Government. The result was that there was a fair amount of chaos, with individual Ministers taking decisions; there was no collective responsibility because there was no Programme for Government. If we have any hope of getting this up and running in the autumn, we need to start considering shortly, not the detail — that will come from the Departments — but areas that we believe, as parties or as a Committee, should be included in a Programme for Government.

As you well know, the time line starts in the summer: by September the detail should be reasonably well firmed up in outline; by November it should be on paper; and then it will go through a process to go live in April. If we sit back and do nothing between now and the autumn, we will find ourselves, as we did in November 1999, with a Programme for Government that has no input from any of the political parties. Therefore it seems to make sense to give some thought to what should go into a Programme for Government.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Alan, thank you for your submission and for the interesting revisionism that you have introduced into the discussion, the scoping exercise. I will come to that in a moment.

Pardon me for having the cold. I hope you do not regard that as a concerted effort to poison you or kill you.

Mr McFarland: Say again.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I apologise for having the cold. I hope that you do not regard it as a concerted effort to have you killed or to poison you with something. Nonetheless, I apologise for that.

Alan, can you make it clear whether you think that we are here to discuss issues, to negotiate issues or to scope obstacles?

Mr McFarland: The remit of the Committee is not to scope obstacles; it is to scope the issues that will be required to be put in place to allow us to get the Government up and running again. If you are dealing with five political parties and you have a Committee, there is a logic in having worked out what each party thinks are the issues, and in having a form of discussion to see whether you can find some sort of agreement. That is not necessarily negotiating — at the high level that will be done, as you have declared, between the DUP and the Government. However, there is benefit in trying to find some common ground.

Suppose, for example, that your negotiations with the Government are successful and that even though the other political parties may not agree, the Government decide to impose a firing-up of the Assembly again. You know well from the first Assembly that, in the end, we all have to work with one another, whether in the Executive or in Committees. So it would seem to make some sense that, if we can find some agreement on issues that are glaringly obvious as to how you deal with them, we should perhaps try to do that.

The Minister, Mr Hanson, said that he has promised the DUP the comprehensive agreement in the autumn if they are good boys and girls.

I presume that your difficulty will be that you do not want this Committee to steal your thunder on any of those issues. From a party political point of view, that is logical. In the end, we all hope to work together for the greater good of our constituents. The Committee should try to produce some positive wins, even if they are minor wins.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I am touched by the fact that you are worried about my difficulties. However, let us get over that and assess this issue.

You agree that we are here to find common ground in identifying the obstacles to the establishment of a Government. That appears to be a summary of what you have said.

Mr McFarland: You use the word “obstacle”, but I think that that is not the Committee’s remit. However, I am prepared to stand corrected. Perhaps the Chairman would read out the Committee’s remit.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I have the remit. I am trying to find out exactly, from what was contained in your submission, what you believe we are here to do.

Mr McFarland: We are here to scope and identify the issues. Can we read the remit again, Mr Chairman, so we are absolutely clear?

Mr Paisley Jnr: If it helps you, Alan, I am sure that we can read it again.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The remit is:

“to scope the work which, in the view of the parties, needs to be done in preparation for Government.”

That is from the Secretary of State’s letter of 26 May 2006.

Mr McFarland: The remit is to scope the work that needs to be done. It is not simply about issues. The remit is to identify what work needs to be done to get the Government fired up again.

Mr Paisley Jnr: That would include obstacles.

Mr McFarland: It would include obstacles. However, it is not the remit of the Committee to identify obstacles.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I am trying to grasp completely what you believe we are here to do. The remit includes the identification of obstacles.

Mr McFarland: Absolutely.

Mr Paisley Jnr: It is not a trick question, Alan.

Mr McFarland: No, no. However, that is not the remit.

Mr Paisley Jnr: From our discussions so far in the Committee, do you believe that legitimate obstacles have been identified?

Mr McFarland: Many obstacles have been identified. It would be helpful if the Committee could prioritise those obstacles. I may believe that a certain issue poses an obstacle that should be prioritised, but my belief may not be shared by the other parties. Let me give you an example. Since 1998, decommissioning has been a major issue, and it was the prime obstacle that first crashed the Assembly. We were promised that decommissioning would start in June 1998 and be completed by May 2000. There was a clear time line, but decommissioning did not happen. It was a major problem. We fought the bit out and brought down the Assembly in an attempt to effect decommissioning because we agreed that it was a major issue with regard to the good faith and genuineness of republicans.

The bulk of the IRA’s arsenal has now been decommissioned; you and William have accepted that fact, and it has been recorded in Hansard. There are residual issues. Although complete decommissioning is still an issue, it does not have the same priority as it did in 1998. We share the view that the major obstacle to be prioritised is Sinn Féin’s unwillingness to engage in policing. During the past week and a half, there have been some encouraging signs. Sinn Féin has engaged in consultation on the policing issue. The Sinn Féin statement attached to the comprehensive agreement states that the ardhomhairle will call an Ard-Fheis to discuss policing, once the legislation is sorted out. Those are encouraging signs that the party recognises the need to move on the policing issue. However, policing continues to be a major obstacle, and we have not got there yet.

Similarly, it is not clear where the IRA stands on the criminality issue. Perhaps we need more clarity from an IMC report.

Those are the major obstacles, but the other parties may believe that there are many other obstacles. The Committee needs to prioritise the obstacles so that we can identify issues that we can influence and affect. The Committee can also identify issues that we clearly cannot affect, even though we may wish to do so.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Just curb your enthusiasm on decommissioning for a wee minute. We will come to that, I promise, but let us see if we can walk before we run. Before we start prioritising things, let us get agreement. Do you agree and believe that the principal obstacles have been identified over the past week or so of this Committee meeting?

Mr McFarland: Each party has identified the obstacles — if you wish to use the term — difficulties, or problems that it sees to the successful firing-up of government.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Those obstacles, problems, difficulties —

Mr McFarland: Right. The question, I suppose, is can we find common ground, because if all —

Mr Paisley Jnr: I did not ask that question. I will come to that in a moment. I want to establish that you believe the principle that the obstacles — or the problems — have been identified.

Mr McFarland: We hope so. The difficulty is that, in some later discussion, one that has not been spotted before could come to mind. However, if the parties have had their say, logically the key obstacles should have been identified in broad terms. We may not have identified whether those are the obstacles or whether they are just the areas in which the obstacles lie, because some of them are extremely broad issues.

Whether you can say that the whole obstacle identified is the issue, or whether it is a minor part of that that can be solved, is not necessarily clear, because we have not had a discussion on whether we have common ground on those. Indeed, parties may not have been able to have a discussion on what each other — [Interruption.]

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): That is somebody's mobile phone.

Mr Kennedy: That is a very attractive tune.

Mr McFarland: We have not had a discussion on what we each mean by particular things. Although we have had questioning back and forward, there may be other areas that will come to mind later today.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Do you agree that, in its discussions last week, Sinn Féin has made no serious effort to remove the obstacles that so far have been identified by the unionist community: criminality and paramilitarism, and their link to Sinn Féin?

Mr McFarland: We were the prime movers in setting up the IMC, which was vigorously opposed by your party as a toothless, useless organisation. It is encouraging that in recent months you have set a lot of store by the IMC reports.

The IMC is reporting, as is the Organised Crime Task Force, on what appear to be improvements in Sinn Féin and the IRA's movements towards normality. Earlier in the year, the IMC reported that the republican leadership — and I do not have the quotation here — was fully committed to peaceful and democratic means and constitutional politics, but that there were outstanding issues concerning senior republicans' involvement in criminality, and their crime empire was still functioning. The OCTF, which is specifically designed to deal with organised crime, reported last week that there had been a drop in republican criminality.

These are things that we will have to judge. Our view is that things have not progressed far enough for us to be comfortable going into Government with Sinn Féin — not that it is our call. As I have said before in this Committee, it is your call whether you go into Government with Sinn Féin. My sense is that, if they are moving in that direction, we can, perhaps, expect to see dramatic improvements in the autumn. Conor Murphy sat here last week and said to William that dramatic improvements could be expected in the IMC reports.

However, we do not know that; we will have to wait and see. If that is the way they are moving, there will — eventually — be a judgement call for you as to when the commitment of the republican leadership, its instructions, and the adherence to those instructions by people on the ground, move from being a political issue to a fully criminal issue, so that the people doing it are not republican criminals, but simply criminals who refuse to adhere to republican instructions. That is a call for you at some stage, presumably as a result of IMC reports.

11.00 am

Mr Paisley Jnr: Let us not worry about what my judgement call will be; let us try to focus on the Ulster Unionist Party's position and its submission. Am I correct in assuming that what you have just said means that you agree that Sinn Féin has made, and is making, a serious effort to remove criminality and paramilitarism, and their links, from its party?

Mr McFarland: That is what the Independent Monitoring Commission has reported. As the organisation that encouraged it and had it set up — against objections from the DUP — there is a degree of requirement for us to accept what it is producing from intelligence reports from America, the UK and the Republic of Ireland. It is not unreasonable that we accept as correct its analysis of these intelligence reports.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I am sure that we can ask the IMC, and we can go and talk to them. However, I am not asking them; I am asking Alan McFarland, senior negotiator on behalf of the Ulster Unionist Party: does the Ulster Unionist Party believe that Sinn Féin has made, and is making, serious efforts to remove criminality and paramilitary links from its political party?

Mr McFarland: I have just told you that the IMC says that it is, and we accept that.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I am not worried about what the IMC has said; I am asking what the Ulster Unionist Party thinks.

Mr McFarland: I will repeat it. The IMC says that it is, and we accept that. The IMC says that it is, and we accept that. You can ask the question another 10 times, and you will get the same answer.

Mr Paisley Jnr: So I am right to conclude that you believe that Sinn Féin is making a serious effort to remove —

Mr McFarland: The IMC says that it is, and we accept that.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Given the level of criminality, paramilitarism and other unacceptable actions by republicans and their links to Sinn Féin, do you agree that it would be impossible to form a Government, at present, that includes Sinn Féin and unionism?

Mr McFarland: We have said that we do not believe that the time has yet arrived where we should be firing up a Government again with Sinn Féin, because there is no point in trying to produce a Government in which Sinn Féin is not tied to the rule of law and order through the police, and when the IMC is still reporting that its internal criminal organisation has been as active as it is. Notwithstanding that, as we go through the year and have further IMC reports, it may be possible — if republicans are serious and genuine — to get to a stage where most reasonable people might think that the criminality can be tackled by the police, customs and organised crime units.

Mr Paisley Jnr: So if the Ulster Unionist Party were fortunate enough to find itself in the position electorally that we are in today, you would not be prepared to form an Executive with Sinn Féin immediately.

Mr McFarland: I have said that at the moment too much is unclear about Sinn Féin's intentions — particularly regarding policing — to allow us to do that. However, as I said before, this is your call. You are in the driving seat, so you call it.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Would it be fair to deduce then that you agreed with the position that our party took four or five weeks ago when we said "Certainly not" to an Executive with Sinn Féin? Did you agree with that position?

Mr McFarland: This is an ongoing process, and we have to make judgements as we go. You make judgement calls, and we have made judgement calls in the past 10 years — some of which were good, and some of which could have been better.

You will have judgement calls to make, and the penalties for getting them wrong can be difficult. However, at this moment I can confirm for the tenth time that the Ulster Unionist Party does not believe that — were it in charge of unionism — it would be comfortable going into Government with Sinn Féin, because of, in particular, policing and criminality.

Mr Paisley Jnr: The paper that the UUP originally submitted made little to no mention of paramilitary activity and decommissioning. However, from your discussion today and the answers that you have given, you believe that those issues have not been fully resolved. Your paper may have given a wrong impression that those issues were resolved, as far as you were concerned. You are now saying that the issues of decommissioning and paramilitary activity have not yet been satisfactorily resolved, and therefore we cannot go into Government. Is that a fair deduction?

Mr McFarland: You will recall that the DUP said that decommissioning would never, ever happen. Peter Robinson said that it was unimportant. We fought for decommissioning because it was a vital sign that republicans were acting in good faith, because if they were genuinely no longer offering unionists violence, they had no need for their weapons.

There is an inconsistency between what the IICD has said and what the IMC has said. We had the IMC's view read out the other day. It is not sure what is going on here: whether individuals have held some weapons back, or whether the south Armagh brigade has held weapons back to defend its organised crime empire. It is not clear what is going on. It would be helpful if there were more clarity.

You know well that there are all sorts of weapons around. We hear anecdotal reports that UVF weapons from 1913 are still sitting about in people's barns, and such like. There have always been weapons. The question is whether the people with the weapons are trying to kill us. It strikes me that the IICD has reported that the republican movement — the IRA — has decommissioned the vast bulk of its arsenals. Either that is an absolute load of nonsense, in which case quite a number of fairly important people in the IICD, and indeed a couple of clergymen, have been completely hoodwinked and Sinn Féin and the IRA have been lying to us completely, and they have an entire arsenal sitting waiting, or we accept that a substantial act of decommissioning has taken place. You and William McCrea are on record in this Committee as accepting that.

There are some outstanding queries, but, by and large, decommissioning should not be resurrected as a hook to get ourselves on again and prevent Government here.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Yes. Again, the record shows that you are raising this issue of decommissioning. I am talking generically about criminality and paramilitarism. We will come to decommissioning in a moment, and I will give you an opportunity to talk about decommissioning, but, for the record, Peter Robinson said that decommissioning was not the only priority. I do not think that he made the statement that you have attributed to him. However, we will come back to those issues.

If these issues have not been resolved satisfactorily, it begs the question of why you went into Government with them. Why did you make that judgement call? Given that these matters have not been resolved satisfactorily, do you agree that the judgement call that was made here four or five weeks ago not to form an Executive was the correct judgement call to make? I want to establish that.

Mr McFarland: I am confused as to why you need this comfort blanket or dummy to chew on that we are not objecting to you going into Government five weeks ago with Sinn Féin.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Just answer the question, Alan.

Mr McFarland: I have said to you already that, in our view, the time is not yet right for a Government to be formed, but it may be right later on this year. At the moment we do not have the cover, from the reports, to give everyone comfort that they would be doing the right thing.

We can keep rephrasing the same question —

Mr Paisley Jnr: It is not the question that I am focusing on: it is the answer. Perhaps we could refocus the answer. Do you believe that it was the correct judgement call to make? The answer is yes or no.

Mr McFarland: I have already said that, at the moment —

Mr Paisley: So the answer was yes? Is that what you are saying?

Mr McFarland: I am really confused. You keep on going: “Just for the record, just for the record, just for the record”. What is this about?

We are trying to have a sensible discussion here. It was the correct decision, in my view, that when Gerry Adams proposed Ian Paisley and Martin McGuinness for First Minister and Deputy First Minister your party did not jump at it. Absolutely: I have said that about five or six times now in different guises, and I can keep saying the same thing. It seems to be some sort of comfort blanket for the DUP that the Ulster Unionist Party Assembly Group agrees with them on this matter. We agree with you.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Thank you. If you had given me that answer to begin with, that would have helped — we could have got a little further.

Can I say once again that we are not here for a discussion; we are here to ask and answer questions for clarification. Perhaps we can have a discussion at the margins somewhere else.

You raised the issue of policing in your presentation. Do you generally believe that the transfer of policing powers should take place as quickly as possible after devolution has been established, or should it wait until an assessment has been made that the public has confidence that those powers should be transferred?

Mr McFarland: Well, the transfer of policing and justice is a matter for the Assembly under the agreement. The Assembly will decide when it is comfortable with the transfer of policing and justice. I am heartened by the speed at which, in December, you were busily getting down to discussing policing here. Within a month of the comprehensive agreement you were straight into discussions with Sinn Féin on the modalities of policing. In fact, the comprehensive agreement timetable says, under February:

“Agreement reached on modalities for devolution of Criminal Justice”.

As we know, although Sinn Féin and the SDLP disagree with this, you have confirmed that, as far as you are concerned, this agreement is the only deal in town. You were straight into that within a month, but the comprehensive agreement says that the aim was to try to get policing and justice devolved within two years:

“The British Government will work to promote the necessary confidence to allow such a vote to take place within two years.”

So the Assembly needs to decide, and the Assembly will clearly vote on this when it feels comfortable that the place is ready for policing and justice to be devolved.

Mr Paisley Jnr: That is how I view it — that it takes the Assembly to have confidence on behalf of the people.

As regards the speed with which we are moving — well, after 300 years of a disputed crisis and 40 years of terrorism, I do not think that a couple of years after an Assembly has been established is really a lot of speed.

We have seen the discussion paper that the Government have published in terms of the devolution of policing and justice. There are about six permutations of how a Department or Departments might operate. Have you a favourite or preferred option? Would you be happy with one Minister running one Department, or would you like to see two Ministers, or two junior Ministers in the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister (OFMDFM)? How would you like to see it?

Mr McFarland: Chairman, this is wonderful. It is 11.14 am and Ian Paisley Jnr is inviting me to negotiate the future of policing in Northern Ireland in a Committee with Martin McGuinness and the SDLP. Let's go. If you wish to sit here now and discuss how many Departments there should be, or whether there should be one Minister or two, I am up for that. I just wonder whether you understand what you are doing in this Committee.

If you do, and you wish to continue asking the questions, I will get into it, and no doubt the other parties will wish to join in negotiations with the DUP on the future of policing and justice in Northern Ireland.

Are you sure you wish to ask that question?

Mr Paisley Jnr: Do not get carried away; do not get too excited now. Again, focus on the question. We have accepted that we are not here to negotiate.

Mr McFarland: Why would you ask the question, if you do not wish to negotiate?

Mr Paisley Jnr: I am not negotiating anything with you; I am simply asking a question. Which of the six permutations do you prefer? After all, you raised it in your submission, so I should be allowed to ask you a question on it.

Mr McFarland: I am confused. Ian Paisley Jnr and William McCrea, in particular, have made enormous play today about how they are only here to scope and identify and how there will no negotiation in this Committee. However, you are now moving into some form of negotiation on how many Departments and Ministers there should be when policing and justice is devolved here. That is wonderful, but I suggest that we leave the negotiation until we have finished our questioning. Then we can all get stuck in to negotiating the devolution of policing and justice to Northern Ireland. I am all for that and would like to get into that discussion with you.

Mr Paisley Jnr: You appear to be very reluctant to answer a very simple question on clarification. In your submission, you raised the Department of Policing and Justice —

Mr McFarland: As issues that need to be resolved.

Mr Paisley Jnr: You obviously raised it as an issue that you want to have scoped. It is an issue that you believe is important, and if there are obstacles they need to be identified. We all agree that there are obstacles here, but I am simply trying to establish for the record which of the six permutations you prefer, given the fact that you have raised the issue. No one is asking you to negotiate anything; we are merely asking you to answer a simple, straightforward question on clarification. Do you want to tell us which permutation you prefer for setting up that Department?

Mr McFarland: I am more than happy to get into detailed discussion with the DUP or any other party here regarding how the Committee should take forward a recommendation regarding the number of Departments and Ministers that there should be, and how policing and justice should be handled. We have identified the positions of each party under the broad heading of issues that need to be resolved. The DUP, in particular, has made enormous play of not negotiating, not going into detail and not discussing; you are simply here to list the headings that need to be resolved.

You cannot have it both ways. You cannot, on the one hand, say that you will only identify the broad areas and that you will not negotiate or go into any detail or discussion, and then, on the other hand, try to press other parties to get into negotiation with you. If you wish to negotiate these issues, I am happy to do it around this table when our questioning has finished.

Mr Paisley Jnr: It took you some time to answer my first question, and it is taking you quite some time to answer my third question, but we will try again. You appear to be confused that we are here to have detailed discussion when we have already agreed that we are here to identify issues. Again, I am asking for an answer to a straightforward clarification question. I am not asking you to negotiate anything or to lay anything on the line, but you have identified the issue of policing and justice. Your submission only contains one sentence on it. Will you elaborate and give us a straightforward answer? Do you favour one of the six permutations for the policing and justice Department?

Mr McFarland: Which bit of “we will discuss this after the questioning has finished” does Ian Paisley Jnr not understand? Which bit does he not understand on the fourth or fifth time of saying it?

Mr Paisley Jnr: I am merely trying to find out, Alan, if you will give us a straightforward answer.

Mr McFarland: Chairman, which bit does he not understand?

Mr Paisley Jnr: I understand everything. I understand that you have not been prepared to answer this question. There is a proposal for policing and justice, which you have referred to in your submission. We know that there are permutations regarding the setting up of a Department. Are you able to tell us which one you favour?

11.15 am

Mr Kennedy: It appears from the earlier presentations that Mr Paisley Jnr attaches some importance to that issue. However, as the Committee is scoping and identifying issues, we are presumably leaving negotiation and the practical outworking of such issues for further discussion, after all the parties have been questioned on their initial presentations.

Although the DUP highlighted policing and justice as an issue for scoping, it did not indicate its preferred option. Ian, you might accept that having not done so yourself, it is slightly unreasonable to expect that of others. Clearly, the UUP has continued difficulty with that question, but we have provided an answer.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Danny, the point is that you could have asked the question. Indeed, you did ask the question and were satisfied with the answers from the Democratic Unionist Party. I wonder why the Ulster Unionist Party is reluctant to answer.

I am sure that you agree that policing poses problems and is an obstacle for some people. There are issues that need to be resolved as far as unionists are concerned. The DUP has brought up discriminatory fifty-fifty recruitment and the failure of republicans to support the police. The UUP's presentation was scant on that, although there was some elaboration today. I want the UUP to clarify that.

Mr Kennedy: Let me give you a copper-bottomed guarantee that the UUP will continue to explore those issues in absolute detail when and if there are negotiations or proper discussions within this Committee.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I am reluctant to intervene in that wee bit of a logjam, but is it possible to involve all parties? The discussion and questioning has been manoeuvred in different ways over the past few days. If Ian Paisley does not mind, can we bring in one member from each other party so that they can ask questions?

Mr Paisley Jnr: To be perfectly fair, each party has deployed, without critique, a system of interrogation over the last number of days in which a person has the floor to ask questions. I want to complete a series of questions on policing and other subjects. If people want to come in then when it is their turn —

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I was trying to involve as many parties and members as I could.

Mr Paisley Jnr: It is unfair to interrupt a person who is in the middle of in a line of questioning. That has not happened during any other questioning.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I understand that.

Mr M McGuinness: When the Democratic Unionist Party had made its submission, I was first to ask questions. I did so for about 15 or 20 minutes and then I gave way, out of respect to my other colleagues who were sitting around and to give them the opportunity to engage in the discussion. The DUP should consider opening the discussion up to others, because during the course of the day there will be plenty of opportunities for the DUP to continue its discussion or questioning of the Ulster Unionist Party.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I think that it involves everybody more, if the other parties —

Mr Paisley Jnr: I am afraid that there has been a process to this, and if someone has the floor and a line of questioning, it is grossly unfair to interrupt them or to try to prevent that person from getting answers.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): No, I am not trying to do that.

Mr Paisley Jnr: If that is the way that business is to be conducted, it is a disgrace.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I am not trying to prevent that; I am trying to involve people.

Mr Paisley Jnr: People will have to wait their turn.

Mr McNarry: Chairman, Ian has a point about the approach. It seems to change depending on who is sitting in your seat. It might even change if you changed what you had agreed on a previous day.

Could we remove interrogation from the atmosphere?

Mr McFarland: Trained.

Mr Kennedy: Not so trained, apparently.

Mr McNarry: It serves no purpose for us to interrogate each other. I know that there is a line of questioning that is intense; that is acceptable, but if someone is here to interrogate, it creates an adversarial atmosphere about the line of questioning. The UUP just wants to give answers and facts, and not, as William repeatedly said, to be grilled. He must have felt like a fish under the barbecue at times. We should try to remove that adversarial element.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I do not want to divert from whatever happened before. I just want to involve people as much as possible, and to create gaps in which others can ask questions.

Mr Kennedy: Hitherto, custom and practice in this Committee has been for one party at a time to ask full and detailed questions. We do not have a problem with that, and would be inclined not to depart from it.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): It is in your hands.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Alan, do you believe that the IRA has decommissioned all of its weapons?

Mr McFarland: The IICD has told us that the vast bulk of the IRA's weaponry has been decommissioned.

Mr Paisley Jnr: There is absolutely no doubt that decommissioning has taken place. Everyone accepts that.

Mr McFarland: Have you accepted that?

Mr Paisley Jnr: Yes. We made that public some time ago. Do you believe that all of the IRA's weapons have been decommissioned, that it was done in good faith and that we should draw a line there and consider it sufficient?

Mr McFarland: The difficulty is that we do not know.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Exactly.

Mr McFarland: We do not know. The IICD and the IMC have said that it was impossible to know. I have no doubt that there are weapons hidden that were under the control of people who have died or were drunk when they buried the weapons and cannot remember where. I have no doubt at all that individual members of the IRA have held back weapons that they have had for years and do not want to give in. I have no doubt that others have held weapons back for personal protection because they or their area may come under threat, or that those involved in serious criminal activity have held weapons back to protect their criminal empires.

The question is whether we still think that the IRA has held back an arsenal with which it intends to attack the state. I do not believe that it has, although I have no doubt that there are weapons out there, among them trophies from the First World War and the Second World War. Northern Ireland is knee deep in weapons of various sorts. The question is, do those who have them intend to overthrow the state or not? The notion that every last weapon in Northern Ireland has to be handed in before we can have government is a dangerous one to get caught up on. I caution against that, because it is a no-win situation. Nobody knows what weapons are out there or who has them.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Do you think that the IRA may have held weapons back for serious and organised crime?

Mr McFarland: I have no doubt that those individuals who are involved in serious and organised crime have held weapons back to protect their criminal empires.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Has the IRA as an organisation done that?

Mr McFarland: I do not know. The IMC said that the leadership of the IRA is serious about ceasing criminality, but that individual senior republicans are continuing their criminal activities. I understand from the report last week of the Serious Organised Crime Agency (SOCA) that that activity appears to have dropped and that that drop may be linked to the raids in south Armagh.

11.30 am

Mr Paisley Jnr: Would it be fair to characterise your attitude to decommissioning as relaxed?

Mr McFarland: I have said what I have said, Chairman; it does not matter how I feel personally. Those are the facts.

Mr Kennedy: We might also echo Peter Robinson whom you quoted this morning: there are issues other than decommissioning.

Mr Paisley Jnr: There is more than one priority; that is right. Everyone agrees that decommissioning is not the only priority. Some people did get rather hooked on it.

Do you accept that decommissioning must be done in a way that builds unionist confidence?

Mr McFarland: Decommissioning was key to unionist confidence. In its 2002 statement, the IRA said that it would decommission in a way that would maximise unionist confidence. Decommissioning was never about weapons. If we had the money, you and I could be back from eastern Europe tomorrow night with a plane load of weapons. The world is awash with weapons.

Mr Paisley Jnr: It is not that easy.

Mr McFarland: It is. Decommissioning was about republicans telling the unionist community that they were no longer offering us violence. If they were holding on to their weapons, the possibility remained that they would be prepared to use violence again. That is why the weapons issue was so important: it was a sign of republicans' good faith and intentions. Their reluctance to give up their weapons raised serious doubts about whether they were indeed committed to the path they claimed to be on.

When they did decommission, they managed to make a complete hames of it. They had several opportunities to decommission in a way that would maximise public confidence, but they did not avail of them. It is to be much regretted that they had not the sense to see the importance of decommissioning properly, because they cannot decommission again. That is the danger of getting caught up on this issue — it is not possible to do a rerun with a photograph. Decommissioning has happened. There still are weapons out there but I do not believe that they are there for the overthrow of the state. It would have been better if republicans had decommissioned properly between 1998 and 2000, as they were supposed to. That did not happen, and trying to revisit the issue is a no win.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Has decommissioning maximised unionist confidence?

Mr McFarland: Certainly not. Unionist confidence has been anything but maximised by the manner and timing of decommissioning. That opportunity has passed; regrettably, it is not possible to rerun it with a photograph to maximise public confidence.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Would an inventory of what has been decommissioned be helpful in building unionist confidence?

Mr McFarland: From the beginning, we have called for the publication of an inventory. It is most unfortunate that Gen de Chastelain had a private agreement that an inventory should wait until all paramilitary groups had decommissioned. The logic is that one small group, such as the LVF, deciding not to decommission — even though the other loyalist paramilitaries had — can hobble the entire process and we will not know what republicans have decommissioned. We have called throughout this process for the publication of an inventory and we call for it again.

Mr Paisley Jnr: You rightly identify the issue of consistency and you talked earlier about ensuring that loyalist arms are got rid of as well. There has been comment on your party's linking itself to the Progressive Unionist Party in the Assembly. That raises the issue of consistency. Do you agree with Sylvia Hermon that that link is wrong?

Mr McFarland: You led in with loyalist weapons and moved on to the Assembly.

Although those are two different issues, I am happy to take questions on them. Do you wish to move completely to the Assembly issue, to continue on weapons, or to continue on the issue of loyalist paramilitaries?

Mr Paisley Jnr: My question was on the issue of consistency. Do you agree with Sylvia Hermon's assessment?

Mr McFarland: I will deal with that in a minute. First, since we are on the weapons issue, let me deal with the issue of loyalism and loyalist weapons.

As I said in my presentation, we cannot get to a stage where the DUP and Sinn Féin will form a government in the autumn and while loyalists are still running around, unguided, and fully armed. Broad unionism can take some responsibility to pave the way for those organisations that wish to move from paramilitarism to a political path; to disarm; and for the rest, which do not wish to do that, to be left to the rigours of the courts and the law.

We have chosen to take that responsibility. You may disagree with us. We have been at this for some time now, since Sir Reg took over. In one of his early speeches, he announced his intention to do it, and the process is now under way. It is clearly going to be time-limited, and the public and broad unionism are going to need to see some progress.

What took place here was quite complicated, but I will run through it for your benefit.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Thank you.

Mr McFarland: The 2003 Assembly election produced numbers that, if the Executive had been fired up, would have led to three Ulster Unionist, three DUP, two Sinn Féin and two SDLP Ministers in government: a 6:4 unionist majority, which broadly reflects the community.

Of course, in the first Assembly, because there were lots of individual unionist independent Members, the Executive did not look like that: it was 5:5. However, 6:4 reflects the proper position of the community in general.

When Jeffrey Donaldson and his two colleagues moved from us to you, it gave the DUP four Ministers in the Executive, and we understand that Jeffrey, as part of his deal to move, was promised the fourth Ministry. That fourth Ministry moved with Jeffrey to the DUP, so the relative strengths were 4:2:2:2.

The unfortunate activities of Mr Berry last year and his subsequent departure from the DUP moved that ministerial position to Sinn Féin.

So it produced a situation, if a Government were to be fired up, of three DUP Ministers, three Sinn Féin Ministers, two Ulster Unionist Ministers and two SDLP Ministers, moving back to the 5:5 ratio — a move away from the unionist reflection of the community. We discovered that if we had one more Member in the Assembly, it would take that unionist Department back from Sinn Féin and restore the Ulster Unionists' position to what it was at the time of the election — three Ulster Unionists, three DUP, two Sinn Féin and two SDLP — and restore the unionist balance. As a political party we felt that that was quite positive for us in that it put us back where we should have been, according to the electorate, and to where we were before the removal of Mr Donaldson. Also, unionism quite likes the idea of taking a seat off Sinn Féin.

What we could not understand in the aftermath was the deep angst of the DUP. We restored the balance, the position that the people voted for and also the unionist majority. The matter was clarified slightly by the television programme featuring Mr Berry, in which Mr Berry had been walking with God, was no longer walking with God and now is walking with God again. There was every evidence that, under the tutelage of Rev William McCrea or Rev Ian Paisley over the summer, he would see the light and be brought back into the fold in the autumn, which would have had several effects. It would have taken a seat off Sinn Féin — a win for the DUP; it would have returned to Jeffrey what he sees as his rightful fourth ministerial position; and it would return the Ulster Unionists down to the floor, from where they should never have risen by daring to get an extra Member in the Assembly.

Politically, from our point of view, it was the sensible thing to do. Of course, it kicks in only when the DUP does a deal with Sinn Féin — when the Democratic Unionist Party is in government with Sinn Féin. That is the background to our having an extra Member. Its effect kicks in only when the deal is done.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Was that not premature, given that you accept that there was not the slightest possibility of forming a Government five weeks ago?

Mr McFarland: It was done then because of time constraints. We discovered that we could do it, according to Standing Orders. Others, including the Northern Ireland Office, thought we could not. People who had not done their homework were taken by surprise. It was time-sensitive because there was every indication that the Secretary of State, having spotted what we were doing, would step in. After all, this is the Hain Assembly, and they are his Standing Orders — he can change them daily. There was a threat that if it did not happen at that time, at the setting-up of the Assembly, we would lose the opportunity. It was a tactical decision, taken for practical and good political reasons.

Mr Paisley Jnr: You say that the move was tactical; that it was good for you and the sensible thing to do. You must have given some thought to the person you would try to attract into your fold. Did you approach any other unionist Member — Bob McCartney, for example?

Mr McFarland: We are on record as saying that we talked to a number of people. I do not propose to go into who we were talking to, why we talking to them and whether they were happy with the prospects. That is a dead end, I am afraid.

Mr McNarry: Chairman, can we have a ruling on this? This is something that could be discussed downstairs in the Members' Coffee Lounge. Is it really relevant to preparation for government? If one party divulged to another party the tactics that it might engage in when we were close to forming a Government, then we would be in the realms of "Beam me up, Scotty".

Mr Paisley Jnr: I asked a question about consistency. Do you agree with Sylvia Hermon's assessment that the UUP ought not to have aligned itself with the Progressive Unionist Party? Alan's answer to that was a five- to six-minute historical explanation. I did not ask for any of the information that he was prepared to give. It is very interesting that he was prepared to spill his soul. The fact that he has put the information out there allows it to be scrutinised. He could have answered the question, to which I will return. Do you agree with Sylvia Hermon's position that the link with the Progressive Unionist Party should cease?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I cannot make a ruling on the questions that members ask. Earlier, I did try to speed up the process, and members did their best to follow procedures. For the past few days, all the parties have followed this procedure. It would be beneficial if we continued to identify the obstacles to preparation for government.

Mr McNarry: You would not want to give offence to another member by saying that that is none of his or her business.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I have a thick skin, so do not worry.

Mr McFarland: I know that you have.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We have had much latitude about what parties ask and what parties answer.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I am amazed that Alan believes all this stuff about Jeffrey Donaldson. It sounds like a script from the 'Folks on the Hill'. Perhaps that is where Alan gets his material from, or perhaps that is where the 'Folks on the Hill' gets its material from.

Mr McNarry: He might just do you out of a Cabinet position, Ian.

Mr Paisley Jnr: It is very amazing.

Let us return to the question that provoked such an answer. Do you agree with Sylvia Hermon's assessment that this alliance with the Progressive Unionist Party should cease? I ask that because of the original question on the issue of consistency. I am sure that you will agree that consistency in issues such as the unionist community's confidence that violence has ended, and political parties having links to violence and criminal and paramilitary activities, is pretty central to the obstacles that we are scoping.

Mr Kennedy: The individual views of any member of the Ulster Unionist Party on any issue, however interesting they may be to you, with your obsession with the views of our party, are not relevant to scoping the obstacles and issues that need to be addressed for preparation for government. The Ulster Unionist Party will continue to examine this issue and will deal with it in its own quarters.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Do you disagree with Sylvia Hermon?

Mr Kennedy: I have given my answer. I would respectfully ask you not to pursue the issue. That is my answer, and even if you do not like it, we will continue to give that answer.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I can understand why she does not like that link, given that she is married to one of Northern Ireland's most respected former Chief Constables. That link with a paramilitary organisation causes her, and the people who support her, considerable personal embarrassment. Do you agree with her very public assessment that she thinks that that link should cease?

Mr Kennedy: We have outlined the background to the decision. Quite frankly, the personal views of any member of the Ulster Unionist Party in respect of a decision taken by the Ulster Unionist Party Assembly Group are not relevant to the work of this Committee.

Mr Paisley Jnr: There is also the issue of inconsistency, principally in relation to the IRA and Sinn Féin. According to the OCTF, it is calculated that the Provisionals make over £100 million a year from ill-gotten gains from criminality.

Do you believe, Alan, that those benefits are derived from the organisation or from individuals? If they are to the benefit of the organisation, do you believe that Sinn Féin benefits from them?

Mr McFarland: I do not know. All we have to rely on are the reports of the IMC, and it is fair to say that unionist confidence in the IMC is growing. In fact your own party has welcomed effusively the last two IMC reports as being major documents. We have only what the OCTF and IMC reports tell us. As I said earlier, we are not yet at a stage at which we can be confident that Sinn Féin and the IRA have moved away from criminality, and we must wait and see what those reports, in which both you and I have confidence, tell us in the next six months.

Mr Paisley Jnr: A party with a link to a £100 million-plus criminal empire is certainly not compatible with government; neither is it desirable for any unionist party to want to be in government with it.

Mr McFarland: This is about the twenty-fifth time that we have said that issues on policing and criminality remain to be solved; the reason for having this Committee is to identify that those are issues to be dealt with. We agree with that, and we will have to wait and see in the coming months whether republicans are dealing with those.

Mr Paisley Jnr: In your presentation you raised the issue of the comprehensive agreement. Do you accept that the Belfast Agreement has failed?

Mr McFarland: No. Why would the Belfast Agreement have failed when you have agreed — in fact, you are the only party that is still running around waving this as your Nirvana when in the autumn Minister Hanson will give you all this as your great victory in the world? This is the Belfast Agreement, and a few modifications to make life slightly better, and a few appalling negotiation points, which effectively remove a unionist veto and remove the Ulster Unionist Party and the SDLP from government if they do not agree with Martin McGuinness's being Deputy Prime Minister.

Mr Paisley Jnr: So the Belfast Agreement is a success?

Mr McFarland: The Belfast Agreement is mixed, in that some areas of it have been extremely successful. We got our Government up here; Northern Ireland is a better, more peaceful place because of it. We discovered outstanding issues that were not right, and those must be dealt with and modified.

I have a copy of the DUP manifesto from 1988; I gaze at it occasionally, just to remind myself of the real world. In it there are three key demands on which the Democratic Unionist Party stood: the consent principle; the removal of articles 2 and 3; and the return of devolved government to Northern Ireland. They were three major platforms on which the Democratic Unionist Party stood for 30 years.

The DUP ran away from talks. I was part of the Ulster Unionist Party delegation on the night that the DUP left with Bob McCartney. William McCrea rushed across to Jeffrey Donaldson, asking him where his Hibernian sash was, as they stormed out, leaving us to deal with our political enemies on our own.

The Ulster Unionist Party achieved devolution, the removal of articles 2 and 3, and the consent principle: the three key DUP points for the past 30 years. If you say that that is failure, that is your view; my view is that it is success. It did not work out as it should have because others, as Seán Farren said yesterday, did not meet their commitments.

There was a clear commitment in the Belfast Agreement for republicans to disarm within two years and to stop their paramilitary and criminal activity. Those things did not happen, and as a result the Ulster Unionist Party brought the Assembly to a close on three occasions to try and make them happen, and finally they have stopped now.

As you have heard from the parties round the table in this review, there are many issues that must be sorted out. There are areas of effectiveness and efficiency, and we have outstanding questions over dealing with policing and criminality. If those are dealt with, we stand some chance of getting a Government up and running again, and there is a penalty for not doing so.

We are faced with a repartition of Northern Ireland later this year under the RPA. I have been speaking to members of your party from Tyrone who are getting extremely exercised that Tyrone and Fermanagh are facing what the unionists in Cavan and Monaghan faced in 1922 — the redrawing of the border on the River Bann and a harmonisation of big councils with their counterparts in the South. I know that your supporters in the west of the Province are not at all happy about that.

According to the Secretary of State, the only way to head this off is for a Government to be set up here. That is a serious issue that must be dealt with, and there is a high penalty to pay if it is not. Issues such as education and rates are sitting there, and if we do not get Government back, then we get into all sorts of trouble sorting them out. There are issues that must be sorted out for effectiveness and efficiency and for the future of Northern Ireland, particularly the future of the unionist community.

Overall, the signing of the Belfast Agreement was the right thing to do, but it was difficult and there were hard decisions to be made. Some people did not meet their commitments, and the safety nets promised by our Government were not provided when required. There have been failures, but it was the right thing to do, and I think that history will prove that — although it seems a bit strange now.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I am a bit of a historian myself, Alan, and I have collected some Ulster Unionist Party manifestos. I have some from the 1950s and 1960s, but I have a more recent one in which Jim Nicholson says “No guns, no government”, shortly after which a government with guns was formed. But I digress.

Do you accept that the Belfast Agreement has failed to attract unionist support?

Mr McFarland: It attracted the majority of unionist support initially, although that support has leached away for the reasons that I have just described. People who were supposed to meet commitments did not meet them, and this has resulted in a reduction in unionist confidence in Government here. However, it could be argued that the issues that caused that reduction in confidence — mainly decommissioning — are largely solved. There is an issue over Sinn Féin supporting the police. You made the deal with it in 2004 — I refer you again to the comprehensive agreement — wherein you had a deal over policing. If Sinn Féin meets that commitment to policing, then clearly unionist confidence will rise again.

These are all cause and effect, but they are not things that the Ulster Unionist Party Assembly Group can deal with. We can only try to do good and push this forward where we can, and our current mission on this is to try and bring a closure to loyalist paramilitarism.

The contribution made by the Democratic Unionist Party to any of this has been virtually nil. What we are getting from it at the moment is catch-up, because this comprehensive agreement is the Belfast Agreement with a few skirts to hide the embarrassment of the party’s U-turn. The DUP comes along to this 10 years later. It is good that you are coming along; it is good that you are engaging; it is good that you have examined issues in the comprehensive agreement — which is the Belfast Agreement with a few improvements.

Hopefully when you get round to doing the deal we will get ourselves back on track. Unionist communities take their lead from their politicians. If their politicians are constantly telling them that they are being sold down the river and that the whole thing is a disaster, then that is what they will believe.

The moment you do this deal you will be out telling your communities about it, in the same way as republicans, when they decide to do policing, will be out telling young republicans that it is acceptable to join the police.

If you ever get round to doing a deal, you will no doubt be out extolling the virtues of whatever agreement you make. However, that agreement, as Tony Blair keeps telling us, is the Belfast Agreement. It may have modifications, but it is the Belfast Agreement. At that stage you will have to go to your followers and tell them about the wonderful deal you got, and how they should support it.

12.00 noon

Mr Paisley Jnr: That is very helpful, Alan. Do you think that one of the reasons why the agreement failed was because unionists believed that it was a process to something else and not a settlement? Do you think that it is a settlement?

Mr McFarland: That is an interesting question. What is a settlement? There is nothing else in life that does not move. We all get older. We go through our jobs and our personal lives and gain experience. Nothing stays still.

There is a strange view — particularly in unionism — that somehow, and at some stage, we will reach a political nirvana where the world will stop and all political parties will accept that they know their place and are willing to stay there, wherever that place may be. Nothing else in life works like that. Do we expect republicans, for example, to stop being republicans? I certainly do not. I expect them to stop attempting to kill me and make me into a republican, but I accept their full right to battle on with their political views in whatever way they see fit, as long as they do not try to force others to believe the same things through violence.

It is not a settlement; there is no such thing as a settlement in political life, and to expect that is a slightly weird view on life. Do we think that the Conservatives believe that life in England should be settled and that the Labour Party should be in government from here on in, and that Conservatives should accept that they are in opposition?

“Settlement” is a slightly strange word to use. You cannot get any settlements in life, because life changes constantly and politics changes constantly. You fight your bit; you win some battles and you lose some, but you keep battling.

Mr Paisley Jnr: That is very interesting. The reason that I used the term — [Interruption.]

Mr Kennedy: It flows from that that the work of the Ulster Unionist Party and all pro-Union parties is ongoing, and that we continue to want to uphold and maintain our link with the rest of the United Kingdom and reject even the peaceful political aspirations of others who would see us in a united Ireland.

A settlement, as Alan said, does not end things. We may view a negotiation, or the end of a negotiation, as a settlement, but the work of maintaining and protecting the link with the rest of the United Kingdom is ongoing for all of us who are committed to it.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I will stick with Alan’s answer for the moment. If it were not a settlement, that would be a weird view. In Dean Dodson’s biography, in Frank Millar’s extended interview/biography, and in Henry McDonald’s biography, the former leader of the Ulster Unionist Party, who was the principal negotiator of the Belfast Agreement, described it as a settlement. One of the principal obstacles is the question of whether we get a settlement or whether we have a process to something else. That obstacle must be addressed, and I am glad that you have helped us to identify that.

Mr McFarland: I want to clarify what I have already said. Issues are settled. The issue of the principle of consent is settled, as is that of articles 2 and 3.

We are trying to settle the issue of whether there should be devolved government here. In my view, that issue should be settled because it is in the interests of the parties and of the Union to have devolved government here. Whether politics is settled is another matter. It is clearly not settled whether a majority of the people of Northern Ireland will decide that they wish to join the Irish Republic. The principle of consent allows for that, but I do not believe that that day will ever arise, either demographically or in terms of people’s general will in Northern Ireland. That is not a settlement, and to somehow expect politics to stop and nobody to have any aspirations other than the ones that we hold is not a very sensible approach to life.

Mr Paisley Jnr: You believe that the link with the OFMDFM under the Belfast Agreement was a success then?

Mr McFarland: It was not a success in that it suffered greatly from personality problems. I am almost certain that if there had been different personalities in there, it would have operated differently. The concept of “jointery”, as with all the safeguards that were negotiated, is necessary because people do not trust each other. Safeguards are necessary; that is the reason for the voting systems in the Assembly — so that people who feel that they are being disadvantaged can get 30 signatures, raise a petition of concern and have a cross-community vote because they are worried that the other team are trying to pull a flanker on an issue.

Therefore, the “jointery” of the office is a good idea because it stops any one or other. We have to be slightly careful here, because there is a danger, the DUP might find, that if the Ulster Unionists have a bit of a renaissance and unionism splits fifty-fifty, or more than it is at the moment, that we could have a DUP Deputy First Minister and Martin McGuinness as the Prime Minister of Northern Ireland.

Our belief is that that safeguard of “jointery” is quite useful. Although it might be attractive to Rev Paisley or Peter Robinson — or whoever the First Minister would be under the current system — to separate that out, if we reach a stage where Sinn Féin is the lead party in Northern Ireland, the DUP may be glad of having some form of “jointery” and control. It is very short-sighted of the DUP to be trying to split these things and to want to operate separate fiefdoms at the top of Government.

Mr McNarry: From a practical point of view, it would be worth mentioning the link that Ian mentioned in OFMDFM. It is important — particularly when preparing for government, as this Committee is remitted to do — that we ensure that the Committee has an agenda of which it is fully aware; that is, a political agenda. There is a lesson to learn because there are great contradictions with civil servant interference in the running of OFMDFM — and there was great interference in the running of OFMDFM, to the extent that it was perhaps a major contributory factor to some of the personality clashes that have been alluded to.

In preparing for government, the UUP can relate to the DUP in that it, too, is cautious about the civil servants’ agenda and its clear and distinctive methods of trying to interfere, because civil servants in general do not agree with devolution in Northern Ireland. We should all bear that in mind. I will finish by saying that I know that my colleague Alan was being factual, but he was stretching it when he suggested that Martin would be a Prime or First Minister. That would be a terrible thing, and I wish to put that on record.

Mr M McGuinness: That would be your worst nightmare.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I understand why Mr McNarry wishes to put that on record. I thought he was making an argument about why there should not be an Ulster Unionist Party renaissance.

You described the issue of “jointery”, or collective responsibility. If you believe in the principle of collective responsibility, do you agree that colleagues in any Executive should support one another?

Mr McFarland: Absolutely. It is key to the success of this enforced coalition that the Executive operates as a sensible entity and that there is agreement before policies go forward. The whole idea of having a Programme for Government is that it is agreed in the Executive and then individual Ministers work out how they do what they do, but the authority for the money and the policy of what they do is agreed by the Executive. That is the way it should operate.

Mr Paisley Jnr: You also said that you have strong objections to the changes in the comprehensive agreement. Does the Ulster Unionist Party object to the changes because it does not want to be in government?

Mr McFarland: I said that some of the comprehensive agreement is obvious. Everyone is agreed on the ministerial code; the Executive had agreed on it by and large before the Assembly was suspended. My point was that the DUP managed to negotiate some daft outcomes, and it has agreed to some other slightly odd things, such as a North/South parliamentary forum and an all-Ireland civic forum. We managed to stay away from some of those things in the first round of negotiations, and now the DUP seems to have committed everyone to them under this comprehensive agreement, which, as far as we can gather, the Government will give to the DUP in the autumn as some sort of sop for how well it has done, even though the other political parties disagree with some of those outcomes.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I turn now to three final issues that have been raised during these discussions. The first goes back to the desirability to be in government with people. If someone believed that a party had made a concerted effort to have them killed in the past two weeks, do you think that it would be amazing if that person wanted to get into government with members of that party, or do you think that it just proves that the allegation is fatuous and wrong?

Mr McFarland: I am reluctant to get involved in Ian Paisley Jnr’s court case, so I will pass on the question.

Mr Paisley Jnr: You raised the issue of the triple mandate. Perhaps that is not a problem that is going to confront the Ulster Unionist Party for a while.

Mr Kennedy: It will be all right in about three or four years’ time.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Will you elaborate on the issue of a bill of rights? You said that this was an obstacle. Is that a serious obstacle that has priority in these discussions?

12.15 pm

Mr McFarland: No. As I understood it, we were trying to identify areas in the agreement where changes or difficulties have arisen, or may arise. The agreement clearly stated that there should be a bill of rights for Northern Ireland, but that it should include rights specific to Northern Ireland. All human rights already enshrined in law are not specific to Northern Ireland. Therefore, the task was to identify which rights are specific to Northern Ireland. The only one that the UUP came up with was the issue of parading.

Recently, the Human Rights Commission, under its previous chief commissioner, was busy trying to empire-build and encouraged a lot of Non-Governmental Organisations (NGOs) to get involved in identifying areas that should be included in a bill of rights; health is one such area. There is an ongoing debate about whether socio-economic rights should be included in a bill of rights. For example, if I take ill and my treatment costs £10,000 a day, do I have a right, regardless of cost, to have that treatment? Traditionally, in relation to all socio-economic rights, politicians decided how much money went to each Department and the Minister operated within that budget. If the Minister for Health then decides that it is a priority that I get my £10,000 per day, or whatever it may be, for treatment, that is what I get.

However, it is a political choice for the Minister and the Department as to where the money goes. The moment that those become human rights, and, regardless of cost, the Government are obliged to pay for them, first, politics goes out the window. Secondly, no country in the world could operate like that because there is not enough money to pay for that stuff.

My point is that there is an issue relating to that bill of rights that the human rights world is trying to push forward. Not only that, but the Human Rights Commission went way beyond its remit by suggesting an examination of a bill of rights for the island of Ireland, and it was considering that. As you are probably aware, about two years ago it suddenly produced an all-Ireland bill of rights for consultation. The question of a bill of rights for Northern Ireland is an outstanding issue within the agreement for Northern Ireland. It is probably a fairly low priority but one that we might need to examine.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Thanks, Alan.

Mr Ford: My line of questioning will probably not be quite as long as the last.

I was slightly baffled by part of the Ulster Unionist Party Assembly Group's written paper. Specifically, in the second paragraph, highlighting the fact that the DUP and Sinn Féin are now the majority parties on either side of the divide, it says:

"Thus the deal needs to be done between the DUP and Sinn Féin."

The attitude of the SDLP is the same as that of the Alliance Party. We are here with a mandate, regardless of the fact that we are currently the fourth and fifth parties respectively. We are keen to have our say in negotiations and put forward policies that we believe would provide for better governance.

Yet that statement suggests that, having witnessed a series of failed side deals in recent times and having been participants in some limited deals in the slightly more distant past, for example in the setting up of the Departments, Ulster Unionists are now effectively saying: "We do not want any part in these negotiations. Over to you." Will you explain the logic of that, given that you are sitting here and participating?

Mr McFarland: The UUP has maintained, from the beginning of the present process, that all parties must be brought into the process. At the beginning, under the agreement, four of the five parties were here. Then, for reasons that seemed sensible at the time, that evolved into the Governments and two parties, the UUP and Sinn Féin, trying to get a deal up and running.

At the beginning of this process, we strongly recommended the need to get back to basics, and, since the only success that we had was the agreement, we should attempt to include all the parties in any discussions. That is what is so heartening about this Committee: for the very first time, all the parties are around the table.

However, the Government has steadfastly refused to do that. Even when they say: "That is a good idea, we will do that", you then discover that there is a revolving door at Downing Street with Sinn Féin in the back as the DUP leave the front and vice versa.

This is a recognition of the reality of current Government policy on this issue. We disagree with it, but that is the way it is. The point I am trying to make is that if either the DUP or Sinn Féin will not deal, there is no deal. We would be willing to move on with the SDLP etc; the SDLP is not prepared to move on with unionism without Sinn Féin. There is a political reality that if the two main parties do a deal, they have the ability to fire up the Assembly, because only they can do the 50%.

