Do members accept that the Belfast Agreement should be there? Do they accept that the Civic Forum should be there as an institution? What about the comprehensive agreement?

Mr McFarland: May I suggest that you ask the parties which points they do not want included?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do all members feel that every point from 1 to 11 is totally relevant, should be there and should not be moved?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): OK, so we believe that every point under institutional issues should remain. Does anyone have any additions, or has anything been missed?

Mr Ford: Given all the Alliance Party's remarks on the subject, particularly since November 2001, I am disappointed that the Assembly voting system is not listed as a separate point.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes, that could come under point 7 on the list. We hold the view that if a certain issue is important to a party, it should be considered. You are talking about the d'Hondt voting system.

Mr Ford: We have made it clear that it is a key issue.

I am not blaming the Committee staff. Despite what the Alliance Party has said to the Northern Ireland Office (NIO) over the past five years, the NIO still does not realise the significance that our party attaches to the voting system — that is obvious from correspondence that we receive from it. We consider the voting system significant enough to be listed individually.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): A great many items come under “Institutional issues”.

Mr McFarland: The voting system can be number 12.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): If we get consensus, I am happy to put it in at number 12, because it is an important issue for the Alliance Party. Is there consensus?

Mr M McGuinness: I think that there is an acceptance — although I do not wish to tempt providence — that some of the headings allow for all sorts of issues to be discussed. Sectarianism and racism are important issues that will have to be dealt with at some stage of our deliberations. The broad headings adequately deal with all the issues that are of concern to all parties around the table. If we try to outline the detail of each issue, we will be making unnecessary work for ourselves.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That suggests that we do not have consensus on number 12.

Mr M McGuinness: I am not saying that I oppose it.

Mr McFarland: The Alliance Party has raised this from day one, and if it is something that it feels strongly about I have no objection to making it number 12.

Mr M McGuinness: I have no objection, but we should resist the temptation of expanding all the issues.

Mr Ford: Chairman, I assure you that I will resist the temptation to put any of my other general concerns. However, since the Assembly voting system is the one part of the agreement that failed to work when implemented in good faith on 2 November 2001, it merits individual mention.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Have we consensus that the voting system be number 12?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Those are the 12 points under “Institutional issues”.

We move on to “Law and order issues”. Mr McNarry has a concern about parades being in this category.

Mr McNarry: We would like “Parades” and “Peaceful summer” to be removed from that list.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do you want them moved to “Rights; safeguards; equality issues; victims”, or do you want them deleted?

Mr McNarry: We do not want them deleted; we would like them to be put into another category.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It might sit under “Rights; safeguards; equality issues; victims” — particularly the third category.

Mr McNarry: It is not an equality issue. It would stand alone in a discussion in which equality was included, but it is not an equality/parades issue.

Mr Ford: In the past, Mr McNarry suggested that parading is a human rights issue. Since “Rights” appear as the first part of that heading, does he accept that parades could fit in there?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Or as part of “Unionist culture” perhaps.

Mr McFarland: Parading has been mentioned through many a discussion. It is an issue for several parties for different reasons, and it would merit being added as point 9 under “Rights; safeguards; equality issues; victims” so that it can be discussed discretely. There are issues connected with it that are not directly connected with equality or human rights — although there are connections. However, as a stand-alone issue it is one that exercises many people for different reasons.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do you want it as number 9 in the third category?

Mr McNarry: Yes.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): “Unionist culture” is number 7 in that category.

Mr McFarland: That might relate to Ulster Scots being part of the unionist culture, for example, which is not connected to parading. Parading is a separate issue.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Therefore you are content for “Parades/Peaceful summer” to be number 9 under “Rights; safeguards; equality issues; victims”. That deletes two items from “Law and order issues”.

Mrs D Dodds: We should not lump “Parades” and “Peaceful summer” together. Parading is an important issue. It is an issue of human rights, culture and identity for the unionist community. It is extremely important, and it must be dealt with on its own. It must be sorted out, as it poses an important question.

Mr McNarry: As we approached the summer, we discussed whether it would be peaceful.

Conor Murphy is not present, but I am mindful of the fact that he said — and I am paraphrasing — that Sinn Féin’s attitude to the Committee and the Assembly would depend on what happens over the summer. That is what I understood from his comment.