If we were on sixty-forty-forty, it would be an entirely different world in getting the Assembly up and running, but the fact of the matter is that Sinn Féin and the DUP hold the cards when it comes to electing a First Minister and a Deputy First Minister, and that is what triggers any form of Government here. If either of them refuses to do the deal, then there is no deal.

Mr Ford: And yet, in the face of that, you have not proposed any change to the fifty-fifty-fifty parallel consent rule for electing a First Minister and a Deputy First Minister. You have, in fact, endorsed that.

Mr McFarland: Mr Ford knows, because he was involved, that we had discussions about how other systems might be found. However, there was no agreement among the parties to move away from that. I cannot see the two larger parties, who have a veto in that regard, agreeing to move away from that.

Mr Ford: But you are not even making the case for that, never mind the fact that you think others might not agree on it.

Mr McFarland: As I said to Ian Junior, we have not actually got into negotiations yet.

Mr Ford: I am sorry, but you have not highlighted that in your paper as an issue that you think might merit change.

Mr McFarland: It has not been a priority in terms of getting stuff fired up, but if we want to go into negotiations and be persuaded that we should move away, and we can persuade the other parties, then we would not have any particular objections to trying to do that.

Mr Ford: I should have perhaps clarified that before, although what you have said is slightly at variance with what is in your paper. The UUPAG is a coalition — I prefer not to use the term that Ian Paisley Jnr used earlier of an alliance between two parties. In his previous guise when attending some of these meetings on his own, David Ervine would have made a case broadly similar to the one that I am making for involvement of all. I take it that your submission is on behalf of both wings of your coalition?

Mr Kennedy: It is on behalf of the Ulster Unionist Party Assembly Group.

Mr Ford: Both wings?

Mr Kennedy: It is on behalf of the Ulster Unionist Party Assembly Group.

Mr McNarry: There are no wings. We only have legs.

Mr Ford: I see. So we are now a single body. That is interesting.

Mr McFarland: That is what it says. We have to be, in order to operate.

Mr Ford: OK. Going on to your verbal presentation, you talked a lot at the beginning about matters of policing and criminality, and of the lack of confidence that unionists have in republicans — a concern that has been well highlighted by other parties around this table. Is there not also a case that other people need to be providing confidence to the wider community — indeed, to decent people who may vote for parties other than the UUPAG?

In the light of your current UUPAG coalition in this place, and of the arrangements between one section of that party and the Ulster Political Research Group (UPRG) in Belfast City Hall — which extend to the nomination of a UPRG member onto the Belfast DPP as an Ulster Unionist; in the light of the withdrawal of Ulster Unionist members from the Belfast DPP while participating in bodies such as the North and West Belfast Parades Forum; in the light of your party leader's comments after the Whiterock riots last September, which appeared to blame the police and the Parades Commission rather than the UVF, who fired shots at policemen; what can the Ulster Unionist Party do to provide confidence to other people in your position on respect for the rule of law?

Mr McFarland: When the leader of our party first took on his task he said that we would attempt to help loyalist paramilitaries to get off the necks of their communities and go out of business. That is sensible because it is easier for us to attempt it than for the SDLP or Sinn Féin — although it would be easier if the DUP joined in.

There is a sort of preciousness about dealing with people who are associated with paramilitaries. Correct me if I am wrong, but the Alliance Party represented David Ervine and Billy Hutchinson on the Assembly Commission all the way through the first Assembly. I saw no great neuralgia from your party then about whether it should represent David Ervine and Billy Hutchinson on that body. The DUP and the Ulster Unionists have been in groupings for at least 13 years, if not longer, in Belfast City Council with the PUP, the then Ulster Democratic Party (UDP), and the UPRG. That is practical politics. There is nothing unusual in that.

Republican paramilitaries are leaving the stage. What is new is our attempt to engage with loyalist paramilitaries to persuade them that, as they claim to exist only as a reaction to republican paramilitaries, they should now stand down. It is sensible for us to try to make that happen.

Mrs D Dodds: May I offer a point of information? The DUP in Belfast City Council has no alliance with any other party or coalition.

Mr Kennedy: I understand that for several years an informal arrangement has existed to allow representatives of parties such as the PUP to be elected as lord mayor and to other senior offices. That has been done with the assistance of the Ulster Unionist Party and the Democratic Unionist Party. The arrangement was entered into enthusiastically and has continued almost unabated. A degree of co-operation has been extended from both the Ulster Unionist Party and the Democratic Unionist Party to groupings such as the PUP, the UPRG and the former UDP.

Mr McFarland: Recently — and this was in the newspapers, so it is no secret — the DUP did a deal with a senior member of the UPRG so that he could be deputy mayor of Newtownabbey Borough Council. However, when this issue arose in the Assembly the DUP suddenly told the chap that it would no longer support him. There is much pretending that nobody ever had anything to do with paramilitaries. We could go into the history of the DUP with up hills, down dales and third forces if we wished to.

Mr Ford: I hoped that in this session we could explore the attitude of the Ulster Unionist Party Assembly Group to building confidence, rather than the history of the DUP.

Mr Kennedy: Or the history of the Alliance Party in electing the first Sinn Féin lord mayor to Belfast City Council.

Mr Ford: However, the Ulster Unionists seem determined —

Mr Kennedy: We can explore that —

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Let Mr Ford answer.

Mr Kennedy: We can explore that, Mr Ford.

Mr Ford: Since —

Mr Kennedy: And your virtuous record on those matters.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Please do not be disorderly.

12.30 pm

Mr Ford: I notice, Mr Chairman, that Ulster Unionist Members had little to ask about such matters when I was answering questions. However, if they are in some difficulty, I will happily take that opportunity now.

The matters of who sat on the Commission and the limited number of places on it — there were certainly people who regarded themselves as not being represented by Eileen Bell in the first mandate, even though they were Members of parties other than the largest four — are issues of the practical realities of life in this place. That is entirely different from forming a coalition as a voluntary activity.

Mr McFarland: The practical realities of life in this place.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The Ulster Unionists have been very disruptive today, have they not?

Mr Ford: We have noticed.

Mr Kennedy: Mr Chairman, I am not sure who is now answering the questions. That is all I would say.

Mr Ford: In the context of Belfast City Council, I have no doubt that the DUP and Ulster Unionists will continue to have a spat over the years as to what exactly they did or did not do. I can certainly place on record that the Alliance Party did not vote for any member of the PUP to be lord mayor of Belfast a few weeks before the Loughinisland massacre. We did not vote for any member of the UDP/UPRG to be deputy lord mayor of Belfast in order that he could appear at an eleventh-night platform with armed and masked men.

We did vote for Alex Maskey to be lord mayor at a time when Sinn Féin Members were serving as Ministers in this place, and at a time when there was a change in atmosphere following acts of decommissioning and a cessation of violence by Sinn Féin.

If people cannot tell the difference between the Alliance Party's encouragement of people when positive changes are being made, and those who seem to be determined to get into bed with others at a time when their friends are still actively engaged in violence, they do not understand much about what is going on here.

Mr Kennedy: What was the question?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Because there is no question at this stage, it might be a good time to take our 12.30 pm break. Perhaps people will come back refreshed. That will be a 15-minute break. Food will be available in the room.

Mr O'Dowd: Mr Chairman, I am sure that, in his comments, Mr Ford meant to refer to the IRA, rather than Sinn Féin. I am sure that he will be happy to correct that for the record. He spoke about a cessation of violence by Sinn Féin.

Mr Ford: I apologise. I would appreciate it if the record could reflect that.

Mr O'Dowd: Thank you.

The Committee was suspended at 12.32 pm.

On resuming —

12.54 pm

(The Chairman (Mr Molloy) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I remind members to switch off their mobile phones.

Mr Ford: I am a little confused about this coalition between the UUP and the PUP. I took from the presentation that this was part of an attempt to bring loyalists in from the cold. Later, in answer to Ian Paisley, we had a lengthy discourse on the application of the d'Hondt system, if one or two numbers changed. He asked if other Members had been approached, in particular Mr Robert McCartney. Will the Ulster Unionists explain whether the principal purpose of the deal with the PUP is to bring loyalists in from the cold, thereby providing confidence, which will make life easier for all of us to progress, or is it just a cunning plan on numbers? The fact that there seemed to be an admission that the UUP approached other people suggests that it was not so much to do with bringing loyalists in from the cold as simply a cunning plan to do down the DUP or Sinn Féin in terms of ministerial seats.

Mr McFarland: You will appreciate that it is both. For nearly a year there has been an ongoing attempt to engage with loyalist paramilitaries to help them follow a peaceful path and to get rid of their weapons. I explained earlier how the other issue arose. The idea was that we would form an Assembly grouping, as we could under Standing Orders, for the purpose of operating inside the Assembly. I do not want to get into whether we approached members of the Alliance Party, the DUP or indeed the SDLP.

Mr Ford: Sinn Féin?

Mr McFarland: We did not approach Sinn Féin — or Mr Berry, although not for the obvious reasons. As an MLA for Newry and Armagh, Danny will confirm —

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I remind members of limited privilege in relation to this meeting.

Mr Kennedy: That is sensible, Chairman.

Mr McNarry: Are we allowed to disclose those who approached us?

Mr O'Dowd: Is Sinn Féin on the list?

Mr McFarland: My point is that that is a two-phase operation. The first phase is a tactical move concerning our representation and the representation of unionism in the Assembly. The second one is an ongoing issue with the loyalist paramilitaries and the wider community. Those two are not incompatible.

Mr Ford: They are not perhaps incompatible, but they do not seem totally congruent. However, I notice with interest that you did not approach Mr Berry or any member of Sinn Féin, but appear not to deny that you approached the SDLP, the Alliance Party or Mr McCartney. I should put on record that they did not approach me; I think that they know what they would have heard if they had.

Mr Kennedy: We probably did.

Mr Ford: As well as the direct issues of policing, you talked a fair bit about criminality. Again, it was criminality in the context of activities by republicans, former republicans, republicans acting officially and republicans acting individually. The IMC, which the UUP claims credit for, although I can place on record that the body we now have is closer to the idea that we put forward than the one that your former leader put forward —

Mr Kennedy: That is very modest of you.

Mr Ford: The IMC, however, has made a fair bit in recent reports of the activities and criminality on the part of various loyalists. I remember that on a few occasions recently when the police carried out actions against organised crime in loyalist areas, Ulster Unionist MLAs — that particular wing of your coalition — raised objections to the behaviour of police officers of a kind that I have never heard them raise when the police carried out similar operations against criminality in perceived republican areas. Could you explain what the difference is, if we are trying to build confidence?

Mr McFarland: Our policy is quite clear: we are against any criminality. Individual members of the party, as in your party and other parties, have views on all sorts of things that pertain to themselves. I do not want to get into that. Our policy is quite clear on law and order. Our policy has also been to attempt to persuade loyalist paramilitaries to follow a peaceful, constitutional path. That has been ongoing for some time. Everything that we do is in keeping with trying to make that happen. Our view is that it is timely; it needs to happen; and it needs to happen in as fast a timescale as can be managed. We have made it clear that we expect some sort of movement on those issues.

That is all that we can do. We do not have a paramilitary wing of our own. All we can do is encourage others to follow a peaceful path. That seems to be a sensible thing to do, although you may disagree.

1.00 pm

Mr Kennedy: It is also worth noting — and it is a fact of life — that, in political terms, greater emphasis has been placed on these issues because of Sinn Féin's electoral mandate, which is substantially greater than the mandate of any loyalist political party. Those important implications must be considered in respect of the formation of an Executive. I do not want to underestimate or dismiss those issues, but they do arise when considering loyalist paramilitaries and their political parties.

Mr Ford: This is not a question. However, I wish to place on record my view that if more than one party or grouping around this table has perceived links to organisations that have been, and may still be, engaged in paramilitary activity — that may not necessarily be the case any longer, although it may have been the case a few weeks ago — that such concerns could apply only to Sinn Féin because of perceived links, in the past and possibly in the present, to the IRA.

My question was not about republican criminality. If, as Alan says, the UUP fully supports the rule of law, how does that stance reassure the wider community when individual MLAs, without any apparent sanction, discipline or comment from the party leadership, criticise police actions against criminality in loyalist areas? A party that supports the rule of law supports the police in upholding the law, whatever the area.

Mr Kennedy: Mr Chairman, how relevant is that question to scoping the issues, for which this Committee has been designed? From Mr Ford's point of view, we would be incapable of giving him a satisfactory answer. We have stated the party's position on illegal activity, criminality, and so forth: such activities are unacceptable.

However, we are in a real situation in which sections of loyalism must be brought forward into an exclusively democratic future. We are prepared, and we are engaged in that work. Some people may criticise us; some people may be virtuous and others may be hypocritical. Nevertheless, we are engaged in that work. There will be difficulties; it is not an easy situation. However, we are determined to play our part so that progress can be made.

Mr McFarland: The Police Ombudsman investigates individual police officers whose behaviour has not been up to scratch, as you know. I am not clear on what you are referring to; I presume it is individual people. They presumably have issues with individual police officers. There is a system, through the Police Ombudsman, to deal with those. That is the way that they should be dealt with. I do not know whether you are suggesting that we have masses of people who are somehow out criticising the police, or police actions, in an unwarranted way. Is that what you are suggesting?

Mr Ford: I certainly have a memory of that.

There seems to be a query about whether it is valid to ask such questions. If you are questioning other parties about their responsibility to provide confidence, you have a duty to answer how you are providing confidence to the wider community. When the police take action against people with paramilitary links, and the activities of local representatives are perceived as defending the interests of those people, that is not how you provide confidence to the wider community that you see policing as an impartial activity directed against all crime. It suggests that those who believe that the police service is serving the interests of only one section of the community are right.

Mr Kennedy: You have given your subjective opinion. Any objective observer of the Ulster Unionist Party will confirm that it is a party that believes strongly in law and order and in law enforcement. We support those principles.

Mr McFarland: We have a duty to provide confidence, which we are attempting to do. We are attempting to help loyalist paramilitaries to move off the stage, just as it could be argued that we have spent the past seven years or so attempting to help republican paramilitaries to move off the stage. They did not particularly want to — they did not want to decommission, but we hassled them into that eventually. It could be argued that that is a good thing, because the fact that they are no longer a fully armed organisation has undoubtedly increased confidence. We discussed that earlier.

We are attempting to encourage loyalist paramilitaries to follow a similar path. If they can be persuaded to stand down, that should lead to increased confidence in the community.

Mr Ford: If I heard you correctly, you appeared to suggest that the only significant issue that might be included in a bill of rights for Northern Ireland is the right to parade. What about the right not to have a parade imposed on you?

Mr McNarry: There is no such right.

Mr McFarland: My point was that the agreement says that a bill of rights for Northern Ireland should include rights that are exclusive to Northern Ireland. We have identified the parading issue as an issue that should be included in a bill of rights, because freedom of association and the freedom to process along a public highway are inherent in the British way of life.

The other point that I was trying to make was that all the other issues that the human rights industry is attempting to insert as being exclusive to Northern Ireland should not be included.

Mr Ford: I heard that. That is not a problem. My issue is with the parading aspect.

Mr McFarland: That is our take on it. You may have another take on it.

Mr Ford: Your take is that the parading issue must be included in a bill of rights. Mr McNarry's take is that there is no right to not have a parade imposed on you, so perhaps —

Mr McFarland: People have a right to protest against a parade, but people also have a right to walk along roads. If it is said that we do not have a right to walk along roads peacefully, we get into all sorts of issues concerning people's freedoms.

Mr Ford: I suspect that we have already got into those issues.

Mr McNarry: If society in Northern Ireland can accommodate peaceful protest, there will always be peaceful walks. That goes without saying. No one can dismiss the fact that one section of the community that walks is targeted by another section for political reasons, to agitate and to cause community division.

Other organisations walk without interference in Northern Ireland. Does Mr Ford suggest that we adopt — as the Parades Commission has done — a rioters' or protesters' charter, and that we all sign up to it? Does he suggest that, when people are attending sporting activities, other people should protest and block the roads? Does he suggest that when people are going about their walks in August, other people should protest against them? Is he suggesting that somehow there is a right to have a territorial claim? On this morning's Radio Ulster news we heard people who were adamant in making the claim that an area was a "nationalist area". Does that presuppose that non-nationalists have no right to go into nationalist areas? Where does it end?

The culture that I enjoy accepts that there are basic rights and freedoms for everyone. There is no right to protest that takes precedence over the right to walk. Two rights do not make a wrong, but perhaps Mr Ford and others could see their way to understanding that there would be no confrontation in our communities if people adopted peaceful protest, which they have been asked to do for years upon years.

Mr Ford: I am not sure that I am here to answer questions.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I was going to allow Seán Farren to speak.

Dr Farren: If you allow me an intervention, Chairman, it will obviate my having to return to the parades issue in relation to a bill of rights. I wanted the UUP to clarify the accuracy of what seems a very narrow interpretation of what the Good Friday Agreement provides in respect of a bill of rights. As I read it, the agreement states that:

"The new Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission ... will be invited to consult and to advise on the scope of defining, in Westminster legislation, rights supplementary to those in the European Convention on Human Rights to reflect the particular circumstances of Northern Ireland, drawing as appropriate on international instruments and experience."

From what is suggested in that paragraph and the following paragraph, in the section entitled 'Rights, Safeguards and Equality of Opportunity', it cannot be distilled that the only issues that need to be identified and agreed would relate to the right to parade. The agreement allows for more than the Ulster Unionist Party seems to suggest. As that had occurred to me, and given what has been said, I thought that it might be more helpful to put the point at this stage, so that it is encompassed in the exchange between Mr Ford and Alan McFarland.

Mr McFarland: We can have whatever rights that we think should be in a bill of rights — they are not limited to parading. There is an entire raft of human rights legislation on the Westminster statute books that reflects European Acts on those issues. What the Good Friday Agreement allowed for, as we understood it at the time, was to include in a bill of rights for Northern Ireland rights that are specific to Northern Ireland. I cannot remember the quote.

Dr Farren: It is:

“to reflect the particular circumstances of Northern Ireland, drawing as appropriate on international instruments and experience.”

It goes on to elaborate on that.

Mr McFarland: What are the issues specific to Northern Ireland — and not to the rest of the United Kingdom — that require a bill of rights? Clearly, socio-economic rights need to be the same. Whether that is on an all-island basis or within the United Kingdom, all those issues are in place.

There are certain rights that people would like, but that would interfere with the political governance of the Assembly. We must take care not to remove political choice on how money is divided. To hand that over as a right would be to cede control over how much things will cost. There is no point in bankrupting the country by giving people rights to A, B, C or D in a bill of rights.

To me, the only issue that is specific to Northern Ireland as distinct from the rest of the UK or anywhere else is parades. The SDLP may be able to identify others that are specific and should be included in a bill of rights for Northern Ireland.

1.15 pm

Dr Farren: I thank David Ford for allowing me to intervene.

As in some of the exchanges that you had earlier on with Ian, we are now debating an issue of concern that a party has raised that needs to be addressed. I am happy to answer some of your points. If we are still at the stage of identifying the issues, let us finish with that and then decide how we are going to deal with the matters that we have identified. It is useful to have that as an item on the agenda. Whether or not resolving it is essential to restoration is another matter that would have to be discussed and agreed or otherwise. Thank you very much.

Mr Ford: Séan has wrapped up the bill of rights point, but I hope that we will come back to it.

You referred to dual mandates. I might personally not be particularly happy that, although he was then the sitting MP, David Burnside was also elected as a MLA for South Antrim in November 2003. I might be further unhappy that, having been elected as MLA for Mid Ulster in November 2003, William McCrea was elected as MP for South Antrim last year. However, that was the will of the people as expressed through the ballot box.

What particular thoughts have you about the legal prevention of dual, triple or quadruple mandates? You highlighted the experience in Scotland, where it was political and media pressure rather than formal legislation that stopped the dual mandate.

Mr McFarland: There has been, and there is, no guarantee that the Assembly will be restored in six months' time, so those with double or triple mandates would not want to change them at this time. For nearly eight years many of us round this table have been unsure of whether we would have a job in two or three months' time. It is understandable that people would not want to bail out of being a MP or councillor while there is any doubt.

Those who served in the first Assembly will know that two days of plenary work, two days of Committee work and a day in the constituency is quite a workload, if the Assembly is working properly. In the first Assembly, Committee members from the west of the Province would suddenly bail out at 5.00 pm in the middle of a fairly key debate on health, for instance, because they had to return to attend a council meeting at 7.00 pm.

The quality of effort in the Committee was diluted because swathes of people kept leaving all the time, and I stress that this was while the Assembly was running properly. Similarly, if you are here for four days a week and you spend one day in the constituency, how can you operate as a fully working Member of Parliament at Westminster? It does not make sense.

The Scots foresaw this, and individual Scottish MSPs were not particularly keen, but the media raised a hue and cry about how they could be at Westminster and in Edinburgh at the same time. Under that pressure, it became embarrassing for people to be claiming two salaries and to be in both places at the same time. The result was that the Scottish Parliament decided that it was not very sensible to have people with dual mandates.

The Government have decided in the Review of Public Administration that they are going to legislate against people being members of the new council system — whether there are seven or twelve or fifteen or whatever — and a MLA. That makes sense, because we are likely to end up with full-time councillors, who will be well paid and will have extra duties. How can someone be here giving full value and also be at a council? Indeed, we have people with triple mandates. How can someone be in a council chamber doing full-time work in a new super council; here giving his best; and at Westminster giving his best?

Although it is nice to have high-profile, well-known people within a party snaffling up all these positions and guaranteeing to get votes, it is politically unhealthy within parties and in Northern Ireland. The Assembly needs to give some thought to this. Clearly we cannot force this unless we legislate, and perhaps we should not be legislating. However, if the Assembly were restored, it would be hard to justify pulling in a Westminster salary and allowances when one is — or should be — here full time.

Mr Ford: I should, perhaps, have declared my interest as somebody who stepped down from Antrim Borough Council in 2001 to concentrate on the Assembly, but who, last year, felt the obligation to seek a renewed mandate because of the circumstances in the Assembly.

I agree to a considerable extent with the view that Mr McFarland outlined, but I am not quite sure how it fits legislatively, as opposed to individual's decisions.

Mr McFarland: How we achieve that is an issue for the famous negotiations, when they get going. All we are doing is outlining issues. I have several other issues, including the standing of MLAs, to introduce later.

To give you a flavour: Ministers and Government at Westminster are accessed through MPs, whereas during the first Assembly, people would phone up Departments and be allowed to take a delegation to meet a Minister. The result of that practice was that MLAs became irrelevant, and we began to be treated as being irrelevant. If the public could go straight to Ministers, MLAs had nothing that they needed.

Therefore, although it is not on the list, when the Assembly gets up and running, we should, perhaps, adopt a system similar to that in Westminster. Constituents in England write to their MPs to get access to Government and make things happen. If that practice were adopted here, MLAs' jobs would become important because they could produce the goods.

Mr Ford: The UUP presentation referred quite a bit to greater collectivity in the Executive. We are all agreed on the ministerial code of conduct, so I do not want to go down that route. Emphasis was placed on the Programme for Government as something to produce collectivity, and mention was made of having power vested in the Assembly rather than in individual Departments, which is an advantage that our Scottish and Welsh colleagues have over us. I agree with that issue.

I want to tease out the specific issue of a collective vote to endorse the Executive. The Executive should operate with greater collectivity than previously, but why would anybody want to be part of an Executive to which they were not prepared to give a vote of confidence?

Mr McFarland: My thinking is connected to the posts of First Minister and Deputy First Minister. Suppose, for example, that we decided that we had reservations so strong to Martin McGuinness's being the Deputy First Minister of Northern Ireland that we, or the DUP, objected to his appointment. Under the present rule, due to the joint-ticket requirement, it would not happen.

However, the amazing negotiations of the DUP have separated this issue out under the comprehensive agreement, so that nationalists vote for the Deputy First Minister and unionists vote for the First Minister. In fact, there is no need for them to worry because the candidates' own parties just need to vote for them under the 50% rule. Therefore, Sinn Féin would vote for Martin McGuinness and the DUP would vote for Ian Paisley. It does not matter whether all the parties think that Ian Paisley would not be a good First Minister, or that we object to Martin McGuinness as Deputy First Minister. None of that would matter because Sinn Féin would get to choose the Deputy First Minister.

If Members object to the appointments at that stage, having a wrap-up vote would mean that they would nevertheless be endorsing Martin McGuinness as Deputy First Minister, having been denied the ability to have a say in whether he should be. I am sorry to personalise this, but the appointment of Martin McGuinness is the easiest scenario to understand.

The UUP's understanding is that if we did have an objection, and we felt strongly enough to refuse to vote, we would be chucked out of the Executive for the four-year term of the Assembly. Similarly, if the SDLP had an objection, either to the First Minister or the Deputy First Minister, it would be chucked out as well.

From what I can gather, one of the nightmare scenarios for the DUP is being left in Government with Sinn Féin, with the rest of us in opposition.

The DUP's outstanding piece of negotiation has led to the removal of any say in who should be First Minister and Deputy First Minister, and to those parties that feel unable to vote for the Executive in the round being chucked out from any ministerial responsibility.

Mr Ford: If you have serious objections to — since we are personalising it — Martin McGuinness as Deputy First Minister or Ian Paisley as First Minister, why would you want to be in an Executive with them anyway?

Mr McFarland: Under the current system, if we could agree on a First Minister and a Deputy First Minister — though one might take issue with individuals whom the parties have put forward — the system is such that we are entitled, in the same way as the SDLP, to a number of ministerial positions. We have a right to those. The way in which the system operated before meant that all of us had a say in who became the First Minister and who became the Deputy First Minister. The DUP could object to the joint ticket and it would not happen. After that, there was no collective vote — that was the only vote we had. After that, we all had our rightful positions and we took them.

Under the comprehensive agreement, not only is any say in who should be First Minister and Deputy First Minister gone, as regards cross-community agreement, but the moment any of us object to the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, we are thrown out. That is daft.

Mr Ford: Yes, but I am not asking —

Mr Kennedy: One of the difficulties of the previous Executive was that the four parties that it comprised were facing different ways on all sorts of different issues, and there was little or no collective responsibility on any of the issues that were brought forward. Presumably, the ultimate desire in the formation of any new Executive would be for some kind of shared responsibility to be created. Personally, I think that we are some considerable way off that, even in this Committee. However, that must ultimately be the desired outcome of any Executive, because it would be more beneficial for our citizens.

We must look carefully at the experience of the last Executive and see how best that can be improved, but our early assumption is that it will not be very easy to achieve the form of collective responsibility that exists in all other Governments. Perhaps the method of forming those Administrations is somewhat different from the convoluted method that we have arrived at. Nevertheless, shared responsibility leading to a shared future is, presumably, what we ultimately seek.

Mr McNarry: David Ford's point is a good one. The more it is teased out and discussed, the better. It is important that we do not reach a situation again in which a party is half in the Executive or half out of it. We want all people to be committed to being in it, if that is their choice. I can also see a reason why my party might take the decision not to go into an Executive. That decision — and it would be open to any party — would probably be based on the progress made by this Committee in working through a Programme for Government. Somewhere along the line, preparation for Government must surely throw up a Programme for Government. One of the failures of the last Executive was that they did not devote sufficient time to agreeing measures before going into Government. I remember from my experience in the First Minister's Office that they were bedevilled by problems.

1.30 pm

I remember David Ford legitimately criticising the inability of Bills to come through. That was because the Executive were starting from scratch and had not worked out any measures or programmes or agreements. They did not know what was a hot potato and what was not. There is a lesson to be learned, and that is the validity of David Ford's point. I am pleased that he has raised it so that it can be teased out now, and we can bear it in mind when we make future preparations. One can go in with the best will in the world with all the relevant papers, but the mechanics do not always go according to plan.

On many occasions, I was driving down Massey Avenue at 9.00 pm, and Mark Durkan phoned to say that there were two words in the third paragraph of a Bill that he did not like, and we would have had to drive back and sit for another three hours to work out two words. That is the nonsense of it all, and more professionalism must be addressed to it. Before the UUP acquiesces to going into Government, I would like to know the bulk of measures that we would attempt to put through in the lifetime of the Assembly.

Mr Ford: I am unsure if that is my point entirely answered but, on the harmony of the past few minutes, I will finish at this point.

Dr Farren: I will pose a few questions that I hope will be quickly answered. The SDLP would like to take the questions as a group if that is OK.

First, I understand from your presentation — and correct me if I am wrong — that the Ulster Unionist Party believes that the Good Friday Agreement remains the basis for the framework within which we must move forward, and that all the relevant parties must agree to any modifications to its operation. By parties, I mean both Governments, where both are involved, and all political parties.

Mr McFarland: The Prime Minister has made it clear that the Belfast Agreement/Good Friday Agreement is the only game in town. If one considers the comprehensive agreement that the DUP negotiated, it is clearly the Belfast Agreement with a few modifications. Some of those modifications make a great deal of sense, because there are things that we need to improve upon. However, other modifications have been made to protect the embarrassment of the DUP from sticking up its hands to vote for Martin McGuinness. That is the name of the game, and whatever deal shuffles out of this will be on that basis.

The UUP's view has been that these things are much stronger if all the parties are brought into it, but, at various stages, other parties have been left out of this equation. Looking back now, it was the way that it was at the time, but it was not necessarily the most sensible way forward. The Governments spent a couple of years negotiating directly with the UUP and Sinn Féin, but that has now changed to the DUP and Sinn Féin. That is still unhealthy, as any deal that comes out of this would be much stronger if all the parties round this table were involved and comfortable with it. To use an old cliché, we will not all get what we want. The question is: what can we produce to get a Government up and running here that we can all live with?

Dr Farren: Would it follow, therefore, from what you have said, that you would join with the SDLP and others who might take exception to what Mr Hanson said in the House of Commons some weeks ago about the DUP having a mandate that required that the changes that they were seeking would have to be granted?

I hope that I am paraphrasing him correctly, rather than quoting his words. To allow that would be, in effect, to concede to the more exclusive bilateral approach that the DUP seems to prefer and that other parties have used in the past.

Mr McFarland: Recent dealings have smacked of the Government going out of their way, in all sorts of ways, to hug the DUP, presumably in an effort to persuade it to go into Government with Sinn Féin. It strikes me that the comprehensive agreement in November 2004 was supposedly between the DUP, Sinn Féin and the Governments. Sinn Féin has told us that it is no longer wedded to that document, that it was of its time and that time has moved on.

The DUP tells us that it is wedded to that document. Indeed it is so wedded that the Government, as we understand it from Mr Hanson, proposes to reward the DUP for doing the deal with Sinn Féin. My problem with that is that a number of issues in the comprehensive agreement are plain wrong-headed. Some are sensible and, with a bit of tweaking, we could all support them. For example, there is a ministerial code that, with a few modifications, all parties around this table could support today or tomorrow. However, my sense is that we will not get the DUP to agree to anything like that, because it thinks that it will get its sweeties in the autumn, for which it will be able to claim credit if and when it does the deal with Sinn Féin. That is not a healthy way for politics to operate. We should attempt to get all parties to buy in to whatever it is that is being proposed for the autumn.

Dr Farren: Does it also follow, from what you have just said, that it is important for the two Prime Ministers, who will be here tomorrow, to make it clear that the Committee has work to do to a timetable over the next few weeks that would contribute to the discussions and negotiations that would re-emerge with greater intensity in the autumn? If the Governments urge us to continue to work here in that context, we should welcome that.

Mr McFarland: I am on record as saying that the Committee, and the engagement between parties around this table over the last three weeks, is probably one of the most useful things that the Assembly has done. It is positive and necessary. The question is what we do with that.

Clearly, there are issues over which most of the parties here have no control, such as paramilitarism. Only Sinn Féin can deal with policing. Having explained that we are all anxious about policing and have urged Sinn Féin to deal with it, that is all that the other four parties can do. It could be argued that until Sinn Féin deals with policing, there is not much else to be said, other than to remind Sinn Féin that it must deal with that issue.

However, other issues, in which we all have a vested interest, are common to all five parties. Although the UUP has put down common issues as a heading on the agenda, it is not at all clear whether we have examined all the issues within the overall topics. It strikes me that there may well be work to do, not negotiating or whatever, but in trying to hone down or define more clearly exactly what the individual issues are within the broad band of issues raised by various parties.

Having listened to almost everyone now, and I know what was in the UUP submission, we may reach a stage, later today or whenever, when we need to consider whether there are topics from which it is not clear whether we have mined all the issues that need to be addressed. It strikes me that there may well be extra work.

I have serious reservations about the idea of this Committee shuffling on over the summer. People already have holidays booked. The Committee has been successful in that we have maintained a fair degree of integrity among the party teams; there has not been an enormous turnover of personnel. The danger in the summer is that we would end up with people who have not been here for the first three weeks, and whose lack of knowledge of the issues that have been discussed so far could lead to confusion. Perhaps we will get round to discussing how to deal with all of that later.

Dr Farren: Do you agree with the SDLP that there are issues that are essential to restoration, and that those issues may well be outside the direct influence of the parties in this room, and, indeed, of the Government, to progress? That is not to say that influence of some kind could not be brought to bear.

There are other issues, which we have generally labelled review issues, such as policing and justice, and what might compose a Programme for Government. All of that could well be progressed, and some issues might be resolved before 24 November. Others might not have that resolution and would be work in progress beyond that date, but that should not impede restoration.

Mr McFarland: By the end of today, we will have heard all the submissions. It would be useful for the Committee to clear its mind on which issues are within its ability to solve, and perhaps to prioritise the issues that need to be dealt with first, ahead of those that can be left. All the matters raised have some problem or other attached to them. Where they are put in the pecking order, and how we prioritise them publicly, is a matter for discussion among the parties around the table. We could then recommend a take-note debate, perhaps, or the formation of a subcommittee, to complete our work.

(The Chairman (Mr Wells) in the Chair.)

Dr Farren: We seem to be agreeing on quite a bit; it might be dangerous to continue too far too fast along that track.

I want to come back to the issue that was raised by several members, which is the UUP's relationship with the PUP, and put it in a way that has not been expressed before. As a party member and personally, I engaged with Sinn Féin at a time when IRA violence was continuing at a considerable level of intensity. We took much criticism for that at the time. There was a clear principle that we would not sacrifice, which was that as long as Sinn Féin continued to be associated with an organisation involved in violence, there could not be anything resembling a joint approach on certain issues.

1.45 pm

I well remember the invitation being extended to us in 1998 to join with Sinn Féin on the equality agenda, as it might be described, to which we firmly said no. More generally, there was an invitation to join Sinn Féin on an international campaign on self-determination, as it was described, and, again, we said no. We stood by the principle that we could not embark on campaigns, or on any kind of broadly political joint activity, as long as Sinn Féin was associated with an organisation that was engaged in violence. That did not stop us engaging in lengthy meetings with senior members of Sinn Féin to impress on them the case for ending violence and to argue that no progress on any issue, whether self-determination or equality, could be expected to be made as long as an armed campaign continued.

What can you point to in your new relationship with the PUP that would give any confidence that loyalist street violence, which can be more intense at some times than at others, and the criminality in which loyalist paramilitaries are well known to be involved, will end? What effect is your influence having? Despite their reservations, people might adopt a less hostile attitude towards your engagement with the leader of the PUP if something positive on loyalist criminality and paramilitarism came out of it.

Mr McFarland: It is no secret that my party leader has said that he has been engaging with those who claim to be involved with loyalist paramilitaries. I am confident, as a result of those meetings, that there is an intention on their part to deal with the issues that must be dealt with. They will do it in their own timescale, because they are unlikely to want to be seen to do anything as a result of a political party wagging a finger at them. We have explained to them that such engagement has been difficult for us — as it clearly has, for there are moral issues involved — but that we believe that it is worth doing. We understand that loyalist paramilitaries wish to come in from the cold. I expect that IMC reports later in the year will reflect a change in the behaviour of loyalist paramilitaries.

Until that happens, I cannot show you any proof. However, we have explained our position as to what we are doing and why. It has been suggested to us that loyalist paramilitaries support what we are trying to do and that there will be a positive response from them. We have been at this since 1997 with Sinn Féin and the republican movement, and that took a very long time. I have no idea how long this will take, but we have explained that the sooner it happens, the better. If there should be a deal in the autumn between the DUP and Sinn Féin, it would be ridiculous for loyalist paramilitaries to be still involved in paramilitary activity. The only people who can deal with this are those directly involved in it.

Dr Farren: There are several questions that follow from that. You are saying that, as yet, there is no evidence to which you can point in public so that people might have more confidence that your influence is having the desired effect.

I am prepared to accept the bona fides of your attempts to influence loyalist paramilitaries, particularly those associated with the PUP. However, if the next IMC report does not signal movement in the direction that you hope — and perhaps I am boxing you into a corner by asking you this question — will it not at least be necessary for you to raise questions and to reassure the public?

Indeed, throughout this period, criticisms should not be muted. Again, I can only refer back to our experience in the SDLP. Our criticism was not muted during the period of our talks, contacts and engagement with the leadership of Sinn Féin. That criticism was as trenchant as we thought necessary, depending on the events that took place.

It would be important to have some sense as to how long we can wait before you draw a fairly definitive answer or conclusion on what the UVF and those other paramilitaries are doing. I find it very difficult, even in paramilitary terms, to accept that they have any case whatsoever, given what has happened on the IRA side, for persisting with paramilitary activity. Have you any understanding from your contacts as to what justification they can possibly offer? I know that there are several questions in those comments.

Mr McFarland: Let me try to answer them. Clearly, if we get another IMC report that shows no change, life will be extremely difficult for us. I am confident that that will not be the case. It is no secret that Mr McNarry has been engaging with loyalism for several years, and has been doing a good job. There is some evidence from the North and West Belfast Parades Forum, in which we are heavily operational, and from background dealings with other parties, of attempts to make the walking season as peaceful as possible. We believe that that is in everyone's interest. There has been a response from paramilitaries on both sides to those efforts in north and west Belfast.

However, a needless complication has arisen. In one of our first meetings with the Secretary of State, he mentioned deadlines — in particular, a deadline of 24 November. We drew to his attention the serious danger of that deadline, but he went ahead and announced it. He said that if there were no Government here by 24 November, the two Governments would move into what they are terming “joint management”, but is actually joint authority in Northern Ireland.

If you were a loyalist paramilitary, you might assume that, on 24 November, we will all be sold down the river, and the Dublin hordes will come for us. That, despite our warning, is what has happened. The paramilitaries have now said, wrongly in my view, that they will do nothing by way of disarming until 24 November because, on that date, Northern Ireland could be sold out.

That is daft stuff on one level, but it is unsurprising on another. We warned the Secretary of State not to say that we would be sold out to the Irish Government with joint authority for Northern Ireland on 24 November because it would lead to that reaction from the loyalist paramilitaries. He would not listen, and we have seen that reaction. In that climate, we are trying to say to them: “Listen, it's not as bad as that. We think that there will be an accommodation with a bit of good will, and we need to get on the road to dealing with weapons and getting all the paramilitary activity stopped and off the radar completely.”

We will know whether that has been successful when the next IMC report is published. That will be the first check mark, when we will know whether our efforts, which were not helped by the Secretary of State's threat that we would all be sold out on 24 November, have reaped some reward.

Dr Farren: The phrase that the two Governments used, echoed by the Secretary of State, was “joint stewardship”. That seems to be the weakest form of relationship that they could have gone for. They did not use words such as “joint authority”. There is some understanding in international politics —

Mr McFarland: If one is already paranoid about the intentions of others, particularly in the light of the British Government's treatment of us recently — and certainly the Irish Government's — the terms “joint management”, “joint stewardship” or “joint authority” all get lost in the smoke.

Dr Farren: Perhaps. However, it begs the question: what has the PUP — and I know the party is not here to speak for itself — been doing over the last few years? Given that the principle of consent is embedded in the Good Friday Agreement, and given that, whatever the two Governments have said about joint stewardship, they are not talking about ditching the Good Friday Agreement in order to implement joint stewardship, it seems to me that people are reaching for excuses. If the PUP has, as it puts it, been “giving advice” to its paramilitary connection, I wonder what influence it has and whether that connection serves any purpose any more. Is the PUP just part and parcel of the same thing to the point that it wants to have it both ways?

Mr McFarland: That is obviously a question for the PUP.

Dr Farren: It is not a question that you can answer, but there is a question of confidence even though the PUP would not be in any Executive. However, the UUP would be, with the support of the PUP. It would be important at that stage, if you persist with that relationship, to know where you stood if the influence that you hoped to exercise was not having the desired effect.

Mr McFarland: Clearly, the relationship with loyalist paramilitaries or even their continued existence would be an extremely serious issue, if we get to the stage where the DUP and Sinn Féin are going into Government. It would be very strange if loyalism were still threatening people with guns.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are you finished, Dr Farren?

Dr Farren: There are a number of other questions that would lead me almost into a negotiating situation, or into discussions associated with negotiations. I think it was Danny who was pursuing me the other day on North/South bodies. So, Danny, can I pursue you for a minute or two?

Mr Kennedy: With great pleasure.

Dr Farren: In the light of our experience of North/South bodies, what is the Ulster Unionist Party's general position — without getting into specifics? I attended North/South Ministerial Council meetings with UUP Ministers, most frequently with Reg Empey, but also with Sam Foster and Michael McGimpsey.

The veil of suspicion was lifted because the UUP Ministers saw that there was a job to be done that would be mutually beneficial to people, North and South, in a number of areas. When they realised that they could make a beneficial contribution, they went about the task as enthusiastically as I did on behalf of the people and the party that I represent.

2.00 pm

Mr Kennedy: The position of the Ulster Unionist Party, and also, I think, that of the Democratic Unionist Party, is that where co-operation is to mutual benefit and interest on a North/South basis, we will co-operate. Co-operation cannot be politically manufactured. Some people have placed a greater emphasis on North/South co-operation, to the detriment of the east-west relationship; that issue has been a considerable concern. Little or no significant work, including the setting-up of secretariats or working bodies, has been done on an east-west basis. Although we will happily engage in meaningful co-operation to the mutual benefit of people, North and South, there are also many mutually beneficial east-west issues that we wish to explore.

There are also concerns about the political emphasis; some nationalists and republicans have been more enthusiastic about the comfort blanket provided through a North/South link than an east-west link.

Dr Farren: You say that some of the North/South bodies are “manufactured”, as if they were mere contrivances created for political ends rather than meeting particular needs. What bodies do you have in mind?

Mr Kennedy: We are relatively comfortable with the existing bodies. However, nationalists and republicans have been suggesting that the number of bodies and joint agencies needs to be built on. We have yet to be convinced of the economic and social arguments. We certainly have yet to be convinced of the political arguments that would allow for the creation of new bodies, because the jury is still out on what they have provided and what benefits have accrued. We would like to measure that a little more and enhance east-west structures before we could reasonably be expected to increase the number of North/South bodies.

Dr Farren: This is not the forum to go into details, but I would hope that you would have firm proposals as to how the bodies might be built on.

Mr Kennedy: The east-west bodies?

Dr Farren: I am talking about the North/South bodies, but I will come to the east-west bodies. You spoke about building on the number of North/South bodies.

Mr Kennedy: No. I mentioned the fact that nationalists and republicans seem keener than unionists to build on the North/South bodies.

Dr Farren: I hope that I would not be wrong in imagining that if a strong case were made for something to be built on, that that would be to the mutual benefit of people, North and South. Unionists sometimes perceive the SDLP as representing people in the South. I represent people in North Antrim, and I want the best for those people.

When I held ministerial posts, I was acting on behalf of the people throughout Northern Ireland, from whatever section of the community they came. That was my primary responsibility. I was not necessarily interested in what was good for Cork — that was the job of the Irish Minister across the table. I argued as trenchantly as I could for benefits to be accrued for Northern Ireland, wherever a particular initiative was focused.

The suggestion that was almost implicit in much of what is being said is that we would rather work for people in Dundalk, Drogheda, Dublin or somewhere else rather than for the people who elect us. I have to put myself up for election again, so voters would not thank me for being instrumental in locating a factory in Cork. They will thank me if I helped to locate a factory in Ballycastle or if I helped Ian to locate one in the middle of Ballee, or somewhere like that.

Mr Kennedy: Steady on.

Dr Farren: I am not sure whether I would get the same thanks for locating a factory in Ballee as I would were it in Ballycastle.

Mr Paisley Jnr: You should have tried.

Mr Kennedy: Although I accept Dr Farren's bona fides as a local representative and his ongoing drive to improve facilities and the economy for those whom he represents in his locality, it has always appeared to some unionists that the SDLP placed a greater emphasis on its North/South Ministerial Council work than the practical outworking of it justified.

Dr Farren: That is why I asked Mr Kennedy to point out what he thought was unjustified. That may be an argument or discussion to get into when we deal more with the specifics. I invite anybody, whether on the unionist side of the table or on Mr Ford's side of the table, to point to where improvements can be made or to where matters can be ditched if they are no longer relevant, and let us see what comes out of that discussion.

Finally, we have no difficulty in principle with the east-west arrangements. The fact that east-west relationships under the British-Irish Council took time to get going had as much to do with procedural problems and difficulties in arranging meetings that involved, as well as Administrations from here, those from the Channel Islands, Scotland, the Isle of Man, Wales and the South.

Therefore, there were many logistical difficulties. Of course, people can say that the fact the British-Irish Council took time to get going was motivated by the ill will that certain people seemed to have towards it. I had no difficulty with it, nor did I think that Sinn Féin Ministers had. They went to the British-Irish Council meetings that they were required to attend. If we can improve the Council's workings, make it more effective and help it deliver what is needed in any of its areas of responsibility, that is what we want to see. The same test of its benefits applies to the British-Irish Council as applies to the North/South Ministerial Council.

Mr Kennedy: We would accept that as a welcome statement of intent.

Dr Farren: We seem to be reaching reasonable degrees of agreement.

Mr Kennedy: It is a Wednesday love-in.

Dr Farren: Do not get too excited, Danny.

Mr Kennedy: That is obviously down to being under the chairmanship of Jim Wells.

Ms Ritchie: He is not after peregrine falcons.

Mr McNarry: Remember that this will be in Hansard — you were on about somebody pursuing you and now you are involved in a love-in?

Mr Paisley Jnr: Hansard will be interesting reading.

Dr Farren: At least when the SDLP spoke, there were smiles all around, which is some achievement. I invite my two colleagues to contribute, Mr Chairman, if that is OK.

Ms Ritchie: In his introduction, Alan referred to various issues that he felt that the Ulster Unionists' Assembly party felt should be up for discussion, one of which was the Review of Public Administration. He said that the issue of seven councils, with or without an Assembly, should be up for discussion. We want to tease that out.

From your previous comments we note that, like us, you are not content with seven councils. You mentioned repartition. What do you perceive to be the issues? Is it the configuration? Do you, like us, want a complete review? What is proposed does not reflect political or community homogeneity or linkage. What about the statutory mechanism for power sharing and the resource differential for delivery of functions between different councils? If the model is fully implemented, there will be nine road authorities instead of one: seven councils plus one for standards and performance and another for motorways and trunk roads. We want to tease out what you are thinking. Perhaps there could be a meeting of minds, and we could continue this Wednesday love-in.

Mr McFarland: I do not want to go into detail, because it is an enormous subject and we agreed to leave the detail until later. We have maintained that local government areas should be coterminous with parliamentary and Assembly boundaries so that all the public representatives represent the same area at different levels, whether Westminster, the Assembly or local government. That seems logical as regards co-ordination and delivery of services and in terms of having people to go and point your finger in the chest of and ask to sort things out for you.

We still maintain that that is the most sensible way, but the Government have crashed on with the seven-council model at fast speed. As far as the UUP can see, that model was dictated by the health service model, although that has changed several times since. That did not seem to be the most logical basis on which to support everything.

Until recently, I understood that the only party keen on the seven-council model was Sinn Féin, which is understandable as that model would repartition Northern Ireland. However, it has recently been suggested that the DUP would be happy with seven councils.

The danger with a seven-council model is that there will effectively be super councils in the west of the Province. Currently, Limavady Borough Council, Strabane District Council and Derry City Council team up with Donegal County Council on mutually beneficial cross-border issues, and no one has a problem with that.

Unionists are currently represented on Strabane District Council and Derry City Council; however, under proportional representation, elections to a new super council would dramatically reduce the number of unionist councillors elected, and the new council would definitely be dominated by republicans/nationalists. The same would happen in Fermanagh.

The seven-council model would create three enormous councils in the west. There has been talk of the chief executives being paid £160,000 a year, enormous budgets and a degree of free rein to do cross-border work. That effectively draws a line to the east of the River Bann.

We keep advising our party colleagues in Banbridge or, as I understand it, Droichead na Banna, that they will need to know Irish because that council will be run from Newry.

Mr Kennedy: Hear, hear.

Mr McFarland: This is big stuff, because there will be three large nationalist councils in the west of the Province and three strongly unionist councils in the east.

There is confusion over Belfast, because, as I understand it, the DUP had been assured that Belfast's electoral boundaries would be pushed out to the suburbs, making it a unionist council. There is now talk of messing around with wards, and the chances are that Belfast will become a nationalist council. That would not be good for the Union. In fact, that is probably the biggest threat to the Union since 1922.

The Government are crashing on with this issue on a Sinn Féin agenda, but the rest of us are saying: "Hang on a minute". It is undemocratic; as far as unionists are concerned, it is extremely dodgy and threatening to the Union. It is generally unhealthy for extremely large councils to be able to drive through measures without anybody paying any attention. I suspect that unionist-dominated councils in the east present as much danger to nationalists who live in the east as nationalist-dominated councils do to unionists living in the west.

The UUP likes the model of 15 councils because it ties in with everything else. It is a balance of effectiveness and efficiency and democratic representation.

2.15 pm

Mr Paisley Jnr: Mr Deputy Chairman, on a point of order. I notice Mr McFarland has made another unnecessary attack on the DUP. He made the false allegation that the DUP supports the notion of seven councils.

The record is very clear. First of all, Sam Foster commenced the review of local administration. Throughout the DUP's chairmanship of the Northern Ireland Local Government Association (NILGA), my party's position paper has never endorsed or supported seven councils. There is no evidence whatsoever for the machinations that Mr McFarland has claimed over the Review of Public Administration; about whether Paul Berry is getting reconverted again this summer; and about whether Jeffrey Donaldson is going to be a Minister in November. They are completely erroneous, and his own colleague's hearty laughter at them shows how stupid he really is when he says these things.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr McFarland.

Mr McNarry: That is the love-in over now.
[Laughter.]

Mr Kennedy: It was all going so well.

Ms Ritchie: I have not finished yet.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Have you stopped, Margaret? The RPA is slightly tangential.

Ms Ritchie: I know it is only slightly related, but if I could just tease it out. Are there any other issues? I take it from what you have said that as we do, you would wish to ensure that a restored Executive and Assembly would get rid of the seven-council model and that we should have around fifteen.

Mr McFarland: My understanding is that the Secretary of State has said that if we wish to head off this process of wrecking Northern Ireland and threatening the Union, we have to get ourselves back in Government. That seems to be the position that we are in.

Ms Ritchie: With your indulgence, Chairman, could I ask Mr McFarland what other issues he sees as pertinent to a discussion about the Review of Public Administration?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): As you have cleverly brought it back to relevance, Ms Ritchie, carry on.

Mr McFarland: Again, it is a good idea for the Committee to fully discuss those issues, so they must first be identified. When we began, everyone reserved the right to seek advice if they were going to discuss particular areas in detail. For example, Jim Wilson MLA is our whizzo on the review, and if we were to go into detail on this, I would quite like to have him beside me. He could give you all the detailed answers that I simply do not have.

Dr Farren: A wand.

Ms Ritchie: Given that, I cannot pursue the RPA issue, but my colleague Dr Farren is pursuing the North/South issue with Mr Kennedy, and I would like to ask a question on that.

You talked about North/South co-operation and matters that would bring benefit on a North/South basis. You also said that the Ulster Unionist Party was largely content with the remit of the current bodies. Would you also consider a future body to deal with transport, which would bring economic benefit to the people in the North as well as to the people in the South?

Mr Kennedy: It would probably be a mistake to start negotiating on these terms.

However, you have accepted our point that, in principle, where it is mutually beneficial, we will consider it. We considered the existing arrangements. We remain to be convinced that they — certainly, the powers that have been vested in them — should be amplified significantly. Of course, we remain to be persuaded on many of these matters. However, our first take on it would be that a significant increase is some way off.

Ms Ritchie: I am sure that Mr Kennedy will accept that one of the best examples of cross-border co-operation on transport is geographically adjacent to his constituency. The work on the road between Newry and Dundalk, which is managed by the Roads Service in the North, is a good example of co-operation. Therefore, when a project such as that is in existence, why not pursue other projects on a joint basis under the auspices of a body?

Mr Kennedy: I am keen that the road infrastructure in Northern Ireland be significantly improved, particularly in the area that I have the honour to represent. Therefore, I will reserve judgment on whether we can extend that co-operation to other jurisdictions.

Ms Ritchie: Some areas for useful discussion have been identified.

Mr Dallat: This subject was referred to earlier. Which was more important, bringing the UVF in from the cold or getting an extra seat for the UUP?