Discussions on a “Peaceful summer” would give us an opportunity to find out from Sinn Féin what it thought of the summer and what its attitude is. I will not talk about this issue in depth, but I agree with Diane Dodds; “Parades” should be a stand-alone category.

Mr McFarland: Do we need the “Peaceful summer” category at all? I agree that it is not necessarily connected to parades. It is on the list because the issue was raised in June as we led up to the compilation of this list. It is now approaching the end of July, and it will soon be August. Events to come may influence whether we have a peaceful summer, but by the time the Committee gets beaver on the list, the issue may not need to be treated as a discrete topic, although it can be mentioned in passing. “Parades” should be dealt with separately at point 9. We could simply abandon “Peaceful summer” as a separate category and include it in the rest of the discussions.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): At the rate we are going, we will be talking about a peaceful winter.

Mr O’Dowd: I would like to respond to David’s comments by clarifying what Sinn Féin said, which was that a peaceful summer would facilitate a better atmosphere for this Committee to carry out its work on the wider preparation for Government. I do not think that Sinn Féin said that it was a precondition — in fact, I know that it did not.

Mr McNarry: I am sorry to interrupt you, but you need to read Hansard.

Mr O’Dowd: That is one of the few advantages of having Hansard in the room; we can go back and read the record.

If some parties want to place “Parades” at point 9 and “Peaceful summer” at point 10, treating them as separate categories, Sinn Féin is more than happy to do that. The summer is rolling on, but Sinn Féin wants to work towards an even better summer next year. If we can deal with the matter, we should do so.

Mr McNarry: To conclude on the “Peaceful summer” category, it would be remiss of anyone not to recognise the summer that we have had so far and the work, from many quarters, that went into that — particularly in certain parts of Belfast, where people worked very hard to achieve objectives. Perhaps under a separate “Peaceful summer” category, recognition can be duly given. People in those areas would appreciate it.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mrs Dodds, would two separate headings at points 9 and 10 address your concerns?

Mrs D Dodds: There certainly should be two separate headings. A peaceful summer is not simply identified with parades and unionist culture; if you lived on the Suffolk estate on Black’s Road, you would know that a peaceful summer is dependent on whether nationalists and republicans will stop stoning your house or coming to your estate with hurley bats at 5.30 am, as happened at the weekend.

I object to the two categories being lumped together because they are not completely linked. It would be remiss of me not to object; I would not be doing my duty for those constituents who voted for me if I said that the two categories should stay together. I will be very interested to see how the summer progresses, especially in west Belfast in August.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We seem to have consensus.

Dr Farren: Although, in one sense, the issue of a peaceful summer is of grave concern, it sits uneasily among the issues to be addressed in order to prepare for Government. Sectarianism, of whatever kind, is, of course, an issue. I could cite incidents in North Antrim that are not dissimilar to those to which Diane referred, but the shoe was on the other foot, if I can put it that way.

An entire nest of issues related to community relations and sectarianism underlie what I understand to be the concerns about a peaceful summer. Chairman, as you said, it may be a case of a peaceful winter, or, as John said, a better summer next year. However, none of that will happen unless we get community relations right. Therefore, I would rather discuss community relations issues, if they are what really underlie the notion of a peaceful summer.

Mr M McGuinness: We can become fixated with where different items are categorised in the course of this work; however, more important is what we do about the issues. There is no point in Mrs Dodds’s referring to an incident, which she says occurred recently, because that just invites people to come forward with other incidents that happened in different parts of the North. A young man, Paul McCauley, is critically ill at the moment as a result of a severe beating that he received on the Chapel Road in Derry some time ago. The attacks on Catholic churches and schools and on orange halls are disgraceful. All members of the Committee have a duty and a responsibility not to select one particular incident and proclaim it worse than all the rest.

Despite the type of society that we live in and the difficult circumstances that we have all faced, we have experienced a relatively peaceful summer. Many parties contributed to that. Many within the broad Unionist community, the UUP, MLAs, our own party, people such as Gerry Kelly and others worked hard to ensure that we came through many difficult situations in a way that the vast majority of our people find satisfactory.