Mr McFarland: The project to bring loyalist paramilitarism to an end has been a priority of ours since Sir Reg Empey took over as party leader. We have been engaged on it for most of the year and before the issue arose of any tactical moves to regain a position for unionism in the Assembly. However, an opportunity arose, and, as politicians and a political grouping, we took it.

Mr Dallat: Although we are not here to look back at history, perhaps it is worth recalling that the first policeman to lose his life in the North was Constable Arbuckle, who was shot by the UVF in 1966. Indeed, to be fair, one of the last policemen to lose his life was Michael Ferguson, a Roman Catholic who was murdered by republicans in Shipquay Street in Derry. It does, therefore, come from both sides.

The UUP in Belfast, as I understand it, has boycotted —

Mr Kennedy: It is important for historical accuracy to record that Victor Arbuckle was murdered in 1969, not 1966.

Mr Dallat: It is recorded in ‘Lost Lives’.

Mr Kennedy: Hopefully, we can all agree that the important matter is that no one wants to see the life of any member of the security forces either compromised or taken. As a political party, we are prepared to do anything that we can to assist with the ending of paramilitary organisations, even though it appears that we will be criticised by parties such as the SDLP, which has previous experience in such matters.

Mr Dallat: You are most helpful, and you have led me to my second question.

Mr Kennedy: Thank you.

Mr Dallat: I understand that the UUP is boycotting the Belfast District Policing Partnership. Is that a positive contribution to supporting the police?

Mr Kennedy: I am not sure that the term “boycott” is an accurate description.

Mr Dallat: Abstaining?

Mr Kennedy: I am not sure that either boycotting or —

Mr Dallat: Absent without leave?

Mr Kennedy: It does not matter. The attitudes of the parties gathered round this table to the district policing partnerships and to the Northern Ireland Policing Board are not particularly relevant to the work of the Committee.

Mr Dallat: Would you agree that, in the absence of political progress and the existence of a political vacuum, the police are vulnerable? In fact, I know of nowhere in the world where a police service can be progressive and advanced if there are no political institutions to support it. That is why I asked the question. In your paper, you say that the DUP and Sinn Féin must do the deal.

Do you agree that as a political party you have a huge responsibility to do everything?

Mr McFarland: I just covered that in some detail. I have covered the issue of the DUP and Sinn Féin several times, in terms of that phraseology. It is better if we all acknowledge that there is a political reality and that, at the moment, the Government are operating on the basis that those are the two key parties whose agreement is essential — according to the Government.

We have always supported policing. However, there are individual issues that individuals have with regard to the Belfast DPP, and we have an issue with the Policing Board. I have spent the last four years on the Policing Board, leaving in April. A deal was done with David Trimble, Rev Ian Paisley and the then Secretary of State as to how the Policing Board would operate. It was in keeping with the Patten Report, which was quite clear that there should be 10 politicians and nine independents so that there would always be a political authority for the Policing Board.

Unilaterally, however, the Secretary of State has turned the board on its head and introduced 11 independents and eight politicians. That is a quango. We disagreed then and we disagree now because that is a fundamental breach of the understanding of how the Policing Board was to operate, and it has been done in order to keep two seats warm for Sinn Féin. That is no way to interfere with what was — I would argue — an extremely successful board. Ian Paisley Jnr and I both sat on it. It worked well. It was one of the few institutions that was still working all the way through. The Secretary of State has unilaterally interfered with the basic premise of it.

We had agreement with the DUP up until about two days before that. Both our parties were unhappy with that, and, for some reason best known to itself, the DUP suddenly did a somersault and joined the board, seemingly forgetting its principled objections.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Once again, Alan likes to characterise things with his ‘Folks on the Hill’ attitude. Of course, the reality is much different. I was actually part of the negotiations on the deal between our party, the Ulster Unionist Party then, and the Secretary of State.

Mr McFarland: So was I, Ian.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Well, you were not at the meeting at which I was present in Westminster. The characterisation that you are giving to that is not accurate. Indeed, the characterisation was for the term of that board, and that term expired almost two years before the new arrangement was made.

However, I agree that the Secretary of State was wrong to change the appointments around, but we are not responsible. No parties here are responsible for the appointments that he makes to a body, but I tell you this: it seems incredible — and Mr Dallat has put his finger on it to some degree — that the Ulster Unionist Party would publicly oppose the appointment of a member of the PUP to the Policing Board, yet would welcome with open arms a member of the PUP into its Assembly group. That is what appears incredible and inconsistent, as far as I am concerned. That leads to a very inconsistent approach to the Policing Board, whereby some days the Ulster Unionist members are at meetings, but other days they are not. That confusion needs to be better explained.

Mr Kennedy: It is also somewhat hypocritical of those parties — including the DUP — that are super-critical of the Ulster Unionist Party’s decision in respect of the UUPAG, given their deafening silence at the time of the PUP chairperson’s appointment to the Policing Board. Nothing was said then.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Once again, a point of clarification; if you read the Hansard of the House of Commons, you will see that the deputy leader of the DUP, Peter Robinson, made a statement on the day of the appointment. I know that the Ulster Unionist Party is not that well represented in the House of Commons, so its Members may not have heard that, but the rest of the public heard it loud and clear. Hansard states that, and there is no better place.

Mr Kennedy: I am not sure that the general public were aware of that, but it is heartening to hear it.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Please be brief, Mr McNarry, because we are drifting from scoping impediments to devolution.

Mr McNarry: You have not heard what I am going to say, so how do you know that I will drift?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I hope that you will come back to the subject as quickly as possible.

Mr McNarry: You seem to want to pick on me. Every time you sit there, you say that I have five minutes or that I am drifting.

For the record, David Trimble and Rev Ian Paisley joined Ian Paisley Jnr at the negotiations. However, David Trimble was never under the impression that Rev Ian Paisley was agreeing to the formation of anything other than a Policing Board that would have a unionist majority. For Ian Paisley Jnr to suggest that there would only be a unionist majority for 12 months or one term seems quite disingenuous. The record will show that Ian Paisley Jnr said that his father agreed to the setting up of a Policing Board with a unionist majority for one term only.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Once again, it would be helpful if the Member read the report of this meeting. I never mentioned the formation or the numbers on the board; it was the agreement on how it would be split, and the current board, even with the way in which the Secretary of State has fiddled with it, still has a unionist majority. That is guaranteed in legislation, but that is not the issue. The issue is whether the 10 members or the majority of members should be drawn from the political parties represented here.

2.30 pm

Mr McFarland: That is what the legislation states: 10 politicians under d’Hondt and nine independent members.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I think you will find that the legislation does not state that. That is the problem, and that was the problem with the Police (NI) Act 2000. That was another reason the DUP voted against the Bill when it was going through the House of Commons, and that was why the Ulster Unionist Party voted for it. Such actions have consequences. The agreement has been a failure, because people did not read the words properly and assumed things. Then when they work things out in time, they run away from the fact that they endorsed the Police (NI) Act 2000 and the Belfast Agreement which led to all the problems downstream.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I will return to Mr Dallat. Those are all legitimate points, but we need to come back to the impediments to restoration of devolution.

Mr Dallat: It is wonderful what effect a bit of stimulating questioning can have. A few minutes ago, Mr Paisley Jnr was reading a newspaper and now he is firing on all cylinders.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Some of us can multitask.

Mr Dallat: I do not see the whole concept of partnership mentioned in the UUP submission, but no doubt it is fundamental to it. I go back to those television pictures that were shown around the world of John Hume shaking hands with David Trimble and motivating the tens of thousands of people to come out and endorse the agreement. What plans do you have to re-engage with those people who have not exercised their franchise since?

You spoke about fear in the community. Do you agree that maximum engagement between the two communities, in partnership with every element, is absolutely essential?

Mr Kennedy: Yes. The UUP faces the same issues as the SDLP in trying to enthuse more people to support our view on matters. We are working hard to achieve that, and I assume that you are trying to do the same.

Mr Dallat: That is a very happy note for me to end on.

Mr Kennedy: Deliriously happy.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr O'Dowd has said that he wishes to speak. Unless anyone else wishes to speak, that will be the end of questions to the Ulster Unionist Party.

Mr Kennedy: Sinn Féin has not had its turn yet.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Sorry. Mr O'Dowd will speak first on behalf of Sinn Féin.

Mr McNarry: You should be reprimanded for that. You should be paying attention to what is going on. [Laughter.]

Mr Kennedy: Did Francie not tell you that?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I will be taken off your Christmas card list.

Mr O'Dowd: While we are putting things on the record, it is worth saying that Sinn Féin finds it interesting that both unionist parties are sitting in Westminster with the Secretary of State divvying up the Policing Board. If that is the way that things are operating at the moment, it certainly does not build our confidence in a new beginning to policing.

Mr Kennedy: Do not criticise the Policing Board too much, because Sinn Féin has to join it at some stage. [Laughter.]

Mr O'Dowd: If you had listened to my comments, I was criticising the private negotiations at Westminster.

Mr Paisley Jnr: In the real world.

Mr O'Dowd: Between the many questions today and the answers to them, a lot of points that Sinn Féin wished to raise have been either answered or clarified. So I will not go back over old ground just to lengthen Hansard or to be in a position to state to the press that Sinn Féin asked 24 questions and someone else asked 23. However, I seek clarification on some points and have questions that I want to put to the Ulster Unionist grouping.

During Sinn Féin's presentation the other day, the first question that the UUP asked was on IRA decommissioning. As a republican representative, whose party is trying to gain a better understanding of what is going on within unionism, I fail to grasp the major concern that we are told exists within unionism around IRA weaponry. I put it to you the other day that since the suspension of this institution, loyalists have murdered 26 members of the Protestant community.

Why is the unionist political leadership still bringing up the issue of IRA arms? You stated here today that if that leadership tells its people that everything is failing and that we are going down the long slippery road, people will feel that way. Do you not feel that you continue to raise that issue and that you are creating that concern, rather than the concern coming from the bottom up?

Mr McFarland: The weapons issue is a question of confidence and trust in the intentions of others. If violence were no longer being offered, why would you need weapons?

Going back to 1998, at the time of the Good Friday Agreement, the UUP was very unhappy about the weapons issue and about the release of prisoners. The UUP's view was that those two issues should have been linked, so that as the guns came in, the prisoners got out. That seemed logical. We were uncomfortable about people being released, but prisoners were released in 1962 after the 1956-1962 IRA campaign. There is a long history in Northern Ireland of releasing prisoners, but we were so unhappy at the way it was happening that we were not going to do the deal.

Do not forget that, as I mentioned earlier, the UUP had never actually negotiated with Sinn Féin. We had spoken to the Government, the Government had spoken to you and had then come back to us. We relied on what they told us: that you were serious and that decommissioning was an issue that would be in the agreement and be finished by May 2000. We were sceptical about all that, but we were being reassured that that was what you were saying and that you were genuine. We did not trust that. Eventually, the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom sent us a side letter assuring us that decommissioning would start in June 1998 and be finished by May 2000. On the basis of that letter, rightly or wrongly — and one has to make judgements at the time — we signed up to the agreement.

It became clear fairly quickly that your team had no intention of decommissioning. Back-room briefings given to the boys in Newry, telling them not to worry, were leaked to the press. Martin Ferris and Pat Doherty went to America where a journalist got into the middle of their briefing, and it was played back that the republican movement had no intention of decommissioning. That was a big problem, because on the one hand we were being assured that you were serious and genuine and that decommissioning would happen, and on the other hand your people were telling your grass roots not to worry because it was not going to happen.

Decommissioning became an issue that it should not have become, had it been done properly. Then the IRA issued a statement saying that yes, absolutely, it was going to decommission and not only that, but it would be done in such a way as to maximise public confidence. We thought that that was great; that finally it would be done, that there would be no doubt that you had done it, and that you were genuine after all. Then it did not happen, and there was confusion. Despite the fact that the first lot of decommissioning took place, events in Florida followed.

There was clear evidence that members of the IRA were in Florida, importing weapons into Northern Ireland and the Republic. The question then was: why would anyone want to import fresh weapons? That sort of thing has dogged us.

I accept the IICD's determination that the bulk of the IRA's weapons had been decommissioned. However, as I said this morning, the IMC is saying that weapons are being held back. The Committee heard me say this morning that they could be trophy weapons; they could be in undiscovered hides; and they could be protection weapons for people still involved in crime.

Although not agreeing with it, one can understand to a degree why those people might wish to do that against instructions from the republican hierarchy. The hard part is that we cannot yet judge whether a massive amount — an entire brigade's worth of weapons — has been held back. We are relying on the IMC and other intelligence to tell us that.

When we were posing questions to Sinn Féin, I asked whether your party understood that as long as this confusion arises as to whether weapons have or have not been held back, it will add to the mistrust that we thought we had got away from with the IICD report.

My advice was that we should not get hung up on this in the way we did before. However, it is a genuine issue, because the logical question remains: if people are not offering violence, why would they want to have a stash of guns?

Mr O'Dowd: Conor Murphy spoke at length about our position on the IMC's statement alleging that IRA weapons were still out there. You mentioned the Good Friday Agreement and the terms under which decommissioning would take place. Seán Farren has a copy in front of him, but I will paraphrase: it is the responsibility of all political parties to ensure that decommissioning takes place. Now you are telling us that your relationship — or however you want to phrase it — with the PUP is about bringing loyalist violence to an end, and you now accept that it is not easy to turn people away from the notion that using weapons is the only way forward.

If politics was not seen to work, it was always going to be a difficult task, given the time frame that you set in front of us. Would you agree with that?

Mr McFarland: I do: that is why we stuck with you. It would have been in the interest of the Ulster Unionist Party to simply abandon it and go back to our trench at the first whiff of Sinn Féin not playing the game over decommissioning. It was not in our party's interest to keep wandering in and out of government with Sinn Féin to try to see if we could make all this work. As you well know, we have suffered as a consequence, but it was the best thing to do, and history will show that.

Only those who have direct links to the folks with the guns can influence them. I cannot go to the IRA and say: "As a unionist I think it's a jolly good idea if you hand your guns in." The only people who can do that — and I understand that it is a difficult job — are yourselves, because you are the ones with the link to the IRA.

In the same way, the PUP can influence the UVF in particular. We are trying to reinforce the message that the PUP is giving them: that the republicans are shuffling off the stage, and it is time for them to go too. There were attempts to remove them before, and for one reason or another they felt that they could stay. However, we are making it clear this time that we strongly believe — and I am sure the DUP is no different — that the loyalist paramilitaries should now pack up and go leg it, go home and get back to a normal life. It is no longer acceptable to have armed groups out there.

2.45 pm

Mr O'Dowd: You say that Sinn Féin is required to support policing in any new Administration, although I do not think that you are using that as a block to Sinn Féin's entering a restored Executive. Do you understand the difficulty in building nationalist confidence in a policing service or in convincing nationalists that there has been a new beginning in policing when, almost weekly, we hear revelations that sections of the PSNI are using and protecting prominent loyalist killers? How do you see republicans moving forward on policing against the background of such revelations?

Mr McFarland: We need to differentiate between what happened in the past and what is happening in the PSNI now. Two years ago, Hugh Orde carried out a complete review of human intelligence sources and of who was working for them. It is clear that, over the past 30 years, practices had arisen that would not survive long in a new Police Service. I suspect that such practices arose in reaction to the terrorism that was going on at the time. Some people obviously felt that those practices were acceptable for the greater good and to stop people getting killed.

If police officers have broken the law, they should go before the courts. However, policing has definitely changed. I have sat for four years on the Policing Board and have been involved in overseeing it. It has been a slow process, and we had clashes with those who were not happy with the speed at which the board wanted to move. By and large, however, most of the key elements in the Patten Report have been put in place.

However, republicans have a problem: if they bring people onto the streets in fraught circumstances — to protest against parades, for example — and those people break the law by rioting, they will come into conflict with the police. That happens in any society. If those who are parading in central London, say, start to trash the shops, the police will try to stop them. There is an onus on those who bring people onto the streets: they know that they could be creating conflict with the police.

I asked Conor about “turning the tanker”. It will be difficult for republicans to embrace policing because, until recently, their attitude has been one of “RUC secuocrats colluding with loyalist death squads” — all the usual stuff. Having told a young republican from Crossmaglen that the RUC is a dirty, filthy organisation, Sinn Féin would then have to tell him to join it, and that the party is joining the Policing Board. I do not know how you will achieve that.

If we are to have a normal society and a normal Government here, policing will have to be resolved. You and Conor have assured me that republicans can achieve that through initiatives led by the leadership of the party, and that you will hold an Ard-Fheis when the circumstances are right. However, we wait to see how successful such initiatives will be in getting young republicans to join the police and whether republicans embrace policing reluctantly or wholeheartedly. In order to have a normal society and a normal Government, republicans will have to embrace policing.

Mr O'Dowd: We would need a normal police force for a normal society and a normal Government. In fairness, Alan, you did not answer my question about the continued use by sections of the PSNI of well-known loyalist killers. I am not talking about when that happened under Ronnie Flanagan or Jack Hermon.

I am talking about what happened under Hugh Orde and about what happens under the present Policing Board. There is no record of the Policing Board holding that section of policing to account, and no police officer has appeared before a court under any of those arrangements.

Mr Kennedy: We seriously contest and reject those allegations as unfair and untrue. We do not see the linkage that you have made between loyalist death squads and PSNI or RUC officers. We have significant difficulty with that.

Mr O'Dowd: It is not just republicans who say that. Members of your own community who have lost loved ones over the last period are coming forward and stating that the killers of their loved ones are being protected by sections of the PSNI.

Mr Kennedy: Many of those comments are unproven and are for other places.

Mr McFarland: There are issues to be dealt with. As we understand it, the Police Ombudsman has forwarded to the Director of Public Prosecutions (DPP) allegations that individual Special Branch officers went beyond their remit in dealing with informers. No doubt, that will reach the courts, and if it does not, I have no doubt that the Police Ombudsman's office will publish that report, and people can make their judgement at that stage.

It is wrong to suggest that there has not been enormous progress in normalisation and getting a proper police service for Northern Ireland. That is well under way. Clearly, there will be all sorts of residual issues such as those that we discussed concerning the Historical Enquiries Team (HET) when you were being questioned. It could be that evidence turns up against senior republicans to show that they have been involved in all sorts of crimes. Would it be right, at that stage, to castigate the present Sinn Féin party for what went on previously?

It is right to castigate individual party members, if they are found to have committed crimes. If there are new members of Sinn Féin who were never involved in the troubles, is it right that they should be tarred with the same brush as those who were combatants? A substantial part of the PSNI is composed of brand new, enthusiastic young men and women from right across the community who believe that it is important to put their weight behind modern policing. That is what is happening.

Ms Gildernew: I do not feel that John's point about a normal society, normal Government and normal policing was adequately addressed. We have heard ad nauseum from William McCrea, among others, about how this Committee exists to scope and identify issues that are problematic to our restoring the Executive. This is a huge issue for republicans. Alan, you pointed out that there may be new, fresh, enthusiastic young people joining the PSNI. The old guard of the RUC is still there and still operating very much under the ethos of the RUC.

A number of months ago, during a search in Dungannon of a republican's home, a seven-year-old boy was threatened by a PSNI officer. At that time, we complained about that behaviour. That search and raid was conducted very much in the way that the RUC conducted searches and raids in many people's homes across the North.

You have said quite confidently that if people are found to have been colluding with loyalists — and there is plenty of evidence to that effect — they will be brought before the courts. We are not convinced. The fact is that the Special Branch is still allowed to run amok and do whatever kind of intelligence gathering or other work that it wishes. In my discussions with republicans about policing, that is the single issue that is most likely to be a deal breaker. The Policing Board cannot control those within the Special Branch and the PSNI. I do not think that Hugh Orde can control them either, to be honest.

There are difficulties about people who are still engaged in policing with a very militaristic agenda against republicans in the Six Counties.

Mr McFarland: We on the Policing Board receive regular briefings on what has happened in policing. We have been party to ensuring that changes take place, and they have taken place. I do not know whether your party receives briefings in detail on what is happening on policing, because sometimes it is hard to see these things unless you are fully up to speed with all that has happened over the past four years.

There are very many checks and balances, right from the moment when someone is to be recruited as an agent. I do not know whether you accept that that is necessary.

For example, suppose there were a non-paramilitary gang that is tiger kidnapping, and you discover that somehow you can recruit the wife of one of the key members of that gang who will provide information on the threat posed by that gang to individuals, such as why a particular person will be kidnapped. Do you accept that it is necessary to obtain information and agents to deal with crime? If there is no acceptance of the need to obtain information — be it electronic or human intelligence — we will have a bit of a problem in society with policing. All societies right across the world have such measures.

If you accept that it is necessary to recruit agents, it raises the whole issue of whether you should be recruiting agents for your organisation. However, if your organisation is doing nothing, there is not much need to worry about agents.

There is a threat from the Real IRA, and there is a threat from the Continuity IRA. I saw in a paper last week that a new group has just been set up that was pictured standing over a grave with masks and weapons, etc. There is an ongoing threat from loyalists and republican paramilitaries, although perhaps not mainstream Provisionals.

There is a need to maintain access to information, from human or electronic sources. However, the checks and balances in this area now are just unbelievable. There are entire commissions that have to look at all of those matters before one is allowed to recruit someone. There is a complaints mechanism if a surveillance operation goes wrong. Obviously, the Police Ombudsman will deal with the case that Ms Gildernew mentioned. If a policeman has been rude to someone during a house search —

Ms Gildernew: He was not rude; he threatened a child.

Mr McFarland: That is even worse. Presumably that matter is with the Ombudsman, who will investigate it with all of her resources — and she has zillions of pounds worth of resources, both in manpower and money. If an officer is found to have threatened someone, he or she should go before the courts, because you cannot have a Police Service that contains people who are going around and threatening people. That is just daft — if it is taking place.

My point is that we now have checks, balances and mechanisms, which I agree were not there before. Therefore, we can have an improved and increased degree of confidence that people are trying to produce a genuine Police Service for all of us.

Ms Gildernew: My point is that there are, continue to be, and probably still will be, people who are outside of those checks and balances and who will be able to carry on their shady dealings without any kind of accountability to Hugh Orde, to the Policing Board, or to anyone.

Mr McFarland: They cannot.

Ms Gildernew: I disagree.

Dr Farren: I have a very quick intervention, which may be helpful at this stage. Michelle raises a very real issue. However, suppose Sinn Féin were on the Policing Board, and that kind of behaviour continued. What are Michelle and her colleagues going to do about that?

Ms Gildernew: That is my point. They are outside of accountability.

Mr O'Dowd: Can I answer that question? There are mechanisms within the power of Policing Board, outside those of the Police Ombudsman, to investigate procedures. The Policing Board has never used those powers.

Mr McFarland: The reason that the board has never used those powers is that we have a good relationship — I think that it is fair to say — with the PSNI's top team. There have been one or two occasions when we have had to get robust with them, but normally if you ask them for information, they will come and give you a briefing — albeit confidential — on the matter.

There are checks and balances all the way through the system. If there is information to the effect that police officers are not acting properly, all those who can investigate that should be alerted. Investigation systems exist at the moment.

3.00 pm

Dr Farren: If Michelle and her colleagues were on the board, insisting that such behaviour was reported and investigated, they would be in a much better position to see whether the mechanisms were being used. You are making that point and are building up the case as to why Sinn Féin should be on the board, using the available mechanisms.

Mr O'Dowd: If that is the case, Michelle and I are prepared to answer questions from everyone around the table. I thought that we were asking the UUP questions. In this Committee, we are scoping issues of concern about preparation for Government. I have said to my unionist colleagues that I am trying to understand the concerns of the unionist community. There are also concerns in the nationalist and republican community about issues such as policing. I have outlined those concerns.

Mr McFarland: Do you get briefings on policing?

Mr O'Dowd: Our party regularly debates the issue of policing — the day-to-day issues, reports from commissioners, and so forth. Are you asking me whether my party is briefed on the four years of change?

Mr McFarland: Do you engage with the police? You say that you do not engage, and perhaps this is not the right forum to discuss that issue, given that any response will be recorded by Hansard. Logically, Sinn Féin would be better placed to discuss policing — and, indeed, to take up Ian's earlier offer to discuss and negotiate policing with all of us — if it were as up to speed on the intricacies of the progress that has been made in policing as the other parties are. The other parties sit on the Policing Board and have an intimate knowledge of what has happened. When Sinn Féin discusses policing and policing mechanisms, it is at a disadvantage if it does not have the same level of first-hand information.

Ms Gildernew: As the UUP and the DUP have pointed out, the SDLP is also at a disadvantage because the UUP and the DUP had meetings with the British Secretary of State to discuss the make-up of the Policing Board, and the SDLP was excluded from those meetings.

Mr Paisley Jnr: The SDLP was there as well.

Mr McFarland: The SDLP was in on this the whole time. Alex Attwood has never been left out of anything yet. The SDLP was in before us.

Dr Farren: We had it all sewn up. They were left with the pickings.

Mr O'Dowd: I can assure Alan that Sinn Féin is kept up to date, except for the details of the secret meetings at Westminster. I am glad that you let us in on that.

Does the Chairman want to break for tea and coffee? We have only a couple of further questions.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We seem to be coming to the end of this discussion. We can get into the meat of the agenda later.

Mr O'Dowd: I have a couple of further questions.

Mr Kennedy: If there are only a couple of questions, it might be useful to take them.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Some of the questions have lasted a long time.

Mr O'Dowd: These questions might not last as long, given that David has left the meeting.

Events on the street — Alan has referred to them already — can affect the wider political process. What is the UUP doing on the ground to ensure that we have a quiet summer? I know that UUP representatives will be present at parades and interfaces, but how we can prepare collectively for a quiet summer?

Mr Kennedy: In certain areas, Ulster Unionist Party members have made representations to the PSNI, to the Parades Commission, to authorised officers and to contacts in the Loyal Orders in an effort to ensure that the summer is as peaceful as possible. The issue has been well considered. In the unionist community, a strong sense of cultural identity is attached to parades, which is often missed, or deliberately overlooked, by many nationalists and republicans.

Therefore, the onus is on everyone to do whatever they can to ensure that there is no public disorder or violence on the streets while lawfully constituted parades process.

Mr O'Dowd: My next question could wait until after the break, when we talk about our discussions so far.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is correct. That is the subject matter for discussion after the break. The Committee will suspend for 10 minutes.

The Committee was suspended at 3.06 pm.

On resuming —

3.18 pm

(The Chairman (Mr Wells) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I remind members to switch off their mobile phones. Is Mr McFarland expected to return?

Mr Kennedy: He is.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is there any indication as to how long he will be?

Mr Kennedy: I am not a prophet, nor the son of a prophet.

Mr Hay: You are very like a prophet, though.

Mr Kennedy: Thank you very much.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We are moving on to some quite important business.

Mr McNarry: He will be here in five minutes, Chairman.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The difficulty is that the time is up.

Mr Kennedy: Mr McFarland would not expect you to wait for him.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Let us hope that he will arrive; Mr Dallat also appears to be missing.

Dr Farren: He is not under the table.

Mr Kennedy: Missing, presumed missing.

Ms Ritchie: Chairman, Mr Dallat went upstairs but his bag is still here, so we can presume that he coming back.

Mr Ford: That is an excuse. He has escaped.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): A couple of new faces have arrived. For the record, Mr McCarthy is here in place of Mrs Long, and Mr Hay has replaced Mr Paisley Jnr.

Ms Gildernew: I am leaving shortly, and Alex Maskey will be joining the meeting.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We have concluded what everyone will accept has been an intensive examination of the various presentations to the Committee. I thank everyone for being so patient during a long and detailed series of sessions.

We will move to what is an important part of today's meeting. We must decide how the Committee's work will be taken forward. Members will know that the two Prime Ministers are visiting Parliament Buildings tomorrow, and this floor will be taken over as a result. If the Committee decides to meet, special provision can be made to access this room, if needs be. We can decide whether to meet later.

The Committee has a number of decisions to make. Should we present a paper on the Committee's work thus far to the Secretary of State, for consideration by the two Prime Ministers? That is entirely a matter for the Committee and, once again, I emphasise that any decision must be made by consensus. No decision means that we do nothing. What are members' thoughts on that important issue?

Mr Kennedy: There are a number of scenarios. Now that the parties have presented their positions, it might be important to think about how to bring that to the attention of the Assembly. It would be useful to involve the wider Assembly, perhaps through a take-note debate of the minutes and Hansard records of the large number of Committee meetings. We could consider what we could recommend to the Business Committee, which, in turn, would make recommendations to the Secretary of State, through whatever convoluted methodology is necessary to do that. It would be good for the Assembly to put on record and acknowledge the important work of this Committee.

Dr Farren: It will be very difficult to encapsulate simply what has transpired over this series of meetings in which we have questioned each other. The Hansard report will be distributed to all our colleagues in the Assembly. However, I am not sure whether that would form the basis for a take-note debate. That is not to say that the contents of the Hansard report would not be drawn upon in any debate about how we should move forward. As I said in my questions to the UUP, the two Governments are likely to want the Committee to build on the work that it has initiated. They will not want the Committee to continue in the vein of the past few days, but to build on its work in a much more focused way.

The Committee staff have been helpful in trying to identify each party's key points from their initial presentations. Further distillation to find general headings will still be necessary if we are to provide a meaningful handle on the business that has come out of our discussions, which have covered issues that are immediately very important to issues that are important, but of less immediacy.

I have always felt that that is the distinction that we need to make. We need to consider what precise issues fall within the first and second general headings. There may be a need for further subcategories within the broad headings that I suggested.

If we decide that providing information to the Assembly is at least one of the ways through which progress might be made, perhaps we could link some of the debate to what the two Governments say tomorrow. That will mean that we will have to wait to hear what they have to say. We will have engaged with them and we will have had the opportunity to influence their thinking and to enlighten them as to what we think must be addressed.

The question of how we take things forward has been the basis of the stand-off in the Committee, with some parties saying that the Assembly exclusively had to be either the way forward or the channel or conduit from which progress would be made through the establishment of working parties, and others saying that this Committee had to create — or be itself — the forum in which more intense discussion on specific issues would be taken forward.

We have got to get round that, and it would be regrettable if any party were to exclude itself from the process, which has been the attitude to the Assembly adopted by Sinn Féin. It has excluded itself from the means through which we could go forward. Perhaps I am wrong, but my understanding is that Sinn Féin is not totally opposed to participating in the Assembly. It would participate if there were a clear restoration focus to its business. Therefore, it may be that we could move in that direction if we suggested business with that focus.

I am sorry for being roundabout in my comments, but it is not easy to be crystal clear and precise about the kind of business that we would — if we agree that we should — hand over to the Assembly. I am not sure how precise we can be at this stage.

Mr O'Dowd: It was agreed this morning that all MLAs would receive copies of the Hansard reports. In deciding whether to hand business to the Assembly, the question is what business — other than those reports — would we hand over? The Committee was set up to scope the issues that it would be necessary to resolve or to examine to prepare for Government. Although there have been lengthy question-and-answer sessions, there has not been a serious engagement from the DUP on that matter. That is a disappointment, because this venue could have been useful in the last number of weeks to resolve issues of concern to all parties.

At this stage, therefore, we see no point in bringing a take-note debate to the Assembly. We are not opposed to bringing forward substantial work from this Committee for debate if it concerns the restoration of the Executive. As I have said on a number of occasions, that work has not been completed. Therefore, although we are at the eleventh hour, and the Taoiseach and the Prime Minister will arrive tomorrow, there is no point in reporting progress for the sake of reporting progress.

3.30 pm

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Perhaps it would be worth hearing from each of the parties. We have to reach some form of consensus. Remember, there are two issues: what we do for tomorrow and what we do after tomorrow. Therefore, perhaps we should address the urgency of the situation because if we are going to do something, staff need a clear indication of our intentions.

Mr Ford: I see little prospect of us producing anything to put to the two Governments tomorrow, unless it is the draft working document in our papers for today's meeting, which has been prepared by the staff. However, that simply highlights the issues that have been raised individually, which does not indicate much progress, as Mr O'Dowd has just said.

In that context, I am not sure that there is anything that we can meaningfully do for tomorrow. No doubt each of the parties will individually make clear to the two Governments its position and what it believes to be the benefits — or lack of benefits — in the way that this Committee has worked.

If John O'Dowd is saying no to a take-note debate — and a couple of weeks ago there was four-party agreement around this table that we should consider something like that — then how much progress does Sinn Féin require before we can have what it determines to be a meaningful debate?

Mr O'Dowd: Sorry, Mr Chairman, did Mr Ford say four-party or full-party agreement?

Mr Ford: I said four.

Mr O'Dowd: At this stage, we would not be opposed to some progress, but we are not going to debate no progress. Our view of this Committee was that it would be a substantial Committee made up of delegations of senior members from each party, and that we were to scope the issues. We have not done that. We have expanded on a debate that could have taken place in any TV or radio studio across this island. That is what we have been engaged in for the last week.

Ideally, we believe that this Committee should have been broken down into subcommittees to examine in detail the areas of concern. For example, we could have done a fortnight's work on policing and justice, an issue about which there have been a number of questions back and forth. We could have debated and discussed at length the peace dividend, and prepared a report that could have been debated on the Assembly Floor. Those are only two examples of work that we could have done and have not done.

Mr McFarland: It is encouraging that for three weeks all the key parties have sat around the table having some sort of engagement. It is imperfect; we have had rows back and forth and up and down, but by and large I view this as some sort of progress — albeit minuscule.

We agreed originally that we would hear the parties' submissions, and we have just completed that. This is a very imperfect document; it was our first best guess when we started. We now have several days' worth of detailed submissions on the parties' views. We are clearly not going to get them in any form by tomorrow. Tomorrow is the day for the parties to meet with the Prime Ministers and have a blether about things generally. We need now to ask the team to put together some form of document — not necessarily in matrix form, but perhaps with headings and notes of which parties subscribe to which issues, or which issues have been raised, because there are a number of common issues throughout the submissions.

We are only just getting the Hansard reports of our meetings. I have not had a chance to read any of them yet. We will get another report of today's meeting — which I may not wish to read. Committee members need time to examine what everybody has said and what the themes are, and then meet again with a clearer picture. Further questions may even be raised because of issues that were not picked up on at the time. We have produced an important body of work.

I have had a quick read of the newspapers, and people are rubbishing the Committee and having a go at the DUP for producing Taliban. We have been hard at it here, and there is much to take in from all the parties who had various opinions on the UUP's submission. Therefore, we need some time to reflect. I do not know what the timescale for producing a report should be and how much of an effort we need to ask the Committee staff to put into it. However, members could do with some time to read Hansard and discuss matters with their party colleagues. Perhaps we could regroup early next week. I understand that the Assembly will run into next week.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Assembly technically will, but whether there will be a plenary is a different matter.

Mr McFarland: Yes, but we have not broken up for the summer, so we could meet next week after we have all had a chance to reflect on the ins and outs of the past five days, because there is a lot of information to take in.

Mrs D Dodds: First, many around the table have reiterated the point that serious work must be done. However, that has not been helped by certain parties referring to members of delegations in derogatory terms, such as referring to them as members of the Taliban or as Talibanesque figures. It is up to individual parties to decide whom they choose to represent them at this Committee. I assure everyone that the DUP representatives are here with full authority, and they have been appointed by the party leader to do a specific job.

Secondly, I have heard much from Committee members about the progress that has been made. The DUP has faithfully attended every meeting and engaged in this process in every way that has been expected of it. As Mr Ford said at the meeting of 16 June, there was a general agreement that, at some stage, it would be useful to engage all 108 Assembly Members in the work of this Committee and in some sort of take-note debate, along the lines of the House of Commons take-note debates when a Committee produces headings of its work, which it then puts forward to the House for general debate and discussion. It would be helpful if we tried to proceed along those lines, since this is not a process that is exclusively for a small group, but one that involves a wider audience in the Assembly.

There is a short timescale for the Committee to prepare anything for tomorrow. I strongly suspect that the parties have their agendas drawn up for tomorrow, and things should probably be left like that, unless we want to ask the Secretary of State and the Prime Ministers to take note of the work that the Committee has done over the past few weeks. That may be a reasonable suggestion. Alan talked about needing time to examine the documents, and there is some truth in that. However, we are also up against a tight deadline, in that the Secretary of State has said that work can continue on the week beginning 3 July. The Assembly would go into recess at the end of that week.

If the Committee agrees, it would be useful and informative to have a debate along those lines in the Assembly Chamber next week, and we may want to prepare headings for that. Hansard may be too wide a publication for that debate, but I am easy on that too. However, our deadline is some time next week.

Dr Farren: From what I have heard, all parties accept the value of some kind of debate in the Assembly. The trick is to find a route to finding a formulation for such a debate that enables all parties to participate.

It may be useful for one representative from each party to meet, possibly after tomorrow's meeting with the Prime Ministers. If we still agree that we should try to reach an agreed basis for an Assembly debate, we could possibly meet on Friday morning — I am thinking of the time required after tomorrow's meeting to prepare for a debate, if one is to take place next week.

Representatives could come back to the Committee, possibly on Monday, with a formulation enabling us to agree. The Committee could put that formulation to the Business Committee and give the Assembly notice that there may well be, although we could give no guarantee, a debate on Tuesday of next week. There may be holes in what I have said, but I am honestly trying to think of a way forward that meets the needs of the moment, and a lot could well depend on what transpires tomorrow.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Before Mr O'Dowd comes in on that, there is a procedural difficulty.

Dr Farren: OK, fine.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Assembly must have three days' notice of a debate, so if you were going down that route —

Mrs D Dodds: Sorry, there is a matter for clarification, Mr Deputy Speaker. I recall much less notice than that for previous debates.

The Committee Clerk: Under current Standing Orders, the Secretary of State makes a direction for a sitting of which Members must have three days' notice. For example, there would be a direction on Friday for a sitting on Tuesday.

However, no notice is necessary of what the Order Paper will contain, so referral of business could be on Monday, and Members could come to a sitting not necessarily knowing what it is about. There is no need for three days' notice of the subject matter.

Mr O'Dowd: I just want to clarify something. I thought that I had made myself clear. Sinn Féin does not agree to a debate on the Committee's work whether it is next week, the week after that or any other week. The purpose of the Committee is to prepare for government. Momentum seems to be building that the purpose of the Committee is to enable us all to debate in the Assembly Chamber and play the politician.

There has been insufficient, or indeed any, progress in the Committee to substantiate debating any issues in the Assembly. If we reach a stage, and Sinn Féin wants to get to that stage, where the Committee can set up subcommittees for detailed discussion and the preparation of reports, we will take a different view.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It looks as though we do not have consensus on that issue.

Mr McFarland: When the DUP first came to the Committee, it said that the only purpose of the Committee was to scope the issues. There would be logic to the DUP's walking out this afternoon saying that the issues have been scoped, end of story, that the Committee no longer exists and that there are to be no subgroups, nothing.

My understanding is that the DUP will not do that and that it is being positive about this whole process. I must say that, despite the first few days of shouting and roaring, the DUP has been here, playing its part and engaging with everybody, and fair play to it for that.

I am worried now that Sinn Féin is starting to try to run the show here and decide when a, b, c, or d is done.

There has been a degree of goodwill around the Committee table, and if you look at Hansard you can see that we have done some interesting stuff. What we have done here in the past five days has never been done before.

3.45 pm

I appreciate that Sinn Féin has reasons for not wanting a talking shop, and I recognise that it does not support other debates, but perhaps Sinn Féin could see its way, in the interests of harmony and good-neighbourliness, to taking a positive view. Martin McGuinness said early on that if work came out of this Committee, Sinn Féin would support a debate. One is then into a discussion about what constitutes work. I would argue that five days' worth of substantial Hansard reports is a fair amount of blethering. The DUP had four hours of questioning, we have had five hours today and Sinn Féin had six. The Alliance had a couple of hours' worth and the SDLP had four. That is a substantial body of work, which is being ignored or regarded as irrelevant. I would argue that it is very relevant.

I know that Sinn Féin has fears that this will turn into a row. However, it would be useful for our colleagues, having read Hansard, to have an opportunity to air some of these debates, because they are public anyway. When the Hansard reports are published, the press will have them wall-to-wall. What Willie McCrea said to Martin McGuinness and vice versa will be all over the airwaves, so it is not that no one will see it. That was the case until today, but now all of this is public, so one will not hear anything in a debate that the press will not have already.

The fears about stoking the fires should be gone with the publication of Hansard. In the interests of Committee goodwill and of involving the wider Assembly, it might be possible for Sinn Féin to ruminate on that and reconsider having some form of discussion on the work of the Committee, which has been good. The logic of all that would be that it might encourage all of us to continue that good work. There are several issues that merit further examination.

This Committee has gone relatively well, if not ideally. It would be a pity to unilaterally destroy what has the makings of taking us forward. It could get into subcommittees and go all sorts of places, but we need to do it as a Committee, examining our way forward with no one making demands or preconditions or things that make it difficult for others to shuffle along the road.

Despite Sinn Féin's misgivings about debates in the Chamber stoking the fires, and in light of the publication of Hansard, I wonder whether it is possible to have some form of take-note debate next week to show that the Assembly, before it breaks for the summer, is actually able to sit in a Committee, to do good work, and to bring it up to some sort of a debate.

Mr O'Dowd: If I have given the impression that we wish this Committee to end today, I am sorry. That is not what we wanted to put across. This Committee still has work to do, and despite our scepticism, we still think it can be done.

As I have said, it is not the role of the Committee to automatically provide debates for the Chamber. As Alan has said, if substantial issues have been highlighted in Hansard then, as he has suggested, we should go away and examine Hansard and come back to the Committee to decide our way forward.

I do not wish to put across the message that we are stopping our work in the Preparation for Government Committee; we are not. An important meeting will be held tomorrow with the Taoiseach and the British Prime Minister, which might lead to more clarification and fresher thinking. It might help if people went through the Hansard report to target the substantial issues and return to the Committee to discuss the way forward.

Mr McFarland: There is nothing mutually exclusive about this. It will take us a day or two to get our heads round the Hansard report. However, that does not stop us setting a plenary date for next Tuesday, as all Assembly Members and ourselves will have had an opportunity to consider the Hansard report by then. That would not stop us meeting on Monday to refine our thinking, which I think we need to do. We need to read the Hansard report and get our thinking clear about whether other areas require further examination — I believe that they do. Some areas we can park, because most of the parties here have no influence over them; therefore we should simply register them.

That should not stop us sending out what would be a really good sign for the Assembly. The public thinks that we are a waste of rations; that we have spent the past three years earning money and doing nothing. People have not yet seen the work that goes on in the Committee; when they do, they will be genuinely amazed that the parties can sit down and have a discussion with one another. It would be even better if we could have some collectivity by involving our colleagues in this amazement next Tuesday. We could meet on Monday to refine matters. The members of the Committee would be the lead speakers in any such debate.

We have a vested interest in not blowing the lid off the Committee; we have a vested interest in making sure that it works. I do not believe that anyone here will demand that the whole thing explode. I know that that is difficult for you and that you are probably sailing under orders, but would you be happy to ask your top team whether, in the interests of the Assembly and the work of the Committee, it might consider taking part in a sensible debate — albeit limited, perhaps a couple of hours' worth — on Tuesday to show that the Committee is working?

Dr Farren: Lest there be any misunderstanding about the SDLP's position, let me state that the SDLP does not regard the Assembly as the be-all and end-all for discussing and resolving issues. We do see continuing, necessary work for this Committee.

Among the issues identified in the various submissions — although this is not an exclusive statement — and the discussions that have arisen from them has been that of economic regeneration. The Assembly has already had a lengthy and comprehensive debate on that topic, although Sinn Féin did not participate. However, if an Assembly motion were tabled to ask the Governments to urge the Committee to continue its work and to address the question of economic regeneration — and I am not formulating precise terms for such a motion — Sinn Féin could participate in the debate on it. Others might want to contribute. We could have a take-note debate.

Perhaps take-note is too loose a term, particularly for Sinn Féin. However, I urge a motion that asks that the Preparation for Government Committee continue its work, the Assembly having noted what has transpired to date, having noted what the two Governments have said, and, in particular, having noted that there is common concern with respect to economic regeneration. One might even add other issues, if there were agreement. However, it is particularly important that we Assembly Members urge that that work continue over whatever period of time.

Such a motion might begin to meet concerns about having a debate that simply goes in all directions. It could well go in all directions, but it would have to come back to the more precise elements in the motion, if contributions were to be meaningful. Something like that might help.

Mr McNarry: I will not bow the knee to Sinn Féin in requesting a debate, but this will be the second time since I have joined this Committee that we have been faced with making a decision to which Sinn Féin is the obstacle. It is not easy for me to explain to my people that, on two occasions, when the word debate was used, Sinn Féin has sought to prevent agreement. Sinn Féin is unable to concede to the consensus that I gather exists among other colleagues sitting around the table. I do not believe that that situation can continue.

With all due respect, I agree with the sentiments that have been expressed about how well we have all got on, about how points have been put across, and about how people have had their moments. However, quite frankly, speaking personally, I am being encouraged — and I am being asked to encourage my party — to come to a meeting such as this when I know fine well that, because it does not suit one party, all the discussion, all the talk and all the reports in Hansard are great, but all that we can do is read them.

Therefore, I am not going to beg, but I do not know what could encourage Sinn Féin to, for once in its life, give recognition to its colleagues. Why be the odd one out all the time, when there is otherwise consensus? That is not a consensus to browbeat them or anyone else into anything.

There are some in this room who have deliberated for far longer than I have; I have only been here for a week. Having put that effort in, and having listened to what Diane Dodds said in summary about how she felt about this matter, it is pretty clued-in stuff.

However, if that is the position of all parties bar one, in effect we are really telling our colleagues in the Assembly that they do not matter.

I think that that is wrong, because they do matter. If I had not been privileged enough to be here, I would expect the people who were here to come to the Assembly and seek my support for this Committee to continue. If it is felt that this Committee can continue without asking for the support of all MLAs, we are setting ourselves up to be something that we are not. We owe it to our colleagues in the Assembly to debate the issues and, in that manner, to seek their support for continuing our work.

However, if the continuance of the work all falls down because Sinn Féin does not like where it is going, or it wants to block or to veto, it makes it very difficult to sell that to my people. I am out of government because of your obstinacy and your petulance and your persistence in vetoes. I cannot get you out of government because of that veto. My ability to work for my constituency in the manner that I was elected to do has been obstructed because of vetoes. As for vetoing ourselves and our colleagues in the Assembly, I do not know how on earth you sell that, Chairman. I do not know how I can go back and talk to my party colleagues. I cannot beg; I can only ask you to see reason. If everybody else has taken a reasonable attitude, why cannot you?

4.00 pm

Mr Maskey: I do not want to take full issue with everything that David has just said. I share the frustration — certainly felt by our party — that we are a number of weeks into this process, and we cannot identify significant progress. Alan asked the question: how do you measure progress? Some may consider 20 hours of grilling as progress, but I cannot measure that as progress, to be perfectly frank. There is a bit of an irony in that a number of years ago a 20-hour grilling would probably have generated a lot of heat and perhaps less light. The interesting thing is that today it would not even generate as much heat because people have heard all of these arguments so often before. John O'Dowd made the point that a lot of what has been said has been exchanged before in interviews and debates on radio and television.

Obviously, it is important that this Committee meet. We are totally committed to it. We are very committed to trying to get substantive business conducted through this Committee and with all elected Assembly Members engaged in that process. We want that to happen very quickly, but as John has already said, we do not see that there has been significant enough progress to bring that to an Assembly debate. That is the very clear position that we adopted from day one. We have worked very hard in this Committee, as have other members, but the outcome, to date, does not, in our view, warrant or justify an Assembly debate. Arguably, you could go in there and rehearse all of the 20 hours of grilling plus the other business that the Committee has discussed. You would either put the Members to sleep or fire them up for the summer, because there is nothing to report to them by way of recommendations for future work.

Alan suggested that the Committee staff try to collate, from the Hansard reports to date, the issues that are outstanding. That might be a useful mechanism to let the Committee meet again and, on the back of that work, to take stock of whatever progress has been made. If the officials can cull from the lengthy Hansard reports an itemised agenda, we can take stock and, more importantly, decide what our next steps should be. That would be useful, because we would be able to start to scope some of these issues. It is very regrettable that we have not made sufficient progress to go to an Assembly debate. We would be delighted to go to the Assembly and report progress in this Committee. That is what we are here for — to make some headway. We do not want to be wasting our time, twiddling our thumbs or having lengthy debates in here that we could have anywhere else.

Unfortunately, we have not made enough progress, and our position has been clear from day one.

We want this Committee to knuckle down, examine the obstacles and issues, and make recommendations to tackle those matters and progress them. It is regrettable that the Committee has not done that. However, it is still not too late. We see considerable merit in the earlier suggestion of identifying, from the Hansard record, the key issues and themes. Let us take stock of the Committee report and then decide what we do next. We can continue to work over the next days and weeks.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is Mr Hay next. I would like to take advice on the table of issues, which has come up several times.

Mr Hay: I am not totally au fait with all the issues that have been discussed in this Committee. Listening to the debate, I think that the Committee has come to a point when decisions must be made about how we move forward constructively and deliver.

The DUP could not support leaving the Assembly behind. Listening to discussions of the issues that have been raised by all the parties, and especially by Sinn Féin, I almost have the impression — although perhaps I am wrong — that they are looking for an exit strategy to get out of the Committee and out of the Assembly. I also agree with Seán that the Assembly is not the be-all and end-all to progressing this issue. Leaving the Assembly behind, and thus having no opportunity to debate, does huge damage to other Assembly Members. They have been totally left behind. Assembly Members want to be in the Chamber, debating issues that have been identified by this Committee.

The trick for this Committee is to reach a twin-track approach, where Committee work continues alongside debates in the Chamber to which everybody can reasonably sign up. No matter how this Committee progresses, or how long it lasts, other Assembly Members cannot be left behind; they must be involved in any debate about the future.

If, for whatever reason, people are being obstructive, my party would have to decide whether there is any point in sitting on this Committee if we cannot debate in the Chamber. We need to discuss how we reach a twin-track approach to try to resolve issues that all the parties are passionate about. If people are saying that good, reasonable work about progressing the issues has been conducted in this Committee, it might be useful to have a reasonable, sensible debate in the Chamber. There is no point in the DUP's staying on this Committee if there is to be no debate in the Chamber.

It is wrong for any party to judge when enough work has been done in this Committee and that the time is right for a debate in the Chamber. There is broad support around this table for a debate on the issues. How do we get to the point where that is up and running? A debate in the Chamber would not obstruct the work of this Committee. There may be a fear that if there were to be a debate in the Chamber, Assembly Members might not bother to turn up at this Committee. One party in the Committee cannot say that there should be no debate, when there is a clear consensus around the table that there should. Our party will not continue to sit on this Committee if there is to be no debate in the Chamber. That will not be an option for our party.

However, we are prepared to attend the Committee. Alan was correct when he said that we could walk away today and say that the scoping exercise has been done. As far as we are concerned, our work is done. We shall report back to our party, and, if we cannot get to a point at which we can tell the party that an Assembly debate is achievable, it will perhaps decide that our work is done.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Before I call Margaret Ritchie, several members have suggested that it was the Committee staff's role to add to or amend the table of issues. As members know, it is a working document, and I think that it is entirely inappropriate for the staff to amend that table. To do so is entirely a matter for the political parties. I wish to make it very clear that it is highly unlikely that it will be appropriate for the Clerks to amend the table. I know that several members, during various sittings, approached the table of issues from different angles. It is totally understandable that people had different understandings of what the document would be. If parties have amendments, additions or deletions to make, they should draft those amendments and ask the Clerks to insert them into the table. However, if members anticipate that the Committee staff will amend the table, I do not believe that that will happen.

Mr McFarland: Our experience tells us that this Committee is, in theory, no different from any Committee that took evidence in the first Assembly. Committee staff would at that time have produced a report on the essence of the evidence that had been presented.

What we have done is to take evidence and question each party in turn. Although a substantially verbatim transcript of the Committee sittings was available in the first Assembly, that was not what the Committee produced at the conclusion of its sittings. I wonder whether, in keeping with practice in the first Assembly, it would be possible to produce a report on the essence of the key points in each submission and cross-examination; otherwise, it will be difficult to judge how much progress we can make, because each party will simply regurgitate the content of its submission.

That would mean that we would be no closer to having a Committee-produced document of the sittings. We should not all split up into our parties and cock a snook at one another again — we need a document from the Committee that each party can buy into as being a report on what was said in each evidence session.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Not only am I depriving Ms Ritchie from attending an important meeting of Down District Council, I allowed you —

Ms Ritchie: You are so kind, Mr Deputy Speaker. You are depriving yourself as well, if I recall.

We must be mindful of whether we want the political institutions restored or not. That is the first question that each of us around the table must ask of ourselves and of our party. We are not solely responsible to ourselves or to our party. There are people out there who voted for all the parties around this table who want to see what is happening and to see the value of their money, so to speak.

Therefore, there must be some level of accountability. If we are seriously interested in — or seriously want — the restoration of the institutions, and if, as we do, perceive as necessary participation in those debates that happen to be relevant to restoration — the findings of this Committee being one such debate — so be it; we shall participate in order to demonstrate to the public that many issues have been discussed. As Alan McFarland said, this is the first time that we have all sat around the same table and identified the obstacles to restoration or the issues that need to be dealt with.