However, let us not fool ourselves that that resolves the difficulties: violence is still taking place against orange halls, schools and Catholic churches. It is despicable and it must stop. This Committee must give a lead; so I am not that concerned about how we categorise individual issues. I am more concerned about what we do about them.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Again, we are in danger of starting a debate on sectarian attacks on halls or parading or whatever. The only issue that members are addressing here is whether they perceive an issue to be of such importance to one party that it should have a separate heading. Remember, and I am sure Mr Molloy will agree with me on this, when it comes up for debate at the hearings, no Chairman will stop any member raising these valid points under whatever heading they feel fit, because these are important issues. Everyone accepts that.

Mrs D Dodds: I shall refrain from further comment, except to say that I cannot accept Sinn Féin's eulogy to some of the people whom they credit with producing a peaceful summer, when they were the very people who went out of their way in the past to create the problem. Picking up on Seán Farren's point, perhaps a "Peaceful summer" more readily sits under the title "Good relations".

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr McNarry, are you happy with that suggestion?

Mr McNarry: Yes.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We are getting somewhere.

Ms Ritchie: Mrs Dodds's suggestion has resolved the problem. However, we should be looking at the causes of where we are today; what members have been suggesting in the past few minutes are perhaps symptoms. We have to look at the causes before applying solutions. "Good relations" covers many facets, including respect for difference, which we should be trying to address.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): You have squared the circle. We have two separate new items under "Rights"; one is "Parades" and the other is "Good relations". Is everyone happy?

Lord Morrow: Have you left "Law and order issues"?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): No. As we move issues into other categories, we go back to the original category to see whether anything in it needs to be changed or deleted. We have consensus on that. Now we are back to "Law and order". We have "Criminality", "Decommissioning", "Devolution of Policing and Justice", etc. "Parades" has gone; "Paramilitarism" stays, as do "Policing" and "Rule of Law." Are there any issues to be added?

Lord Morrow: We would like to add "Community Restorative Justice" as number 9.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That would be new number 7. Does anyone have any problems with that suggestion?

Members indicated assent.

Right, that is 7. Is anyone looking at 8?

Mr M McGuinness: Yes, MI5.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): MI5?

Mr McNarry: Are you going to be a witness on that, Martin?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Does anyone have any views on that as an issue?

Dr Farren: Is that not included under policing issues?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes, I would say —

Mr M McGuinness: Well, is Community Restorative Justice (CRJ) not included under policing?

Dr Farren: I did not object. I am only asking a question. If that is the response, OK, but —

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There is absolutely no doubt that a Chairman would allow that issue to be discussed.

Dr Farren: I have absolutely no objection to discussing that issue separately, but I just asked. There seems to be no answer to the question in the terms that I asked it.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do we have consensus on MI5 going in as number 9?

Ms Ritchie: To cover MI5, would it not be better to have "policing and intelligence services", or a separate title under intelligence services? That would cover any other matter under that umbrella.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That would cover a wider area. "Intelligence services" sits a bit more neatly. Are there any problems with that? Do we have consensus? It is instead of MI5 — "Intelligence services".

Mrs D Dodds: Just to clarify: you are putting policing and intelligence services together? They are not necessarily the same thing.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): No, they are separate. Is there consensus on that?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Right, OK. We shall move on to rights and safeguards etc. We have added the parades issue and good community relations. Are there any issues? We may have to use this as a catch-all for anything that has been missed.

Dr Farren: The Good Friday Agreement refers to the two dominant cultures here. If we are going to discuss one, we must discuss the other. However, in the light of the significant migration of other ethnic communities that has occurred in Northern Ireland since the Good Friday Agreement in particular, we should widen the cultural debate.

I have no objection to discussing what is referred to here as "Unionist culture", but we should include recognition and expression of all the different cultural traditions that are here. How we label that without getting long-winded can be left to the wordsmiths in the secretariat, but there is a cluster of issues that can be taken together, because it relates back to issues on good relations and sectarianism.

Martin mentioned the need to address the issue of racism. There is a negative and a positive side to that matter. If we are going to debate issues of culture, we must do so comprehensively and not just focus on one. In case someone on the other side of the table thinks I am trying to smother it, I am not saying that we should not give explicit recognition to unionist culture.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I am looking for a snappy title for all of that, Seán.

Dr Farren: That is why I said I would leave it to the wordsmiths.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): One suggestion is “Cultural issues”, but I am sure there are —

Mr McFarland: The essence of what Seán is saying is that this is about ethnic communities. We have covered most of the other traditions and cultures. Seán used the words. Is “Ethnic communities” too broad a term?