That is novel in itself. It is not a backward step, but is something that can be built on. That debate could perhaps identify other issues, elaborate on those that already exist and help this Committee to pave the way for other work that it may need to do. However, our ultimate goal should be the restoration of the institutions.

It should be remembered that we have only until 24 November. The SDLP would hate to think that there might be parties in this room, and in the Assembly, that are deliberately trying to obfuscate that process. At the end of the day, we are accountable to the public, who want to see what is happening.

4.15 pm

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Maskey has indicated that he wishes to speak. This issue has been fairly well aired. After Mr Maskey has spoken, I will ask whether there is a proposal and, if so, put it to the Committee, because members have had a good opportunity to make their points.

Mr Maskey: For the record, Sinn Féin has no exit strategy and is very much committed to the process, and we will continue to assert that.

Seán Farren will make a proposal in a few minutes. However, if it would be inappropriate for officials to try to distil the key outstanding issues from previous debates, so that we can take stock of where we are and decide the future strategy of the Committee, I presume that any or all of the parties could do so. That may be a useful mechanism. As William Hay said, we are coming to a point where we need to take stock and decide our next steps, and it would be appropriate to do that.

Sinn Féin believes that there is no point in having a debate in the Chamber to tell Members that we have been talking and airing all those issues. Many issues have been aired, but there have been no decisions or collectivity in how any of those issues are to be taken forward. That would be the only credible basis on which there could be a debate in the Chamber. As much as I want a debate in the Assembly, I do not want to regularly report to my party colleagues that, although the Committee has met several times and there has been much discussion, not one issue has been taken forward. Until we have some progress to report on any of the obstacles, or any steps that can realistically and collectively take us forward, there is no point in allowing 108 Members to rehearse in the Chamber what 20 or so members have been rehearsing in this Committee over the past number of weeks. That is very unfortunate. However, it is still not too late for us, as a Committee, to collect our thoughts, take stock of where we are and take key decisions about what to do next. When that time comes, and there is progress to report, there could be a substantive debate in the Assembly.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I understand that Dr Farren has a proposal. We all know the rules by now; the proposal must be agreed by consensus. If I ask whether there is consensus and any member says “No”, that is it. The proposal will fall, and we will move to another proposal.

Dr Farren: Subject to advice on the wording of any motion, I propose that the Committee gives notice that an early debate — without specifying a particular date — should take place in the Chamber. The debate would be on a motion that takes note of what transpires from tomorrow’s visit by the two Prime Ministers, if that would be helpful, and of what has taken place in this Committee.

Over a month ago, the Northern Ireland Business Alliance gave a presentation to Members in the Senate Chamber, and the proposals that it put forward were met with general consensus. Various parties suggested that delegations should meet the Prime Minister and the Chancellor, and that those delegations should focus on identifying the key elements of an economic regeneration programme.

The purpose of a debate in the Chamber would for be parties to suggest proposals for subsequent discussion in a Committee that would be established to take forward those proposals.

We have been through that already, but Sinn Féin was not part of it, and that is why it is important that it participates this time. I understand that it is a rather wordy expression of what a motion might consist of, but we need a precise meaning of what is contained in my proposal for a motion to the Assembly as soon as possible after tomorrow, and probably on Monday morning. The Assembly could be convened to discuss it as soon as possible after that if we can agree the terms of a motion, and that would help with our work on the economic regeneration issue.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We have a proposal. Is there consensus on that proposal?

Mr O’Dowd: With respect to Dr Farren, that was lengthy and wordy. What are the bones of the proposal? Perhaps one of the Clerks could read them back to me.

The Committee Clerk: I could paraphrase a little. This Committee gives notice that an early debate should take place in the Assembly, taking note of the view of the Governments in relation to the work on preparation for government and asking this Committee to continue its work and in particular to consider what work should be done to address economic regeneration.

Dr Farren: That more or less captures the essence of what I was saying.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is this a counter proposal?

Mr McNarry: No, it is a point of information.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Will you leave it to Dr Farren then?

Mr McNarry: You might be able to answer it.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Certainly if I can.

Mr McNarry: The Secretary of State and the Prime Minister may or may not refer to the work of this Committee tomorrow. Are you, or is anyone who is in contact with the Secretary of State’s office, aware of any enquiries that his office may have made on progress in the Committee?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There has been no contact from the Secretary of State’s office to me as Chairman. I do not know if the clerking staff have had any contact.

The Committee Clerk: The Secretary of State is in regular contact, I believe, with the Speaker, and the Speaker has asked on occasion how the Committee is going and what work is being done. So there is no formal contact as such, but I believe that the Speaker acts as a conduit.

Mr McNarry: I do not want to go too deeply into this, but what has the response been to the Speaker?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The minutes are published once they are agreed, and, from yesterday’s media coverage, it is obvious that the Hansard reports are now being widely distributed as well. Perhaps that is one of the ways.

Mr Maskey, is this an alternative proposal?

Mr Maskey: That last proposal seems to be a convoluted way of saying: “Let us have a debate in the Assembly at some point in the future about something that we are not quite sure about.” It has already been said that the Prime Minister and the Taoiseach are here tomorrow, so let us hear what they have to say. This Committee has a job to do, and it does not need to ask anyone how to do that job. We should be doing that job, so I will not be supporting that proposal now.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): So there is not consensus. It is absolutely clear that there is no consensus on Dr Farren’s proposal, so that falls. That is how this Committee operates.

Having dealt with that, we move on to a future work programme. What do we do in the absence of a debate on the Floor of the House on this Committee? There was a proposal from Mr McFarland that we go back.

I just want to draw members' attention to a practical point. The Hansard for this sitting will not be available until Friday afternoon at the earliest. Obviously tomorrow is a very busy day for the Building, so if you are thinking of taking time to read —

Mr McNarry: What has tomorrow got to do with Hansard?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I presume that Hansard is involved.

Mr McNarry: How is Hansard involved tomorrow?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Sorry, my mistake. I believe that Hansard will not be getting these tapes tonight because of the Prime Ministers' visit, meaning that it will be too late for its staff to produce the transcript tomorrow.

Mr McNarry: Is Hansard attending lots of meetings? Hansard used to be the most efficient organisation in the Building. Since it became involved in these meetings, we have been told that we must wait for the transcripts, and now you are telling us that we must wait until Friday.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): These transcripts are not produced in the same manner as those for plenary sittings. It is unusual to receive the Hansard report for Committees on the following day. For example, if this were the Regional Development Committee, we would not get the transcript tomorrow. As members know, we have put the Hansard staff under a bit of pressure to put the transcripts through the system as quickly as possible, but I am told that the earliest that we can receive this transcript is Friday afternoon.

The report will be with members on Saturday, and we need to consider how much time to give them to read it through. The proposal was that we would allow members to have time to read the material —

Mr McFarland: Logically, if we are not agreed on a debate — and, obviously, we are not — we should not presuppose that the Secretary of State will not decide to have a debate of some sort next week. We have no idea whether he wishes to do that. Once we receive the Hansard report, it would be beneficial to have the opportunity to talk to colleagues about the issues. We will be tied up on Monday morning with our party meetings —

Mr McNarry: Ours is on Tuesday.

Mr McFarland: Perhaps the answer would be to regroup on Tuesday, having had a chance to think through the issues. I do not know whether that would be too late. We can decide then whether we wish to have further meetings later in the week.

Mrs D Dodds: From our party's point of view — and my colleague made this perfectly clear — there seems to be a blocking agenda in operation in the Committee. My party will view this issue seriously. We do not want to discuss future business until we have spoken at length with the party officers. William and I are party officers; we want to consult with the rest of the party officers. Alan McFarland expressed a wish to do that as well.

Mr Hay: Each of us has to report back to our parties. It does not bode well that we are going to report that there is a blockage in this Committee. There will not be an Assembly debate until one party in particular agrees to that. That is the issue for my party. We cannot remain indefinitely in this Committee. Our party wants to make progress and move the issues on. We should not hold back other Assembly Members. If there were an Assembly debate, the public would have a better understanding of the Committee's work and the issues that need to be resolved. Unfortunately, there is a blockage.

The Assembly is going to be continually stifled, and the parties will have to make up their minds on whether there is any point in the Committee's continuing to meet. I said earlier that there was no reason why we should not adopt a twin-track approach, with the Committee carrying on with its work and some form of debate taking place in the Assembly. One party in particular has adopted the approach that if it is not done its way, it will not be done at all. That is a tragedy. The other parties around this table need to make up their minds about the future of this Committee.

Mr O'Dowd: I have no wish to open up the debate being hinted at by Mr Hay. If Mr McFarland is proposing that we come back on Monday or Tuesday, after the meetings with the two Prime Ministers, to take stock of the reports that have been laid before us, we are more than happy to do that and to plan a way forward that, I hope, will involve all the political parties.

4.30 pm

Mr McFarland: Chairman, in the light of what William has said, perhaps the answer is for you to call parties to discuss this on Monday and then perhaps get in touch with you. Clearly if people are not going to come back, there is no point in organising a meeting today for next week that people are not going to go to — or are not in a position to say whether they will attend.

Mr Hay: I think the key for us, Deputy Speaker, to move all of this forward is opening the door of the Assembly to allow the other Assembly Members to debate that. And no one party should stop that. That is the key for us.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): May I just remind Members that if we cannot reach agreement on any future meetings, we have a slight difficulty in that we are hanging in the air, as it were. So you need to give some thought to that, because I do not believe the Chair has got the power to call a meeting specifically — so it is left hanging.

On one practical issue, because I know people want to come in, will parties send amendments to the table of issues by 2.00 pm on Friday to help the staff.

Mr McFarland: Is this Hansard?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): No, the table of issues. Any additions or amendments you wish to make. Any issues you feel you have not included in your original draft.

Mr O'Dowd: Sorry, by 2.00 pm?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): On Friday to the Committee Clerks, please.

Mr McFarland: Chairman, the table was valuable as a quick snapshot of our original, very simple, position papers. The reason I was suggesting we had some sort of report from Hansard, as you would have in a normal Committee, was that all sorts of issues that are not in there have arisen. Now, we are in danger of having a 25-page document here, because if all the parties submit all the issues back and forth that they brought up in their submission, that document will expand dramatically. You will then have a competition in that the party who has not put in 10 pages worth of amendments will feel that it has to put 10 pages in to look the same as all the other parties. One of the issues raised here this morning by Ian Paisley Jnr was a whole lot of dismissing of the Ulster Unionists' paltry, irrelevant six topics, headings and so on. Now if we are into the business of judging how valid our positions are by how chunky our submissions are, you watch this party. We will give you 25 pages worth.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr McFarland, I should add that we did agree as a Committee with consensus that any party who wished to bring additional amendments, extra material or delete from its initial papers which lead to this table could do so. So unfortunately that has been agreed already, and we cannot go back on that.

Mr McNarry: Chairman, just on a point of order. We seem to be jumping. Two colleagues here have made very pertinent points. Unless I have missed the point, the relevance of adding this or adding that by Friday would seem to have been missed: I will not be coming back here unless my colleagues in the Ulster Unionist Party are of the view that it is worthwhile. Mr McFarland was asking that we would leave our future decisions in abeyance until such times as our party under its own strength should report to you or to the other Chairman or to both our views on progress in this Committee.

So I am just wondering what the point is in continuing with business now if that is the view that seems to be prevalent?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We have Dr Farren, Mr Maskey, Mr Hay and Mr Ford. The only point I am trying to make is that if we do not reach consensus on any resumption of meetings and it is left hanging in the air, I am unsure as to whether the Chairmen have the power to ever bring this Committee back. It may be that the only person who can do it is the Secretary of State.

Mr McNarry: I appreciate that but Mr McFarland was not alluding to your powers but to the courtesy of informing you about whether or not we would be returning to future meetings.

Mr Hay: To follow up, Deputy Speaker, on what David has said, what has annoyed everybody is that the SDLP made, I believe, a reasonable proposal. I think everybody was saying that there are a number of things we want to take away and come back and discuss. But once again one political party has just said "No". It was not even prepared to say: "Well, I hear the proposal, and I am prepared to take it to the party and at least discuss it." It is just "No". And the worry for myself and for the Unionist bloc here is that the door is now firmly closed.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Seán Farren has been very patient.

Dr Farren: The relevance of the table of issues has now been lost. Therefore, unless we can clarify its relevance for our future business, the SDLP will not submit any further points for inclusion in the table. I do not think anyone should put staff to that task.

Notwithstanding what has been said about attendance in the future, it would be helpful if we could pencil in, at least tentatively, a meeting for Monday afternoon or Tuesday morning. Meetings can be cancelled and the secretariat advised. However, to ease the burden on you — you say that you cannot exercise the authority to call a meeting if there has been no agreement that one should be called — I suggest that we agree tentatively. If parties decide in the meantime that they should not and will not attend, there will be no further meetings. At least I would know that there might be a meeting on Monday afternoon or Tuesday morning — I would go for Monday afternoon.

Mr Maskey: It is imperative that the Committee meets again. I reiterate that Sinn Féin does not rule out debates in the Assembly at some point, but they must be on the basis of some progress having been made. We do not measure progress by the fact that all the parties are sitting in the same room for x number of hours or days. At this stage of the game, in 2006, that is not a measure of progress.

Mr McFarland: It is definitely progress, Chairman.

Mr Maskey: David mentioned that we have been here for a week, but some people have been in this process for 10 years and perhaps a lot more.

Mr McNarry: You can go back as many years as you like, Alex, but we are talking about this process.

Mr Maskey: I appreciate that, but this Committee needs to meet. Members around the table say that progress has been made on the issues, but we have not heard an example of that progress.

Dr Farren: What about economic regeneration?

Mr Maskey: There was a debate, as you well know.

Dr Farren: Martin said that we could do it in two days.

Mr Maskey: There was a debate in the Assembly, which involved most parties. There was not a very positive outcome to that, but time will tell. We want to have sensible, constructive, substantive debates and discussions with the rest of our colleagues on the basis of work done and progress made. There is absolutely nothing that would preclude Sinn Féin from future debates in the Assembly — far from it. We want to have discussions with the rest of our colleagues. However, we feel that, at the very least, this Committee has a responsibility to meet again to take stock and to identify the progress that has been made. It is not good enough to say that we have made progress; let us identify where progress has been made. Perhaps that is a slight advance on Alan's suggestion about identifying the issues. Let us identify what we consider to have been progress and then determine what we can do to take that forward. We all say that we want to take this process forward, so let us agree that we will meet again, identify the areas where progress has been made and determine where we go from there.

Sinn Féin wants to ensure that we build on any progress that might have been made, but no one around this table is advancing where it has been made. There has been insufficient progress to warrant an Assembly meeting. People here seem to be focused on one outcome — a debate in the Chamber. However, that is not why this Committee is in business.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Ford will speak next, followed by Mrs Dodds. Then I will look for a proposal.

Mr McFarland: I second Seán's proposal.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will take your proposal, Mr McFarland. There will be two more contributions, and then we will try for consensus on that.

Mr Ford: We are rapidly reaching the point that proves that after six and a half hours sitting around this table, we are in no mood to agree anything. If we can at least agree a date for another meeting that may be as much as we can manage.

It is clear that all parties now have to take stock and have discussions with other members of their teams. Most of those discussions will take place on Monday morning, so we should seek to meet as early as possible — perhaps around 12.30 pm. If we cannot meet on Monday because others want to take all of Monday to consider the issues, then, given the fact that the Business Committee is meeting at lunchtime on Tuesday, perhaps the best suggestion would be to meet at 2.00 pm on Tuesday. I support those who think that we should fix a date now; otherwise we will be in major difficulties if we do not at least have that ahead of us.

Mrs D Dodds: It is interesting to see Sinn Féin trying to get some wriggle room on the issue. I suggest that it is trying to sell us something on the never-never. That is what Sinn Féin's latest positioning really means. The Committee has run into a serious situation.

As I said before and repeat for the record: the DUP has come to the Committee and has identified and put forward serious issues that must be addressed. It is time for the rest of our colleagues to be given the opportunity to consider and debate those issues with us. Seán Farren's proposal was wide-ranging and sensible.

Yesterday, I spoke to members of the business community and to our representative on the Northern Ireland Business Alliance, which meets regularly. They are very anxious for the Assembly to get down to work and consider the issues that affect the country's economy. The blocking-and-wrecking agenda is a serious tactic — so serious that we should now forward details of that position to the Secretary of State.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Both proposals can be forwarded; they are not mutually exclusive.

Dr Farren: I propose that the Committee identify Monday afternoon for its next meeting. I am not available on Tuesday and possibly not on Wednesday, but that does not mean that the SDLP will not be represented. Taking cognisance of my timetable, my only point is on consistency — I have attended every meeting, and I do not want to miss the next one.

Mr McFarland: I suggest 2.00 pm on Monday, subject to the parties' agreement.

Mrs D Dodds: What will we be meeting to do?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The specific issues to discuss are the outcome of the meetings with the Prime Ministers, the resulting documentation and the results of the party meetings. Everyone has indicated that, having received copies of the Hansard report on Saturday, they will have issues to discuss in depth. I hope that they will have a chance to read it over the weekend and report back to their group meetings.

Mr Kennedy: Is the Deputy Speaker aware of the existence of correspondence from the Speaker that indicates how business may proceed in relation to the Business Committee, Assembly plenaries and perhaps the Secretary of State's wishing the Committee to continue its work? Apparently, a letter from the Speaker is in circulation this afternoon. Can that be clarified?

The Committee Clerk: Do you want me to send someone to the Speaker's Office to ask about that?

Mr Kennedy: Yes. My understanding is that a letter, perhaps to party leaders, has emerged from the Speaker's Office.

Mr Maskey: Mr Chairman, you identified two items for an agenda should the proposal be agreed. Neither of those items is relevant to the work of this Committee. We have no difficulty discussing those matters, but, given the way in which people have expressed frustration, the real purpose of the Committee is to take stock of any progress that has been made and to decide on our next steps.

We should talk about what will be said tomorrow and reflect on what the parties are saying, but the Committee needs to determine what progress it has made and what its next steps will be. That is the primary purpose of the Committee.

4.45 pm

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr McNarry has opted out of his opportunity to speak.

Mr McFarland: It is my traditional speech. It is 4.45 pm. We have had a very long day, and I suggest that we should not get into a long discussion. We have a plan for Monday that we can either go with or cancel. Can I suggest that — Mr Maskey: We need to agree on what we are going to talk about next week. I mentioned two items.

Mr McFarland: Yes, we can include your suggestions as well as taking stock of our discussions here.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do we have consensus?

Mr Hay: If we are talking about an agenda, one item that should be included is a future debate in the Assembly.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are we happy to discuss that on Monday? OK, we are moving here.

Mr Hay: In saying that, it should not be left on the long finger, just because it is on the agenda.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are we agreed on the time: 2.00 pm on Monday in this room?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There will be no lunch.

Mr Kennedy: No free lunch.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is good. We are making progress.

Mr Ford: Does that mean we can take a break?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): No, no, we have to push on.

Mrs D Dodds: Sorry, Mr Chairman, I did say that a report on the serious nature of the blockage that has been caused in this Committee should be sent to the Secretary of State.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I apologise. Mrs Dodds did make that request.

Mr McFarland: Tomorrow, all the parties will discuss the issues with the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister. I am not sure that we will get agreement.

Mrs D Dodds: It should be formally recorded.

Mr McFarland: The difficulty with that is that I am not sure that we would get agreement.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is there consensus on Mrs Dodds's proposal?

Mr O'Dowd: No.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): No consensus.

Mr Kennedy: It will appear in Hansard anyway.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There are a few changes to the minutes of the meeting of 26 June, which was last Monday. For instance, the meeting was suspended at 3.06 pm, not 3.05 pm — I am sure that you all spotted that — and it reconvened at 3.24 pm rather than 3.23 pm.

Apart from those changes, are there any other amendments, additions or corrections that members wish to make? Shall we take them line by line or en bloc?

Mrs D Dodds: I am looking at point 5 in the minutes. I would like clarification and want to see how these minutes will be presented. If the minutes for 16 June are presented as having everything deleted after 4.47 pm, we will not have registered the fact that there was no consensus on the minutes of the remainder of the meeting.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That issue was noted in Hansard yesterday and was dealt with.

Mrs D Dodds: Yes, but that will not appear in the minutes of the meeting. They will simply say 4.47 pm and end.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The fact that you have read it into the record now means that we have covered that point.

Mrs D Dodds: Exactly.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are the minutes agreed?

Members indicated assent.

Mr Kennedy: Set my people free.

Mr McFarland: There is one more issue.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Please note that the letter from the Speaker dated 23 June 2006 has been referred to the Clerk of the Assembly, and, at this stage, we have not received a substantive reply.

Adjourned at 4.49 pm.

COMMITTEE ON THE PREPARATION FOR GOVERNMENT

Monday 3 July 2006

Members in attendance for all or part of proceedings:

The Chairman, Mr Jim Wells
Mr John Dallat
Dr Seán Farren
Mr David Ford
Ms Michelle Gildernew
Mr Danny Kennedy
Mr Kieran McCarthy
Rev Dr William McCrea
Dr Alasdair McDonnell
Mr Alan McFarland
Mr David McNarry
Lord Morrow
Mr Conor Murphy
Observing: Mr Francie Molloy

The Committee met at 2.06 pm.

(The Chairman (Mr Wells) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Wells): All the parties are now represented. As the first few items on the agenda are simple preliminaries we will start.

I welcome Lord Morrow to our meeting. This is the first meeting of the Committee since his elevation, and I am sure that the entire Committee will wish to congratulate him on becoming Lord Morrow of Clogher Valley. We will address him by his proper title from now on. Congratulations.

Can we agree the substitutes for today's meeting?

Mr Murphy: Apologies from Martin McGuinness.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Who is his substitute?

Mr Murphy: There is no replacement.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mrs Dodds will be along; Mr Kennedy and Dr McDonnell, of course, are full members of the Committee.

The Committee Clerk: John Dallat is here for Mark Durkan.

Mr Ford: Apologies from Naomi Long. She should be here shortly.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): She has gone downhill since we last saw her. [Laughter.]

There are no further apologies.

I draw Committee members' attention to the original agenda, wherein item 3 was mentioned twice, and I apologise for that. You all have an amended agenda.

We move on to the minutes of the meeting held on 28 June. Are members content that they are a true and accurate record of that meeting? Are there any comments or questions? That seems to have consensus.

The next item on the agenda is important. On 29 June the two Chairmen of the Committee and the two Clerks met the Secretary of State and gave him a report of the Committee's deliberations. We said that the Committee had met nine times and that its work had focused on the presentations by each of the five parties, followed by question-and-answer sessions. We said that a wide range of issues had been dealt with and that we were meeting today.

The Secretary of State said that he considered the role of Chairman to be somewhat wider than the way we had been using it to date. He sees the role as facilitating and directing the work of the Committee, in addition to simply chairing the meetings. Members may wish to make their views known on that when we return to the issue later.

Crucially, the Secretary of State said that he is minded to issue a direction that the Assembly will hold a plenary session this week on a subject to be determined by the Committee. We will return to that at item 5 on the agenda.

We hoped to have received that direction in time for this meeting. It has not yet arrived, but the Clerks have informed me that they are in regular contact with the Secretary of State's office. As soon as the direction arrives, it will be brought to the Committee for consideration.

Mr Molloy, who was also at the meeting with the Secretary of State, and is here as an observer, may wish to add his comments on what was discussed.

Mr Molloy: From the Chairs' point of view, the meeting was certainly useful in that we were given lines of direction. The Secretary of State's clear line, as the Chairman said, was that he would be giving directions with regard both to the subcommittees being set up and to a plenary this week to discuss the issues. He indicated that he would not issue a direction until this Committee had discussed the matter of a plenary. That seems to have changed slightly, but his thinking was on the lines that this Committee should discuss it today and then advise him. Maybe he is still waiting for that.

The meeting was useful in the sense that it gave guidance to the Chairs on how to create and facilitate more discussion around the table. The Secretary of State indicated that if the subcommittees are set up, he wants the two Chairs, or Deputy Speakers, to chair them.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Although there appears to be a discrepancy, that is not the case: the Secretary of State can issue a determination today that the Assembly should meet, probably on Thursday or Friday. However, it is up to this Committee to decide what should be on the Order Paper for that meeting. That is the difference. He must give three days' notice to Members of a meeting, but can give notice as late as the day of the plenary meeting as to the subject matter. We can make a decision on that today.

It is clear that the Secretary of State is minded to call a meeting of the Assembly on the work of this Committee and devolution-related issues. Whatever we decide today will be referred to the Business Committee, which meets at 12.30 pm tomorrow. I will be chairing that meeting, because Madam Speaker is not available. After that, it is up to the Business Committee.

Dr McCrea: The Business Committee seems to have little function other than to rubber-stamp things. The Secretary of State appointed the Deputy Speakers to chair this Committee, but with the greatest respect it is not up to them to direct the Committee — and I do not accept that we are to be directed.

The Committee has been given a responsibility and a task that it must fulfil through making decisions by consensus. Nevertheless, the Business Committee should not be sitting there simply to be ordered around. It seems that this Committee can practically tell the Business Committee what to do and the Business Committee facilitates whatever it is ordered to do. One must ask what the Secretary of State sees as the Business Committee's role, other than to be bullied by everyone and told exactly what to do.

A Business Committee has a proper function in any democratic society. It should be allowed to function properly and appropriately without interference from others. Although the Business Committee will certainly accept whatever this Committee sends to it, it should also have the freedom to send business to the Secretary of State in its own right. I thought that the Business Committee was allowed to participate in that process and that the Secretary of State would issue a direction thereafter. The Business Committee seems to have been demoted to something less than what it is supposed to be.

2.15 pm

Dr Farren: The SDLP has made it clear that it wants to see progress. At the last meeting of this Committee, we put forward a motion to try to achieve progress.

Now that the Secretary of State has intervened — and I accept that he intended to be helpful — it would also be helpful to have some clear sense of how he views things. Has he put anything on paper that would clarify what he foresees as the direction of this Committee — which would probably be the easiest thing to understand — and, in particular, how the subcommittees would be established and how they would relate to this Committee and its business? It is to be hoped that they will. According to the communiqué issued by the two Prime Ministers on Thursday, they foresee this Committee being engaged in ongoing work over the next few weeks — in particular, leading to reconvened sessions of the Assembly and a more urgent pace behind all political movement in the autumn.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Dr Farren, you have raised a very important point. I am going to ask Mr Molloy to stay for this discussion, because it will deal with a meeting that we both attended.

The issue of subcommittees came up at the meeting on Thursday, and the Secretary of State may issue a determination on that, but we do not expect that today; however, we expect a ruling this afternoon on the plenary session. He felt that the issue of subcommittees was best left to this Committee, but if we do not make a decision, he could well make a determination that, in addition to the plenary, subcommittees or working groups should deal with specific issues that have arisen during meetings of this Committee.

Mr McFarland: I am worried that we are getting slightly ahead of ourselves. At the last meeting we said that we would decide today what we are going to do, and we have not had that discussion yet. Out of our discussion about where we are going may well come the logic that this Committee would want to involve the wider Assembly membership.

We issued a plea to Sinn Féin at the last meeting — at which John O'Dowd was present — to reconsider their outright opposition to a plenary session towards the end of this week to discuss what is now a substantial body of work. If one reads the Hansard reports, one can see that we have done quite a lot of fairly good work here, and surely that should be enough to persuade Sinn Féin that there are issues that we should share with our colleagues in the wider Assembly.

In addition, at the last meeting we identified broad issues that may require some form of expansion and digging down into because the exact issue was not necessarily clear. The actual problems could be further down and need to be “mined out”, and that might involve further meetings of this Committee or subcommittees over the summer.

Discussions today might result in Sinn Féin accepting that there is a perfectly sensible logic to holding a plenary to discuss the good work that the Committee has done — indeed, we might identify that this Committee has more work to do and we may find a way of carrying that out over the next few months.

I suggest that we discuss the matter, and with a bit of a goodwill all round we could reach agreement, because it would surely be much better if the Committee could agree what it wanted to do rather than having to rely on the Secretary of State to fly in to issue edicts on what he thinks we should be doing.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We are moving towards a discussion on the report from the meeting with the Secretary of State and future business, and it will be difficult to discuss each in isolation. Are members happy enough to have a general discussion on the way forward, including the Secretary of State's determination, rather than simply putting the two items in different silos? What are members' views on that?

Mr Ford: It appears to make sense; they are clearly interrelated.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): As the two have been running together, I think that we should keep Mr Molloy where he is. We may return to a discussion on the meeting, and, when that has finished, we can go back to the main agenda. Are there any other views on that?

Mr Molloy: I will just add to what you said about the Secretary of State's thinking, and what he said he was minded to do. First, he would direct that subcommittees be set up, and, secondly, that there would be a plenary. The Preparation for Government Committee would then deliver reports that could be debated in September plenaries, which would be part and parcel of that.

The Secretary of State also said that he was interested in an earlier plenary, because September is a long way off, and work would need to be done in the summer in order to deliver those reports. If all parties request it, there can be a plenary this week.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Any decision has to be by consensus, but it is clear that even if we do not reach consensus the Secretary of State may take the decision anyway. It is important to realise that we are still bound by those rules.

Mr McNarry, I will give you wide latitude today, because you were cut off last time.

Mr McNarry: I accept your apology, Mr Chairman. [Laughter.]

Dr McDonnell: Could we qualify that, Mr Chairman? Not too wide, because he will take advantage.

Mr McNarry: It makes sense that agenda items 2 and 5 go together and that we treat them as such. I have spoken before of the manner in which the Secretary of State appears to treat us. This sounds like more of the same. He is treating the Assembly with disdain and is making little of the commitment that has already been shown by the Business Committee. He is toying with us on his directives for plenaries.

If I heard Mr Molloy right, the idea is that we can talk and talk, but the discretion of the Secretary of State remains, and he will decide what he is going to do. He would probably be much better with a consensus or a recommendation from this Committee. It appears to me that he would much rather have all the boltholes blocked up, because this Committee would then send its recommendations to the Business Committee for the 12.30 pm meeting. In the meantime, however, a directive from the Secretary of State regarding a plenary may be winging its way to us as we sit. I find all of that hard to tackle in terms of doing business.

Mr Chairman, I understand that there may not have been scope to do it at your most recent meeting with the Secretary of State: but next time, if you find yourself in that position, perhaps you would convey to him that although it is known as his Assembly, it is either totally his to do with as he wishes, or he must give some control to this Committee or the Business Committee. If he does not, Mr Chairman, quite honestly he is toying with us, and I find that very difficult.

Whether or not I am judging on past performance, decisions to move forward have been taken on the basis of consensus. We know, after everyone has had their say, whether we are going to get consensus or not. Yet Hansard will show — because we all like talking, including myself — that after four hours we reached a conclusion that could have been reached in five minutes.

If it is possible, without interfering in anybody's freedom of speech, and while wishing to hear from everybody, the sooner we can move to consensus the better. I would appreciate that very much, because then we would be on a business footing, and we would know where we are going.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I will call Mr Ford next. Then, if anyone wishes to object to having a plenary on Thursday or Friday it would be useful to hear that, so that we know where we stand.

Mr Ford: After many sessions, today we have finally got to the kernel of the issue, which is the role of the Committee and what more it can be expected to do. I mean no insult to the Chairman or the Co-Chairman, but I am unsure whether we will get a definite direction from the Secretary of State or whether he will wait to see if we can reach any consensus in the Committee first.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is highly probable that we will get a direction today that there shall be a plenary this week. The agenda for that will be entirely up to us.

Mr Ford: As others have said, the Secretary of State can do whatever he wishes; that is the nature of the Committee and the Assembly in which we are operating. It is clear from our experience so far that consensus has never been easy, even on relatively uncontentious matters, and it has never been possible on contentious matters.

Alan McFarland referred to the circumstances in which Sinn Féin Members might accept the concept of a plenary. The Secretary of State hinted that others might have to consider their attitude to the potential formation of subcommittees to carry out more detailed work over the summer than has been achieved so far. No one seems to be changing their minds and, if that proposal is presented as a one-off, perhaps parties will enthusiastically embrace that and we will get consensus. The nub of negotiations may be that everyone must accept that if one party gets something, another party will get something else. If the Committee established some consensus on that, weighing one thing against the other rather than taking one thing at a time, we might be able to get past the Secretary of State. However, that depends on whether people are prepared to strike a balance as opposed to considering issues one at a time.

Mr Murphy: Sinn Féin has outlined its position several times in relation to how it sees the Committee doing its business and how that business relates to the wider Assembly. It is fairly straightforward, along the same fashion that other Committees have conducted their business in the previous Assembly: members carry out work, a report is produced, and that report is taken to the Assembly and debated there. We have no difficulty with that.

We have no opposition to plenaries per se, but we are not in the business of playing the shadow-Assembly game of having debates in the Chamber to occupy ourselves or to show a disinterested or cynical public that we are somehow occupying ourselves. Sinn Féin genuinely wanted to come to the Committee to prepare for Government, to deal with the issues that everyone has identified and to get some serious work done so that we can meet the British Government's deadline of 24 November. However, Sinn Féin believes that date could be met much sooner.

Members have done some work in this Committee. We have put forward papers, we have examined each other on the issues that were contained in the papers, but we have not got down to serious engagement. The DUP has told us that it is not here to negotiate, and it is not working to the deadline of 24 November. It considers the work of the Committee as simply to identify the obstacles to the return of devolution.

There are possibilities of the Committee getting down to serious work in the next couple of weeks. We look forward to that and we will be part of that, if that is what people wish, but we have not done any work that would justify rewarding ourselves with a plenary. There is no report; there is simply a series of questions and answers in relation to preliminary papers, and all of us have been publicly identifying those issues for a long time. I am unsure how that would be further developed in a plenary debate, other than by allowing the parties to repeat the same thing but with more Members.

We all identified issues such as peace dividends or economic packages — or however people wish to describe it — and also policing and justice. People need to get down to some serious work on those issues and produce reports, which can then be the subject of debates.

This is not some abnormal opposition to debating in the Chamber; we are simply clear that we neither want, nor will not get into, some form of shadow Assembly in which people justify their existence. We are trying to cobble together some sense of progress in the Committee, and we will work towards that. We want to work with the DUP, and the other parties, to achieve progress.

2.30 pm

We will say it as we see it. Sinn Féin will not be part of tactical engagements to facilitate debates in the Chamber. That is all that we have seen to date: a tactical engagement in this Committee to justify a demand for Assembly debates. When we get beyond that, Sinn Féin will be quite happy to debate in the Chamber the substantive issues on which this Committee has worked in the Chamber. To date, however, that has not happened, and I hope that we get to that point fairly soon.

Sinn Féin must make its own assessment on the work of this Committee. That has begun, and will continue over the summer so that we can see how the prospects for the autumn are shaping up. We are prepared to get down to serious work, but we have not seen any yet. Therefore, we will oppose any notion of a plenary meeting. Sinn Féin's opposition may not matter; if the Secretary of State directs that there will be a plenary on Friday, he can open the Assembly for a debate. However, we will not consent to a plenary on Friday to debate this Committee's work because we do not believe that sufficient work has been done.

Dr McCrea: We have just listened to the usual from Sinn Féin. It has been unwilling to tackle the issues that have been highlighted here. Paramilitarism, criminality, decommissioning and policing are the major obstacles to the restoration of devolution in Northern Ireland. Sinn Féin has not been willing to face those issues, or to even practically acknowledge that they have any credence. Those issues have not gone away, you know. They will not go away until they are dealt with honestly, honourably and democratically. As far as the DUP is concerned, Sinn Féin will not participate in the Government of Northern Ireland until that happens.

I was unable to attend the last Committee meeting. Apparently folks say that most weapons have been decommissioned. However, after the ammunition find in the Irish Republic, the Garda Síochána said that there is much more. The DUP did not say that; even the Independent Monitoring Commission (IMC) did not say it — the guards said it.

There was another revelation at the weekend that a huge arms haul was found in a secret IRA bunker. A source in the Irish Republic said that enough explosives had been found to turn parts of Belfast into a car park. Bomb gear, timers and 500 rounds of ammunition were found. None was rusty and none dated from the periods mentioned in one of our last meetings; they were all up to date and could have been used to catastrophic effect.

This is no joke; this is serious. Anyone who says that the decommissioning of all weapons, from whatever source, is not a serious issue that must be dealt with before there is stability and a democratic Government is blowing and whistling in the wind. That issue must be faced and tackled. With the greatest respect, only Sinn Féin/IRA can deal with that issue over the summer. No one else can do it. Sinn Féin needs to stop this evasion. All that we have got from its pile of the answers is evasion. The public can read the answers that came from the lips of the Sinn Féin spokespersons who attend these Committee meetings. When it came to presentation and examination, the leadership ran away. Evasion will not solve this; Sinn Féin must deal with the obstacles.

With the greatest respect, my colleagues and I were not sent here to negotiate with anybody. We are here to clearly identify the problems that we, and the public, face in establishing a Government. There cannot be a Government unless it is solidly and only built on a democratic foundation that can stand the test. Therefore, the security forces must be supported when they tackle any group, irrespective of who they are, that seeks to undermine the future of any democratic Government.

Criminality and paramilitarism continue and the structure of democracy is being demolished.

I attended a conference in the Great Hall with folks from south and north Armagh who had produced a book entitled 'Legacy of Tears', which is an account of 30 years of Protestant suffering at the hands of Irish republican terrorists in north and south Armagh from 1969 to 1999. I recommend that everyone read that booklet, because it reminds us of the reality of the terrorism that has plagued this country. We want a complete end to that terrorism, whether from republicanism or loyalism; we want there to be no possibility that the nightmare of terrorism and the savage butchery of our people should continue.

I have no doubt that the Secretary of State has an end agenda to which he, along with his leading civil servants, and Dublin are working. However, neither I nor my Committee and Assembly colleagues are nodding dogs for the Secretary of State. We will not nod our heads to his agenda. We have a policy and principles that we have put before the people, and we will not allow those who are wedded to terrorism or who support it to continue to pollute the democratic process in Northern Ireland.

It is a disgrace that the Secretary of State and others have impeded the pathway of the economic working group — which the Secretary of State has acknowledged is under the Business Committee. The economic working group should already have been set up. There is no reason for our having to wait. No instruction has come to this Committee, even though the Secretary of State has been reminded that the Assembly resolved that the Business Committee should take forward the establishment of an economic working group. It is not the business of the Secretary of State: it is the business of the Assembly. The Secretary of State acknowledged that an economic working group was to be set up, yet it is still in abeyance. It is a disgrace that the Secretary of State has prevented the economic working group from having a meeting. Will he get off his backside and give instruction that a working group be set up under the Business Committee? That is the appropriate place for it. Those who have impeded the formation of an economic working group should realise that they do not have to wait for this Committee to act on the matter; the working group should already be under way. Those who do not take the working group seriously have impeded something that is of vital importance to the future stability and prosperity of our country.

The DUP representatives are not here to negotiate. Furthermore, we have no instruction from our party that we are to set up subcommittees through the Preparation for Government Committee. This Committee was to do its own work, not the work that the Secretary of State would like it to do. We are not here as his obedient servants.

Mr McFarland: It is fair to say that, by the end of Wednesday of last week, we had had a fairly good five days and that the Hansard reports of our meetings are fairly substantial documents. I understand that the team that William's party sent here on Wednesday sought a plenary this week. The general belief of four of the five parties present was that it would be extremely healthy for the Assembly to have a plenary sitting before we break for the summer, which we do at the end of this week. If we do not have a plenary by the end of this week, there will be none until September.

Given that four of the five parties on the Committee thought that they had done a fair amount of work, we made a plea to the Sinn Féin representatives to go back to their high command — they were clearly sailing under orders — to get authority to produce something useful from this Committee so that we might have a plenary.

In return, the Democratic Unionist Party might understand the need to investigate some of the issues further. Whether that would be done by subcommittee or by some other means is for the Committee to discuss.

However, I am worried that we are competing to see who is the biggest or the toughest, or to see who can beat their chest the loudest. If we fail to agree a plenary — with the best will in the world, Sinn Féin may be playing the blame game — it is difficult to see how the DUP will agree to any Committee work over the summer. The Secretary of State may direct whatever he wants, but if the DUP fails to appear here, the Committee's usefulness ceases.

The Committee has done much hard work and much good work — it was working well. I return to the question of good faith. We can all play sillies, but serious engagement must be acknowledged. I said it on Wednesday and I shall say it again: for all its noise, the DUP has been engaging seriously in the process in Committee. Its representatives have attended each day, and they have asked questions and been questioned, and they have treated the Committee seriously, as have the rest of the parties. It seems sensible to me that we continue to treat the Committee seriously, but if we want a whole row and are unable to agree a plenary to discuss the issues raised in Committee, we shall all go off for the summer with the public thinking that we are even more useless than they had previously thought.

In Committee on day one, Martin McGuinness said, "If it comes from this Committee, we will be there to debate it." It now turns out that we have all sat here in good faith for five Hansard reports' worth, and Sinn Féin, having told us all that it would debate with us in the Chamber if we did some work, is now being silly about doing that. The Sinn Féin representatives either did not go back to their party, or they did go back and the party has decided to play hardball. That is quite dangerous, because four fifths of no Committee is no Committee, and I am afraid that we need to give the matter some serious thought. The rest of us believe that we should have a plenary to discuss the good work that the Committee has done, and I cannot understand Sinn Féin's reasoning as to why it should want to prevent that happening.

The Secretary of State can call a plenary, and I have no doubt that he will call a plenary, because he has told the Deputy Speakers that he intends to call one. I would rather that that plenary was on business that this Committee had referred than on something that individual Members have submitted to the Business Committee. That is not such a daft idea. It would look much better if this Committee could produce something for a plenary debate rather than have the Secretary of State decide what should be debated.

Dr Farren: As someone who regards himself as a self-respecting Irishman, I am never terribly happy to dance to the dictates of a British Secretary of State. From what Conor and Willie McCrea have both said, we seem likely to find ourselves back in a situation in which we have no discretion on the matter and in which all that we can do is to respond to what a Secretary of State sets down.

Like Alan, I thought that we were reaching a consensus towards the end of last week. Although I have to accept the credentials of the DUP delegates who attend, I am not terribly sure which voices from the DUP really are to be believed, because we hear different emphases, if not completely different messages, coming across the airwaves to those emphases that are delivered here. People agree that there is work for the Committee to do. We heard one of the DUP delegates say last Wednesday that they foresaw work for the Committee over the next few weeks.

I do not in any way deny or want to suggest that the DUP should not bring to the Committee the concerns that it has expressed on arms finds or on other issues linked to paramilitarism that it seems to think are important. However, the Committee cannot resolve those issues, even if we do find ourselves able to negotiate. The DUP would do far better to make its views known to those agencies that at least have some responsibility for overseeing such matters, and to let the Committee get on with what it is able to address.

2.45 pm

One way or another, our presentations have identified a range of issues. I point out, in particular to Sinn Féin, that for over two and a half years, Sinn Féin had a delegate — Dara O' Hagan usually — who sat with representatives of all the other parties that are represented here. They talked about, and ultimately agreed to, a basic framework document on economic regeneration. Is Sinn Féin saying that all that work is not sufficient to be referred to through this Committee to the Assembly, at least for its consideration, so that the responses that would be obtained in the Chamber could be distilled into further work?

That is one of the issues on which a significant amount of progress has been made. Indeed, I have referred several times to the presence at the beginning of May of the Northern Ireland Business Alliance, the very people with whom we worked for two and a half years. Its members presented themselves and their views to us, and asked for our support, without which the ideas in the economic regeneration package, or framework document, could not be progressed.

There is not an awful lot more that needs to, or should, be done on that matter. Perhaps Sinn Féin sent someone who was speaking without authority, but I understood that everything that its delegates said at that series of round-table meetings — many of them intense, over a long period of time — was said with the authority of the party.

Work has been done that looks to the restoration of Government, so it cannot be said to have been something on the margins or something that was simply indulged in for the want of doing something else. That work was serious and has a considerable degree of outside support. Therefore, that could now be referred as a work in progress for further consideration.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The next contributors will be Dr McDonnell, Mr Murphy and Mr McCrea, but I think that we have been here before. I get the impression that, when it comes to a vote, we will not reach consensus on this issue. I suspect that that could happen. Therefore, if Mr Murphy holds to that view, I propose that, after Mr McCrea speaks, unless anyone has anything new to bring to the table on this issue, we will take a decision on the matter of a plenary. Once we have done that, we can move on to what we should do next, based on that decision. I hope that members are happy with that. Dr McDonnell, you have been very patient.

Dr McDonnell: Mr Chairman, I will be very brief, because you are quite right; we have been here before. There are a couple of things that burn me about the issues that we are discussing. First, at street level, people — not just my own friends and supporters, but supporters of the DUP, the UUP, the Alliance Party and Sinn Féin — have one thing in common; they want to see progress. There may be a variation in what each group means by “progress”, but they expect movement. They will be disappointed if we do not get moving.

Secondly, I wish to emphasise that we all, to a greater or lesser extent, resent the puppet-on-a-string position in which we have been placed by the Secretary of State, who is pulling us this way and that, and switching us on and off. However, in spite of that, the beginning of a degree of respect and trust is emerging among parties.

I have a simple question that I want to address to Mr McCrea with all honesty and sincerity, and it is on the issue of residual arms and ammunition that may be out there, which he feels very strongly about. At what point does this issue — and we have heard the reports that he mentioned — create a barrier? Does this create a barrier to our talking and doing some preparatory work?

If I was to follow my own logic through, and I may be wrong in this, the barrier that he suggests is one that should emerge much further down the road. If I read him correctly, it is a barrier to the formation of an Executive or a Government, rather than a barrier to our current talks. At what point does this barrier come in? If it comes in now and prevents us from doing any serious talking and advancing serious engagement here, then to some extent we are wasting our time going round this circuit on a weekly, if not daily, basis.

I respect the feelings of Mr McCrea and his party, and I respect his interpretation, although I may not always agree with him on these things. The important point is that I can accept that from his perspective it is an obstacle to government, but surely it should not be an obstacle to our clearing the way for government.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Dr McCrea, you are the next speaker but one. Do you want to address that?

Dr McCrea: No, I will deal with it when it is my time.

Mr Murphy: I am of the view that our position has been very clear and consistent in relation to what we consider to be progress in this Committee and where that progress will take us. I appreciate Alan McFarland getting agitated about all of this, and there may be a degree of pressure from within his party to have debates in the Chamber. However, we have been very clear. I was not at the last meeting, but I have checked and Alex Maskey made exactly the same comment at the end of that meeting as I have made this week; exactly the same comment that we have made throughout.

Alan might measure progress in terms of hours spent in this room, but I measure progress in the fact that we asked the DUP whether it was serious about 24 November and going back into government. We have had no response. They are not here to negotiate; they are here merely to list the obstacles to devolution as they see them. I do not measure that as progress.

I am at a loss as regards having a plenary debate on Friday. Alan remarked that it might make us look good. We are not in the business of trying to look good. There is either progress or no progress. We are not about wasting our time here. We are about serious engagement with the DUP and the other parties and trying to progress some of these issues, but all we have had so far is a listing of issues that are well out in the public domain anyway. I am happy to stay here to continue that engagement and try to develop it, but it has not yet developed into a serious engagement.

As for importing the work of other Committees or groupings into this Committee and trying to describe it as progress from this Committee that merits a debate: Martin McGuinness suggested that we could have had the work done in relation to an economic package in two days, and other people laughed and scoffed at the idea. If that degree of work is there, let us bring it in.

Let us get the people who are tasked with economic regeneration issues to work on that, and let us get it back as a Committee report and have this Committee look at it and refer it to the Assembly for a plenary sitting, rather than try to import the work that some other Committee has done and describe it as our own in order to claim that there is progress on this Committee. This Committee was set up to prepare for government. That is its title.

People lifted the issues that they wanted to see addressed. A lot of those issues are common, particularly the financial package. That is common to all the parties here. Work can be done on that, on policing and justice and on other issues. Some people think progress is measured by the number of hours that we sit here; that is not the standard of progress that Sinn Féin applies. We apply our standard when there is actual work being done here that merits being brought to the Assembly for debate.

We do not try to look good, nor do we try to convince the public that something is happening when it is not. We are not under that kind of pressure. I do not know why other parties feel that way — perhaps it is the 24 November deadline closing in, with the resultant loss of salaries, constituency support, etc.

If there is progress to be made, we will debate the issues in the Chamber. However, if no progress is being made, we are not afraid to stand up and say so. We do not cobble together the work of other Committees, or fancy up as progress whatever engagement there has been in order to justify ourselves. We want to see progress in this Committee and are willing to stay here over the next weeks. However, it must be said that we have not yet seen the kind of engagement that we want, and that we outlined at the outset.

Dr McCrea: My leader, after a meeting with the Secretary of State, the Prime Minister and the Prime Minister of the Irish Republic, said that he was under no pressure. I can assure you that I am under no pressure from my colleagues. In their last meeting, my colleagues kept in constant contact during that entire day. Therefore, we were absolutely as one.

Let me remind you of what Mr Hay said:

“If, for whatever reason, people are being obstructive, my party would have to decide whether there is any point in sitting on this Committee if we cannot debate in the Chamber.” — [Official Report, Bound Volume 19, page CPG 201]

He then said:

“If people are saying that good, reasonable work and progress on the issues have been conducted in this Committee, it might be useful to have a reasonable, sensible debate in the Chamber. There is no point in the DUP’s staying on this Committee if there is no debate in the Chamber.” — [Official Report, Bound Volume 19, page CPG 201]

I heartily agree with my colleague. There are no mixed signals; that is clearly the position of every one of us, and it is a sensible position, because there is no use in pretending that something wonderful is happening.

When we sought clarity on Sinn Féin’s position concerning the IRA, their weapons and the rest of it, all we got was evasion. Did they do it for the IRA? Were the instructions from the IRA? Was the person a criminal or not? If they did it for their own personal gain, they could be considered a criminal. However, as long as robbing banks, extorting money, evading tax, money laundering and fuel laundering were carried out under the instruction of the IRA, those were not crimes.

Those people are supposed to be partners in a democratic Government, and we are meant to see that they are ready for that. That is their up-to-date position, expounded only a week ago in this Committee. The persons who do those things, as long as they have the cover of the IRA, are not criminals.

I want to see progress. In fact, I suggest that the unionist community wants it more than most, because it has been at the receiving end of the Provisional IRA murder campaign for 35 years.

However, even in this Committee, there are those who are unwilling to face the issues. They will talk about anything and everything except the real issues. I have the greatest respect for others, but none for Sinn Féin/IRA. Do not expect me to turn into someone who has.

I do not accept Sinn Féin as another democratic party on the same lines as the SDLP, the Ulster Unionist Party and the Alliance Party. I do not accept that it has moved away from its inextricable link with the Provisional IRA. Therefore — and we make this abundantly clear — we will not get into government and we are not tied to 24 November, even though the Secretary of State has tied himself to that date.

We are tied to getting a democratic settlement in Northern Ireland, based on the solid foundation of democracy alone, with no knobs on. With the greatest respect, I remind Dr McDonnell that it was the guns issue that four times brought down the Executive. When are the SDLP going to face that?

The truth of the matter is that we have been lied to; the IICD told us that all the guns were gone. Yet the Garda Síochána said just last week that there are a lot more out there. Who am I supposed to believe? If we have turned the corner, if the IRA is no more and if the war is over, then what does the IRA want with guns and bombs and timers? Those guns were found thanks to an informer.

3.00 pm

We need to get guns out of politics and to ensure that the only basis for any party getting into government is its democratic principles, not the number of its guns or the size of its bombs. The tragedy of this situation is that our Government have not forced Sinn Féin into that position, rather they have kowtowed and crawled to Sinn Féin over the last number of years even when they were reminded after the ceasefire, in the famous words:

"They haven't gone away, you know."

That was the Provisional IRA. So it sits in the wings. What would terrorists linked to a political party have for the future of Northern Ireland other than their terrorism?

I want to see progress and a devolved Government but on the solid basis of democracy and democracy alone. I believe that there are other parties around the table that want that too. Some are willing to take a gamble. The Ulster Unionists under Mr Trimble took a gamble — "we'll jump; now it is up to you" — and the Provos and Sinn Féin laughed at them. I can assure you that we will not allow the people to be lifted up and thrown down again. Whatever is resolved for the future of Northern Ireland, we will ensure that it will be something that we can build upon with a peaceful society for everyone, irrespective of your political philosophy or where you hang your hat on a Sunday. The only basis on which you will challenge one another will be on the basis of the argument not on the power of the bomb or the bullet. That is the democratic society that I believe in with all my heart, as do many others.

However, it is no good closing our eyes. I heard Sinn Féin say today that it is not afraid to stand up — well, neither am I. Should I be standing on my own, I shall not be afraid to say exactly what needs to be done. Sinn Féin must get rid of the philosophy that if an instruction comes from the Provos telling you that you can rob a bank or extort money or threaten people and not be considered a criminal, it is all right because you are doing it for the cause. There is no cause that does those things in a democratic society. That is why it is imperative that any Government here is based on a democratic foundation with the full backing of the forces of law and order so that those who threaten democracy will be put down and defeated, which will allow that democracy to grow. That is what I stand for.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We are going round in circles. We are all trying to get consensus, and it is fairly clear the direction in which this is going. Mr Kennedy has a proposal that may move things on.

Mr Kennedy: I am not sure if it will move things on. However, having listened carefully to what has been said, I think is time to put proposals and see what emerges after that.

I propose that this Committee recommend to the Business Committee that a take-note debate be held in the Assembly to consider the Hansard reports produced by the Preparation for Government Committee and that this Committee proceed to conduct ongoing business and establish all necessary subcommittees to bring forward the work of the Preparation for Government Committee.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Did everybody get that?

Mr Kennedy: I am happy for that to be tweaked — not substantially changed, but perhaps tweaked.

Mr McFarland: Could the wording at the beginning of Mr Kennedy's second motion be changed? The motion mentions "the Committee". It should be made clear that the motion refers to the Preparation for Government Committee; as it stands, it could mean the Business Committee.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That has been amended.

Are all members clear on that proposal? I am not asking for views on the proposal; I am asking whether members are clear on it. Does the proposal contain anything new to anyone who feels desperately that they must raise another issue?

Is there consensus on Mr Kennedy's motion?

Mr Murphy: I could certainly not consent to the first part of Mr Kennedy's motion, although I could consent to the second part.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is quite clear that there is not consensus on that motion.

Are there any other proposals? Mr Murphy hinted at a motion earlier — I do not know whether he intended it to be so — suggesting that this Committee sets out terms of reference to examine the economic issues identified by the parties in the Preparation for Government Committee. I was not quite certain whether that was a motion.

Mr Murphy: No. I was referring to how this Committee will conduct its future business as part of that discussion. Sinn Féin envisages, and has maintained all along, that this Committee needs to examine some of the issues that are common to us all. Sinn Féin has no difficulty in facing the issues that people want addressed.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): As it stands, there are no further proposals. Is there any other matter on which a member wishes to make a proposal? Any proposals must be substantially different from Mr Kennedy's in order to be considered.

Mr McFarland: It is clear that there is no agreement within the Committee on proposals to have a plenary. If the Secretary of State directs that there shall be a plenary, does the Committee have a view on whether the subject of that plenary should be decided by the Business Committee? We are not discussing whether a plenary should take place, but what should happen in the event of the Secretary of State directing that a plenary will take place. Would the Preparation for Government Committee wish the Assembly to have a take-note debate on its work so far?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do members have any views on that?

Mr Murphy: Sinn Féin's previous view stands: we would be quite happy to debate any work that the Committee had done that was worthy of a debate. However, in our view, the Committee has not yet done any such work. It is quite simple: this is a hypothetical situation, no matter how hard people try to dress it up and turn it around. Sinn Féin will be quite happy for a plenary debate to be held when this Committee gets down to serious work and produces reports. To date, however, this Committee has not done that.

The DUP has given a clear signal that it has no intention of getting down to serious work. I noticed that Mr Kennedy's was phrased so that the DUP was not asked whether it was interested in establishing subcommittees. We will, no doubt, return to that issue at some stage. When this Committee gets down to serious work and produces reports, those reports can be debated.

Sinn Féin is not interested in attending plenary debates for the sake of repeating in the Chamber the same things that have been said here and trying to justify its own existence. However, Sinn Féin would be content to take part in plenary debates that have some purpose and substance.

Mr McFarland: If the Secretary of State wishes there to be a debate, and makes such a direction, either he will have to direct that the Assembly hold a take-note debate on the work of this Committee thus far or the Business Committee will have to choose one of the other motions already before it.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr McFarland, is it your view that, if the direction is received, the Business Committee should recommend a motion?

Mr McFarland: I sense that the Business Committee will not fare any better than this Committee, because it also relies on consensus for motions.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): No. The Business Committee goes round the table, but it does not have to reach a consensus. Unanimity is not required, and the Committee can make recommendations. Both Deputy Speakers are in attendance at Business Committee meetings, and I am absolutely certain that, at every meeting, one party reiterates its views on plenary sittings. The other four parties state that they wish to make recommendations to the Secretary of State.

Mr McFarland: However, it is the Secretary of State's decision whether or not to accept those recommendations.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes, it is his decision. The Business Committee does not have a complete blocking mechanism; it can make recommendations to the Secretary of State. If this Committee cannot reach a consensus, it cannot make recommendations.

Mr McCarthy: Can the Secretary of State refuse to accept recommendations?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): He has refused to do that. However, the Business Committee has the opportunity to make recommendations to him.

Mr McNarry: The Secretary of State may take the view, contrary to the view of Sinn Féin, that serious work has been done in this Committee. He may, therefore, call for a plenary sitting on Friday to debate that work. I take it that Sinn Féin would not take part in that debate. Is the Secretary of State waiting for our decision, not on whether we agree on a motion for debate but on whether we agree, in principle, to having a debate at all? If that is the case, can we have a five-minute break to ascertain whether the Secretary of State's direction is on its way and whether he needs to be told what we have done before anything is expedited?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We anticipate that the Secretary of State will issue a direction this afternoon for a plenary sitting on Friday; no motion will be attached to the direction. We had anticipated that the direction would have been brought into the Committee as we met. That has not yet happened, but it is pretty clear that it will happen. If we do not make a decision, the Business Committee will have to do that tomorrow. It can make a recommendation, by majority opinion, to the Secretary of State.

This issue was discussed at our meeting with the Secretary of State last Thursday, because we knew that it was unlikely that we would reach a consensus. He is aware of that likely lack of consensus, which is why he is using this mechanism to ensure a plenary sitting before the recess. That is my understanding of the situation, but I shall ask Mr Molloy for clarification.

Mr Molloy: That is exactly the position. The Secretary of State was minded to make a direction on the subcommittees and the plenary sitting before the end of this session of the Assembly.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We are in the position of nothing having been agreed. If a plenary sitting is imposed on us, there will clearly be no consensus on what the business should be. Please speak up if I am wrong, but that is my view. We have no proposals for business for a plenary sitting. Does anyone want to make a proposal, or will we simply move on and accept whatever happens?

The Ulster Unionist Party delegation put a question to Sinn Féin about attendance at a plenary sitting. Does Sinn Féin wish to answer that question?

Mr Murphy: I do not know whether the question was addressed directly to us. If a plenary sitting is called for Friday, Sinn Féin will not attend. Our position has been consistent; if a plenary is called to debate an issue that has resulted from a substantive piece of work, we will participate. However, if people are calling for debates simply for the sake of having debates or to reward themselves for having sat through nine of these Committee meetings, Sinn Féin will not be there.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Kennedy, do you have another proposal?

Mr Kennedy: I do not have another proposal; my previous proposal did not get very far.

It appears that the Secretary of State is to issue a direction on a plenary and the establishment of a subcommittee.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes, but we do not expect to receive the direction on the second issue today.

Mr Kennedy: With the lack of consensus in the Committee, we appear to have reached a considerable deadlock. Sinn Féin has stated that it will not attend the plenary, and it is difficult to imagine how we could allow the Secretary of State to establish a subcommittee when we are not prepared to do so ourselves.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): At the meeting, the Secretary of State said that he could not force anyone to attend anything. Therefore, he cannot force any party to attend the plenary or to nominate representatives to the proposed subcommittee.

Mr Kennedy: Therefore, the likelihood is that if the Committee is not already in a deadlock situation, it is fast approaching one.

3.15 pm

Mr Chairman (Mr Wells): Of course, that is subject to the consideration of other business on the agenda, but it is a view that could be held.

Are there any other contributions on this issue? It is looking inevitable that we will not have anything to refer to the Business Committee. Is everyone agreed that that is the case?

Members indicated assent.

Having agreed that, our discussion of the meeting with the Secretary of State is complete. We will move on to future work for the Committee, particularly how we should deal with the Prime Minister's statement.

Mr McNarry: Will the Committee meet tomorrow?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will decide that when we have ascertained whether we need a meeting.

Members will have received a copy of the statement and work plan that were sent out with the Committee papers. I think that other MLAs received them as well. Members may wish to discuss the future work of the Committee, taking the statement and work plan into account. Also, members will remember that, at the last meeting, it was agreed that every MLA would be given an opportunity to read the Hansard report.

I am extremely grateful to the Hansard staff who managed to get all the material out to MLAs by Saturday morning — certainly, mine arrived on Saturday morning. I am sure that members read every word of the Hansard reports over the weekend — or, at least for some of us, on Saturday — and have, therefore, familiarised themselves with the contents. The idea behind issuing the Hansard reports was to allow that to happen and to give those MLAs who are not members of this Committee the chance to make their views known at their party meetings.

Do members wish to discuss the two sets of documents?

Mr McFarland: I presume that the Wednesday Hansard is not yet closed to suggested amendments, as the others, presumably, are by now. In fact, the others have been printed and issued. Am I right?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes.

Mr McFarland: My party meeting is not until tomorrow morning, but I have spoken at length to party members. The Hansard reports are there for the record. Are we now discussing what the Committee does from here?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes, and there is another issue that we need to mention. On Thursday, all five parties met the Prime Minister and the Irish Prime Minister. Members may wish to report their views on those meetings. Those are the three items that we can throw into the pot and discuss to see whether we can distil a way forward for the Committee.

Mr McFarland: A number of issues are not necessarily crystal clear. For example, have we identified the issue that needs to be solved or is there a broad issue that needs to be solved? There are clearly areas that we need to discuss at some point. The hard bit is working out what constitutes sensible discussion — with all five parties here, that seems to be a good idea — and identifying the areas that the DUP will not negotiate in this forum and from which it might shy away. Obviously, there may be issues that it will not wish to discuss.

Therefore, it might be useful to identify whether all the parties are willing to mine down into the areas that we have identified. This would confirm whether those are the problem areas or whether particular parts of those areas are the problem.

We have all had a general canter through the issues with the parties and have asked questions. However, there are things that are not yet clear.

There is still work to be done, but, not wishing to repeat what I have said previously, other members in our parties are better qualified in some of those areas. It was agreed early on that, if particular topics were discussed on which present members of the delegations were not expert, we might include people who were experts in party delegations.

It would be useful if we could identify the areas for further discussion. By and large, and whether or not we agree with them, those areas have been agreed as being problematic for one party or another. Where there are areas of common agreement, those matters could be set aside. The ministerial code is one such issue; as far as I can gather, all parties are agreed on that. I suspect that the Government will have produced a ministerial code. Would it be worthwhile for the Committee to ask for that so that it could be agreed and parked?

There is work to do over the summer. However, we must look very carefully to the delegations to ensure continuity. There is a danger that issues discussed during the last three weeks may be revisited if new teams come to the Committee because current members are on holiday. Even though they may have full authority from their parties, new members may feel the need to beat their chests to show that they are as good as their predecessors. A lack of continuity could cause problems.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Clerks have read the Hansard reports and have produced a list of the headings of the subjects raised. It is quite extensive, running to 25 headings, but there are no great surprises. They are listed alphabetically and in no order of priority; some examples are the Belfast Agreement, a bill of rights, and the Civic Forum. The list will be given to Members.

That list does not change the table of issues: the Clerks have simply gone through the Hansard reports and come up with main headings raised by each party. Members may wish to have a brief look at the list.

Dr Farren: Although I am glad that we are getting down to this task, is there a clear willingness to engage in whatever debate may transpire around any or all of those issues? From the hiatus created by our failure to agree on the previous issue, the question of whether all parties are willing to contribute to further discussion in this Committee in whatever format we decide — whether it is in plenary or through subcommittees — has yet to be clarified. Before we get into the issues that need to be discussed, we must know whether we are all prepared to put our weight behind the wheel and participate further. I thought we were coming close to a full stop about 10 minutes ago. I do not want that to happen, but we must know whether we are discussing matters that will be taken forward.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Clerks have kindly identified four core issues that members agreed were important and needed to be clarified: economic regeneration; devolution of policing and justice; the institutions, both North/South and east-west; and the Programme for Government. That does not pre-empt anyone's view on whether we go forward at all to discuss those, and in what mode. However, it should be put on record that the Clerks have identified those issues.

We now move on to the substantive issues. Do members wish to go forward to deal with those, and if so, in what mode? Remember that there must be consensus.

Mr McFarland: I am slightly worried. On Wednesday, I spoke at length about the comprehensive agreement, including issues relating to the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. Those do not appear to feature.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): North/South and east-west issues and the comprehensive agreement come under the heading of 'Institutions'.

Mr McFarland: The comprehensive agreement was the follow-on from the Belfast Agreement, which is listed, and encompasses all sorts of issues that are listed elsewhere. It was a major issue on Wednesday: you will find it mentioned throughout most of Hansard. I am worried that putting the comprehensive agreement under the heading of 'Institutions' means that we all have to guess where it is. The same applies to the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister issue. That is on a par with the bill of rights and the Civic Forum. Those are all in the comprehensive agreement but have been listed separately. May I have those included, please? As you will see from Hansard, they are key issues.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): OK. Is everyone agreed?

If a party believes something to be important, we must accept that as its perception.

Dr Farren: My question stands, Chairman. Before we add to or subtract from this list, we need to discuss it. There is no point to having a list if we are not going to discuss it.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We should at least let individuals know that if we were to agree a model for discussions, that is the sort of thing that we would discuss. However, again that requires consensus.

The four common issues are economic regeneration, devolution of policing and justice, institutions, including North/South and east-west issues, and A Programme for Government/priorities for Government as per the Prime Ministers' work plan.

All parties identified those as important issues that must be resolved.

Dr McCrea: Why are we coming back to that? Why have we not allowed the establishment of an economic regeneration committee, which was supposed to operate under the Business Committee? That work could be done in the summer. It seems that no one is willing to take it on and that either the Secretary of State is sitting on his backside or hands in relation to that, or he is not allowing the Business Committee to take it forward.

This Committee forwarded the matter to the Business Committee. Why has it stopped there? What is the motive behind that? We say that we are concerned about economic issues and the business fraternity and that Assembly Members could start work on that over the summer. Why has that not happened?

Mr McFarland: I do not understand why, because this Committee backed it, but there was no cross-community support, as both Sinn Féin and the SDLP objected to it at the Business Committee. So, even if four members of that Committee had agreed and one had not, it could not have gone forward to the Secretary of State.

Dr McCrea: The question of establishing an economic regeneration committee arose from a debate in the Assembly and went from there to the Business Committee. Then the Secretary of State started messing around and brought it to this Committee. We sent it to the Business Committee, and in a letter the Secretary of State said that he would instruct the Speaker to take it forward. Why has that not happened? It should be moving along.

Those who pretend to be concerned about economic issues have put a block on the establishment of that committee because they want the issue to sit here — even though it was sent from here to the Business Committee to take it forward. People are messing around. They are not going to play games — certainly not with the DUP. It was supposed to have happened. The business community was supposed to sit with Assembly Members and take that forward. That could have started in May, but there has been fooling around.

What is this Programme for Government that everybody has identified in the list of issues?

3.30 pm

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Programme for Government/priorities for Government was identified as an issue by all parties

Dr McCrea: When did all parties list that as an issue?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Prime Ministers issued a work plan.

Dr McCrea: As far as we are concerned, they did not issue it to us. The first that we heard from the Prime Minister is in this letter.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That work plan was issued to all members. It was attached to the statement that was issued after the meeting on Thursday.

Dr McCrea: When did I, or my party delegation, mention the Programme for Government?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That was raised by the Prime Minister.

Dr McCrea: It was said that the parties mentioned the Programme for Government, which is why it was included in the list of issues.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): You are correct. I should have said that the first three points were common to all parties. The fourth point was raised by the Prime Ministers. You are absolutely correct; that was my mistake.

Lord Morrow: Does that heading need to be changed?

Dr Farren: The DUP talked about a financial package. There are various ways of describing economic regeneration. One can use the term “financial package” if it encompasses what economic regeneration is about. As far as the SDLP is concerned, that would be part of a Programme for Government. The administration of available resources must be part of a Programme for Government; that cannot be done separately. We can have ideas about economic regeneration, which would form part of a Programme for Government.

Mr McNarry: If we do nothing else today, can we clear up the situation of a financial package and economic regeneration? I share Mr McCrea’s exasperation about this, and he is right to ask where it stands.

My colleague, Mr McFarland, is also right in that when the issue was discussed, the Committee, to all intents and purposes, reached a consensus. My recollection is that this Committee adjourned because there was a meeting of the Business Committee at 12.30 pm. We adjourned; the Business Committee met. It was then reported, much to the surprise of Seán Farren, that his colleagues on the Business Committee did not share the same opinion as the SDLP members in this Committee. I commented that SDLP members here are talking with a different tongue to SDLP members in the Business Committee.

Will this item be on the Business Committee’s agenda when it meets tomorrow? Could we agree that we should let the Business Committee know that we would like that pushed forward?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is worth mentioning that the Committee discussed this issue on the 20 June and consensus was not reached. A decision has been made on this issue, although several groups in this Committee did not like it. Would you like a second decision to be taken?

Mr McNarry: I thought that consensus had not been reached on whether to have a debate because the Sinn Féin delegation decided that it was not prepared to allow such a debate.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I will read the minute. It states that:

"1. The Committee considered a letter from the Speaker to the Committee enclosing correspondence she had received from the Secretary of State about the establishment of the working group on the economy.

2. Dr McCrea proposed that the Committee asks the Secretary of State by direction to set up the working group on the economy and invite the Business Committee to determine membership and arrangements for the chairing of the Committee.

There was not consensus and the proposal fell."

Mr McNarry: We are jolly fortunate that the leak to Mark Devenport does not seem to have highlighted our inability to address this issue. The business community must think that we are a quite pathetic lot, in that the Assembly makes recommendations, which are then blocked because of party politics.

I am only asking for a direction. If you are telling me that we cannot go back on it, then I accept your ruling. We have talked about financial packages and economic regeneration again this afternoon, and there seems to be a consensus that there is a need to address those matters. We are falling down on the vehicle with which to address them. Is it not possible that, given that those issues are so important, that consensus could go back from us to the Business Committee? If we cannot do it, I accept your ruling.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The next two members to speak are Mr Murphy and Mr McCrea, and perhaps we will tease out a consensus on this issue.

Mr Murphy: Just to correct the recollection, the letter from the Speaker reflected on two options offered by the Secretary of State to take the proposal forward. One was a separate committee and the other was a subcommittee of this Committee. We argued at the time — and the logic still stands — that if all of the parties have listed this as an important issue for preparation for government, which they have done, the logical thing would be that a subcommittee would report back to this Committee and then to the Assembly. At the Business Committee, the SDLP also agreed that that was the better of the two options, but we did not get agreement from the other parties as to which option to go for.

Dr McCrea: It is correct that four groupings agreed to send the matter to the Business Committee and that recommendations would be formed there. That included the Ulster Unionists, Alliance, the SDLP and the DUP. I am led to believe that when the proposal went to the Business Committee, those four went down to three when the SDLP delegation changed its mind. If we have to look at the record we will find out exactly who did or did not agree. The truth of the matter is that this should have gone ahead in May.

The Secretary of State has to carry some of the responsibility. He muddied the waters, because the matter went straight from the Assembly to the Business Committee, and at least it was being taken forward at that time. Then it was put back for further discussion to allow this Committee to be established. It was established, and then we saw different shenanigans taking place thereafter. The matter ought to be sent back to the Business Committee, which should be asked to put it into action.

That can be done, and it would be good to get the Secretary of State's letter to Mrs Bell out as well, just to see exactly what he did say on the matter, because he was instructing the Speaker to set that up. That is what it said in his letter.

Mr Murphy: Is Dr McCrea making a proposal?

Dr McCrea: Yes, I am.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is there a consensus on Dr McCrea's proposal?

Mr Murphy: This proposal has already gone to the Business Committee. It has been discussed here, and discussed there. There was no agreement on how it was to be carried forward. There were two options. We have it listed here as an option or a topic of interest. We argued all along that it should be treated as a topic of interest for this Committee. There was no consensus in the Business Committee as to which of the two options was the best. There was a difference of opinion. I cannot see that sending it back to the Business Committee will produce a different result.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): So there is no consensus.

Mr Murphy: No.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Clerks have kindly advised me that there are several options before us. We could set up our own subcommittee, or, as a Committee, we could deal with this issue as a substantive agenda item. In other words, economic regeneration would become one of the issues that we would deal with over the summer. Allied to that, we could invite the economic experts in our parties.

I am only putting those out as the options that are available. As Chairman, I cannot make any proposals, but whatever we decide, it must be by consensus. If we do not, it will not be carried forward. It is as simple as that.

Dr McCrea: That is exactly what was suggested. It is nothing new. That is exactly what the other committee was to do; it was to bring in experts from the parties and from the business community.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The fundamental difference, Dr McCrea, is that that would be driven by this Committee rather than a separate economic development committee elected from the Assembly.

Dr McCrea: There has not been consensus; therefore that does not stand. As the Chairman said, the decision has been made. After debating the issue, it was decided by four parties to one that the Business Committee was the proper and appropriate place to take forward the establishment of a working group.

Mr Murphy: There cannot be consensus to send something back if all the parties do not agree to it.

Dr McCrea: There was not consensus — I said that it was decided by four parties to one.

Mr Murphy: One cannot take action based on a ratio of four parties to one.

Mr Kennedy: I would like clarification. Will a subcommittee address the issue or will that be the main work of the Preparation for Government Committee?

Dr McCrea: The Business Committee will address the matter.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The two options have been tabled to help to direct members' thoughts, but, again, we need consensus. As it does not look as if we will get that, we will ask the Business Committee to set up an economic working group.

Mr McFarland: It was referred back to the Business Committee because we could not get consensus, but the Business Committee could not reach consensus either. Technically, it is now a matter for the Secretary of State or for this Committee; all of us would like the issue to be addressed as it is on our agenda, notwithstanding all that has gone before. Is there any need for us to examine economic regeneration or financial packages as part of this exercise? We have all identified the topic and it is on our agenda separately from the debate that took place in the Assembly. The record of the Assembly debate is sitting on the Secretary of State's desk, so it is up to him whether he establishes a committee, separate or otherwise, to take forward that issue. The issue is also on our agenda, because it has been identified in discussions around this table. One could argue that those are separate issues. The report is sitting on the Secretary of State's desk but nothing is happening, as he seems to be reluctant to establish a committee; however, the issue needs to be discussed at some level as part of our deliberations because it is on the list and all the parties brought it up. Therefore we either leave it with the Secretary of State in the hope that he will do something about it at some stage, or we address it as part of our discussions in this Committee or in a subcommittee.

Dr Farren: I remind members who have been quick to try to identify where the SDLP stood on this issue some weeks ago that I recognised then, as I recognise now, the impasse that we were in. I stated that the SDLP's preference was for the work to be taken forward through the Preparation for Government Committee either in plenary or in subcommittee. However, recognising that we were not going to get consensus or a clear way forward through the Business Committee, I proposed a compromise whereby the Business Committee and the Preparation for Government Committee could take the issue forward together. We did not say one thing here and say something different in the Business Committee. The SDLP put forward a helpful compromise, but it failed. There was no point in the Business Committee's moving ahead with something that was equally likely to fail. We are now in the same position as we were four weeks ago. I recognise that the same arguments about how we proceed will lead us into the same impasse; therefore I have contributed little to this part of the debate. The SDLP was trying to be helpful; it is not in the business of one hand not knowing what the other is doing.

3.45 pm

Mr McNarry: If we are dealing with the three main issues that the Prime Minister laid down, plus this one, how will the Committee deal with other matters? Will it do everything in the same way? In other words, if the Committee feels that it could deal with this matter, it needs to be clear and consistent in what it does, given that it is being asked to deal with devolution, policing and justice, as well as the institutions and North/South and east-west matters. We are unlikely to have any of those issues debated by the Assembly, because there will not be consensus for that. We are also unlikely to reach consensus to break into subcommittees to discuss those three main issues. What is to stop this Committee from taking the financial package and economic regeneration issue and deciding that it will prepare the report and take expert witness evidence?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): If, by consensus, we agreed to bring in our economic experts to help with that, there would be absolutely nothing to stop the Committee from doing that. We have four simple options: set up a subcommittee; take it as a substantive item for the Committee to deal with; do nothing at all; or, given that we may not have had the chance to consult our parties on the issue, we could defer it. I get the impression that there have not been too many group meetings today, so it may be an option to adjourn so that we can consult our parties.

Mr McFarland: I would like to ask William McCrea about subcommittees. Part of the difficulty that we will have is that a substantial number of issues clearly need some sort of discussion. My sense is that we will not have a massive number of meetings over the summer with people coming back and forward and going here and there etc, but it would be good to have some meetings, if everyone is happy with that. Therefore, it may well be that, in order to get the ground covered on those different issues, there may be some merit in looking at the Committee's taking on the large issues such as those that Mr McNarry mentioned. Perhaps subcommittees of experts from our parties could examine the areas in which they have an expertise.

What are William's latest thoughts on how we proceed? At one stage, there was a suggestion that, so far as the Democratic Unionist Party was concerned, there would not be any subcommittees because that party would not be comfortable with that. Is that still the case, or is there wisdom and merit in examining whether we need to bring colleagues into subcommittees to discuss some of the topics, rather than taking up time from this Committee's dealing with larger issues?

Dr McCrea: I have no authority whatsoever to make any determination or agreement about subcommittees. Our party will not meet until Friday, if there is a plenary. Our colleagues are in other places and no Assembly group meeting has been called.

However, there is nothing to stop the Secretary of State from doing that. The Assembly referred the matter to the Business Committee, which was unable to reach consensus. The Secretary of State then lifted the economic package and sent it up to this Committee, there was no consensus, and it was sent back down to the Business Committee. There is absolutely nothing to stop us from sending the matter back to the Secretary of State and requesting that he set up an economic committee.

Make no mistake: he has not turned down that possibility. He was waiting for the Business Committee to refer the matter to him, but it could not agree to do so. There is nothing to prevent the Secretary of State from setting up an economic working group. Since he was flexing his muscles and since he told us in his determination that he was going to set up committees, let us find out exactly what he does. This is his test.

Mr McFarland: The matter is with the Secretary of State for his decision. My worry is that if he has not made a decision — and, clearly, he has not — can we find out whether he intends to do so? If the Secretary of State is determined not to make a decision, the Committee cannot ignore that. It is, after all, a major issue in which the business community has been involved. I am not sure that we can ignore the issue on the off chance that the Secretary of State might, at some time, decide to act. It would be useful to know whether he intends to establish such a working group. However, the issue has been round everyone and is now back on his desk.

Dr McCrea: With the greatest respect, I thought that the import of the report that the Deputy Speakers gave us was that either we would have subcommittees or that the Secretary of State would set them up.

Mr McFarland: He was talking about subcommittees of this Committee.

Dr McCrea: Yes, but he has the authority to set up any subcommittees —

Mr McFarland: Yes, but he is refusing to do that.

Dr McCrea: He has not acted because he is waiting to see whether we would refer the matter, but we have not been able to reach consensus and neither has the Business Committee. However, it is within the power of the Secretary of State to set up a working group. If he believes that this matter is important, there is nothing to prevent him from ensuring that an economic working group be set up to start its work. It has already been agreed that Assembly Members would be off from 7 July to 4 September — I think that that is in the letter. Some Members are already away. Let us not say that they should forgo their rights — just because the Secretary of State and everybody else forget about them — to debate the matter in the Chamber. There is nothing to prevent the Secretary of State from ensuring that an economic working group be set up to work with the business community and its experts.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I will refer to Thursday's meeting for clarification. If the Secretary of State issues a directive that subcommittees be established, it is inevitable that one of them will be on economic matters; it is unimaginable that that would not happen. Perhaps that is the reason —

Dr McCrea: The Secretary of State knows that there is an impasse in this Committee. Therefore if he is really interested, he should remove the matter from the contentiousness that exists between the political parties and set up a committee to deal directly with economic issues.

Mr McNarry: Is it clear, Chairman, that he will not issue such a directive for another week or 10 days?

Dr McCrea: If he did issue a directive in 10 days' time, we would be better off than we are now. We started in the month of May and now we are in the month of July, yet the Secretary of State has done nothing.

Dr Farren: Neither have we.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I came away with —

Dr McCrea: With the greatest respect, I would like to respond to that. We cannot have it both ways. Certain of your statements say that we have done some things and that we are moving on. You praise one day, only to cut the feet from under us the next. Make up your mind. Scripture says that:

“A double-minded man is unstable in all his ways”.

Therefore if you have two double minds on it —

Dr Farren: I question my stability every time I leave this place.

Dr McCrea: Do you want to stop the meeting? We can do that if the member wants.

Mr McNarry: Seán Farren should go back to Parnell.

Mr Dallat: Kitty O’Shea.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Where do we go from here? Do we want subcommittees, do we want this Committee to take the subject on board, do we do nothing at all, or do we adjourn to consult our parties?

Mr McFarland: William told us that his party has not been able to consider the matter yet. There are logical arguments for taking issues forward either as this Committee — and there is merit in that suggestion — or as a subcommittee in order to involve others. It would be useful for us to discuss that proposal with our parties because it is clear that this Committee cannot currently make decisions.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): To clarify, what do you intend to consult your parties about, and when?

Mr McFarland: The Committee might meet tomorrow, and our Assembly group’s meeting normally takes place on Tuesday mornings. Our party group is agreed that we need to take the matter forward. There is no doubt that the Committee needs to examine and expand on some issues. Therefore, by and large, we would be happy enough to take the matter forward, because certain issues require further discussion. We have no objection in principle to the establishment of a working group.

As William has just told us, the Democratic Unionist Party clearly needs to discuss the issues. I do not know the other parties’ positions.

Mr Murphy: We are happy to allow other people to go off and consult. We want to get down to work, and we have already advocated the best way of getting down to that work.

Although William says that there is nothing to prevent the Secretary of State from following a course of action, our party’s opinion and that of the SDLP should prevent him. We were offered two options, and we opted for one of those. The Democratic Unionist Party and the Ulster Unionist Party opted for the other option, and the Alliance Party — without my trying to state its position — would perhaps have been happy with either. There is a job of work to be done, and we have always advocated the way in which we see that work going. We are happy to decide now, but if other parties want to consult on the structure of the working group, we are happy to return to make a decision in a future meeting.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do we have consensus that parties should be given time to consult? Is there any objection to that?

Mr Dallat: How much time shall we allow for consultation?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is a matter —

Dr McCrea: With the greatest respect, Mr Deputy Speaker, it is not a matter of whether you give the parties time to consult. As far as we are concerned, we will take the time to consult with our party, and we are not taking a gift from anybody.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Parties can of course consult. Mr Dallat asked on what date the Committee would resume after parties had been consulted.

Mr Kennedy: It would appear, Mr Chairman, that the earliest day on which we could meet would be next Monday.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is looking like that, because one party group does not meet until Friday, one meets tomorrow, and I do not know when the SDLP is meeting.

Mr Kennedy: There is potentially a plenary on Friday.

Dr Farren: If there is a plenary on Friday, I do not know what the urgency is to meet this week. I am happy enough for the Committee to meet if it is necessary, but, given what Mr McCrea has said, the DUP will not be in a position to advise us of its opinion until Friday.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is Monday at 2.00 pm an option?

Dr Farren: Yes.

Mr Murphy: It might prove a difficulty for me, but I am sure that we will be represented.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are there any other problems with meeting on Monday at 2.00 pm?

Mr McFarland: I wonder where we stand. It is my understanding that the Assembly breaks on Friday.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes, but the Secretary of State, when he met the parties last week, said that this Committee could continue to meet.

Mr McFarland: No, we cannot. The problem is that —

Dr McCrea: With the greatest respect, I thank the Secretary of State very much for his kindness. Who does he think that he is?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I am only reporting what the Secretary of State said.

Mr McFarland: As I understand it, the Assembly breaks on Friday for the summer.

Dr McCrea: You might be nodding dogs to the Secretary of State, but some of us certainly will not be.

Mr McFarland: The difficulty is that this is the Secretary of State's Assembly.

Dr McCrea: Absolutely. Therefore it breaks on 7 July and, as the letter says, that break lasts until 4 September. That is the Secretary of State's Assembly.

Mr McFarland: Yes. The Secretary of State's Assembly breaks on Friday and reconvenes on 4 September. We clearly have work to do in this Committee, and, according to what the Prime Minister has issued, we will meet over the summer.

There is a traditional holiday for a fortnight over the Twelfth. If we are wishing to meet when one half of our community traditionally disappears down South or overseas during that time, are Sinn Féin and the SDLP likely to be present, or will they be in Cork on holiday? Are we likely to see the DUP and ourselves, when some of us are apt to be involved in other things? What are the chances of people attending next week with concentrated minds? We need next week to confirm where the Committee is going with issues. We may then need to take a short break, as people will be off on holidays or whatever. However, if they are not, we can carry on.

Dr Farren: We must first establish whether we can move forward.

4.00 pm

Mr McFarland: We should meet on Monday at 2.00 pm to confirm whether this is a starter. Would that be sensible?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Some of us have problems with Wednesday, but Monday 10 July should be OK.

Mr McNarry: Sinn Féin members are all going to the "orange-fest".

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We seem to have reached agreement to meet on Monday 10 July at 2.00 pm. We have one other very important issue to deal with. All members have received copies of the Hansard reports for the period of 20-28 June. We must decide whether to place those reports on the Assembly website. That will make it a public document for all of the community to read.

Mr Ford: Before or after Mark Devenport?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That would be the corrected version. Members will have an opportunity to correct the reports before they appear on the website.

Mr McFarland: As I understand it, we are issuing the reports to Assembly Members.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): They have already been issued. Members received them on Saturday.

Mr McFarland: I hope that last Thursday's report was not issued, because it is being corrected. However, if the Assembly Members have received the reports, the press will almost certainly have them too.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): They are supposed to be confidential, but —

Mr McFarland: The press almost certainly have them, and, if that is the case, there is not much point in trying to pretend that they do not exist. We are famous for not being able to hold our confidences.

Dr Farren: Are we issuing the unedited or the corrected version to Assembly Members?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Only the corrected version.

Dr Farren: That is OK.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Ford, are you happy?

Mr Ford: I wish to check the time scale. The version for correction that we received on Saturday morning has now expired its 24 hours.

Mr McFarland: That is working days. The corrections need to be in today.

The Committee Clerk: The corrections should come back as soon as possible. There is flexibility. The corrections should be in by lunchtime tomorrow.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Once the Assembly Members have received all of the corrected versions, we are proposing that they go straight on to the website. Have we reached consensus on that?

Members indicated assent.

Dr McCrea: We said from the word go that they should be placed on the website.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Hansard staff know where they stand on that issue. We meet again at 2.00 pm on Monday 10 July. Mr Molloy will be in the Chair.

Adjourned at 4.05 pm.

The Committee met at 2.02 pm.

(The Chairman (Mr Molloy) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Members, we will kick off. Everybody is ready. I remind Committee members to switch off their mobile phones as they interfere with the Hansard recording.

Do we have deputies or replacements, whichever term you want to use, for each party?

Mr O'Dowd: I am standing in for Mr Murphy.

Ms Ritchie: I am standing in for Alasdair McDonnell.

Mr McCarthy: I seem to be the permanent one, but I am standing in meantime.

Mr Kennedy: We prefer the term "replacement".

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Replacement, sorry.

Mr Kennedy: "Deputies" has other connotations.

Mr A Maginness: I think "deputy" is very good.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): David McNarry is standing in for whom?

The Committee Clerk: David McNarry is here for Michael McGimpsey.

Mr Kennedy: That is now a permanent change.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do members agree the minutes of the meeting of 3 July?

Mr Kennedy: There is no "u" in Clogher Valley.

Mr McFarland: I was going to ask if Lord Morrow was comfortable with that spelling.

The Committee Clerk: Apologies.

Mr Kennedy: Is that a County Armagh fellow?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Perhaps that was the Ulster-Scots spelling.

The next item is the letter of 4 July 2006 from the Speaker — which members should have in their papers — including directions from the Secretary of State for three subgroups to be set up: on economic issues; changes to the institutions; and the devolution of criminal justice and policing. The direction from the Secretary of State is that the Committee should actually set up those committees. Are there any comments or views?

Dr McCrea: My party has instructed me that an economic committee should be set up under the Business Committee, as per the letter of 19 June 2006 to Mrs Bell, the Speaker.

The DUP is to meet the Secretary of State to find out exactly how the other two subcommittees fit in with the Secretary of State's initial instruction to this Committee, which was to scope the issues. I agree that economic issues must be taken forward immediately. That should have happened immediately after the debate under an Assembly motion and in line with the Secretary of State's suggestion in his letter of 19 June 2006 in which he said that:

"If the preference is for a separate committee to be set up by way of a direction from me, I would intend to do so immediately and to invite the Business Committee to determine membership and arrangements for chairing the Committee."

The issues of changes to the institutions and the devolution of policing and justice are more akin to negotiations. The DUP wants to find out exactly where those sit in relation to the Secretary of State's initial brief, and I will not agree to the setting up of those subgroups.

Mr M McGuinness: It would be helpful if the DUP could tell us when the proposed meeting between the Secretary of State and the DUP will take place. I am sure that other parties will be interested in that too because given what we have just heard, it is hard to see how we can sensibly take forward the work with which this Committee has been charged.

Dr McCrea: In response to you, Deputy Speaker, I have no knowledge of when the meeting will be, because the party leader and the Secretary of State will arrange it. The DUP is endeavouring to find out how those two subcommittees on policing and justice and changes to the institutions fit in with scoping the issues, because we have scoped and identified a number of issues.

As I have said, probably ad nauseam to some, this Committee is not the place for negotiations. I have not been instructed, nor given the mandate, to negotiate, and I am in total agreement with that decision. That is the appropriate and proper stance for the leader and deputy leader of my party and for those of us whom the party has chosen to be a part of the team that negotiates with Government. The purpose of this Committee is certainly not to negotiate. Therefore, the DUP must ascertain how those two subcommittees fit in with the Secretary of State's initial remit to this Committee.

Mr M McGuinness: Nothing that has been said by the Secretary of State vis-à-vis the establishment of three subcommittees conflicts with any previous correspondence between him and the Speaker, or, indeed, this Committee. We had hoped that we could do some productive work today and see an agreement on the establishment of subcommittees, so that people could begin the serious work of dealing with these issues in the near future.

As a result of William McCrea's contribution, we are not going to be in a position to take things forward. Not only does the DUP seek additional information about the subcommittees relating to the institutions and to policing and justice, but it appears to be totally opposed to the Preparation for Government Committee's establishment of a subcommittee on the economy and the peace dividend.

I am at a loss to see how we can sensibly proceed today.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The main issue from the Committee's point of view is that we have been directed by the Secretary of State to set up the subcommittees. Parties can decide to go to the meetings or not; that is the current position. It would obviously be beneficial to have all the parties in those subcommittees, but our task today is to set them up. We have been given a clear direction on that.

Mr McFarland: The Committee's mission is clear: we have spent several days discussing our remit, and, as William McCrea has said, identifying issues. However, at our previous meeting, we recognised that many of those issues were substantial ones, and that other concerns might be contained within the broader matter, meriting further investigation or an attempt to expand matters or seek clarity. That was the logic behind the establishment of the subcommittees: not to negotiate, but to try to ensure that we had identified all the different parts of the broader issue. So there was some sense in trying to identify those.

The Secretary of State has made two directions on the institutions and on criminal justice, and the other one is in response to his previous intention to set up an economic committee. Is that right?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Yes.

Mr McFarland: What is the status of these subcommittees? Am I to understand that they are in existence? Either the Secretary of State has directed that they exist, or he is inviting us to set them up. It is unclear, because logically, if he has set them up, then it is a question for parties as to whether they take part in them or not. If it is up to us, then whether or not they should be set up is an issue for discussion around this table.

Is it possible to clarify that?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): My information is that the Secretary of State has directed that this Committee set up the subcommittees, and the parties nominate to them. The Secretary of State's letter is there among the papers.

Mr McFarland: The question is whether or not the Secretary of State can direct the parties around this table to do anything. In every other pronouncement that he has made, he has said that it is up to the Committee to elect its Chairs, and to do a, b, c and d. In fact, in one of the instructions here, it says that we have to decide on terms of reference and nominations to membership, etc.

Have these been set up — in which case, parties have a choice as to whether they attend them or not? If they are not set up, then the parties have a choice as to whether we set them up or not.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We must discuss the terms of reference for the subcommittees, their membership and arrangements for meetings. The letter is very clear that the Secretary of State is directing the Committee, under paragraph 4 (1) of schedule 1 to the Northern Ireland Act 2006, to set up a subcommittee.

Mr McFarland: The subcommittees have been set up. We have now to decide whether our parties will attend, and, if so, what the terms of reference and the rules of the game will be. Is that correct?

2.15 pm

Dr McCrea: That cannot be right if the subcommittees are to be set up by the Preparation for Government Committee.

Mr McFarland: That was my question.

Dr McCrea: The subcommittees, therefore, have not been set up. The Secretary of State is directing the Committee to set them up, so it is up to it to do so. If they were already set up, he could not possibly be directing the Committee to set them up.

Mr McFarland: That was my question. It is not at all clear whether the Secretary of State is telling the Committee to set up the subcommittees, in which case it can say: "Oh no, you do not"; or whether he has set them up, and Members are being invited to join them, or not, as we see fit.

Dr Farren: Once again, I feel that we are close to reaching an impasse. An inconclusive debate will ensue if we continue with these exchanges. My reading of the letter is that this Committee is being directed to set up subcommittees. Of course, it can refuse to obey that direction and refuse to nominate people to attend the subcommittees, if they are established.

However, we should now move to setting up the subcommittees as directed. Referring issues back to the Secretary of State and bringing his responses to the Committee will leave us in the same situation that we are in now. Either we decide that we want to move forward or we accept that there is no possibility of us doing so. We should accept that, however regrettable, we have to be directed to do things, and we should establish the three subcommittees.

Mr Ford: I agree with William McCrea on the logic of this matter — if not on much else. The letter clearly states that this Committee is directed to set up subcommittees but that it can also decide otherwise.

On the fourth page of the letter the Secretary of State repeats his direction regarding methods of reaching agreement, which is consensus interpreted as unanimity. That is a completely contradictory position. It seems illogical for the Secretary of State to direct the Committee to do things but then also direct that unanimity is needed on every issue; unfortunately, the pattern of events in this Committee shows that it frequently attains a certain level of consensus but not complete unanimity.

Co-chairman, I know that you and Mr Wells had a meeting with the Secretary of State a couple of weeks ago. Are you planning further meetings with him, or is asking the Speaker to write to him our only method of communicating to him how impossible we find the position in which he has left us? It seems that if this Committee is bound by reaching consensus, meaning unanimity, it is unlikely to agree anything, yet the Secretary of State's directions leave large gaping holes.

I agree with Seán Farren; we should accept the Secretary of State's direction and do the work that we have been instructed to do. However, if one party objects, we will not be able to do that today. Until the Secretary of State resolves how the Committee reaches decisions, he will have to issue directions to it on absolutely everything. He must ease up a little on the rules of consensus so that it is possible and realistic for the Committee to decide things.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We made no further arrangements to have a meeting with the Secretary of State. The meeting to which you refer was held after the visit by the Taoiseach and the Prime Minister. I am quite certain that if the Committee, through the Clerks, wrote to the Secretary of State, the issue could be dealt with directly.

My interpretation of the direction is that, because the Secretary of State has directed that the subcommittees be set up, this issue does not need consensus. He made it very clear to Mr Wells and myself that he could not force Members to attend the subcommittees in the same way that he could not force them to attend a plenary. Those were his words. We have a clear direction from the Secretary of State that the subcommittees be set up.

Whether parties wish to attend them or not is up to themselves, although we would like everyone to attend them to make them work. However, that was the direction from the Secretary of State. Perhaps Mr Wells wishes to add to that.

Mr Wells: We asked the Secretary of State several times whether establishing subcommittees was a matter for consensus in the Committee or whether it was a done deal. He made it clear that he would make a ruling on two issues: that there would be a plenary on Friday — and neither the Business Committee nor the Assembly had a say in that; although people could not be forced to turn up — and, equally, he made it clear that he would establish subcommittees, although he cannot force anyone to attend them. The two issues were seen in parallel: the first was Friday's plenary; the second will be the subcommittees.

I am absolutely clear on that. We asked him whether the Committee had the right to decide on subcommittees, and the answer was that it does not.

Mr McFarland: Chairman, that clarifies my point.

Dr McCrea: With the greatest respect, it does not clarify the point. That is not what the Secretary of State says in his letter. We have it in writing, and I will not take dictation from anyone else on the matter. The Secretary of State in his letter states:

"I am ... directing ... that the PFG set up sub-groups"

— but the setting up is the responsibility of the Committee. The Secretary of State is not setting up the subcommittees: he is asking or directing us to set them up.

With the greatest respect, this Committee will decide whether it sets up subcommittees or not. That is not within the power of the Secretary of State. He is directing us to set up subcommittees. I am informing the Committee that my party will not be setting up subcommittees; there is no consensus in the Committee on setting up subcommittees or on the other issue in that paragraph.

Mr M McGuinness: The only course of action open to us is to proceed with establishing the subcommittees. Sinn Féin accepts that subcommittees need to be established. If we are to be involved in the serious work of properly preparing for Government, we must address the issues that are of huge significance to everyone in this room. Some of the issues deal with matters that the DUP raised in its submission, particularly Sinn Féin's attitude to policing and justice. Establishing a subcommittee to deal with that issue would enable everyone to be fully apprised of how Sinn Féin thinks that it should be taken forward. We believe that whatever outstanding difficulties may be attached to the issue can be resolved. Therefore it is in the interests of every party around the table that a subcommittee be established to deal with that crux issue.

All the parties have expressed great interest in the issue of an economic dividend; it certainly exercises many in the business community and throughout society. We should attempt to establish the subcommittees, and parties should make nominations to them, as Sinn Féin intends to. If the DUP, in effect, vetoes that today, we need to go back to the Secretary of State to establish exactly how he intends to take the matter forward.

We appear to have a measure of consensus among the Ulster Unionists, the Alliance Party, the SDLP and ourselves on the need to take the work of the subcommittees forward. Therefore, rather than beat about the bush, we should accept Seán Farren's proposal and try to move the situation forward. If we hit a brick wall, we will have no choice but to go back to the Secretary of State to establish on exactly what basis we can take this forward, with or without one party.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I draw members' attention to the next paragraph, which states that the membership of the subcommittees should comprise one PFG member from each of the five parties, plus one other member from each party. That is very clear.

Mr McNarry: As has happened previously here, no consensus has meant no movement forward, and matters have been redirected back to the Secretary of State. If we operate like that, and given David Ford's valid points about consensus, how can there be consensus if a subcommittee is set up with one party or more not participating? What is the status of a subcommittee that is not inclusive? It does not appear that you have the basis to set up subcommittees if one party, or more, refuses to participate in them. The rule of consensus has operated throughout and is heavily recorded in Hansard. It has been our practice to talk for hours until the Chairman asks for consensus, and somebody says no, and that has then been the end of the story. We need to know what we could be talking ourselves into or out of. If a subcommittee is weakened because it is not inclusive, it becomes devalued.

Finally, you have just said that the Secretary of State directs that the subcommittees should comprise one member from each party that is represented on this Committee and one other member from those parties. Is that a directive? Is there an enforcement with that? Can there be a subcommittee only if it comprises one member from each of the parties that are round this table and their nominees?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): There is clear direction that that is how the subcommittee should be set up. When we met the Secretary of State he was very clear that he could not force people to take part, but that, otherwise, the positions would not be filled.

Mr McNarry: If the Secretary of State issues a directive as to how the subcommittee should be formed, his directive fails if one member from each party is not represented.

Dr McCrea: As far as the economic issues are concerned, the DUP has been urging the establishment of an economic committee since the Assembly debate on the matter. It could have been set up then. Sinn Féin/IRA is the only party that has blocked that subcommittee. Those who talk piously as though they have a genuine concern about economic issues did not think about that in May, which was when the subcommittee was supposed to have been set up. The whole project could have been well progressed, but, of course, that party rejected it. Everyone is bowing to the whims and wishes of Sinn Féin. The Assembly, not the Secretary of State, proposed the idea. He has agreed in his letter that, if we want a separate committee, he is willing to set it up and allow the Business Committee to take it forward and decide on the membership. Let no one try to get off the hook and have some pious concern for economics, especially after 30 years of trying to blow the economy out of existence with bomb after bomb. Let no pious platitudes come from Sinn Féin on that.

As far as the other issues are concerned, Sinn Féin is talking about changes to the institutions, and the devolution of criminal justice and policing. Neither of those are the real impediment to the restoration of devolved government here: paramilitarism, decommissioning, criminality, guns and bombs brought down the Executive. We were told that those were dead issues.

2.30 pm

Therefore, once again, Sinn Féin is crawling and bowing to those who have a vested interest in keeping the situation as it is. If one views the statement that a Sinn Féin councillor in Cookstown made, one realises that those are not dead issues. He was goading the so-called Real IRA and the Continuity IRA by asking them where their dead bodies are. He said that if they are the real heroes of republicanism, where are their dead bodies of British soldiers and of policemen? When was that statement made? It was reported in the 'Dungannon News and Tyrone Courier' last week. Therefore, that is the up-to-date thinking of Sinn Féin — goading the Continuity IRA and the Real IRA into producing dead bodies, in the same way that calling my colleagues and me the Taliban could produce a dead body.

Let us be quite honest about it: games are being played here. Members can set up their little subcommittees, but they are not dealing with the issues. Until the problem is solved; until we see that criminality is finished, and finished for good; and until we know that there is credible decommissioning, where all the weapons have been decommissioned, not some of them, we will not enter into devolved government. I stated at the previous sitting that enough weapons to turn Belfast into a garden had recently been found.

What about paramilitarism? Remember that the IRA is still in existence. Who made a statement about Mrs McConville after the Police Ombudsman's findings were announced? It was the IRA — it is still fully in existence. The IRA declared that it was right and fair for it to kill her, because it had decided that she was working with the security forces.

People are closing their eyes to the reality, folks, but this party will not do that. We are a devolutionist party, but if we are to have devolved government, it will be something that will stand the test. It will not be knocked down by anyone's statements or actions.

That is the reality, and I make it abundantly clear that my answer to Seán Farren's proposal is that there is not consensus. We want to find out from the Secretary of State how subcommittees fit in with the work that has been started through the setting up of this Committee.

Dr Farren: The DUP needs to make up its mind on the whole issue of consensus; it cannot have it both ways. On the one hand, it says that we should proceed on some issues on which we obviously have no consensus, because that is the way in which it wants to proceed on those issues. On the other hand, it says that there will not be consensus on other issues without its assent.

The DUP must operate by one set of rules or else rethink its whole approach to how we determine the Committee's procedures. Indeed, with respect to some of Mr McCrea's recent remarks, by preventing progress on the establishment of subcommittees this afternoon, some issues that he has identified will not be aired in the manner in which he thinks it would be most appropriate for them to be aired. Without risking the atmosphere becoming more tense and fraught, my proposal is that we accept the direction from the Secretary of State, move to establish the three subcommittees and begin discussion on the terms of reference and the timings for the subcommittee meetings over the next few weeks.

Mr Kennedy: I seek clarification and confirmation from yourself and Mr Wells in your role as Deputy Speakers. I would certainly appreciate Mr Wells's involvement. Is it your joint understanding that failure to nominate to or failure to attend any of the subcommittees will invalidate their work?

What is your take on that, or your interpretation of the letter, following your meeting with the Secretary of State?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): My interpretation is clear, as are the Secretary of State's words in the letter. If subcommittees are set up, he cannot force members to attend. That does not indicate that they will be considered invalid if not every member attends.

Mr Kennedy: Is it your view that non-nomination or non-attendance by any particular group would not invalidate the work of the subcommittee?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): That is my interpretation.

Mr Kennedy: Mr Wells, it would be helpful if you were to indicate your view.

Mr Wells: The context of the discussion was the demand by parties for there to be a plenary. It was made clear to the Secretary of State that the issue had arisen many times in Committee. It was recognised at that point that not all parties would turn up for a plenary; however, neither that plenary nor what was decided at it would be considered invalid.

Similarly, the discussion moved to several parties' demand for subcommittees to be established. The Secretary of State made exactly the same point. He said that he would direct the establishment of subcommittees but that he could not force people to attend. My interpretation was that that did not invalidate the work of subcommittees.

I accept that that is not good news for some people in this Committee, but I simply report my understanding of what the Secretary of State said. I put no weight on it, nor state whether I am for or against it. I report only what was said at that meeting, and I left with no doubt that he would make those two directions. That he did so, indicates that our understanding was correct. If the Clerks who were present have any different understanding, I would be interested to hear it, but we were 100% clear on that issue.

Mr Kennedy: I accept the interpretation of the two Deputy Speakers. It seems that, although the work would not be invalidated, it could be seriously impeded.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Obviously, we would like all members to attend the subcommittees. It has been left open for Members outside of this Committee to be on subcommittees, because parties expressed an interest in involving their experts in various fields, such as policing or the economy. That is what was meant by subcommittees having 10 members.