Ms Ritchie: “Ethnic communities and culture”?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We have to get round Seán’s difficulty that there is reference to unionist culture but none to nationalist culture.

Mr Ford: If the Clerks are suggesting “Cultural issues”, that seems to cover everything that Seán raised. We can all refer back to Hansard to all the things he raised. [Laughter.]

The Chairman (Mr Wells): “Cultural issues”? Is that agreeable? It is instead of unionist culture or in addition to unionist culture.

Mr M McGuinness: “Multicultural issues”.

Mr McNarry: Could we perhaps take stock? There is a specific reason why the unionist culture is there. It is something that we spent time discussing, and there was agreement that it would be there. Without offending anyone else — and I understand what Seán was saying — could we have “Other cultures”?

Dr Farren: No. If you name one, you need to name them all.

Mr McNarry: But you are only raising this now. You did not raise it at the time, and there was no discussion of it. This is an extraction, a compilation, of headings of issues raised by parties during presentations.

Dr Farren: But we are not excluded from introducing additional issues.

Mr McNarry: I am not saying that they should be excluded, but —

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Dr Farren is wise, because that issue could arise. It could be argued that it was not implicit that we would discuss ethnic issues or nationalist culture. One suggestion was to have a broad heading of “Unionist culture, nationalist culture and ethnic communities”. That would give the two Chairmen clear direction that those issues would have to be discussed. Even though nationalist culture was not raised in the scoping exercise, it will be discussed. The Ulster Unionist Party and the DUP raised the issue of unionist culture, but there was no reference to nationalist culture.

The view of this Committee has always been that if a party considers an issue to be important, we allow them to include it for discussion. Would the subheadings of unionist culture, nationalist culture and ethnic communities be helpful?

Mr M McGuinness: That will cover everything.

Mr McFarland: Would those headings be on one line?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Those issues can be listed separately or on one line under the heading of “Unionist/nationalist culture and ethnic communities”. Do members want them on one line or as three separate headings?

Mr M McGuinness: Let us be united for once.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are members agreed to list those issues on one line?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That leaves us with 10 points for discussion, which is a manageable amount. Are there any other issues?

Lord Morrow: The DUP moved the issue of parades from the heading of “Law and order issues” to “Rights; safeguards; equality issues; victims”. We also consider victims and truth and reconciliation to be separate issues. I am interested to hear what Mr Ford has to say about that.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That puts us up to 11 points. Are members happy to split those two issues? The subject of victims is a big issue in its own right.

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do members feel exercised about any other items that have been left out?

Dr Farren: We are free to add to the list at any time.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): No reasonable issue will be excluded from these categories simply because it is not listed. If we listed everything, we would have pages and pages of headings.

Lord Morrow: The heading of “Other” can safely accommodate issues not yet included. It is hard to envisage a subject that has not yet been mentioned, but it has been known to happen.

Mr McFarland: If it were open to members to introduce additional issues into each of those categories, we would not need “Other” as a separate category.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I will ask Mr Molloy's opinion. I have expressed my views on how I see this going forward, but he may wish to agree or disagree. It is important that we agree, as we both chair the Committee.

Mr Molloy: I have no problems. The main thing is that all the issues are listed; the overarching heading of "Other" is useful for subjects that may arise during discussions.

Mr M McGuinness: Under the heading of "Other issues", it is only sensible to ask what the issues are that have been raised with the Government and require delivery before the return of devolution. The rest of the packages dealing with financial business, institutional issues, law and order issues, and rights and safeguards all have explicit headings. I presume that whoever wrote the "Other" heading knows what those other issues are. They should share them with the rest of us.

11.30 am

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Am I right in thinking, Lord Morrow, that that is in case another issue emerges? Perhaps an issue will develop in the media which has not been included in any of these headings, and despite the assurances that I have given that I would allow it, you want a catch-all category just in case.

Lord Morrow: That is exactly it. If someone has an afterthought, he or she would not feel that the subject is blocked out, and it can be accommodated here. There is nothing more sinister about it than that.

Dr Farren: I take it, Chairman, that the term "raised" does not refer to matters that have already been raised, but matters that may be raised? If it concerns matters which have been raised and of which we were unaware, we should be made aware of them. However, if they were matters that may be raised and which we have not anticipated, then they should appear on our agenda. Is that how I should understand "raised"?