This Committee was set up by direction of the Secretary of State. The two Chairmen were appointed, not as a result of agreement in Committee but by direction of the Secretary of State. My interpretation is that he has done the same now. He has directed that the subcommittees be set up, and it this Committee's job to do that. We want all parties to attend, but that is up to the members.

The Committee's job today is to set up the subcommittees and outline their terms of reference. There may have to be agreement around this table on that; alternatively, the subcommittees could set their own terms of reference.

Mr M McGuinness: I propose that the motion be moved. I support Seán Farren's proposal that this Committee accepts that the subcommittees be established.

We all know that there will be a vote on that during this meeting. The DUP has expressed its opinion and will vote against the motion. The Secretary of State should inform the Committee of what he intends to do against that backdrop. I assume that he will continue with the establishment of the subcommittees, as he directed, with the support of four of the parties at this table. Although it remains to be seen, if we reach a situation in which the DUP is not prepared to play its part on subcommittees, those subcommittees will effectively be holed below the waterline.

It would be much better if the largest party in the Assembly contributed, with the rest of us, to the essential work of dealing with the economic dividend, the institutions, and how we bring about the devolution of policing and justice.

We do not need a circular debate; we need to decide how we move forward. I have resisted coming back to some of the things that William McCrea said. I could talk about William McCrea/LVF, but I will not. I could launch into a history of his party leader and his responsibility for the events of the past 40-odd years, but I will not do that either.

Dr McCrea: Be thankful that you have not —

Mr M McGuinness: I think that —

Dr McCrea: — some folks in here have a privilege that could be taken from them.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Could members please deal with the three subcommittees?

Mr M McGuinness: Absolutely. That is what I have tried to focus people's minds on. However, it would be helpful if people would stop misrepresenting the name of the party that the three delegates on this side represent. We represent Sinn Féin and nobody else.

Mr McFarland: My understanding is that the remit of the Committee and the subcommittees is to produce a report that will be taken to the Assembly for debate on 4 and 5 September. The logic is that we would work over the summer and produce a report, and that there would be a couple of plenaries on it.

If there were to be plenaries on 4 and 5 September, would Martin McGuinness's party take part in them? Will we do another summer's worth of hard work here only to have Sinn Féin decide that it is not enough and that it will not take part in those plenaries?

Mr M McGuinness: From the outset, I clearly indicated to this Committee, and in Sinn Féin's meetings with the Secretary of State, the British Prime Minister and the Taoiseach, that we will play our part in any subcommittees because we believe that there is important work to be done. Sinn Féin passionately hopes that progress will be made and that the Preparation for Government Committee will be in a position, on the basis of the productive work that is being done, to put forward issues for debate in the Assembly. That is our position.

Mr McFarland: Is that a commitment to take part in debate? We have had discussions on "productive" work before. Some Members would argue that although we have not made enormous progress in the past five weeks, we have made some progress, but not enough for Sinn Féin. Must we wait until September for adjudication on what is or is not progress? By then, we might have joined the subcommittees in good faith and worked hard on them, only for Sinn Féin to judge that not enough work had been done or that not enough commitment had been shown for it to take part in a plenary.

Mr M McGuinness: Unlike the Ulster Unionists, the SDLP and the Alliance Party, we are not content to go along with what has been the DUP's game plan from the beginning: the institutions would not be re-established until the DUP decided that it was ready to go into Government. All the informed opinion suggests — although I do not accept the informed opinion — that the DUP might be prepared to do that some time next year.

The Taoiseach and the British Prime Minister clearly stated that 24 November is the cut-off point; that is the backdrop against which we are working. I have said from the outset that we would involve ourselves in the Preparation for Government Committee and in subcommittees but that we would have to satisfy ourselves that we were dealing with a political party — the largest unionist party — that was shaping up to do a deal with the rest of us to restore the institutions.

If, at the end of the summer, we feel that the DUP is not shaping up to do a deal, we will not participate in the type of talking shop that all the other parties participated in last Friday.

2.45 pm

Lo and behold, everyone came out saying that it had been a waste of time. Sinn Féin will not waste its time trying to fool people that we are here working when work is not being done. The talking shops in the Assembly go on against a backdrop of no one knowing when the institutions will be restored or when the DUP will be prepared to come on board. That leaves us with no option other than to make it clear, not only to the DUP but to everyone on this Committee, that we want to see progress.

A large part of our judgement on any progress will be based on whether there is real engagement between all parties on this Committee. One could argue that the mere fact that Hansard, for all sorts of reasons, has been brought into play, works against the initial idea that this Committee might produce a relationship between all parties that would move the process forward.

To be honest, when I hear the DUP's contributions, I hear people playing to the gallery. Everyone knows that someone will hand the Hansard report of this meeting to Mark Devenport or Martina Purdy, and it will be all over the news. Will we get engagement with the DUP on that basis? I hope and pray that we will, but it is most unlikely.

Whether committees are established will also play a big part in our coming to a judgement on whether progress has been made. If they are established and the DUP does not play its part, whatever work we engage on in the Committee is in danger of being vetoed by the DUP. However, I am not fully satisfied that the DUP would be able to do that, because a case can be made that some important work can be done, which would be of huge benefit to both the Irish and British Governments as we move this process forward.

If the institutions are not restored by 24 November 2006, we move into a wholly new situation, wherein the economy and many other issues relating to the Assembly will come into play in an important way. We must establish, at this meeting, whether we attempt to set up subcommittees. I support Seán Farren's proposal to do so, and I am sure that there is much support from the other parties around the table. We should vote on that, send the result to the British Secretary of State and consider how we take forward the situation, against the declared aim of the DUP to frustrate the efforts not only of Sinn Féin but of the two sovereign Governments.

Mr Kennedy: That was a long and convoluted answer to Alan McFarland's perfectly legitimate question. When it is all boiled out of the pot, I understand the answer to be a highly cynical definite maybe.

Mr M McGuinness: You can interpret it in whatever way you wish. I have made a very honest contribution.

Mr Kennedy: I am giving you an honest assessment of your answer.

Mr M McGuinness: That is fair enough.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I remind members of the short timescale to meet the deadlines. We have to set up three subcommittees that must meet and report to this Committee, which must then compile a report for plenaries on 4 and 5 September 2006. It is up to this Committee whether those reports are prepared. If there is nothing to report, that is another issue.

Within those three subcommittees there is the opportunity and space to deal with all the issues that Rev McCrea raised as obstacles to progress.

Dr McCrea: Absolutely not, and, with the greatest respect, it is not your place to lead this Committee or to act as if you were the Secretary of State. The DUP will make up its own mind. The issues must be dealt with.

It was said earlier that we either fiddle to Sinn Féin's tune or it will not play its part in the Assembly Chamber. That is exactly what Sinn Féin said. The DUP is saying that the decision to form a working group to deal with economic issues was taken by the democratically elected Members of the Assembly. That is why we said that it was different, as did all the parties that agreed to it.

All I say is that anyone waiting for us to have some cosy love-in with Sinn Féin has another thing coming.

We cannot play around the edges with wee subcommittees that do not deal with the real, cardinal issues. Why does Sinn Féin want a policing subcommittee? Because it has its own agenda on policing and justice. Until we deal with the issues of criminality and paramilitarism, guns and all the rest of it, the last thing to be dealt with will be policing and justice. Make no mistake about it; those matters will have to be dealt with either here or by the Government. They are not dead issues.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Mr McCrea, I will remind you of the Secretary of State's other direction, which is that it is the Chairs' job to facilitate —

Dr McCrea: Facilitating is one thing; this was going further than facilitating.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I do not believe that it is. It sets out very clearly the timetable laid down by the Secretary of State, if we are to do the work that we are supposed to as the Preparation for Government Committee. That is our role, and we need to get the subcommittees in place, to establish the terms of reference for their meetings, and to report back to this Committee.

We have a proposal to set up those subcommittees. I put that to the Committee. Is there a consensus?

There is obviously no consensus, but we do have a clear direction from the Secretary of State to set the subcommittees up, whether or not the parties attend them. Therefore, I will proceed to that position and deal with the terms of reference for those three subcommittees. Are we agreed to do that?

Mr McFarland: We have a problem here. We either approach this in a positive state of mind and in good faith, in an attempt to take things forward, or we do not. The DUP clearly has a difficulty with this, and unless it changes its mind it is not taking part. It objects to one of the three subcommittees for which a directive has been given. Either way, from what William said this morning, it will not take part in any of the subcommittees.

So the DUP refuses to soldier, as Sinn Féin refused to soldier last Friday by not showing good faith and not taking part in the plenary, whatever it thought of the outcome. People will not play the game, and we will not get anywhere.

It was interesting that the Secretary of State's letter sounded more robust about whether any one party was able to stand in the way of the general consensus of the meeting. However, he copped out by encouraging people to try to seek a way forward. Until the rules of the game allow a majority — which some parties demand — we must abide by consensus. If the DUP does not agree, we are going nowhere unless the Secretary of State changes the rules of the game.

There is no point in us spending any more time beating around the bush or making speeches. It seems that we will not get off the ground unless the Secretary of State produces different rules under which we should operate.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): To clarify the issue of the validity of the subcommittees, last Friday's plenary went ahead regardless of whether parties attended. The same applies to the subcommittees, as far as the Secretary of State is concerned. The plenary went ahead; the Secretary of State gave a clear direction that it should happen — and it happened. He gave a similarly clear direction with regard to the subcommittees, and they will happen. The role of this Committee is to set them up, regardless of whether Members decide to attend them. That is exactly what the Secretary of State said, and that took place.

Mr McNarry: We should listen carefully to what Alan McFarland said. If the Secretary of State comes up with some rules, does he include retrospective majorities? It is OK to talk about the plenaries, and how people were not forced to go to them, but this Committee tried to support a consensus-led committee on the economic question, there was no consensus for it, and it fell. It has been batted about like a tennis ball and has come back here. That is unfair.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We now have a direction to set it up.

Mr McNarry: We now have a direction to set up a subcommittee, which is contrary to the consensus or the majority agreement when the Committee last discussed the issue. We must try to get a hold of the management of this; otherwise I will ask, retrospectively, why we cannot deal with the economic issue in the way in which we wanted to a week or so ago.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): If the Committee takes control of setting up the subcommittees, then we will be in control. However, if we continue to bat the matter back to the Secretary of State for further direction, we are simply handing power back every time it is handed to us.

Mr McNarry: With all due respect, Chairman, the Secretary of State is the cause of this problem. He set the game rules, and the issues go back and forth to him. He has steadfastly refused to give either the Business Committee or this Committee an opportunity to run its own affairs.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): It is his Assembly.

Mr McFarland: The question is; are we operating by consensus or not? The Secretary of State has invited us to set up subcommittees, and no consensus has been reached. Unless the Secretary of State sets them up and says: "We have moved away from consensus now, and I will accept a majority agreement from four out of five parties", how do we set up subcommittees without consensus?

For example, if four out of five parties wanted to have a plenary in the middle of August, and Sinn Féin objected, it would not matter; the plenary would go ahead. Similarly, if four out of five parties agreed to set up subcommittees, and the DUP objected, the subcommittees would be set up. However, under the current rules of the game, we cannot do that.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I am no great expert on English directions, but my interpretation is that the Secretary of State has not invited us to set up subcommittees, he has directed us to do so.

Mr McNarry: What happens if we cannot?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): He has not raised the issue of consensus on setting up subcommittees. He has directed us to set them up.

Mr McNarry: To be consistent, Chairman, he has to.

Mr Storey: Deputy Chair, if there was a plain interpretation of the Queen's English, it would be obvious to everybody —

Mr M McGuinness: Can members simply interject, or do they need to put their hands up?

Mr Storey: I had my hand up for some time. I will not take direction from the Member who is sitting across this table; I take direction from the Deputy Speaker.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): You had your hand up before.

Mr Storey: Yes, I had. There is a difference between a determination and a direction. It is abundantly clear that the Secretary of State determined that only two obligations were to be fulfilled: one, that there should be a plenary on 7 July and, two, that the Assembly should rise for recess on 7 July and not return until 4 September. The Secretary of State has given a direction to the Committee, and the rules of this Committee are such that it must operate on the basis of consensus. From what my colleague Rev McCrea has said, there is no consensus. That is very simple and clear, and it does not take an Einstein to work out our current situation.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We have not had consensus on many things. The Secretary of State gave us a clear direction to set up this Committee, and, because we could not reach agreement on who should chair the Committee, he gave us a clear direction on that, too. This is where the interpretation comes in. We had a clear direction to have a plenary on Friday, and we have a clear direction on subcommittees: one has happened, the other has not.

Mr Ford: Mervyn Storey is certainly not right to say that there is a difference between a determination and a direction. The language changes in the course of the Secretary of State's letter, and they mean the same thing.

It may or may not be directed that there should be three subcommittees. However, if we are still required to operate on the basis of consensus, I am not sure how we are supposed to agree the terms of reference, the membership, the chairmanship, the procedures and the other matters on our agenda. The Secretary of State has left us in an impossible position. Unless we operate this afternoon as if four to one is an adequate consensus — which has not been the procedure to date — we can take no further decisions. We require the Secretary of State either to change the rules on consensus or to issue directions on those matters.

3.00 pm

Mr M McGuinness: There is no consensus on the establishment of subcommittees, and I find that particularly disappointing. Since the Secretary of State has gone so far as to direct the establishment of subcommittees, he should have had some indication that a level of consensus would be required to establish them. I do not know whether the Democratic Unionist Party gave the Secretary of State any commitments vis-à-vis their willingness to co-operate in the establishment of subcommittees. It is clear from today's meeting that the DUP has set its face against such a proposal.

The only thing that we can do is send a report to the Secretary of State to tell him that the DUP has set its face against the establishment of subcommittees. He then needs to come back to us with a remedy. I say that in the knowledge that, without the DUP, those subcommittees can achieve very little. The dilemma is one for the Secretary of State. My proposal is that we send a report of this meeting to the Secretary of State telling him clearly that the DUP has set its face against the establishment of subcommittees and await his reply.

There is not much point in going ahead with terms of reference until we get an indication from the Secretary of State on how he intends to deal with the situation.

Mr Kennedy: It appears that we are fast approaching the deadlock that I indicated at our previous meeting. Rather than deadlock matters completely today, we should refer to the direction from the Secretary of State, with all its anomalies, and ask him for further clarification. In the meantime, Dr McCrea has indicated that the DUP will meet the Secretary of State. Perhaps progress might emerge from that meeting that will assist the Preparation for Government Committee. I suggest that we move forward on that basis and then adjourn any other business.

Dr Farren: At this point, adjournment is virtually all that we can do, although I regret the impasse at which we have arrived. Realistically, however, any subcommittees that were established without full consensus would not have led us to a satisfactory position. Is it not more likely that the Secretary of State, having been made aware of what transpired — or did not transpire — this afternoon, might establish the subcommittees directly himself and invite the parties to nominate members to them? Waiting on the outcome of a meeting between the DUP and the Secretary of State as if that will resolve our problems is not a plan in which we should put our trust.

The DUP may want a meeting with the Secretary of State, but our business is to let the Secretary of State know the position. I imagine that he is likely to establish subcommittees by direction himself. He will set the terms of reference, will invite nominations and allow the subcommittees to indicate when they can meet — that may be all the discretion left to them. They could report matters to this Committee, and through it to the Assembly, for debate in September. That seems to be the only realistic prospect, given the impasse.

Mr McCarthy: In reply to Mr Kennedy, Willie McCrea did not give the Committee any indication as to when they were going to meet the Secretary of State. God knows when it could be, and we do not have the time. Therefore, I think that what Seán Farren has said is sensible.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We have two proposals in front of us.

The Committee Clerk: Martin's proposal was that the Committee send a report to the Secretary of State indicating that the DUP has set its face against the establishment of subgroups.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do we have consensus on that?

Members indicated assent.

The Committee Clerk: Danny's proposal is that we should refer the direction back to the Secretary of State for clarification of the anomalies raised during the meeting, and that we now adjourn.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): He may need to actually set them up. Perhaps it would be worthwhile for me, Mr Wells, and the two Clerks to meet the Secretary of State again so that we are clear.

Mr Kennedy: If the other Deputy Speaker is content with that, we do not have any objection.

Mr Wells: Yes.

Ms Gildernew: Could you bring back something in writing? Some of the difficulty today has been around interpretation.

Mr Storey: It should also be noted that we would not agree with any interpretation placed on a referral from this Committee by Sinn Féin as to what our position is or is not on that matter. It may be convenient for Sinn Féin to go into the public domain and convince its troops that somehow it was able to get the Committee to have a consensus on the position that the DUP has set its face against a particular course of action. We are not taking any direction from Sinn Féin as to what our position is, other than has been stated by Rev McCrea at this meeting.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We have a consensus on that. Do we have consensus on Danny Kennedy's proposal?

Mr Kennedy: I am happy to have the add-on.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): OK. Are we agreed on that?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): That leaves us where we can do nothing but adjourn.

Adjourned at 3.08 pm.

Monday 17 July 2006

Mr Danny Kennedy
Mr Kieran McCarthy

Observing: Mr Francie Molloy

The Committee met at 12.04 pm.

(The Chairman (Mr Wells) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Let us get the ball rolling. Are any deputies here this afternoon?

Mr O'Dowd: Yes, Deputy Speaker. I am standing in for Martin McGuinness.

Dr Farren: Alasdair McDonnell will be here later.

Mr McCarthy: I am standing in for Naomi Long.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Ulster Unionist Party has a full complement; its main team is here.

Dr McCrea: Diane Dodds will be here for the DUP.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The minutes of the meeting of 10 July 2006 have been circulated. Do members have any comments to make about those?

Dr McCrea: The minutes state that:

"the Committee should send a report to the Secretary of State."

Mervyn Storey said that he did not agree with that and that he agreed with Mr Kennedy's proposals.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Initially, Mr Storey did not raise a concern but, on reflection, he subsequently objected.

Ms Gildernew: However, by then the proposal had been agreed.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes. The difficulty was that when that meeting's Chairman, Mr Molloy, put that proposal, Mr Storey did not comment. However, he later indicated that he did not agree with the interpretation of consensus. By that stage we had passed that point, and it was difficult to unwind. However, Mr Storey clearly stated that he felt that that was not a fair record.

Dr McCrea: I want that drawn to the Committee's attention.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are members happy that Mr McCrea's comments be noted?

As there are no further additions or corrections to the minutes, we shall move on.

As you remember, at the meeting of 10 July 2006, two proposals were agreed by consensus, although Mr McCrea has pointed out that the DUP group subsequently indicated that it had not assented to one of those. However, Mr Molloy, Mrs Dunwoody, Martin Wilson and I put the two agreed proposals to the Secretary of State on 11 July 2006.

We pointed out the anomaly in the Secretary of State's direction of 3 July 2006. He appeared to instruct this Committee to set up subgroups but then stated that the decision to do so should be taken by consensus. We sought clarification on that and on the establishment of the three subgroups. Mr Molloy was at that meeting, so I will ask him to come to the table because questions might be asked of the entire group that attended that meeting.

The Clerks made strenuous efforts to ensure that, over the holiday period, everyone received the Secretary of State's subsequent letter and determination. I assume that it is dated 11 July 2006 and that it is in your packs for today's meeting.

A helpful letter, which is also dated 11 July, is attached. I will read the salient points. The Secretary of State wrote to me; did he write to you, Mr Molloy?

Mr Molloy: Yes he did, Mr Chairman.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): As directed by this Committee, we asked the Secretary of State whether he was making a direction to set up subgroups under paragraph 4(1) of schedule 1 to the Northern Ireland Act 2006. He stated:

"I confirm that I am making a direction and a referral to set up the three specified subgroups."

In other words, that is not a decision that has to be taken by consensus of this Committee: it is something that he is directing us to do.

We asked if the Secretary of State intends that the subgroups operate by consensus or by majority vote. He is saying that he is content with simple majority voting. We must remember that the subgroups will report to the Preparation for Government (PFG) Committee, and that decisions taken by the PFG Committee remain on a consensus only basis. It is important to emphasise that that is still a safeguard — as some people might see it — if they disagree with something that has been agreed by majority in the subgroups.

We also asked the Secretary of State what would happen if one or more parties did not attend the subgroups. He has directed that the subgroups be made up of two individuals from each party: one will be the party's representative on the PFG Committee and the other will be a party nominee. For example, if the subject were economic development, the nominee would be the party's spokesman or expert on that issue. He added that if, for any reason, parties fail to nominate or attend a subgroup, its work would continue: full attendance is not a requirement. He is also content that substitutes could be appointed if the main spokesmen could not attend the subgroups.

The question arose of whether the Secretary of State envisaged that the subgroup on the devolution of policing could discuss criminality and decommissioning. He said that he is content for that to happen — if the subgroup agrees.

Those were the questions we were asked to put to the Secretary of State, and he has issued what I perceive to be a reasonably clear direction, and that has been issued to all members. Members may wish to discuss the contents of those important documents.

Dr McCrea: The Secretary of State has made a direction, and, under the Act he can do that. The next step would be to establish the subgroups and receive nominations. I made it clear that Northern Ireland faces economic challenges and that this is the wrong place for work on that to begin. However, if the Committee accepts the Secretary of State's direction then the DUP would be making nominations to that subgroup. However, I have no direction from my party to make nominations to the other two subgroups.

Dr Farren: I did not hear the Member's last point.

Dr McCrea: I have no direction from my party to make any nominations to the two other subgroups — devolution of policing, and changes to the institutions. I am only giving members the facts.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are there any other comments on either the letter or the direction? We will be moving on later to the actual mechanics of establishing the subgroups.

Dr Farren: I assume, given that decisions in the subgroups will be by simple majority voting, that parties which are not part of the majority will be able to submit their views on a particular issue as part of the report, so that views which did not form the basis for the majority support would also be transmitted to this Committee, and that no party would find its voice excluded from the report.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is the convention of the Assembly generally, and the Secretary of State mentioned the issue. Groups have the right to try to convince the PFG Committee that their arguments are correct and to try and get the report changed. The proceedings would be minuted, reported by Hansard and put into the record.

Mr McNarry: If a party were unable to nominate to a subgroup, will a place be left open for them?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes. It can be filled later if necessary. We will not beef-up the Committee with other parties. The positions will be left free.

Mr McNarry: Would the group that was unable to attend be kept fully informed of the deliberations and receive the minutes and reports.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The subgroup would have to decide whether it wanted to have its proceedings reported by Hansard, as the PFG Committee has done from early on. If that happened, the parties that did not attend would get full details of what happened. However, that is a decision for the subgroups. I suspect that it would be best to keep the entire Assembly informed about what was going on in each subgroup but there may be reasons why that is not possible.

Mr Murphy: Is it then possible for a party not to attend subgroup meetings but use the requirement for consensus in PFG Committee meetings to substantially nullify any work done by a subgroup?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That could happen; a party could block a report from a subgroup. Everything has to be done by consensus, and the default position would be that there would be no report. Do you want to come back on that, Mr Murphy?

Mr Murphy: Given the position outlined by William McCrea, it appears that two of the subgroups will be operating with one hand tied behind their back. If they are going to work on the devolution of policing and justice powers, and on the institutions — issues that all parties here have identified as necessary for the preparation for Government — then whatever work is done in those subgroups could simply be blocked when it comes back to this Committee. It is an unfair position to put the rest of the parties in. The DUP has decided to participate in the one subgroup that it is interested in and to not participate in the rest.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I know that Mr McFarland wants to come in, and I want to come to Mr Molloy as well. Mr McCrea, were you saying that you were not yet in a position to nominate to the other two subgroups, or that you were not nominating to the other two subgroups?

Dr McCrea: I have no authority to nominate anyone. I do not believe that the subgroups should have been under the PFG Committee: I have stated that many times. However, I have to play by the rules. Other Members will find that they have to play by the rules too.

Mr McFarland: I understood from our last meeting that Martin McGuinness said that there was no point in having subgroups if the DUP were not playing on them, as it would effectively nullify them for the reasons that Conor has just pointed out. We could spend all summer beavering away, producing the most brilliant things to which, when it gets back here, the DUP says no because it was not involved. I have more to do with my life than spend all summer in here beavering away, trying to do good, and have the whole thing wrecked when we come back at the end of August because the DUP has not been engaged. The logic is that either the DUP is engaged, or it is not. If it is engaged, then we will all work hard at this. If not, then I do not see much point, as Martin McGuinness said the last day, in us all spending time trying to solve things here if one of the major parties is not involved.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That only applies to two of the subgroups. The DUP is nominating to the economic subgroup.

Dr McCrea: Mr McFarland should exercise his mind and find out what Martin McGuinness did say. He said that after beavering through the work, if Sinn Féin did not like the final report, his party would not even go to the Assembly to debate it. Why did Mr McFarland just choose the DUP? Why did he not reflect the fact that, after all the beavering away, and even if an excellent report which could be accepted at the PFG Committee were produced, Martin McGuinness said that if it did not suit him, none of his colleagues would go to the Assembly to debate it. It is supposed to be reported to the Assembly. He said that after all your work, as far as he was concerned, he would scupper it all, because he would not allow it to get to the Assembly. So perhaps Mr McFarland could turn some of his thoughts to Sinn Féin/IRA.

Mr McFarland: Chairman, at our last meeting I made the comment strongly to Martin McGuinness about the difficulties that we faced if Sinn Féin were going to keep blocking normal debate. In fact, at one stage, several meetings ago, I made an impassioned plea to John O'Dowd that he take the issue back to the hierarchy and see whether it could reconsider its blocking of plenaries etc. Therefore, I am on record as stating that Sinn Féin should play its part in this. I am not one to speak for Martin McGuinness, but he said that if the DUP were not fully engaged in this, Sinn Féin were not going to take part.

That is daft. We need all the parties in the Assembly to genuinely engage and try to find a way forward so that we can have a profitable summer and a profitable debate in September. However, I say again that there is no point in the rest of us working away here if either Sinn Féin or the DUP is not playing the game.

Dr Farren: I ask the DUP to reflect on the curious position that it is adopting. It is hard to understand. The subgroup to deal with institutional matters would, I imagine, have as most of its agenda the very issues that were under discussion during the review of the operation of the Good Friday Agreement.

As I understand it, the DUP had worked out the changes that it wanted to see to the operation of the institutions. Since those institutions — if we get up and running again — have to be operated by all of the parties, I fail to understand why the DUP is refusing to engage with the other parties or to try to convince them that its proposed changes should be adopted. Otherwise it is going to find that there is to be, as far as we are concerned, no engagement with them in any subsequent situation.

That raises a fundamental issue. Perhaps it is because the DUP already has a sense of some guarantees from the Northern Ireland Office and Minister David Hanson with respect to the institutional changes that it is seeking. When this matter was being discussed in the House of Commons some months ago, David Hanson said that, given its mandate, the DUP had to have changes. Therefore, the party is taking it as read that the changes it seeks are already conceded.

If that is the case, the Secretary of State must clarify to us what recognition he would give to any recommendations for change and what their purpose would be, particularly if we found ourselves in a situation in which one party seeking many changes decided to absent itself. Would that be because it already has guarantees that those changes would be made, and there was no point in talking to the rest of us?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Murphy and Mr McNarry are due to speak, but I think it is important, since we are dealing with the meeting that we had with the Secretary of State on 11 July, that Mr Molloy should let us know if there is anything that we have missed, or if there is anything that he wishes to add about the outcome of that meeting.

Mr Molloy: You have covered all the issues of concern that we asked questions on, Mr Chairman. It is important to recognise the Secretary of State's line that we set up the subgroups as quickly as possible. He made it clear that he wanted all the parties to engage in those subgroups and come up with reports to this Committee. He also said that in doing that, he hoped that this Committee would have a report to present to a plenary sitting in which all parties would take part.

The question is whether the work will be done in this Committee to produce a report, and whether this Committee and the subgroups are going to be inclusive. We talked to the Secretary of State about the fact that some issues, particularly policing, justice and criminality, were being covered over. They were not being discussed, or were being brushed under the carpet.

We asked him whether those issues would be dealt with. He clearly said that it would be up to the subgroups to deal with the issues. The subgroups would also be responsible for the issues raised by political parties in documents, reports and presentations. The roles of the subgroups and the direction of the Secretary of State are clear: the Committee must set up the subgroups and get the work done so that we have something to report at the end of the summer.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Can I ask you to stay, Mr Molloy, because we will return to this issue?

Mr Murphy: I was not in attendance at the previous meeting, but I have read the Hansard report. Martin McGuinness's comments on Sinn Féin's stance on the work of the subgroups are clear. He also expressed his support for that work being debated in a plenary sitting.

The DUP's position on being involved in only one subgroup raises questions about the effectiveness of the other two subgroups. Seán Farren has asked a legitimate question about the institutions. If there were to be agreement and a report were to be compiled on how the outstanding issues arising from the review of the Good Friday Agreement should be handled, what would its status be, considering that, despite the DUP's non-involvement, that party could still veto the report even going through this Committee? Although Sinn Féin is prepared to be involved in this work, I am loathe to ask members to come in and spend the summer working if there is no clear view of how their work will be progressed if one party is not involved and can block the work of this Committee. Where will that work stand in relation to both Governments — particularly the British Government — and what will its status be at the end of the consultation period? The DUP's attitude raises questions as to how either of those two subgroups could work.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): A party may sit in a subgroup and subsequently try to overturn a report at this Committee. We have checked with Arthur Moir, the Clerk to the Assembly, on this issue: if the report reached the Floor of the House, it could be made the subject of a petition of concern, which requires cross-community support. The report could also be blocked at that stage. It is important that members realise that several mechanisms could be used.

Mr Murphy: If members were participating in a subgroup, the level of agreement on certain issues would be clear. It is proposed that four parties go off and discuss different issues. They will be completely in the dark about the DUP's attitude on the subjects that they are discussing and may find that all their work comes to nought. That is a poor basis on which to ask people to spend their summer working.

Mr McNarry: On the basis of what I have heard so far — and it is within my remit to say this — I am happy for a subgroup on economic challenges to produce a report in line with what is being discussed. However, is there consensus that a subgroup report would be sent to the Assembly for debate? We have talked about it loosely and have said that that might happen, but I want specifics. If a subgroup compiles a report and brings it to this Committee, would that report have a fairly quick passage to the Assembly for debate? Various mechanisms are in place, but we need to establish the status of the subgroup reports and the Assembly debate.

It would be unsatisfactory to return to take-note mode. Mr McCrea has said that he does not have the authority to move on the issue of the two subgroups. We could deal with the issue of one subgroup, where there might be movement and on which we all could agree, or we could hold out for all three subgroups; that would be unfortunate.

We must bear in mind that we have already debated the economy in the Assembly. The Assembly requested that a working group be set up and handled by a Committee other than this one, and that not only party experts, but outside experts, should be consulted. Either way, we can see the mechanism for setting up such a working group.

However, simply setting up a subgroup will not be enough: we must be certain that if it meets and prepares a report for this Committee, the filibustering will not begin again because this Committee works on the principle of consensus — and it has yet to be decided whether the subgroup would have to reach unanimous or majority agreement on any such report, or whether, as Seán Farren asked, members who disagree with it can input into it.

It would be appropriate that consensus in principle should be reached before we go down that route so that if this Committee received a report from a subgroup, a debate on it could take place. That seems logical, and the public would want it, too.

12.30 pm

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It would be difficult for the Committee to make an upfront decision that there would be consensus before knowing the content of the report or the deliberations. That would be unusual.

Mr McNarry: I did not say that; I said that there would be consensus in principle — in other words, the blocking mechanisms should sit here. Let us not forget that we are in this position because, for as long as I have been on the Committee, Sinn Féin has blocked every attempt to have a debate on the issues that we have discussed here. When there has been a debate, Sinn Féin has refused to go to it, yet its members sit around this table and talk about engagement. I am all for engagement, but that also involves debating.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I will take that as a proposal, Mr McNarry, and we will vote on it after Rev McCrea has spoken. I understand that has a tight deadline.

Dr McCrea: Let me make this clear: the Secretary of State has told us that he is directing us. All we want is the Secretary of State's mind on the matter. We must play by the rules. The Secretary of State said that he was directing the Committee to set up subgroups; therefore it is not in the Committee's gift to set them up. However, he said that he could not direct any party to participate in any subgroups, although he may want it to do so.

Some members want to set up subgroups. I am sorry, but they have no power to do so. The Secretary of State has the power. I was reminded at the last meeting that this is the Secretary of State's Assembly and that he had the power to issue directions. Members wanted direction and now they have it. The Secretary of State has directed them to set up subgroups; now that we have them, those that wanted them can be participants in them. The DUP is not preventing anyone from being a participant and from discussing those issues.

Most of the Committee wanted to report to the Assembly on progress in this Committee, but, once again, Sinn Féin blocked that debate. Let us play by the rules. Sinn Féin cannot play by the rules one day and then object to another party playing by those rules the next. What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. Do not forget that.

I want to make it abundantly clear that the Secretary of State's direction said that he could not make any party participate in the subgroups. If parties were to participate, they could nominate one member from the Preparation for Government Committee and one other individual. I have made it clear from the very beginning that we are not here to negotiate. The Secretary of State gave the Committee a clear remit to scope the issues, and we are seeking to do what he told us to do. We have scoped the issues and have identified major obstacles to getting devolved government back — ongoing paramilitarism, criminality and thuggery, and the lack of support for the security forces in their efforts against the criminals in our society. I am sad to say that that support has not been forthcoming and was even regarded as a dead issue.

I am pointing out that you can talk around the subject and cajole yourselves as much as you like, but the DUP delegation is stating that it will participate in and nominate to the subgroup on the economic challenges that face Northern Ireland, even though it does not believe that that subgroup should have come through this Committee — it should have come through the Business Committee. As the Secretary of State has directed that that subgroup should get off the ground, there is no reason why that cannot happen. However, I have no authority whatsoever to nominate to the other two subgroups.

Mr Ford: Contributions from around the table have shown the limitations of this Committee with or without subgroups and emphasise that the significant business of restoring devolution will happen only when the two Governments engage in the process at whatever stage in the autumn they get round to it.

There are dangers in taking the line that we should merely examine the economy, because, in one sense, that is too easy. Economic challenges face Northern Ireland regardless of whether there is devolution and regardless of the structures of that devolution. Frankly, the work done with the Northern Ireland Business Alliance and the other social partners in the past year or two has shown that very little prevents the five parties and the social partners from coming together on economic issues anyway.

Therefore we could suggest that establishing the subgroup on the economic challenges means that some sort of work was being done. However, that would merely prove that we can discuss an easy topic but cannot tackle the real issues, which are the institutional issues and those that are concerned with the devolution of justice. If this Committee cannot tackle meaningfully those issues, perhaps it does not have a role to perform.

I would have thought that, over the coming weeks when nothing else is happening, the Committee has a role to play by working on those issues. That may mean that a party that does not take part in the subgroups will have the power of veto in this Committee. However, I do not regard this Committee's discussions and an Assembly debate as being the end of the process; they merely open it up for the negotiations in which the two Governments have to be major parties in the autumn. Frankly, the sooner we get down to that, the better. If that means that the subgroups work over the next six weeks — when the Governments are asleep — and get some of the groundwork done, I can see virtue in all three subgroups doing whatever work they can.

Mr McFarland: We are possibly getting ahead of ourselves. For the fifty-fifth time, we must remind ourselves that this Committee was set up to scope or identify the issues; it is not a negotiation Committee. At the last meeting, we discussed the fact that we have identified some outline issues but that the detail of those is not at all clear. Therefore more work has to be done to identify exactly what we should look at within those larger issues.

There is a difference between the two other subgroups that were discussed in the Secretary of State's letter and the subgroup that the Assembly recommended. Mr McNarry's suggestion that the subgroup on the economy should go ahead if we are all willing to take part in it makes lots of sense. Certainly, my party would need to consult further with its leadership if the DUP is not playing on the other two subgroups. There are concerns about whether we spend time blethering over the summer and have the whole thing crash in August. We support the formation of the subgroup on economics, because that was a separate Assembly recommendation, but we would need to have a timeout and discuss further whether, if all the parties are not engaged, it is worth our taking part in the other two.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mrs Dodds, does your point refer to the proposal?

Mrs D Dodds: There are a couple of points that I want to raise. I would like Mr McNarry to restate his proposal so that we can go through it. There is an interesting point in that: we can do everything and anything that we want to with an economic subgroup. The report can come here and can be vetoed from going to the Assembly anyway, if that is the desire of one particular group.

Mr McNarry has made a valid point, and it is worth teasing that out.

The DUP has expressed concern about the subgroups. Our party is due to meet the Secretary of State to discuss those issues with him, and, until that happens, we have no authority to take those matters forward in this Committee.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is very helpful. Are you saying that the DUP is not saying no in principle to joining the subgroups, but that, as things stand, you do not have the authority to nominate?

Mrs D Dodds: We do not have the authority to nominate to the subgroups, and I do not know whether we will nominate to them at all. However, as Mr McCrea said, the economy is a pressing matter that has been pushed through the Assembly and spoken about several times. Economic issues will be ongoing for a considerable time.

Dr Farren: Given the more negative starting point, what has just been said is a little more positive. When will the DUP's meeting with the Secretary of State take place? If that happens fairly soon that party could get clarification about the subgroups. Its concerns would also be allayed, and it would feel free to nominate — as it already can to the economic subgroup — and we would know for sure where we are likely to be. Given that members here have reservations about joining one subgroup because not everyone will join the other two, would it not be more appropriate for us to postpone taking decisions? Before we make our final decisions, therefore, would it not be better to hear definitively from the DUP whether it will nominate? Given that we are good at losing time, another day or two will not add to, or subtract very much from, our endeavours.

Mrs D Dodds: I am happy to clarify as best I can. A number of telephone conversations took place last week, and those will be firmed up at a meeting reasonably soon. I do not have a diary date for that meeting because of holidays — the Westminster recess is due to start next week. However, I presume that it will be firmed up fairly soon.

My party is firmly of the view that this Committee was set up to identify and scope the issues. Even though we do not agree that this matter should go through this Committee, the DUP is happy to take part in the economic subgroup because that subject has been debated and proposed as the will of the Assembly. However, the other subgroups will require further consideration.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Before I bring in Mr McNarry and Mr Ford, Seán's proposal about postponing for a few days causes practical problems for the Committee's Clerking arrangements. It is incumbent upon me as Chairman to point out that it will be incredibly difficult to complete our work in time, even if we had agreement this afternoon. We are talking about debating a report on 19 August so that the Committee can refer it to the Business Committee the following week for debate on 4 and 5 September.

I have had discussions with the Clerks, and they have a full team that is assembled and ready to go. That is entirely in order, as it does not pre-empt any decision of the Committee. However, it had to be done in case we take the decision to go ahead.

Dr Farren: My proposal tries to put pressure on the DUP to state a definitive position so that we all know precisely where we stand on the matter. Parties that feel that they would not participate in any of the subgroups because another party would not participate in two of them would know for definite that that was the situation. Would the DUP not bear in mind the points that were made about the pressures of servicing the subgroups? Could it expedite its consultation with the Secretary of State and let us know its position within 24 hours?

Mr McFarland: Earlier, Dr Farren raised a point about whether there was any point in our discussing the issues if a deal has already been done between the Secretary of State and the DUP. He asked that clarification be sought from the Secretary of State on the position with regard to the DUP's having been promised the measures contained in the comprehensive agreement. If such a deal has been struck, our discussions here are irrelevant.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Next to speak is Mrs Dodds, definitely followed by Mr McNarry. Mr McNarry has asked several times to speak, and I am conscious that having had one walkout I do not want a second.

Mrs D Dodds: I thank Mr McNarry for his patience. Diary dates are beyond my control. I do not want to take away from what Mr McNarry said, but there is a point that must be debated and a conclusion that must be reached. Will there be agreement that whatever comes back to this Committee from the subgroups will be debated in the Assembly? I read in the newspapers this morning that the Secretary of State would negotiate directly with Sinn Féin on policing and justice. I wonder, therefore, about the point of our discussions.

Mr McNarry: Sinn Féin is in an enviable position. When the Ulster Unionists were in the position that the DUP is in now, there were separate negotiations and deals. We understand that, as we have experience of it. Sitting here, we have a sense of déjà vu: the situation may be new to the Democratic Unionist Party, but it is not new to Sinn Féin, which knows how to play its part well.

Mrs Dodds has been open with us; she has told us what she can do and where the difficulties lie. However, she also told us of the likelihood of a decision being taken at an appropriate time. I do not know what the rest of the Committee thinks, but the weather is lovely —

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is the only thing on which we agree, Mr McNarry.

Mr McNarry: On the basis of what I received in the post — and I thank the Committee Clerk for getting it to us in time — I came here today thinking that there was scope to move matters on. We can take a decision, Seán, on forming one subgroup, and we should. The Secretary of State's direction stands irrespective of whether we move the matter back. Mr McCrea said that we would play by the rules, one of which says that a subgroup may meet whether or not all party representatives are present.

I dislike intensely Sinn Féin's attitude to debates; nevertheless, I respect its right to take that attitude. We should adopt that approach when making a judgement on any party, and implement point 5 of the Secretary of State's letter. We should get down to work and get on with the subgroup on economic issues, in line with the Secretary of State's direction.

However, I have one reservation. It does not matter whether we take that decision today, although I would like us to do so. However, whenever we take that decision, we must reach consensus in principle that a report from the subgroup should find its way to the Assembly for debate. Otherwise, we are wasting our time because people will adopt the tactics of staying away or of saying that they need not say too much, and instead wait until matters come before this Committee where the rules require consensus. Therefore, the type of compromise indicated in the Secretary of State's letter about decisions being taken by a simple majority is useless.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I shall call Mr Ford, who has been waiting for a while. After that, in the absence of anyone's indicating disapproval of Mr McNarry's proposal, I shall ask for consensus.

Mr Ford: I met the Secretary of State last week. He said he would be setting up meetings with the five party leaders before Westminster rises for the summer, which effectively means that we are potentially waiting until the middle of next week. I presume that will create huge difficulties about the timetabling arrangements you spoke about. If we are examining that matter, we really must know that the potential timescale for the DUP to take a decision will be much sooner than the end of next week.

I am not sure that we are in a position to proceed if the DUP cannot give us a better undertaking.

Mr Molloy: On the original matter, we have a clear direction from the Secretary of State to set up the subgroups. Why do we not set up the subgroups? Some parties will wish to tie into that, other parties will still have the option to pull out. All parties have the option to pull out of those subgroups. The clear direction is for us to set up the subgroups today. After that, it is up to the parties whether they wish to participate. That may apply to one or more parties.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): If we do not set up the subgroups today, it will be practically impossible, from the pure mechanics of it, to get this process finished. Mr McNarry has made a proposal. I think that I detect a proposal from Dr Farren as well.

Dr Farren: On a point of procedure, I do not think that any proposals are required if we are moving to implement the direction of the Secretary of State.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is a different proposal, Mr Farren. It is the principle that if a report comes from the subgroups, it will be referred to the Assembly and that the Committee will not be exercising a veto to stop that from happening. I understand that you have a proposal seeking clarification from the Secretary of State on the comprehensive agreement.

Dr Farren: That will come up in the course of discussion on the matters related to subgroup's work, if the subgroup gets under way. I was probing the DUP at the time, if you recall.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I shall take Mr McNarry's proposal. Mr McNarry, do you wish to formally move the proposal that we accept the principle that whatever comes from the subgroup or subgroups will go to the Assembly for debate?

Mr McNarry indicated assent.

Mr Murphy, what is your comment on that?

Mr Murphy: It is difficult to accept the proposal on the basis that something may happen in the future. We have made it very clear that we want the subgroups to work. The logical process of that work is that whatever reports they can put together should come to this Committee for approval and then go to the Assembly for debate. We are quite happy for that to happen. However, it is illogical to make a commitment now on the basis that we are not even sure that the subgroups will work at all because the DUP will attend only one of them. That is the DUP's indication to date. Others may, in the light of that, review their participation in all of the subgroups. It is not logical to make commitments on what we will do with the reports in six weeks' time on the basis of this very shaky start.

I can assure members, if they want assurance, that if the subgroups work properly and get reports back to this Committee, we are quite happy to debate those in plenary. However, I am not going to make a commitment now when we are not even sure that the subgroups are going to get off the ground at all.

Mr McNarry: Conor, perhaps you understand that when Martin McGuinness was sitting where you are sitting, he was unable to give that assurance. He was unable to give any assurance. Sinn Féin's position is based on whether it likes what it hears or reads, and an assurance has not been made. I have heard Sinn Féin's words before, not just from your mouth, but from other representatives of your party. There is still an exit for you in what you have said.

Mr Murphy: I was not at the last meeting, when Martin McGuinness talked about indications we had given to the Secretary of State, the British Prime Minister and the Taoiseach that:

"we will play our part in any subcommittees because we believe that there is important work to be done. Sinn Féin passionately hopes that progress will be made and that the Preparation for Government Committee will be in a position, on the basis of the productive work that is being done, to put forward issues for debate in the Assembly. That is our position."

— [Official Report, Bound Volume 19, page CPG 232]

I quoted from the Hansard report of what Martin McGuinness said at the last Committee meeting.

That is our position, and it is fairly clear. However, on the basis that the DUP has indicated that it may engage in only one of the subgroups and that others therefore may have to review their positions, Sinn Féin will now not tie itself to the outcome and its attitude to it.

Mr McNarry: You are only tying yourself to a principle.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr McNarry, it is clear that there is not consensus on this proposal.

Mr McNarry: Anything that comes from this side of the table always seems to be met with a veto from the other side, so what is new?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Those are the rules by which we are bound. We are left in the position where we have a direction from the Secretary of State, telling us to establish the subgroups. We have no option. We must therefore move on to nominate representatives from this Committee and outsiders. For instance, Mr Ford has already advised us of names. We must also consider such issues as chairmanship and terms of reference. That does not have to be done by consensus; because it is an order from the Secretary of State we have to do it, but people do not have to turn up.

Mrs D Dodds: Chairman, you mentioned chairmanship. Does it not say that each subgroup shall be chaired by either of the two independent Chairs?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes, but this Committee, by consensus, could decide to appoint three other chairmen to carry the load. However, as things stand, it would be for Mr Molloy and me to chair the subgroups, and we are prepared to do it. We are not going anywhere this summer.

Mr Kennedy: What a sacrifice!

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We might all have a very long holiday from 24 November, Mr Kennedy.

Mr Ford: If the two of you are prepared to chair the subgroups as well as this Committee, you spare us one decision. Let us move on.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is entirely a matter for this Committee.

Mr McFarland: Given that people are away over the summer, and that if the subgroups get up and running, there will be an intensive workload if we are to report by the middle of August. It would make sense to ask the other three parties to nominate a reserve, regardless of whether they are used, so that if neither you nor Mr Molloy are available the whole thing does not crash because there is no independent Chairman.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That proposal must reach consensus. Are there any variations?

Mrs D Dodds: My party's view is that there should be an independent Chairman set up by the Office of the Speaker.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There is no consensus, so it looks as if you are stuck with Mr Molloy and me.

Mr Kennedy: As long as neither of you is run over by a bus.

Mr Ford: It is good to see the DUP so keen on Mr Molloy's taking the Chair so often.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is the Secretary of State's decision and not mine.

Mr McFarland: Chairman, are you looking for nominations?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): No, we do not have consensus.

Mr McFarland: I meant nominations for the subgroups.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Clerks have prepared a draft paper on procedures. It might be worth taking five minutes to look at it.

The Committee Clerk: The first paper details procedures that would apply to all subgroups; attached to that are suggested terms of reference for each of the subgroups. All subgroups will operate under the same procedures as regards the number of members required for a quorum, for example.

Rooms are available if parties wish to discuss these matters further.

The Committee was suspended at 1.00 pm.

On resuming —

1.09 pm

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Have all members had a chance to look at the paper detailing draft procedures for the subgroups? Some procedural aspects are at the Committee's discretion; others are subject to the Secretary of State's direction.

I want to re-emphasise a point that I did not make clear this morning. A question arose as to whether issues of criminality and decommissioning could be considered by the relevant subgroup. It is important that I should include in the record what the Secretary of State wrote:

"I am content for the subgroup on devolution of justice and policing to consider issues of criminality and decommissioning if they agree to do so. It is of course also open to the PFG, under the direction I issued on 26 May 2006 establishing the PFG, to establish other sub committees to look at specific issues."

The letter makes clear that the answer to the question that Rev McCrea raised, as to whether that subgroup could consider criminality and decommissioning, is a definite yes. The letter was sent to Mr Molloy and myself in our roles as Chairmen to the Committee; it was not copied to the Committee, but copies will be distributed. It is important that members see that crucial paragraph. It is a commentary on the direction of 26 May.

Members will also have copies of the suggested procedures for all three subgroups. We need to agree the procedures today if we are to establish the subgroups.

Mr Kennedy: The suggested procedures are described as terms of reference, but what are the powers vested in the subgroups? In the previous Assembly, Committees had the power to call persons to appear and to request papers on a range of issues. The limited time available and the unlikely event of any of the subgroups actually doing anything make one cynical. However, it would be helpful to know the scope of the subgroups, in addition to the terms of reference, and whether that has been agreed.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is a very valuable point, Mr Kennedy. I am glad that you raised it. I understand that Statutory Committees of the Assembly have the power to call persons and request papers. We do not have such a power, but we can ask. I am sure that if a subgroup asked the NIO or the PSNI to give evidence or to send papers, they would — but they could not be compelled to do so. Similarly, I suspect that the CBI or DETI would appear before the subgroup on economic challenges, for example. However, neither we, as a Committee, nor a subgroup can call a person or body to the Bar of the House and admonish them for not turning up.

Mr Kennedy: If they were established, would the subgroups have a role such as you outlined?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We can ask anyone to provide the Committee with evidence, as any Committee of the Assembly can, but we do not have that overarching power of compulsion.

Mr Murphy: In relation to the letter that you read out, were the Secretary of State's clarifications of the issues that are of concern to us made available to the DUP before its decision not to participate in those two subgroups? I ask because you made particular reference to an issue that was of particular concern to William McCrea, who raised it at the last meeting. For our own understanding of what is going on, I would like to know whether that was clear to the DUP before its decision not to participate or whether it was still an outstanding point of concern.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I am seeking advice from Mr Molloy on that. I think that the letter was in my pigeonhole on the evening of July 11. Certainly, there was not time to show it to anyone else before this morning. In fact, as I read from it this morning, I was unaware that Mr Molloy and I had received the letter but that, at that stage, no one else had.

That is why I thought it important that the letter be copied to everyone. I thought that it had been attached to the papers containing the Secretary of State's direction, but it was not. It lists the Secretary of State's comments on the issues raised by the Committee. The DUP had no knowledge of the letter until parts of it were read out this morning.

Mr Murphy: Therefore, the letter could have some bearing on the DUP's decision on the policing and justice subgroup.

1.15 pm

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes. Dr McCrea raised that issue, and from what he said, it appeared to me that he was not aware of the contents of the relevant paragraph, which states that criminality and decommissioning could be considered. That is why it dawned on me that he had not seen the letter, and I, therefore, felt it important that it be copied to each party. I hope that that is clear to everyone.

Mr Molloy, can you recall when you received the letter?

Mr Molloy: I think that I received mine in the post on Saturday morning, meaning that it was probably in my pigeonhole on either Wednesday or Thursday. I referred to the letter earlier when I mentioned the Secretary of State's comments. Of course, Mr McCrea and other members did not have a copy of it then.

However, I referred to it and suggested that a subgroup on policing and justice could address the issues that have been raised in this Committee and on previous occasions.

Mr McNarry: Mr Chairman, in case it is the intention of Sinn Féin and Conor Murphy to suggest as much, can I make it clear that neither your integrity nor Mr Molloy's are in doubt? There is no implication that letters that you receive are shown to your parties before they are passed to the other parties. I understand that that is not your role and that you are independent Chairmen, and it would be best for the Committee if we could agree to work on that basis. There will be occasions when you will get letters, and temptation could be a challenge to you. By the same token, Mr Molloy could show letters that he receives to members of his party. The Committee must work on a better basis than that.

Mr Murphy: I want to make it clear that my question did not refer to Mr Wells's integrity as a Chairman. Rather it was to know whether the DUP had been aware of the letter. There was further reference to the DUP's having had several phone conversations with the Secretary of State over the past few days, and my question was to ascertain whether it was aware that the policing and justice issues would be referred to a subgroup. If the DUP was not aware of that possibility, would the contents of the letter have an implication on its decision?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I thank members for their clarification. To avoid ambiguity, it was important for members to see the letter. It was the Secretary of State's intention that the letter be seen by the entire Committee. However, with the summer holidays, there was a degree of confusion. I am glad that members at least have the letter now.

Mr Molloy: I wish to clarify that I did not circulate the letter to members of my party.

Mr McNarry: I am glad that you made that point.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It was obvious from the reaction of the members here that no one had seen the letter.

Mr McNarry: It does not stop the NIO circulating documents.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We shall move on to the draft guidelines that the Committee Clerks have kindly provided for us. Perhaps we should consider them point by point.

Mrs D Dodds: Have these guidelines been prepared by the Clerks, using —

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Clerks have a lot of experience of our normal Committee procedures. Also, given that we have no option but to, they have taken account of the directions from the Secretary of State.

Are there any comments on the first point?

Mr McFarland: Are you referring to the terms of reference?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes, the procedures for subgroups. It starts:

“The terms of reference for the subgroups will be those agreed by the Committee on the Preparation for Government”.

Is everyone agreed?

Mr McFarland: On the terms of reference?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes, in other words, this Committee agrees the terms of reference for the subgroups. I think that that is taken as read: we have no choice.

Dr Farren: Are you proposing that we agree the terms of reference as listed?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): No, no. We need to go through them. Simply to agree them would be a bit presumptuous.

Dr Farren: I thought you were inviting us to agree what is there.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Unfortunately, we do not have any discretion on section 2, which deals with the membership of the subgroups. We have been told that each party must provide one Member who sits on the Committee on the Preparation for Government and one other Assembly Member. That will put quite a burden on the Alliance Party because it has only two members available to sit on the three committees. It will be quite busy.

Mr Ford: We are up to it, Chair; do not worry.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Committee can note that that is how it will work.

Mr Murphy: Is there not flexibility in the arrangement to allow for substitutions?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes. The Secretary of State said that he is happy for deputies to be appointed. Given that it is almost August, we will have to use that discretion, because it is unrealistic for everyone around this table to be available for the next month. Only Mr Molloy and I are available for the entire time. Any nominated deputies must be available, so members need to check with their colleagues. It has been decided that Mr Molloy and I will chair the subgroups.

We need to consider the issue of having a quorum for those subgroups. What is the plural of quorum?

The Committee Clerk: Quora.

Mr McCarthy: With your knowledge and recent award from ‘The Politics Show’, you should have known that, Chair. [Laughter.]

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I was just lucky.

The quorum for this Committee is seven. It has never been an issue because there has normally been a good turnout. Excluding the chairperson, what does the Committee feel about the quorum being six or seven for the subgroups, which will comprise 10 members, with two from each party?

Ms Gildernew: It probably has to be six, given the fact that if it were seven, four parties would have to participate. The quorum should be six in case one party decides not to participate.

Mr Ford: Given that the voting is specified in the direction as voting by a simple party majority, would it not be simpler to also spell out the quorum in party terms so that the quorum is three parties?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Technically, that means that a subgroup might have only three people.

Dr McDonnell: The quorum for the subgroups should be at least six members from at least three parties.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I feel that that is a better option. Are there any other suggestions?

Mr Ford: If there are at least six members there will be at least three parties, given that there are only two members from each party.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is where the deputies come in.

Mr McNarry: Why are extra members allowed on those subgroups and not on this Committee?

Ms Gildernew: That is because you cannot split the Committee in half, David.

Mrs D Dodds: I am happy to listen to members’ views on procedures for the subgroups. My party has not taken a decision on the forming of the subgroups. We will not agree fully to procedures and drafts that we received only 10 minutes ago, but will seek to return to them. The DUP will take up a number of issues in relation to the subgroups with the Secretary of State.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr McCrea has agreed to submit nominations for the economic subgroup. May I take it that the DUP is agreed on that one?

Mrs D Dodds: I am concerned about some of the things that we are told are directions from the Secretary of State — I would argue that those are not directions. As we proceed, I will make those concerns known. I am happy to listen to members’ views, but I will not sign up my party to a subgroup when I know that it will be unhappy about some of the procedures.

Dr Farren: Perhaps you will tell us what some of those procedures are.

Mrs D Dodds: We are unhappy with point 7.

Dr Farren: That is a direction.

Mrs D Dodds: That is why we are going to see the Secretary of State. That is the kind of concern we want to make clear to the Secretary of State.

Mr McNarry: May we possibly have a ruling on this? I respect what Mrs Dodds and Rev William McCrea have said. Although I am not saying that the DUP is in a privileged position, it is saying that it has the opportunity to meet the Secretary of State. We have conceded that the meeting will take place and we respect that.

How would the Committee deal with a similar situation should it arise? A party could say that it had a meeting with the Secretary of State to discuss issues that cross over into matters that were discussed in this Committee, but, rather than discuss them in the Committee, it wanted to discuss them with the Secretary of State to decide what to do.

That seems to be locking the Committee out. The DUP is doing it now, but any party could adopt that attitude. My party leader has a meeting with the Secretary of State, and meetings will continue until November. Is there some way that we can establish where we are going? With due respect to Mrs Dodds and the DUP, we cannot make progress.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I will take a round of members on this subject.

Mrs D Dodds: I want to clarify the point. I accept fully what Mr McNarry says — any party can say: “Hold on, you have to wait until we see the Secretary of State”.

It is not just the Secretary of State to whom we will speak; we will also speak to the rest of the party about our attitude to the issues. I accept that it would be unreasonable for any party to adopt such a blocking attitude.

However, my party considers that the setting up of subgroups is moving the guidelines. The DUP agreed to sit on the Committee to scope issues that were hindering the return of devolution. We have sat on this Committee faithfully for several weeks and have identified issue after issue, yet there was not even agreement that they should go to the Assembly for debate. We are still here, and that is an act of good faith that devolution is important to the DUP.

However, you also must respect that the Secretary of State has moved some issues on significantly, and that requires debate. I will return to the Committee on the matter.

Mr McNarry: That is significant and I am very grateful. In effect, the DUP is saying that the Committee has fulfilled its scoping exercise and now the DUP wants to talk to the Secretary of State about the next steps. It is entitled to do that, but it is taking the matter to the Secretary of State rather than to this Committee. It is saying that it studiously attended the Committee meetings and carried out the task of scoping; but now the Committee is turning itself into something else and the DUP wants to discuss that with the Secretary of State.

Mrs D Dodds: And with the party.

Mr McNarry: And then with the party. Quite honestly, until that discussion takes place, that is a very definite position adopted by the DUP.

Mr Ford: When the Secretary of State issues a direction, this Committee must work with it. Each of us may wish to go running to the Secretary of State, the Prime Minister, the Taoiseach, the President of the United States or whoever else we fancy to get the direction changed, but if the Committee does not work with the direction before it when it meets, it will never get anywhere.

The subgroups should not come as a surprise to anyone around the table today.

Weeks ago we said that we would now be — in Alan MacFarland’s elegant phrase — “mining down” that which we had previously “scoped out”. If nothing else we are doing wonders for the English language. In fact, we knew what was coming. Our draft procedures are based on existing Assembly procedures and the directions from the Secretary of State. I do not know that we can do anything else.

Frankly, if the DUP does not send people of sufficient seniority to take decisions for the party, and if every issue raised requires a DUP adjournment for full party consultation, then it does not treat this Committee seriously. Other people are here with a remit from their parties to take decisions within the broad parameters of where the Committee has been going. What we discuss today cannot be a secret. I do not see how we can be expected to continue postponing decisions every week.

1.30 pm

Mr McFarland: Chairman, this is simple. We cannot get past the procedures for subgroups or the terms of reference without consensus on this body. Mrs Dodds is not able to give consensus because she has to talk to the Secretary of State. There is no point; we will not get consensus either on the procedures, because this Committee has to have consensus on them, or on the terms of reference, because point 1 states that the terms of reference are to be agreed by this Committee. We will not get past those two things because — unless I misunderstood — Mrs Dodds made it clear that she has no authority to make decisions in advance of the meeting with the Secretary of State and a meeting with her party.

Mrs D Dodds: I have considerable authority to take this forward along a particular line that my party has clearly and openly set out. I am given five minutes to look at a set of procedures and terms of reference, which are significant, which we may wish to add to or take away from, and consider. It is not inappropriate to do that at that stage, as I said earlier. Moreover, some of the directions in this are very difficult for my party. They move from the Secretary of State saying:

“I am content for them to operate by a simple majority of voting” to:

“Decisions of a subgroup shall be by a simple majority of those voting.”

Mr McFarland: Chairman, I do not judge whether it is right or wrong. From what Mrs Dodds has said, this is not solvable today. No matter how many times we go round the room, it will not be solvable, in that the DUP is unable — rightly or wrongly — to give authority and agreement to either the procedures or the terms of reference.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): No doubt a meeting with the Secretary of State will move this forward a bit. The problem is that, from the purely practical point of view, I do not know how much time we can afford to adjourn for these issues.

Mr McFarland: Unless Mrs Dodds is prepared to change her mind and to give consensus to procedures and terms of reference, which she has just said she is not prepared to do — and given that we are not into subgroups where it is by a majority, we can all vote, and therefore consensus is not required — if the DUP is unable to give consensus to these two issues, it does not matter how many times we go round this, it is not solvable.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Secretary of State could issue another determination and make all these mandatory.

Mr McFarland: Absolutely. No problem at all. What I say is that now, at this meeting, as we stand here at 1.35 pm today, this is not solvable.

Dr Farren: Neither Mrs Dodds nor her party has any discretion with respect to point 7 on the procedures for the subgroup. The key direction is point 6 in the determination made by the Secretary of State:

“Decisions of a subgroup shall be by simple majority of those voting.”

So the reference to contentment, or whatever, is a reference that has no other interpretation than that which is there by determination. Therefore we should proceed on that issue, because, as I understand the English language, it is not within our discretion to say otherwise — to say that he is wrong.

Mr McFarland: My understanding is that the Committee must have consensus on this document, “Procedures for Sub-Groups”, regardless of individual choice.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Committee must have consensus only on those elements that are not subject to a direction. We have two documents: one is the explanatory letter from the Secretary of State, which has no standing apart from that; the second is the direction by which we must abide. Point 6 of the direction clearly states that decisions must be taken by majority vote.

Mr McFarland: Mrs Dodds can choose whichever one of these she objects to, or all of them, or none of them. She is required to give her consensus to this document — is that correct?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): She is required to give consensus only to the points that are not directions.

Mr McFarland: This document is headed “Procedures for Sub-Groups”. Is she required to give consensus to this document?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes.

Mr McFarland: Therefore, she is required to give consensus. Point 1 states that the DUP is also required to give consensus to each of the pages headed “Terms of Reference”. For whatever reason, rightly or wrongly — we are not making a judgement — Mrs Dodds has said that she is not prepared to agree to the page headed “Procedures for Sub-Groups”, nor is she prepared to agree to the three subsequent pages. Unless Mrs Dodds changes her mind and says that she is prepared to give consensus to either the procedures or the terms of reference, it does not matter how many times we go round this subject. If the DUP will not move, we can spend the rest of the afternoon discussing the issue and be no further on at 5.00 pm.

Mr Ford: Seán Farren has already made the precise point that I was going to make on the specifics. Can the Committee Clerks, who have had more time to examine the procedures than I have, please advise us which procedures are not subject to a direction? It appears to me that the majority are directions.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Certainly, points 2, 7, 9 —

Mr Ford: Point 1 is as well — is it not?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): No. Point 1 is at the Committee’s discretion. There is no direction stating that we have to agree terms of reference. Point 3 is the Committee’s decision, which we have made through consensus. Point 5 is entirely a matter for this Committee and the subgroups. There is no direction on whether the subgroups meet in public or use Hansard. The document contains a mixture of directions and issues at our discretion. Any party can object to the terms of reference and the procedures, and we hit the wall again.

Mr McFarland: There is no point in going around this for another 10 minutes. Mrs Dodds is adamant and has said several times that she does not have the authority to agree these points without meeting the Secretary of State and her party. Unless the DUP changes its mind, it does not matter how long we discuss the issue.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There is another option. We can set up the subgroups and let them decide on their own procedures by majority.

Mr McFarland: Are we saying that these subgroups can agree their own terms of reference?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We could do that, apart from those points that are directions.

Mr Ford: Point 2 is a direction.

Dr Farren: Yes, that is right.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We could simply go with point 2 and establish the subgroups. By majority decision, the subgroups could decide to meet in public, use Hansard, or whatever. That is the other option.

Mr McFarland: If we take the Assembly as a precedent, can you see an Assembly Committee agreeing to allow a subcommittee to go off into the ether and decide what it wants to do?

Mr Ford: Would the Assembly have voluntarily set up this Committee in this format, with its remit and rules? We are not in charge of the territory at all.

Mr McFarland: We have a difficulty here. Until the Democratic Unionist Party meets the Secretary of State and decides whether it is taking part or agreeing the procedures and terms of reference — however much we may disagree with that position and find it frustrating — it will be hard to get round.

If the DUP is saying that it will never take part in any of these subgroups, we are into a different game. The Secretary of State will produce another direction telling the rest of the parties to go ahead with the work. There is no problem with that. Nevertheless, we are in limbo, where consensus is required and we cannot get it, however much we might wish to have it.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): You are wrong, Mr McFarland. We could go through these procedures line by line and not reach consensus on half a dozen points, but still be left with the three directions that are sufficient to establish the subgroups.

Mr McNarry: We have heard from the DUP that it cannot nominate members to two of the subgroups.

That party voted to nominate to one subgroup, but there was no consensus.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): No, we did not. We had a vote on whether it would go to the Assembly.

Mr McFarland: We thought that there was agreement on the economic subgroup because all parties agreed to sit on it. However, Chairman, you raised the point of whether Mrs Dodds agrees to the terms of reference and the procedures for the subgroups, and the DUP has said that it cannot agree to those.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mrs Dodds has a specific point.

Mrs D Dodds: I wish to clarify a principle. Mr McCrea said earlier that the DUP was prepared to attend and work on the economic subgroup. That is a point of principle, and it is there for all to hear and see. We are concerned that that goes ahead. However, we are unhappy that it will proceed through this Committee, as it should have gone through the Business Committee. That is a point of principle. We now come to the nitty-gritty of where the procedures for those subgroups are, and we have difficulties with some of them.

Mr McFarland rightly clarified that we can agree some procedures, but other points are directions over which we believe that we have no authority. I particularly object to the directions. I am sorry that he feels frustrated by that, but that is the situation. I have readily agreed to point 3, which can be agreed in this Committee, but there are some directions that my party is not happy to sign up to now.

Dr Farren: There are many directions that the SDLP is not happy with, and I have emphasised several times during our deliberations that I am frustrated, and am almost politically castrated, that we are subject to directions from the Secretary of State all the time and that we cannot decide how to conduct ourselves. We are reluctant to have to operate under a set of directions, but we are prepared to do so.

Given that the DUP has accepted that it will participate in the economic subgroup, we can proceed to establishing all the subgroups, as the direction has indicated, and the DUP can discuss its reservations with the Secretary of State. I would be surprised if the Secretary of State changed his directions at this stage, but I should not, perhaps, be that surprised if that were to happen, considering how the NIO tends to bend towards whatever force is applied to it.

It is likely that we will talk ourselves out of moving ahead. Therefore, we should proceed and set up the subgroups. If we are unable to agree terms of reference here, the Secretary of State may direct what those may be, or — miracle of miracles — the subgroups may come up with an agreed set of terms of reference.

However, we should proceed according to the direction before us.

Mr Kennedy: Chairman, my point goes to the centre of the debate; it is a technicality: can subgroups be established — with procedures or directions, or both — without the consent of all of the parties?

1.45 pm

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The answer to that is yes. Several items on the list are directions on which we cannot make a decision; they do not require consensus or a majority vote. Even if everything else falls, they will still stand and will be enough to set up the subgroups. Points 2, 7 and 9 are clear — they set up the subgroups, which can then agree their own procedures.

However, one party has made it clear that it is unhappy and that it wants to take further advice on the issue. Mr McFarland made the valid point that it is important to consider that.

Mr Kennedy: However, Chairman, your ruling is that it is possible to establish the subgroups by virtue of a mixture of procedures and directions.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes, absolutely. In fact, we have agreed on the chairmanship, and it looks as if we have probably agreed on quorums as well.

Mr Kennedy: You have no concerns about unanimity consent?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It seems that some items will not be unanimously agreed. They will fall, and they will not be part of the terms of reference.

Mr Kennedy: Therefore they will be procedures rather than directions.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes. However, the Secretary of State may step in immediately and make them directions. That would be the third or fourth time that he has done so.

Dr McDonnell: Which items will fall?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will go through them one by one to see where we stand.

Mr McNarry: Could you not get the Secretary of State here to answer the questions as we go through them instead of all this toing and froing?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): If the subgroups could summon the Secretary of State on an issue, I am sure that he would come.

Are we agreed on point 1?

Mr McFarland: Can I ensure that I understand this procedural issue correctly? After all, much of this involves procedure. The agenda for the Preparation for Government Committee lists items to be agreed or not agreed. Is it correct to say that that is what an agenda is?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Unless they are directions.

Mr McFarland: OK. Item 4 on the agenda of this Committee — which requires consensus — deals with the quorum for subgroups. You have already raised that issue, and ta-da! we have agreement on it. Is that correct? We had a vote, and there was consensus.

The next item deals with the procedures for subgroups, which is on the agenda presumably because this Committee has to agree it. Is that correct? Here are the procedures for subgroups. No matter what it says, this bit of paper goes on the agenda for agreement — or not — by this Committee, which operates by consensus. Is that correct?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes.

Mr McFarland: Therefore the question is: is this agreed or not? Consensus agreement is required. We can go through each item on the agenda and when we come to a direction, we can say that even though it is on our agenda, it does not require a vote. However, item 1 says:

“The Terms of Reference for the Sub-groups will be those agreed by the Committee on the Preparation for Government.”

Therefore item 1 requires consensus in this Committee.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Which we have achieved.

Mr McFarland: No, no — are you saying that we have achieved consensus on the terms of reference for subgroups?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We put item 1 to a vote and got consensus on it.

Dr Farren: The terms of reference have yet to be agreed. We have not agreed them.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Item 1 has been agreed to.

Mr Murphy: It is agreed that the Committee will agree them, but we have not agreed them. [Laughter.]

Dr Farren: That was my point about half an hour ago.

Mr Murphy: We have agreed the mechanism for agreeing the terms of reference, but not the terms of reference themselves.

Mr McFarland: Yes, but what did the Chairman say a short time ago?

Mr Murphy: I understand your point.

Mr McFarland: He said that we should abandon all this and let the subgroups decide their own terms of reference.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I did not say that; I said that that was an option for the Committee.

Mr McFarland: It is not an option. The Committee has already decided — by reaching consensus on item 1 — that it should not be an option, and that this Committee will decide the terms of reference. That option is, therefore, not an option, because the DUP has told us that it will not agree the terms of reference of any of the subgroups.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There is a difference between terms of reference and procedures.

Mr McFarland: Follow me through this again: under item 4, we are required to agree this document of procedures. Is that correct?

Mr Ford: We will be given the opportunity to —

Mr McFarland: No, it is in here. It requires agreement.

Mr Ford: But certain consequences flow if the Committee does not agree the terms of reference.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We are not required to agree all of them. We could agree four of them, and three of those are determinations on which we have no option but to agree. That is what we are left with. If we do that, we will have enough to set up subgroups.

Mr McFarland: Follow me through this: we cannot have subgroups without terms of reference. Is that correct?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes.

Mr McFarland: This Committee has voted by consensus that it will decide on terms of reference. Is that correct?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is correct.

Mr McFarland: This Committee agrees by consensus. The DUP said that it would not agree, by consensus, terms of reference. Therefore, it does not matter whether we set the subgroups up or not — they have no terms of reference. We cannot set up a subgroup without terms of reference. Which bit of that do we not understand?

Mr Ford: I want to ask rather than answer a question on that. At that point, does paragraph 2 of the direction not apply? If the Committee has not established terms of reference, then each subgroup will deal with matters as stated in the direction.

Mr McFarland: We have already taken a vote under paragraph 1 that said that this Committee will, by consensus —

Mr Ford: I am not sure that this Committee can vote to overrule the direction. We may vote on something to enhance, expand or interpret the direction, but we cannot overrule it.

Dr Farren: Alan, with all due respect, you are talking us into a spiral out of which we will not emerge with any satisfactory outcome. I am sure that the Chairman will correct me if I am wrong, but I believe that the Committee can set up the subgroups. If we fail to agree the terms of reference, my guess is that they will be determined for us. We should not tie ourselves in knots about the terms of reference at this point.

About all that we can do for the rest of the afternoon is set up the subgroups. That is all the discretion that we have. Indeed, we do not have even that discretion; all that we can do is nominate.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I cannot call for consensus on that: it is a determination.

Mr McFarland: We have been told that the subgroups exist; all that we are required to do is nominate or not nominate to them. Subgroups can do nothing other than exist — which they do already — without terms of reference on what they are supposed to do. There is no agreement on the terms of reference, because we took a vote that this Committee should agree the terms of reference. The Committee cannot agree the terms of reference because there is no consensus in the DUP —

The Chairman (Mr Wells): If it is helpful, we can ask the Secretary of State to issue another determination.

Mr McFarland: I am more than happy with that. The point that I am trying to make is that we cannot decide anything further today.

Dr Farren: Probably not.

Mr McFarland: I have tried to think of ways of getting round the issue. However, we got ourselves into a loop whereby we have decided that only we can decide the terms of reference. If we had decided that we could not follow paragraph 1, but had delegated the matter to the subgroups, we would have been under way.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The crucial point that you have missed is that we have agreed that we will establish the terms of reference. However, it may be that all we are left with after this procedure is the three directions. That is what we agreed. Then we could go ahead with our subgroups.

Mr McFarland: With the best will in the world, you cannot have a subgroup that has no idea of what it is doing.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Secretary of State has given the subgroups the power to agree their own procedures.

Mr McFarland: Not in his terms of reference — or perhaps he has.

Dr Farren: No, not yet.

Mr McFarland: No, but if he does —

Dr Farren: Let us leave it at that, Alan. Let us agree the subgroups and get out of here in five minutes.

Dr McDonnell: Is it possible for us to screen the procedures and determine the question that I asked 10 or 15 minutes ago about which points we agree, which points are directions and which are not? Where are the obstacles on the list?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is what I am trying to do. Let us work down the list. We have already agreed point 1, and we have no option on point 2.

Mr Kennedy: Point 2 is a determination.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes; we have no option on that. Point 3 is agreed.

Mr McFarland: Point 4 is a problem because the DUP said that it could not agree the matter until it had consulted the Secretary of State. We will not see any light on that point.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is there consensus on six members as the quorum for the subgroups?

Mr McFarland: My understanding is that Diane Dodds said that she could not agree that matter.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The DUP said that it could not agree that matter, so there is no consensus. Presumably, there is no consensus on seven members either.

Dr Farren: How many members would the DUP want?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are there any thoughts on what the quorum should be?

Dr Farren: It cannot be more than 10.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is there consensus on seven members as the quorum for the subgroups?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It will be up to each subgroup to decide whether it wishes to meet in public or in closed session. That includes a decision on whether —

Mr McFarland: I am sorry, Mr Chairman, but I would like to make a point. Before we get past that matter and so that everyone understands: there are 10 members on each subgroup. It is standard practice to have quorums of about 30% or 40% on most committees. We are looking at 70% attendance for a quorum.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Substitutes can be used.

Mr McFarland: We are still looking for seven out of 10 members to be present at every meeting.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): If you agree to nominate nine members, with the ability to bring in substitutes, surely we have enough among the parties to do that. If the Ulster Unionist Party Assembly Group appoints half a dozen people to act as substitutes to be called upon —

Mr McFarland: I understand that. On the average day, with people bobbing in and out, is it more achievable to have six people in the room as a quorum? I am not talking about who is here, because if we go under seven we become inquorate and so we must stop. We could end up with a fairly small number in the room at one time. Is six more achievable than seven?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr McFarland, the problem is that the DUP has already said that it will not agree to a quorum of six.

Mr McFarland: My understanding is that the DUP would not agree to anything.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The DUP has agreed to a quorum of seven.

Mr McFarland: I ask the DUP: what is the practical, realistic difference? On an average day when we meet as a subgroup, it is more achievable to have six rather than seven people in the room at any one time. I am not talking about who is nominated to attend; I am talking about the practicalities of people wandering in and out.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We have moved past that matter, Mr McFarland: we have agreed on seven.

Mr McFarland: At our last meeting, a member nodded assent on something to which, had he stopped to think, he would never have agreed.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I thought that Mr Dawson and Mrs Dodds expressed themselves quite clearly.

Mr McFarland: I understood that they had to take the matter to their party. That is now not the case. They have agreed on seven.

Dr Farren: Yes; let us leave it at that. We have agreement on something.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Can we move to point 5? It will be for each subgroup to decide whether it wishes to meet in public or in closed session. That includes a decision on whether Hansard is present. Is that agreeable by consensus?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Point 6 states that the dates of the meetings of each subgroup will be a matter for the Chairperson.

Mr Kennedy: I have a concern on that point, Mr Chairman. There should be consensus among the members of the subgroup.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That would be a majority of the members of the subgroup. Should we change “Chairperson” to “subgroup”? Is everyone happy with that?

Members indicated assent.

Point 7 is a determination, and we have no choice. There may be some ambiguity in the letter, but it is clear in the draft procedures.

Point 8 states:

“The Sub-groups will not take any decisions on behalf of the Committee on the Preparation for Government.”

That is a reasonable suggestion.

2.00 pm

Mr Kennedy: Why is it there?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): So that they do not take powers unto themselves and become little empires. The Clerks have clarified that this is to stop the subgroups making reports directly to the Assembly and bypassing this Committee. Reports must be authorised by us, and it must be on the basis of consensus.

Mr McFarland: Is it not a determination by the Secretary of State that they have to report back to us anyway?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Not as it stands, although I am sure he would give you that if you wanted it.

Mr McFarland: I thought there was something on this already. Yes:

“Each subgroup shall report to the Preparation for Government Committee in accordance with the terms of reference”.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes, but there is nothing to stop them reporting directly to the Assembly. That is the only reason that point 8 is there. It is a safeguard worth keeping.

Point 9 is important because you have agreed the quorum as seven, so it is a matter for the subgroup to decide if deputies may attend meetings if members of the subgroup are unable to do so.

Mr Ford: Are we not to determine today that deputies will be entitled to attend?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do we have consensus on that? If so, it would get us around the problem.

Mr Ford: It would be better to spend two minutes here than half an hour at each of three meetings.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is everyone happy that we say that deputies can attend the subgroups?

Members indicated assent.

Mr Kennedy: Chairman, it is important that the word “deputies” does not contain a capital letter. [Laughter.]

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We have got around that difficulty, and will move on to the terms of reference for the economic subgroup.

Mr Dawson: Just before moving on, Mr Chairman, although you may have got around the difficulty, the DUP has not given consensus to point 7. We have requested a meeting with the Secretary of State for matters to be clarified. Even though subgroups have been established, we are not happy with —

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We have noted that. The Secretary of State’s view was that if decisions were not to be taken by simple majority the subgroups would run into the same brick wall as the PFG Committee has run: that we can move nowhere without consensus. That is the reasoning, but you can take it up directly with the Secretary of State.

We move on to the economic challenges facing Northern Ireland. These are the terms of reference, as opposed to the procedures:

“1. To identify the major impediments to the development of the economy in Northern Ireland.”

Dr Farren: I suggest an amendment to point 3: “To consider how other matters, including a peace dividend, could contribute”. I hope that this will meet with general consent, because the terms of reference are rather narrowly constrained. Matters such as improvements, education, training, infrastructure — and we need not debate them here — might need to be referred to in the work of such a subgroup. Therefore to consider “other matters, including a peace dividend” only adds to point 3 and takes away nothing from it.

Another way round it would be to add: “any other matters which may be considered relevant” as point 4.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Any views on that? Any problems? Agreed?

Does that presume that we are happy with points 1 and 2?

Dr Farren: I was only entering something to point 3.

Mr McNarry: Just leave it there, Seán.

Dr Farren: I was not expressing any view about 1 or 2.

Dr McDonnell: If it is appropriate — [Laughter.] — give me a break.

Mr Kennedy: That will be in Hansard.

Dr McDonnell: I will take advice and guidance from you, Mr Chairman, and other members of the Committee — point 2 needs to be tightened and focused.

I am particularly keen that direct reference be made to newer technologies, because that is where our economy is slipping behind. Massive opportunities are often missed in that regard — because biotechnology infrastructure is not there, for example. Perhaps I am going into too much detail.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I suspect that you are, Dr McDonnell. I assume that you will be the SDLP representative on that subject and, as such, you will wish to raise that issue.

Dr McDonnell: Thank you, Chairman.

Mr Kennedy: Are you nominating Dr McDonnell for that position, Chairman?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The direction is quite clear: members can raise any issue directly relevant to the economic challenges facing Northern Ireland — that is a wide remit, I can tell you. If Dr McDonnell wishes to raise that issue at the first meeting, I am sure that the Chairman will be happy for him to do so.

Do any other members have problems?

Mr Dawson: I am concerned at the use of the words “peace dividend”; would “economic package” be a better term? There are other factors to be considered apart from how an economic package could contribute to economic regeneration and how such a package might be delivered.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Does anyone have any problems with that?

Mr Murphy: The term “peace dividend” has a particular focus in relation to a package of support from both Governments to assist restoration of all institutions and to try to get this institution back on the road. It is quite focused in relation to its meaning; “economic package” is a general term. “Peace dividend” is quite clear as regards the arguments made to both Governments about a financial package to specifically underpin the restoration of devolution.

Dr Farren: I am sure that the meaning will be spelt out. It will give people the opportunity to use the language with which they are more comfortable.

Mr Dawson: An economic package is much broader than the narrower term “peace dividend”. There is an opportunity to broaden it beyond the two Governments’ involvement to include the European Union and the United States. Focusing on a peace dividend would tie it very much to this island, as opposed to a broader package necessary for the economic regeneration of Northern Ireland.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Would one solution be to refer to an economic package that includes a peace dividend? Would that square the circle and keep everyone happy?

Mr Dawson: A broad economic package inclusive of a peace dividend.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Would everybody agree to that?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Can we formally agree the terms of reference for the subgroup on economic challenges?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The next item is the subgroup on the devolution of criminal justice and policing.

Mr Kennedy: Pending a decision to be made by the DUP arising out of their subsequent meetings, there seems to be little point in agreeing terms of reference for the other two subgroups. It is difficult to see how any of the subgroups could achieve meaningful work without the involvement of all political parties.

Dr Farren: But we are setting up the subgroups now.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The subgroups are there.

Dr Farren: Yes; that is what I meant. The subgroups must have terms of reference if they are to meet. That is what we are doing.

Mr Kennedy: As of today, there is no indication that all parties will participate in the subgroups.

Dr Farren: That is true.

Mr Kennedy: Therefore we will be establishing something that may never meet.

Mr McFarland: Chairman, we are getting confused again. The subgroup on economic challenges was set up on the recommendation of the Assembly, in which we are all taking part. Is that correct?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes.

Mr McFarland: The other two groups are subgroups of this Committee. We need to remind ourselves that the duties of this Committee are to scope or identify issues relating to the restoration of devolution. We are not here to negotiate how many Departments there should be — that is not what this Committee is here to do.

We are moving into negotiating about policing and justice. There is a consequence in relation to that, as you well know. If a policing Department and a justice Department were formed, two of the existing Departments would need to be downscaled. A whole raft of issues opens when we debate those matters. This is not scoping, is it? If it is not within the remit of this Committee to identify and recommend for consideration appropriate models for policing and justice, it is certainly not within the remit of a subgroup.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): You could change the terms of reference.

Mr McFarland: I am wondering if there is any point. If, for example, the DUP decides to take part, it will wish to change these things. If it does not wish to take part, then the rest of us may wish to have entirely different terms of reference for discussing these issues. Dr McCrea said he wants to include organised crime and terrorism — and the Secretary of State has now agreed that they can be included — so where does all that fit into these terms of reference? Until we are sure about who is taking part in this exercise, there is little point in having terms of reference for subgroups. The subgroup on the economic challenges is different. Everyone has agreed to take part; we know what it is for; we know where it has come from; we know what its remit is; and we are able to agree its terms of reference. This one and, indeed, the one on identifying issues of concern regarding the institutions and considering what changes are required are rather more difficult. Then we are into the core of negotiations between the parties on the re-establishment of the institutions. That is not what this Committee is supposed to be doing.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr McFarland, are you proposing that we take no decision on the terms of reference until we know where the DUP stands?

Mr McFarland: I do not believe that we can.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are you proposing that?

Mr McFarland: My colleague Mr Kennedy has already proposed that.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): So we have a proposal. Dr Farren, are you speaking to that?

Dr Farren: Yes, I certainly am. It seems to me that Alan, with due respect to what he is saying, is effectively attempting to negate the process in which we are engaged at the moment. The subgroups are to be established. In so far as we can, we should try to establish some or all of the terms of reference for them. It may be that we fail to get consensus on the terms of reference, but the subgroups exist, and they should start to meet. If the Secretary of State sees a gap in the terms of reference, I am sure that he will move to fill it by direction. We should accept that. Otherwise we will prolong an unnecessary debate at this point.

Mr Murphy: This is the Preparation for Government Committee, and we have talked since the first day about setting up various subgroups to get down to work. Alan made the point about mining into the issues that we have already identified, so I am at a loss to understand why, because one happened to be subject to a vote in the Assembly, the others should not be set up. Preparation for Government is going to have to deal with the devolution of policing and justice powers, and with outstanding matters concerning the institutions. Those are necessary things that we have to deal with and resolve. If the UUP's position is now the same as that of the DUP's, if it is not here to negotiate, I do not see any point in setting up any of the subgroups. If we are just going to talk about an economic package and leave all the other stuff, it will not in itself prepare us for the restoration of Government. It is a very necessary part of that, but so are policing and justice, and the institutions.

Mr McFarland: Is Conor saying that his party now supports policing here and that he therefore wishes to get into the details of how he is going to make the policing institutions work? If that is what he is saying, we will be happy enough to engage in that. There is no point in sitting and discussing policing and justice matters with Sinn Féin, which does not recognize the police and does not have anything to do with the police, while it still refuses to accept the police. This is barking world.

Mr Murphy: I want to make it clear that we had discussions with the Ulster Unionist Party and other parties about the devolution of policing and justice matters several years ago.

Mr McFarland: Absolutely. And without prejudice.

Mr Murphy: Yes. And we can discuss them again without prejudice. There are issues that need to be resolved, and we are happy to get down to them. If the Ulster Unionist Party wants to start putting preconditions to matters that we need to resolve, then it is leading us off course.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We are drifting into issues that really should have been covered previously. I am going to bring this to a crunch after Mr McNarry and Mr Dawson, who has not had a chance to speak at all.

2.15 pm

Mr McNarry: I want to go back to the letter of 11 July addressed to you and to Mr Molloy, which was copied to members, and to the direction letter of the same date, which was determined by the Secretary of State. Point 5 in the direction reads:

"A subgroup may meet whether or not all party representatives are present".

That is a direction in the sense that it is headed: "Direction determined by the Secretary of State".

The letter of the same date was perhaps by a different typist. Your question was whether the Secretary of State would be content for subgroups to meet if one or more parties chose not to attend. Mr Hain replied that he was content for the subgroups nevertheless to meet, and for substitutes to attend.

Are we now in the realms of content and direction? Which do we go by?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The direction or determination is overriding. It is like a Government Order — there is an explanatory memorandum at the start and the actual legislation follows.

Mr McNarry: That is what we established at the start of the meeting. I wanted to check that we had not drifted.

We are under direction to do this; no consensus is required to establish the other two subgroups. Does that mean that irrespective of whether there is consensus, these two subgroups can be established — even if a party does not wish to appear?

Mr Farren proposed earlier that we move to appoint these subgroups. They need terms of reference from this Committee by consensus. Do we do that at the same time, or does that follow after?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We have already agreed the terms of reference for the subgroup on economic challenges.

Mr McNarry: That is an easier one.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There is no direction as to when this happens, so if members wished to wait until the DUP had sought clarification from the Secretary of State, we could do that.

Mr McFarland: That is what Mr Kennedy proposed some time back.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That proposal is still on the Floor, as it were. Our difficulty is in the timing and the sheer logistics of trying to —

Mr McNarry: I understand that a timetable has been laid out; but, without labouring the point, what do we have to discuss? The direction is that two subgroups shall be formed. What do we need to discuss? The Secretary of State does not mind who participates. If a party chooses not to participate, he thinks that that is fair enough. However, he has not advised what should happen if more than one party does not participate.

Mr McFarland: The subgroups cannot operate without terms of reference agreed by this Committee. We return again to the fact that if the Committee cannot agree terms of reference, there is nothing for the subgroups to do.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The terms of reference could be simply to report back to the Committee and let it, by majority decision, decide what it is going to do.

Mr Dawson has been waiting for a very long time.

Mr Dawson: Mr McFarland spoke about the function of the subgroups, which would be to scope and identify issues. It was never intended that they be negotiating subgroups. Those are the issues on which we need clarification from the Secretary of State. Until we receive that clarification, we cannot give consensus for the subgroups. The DUP had previously agreed the need for a subgroup on economic challenges, so it was able to agree those terms of reference today, but it cannot agree the terms of reference for the other two subgroups.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is very clear. Mr Kennedy has a proposal on the table.

Mr Kennedy: Let me give some explanatory commentary on that. The UUP would be happy for the establishment of subgroups that would mine the relevant issues. It is clear, however, that the DUP has reserved its position on the subgroup on devolution of criminal justice and policing and the subgroup to consider changes to the institutions set up under the Belfast Agreement.

Therefore, we see no merit in establishing subgroups, even though I accept that, by determination, they already exist. However, in the current situation, we see nothing worthwhile in creating terms of reference for the other two subgroups. Therefore, we are not prepared to give our consensus to establish the terms of reference.

Dr Farren: I have a look of exasperation on my face. Perhaps that is not surprising. Almost two hours ago, I made a similar proposal, which was voted down. In the light of all that has transpired since, I no longer support that proposal.

The SDLP accepted the establishment of the three subgroups under the direction of the Secretary of State. The SDLP agreed to the terms of reference for the first subgroup. It is obvious that the terms of reference for the second and third subgroups will not be agreed. That should not prevent their existence. I imagine that the Secretary of State will direct the terms of reference for them. If parties chose not to attend those subgroups because they do not like their terms of reference, we will face that situation and we will have to deal with it.

If we accept that we will not agree the terms of reference for the second and third subgroups, we could wrap up this business very quickly, report the lack of agreement to the Secretary of State and await the subgroups being given a date, time and place to meet.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Can I put Mr Kennedy's proposal to the Committee? As I understand it, the proposal is that until the DUP reports back from its meeting with the Secretary of State, the Chairmen do not call the first meetings of the subgroup to consider changes to the institutions set up under the Belfast Agreement and the subgroup on the devolution of criminal justice and policing.

Mrs D Dodds: I will clarify. I do not want a convoluted argument. The Committee exists whether the DUP likes it or not, but the DUP will not agree to the terms of reference for the subgroups, which have to be established by consensus. That is the DUP's position.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There is no consensus for Mr Kennedy's proposal. Dr Farren has made it clear that the SDLP finds it unacceptable. It would seem that we are not going to reach consensus on the terms of reference for the second and third subgroups. Mrs Dodds has made that clear. Therefore, although we have established the format for the subgroup to consider economic challenges facing Northern Ireland, it would appear that we will not be able to nominate members to, or make arrangements for, the second and third subgroups. Does anyone dispute that assessment?

Are there any other proposals for the second and third subgroups?

Mr Kennedy: Obviously, it is important that the situation be reviewed at the earliest possible date. That means that we would set a date for this Committee to consider the issues and to see whether any progress has been made that would allow the proper establishment of the subgroups, with full terms of reference, that could be supported on a cross-party basis.

Mr McFarland: Do we have any indication from the DUP on when its meeting might take place and when it might, therefore, be in the position to report back at a meeting of this Committee?

Mrs D Dodds: The meeting will not be too far off because Westminster goes into recess soon, and, therefore, the holiday period starts. I presume that —

Mr McFarland: Would next Monday be too soon?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Fixing a date for the next meeting comes towards the end of the agenda, but next Monday is a possibility.

Mr Dawson: A date for our meeting is in the hands of the Secretary of State and depends on his diary. There is no firm indication of a date yet.

Mr McNarry: Can it be relayed to the Secretary of State that a date for a meeting with the DUP is important, bearing in mind the timetable, staffing issues, reports, etc?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is everyone happy with that suggestion? The Secretary of State is aware of the situation and is keen to clarify it.

Mr Kennedy: Deputy Speaker, have you, or the other Deputy Speaker, an insight as to whether the Secretary of State is inclined to issue a direction on the other two subgroups?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I am happy for Mr Molloy to come in on that. In our meeting with the Secretary of State, we relayed the DUP's concerns about procedures. He indicated that he was keen to meet the DUP to discuss those concerns. However, given that the meeting was on 11 July 2006 and people were tied up for the next few days, there were practical difficulties.

The Secretary of State made it clear that should other obstacles emerge, he reserves the right to issue further directions; this is the third set of directions that he has determined. We can discuss procedures as much as we like, but at the end of the day, the Secretary of State can step in at any stage and tell us how it will be, and that is that.

Mr Kennedy: The UUP's view is that it would not be particularly wise, or helpful, for the Secretary of State to issue fresh directions on those two subgroups.

Given that we have agreed that the quorum be seven, the absence of two political parties would mean that the subgroups could not function.

Dr Farren: That sounds like a threat.

Mr Kennedy: No, it is not a threat; it is a simple statement of fact.

Mr Murphy: The same applies to the subgroup on economic challenges.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is clear that we cannot move forward on the other two subgroups, but we can move on nominations for the economic challenges subgroup. If nominations are not received today, they must be with the Committee Clerks by close of play tomorrow. Can everyone meet that deadline? We need one party representative from around the table and presumably each party's economic development spokesperson.

Dr McDonnell: Chairman, are you proposing that I am my party's economic development spokesperson? [Laughter.] Earlier, I took that as an indication of support.

Mr McFarland: Do you want nominations now?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): If you have them, yes.

Mr McFarland: Mr McNarry will be the UUP member from this Committee, and Dr Esmond Birnie will be the second member. Mr Roy Beggs will be first reserve.

Mr Ford: Sean Neeson and I will be the Alliance Party representatives.

Dr Farren: Alasdair McDonnell and Margaret Ritchie will represent the SDLP.

Mr Murphy: Michelle Gildernew and Mitchel McLaughlin will represent Sinn Féin. Barry McElduff will be the reserve.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Does the SDLP have a reserve?

Dr McDonnell: We will find one.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Does the DUP have nominations?

Mrs D Dodds: We will nominate by close of play tomorrow.

Dr McDonnell: John Dallat will be the SDLP reserve.

The Chairperson (Mr Wells): Apart from the DUP, that is a full complement. Cathie White, an experienced Clerk to the Enterprise, Trade and Investment Committee for many years, will clerk that subgroup.

We have more work to do. We may park the issue of the two subgroups for today. We will not get any further on that issue.

We must also decide on the future work of this Committee, as opposed to that of the subgroups. Will we continue to meet over the summer? What issues will we consider? We could leave it to the subgroups to continue the work, and we could meet less often.

Mr Murphy: We certainly need one more meeting to find out what happens with the other two subgroups. We can then take it from there.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Members will recall that the Secretary of State, in his letter of 3 July 2006, asked us to:

“take account of the issues and timeframe”

as set out in the work plan from the two Governments.

We were also asked to continue our work to identify issues that need to be addressed and to prepare a programme of work that would enable the Assembly to address those matters. Those are to be agreed on and announced by the end of August.

2.30 pm

We may feel that we can fulfil those tasks by setting up the subgroups and letting them deal with the issues, or we may feel that other issues should be addressed and that we should continue to meet.

Mr McFarland: Can I suggest that we put this subject off until the next meeting? The success or failure of the subgroups will dictate directly what we do. We would be in a better position to decide whether this Committee needs to meet if we knew the DUP’s position on subgroups.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is there consensus that we put the decision off until next Monday?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Would it suit members if the Committee met next Monday at 12.00 noon?

Mrs D Dodds: I cannot attend next Monday at 12.00 noon. Could the time be changed to 10.00 am?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Does 10.00 am next Monday suit?

Mr Kennedy: Thankfully, I am not available at all.

Mr McFarland: Mr Kennedy has had the sense to go on holiday.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will agree to meet at 10.00 am next Monday.

We wrote to the Clerk regarding the powers of the Chair, asking whether the powers of the Speaker in plenary extend to the Chairman of this Committee. It was on the agenda for the previous week but we did not get time to deal with it.

Mr Moir’s letter is not specific. Does anyone have any comments to make on the Clerk’s ruling?

Mr Kennedy: If it is written in Hansard that I am on holiday, every burglar in the country will —
[Laughter.]

Can you expunge that from the record? [Laughter.]

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The powers of the Chairman were mentioned a long time ago. Do members have any comments to make on that?

In the absence of anything dramatic happening, we will meet at 10.00 am next Monday.

Adjourned at 2.33 pm.

COMMITTEE ON THE PREPARATION FOR GOVERNMENT

Monday 24 July 2006

Members in attendance for all or part of proceedings:

The Chairman, Mr Francie Molloy
Mrs Diane Dodds
Dr Seán Farren
Mr David Ford
Mrs Naomi Long
Dr Alasdair McDonnell
Mr Alan McFarland
Mr David McNarry
Lord Morrow
Mr Conor Murphy
Mr John O'Dowd
Ms Margaret Ritchie

The Committee met at 10.06 am.

(The Chairman (Mr Molloy) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The minutes of the meeting of 17 July are attached to the papers. The only point that I would make is that the last paragraph of the minutes states that the next meeting will take place on 17 July. That date should be changed to "24 July". Does anyone have any other points to raise about the minutes? Are they agreed?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): On the subgroups on changes to the institutions and devolution of criminal justice and policing, I ask members to note that the title of the second subgroup has changed to "subgroup on devolution of policing and justice", as was the term used in the Secretary of State's letter. Are we in a position to proceed?

Lord Morrow: What was that subgroup's title before this massive change?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): It was to be the subgroup on devolution of criminal justice and policing. It is now to be called the subgroup on devolution of policing and justice. Can we proceed to set up those two subgroups at this stage?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We move now to the issues raised in the letter from the Secretary of State to the Chairpersons, and to the terms of reference for each subgroup.

Can we have nominations for the subgroup on changes to the institutions?

Dr Farren: I nominate P J Bradley and myself.

Mr Ford: I nominate Kieran McCarthy and myself.

Mr Murphy: I nominate John O'Dowd and myself.

Mr McNarry: When is the cut-off time for nominating? By what day do you need to know?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): That is up to this Committee.

Mr McNarry: A couple of days were allowed for nominations to be made to the previous subgroup.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Is close of play tomorrow OK?

Mr McNarry: That is fine.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Maurice, I know that the DUP has had communication with the Secretary of State. When can we expect a reply from your party on its position?

Lord Morrow: I understood that we had replied at the previous meeting. Did Dr McCrea not state our position? I am sorry, but I was not there.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Yes, he did, but your party had communication with the Secretary of State in between. The DUP said that it was meeting with the Secretary of State to discuss the voting procedures and other issues. I am just seeking clarification as to whether there has been any change in the party's position.

Lord Morrow: No, there has not been.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I invite members to look at the terms of reference for the subgroup on devolution of policing and justice and to agree them.

We shall now consider the terms of reference to see whether we can agree them.

Dr Farren: Chairman, before we leave the issue, is it correct that four of the five parties will have nominated by the close of play tomorrow?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Yes.

Dr Farren: I understand that the DUP will not nominate.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): That is correct.

Dr Farren: I just wanted to know where we stand.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Members will have copies of the terms of reference for the institutions subgroup. The terms of reference list several issues, in no order of preference, that came up in proposals and discussions on the institutions. That list can be added to if members have other issues that they wish to discuss, but what we have should suffice to start off with.

Mr Ford: The list does not cover all the institutions. For example, there is no mention of the inter-parliamentary body between the Oireachtas and the Assembly. However, the list is comprehensive enough to include that body somewhere in the discussions.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are we agreed on the terms of reference?

Mr Murphy: Is it a matter for the subgroup to add to the list if it wishes?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Yes.

Members indicated assent.

Dr Farren: Chairman, is it in order to ask the DUP why it declines to participate in the subgroup?

Lord Morrow: Which one?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The one to consider changes to the institutions.

Lord Morrow: I thought that Mr McCrea made it clear that the only subgroup that had been agreed to through the Assembly was the working group on economic challenges; the other two subgroups have not been agreed through the Assembly.

Dr Farren: We left last week's meeting on the understanding that the DUP was to seek clarification from the Secretary of State. Despite that view being expressed, the door was not closed on the issue, as it were. Are we to understand that now the reason for the DUP's not nominating to the institutions subgroup is that that subgroup did not come through the Assembly? Are the issues to be discussed in the subgroup of no concern to the DUP?

Lord Morrow: Whatever the subgroups agree must come back to the Committee to be agreed. This Committee is a catch-all. Therefore although we have decided not to nominate to the subgroups, we recognise that the purpose of the Preparation for Government Committee is to scope the issues. That is what the Secretary of State told us at the start, and that is what we are sticking to.

Dr Farren: Of course that is correct. However, in order to scope the issues in sufficient depth so that we all understand and appreciate them, it is necessary to form the subgroups. The DUP is declining to participate in further elaboration and scoping of the issues in a way that would help the rest of us to understand its position. It is particularly interesting that the DUP, in any comments that it made on the review of the institutions, made great play of those issues. In fact, since the DUP insisted that many issues relating to the operation of the institutions were of concern to it, I would have thought that it should be to the DUP's advantage — and to the advantage of the rest of us — to hear its elaboration and full scoping of the issues, as that might help us to move forward. It is a matter of regret that the DUP has declined to do so.

The DUP is abdicating a clear responsibility, as far as the terms of reference of this Committee are concerned, to help the rest of us to understand its position. Since the DUP is not participating in helping the rest of us to understand its position on those issues, I am sceptical of the views that it expresses.

10.15 am

Lord Morrow: Will I have to respond to every view expressed around this table? Our position is clear. No one should be under any misapprehension about where we stand on the return of devolution. The dogs in the street know the issues that are holding up the return of devolution. We are not being allowed to have debates in the Assembly because Sinn Féin has said that it will not take part in them, and the Secretary of State obviously takes that line. Therefore what is the point of scoping the issues further? This Committee is designed to scope all the issues. We understood that that had been done and we thought that we had made that clear to everyone around this table, but it seems that we have not.

Dr Farren: Would the DUP be happy for this Committee to turn itself into a subgroup and continue its work on focusing on institutional and policing issues in a way that would enable us to understand the DUP's approach? Over the next few weeks we would focus sequentially on those two issues in this Committee. The DUP would have the opportunity to focus on the issues here since it will not participate in subgroups.

Lord Morrow: The DUP has no problem with this Committee. We understood that the role of the Preparation for Government Committee was to identify and scope the issues. Now we are being told that this Committee needs subgroups to identify the issues, and no doubt in a couple of weeks' time we will be told that those subgroups will need subgroups to identify the issues. We are rolling this out into an array of subgroups that will not deliver anything. This Committee was quite capable of identifying and scoping the issues no matter what they were. We have been sitting on this Committee — even though it has been difficult over the holiday period to get Members to sit on it due to holiday arrangements. However, we have been able to muster people for every meeting. We see no need for the subgroups on the two issues that are being identified this morning. The economic working group is different as it was agreed following debate in the Assembly.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Seán, are you making a proposal?

Dr Farren: At the moment the matter is up for discussion. Either these issues are important and need further elaboration and discussion or they are not — and if there is no consensus that there is anything to be discussed then I must accept that. However, it is very curious that the DUP, which went to considerable lengths to express concerns about the operation of the institutions, is declining to avail of the opportunity to let the rest of us — who would have to operate those institutions together with the DUP — hear its position.

Although I may not agree with the positions that the DUP was putting forward, I am anxious to hear them. My party had an exchange with the DUP at Leeds Castle to which that party did not respond in any detail. Given that experience, I am anxious that we know its response to our proposals. We have never gone through the issues in any detail at our meetings here. Even if the DUP is frightened of negotiating and wishes to remain at the level of scoping, surely it should be more than anxious to let the rest of us hear what it has to say.

We are not going to bend over simply to accommodate the DUP, but I am making a suggestion that might be discussed here for a few minutes before it turns into any kind of proposal, because that may not be what we should do. My suggestion is that this Committee should focus on the two issues on which the DUP will not participate in subgroups. Members can be represented by one, two, or all of their delegates as they choose, and they can send whomever they like — it is not necessary to have the same faces around the table on those issues. Effectively, this Committee could become the subgroups. It is a device to get around our difficulty. Perhaps, of course, we should proceed without listening to the DUP.

Lord Morrow: You have done that for years.

Dr Farren: Now that you are being given the opportunity, I cannot imagine that you want to scorn it.

Mr Ford: I am at a loss to know quite where we are. Last week the DUP conceded the establishment of the subgroup on economic challenges as a subgroup of this Committee, despite previously maintaining that it should be set up by the Assembly and the Business Committee. I accept that as a gesture on their part towards the rest of us to enable something to get under way.

Maurice Morrow now seems to be saying that there is some concern about further scoping the issues, but we do not agree on the mechanism for that. Interesting though they were, the five sets of inquisitions, when proposals were teased out over a few days, did not actually constitute dealing in full detail with every outstanding issue. There is much “mining down further” — in Alan McFarland’s elegant phrase — to be done. The view from the DUP this morning is that that is so, but the structures to do it have not been agreed.