Mr M McGuinness: That is specifically what I am referring to. We need an explanation of what these terms actually mean. If "raised" means "may be raised", then we should specify that. If these issues have already been raised then the Preparation for Government Committee is entitled to know what they are.

Mr McFarland: Peter Robinson said in the media recently that the DUP had additional issues that it was raising with the Government in relation to the reduction in Departments and the number of seats for MLAs. Presumably those issues would be discussed under item 7 of institutional issues.

Lord Morrow: Yes, that is probably right. I suspect that some of those issues might have been raised already under the comprehensive agreement.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): If members fear that issues will be ruled out of order by the two Chairmen because members were not given advance notice about them although they are relevant, I can reassure them that I think that will not happen.

Mr McNarry, I will need to read the DUP's submission on this.

Mr McNarry: I want to come back to what I said earlier about the Secretary of State's role in this. As that category is included, it is incumbent on the Secretary of State that he does not go on "Lone Ranger" jobs during the course of our deliberations, and that the Committee might be given some advance notice — even if it is through the Deputy Speakers. There should be no surprises.

A statement from somebody that is contrary to something that may have been discussed the day before could destroy any of these meetings. I am anxious about that.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The DUP's original submission states:

"In addition to these matters" —

meaning the DUP's list —

"there are also a significant number of issues which we have raised with the Government which also require delivery before the return of devolution. We intend to raise the matters again with the Government in the future."

I assume that the DUP wants to raise those issues at various points. I presume that this is a reference to confidence-building measures.

Mr McFarland: Logically, they should have been part of the DUP's original submission. If there are secret issues that are subject to deals with the Government and have not appeared here — and presumably there are not — it would be useful for the Committee to be made aware of them. However, there may be side games going on. We might ask ourselves why we are bothering if issues are being identified and raised separately with the Government.

Mr M McGuinness: The extract that the Chairman read out from the DUP's submission was enlightening and helpful. It brings us to the heart of the problem. The DUP's contribution clearly refers to these issues being raised with the Government in the context that there will be no devolution if they are not resolved. The Committee is entitled to know what those issues are.

If, as Maurice has said, there is a more benign interpretation of what that means, the sentence should be changed to refer to dealing with other issues that may be of concern or interest to the parties. It is important that the DUP offer some clarification on the "issues". The import of the last sentence of what you read from the DUP's submission is that the issues are preconditions for the return of devolution. If so, this Committee is entitled to know that they are.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Lord Morrow, have you any comments on that?

Lord Morrow: Some around this table will try to see something sinister in everything that we say. They will try to twist and turn it to mean something different. Seán Farren is close to the mark in his interpretation. The “Other” category is for issues that may have been missed, or which suddenly become relevant but have not been listed. It is there so that no member from any political grouping feels obstructed in raising a particular issue, simply because it does not appear on the list.

New issues may arise. As David has said, we run the danger of having the “Lone Ranger” in the Northern Ireland Office issuing a statement every now and again. The Secretary of State told us yesterday that the Provos are now cleaner than clean. I suppose that the next statement will be that they are reforming into a Boy Scout organisation.

We will go through that whole process between now and 24 November. Things are undoubtedly being done deliberately to unsettle this Committee and to hinder the restoration of devolution. Therefore, as issues arise it may be that a member feels he wants to raise them here. That is purely what the “Other” section is for.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are members content with that assurance?

Dr Farren: Maurice referred to what I said. I asked for clarification on how to understand the sentence. I said that if “issues” are to be understood as issues that have been raised, we should know about them. If the submission refers to issues that may be raised in the future, no one will know what those are until they have been raised, at which point they can be logged with this Committee.

If the issues have already been raised and are additional to what we have heard about from the DUP, we should be told what they are. It is as simple as that. Is Maurice now saying that the interpretation should be that the submission refers to issues that may be raised but that we have not yet anticipated? If that interpretation is correct, I am happy to leave the list as it has been agreed. However, if the other interpretation is correct, we are entitled to know what those issues are.

Mr M McGuinness: I agree with Seán Farren. It is essential that we know whether the DUP is speaking about issues it has raised with the Government and that require delivery, or, as Maurice has indicated in the course of this, that the submission refers to future issues.

Mr McNarry: Is it not fair to say that it is essential that we all know what each party is doing? Martin may be talking to the Taoiseach. Sinn Féin could be doing some sort of deal down there. Goodness knows, it has done it before. [Laughter.]

We should not become involved in a conspiracy theory. Lord Morrow has been clear, and we are prepared to accept what he has said about future issues. You have introduced the other Deputy Speaker so that you are clear on how to interpret “issues”.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is why I did that.

Mr McNarry: I think that was worthwhile, and I suggest that we move on now.

Mr M McGuinness: I propose that the heading reflect Maurice Morrow’s contribution, on which there appeared to be agreement.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I have a suggestion. Lord Morrow’s comments are now on the record, and we understand their import. The Committee Clerks are suggesting a heading: “Other issues that may be of concern or interest to the parties”. Mr Molloy and I have listened to the discussion, and we understand those issues. If an issue emerges like a rabbit from a hat, we will know whether it meets Lord Morrow’s assurance.

Mr M McGuinness: I am content with the Committee Clerks’ suggestion.

Lord Morrow: Do other parties have to give the same assurance?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): If a party raised an issue that we had been notified about and that had not emerged out of the blue, we would have to apply the same criteria.

Lord Morrow: I suspect that, from time to time over the next couple of months, all the political groupings around this table will air their concerns at meetings with the British or Southern Governments. Perhaps the parties will have meetings with other people or organisations. Nobody could deny the parties those meetings. Parties are good at putting their concerns into the public domain.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We have a suggestion for a heading: “Other issues that may be of concern or interest to the parties”. We understand the context of that suggested heading. Do we have consensus?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Molloy, do you agree with what has been established? We need to understand how we are to proceed.

Mr Molloy: Some of the issues may have been raised with the Secretary of State, or someone in the Northern Ireland Office may raise other issues. It might be worthwhile for the Committee to write to the Secretary of State asking that his views come through to this Committee. He may not do that, but at least he would have the opportunity to do so.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is Mr McNarry's point. We should let the Secretary of State know exactly what we are doing, although I suspect that he will know five minutes after this meeting is over. We ask him not to take on any initiatives that may pre-empt or torpedo our work, at least not without consulting us.

Mr McNarry: We do not want any surprises.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We want no surprises from the media.

Dr Farren: Does that mean that the DUP no longer stands over the penultimate sentence of its initial submission to the Committee? It reads:

"In addition to these matters there are also a significant number of issues which we have raised with the Government which also require delivery before the return of devolution."

The unidentified issues referred to in that sentence are the bone of contention.

Mr McNarry: We have dealt with that issue. This is the second time that Dr Farren has come back on an issue after consensus had been reached.

Dr Farren: Correct me if I am wrong, but has consensus not been reached on issues that may be raised in future?

Mr McNarry: Consensus has been reached about the wording of this heading. A proposal was made, and it was accepted.

Lord Morrow: Mr Deputy Speaker, I want to reinforce what David has said. Did you not invite the second Deputy Speaker, Mr Molloy, for his clear understanding, which was to draw a line under the entire issue?

Dr Farren: With all due respect, Mr Chairman, I must ask for clarification. If the Chairman says that I am incorrect, I will stand corrected. I accept that we now understand the meaning of the sentence concerning matters that may be raised in the future. I am not referring to that sentence but to the penultimate sentence of the DUP's initial submission. It reads:

"In addition to these matters there are also a significant number of issues which we have raised with the Government which also require delivery before the return of devolution".

Will all those matters be included under the various headings outlining the Committee's future business? Is that what is being said?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I think that I raised that point and that the DUP said that it came under confidence-building measures in point 2. Those have been well highlighted publicly. However, perhaps I picked up Lord Morrow wrong on that.

Lord Morrow: No.

Dr Farren: I apologise for wasting the Committee's time if I did not pick up on that point. However, I thought that it was very important that I had the meaning clarified. Like other members, I do not want the SDLP to find itself in the situation in which matters that have already been addressed by the two Governments and that are pertinent to the restoration of the institutions are not being addressed here.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I can see the logic of what you are saying — we need to get the point clarified.

Mrs D Dodds: There are no issues that have not been discussed over and over again. This is an irrelevant discussion.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is the real issue, Dr Farren; you do not want to see the rabbit out of the hat.

Dr Farren: I am sorry if I have misunderstood.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is a valid point to want to have clarified.