Can the DUP confirm that it is content that there is further scoping out in detail to be done on some issues, and that it is simply a matter of the mechanism by which we do it? Or does the DUP believe that the job is now completely finished?

Lord Morrow: I repeat — perhaps I did not make it clear — that my understanding was that this Committee was to identify and scope the issues. Is that the Alliance Party’s understanding?

Mr Ford: That was certainly our understanding; however, as I thought I had made clear a few moments ago, it was not our understanding that the process had been clarified. Scoping the issues is more than publishing a list that says: “Party A believes items 1 to 27”, and: “Party B believes items 28 to whatever”. It is a matter of establishing in greater measure, through discussion, any overlaps and differences between parties that may not be immediately apparent. That is a valid job to continue, either in this Committee or in subgroups.

Lord Morrow: The DUP has never seen this as a negotiating committee.

Mr Ford: No, and, conscious of your concerns, I did not suggest that it was. I suggested that it was a committee for further elaboration of where parties stood.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Referring to what Seán said, there is no reason why the possible ongoing work of this Committee should not deal with some of the issues that are not being discussed in subgroups.

Mr Murphy: That reinforces the DUP’s position all along with regard to this Committee, which has been that it is a tactical engagement with no serious intention to work to prepare for Government here but to secure plenary debates in the Assembly.

Ironically, the DUP, in many of its submissions and interventions, accused the rest of us of running away from issues, particularly policing and justice. Now it has a chance to join a subgroup to deal with those issues. The DUP asked that it might raise all sorts of issues, and that was granted. Yet it still does not want to get down to work. The DUP accused the rest of us of not facing up to the issues; now it spurns a chance to get down to them. That reinforces the view that we have had throughout our engagement with this Committee: the DUP’s approach has been merely tactical; it goes through the motions without doing any real business.

I have sympathy with Seán’s frustration, and I would be prepared to explore other ways of doing business. The difficulty is that we have a direction from the Secretary of State to set up two subgroups to do the work. We would have to look at ways of trying to get around that. We can dance around the issue to try to find a more amenable way to get the DUP to do business. However, since coming onto this Committee the DUP representatives have shown themselves consistently unwilling to get down to any serious engagement with the rest of us. They are not prepared to negotiate on any institutional issues; neither are they prepared to negotiate on any of the issues in order to prepare for the devolution of policing and justice. They are consistent in refusing to engage in the subgroups.

Mr McNarry: Chairman, I hope that we are not going to get into another two-hour wrangle about business that we have covered repeatedly. The way that we work here is clear: there is consensus or there is not. There seems to be a proposal from Seán Farren, which may or may not be a way ahead. I am uncomfortable with the DUP position on the Committee, because we operate on consensus. If Seán has a proposal, we need to know whether there is consensus for it.

We began the proceedings by establishing consensus to set up two subgroups, and there was no disagreement. Trouble arose only when we moved to nominations. What Maurice Morrow has reported is no surprise, as the signals given by William McCrea were clear. Therefore it should be no surprise that my party has discussed the potential of the DUP position — we picked up those clear signals. William McCrea also clearly said that the DUP would abide by the rules, yet it does not do to criticise what you have been a part of.

We do not have control of this Committee; that is our weakness. When we encounter a problem, we run like children to the Secretary of State, who issues letters that are contrary to previous letters, and we do not know what the hell we are working to. We have bowed to Sinn Féin on debates — no debates because Sinn Féin does not want them — a position that has been facilitated by the Secretary of State. We now have an economic subgroup, which, I must say on behalf of those of us who attended it, worked very well. It seemed to have a good programme; it had agreed a very full agenda; and the participation in it seemed of the highest quality. What do we do now? We allow the Secretary of State to tinker and to take control away from us, while we sit here like plebs.

We have to get a grip on that, because we are now tinkering with it. I understand and I sympathise with Seán's proposal, because the tinkering is intended to keep us together so that we do not go into subgroups from which one party is absent. As Maurice said, quite rightly, a subgroup would report to this Committee; and then this Committee — after some of the people on it had changed their hats — would decide whether or not it would adopt the report. The essential thing, unless I am wrong, was that we agreed that all reports on the three issues would be debated in the Assembly.

I challenged Conor Murphy last time, and he gave me as good an answer as he could — by quoting Martin McGuinness. Hansard will have recorded my reaction to that.

10.30 am

Could we perhaps get to the point? Assurances were given, which I took in good faith, that the reports would be debated in the Assembly. The objective of this Committee to ensure that reports are completed remains. The problem is which mechanism is used to complete those reports.

To facilitate colleagues in the DUP, as we facilitated colleagues in Sinn Féin in relation to participating in Assembly debates, is there something within Seán Farren's proposals that would retain those issues within this Committee or a subgroup of its membership? I am a bit concerned about the loose talk about having a subgroup with different faces. That changes the entire outlook of this Committee. There are substitutes in this Committee today, but those members came as substitutes. We should not send members to be surrogate PFG Committee members. That must be clarified.

If, in the interests of collectivity and co-operation, there is a proposal to allow this Committee to deal with the two outstanding issues, which the DUP is prepared to accept and which we all accept, is there consensus to explore that? I appreciate Conor Murphy's words that he would be prepared to explore that. It was very interesting and helpful, and I appreciate it. Could that exploration be tied to Seán's proposal?

If there is no consensus, we go back to what the Secretary of State said, which was: "I am directing; I am the boss; I am the overseer; and I am the colonial custodian of Northern Ireland at the moment". Ha ha, big deal. The Secretary of State also introduced new rules to help some people and offend others. One new rule was that consensus was unnecessary in a subgroup. Would that rule apply to a subgroup of this Committee dealing with those issues? He also said that there did not need to be consensus and that a majority vote would do. Those issues need to be clarified, Chairman.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): A subgroup of this Committee is what we were directed to set up. Whatever term people wish to use, they are all subgroups of this Committee.

Mrs D Dodds: I have a number of points; I will ask Seán for clarification on his point in a moment.

First, this party never agreed with the consensus to set up subgroups last week. The establishment of subgroups was directed by the Secretary of State. That is apparent from his letter, which is included in the papers for today's meeting. The Secretary of State directed us to do that, whether or not I like subgroups.

Maurice Morrow has made our party's position clear; we are not running away from any of the issues. We have sat on this Committee for a number of weeks; we have scoped issues and prepared a lengthy report for the Committee, which seems to have disappeared into the ether.

There is much work to be done, which involves a wide range of issues, but the subgroups' remits are narrow. Other issues, such as criminality and paramilitary activity — which parties in this room want to run away from — are exceptionally important to the DUP and must be dealt with extensively.

I would like Seán Farren to clarify his point; if he would like this Committee to deal with the issues assigned to the subgroups, does he agree that the Committee should deal with all the issues that have been scoped to date, not just the couple of issues that have been identified in the Secretary of State's directives?

Dr Farren: The SDLP is not afraid to address the issues on which you focused — paramilitarism and criminality. The Secretary of State explicitly included those issues on the agenda for the subgroup on policing and justice, so it will deal with those concerns of the DUP. There is no question of them, or any other issues, being avoided. If parties wish to address any other issues, there is absolutely no reason why, under the broad umbrella of preparing for Government, they should not be on the agenda of this Committee or one of its subgroups.

I raised the possibility of the PFG Committee addressing the issues earmarked for the two remaining subgroups to ensure that the DUP would be able to participate, given its refusal to nominate to those subgroups — its reasons are beyond me; nonetheless, the party seems to have adopted that position and is not budging from it. Notwithstanding his directions, if the Secretary of State heard that this Committee was anxious to continue discussion on those issues, I would not imagine that he would insist that they be dealt with by the subgroups simply because he directed that they should be established. Let us remember, directions were only issued because this Committee has been unable to reach any consensus. The Secretary of State took it upon himself to provide a way for us to continue to operate.

I recognise that my suggestion is really a contrivance, but sometimes contrivances are necessary in politics to hide parties' shame or to protect them from their own intransigence, which backs them into corners.

We must first establish whether there is a clear acceptance that the issues on the two subgroups' agendas need to be scoped, discussed, explored or whatever word one wants to use — Alan McFarland uses the word "mine". If we can agree on that, then, as David said, the mechanisms become just a way of achieving our goal and are of lesser importance than the agreement that we should continue to discuss, explore, mine, scope, identify — or whatever the suitable word.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): When we started the discussion this morning about setting up the subgroups, I asked whether there was any problem with setting them up this morning, and there was no objection. The Secretary of State's direction may mean that we do not need consensus.

Lord Morrow: Members could not object to them. He has made it clear. The Secretary of State is the boss. He will tell us what we should or should not do, and that is what he has been doing. He has determined that the Assembly cannot meet. He has said that. His words are: "I have directed." He is not asking for agreement.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I am just clarifying the point that Diane raised. Diane, do you want to respond? The Secretary of State is really asking whether, if this Committee were to deal with the issues, the DUP would be happy to sit on it to deal with them?

Mrs D Dodds: This Committee has set itself a very large programme of work. Our statement earlier in the week said that this Committee is perfectly capable of dealing with the issues. However, that will be all of the issues — every issue that has been identified, on an issue-by-issue basis, and it will not be confined to the narrow remit of subgroups. There is no need for subgroups.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The problem I have is that we have been trying to expand, or have been accused of expanding, the remit of this Committee. Now members have been told that it has too narrow a remit.

Mrs D Dodds: No. I am sorry. The remit of this Committee is very wide. It is to scope the issues. Members have already spent weeks and weeks doing that. Now you say to us that we are going to expand the Committee. I am interested to see how you want to expand the remit of the Committee.

Mr O'Dowd: The wider the scope or remit of this Committee, the greater the need for subgroups to break down that work and look at it in a detailed manner and report back. However, I wish to clarify the position for the DUP. Our party is more than keen — indeed, champing at the bit — to discuss the issue of criminality and paramilitary activity. If that helps the DUP's deliberations, we are more than happy to do that.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): That could be done in the Subgroup on Devolution of Criminal Justice and Policing.

Mr McFarland: I apologise for being late this morning. We had a meeting with the Secretary of State at 9.15 am, which overran. Mr Kennedy sends his apologies.

Forgive me if I cover ground already covered. This Committee was tasked with identifying the issues. It has perhaps identified most of them, but we do not know. It was decided that we should break into three subgroups to try to find out whether, within those areas, there are other issues that have not yet been identified; and to expand those areas and find out whether we have identified all the issues that are important. As Lord Morrow said while I was coming in, this is not a negotiating Committee. That is absolutely clear. Negotiation will take place elsewhere. We still have work to do on identifying issues. There are lots of sub-parts of these issues that we have not yet got round to examining, because we have been operating at a more macro level.

Rightly or wrongly, the Secretary of State has said that we should have three subgroups. It is in the middle of summer. Mr Kennedy, for example, has now left for a fortnight's holiday. I have no doubt that colleagues will be back and forward over the summer. We cannot operate this Committee and the subgroups at full pace, because the Secretary of State has decreed that each member is to sit on a subgroup. Therefore it is not possible, with holidays and everything else, to run these two organisations side by side. There is a logic in moving it down to a more micro level to examine what is going on within those issues.

We had a difficulty with the phrasing of the terms of reference, because it looked as though we were involved in dealing only with the Government's paper on policing. We have enormous problems with that. The five options are not the only options; there are many others, but that is a matter for negotiation.

10.45 am

We identified many sub-areas within the issue of policing and justice. When criminality and paramilitary activity were not being discussed in that subgroup, William McCrea said that the DUP wanted those issues on the agenda. That makes a lot of sense, because there are many areas within criminality that we need to explore in a subgroup — whether organised crime is carried out by individuals, who sanctions such activities, and other questions.

There is work to be done. However, I am still confused about whether the DUP is refusing to take part in the subgroups as a matter of principle — no matter how useful the work might be or how important it is to identify and scope the detail of these issues. Why? It is not ideal that the Secretary of State has ended up directing the subgroups. Is the DUP objection on principle or does it object because it does not have control, in that subgroup decisions are not based on unanimity?

No other system operates on the consensus basis of this Committee, and if we are ever to succeed as an Assembly or a Government, we must realise that. In the Assembly last week, Peter Robinson said that parties operating outside unanimity would take hits that they do not like on certain matters, but that is the way it is. That seems sensible.

If we approach the issues in an adult and sensible fashion through subgroups, I cannot see why we cannot do some more good work in identifying the issues — not negotiating — that can be brought before the Assembly for debate. We must keep reminding ourselves why we are here: it is so that the DUP can have an enormous four or five days of debate in the autumn.

Lord Morrow: Do you not want a debate also, Alan?

Mr McFarland: I absolutely do; but if there are no subgroups, there will be no debate. The problem is that we are trying to get debates. We need debates in the Assembly, with everybody present, so that the public can see that we are operating properly. If the subgroups do not identify detailed areas of discussion, the Secretary of State will have problems producing debates. That will be unfortunate.

Mrs Long: Further to what David Ford asked earlier, the DUP seems to agree that the scoping exercise, which is the job of this Committee, is incomplete, in that there is still further work to be done. The question is how we go about doing that.

I am unclear whether the DUP's objection is to the idea of subgroups. I understood that its fundamental objection was that subgroups could end up negotiating. If the subgroups are set up with the same remit as this Committee — to further scope the issues — I do not see how that is any different from our discussing matters in this Committee or in a subgroup. That is why I am slightly confused by the DUP's current position. It has no fundamental principled objection to subgroups, as such — by the DUP's own admission, the Subgroup on Economic Challenges is working well.

The issue seems to be where subgroups blur into negotiation. That is what I am asking. If the remit of subgroups is to further scope the issues, is it not sensible to proceed so that the subgroups can report to this Committee, where reports would be agreed by unanimity, if that is part of the objection?

Diane mentioned the issues that would not be dealt with under the remits of the subgroups. I would have thought that any outstanding issues from the subgroups would be better dealt with through this Committee. That way, no issues would be left outstanding. It would simply be a case of the subgroups further scoping those issues that fit comfortably into their remits, while those issues not within the remits of the subgroups remain with this Committee. That would be a way of addressing all the issues. Clearly, we all agree that they have not all been scoped in any depth.

Lord Morrow: There are a couple of points that Mrs Long has got right, and others on which she is wrong. She said that, by our admission, the Subgroup on Economic Challenges was working well. I never mentioned that subgroup in our deliberations, and neither did Diane Dodds. I do not know whether it is working well.

In relation to the subgroups that have been born of this Committee, I said that there would no doubt be subgroups out of subgroups.

How many subgroups do we need?

Secondly, you said that we did not object to the subgroups. I am sure that you have read the correspondence, so you will know that the Secretary of State directed the subgroups to meet. Therefore, there was no need to object or to agree; he is the king of the castle. The DUP did not initiate this debate — others sitting around this table did that. We simply said that we would not nominate members to two of the subgroups. Where is the ambiguity in that?

Mrs Long: That is the point. The ambiguity lies in the fact that the DUP will not nominate members to sit on two of the three subgroups. It is willing to nominate members to sit on one of the subgroups, but not the other two.

Lord Morrow: Yes, because we made it clear —

Mrs Long: And —

Lord Morrow: If I can interrupt you —

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): One at a time.

Mrs Long: I would like to finish my point. That is where the ambiguity lies.

Lord Morrow: She will not listen.

Mrs Long: It seems that the issue is not with the subgroups; rather it concerns what they will be dealing with.

Lord Morrow: That is not what I said. I said that the economic subgroup was born out of the Assembly debate.

Mr Ford: It is a direction from the Secretary of State.

Lord Morrow: It was born out of the Assembly debate; the Assembly requested it, and the Secretary of State acceded to that request.

Mrs Long: Not as a subgroup of this Committee.

Mr McFarland: I am confused as to why Maurice is unhappy with the subgroups. I could understand his objections if the subgroups had powers to negotiate, in the same way as I could understand objections to this Committee having those powers. However, if the subgroups will not be negotiating, but rather scoping and identifying issues in finer detail, what is the difficulty with them? Is it because they will operate a non-consensual voting system or because the terms of reference are not right? I am trying to understand why the DUP is saying that it will not sit on the subgroups.

Lord Morrow: We believe that the PFG Committee could adequately deal with the issues.

Mr McFarland: Chairman, the problem is that the PFG Committee will not meet because, as directed by the Secretary of State, its work areas have been divided among the three subgroups. It will be impossible for members of this Committee to sit here and on the subgroups. The subgroups will discuss the work areas in more detail, and party experts on those matters will sit on the subgroups. The Secretary of State is expecting the subgroups' work to be fed back to this Committee so that it can decide on matters for debate in September. Without the work of those subgroups, how does Maurice think that those debates can be arranged? Is he not concerned about whether we can arrange five debates in the autumn?

Lord Morrow: Sinn Féin is already on record as saying that it will determine whether there will be any debates.

Mr McFarland: The Secretary of State has already determined that the debates will take place.

Lord Morrow: You are right. The Secretary of State has said many things. Your colleague, David McNarry, said that every time we get a letter from the Secretary of State it contradicts and changes what he said in previous letters. Therefore, do not set too much store by what the Secretary of State has determined or not determined because he will change his mind at the next call.

It is time that we moved on from this issue.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We are reaching that stage now.

Lord Morrow: We are just going round in circles, and there is nothing around this circle.

Mr McFarland: I do not understand the DUP's objection.

Lord Morrow: We will not sit on negotiating subgroups. We have made that quite clear from day one, and, Alan, you know that.

Mr McFarland: They are not negotiating subgroups.

Lord Morrow: That is Mr McFarland's interpretation. One of his colleagues said in the newspaper recently that negotiations were going on in this Committee. Who is right? I understand why he looks bewildered.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): For clarification, rather than have a subgroup, the consensus was that there would be a working group, which would produce a report — a majority report or a minority report — until voting procedures are established. The subgroup on policing and justice would deal with issues such as criminality and paramilitaries. The Committee's agenda could be expanded to include those issues further if there is agreement. The subgroups would have a clear line as to what they can deal with.

If the subgroup is set up, the Secretary of State's direction will be fulfilled. The reports will come back to the Committee — where consensus comes back into play — so the majority issue is not damaging in any way in the subgroup. A debate in the Assembly will follow the submission of the subgroup's report.

Mr McNarry: It is vital that the Committee reach a decision to get down to work. The outcome that I am looking for is that we produce reports for debate. The Secretary of State has given dates in September for debates, and I take it that we are still working towards having those debates. I presume that they will cover the reports that the Committee will have approved, or will have been part of approving, and that there will be a report on rural planning. We must find a compromise whereby those reports can be compiled through the Committee.

I feel privileged to be here, but I share my party colleagues' anxiety to know what the Committee is doing and how it is progressing with issues. There are not 108 MLAs in this room, and the only place where there will be 108 MLAs is in the Assembly, where all Members will have the right to discuss the issues and reports that the Committee discusses.

This is the Committee on the Preparation for Government, yet it is extraordinary that the scoping issues so far have not included such matters as education, health and development. I have some sympathy with that view. If we are serious about preparing for Government, we should discuss the issues that we will inherit; for example, we may have ideas on how to design the future of the institutions and of policing and justice. However, there are other issues, and that is why I am glad that there is a subgroup on the economy.

We have come to today's Committee sitting on the back of news that the Government have frittered away millions on consultation. They are suffering from "consultation-itis" and cannot move without consulting the people. However, when the Government have consulted people on issues such as education, they ignore them. Would we have done that? We need to prepare for Government by establishing the background to that consultation.

The levels of consultation prove to me that the Government cannot govern properly. That is lamentable, and their management of Northern Ireland is dreadful, but that is also part of preparation for Government. I know that we have timescales and that people are going on holiday, etc, and those should be facilitated, but I hope that we can deal with such issues in order to get to the wider issues in the lifetime of the Committee. Therefore, that seems to put pressure on the Committee to make decisions here and now.

Do we go for a subgroup that my party may not participate in, or do we try to facilitate to keep us all together? It seems a nonsense that people may abstain — my party included — from a subgroup and yet discuss the reports of the subgroups on changes to the institutions and the devolution of criminal justice and policing — a point that has already been made.

Can we either decide to move on with the subgroups without parties, or find a compromise that will keep us together on these issues?

11.00 am

Dr Farren: I plead guilty to initiating this procedural debate. I understood from initial comments made by the DUP that it would not be nominating members to the two subgroups on changes to the institutions and the devolution of criminal justice and policing, although last week we were given to understand that it might be in a position to do so following consultations with, and clarification from, the Secretary of State.

The DUP is not nominating to those subgroups, and, rather than have those two subgroups, I thought that we might continue to debate the issues related to those two agenda items in this format. The DUP seems anxious that these matters should be discussed, but, rather than say: "Yes, that would be a way forward", it seems to be trying to find ways to obscure the issue, and it will not make a commitment to have the issues scoped further — to use its language — within this Committee.

However, if it is saying that this Committee could do so, then there would be no need for the subgroups, whatever the directions of the Secretary of State. We would tell the Secretary of State that we have agreed to continue to discuss those issues in this format and that we do not need the other two subgroups.

Will the Secretary of State say that we must have those two subgroups? Will he not be pleased that we will be discussing the matters further in this format?

Mr McNarry: I said before that we should get the Secretary of State to come to this Committee and answer those questions.

Dr Farren: He is unlikely to accede to that request. However, we could agree to scope those issues in this Committee. Would the DUP be happy for us to proceed without the subgroups and to scope the issues in here in this format?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We need to reach a conclusion. If Dr Farren's proposal were put forward and we had consensus that we do not need the subgroups, we would need legal opinion and the opinion of the Secretary of State, as we would not be complying with his direction.

Dr Farren: We would suspend the implementation of the direction. Is there a serious suggestion that the Secretary of State will say that we must operate those two subgroups even though we have decided to continue with those issues in this Committee? It may be that some other party will object to that procedure. I began by saying that I was thinking off the top of my head as to how we might proceed with these two issues — if they are important to the DUP in particular — and how we might overcome the problem that the DUP has with nominating.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Dr Farren, are you making that a proposal?

Dr Farren: I am making a proposal in order to bring this to a head. It will test whether or not people are happy to proceed.

Mr Murphy: It should be brought to a head. We are in danger of talking this to death. The DUP has not shown any willingness to deal with these matters as agenda items here, and it is unwilling to go into subgroups.

David McNarry has suggested that the UUP might abstain, and that would mean that the subgroups would not be workable anyway. Alan McFarland challenged the DUP as to why it would not join the subgroups, and David McNarry said that his party might abstain anyway. It is getting ridiculous.

David McNarry is out of the room now, but he has suggested several times before, and also today, that the other parties facilitated Sinn Féin in not having Assembly debates. I have to correct him: they did not facilitate us.

Sinn Féin objected to every plenary session of the Assembly except for the failed attempt to elect the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. On four or five occasions, our objections were overruled, overlooked or ignored, and the Secretary of State proceeded with his plans. No one facilitated Sinn Féin in that regard.

Sinn Féin has made clear its position on this Committee: it is a Preparation for Government Committee, not a preparation for debates committee. It seems that Alan thinks that the emphasis of this Committee is on facilitating a debate in September. The emphasis from our perspective is to get down to talking about some of the serious issues that need to be discussed in order to meet the deadline for restoration on 24 November. That is Sinn Féin's purpose. If part of that work involves debating some of those matters in the Assembly, and those are genuine debates in relation to work that has been done in this Committee, we are happy to co-operate.

The objective of this Committee is to do the required work. However, we have been talking for an hour, and I have seen no indication yet of any progress on the two topics. The other subgroup is up and running, and there is no indication of the other two getting under way. If the UUP abstained from participation in the subgroups, as it seemed to indicate earlier, they could not function anyway. It is time for some straight answers. Is this work going to happen or not? Frankly, we could be doing something more useful than sitting here in circular discussions every Monday.

Mrs Long: The Alliance Party does not care whether the discussions take place in the Committee or a subgroup, so long as they take place and do so quickly. At present, we seem to be going round in circles and getting nowhere. If having the discussions in the Committee makes it easier for other people to participate, we are happy to have them here, and if it is easier to do it in subgroups, that is fine. The meat of the issue matters, not the structure of the discussions. We must focus on that.

Following the questioning of the DUP's position, I was surprised to hear the Ulster Unionists suggest in the last intervention that they might not participate in the subgroups. That question was asked of them earlier today, and no indication of their position was given until the end.

If we are going to proceed with the subgroups, there must be a commitment from all parties to be present. We could proceed with the subgroups without the DUP — and I understand its frustration with this discussion — but that would be pointless, because all parties around the table need to make some kind of submission and be party to the discussions. The non-participation of any party would not be helpful to any of us, and that is why we are having this hour-long circular discussion.

We want to see how we can do business, with the DUP and everyone else at the table contributing something, because we all believe that that is not only positive, but necessary. That is why we have been teasing this out, but there must be a commitment from all five parties that they will sit around the table and be willing to get on with the business, wherever it may take place.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): That is the key point. If the subgroup is not set up and the topics are to be debated here, it must be established whether all parties will participate.

Dr Farren: I will put my proposal, in that case.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Alan wanted to speak first.

Mr McFarland: Seán asked Maurice whether the DUP would take part in the discussions if they took place in this format. It would be useful to know the answer to that before we take decisions.

Dr Farren: It is a rhetorical question, because they are members of this Committee. If they do not turn up —

Mr McFarland: If the DUP objects to negotiating policing and justice in a subgroup, it is as likely to be neurotic about discussing it in this Committee — or perhaps not, as the case may be. I am curious to get an answer.

Mr Ford: I asked that question directly in my first contribution to this discussion. If we are merely scoping further — or in your terms, mining down — is there a suitable format in which to do that? I was trying to see whether we could assist the DUP in getting engaged in that, while accepting that it would not engage in anything that it regarded as negotiations.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We need a commitment from all parties, not just the DUP, that they will be happy to discuss policing, justice and other issues in this Committee if there is not going to be a subgroup.

Lord Morrow: Under what circumstances would Alan McFarland or his party not participate in subgroups?

Mr McFarland: Hold on for a moment. We are back to Seán Farren's question: if those issues were kept in this Committee and in this format, would the DUP take part?

Lord Morrow: We have made it quite clear from day one that we see this as a scoping Committee. We can scope whatever issue under the sun that members wish.

Mr McFarland: The subgroups scope at a micro level. The DUP disagreed with that and said that that was negotiation. Is the DUP happy to do micro-level scoping in this format?

Lord Morrow: I am sure that Alan McFarland will answer my question in a moment or two. If there is further scoping of the issues within this Committee, we expect that to include all the issues that have been raised in the Committee but that we were never allowed to debate in the Assembly.

Mr McFarland: So the answer is that the DUP is happy to discuss institutions and policing and justice in this Committee as part of a scoping exercise. That seems to be a yes.

Lord Morrow: It is your turn to reply.

Mr McFarland: Hold on; I am trying to go through the logic of this. The DUP's objection to the subgroups was nothing to do with scoping, because what was to be discussed in the subgroups is the same as what we discussed in this format. Therefore, the objection must be to the lack of a requirement for consensus on the subgroups, because the issues and the terms of reference are the same. The difference is in the formats of this Committee and the subgroups. If the DUP is happy with that, its problem must be something other than the scoping exercise.

Mrs D Dodds: I am very anxious to allow Alan McFarland to reply to Maurice Morrow's question. Our objection is not to subgroups per se, but to the voting system in the subgroups. It is interesting to see that so many parties in this room are now content with majority rule in some cases.

Mr McFarland: That is how the first Assembly operated, and the next Assembly will operate in that way.

Mrs D Dodds: Before the end of June, this Committee prepared a comprehensive list of issues that had been scoped and identified as the obstacles to the return of devolution in Northern Ireland. For example, on the matter of debates, we had a report that quite easily could have gone to the Assembly for a valuable debate that would have allowed 108 Members to contribute. I entirely share Mr McNarry's frustration at the way in which that has been handled and blocked by parties in this room and by the Secretary of State.

We have a full report and a full list of issues. We cannot pick and choose those issues, which are far too narrow as defined by the remits for the two subgroups. We will not agree to those remits.

Maurice Morrow asked some time ago — and I would really like to get round to Alan McFarland's answer — on what basis the Ulster Unionists would not nominate to the two subgroups. We have already made our position quite clear.

Mr McFarland: All the issues that we identified fit into one of the three subgroups. You can see that. That is why we have established subgroups. The Secretary of State wants subgroups to identify particular issues. We are trying to agree the format because, as others have said, to have one of the major parties, the DUP, not playing its part clearly does not help the work of this Committee at all.

Why does the DUP not want to play its part? It is not because of the scoping exercise that the subgroups could do, because the DUP is happy to do that in this format. There must be some other reason, to do with the voting system or whatever, for its not being happy to sit on subgroups.

11.15 am

Mrs D Dodds: I am sorry, I am still waiting —

Dr Farren: I have a point of procedure, Chairman. The debate is moving away from the proposal. Whether one, two or three parties decide not to nominate to subgroups is not the point; it is whether we have a format in which the issues can be addressed. My proposal aims to establish whether there is consensus for such a format; that is, this Committee. That is all. After the proposal has been put, members can question each other as to whether they would participate in subgroups, were they to exist. However, my proposal would probably push the subgroups aside and render them unnecessary.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I will put your proposal to the Committee.

Dr Farren: My proposal should be put, because it does not require any further debate, in my view.

Mrs D Dodds: For weeks, we have openly discussed these issues and answered parties' questions. Maurice put a question to the Ulster Unionist Party, and I would really like to hear the answer.

Mr McFarland: The answer is absolutely irrelevant, because the subgroups will not function. There cannot be a situation whereby only four parties sit on a subgroup and produce a report that must come back to this Committee for consensual agreement before it goes before the Assembly. If the DUP does not sit on the subgroup, there is no subgroup. Asking silly questions about who else might sit on the subgroup and what its terms of reference might be is —

Mrs D Dodds: I did not raise that issue. It was raised by a member of Mr McFarland's party, and I am keen to know his view.

Mr McFarland: But it does not matter.

Lord Morrow: There is an inference that everyone else is asking silly questions and that only questions asked by Alan are intelligent.

Mrs D Dodds: It is a particularly pejorative way of speaking.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Will you restate your proposal, Dr Farren?

Dr Farren: I propose that this Committee continues to discuss issues other than those being discussed in the Subgroup on Economic Challenges. Whether we decide that subgroups are necessary is an aside at this point. Let me make it simple: I propose that we continue to discuss the issues identified for the other two subgroups, on institutions and policing and justice, and other matters, in this Committee. That is all.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Is there consensus?

Mr Murphy: I am sceptical, given the DUP's refusal to give a direct answer to whether it would get down to business in this Committee. The DUP seems to be evading that. If we try to have some sort of micro-discussion on those issues, as Alan suggested, the DUP will use that to introduce other issues in order to avoid getting down to the serious issues.

Nonetheless, in order to advance this discussion, which is what we are trying to do, Sinn Féin is prepared to go along with the proposal. I must say, however, that I am quite sceptical about the outcome, but we are prepared to consent to Seán's proposal and see how this process develops. If we are to try to do some serious work on the issues outlined in the terms of reference, and people just play with that, we will obviously have to reassess our position. However, in order to move this discussion on, and with that health warning attached, Sinn Féin is prepared to go along with Seán's proposal.

Mr Ford: We certainly agree with Seán Farren's proposal. There is clearly no way in which subgroups can function at this stage. Whether issues can be scoped in greater detail in this Committee will have to be demonstrated by those who participate. The fact that people are playing games is not much of a reason for walking out — otherwise this Committee would never have started.

Lord Morrow: We need clarification that further scoping will be wide-ranging and on an issue-by-issue basis. We also need clarification that, if members — and I include the DUP in that — feel that it is necessary, further scoping is possible on the report that has already been produced. In fairness, Seán Farren mentioned "any other issues".

Mr McFarland: We are happy with the proposal.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Is that agreed?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): All right, we will refer that to the Secretary of State. Perhaps we can delay the establishment of subgroups rather than clear them from the table completely.

Dr Farren: Perhaps the secretariat could help us to identify those issues that require further scoping and circulate them to us. We can then agree an order and add to that list if necessary. Obviously, the Secretary of State may have a view, but I would be surprised if he should intervene when we have reached a rare level of consensus.

Mr McFarland: I presume that it is open for parties to bring their subject experts into the subgroup as substitutes for other members?

Mrs D Dodds: What subgroup?

Mr McFarland: Sorry, I meant the Committee.

Mr Murphy: I assume that the topic for discussion at a PFG Committee meeting will be clearly identified from now on. We must know whom to bring along.

There are two main topics listed for our attention. I am not averse to anyone raising something new, as that is his or her entitlement. However, if we get into the business of listing, as Seán Farren has suggested, and dabbling into a wide range of issues, it will be difficult to produce a report in the time allotted. It will be possible to report on the two main issues if the proper work is done and the Committee meetings are structured in such a way that we know what topic is coming up and who is to be sent along. Otherwise, the chances of our producing a report for September are very slim.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do members wish to propose a first item at this stage, or should the Clerks decide?

Mrs D Dodds: I propose that we go back to the list that the parties produced, correlate that with the issues that were identified during the scoping exercise and the tentative report that resulted, and thus identify a running order.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The Clerks will do that and circulate it to members. Agreed?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We must also agree a date for the next meeting.

Mr Murphy: Can I presume that that is item 3 out of the water and that the draft programme for work is not going to be referred to us?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Yes, although it could become part of that discussion too. The Secretary of State mentioned working in the context of the Programme for Government.

What will be the date of our next meeting?

Dr Farren: We would need to meet not later than next Monday.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We could meet on Wednesday. The economic subgroup will meet tomorrow and on Thursday.

Mr McFarland: We now have a chunky programme of work to discuss: the institutional issue; the policing and justice issue; and all that relates to those topics. We must report by 18 August, is that correct?

Dr Farren: We should meet on Wednesday.

Mr McFarland: I should think we would need to meet twice or even three times a week.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Will we try for Wednesday at 10.00 am?

Mr Murphy: I have a difficulty.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Is there a time that is suitable for everyone?

Mr McNarry: Will both Chairmen be able to sit in for continuity?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Yes. Jim Wells is off today and sends apologies for the economic subgroup tomorrow too. I am not sure of his arrangements after that, but we will endeavour to ensure continuity.

Mr McNarry: I am just mindful of the workload of the two Deputy Speakers. If that becomes a problem, will we be advised?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Yes, and then we will look at alternative arrangements.

Wednesday at 10.00 am, is that OK?

Mr Murphy: That is to look at all these issues and decide how we are proceeding from there?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Yes.

Mr McNarry: Can “Slab” Murphy be the first witness to be brought forward?

Mr Murphy: If you can find him.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The meeting is closed.

Adjourned at 11.25 am.

COMMITTEE ON THE PREPARATION FOR GOVERNMENT

Wednesday 26 July 2006

Members in attendance for all or part of proceedings:

The Chairman, Mr Jim Wells
Mr Thomas Buchanan
Mr John Dallat
Mrs Diane Dodds
Dr Seán Farren
Mr David Ford
Mr Alan McFarland
Mr Martin McGuinness
Mr David McNarry
Lord Morrow
Mr Conor Murphy
Mr John O'Dowd
Ms Margaret Ritchie
Observing: Mr Francie Molloy

The Committee met at 10.10 am.

(The Chairman (Mr Wells) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will get cracking. We have been asked not to wait for the Alliance Party delegation, but they will be here. Who are the deputies?

Ms Ritchie: I am representing Dr McDonnell.

Mr O'Dowd: I am representing Michelle Gildernew.

Mr Buchanan: I am representing Rev Dr William McCrea.

Mr Dallat: I am representing Mr Durkan.

Lord Morrow: Diane Dodds will be here later, and she will be representing Ian Paisley Jnr.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Apologies have been received from Mr Kennedy who is on holiday. Mrs Dunwoody is also on holidays, so the Clerks for today's hearing are Principal Clerks Mrs Pritchard and Martin Wilson.

Hansard has been effective in producing the report on the meeting of 24 July. Does anyone have any amendments or additions to make to it or the minutes?

Mr O'Dowd: The comments attributed to me on page 18 — while I wholeheartedly agree with them — were spoken by my colleague Mr Murphy.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That would be more properly addressed by contacting the Hansard staff and making certain that it is corrected before it becomes the official version that goes on the website. However, you have put it on the record, and that is a handy way of letting the folk upstairs know that the correction should be made.

Is everyone else content?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I was not present on Monday, but I understand that the Committee decided not to form the two additional subgroups and that the subjects that they were to cover would be dealt with by full meetings of the Preparation for Government (PFG) Committee. The Clerks have advised the Secretary of State of that decision, and he is content with that. He says that that is in accordance with his direction.

Mr McFarland: Perhaps I am being dozy here, but it states in item 3 of the minutes:

"It was agreed that the Committee should proceed to set up the subgroups on Changes to the Institutions and Devolution of Policing and Justice".

I thought that the Committee had agreed not to set up the subgroups but that those issues would be dealt with by the PFG Committee.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Dr Farren came in at that stage and made his proposal. He felt that as one party at least would not be attending, there was no sense in going ahead with the subgroup, so he proposed that it would be dealt with by the full PFG Committee.

Mr McFarland: Are we dealing with the minutes of the last meeting?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes.

Mr McFarland: It says in the minutes that this Committee, which operates by consensus — including the DUP — agreed that the Committee should proceed to set up subgroups on institutions and policing and justice. The Committee did not agree to set up subgroups; it objected to subgroups. It agreed to deal with policing and justice and institutions in this forum.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): You did agree to set up the subgroups and then changed your mind.

Lord Morrow: That is not right. We were never asked to agree to set up subgroups. We were never asked that question. The Secretary of State made a directive that they would be set up, therefore we were not asked to approve or disapprove them. We said that we would not nominate.

Dr Farren: It would more accurately reflect what happened by saying that we nominated members to the subgroups.

Mr McFarland: That is not what is stated in the minutes.

Dr Farren: I know that. It would be more accurate to leave out "agree" and say that we nominated members to the subgroups. Since the minutes only record decisions, it would be right to say that we nominated members. Those parties who were content to nominate members did so. However, I made my proposal when it was discovered that there would be no participation by one party.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): You could get round this by deleting the first paragraph of item 3.

My reading of the situation is that, when it became apparent to Dr Farren that one party was not going to nominate, another motion was more or less tabled.

Mr McFarland: That may well have been the case. However, in order for paragraph 3 of the minutes to state that it was “agreed”, consensus must have been reached that the Committee should proceed to set up subgroups. I arrived late to the meeting, but I was present to hear members make it clear that they were not going to set up subgroups. Therefore, the minutes should not say that there had been any agreement on the subgroups.

10.15 am

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Morrow made it very clear that the DUP would not be nominating.

Mr McFarland: I suggest that we take that line out. If someone from outside the Committee were to read it, they would think it really odd that the Committee had agreed by consensus — because it operates by consensus — to set up the subgroups and then had two hours of rows about not wanting to set them up. The first paragraph does not make sense. Dr Farren’s suggestion should be adopted: the paragraph makes sense only if it reflects the fact that members simply nominated to the subgroup.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are members content with that proposal?

Lord Morrow: That is not a true reflection. The Committee was never asked to agree or disagree on the setting up of subgroups. The Committee received a simple direction from the Secretary of State that subgroups would be set up: the DUP simply said that it would not nominate to them.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are there any other comments? Mr Morrow, are you objecting to the deletion of that comment?

Lord Morrow: It should clearly state that the Secretary of State directed that subgroups be established.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The difficulty that I have with that, Mr Morrow, is that on page 1 of Hansard, Mr Molloy, who was in the Chair, said:

“It was to be the subgroup on devolution of criminal justice and policing. It is now to be called the subgroup on devolution of policing and justice. Can we proceed to set up those two subgroups at this stage?”

It continues:

“Members indicated assent.”

Then Mr Molloy called for nominations.

Lord Morrow: What happened then?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Farren nominated Mr Bradley and himself, and three of the parties provided nominations. The difficulty is that “Members indicated assent” suggests that consensus was reached.

Mr Murphy: There was consensus to begin the proceedings to set up a subgroup, and that is when the parties nominated. David McNarry said that the UUP would nominate by close of play the following day, and the DUP said that it would not nominate. We then discussed ways of working around that. If one is splitting the difference, we agreed to begin the proceedings to have the subgroups in operation, and that is when the nominations were asked for. We did not have to agree on the establishment of subgroups because they were already established.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): How do we get around this?

Lord Morrow: Mr Deputy Speaker, why is there no mention of the Secretary of State’s directive in the minute?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is not mentioned because at the previous meeting we spent about 40 minutes assessing the exact meaning of the directive and the accompanying letter. By that stage, it was taken that people were very clear about what the Secretary of State meant.

Lord Morrow: Yes, but to get an understanding of the situation, it must be re-established in the minute that, following the Secretary of State’s direction, subgroups were to be established.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): A phrase could be inserted stating that the Committee agreed to implement the Secretary of State’s direction to set up the subgroup.

Lord Morrow: We were not asked to agree that. You do not have to agree a directive, Mr Deputy Speaker. We were given no choice in the matter. We were told to get on with it and make nominations, and parties started to do that.

Dr Farren: I would have thought that this problem could be very easily solved. Could we say that it was agreed that nominations be invited from the parties? That is what happened.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Would that be acceptable?

Dr Farren: The nominations that were made could be recorded.

Lord Morrow: It should be recorded that the Deputy Speaker asked for nominations.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Of course, Lord Morrow, your remarks will be put on the record anyhow, and will now appear in Hansard. Are folk happy with that suggestion?

The Deputy Speaker asks for nominations to the subgroups on institutions and on the devolution of criminal justice and policing. Can we have agreement on that in order to get the minutes out of the way?

Mr M McGuinness: Does it matter one way or the other? It is down to whether the DUP is prepared to accept that formula.

Lord Morrow: We are happy as long as the minutes clearly reflect that we were never asked to agree or disagree anything. The problem arose when we said that we would not nominate.

Mr M McGuinness: That is clear enough. We appear to be agreed on a form of words that has just been suggested by the Deputy Speaker. I suggest we sensibly move on.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Have we consensus?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Good.

We have agreed the minutes. I have allowed Mr McFarland to come back in on the minutes when, really, we had gone past them. A nice try and it succeeded.

We have reported to the Secretary of State and he is content that we go forward as we have planned, so there does not seem to be any difficulty there. On tab 2 of your papers the Clerks have helpfully devised a table of issues raised by parties during the presentations and the submissions.

Mr McNarry: Before we get into that, may I raise an issue. On the radio this morning, it was related that the Secretary of State had set up a group to deal with rates, and in particular with industrial derating. Should we ask the Secretary of State whether he intends to set up other groups outside the remit of this Committee? I ask because industrial derating has been discussed by this Committee and forwarded to the Subgroup on the Economic Challenges facing Northern Ireland, which has it in mind to invite that lobby group on industrial derating. I am totally in favour of that group being set up by the Secretary of State. However, on the one hand, he directs us to carry out work; on the other, he meets people and sets up groups without acknowledging to this Committee what he is doing. In view of the long list of issues that we have now to discuss, would it be proper to seek his mind and ask whether he is engaged in any issues outside this Committee and, if so, would he make us aware of them?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Subgroup on the Economic Challenges facing Northern Ireland meets tomorrow morning at 10.00 am and I am in the Chair. Derating is a relevant and important issue for the work of that subgroup. It is any Committee member's right to raise it first thing tomorrow morning; and if the Committee votes by a majority to do so, it could ask the Secretary of State to give evidence on this issue so that Committee members can express whatever concerns they may have. It is not a matter with which the PFG Committee should be dealing directly.

Mr McNarry: Chairman, in case you misunderstood, I meant that it is relevant because the subgroups are under the auspices of this Committee. That is why I raise it. I am not raising it as an issue for this Committee, although tomorrow I intend to do what you suggest. However, as we move down the long list, it appears inconceivable for the Secretary of State to speak to others about these issues with a view to setting up groups, as he has done on the derating issue. It would only be proper for us to seek his mind.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes, if your concern is that, as we work through these issues, we find that the Secretary of State has set up an ad hoc group to deal with some or all of those matters. It is unlikely that we will start the work today, but as soon as we do, we could well agree to write to the Secretary of State.

Mr McNarry: I appreciate that.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I can see the difficulty that that causes. Of course, the Secretary of State may have made that decision before he was aware of the progress that the Committee has made.

Mr McNarry: I do not think so.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Murphy, do you have the list?

Mr Murphy: Yes. Over the past week, we have received three broad remits for the subgroups, one of which is the economic subgroup referred to by David McNarry. It strikes me that the bulk of items on the list fall into those three categories. Perhaps we should identify those items, allocate them to categories, decide what is left over and agree a focused series of meetings to deal with the outstanding issues.

The Committee has agreed to deal with two of those issues — the devolution of policing and justice and the establishment of the institutions. Some of those items rightfully belong to the economic subgroup, which is meeting. We should identify which of the remaining items fall into the other two broad remits and see what is left, so that we can set an intensive timetable of work to achieve some progress on those two issues before the end of the summer.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Clerks have helpfully drawn up a table. I will talk through it while it is being distributed. We have tried to bring the issues under four main headings: Government; institutional issues; law and order issues; and rights, safeguards, equality issues and victims. It is purely for guidance, but it might help us to focus on how to deal with the issues. I have had a brief look: some of issues sit comfortably in the groups, while others are perhaps open for debate. Members might want to consider the table to decide whether it shows a way forward in tackling the issues in groups of eight to 11.

Mr McFarland: The Secretary of State tried to put three areas into subgroups. The Committee decided to deal with two of those, but that does not mean that they cannot be dealt with separately.

One could argue that the safeguards and rights issues would sit well in the institutional issues category, in that they are related directly to the agreement and the comprehensive agreement and involve setting up institutions. For example, the bill of rights is related directly to the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission, which is part of the institutional side. Policing and justice and the institutions could be dealt with in alternate Committee meetings. That would package things up easily.

Mr Ford: I take the point made by both Conor and Alan. However, the matters covered under the final heading of rights, safeguards, equality and victims are distinct and discrete. The needs of victims and building a shared future do not sit that easily with discussions on the structure and architecture of the institutions. There would be merit in keeping those matters out as, in effect, a fourth pillar.

Dr Farren: I had begun a similar exercise and I came up with broadly the same headings. Human rights, parades and equity issues form a cluster, which can be addressed as a whole. I identified victims and the past as a separate matter, but institutional issues, policing and justice, paramilitarism, criminality and decommissioning — as far as we can deal with them — flow from the Committee's remit. As I said, I identified human rights, parades and equity issues and victims and the past as two further subheadings.

However, we should try to get under way with the first two, which, by common assent, are at the top of the list. We will not get any more than an interim report finalised before the end of August.

10.30 am

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Part of the reason why we were constrained was that if we had set up subgroups to deal with the issues, it would have taken two weeks for us to consider their reports. However, the PFG Committee will produce the report, so that will free up some time. We could produce an interim report in September charting the progress and then perhaps report a month later. That would relieve some of the pressure we have in dealing with the issues more carefully.

Dr Farren: The Committee should have some type of report ready by the end of August whether it be an interim or final report. That will take a great deal of time, and the Committee will probably have to meet twice a week for quite some time to get through all the issues that are covered by the various headings insofar as it is possible to make any progress in the next four weeks.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are there any other views? There seems to be slight disagreement about the groupings.

Mr McFarland: I am happy to go with that grouping. I was simply trying to keep it logical on the basis of what we have discussed before. It will be a matter for the Committee to decide whether we deal with those headings in turn.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There seems to be some support for Mr Ford's view that "rights" and "safeguards" do not sit easily under the heading "Institutional issues".

Lord Morrow: Would it facilitate the meeting if we had a short adjournment to let the groups retire and go through the list for 10 minutes? It would be helpful to come back after each group has discussed the issues.

Mr McNarry: I have no objection to what has been said, but I express my sensitivity at seeing "Parades" under the heading of "Law and order issues". That is not where I would put it.

Lord Morrow: That is the sort of issue that an adjournment would facilitate.

Mr McNarry: That would be helpful. I am pleased that the list has been drafted and it is well intended, but we need some cohesive thinking that parades are not a law and order issue.

Mr M McGuinness: Does the member think that we should put "Parades" under the heading of "Hillwalking"?

Mr McNarry: We had a discussion on walking, and I would prefer to see the heading "Walking". I am glad that the Member has learned from that discussion.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Committee has a precedent of granting a brief adjournment to any group that requests it. That is entirely acceptable.

Mr McFarland: The category "Other" covers "Other issues raised with the Government which require delivery for the return of devolution". It would be helpful if those who have raised those issues with the Government would let us know what they are. Presumably, unless there is something magical that we have not spotted yet, they are already reflected in this list. All parties have made their submissions and the issues have been listed. What could appear under the category “Other”?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That was part of the DUP’s submission. The party may wish to expand on that following the adjournment.

Mr McFarland: Most of the topics come under one of the headings, unless there is something that no one has thought of.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I am sure that the DUP will expand on that when it returns.

The Committee was suspended at 10.33 am.

On resuming —

10.55 am

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The meeting is reconvened. Members have had a chance to look at the list. As I have not heard any dissention on the principle of trying to group items, can I take it that members are happy that we go down the list and make sure each is in the right pocket, as it were?

Obviously the first item on the list will be referred to the Subgroup on the Economic Challenges facing Northern Ireland, and the first section could also be dealt with by the subgroup.

The Secretary of State has made reference to the Programme for Government and we will come back to that later as a separate item.

Are we content that the Belfast Agreement is an institutional issue?

Lord Morrow: Could I have clarification? I missed what you said in relation to Government.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): This matter arose at a previous meeting. The Secretary of State referred three sets of issues for discussion by subgroups, but he has also referred to the Programme for Government separately in a letter dated 3 July, which is in your pack. At two previous meetings, Mr McCrea made it clear that he objected to this Committee dealing with that issue, so it will be dealt with as a separate issue today because of the strong views on the subject. I suggest that we come back to it later, because if we start debating it now we will be very slow in dealing with the other issues.

Lord Morrow: The DUP does not see items 2 and 3 as blockages to the restoration of devolution. We believe that the priorities for Government and the Programme for Government come after devolution and will be worked out by those who will be forming the Government.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There will be an opportunity to make that point at the end of the meeting. Do we accept that the Belfast Agreement is an institutional issue?

Lord Morrow: A very bad one, but yes.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Dr Farren, do you accept that?

Dr Farren: There are institutional issues within the Good Friday, or the Belfast Agreement. The Belfast Agreement is much more comprehensive than the institutional issues that it contains. It deals with constitutional and human rights issues. As long as it is clear that it is only the institutional matters that fall under this heading then, in one sense, specific reference to it is redundant, but I am happy to keep it there as long as that is what is understood by it. Aspects of the Good Friday Agreement come in under each of the headings. If we are discussing institutional issues, let us confine ourselves to institutional issues of the agreement under that heading, and deal with the human rights issues, and any other issues, under the appropriate headings.

Mrs D Dodds: The Belfast Agreement is an extremely important issue for unionists. My party has never supported the Belfast Agreement, and, indeed, the majority of unionists do not now support the Belfast Agreement. Any committee set up to look at the blockages to devolution, which did not take into account the Belfast Agreement, and the lack of support within the unionist community for the Belfast Agreement, would be denying reality. Therefore it is important that we discuss these issues.

Mr M McGuinness: A number of parties were involved in the discussions that took place during the greater part of the autumn of 2004: the British Government, the Irish Government, Sinn Féin and the Democratic Unionist Party, albeit at some distance. Anyone who was there could come to no other conclusion than that, during those discussions, the Democratic Unionist Party accepted the Good Friday Agreement as the template for future politics on this island, and specifically in the North.

11.00 am

The Good Friday Agreement has effectively been accepted as an international agreement between two Governments. The broad headings allow, as they should, all parties on the Preparation for Government Committee to discuss any issue of their choice. The DUP can spin that how it likes, but the agreement is the template from which all participants on this Committee are working.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I have a slight concern: we are not debating the merits, or otherwise, of the Belfast Agreement. If we go down that route, we will occupy the next six hours.

Mr M McGuinness: That is why I do not intend to prolong my contribution, except to say that all participants have a right to express their views and opinions. Let us not fool ourselves, however — the template from which we are all working is the implementation of the Good Friday Agreement.

After all parties met with the Taoiseach and the British Prime Minister in Parliament Buildings a number of weeks ago, the two leaders issued a joint communiqué that clearly indicated that the job of work ahead for all of us was to restore the institutions by 24 November 2006. The Secretary of State set out a programme of work. That is why we are sitting on this Committee, and that is the basis on which we will move forward these discussions.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): All we need to establish is whether all Committee members agree that the institutional issues in the Belfast Agreement — it would almost be better to put institutional issues in brackets after each point — is a subject that falls neatly into the institutional issues section and should be debated in that category. We do not require people to suggest what they feel that the Belfast Agreement means.

Is there any objection to that?

Mr McFarland: Chairman, may I suggest that you ask whether there are additions to be made to the list or points that can be moved elsewhere? If you go down the list, one by one, each party feels that it must say something about each of them, and we will be here until 5.00 pm.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I suggest that members comment only on whether they feel that a particular point should be included in that category, rather than what they feel about the issue. There will be ample opportunity for comment when we debate the issues.