We seem to have reached agreement on the main headings of what we will discuss. However, we have not agreed how we will discuss those matters. Before I ask Mr Molloy to return to his normal position, I will check whether members have any other problems with the headings. In fact, I will ask Mr Molloy to stay because we will have to move on to the nitty-gritty of how to proceed. Do members have any final points about the headings? I am sure that this section of Hansard will be well quoted in future, especially if anything is brought up that members feel is unacceptable.

Mrs D Dodds: Will we return to points 2 and 3 under the "Government" heading?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes; it is a separate item.

Are we agreed on the content?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I thank members for their help on that.

We now have to agree the modus operandi of how we proceed: how often we will meet; whether we will call witnesses; and whether we will ask parties to submit papers in advance of the meetings. We have a heavy schedule ahead of us, and we should expect to meet at least twice a week as a full Committee over the next few weeks. I am sure that you are all very pleased to hear that — I can see why Mr Kennedy went on holiday.

Can we perhaps get the practical points out of the way? Should we meet twice a week or more? When should we meet?

Mr McFarland: The Committee now has three issues with which to deal. We agreed that we would bring in our experts on these issues — we have people who deal with human rights, victims, and so forth, who would obviously want to attend meetings on those matters. The logic is that we would have at least three meetings a week, with one on each topic. Ideally, we would want two meetings a week on each topic. That would mean that we would have six meetings of this Committee a week, plus the twice-weekly meetings of the subgroup on the economy. That adds up to at least eight meetings that Mr Wells and Mr Molloy will chair. A while ago it was suggested that we have more chairmen in order to facilitate such meetings. That idea was rejected at the time, but I wonder whether it is worth revisiting. Otherwise, Chairman, you will be fairly ragged if you have eight meetings a week — there are only five days in a week.

Dr Farren: There are seven days in a week.

Mr McFarland: There are five working days. Members will have spotted immediately that that does not compute with two Chairmen.

Dr Farren: Why not?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Today is my twenty-third wedding anniversary, and I have lost brownie points for being here instead of at home.

Mr McFarland: The question is whether, with the experts involved, we will run the meetings in parallel. On some days, this Committee may meet several times and in different formats. If it remains in the one format, there will be time constraints for the Chairmen, for example. We could follow the standard Assembly procedure of calling witnesses and hearing evidence, but members will know from previous experience that if one particular witness is called and not everybody else, we could get into the most awful trouble in the media for not taking things seriously. I am thinking of victims' groups, for example.

There are major issues to be discussed as to how we deal with this.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There was a proposal for additional Chairmen, but there was no consensus.

Mr McFarland: Might we revisit it now in the light of current developments?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I am advised that we can revisit it. The proposal that the Secretary of State suggested was that with our agreement by consensus we could have one SDLP, one Alliance and one Ulster Unionist Chairman, which would give us five — one per working day, basically.

I will put that proposal again. Is it acceptable to the Committee?

Dr Farren: Yes.

Mr McFarland: It would certainly ease the burden that the two current Chairmen will carry in trying to cover what is potentially eight Committees a week.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): If there were consensus on this we would advise the Secretary of State, and he would then ask the parties to nominate their representatives.

Lord Morrow: Deputy Speaker, you are going down the road of —

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I stress that that is if there were consensus.

Lord Morrow: But that is tantamount to going into subgroups and taking it away from the Committee.

Mr Ford: Even in the terms that Maurice has just outlined, presumably it would not be objectionable to him to have alternate Chairpersons taking the Chair of the economic matters subgroup, which would relieve the two of you of a share of the burden.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): You mean keeping the same two Chairmen for the PFG Committee?

Mr Ford: Yes. I do not accept Maurice's argument, but if that is his feeling, surely it still merits considering alternate Chairs for the subgroup.

Mr McFarland: This is a difficult issue in that if the PFG Committee adopts different guises, as in this case, the make-up of the Committee will be different for each subject it tackles. We will have different party experts in to explore institutional issues, policing, human rights and equality. Although they are not subgroups, the make-up of the Committee will change. Each of these "Committees" will try to get on with the issues involved, some of which are extremely difficult to identify. If we get into hearing witnesses, each of these groupings might work for three or four days a week. This is a major problem, particularly in terms of chairmanship.

Also, when we had subgroups, the Secretary of State had decreed that each should be made up of one member of the Committee and one expert. Presumably that is no longer the case, because there is no rule in the PFG Committee to stop substitution. The three SDLP members currently in attendance need not stay; Dr Farren, who is almost always here, could technically leave and have two substitutes sitting here as members.

Although one member from this Committee from each party must sit on a subgroup, because the subgroups on changes to the institutions and on policing and justice do not exist, the make-up of the delegations that attend the Committee on the Preparation for Government can be different for each of the issues to be discussed. Is not that correct? It is up to the parties to choose their representatives.

Therefore, it is possible that different pairs from each party will be looking at each of the three areas for discussion. Sittings will not constitute meetings of subgroups but rather meetings of this Committee.

However, if three different pairs can represent each party at those meetings, and the Committee is under time constraints, the issue arises about how meetings can be chaired by two people only.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It would be helpful if the role of Chairman of the Subgroup on the Economic Challenges facing Northern Ireland could be rotated. That is a separate group that deals with economic rather than political issues. A compromise would be to spread that load and continue with two Chairmen for the PFG Committee.

Mr McNarry: What is the Speaker's position? What is she doing?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Speaker will have absolutely nothing to do with this. She has made it very clear that she will not be participating. It was only on the Secretary of State's directive that the Deputy Speakers are here.

Do we have consensus on rotating the chairmanship of the Subgroup on the Economic Challenges facing Northern Ireland?

Mr M McGuinness: What would that mean? Would the chairmanship rotate between the five parties on the subgroup or the three parties that do not chair this Committee?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It would rotate among the five parties. It is to be hoped that to do so would make it less onerous for Mr Molloy and me, who will be locked up here for most of the week chairing this Committee. The problem is that Mr Molloy and I are present at almost all meetings. Although we may miss the occasional meeting, we have effectively signed up for all of them. It is very difficult to take the Chair the following day unless we are present to watch developments.

Mrs D Dodds: You definitely make the point about your needing to chair this Committee by emphasising the need for continuity in the Chair.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I said that continuity in the Chair is not as important for the Subgroup on the Economic Challenges facing Northern Ireland.

Lord Morrow: You still make the point.

Mrs D Dodds: We see the difficulty, but you make the point very well for the two Deputy Speakers to chair this Committee continuously.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): What is your view on sharing the chairmanship of the Subgroup on the Economic Challenges facing Northern Ireland among the five parties?

Mrs D Dodds: That could be shared between the five parties.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It looks as though we have agreement to nominate three other Chairmen to rotate as part of the five for the Subgroup on the Economic Challenges facing Northern Ireland.

Mr McFarland: Will you be one of the five, Mr Chairman?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes. Mr Molloy and I will be among the five.

Mr McFarland: Therefore, we have four groups. Each group can meet once a week, and one can meet for a second time each week, unless we are to meet in both the morning and the afternoon.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes. There could be a Committee meeting in the morning and a separate Committee meeting in the afternoon.

Dr Farren: It was generally understood that, given the volume of work that seems to be before us, it is unlikely that we will produce final reports by the end of August. Let us not overload people, particularly the secretariat, which will have work to do before and after each meeting. I suggest that the Subgroup on the Economic Challenges facing Northern Ireland meet as it can determine and that this Committee, meeting three days a week, deal with the other three issues.

Let us leave it to the parties to nominate whom they wish. That is not a matter for us. If they wish to send the same people or different people to all three meetings, that is their business.

If this Committee were to meet three days a week and the Subgroup on the Economic Challenges facing Northern Ireland were to meet twice a week, that would mean a meeting on each day of the working week.

We might need advice on whether we could be serviced if we met quite so extensively and frequently.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Clerks had developed a system for covering three subgroups.

Dr Farren: Are they saying that they could —

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Hansard reports would be slow, because a large burden would be placed on the staff. However, the meetings would have been recorded.

Dr Farren: I can certainly live with that.

12.00 noon

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Have we reached consensus on the appointment of three additional Chairmen for the economic subgroup?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Debbie Pritchard will inform the Secretary of State of that, and he will ask the parties to make nominations. That will help to relieve the load on Mr Molloy and me.

Dr Farren has made a scaled-down proposal, to the effect that rather than meet twice a week — as Mr McFarland suggested — we meet every day, with the economic subgroup meeting twice a week. In other words, on Monday, we would deal with institutional issues; on Tuesday, we would deal with law and order; and on Wednesday, we would deal with rights and safeguards, etc.

Dr Farren: Or whatever.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes; that is not hard and fast. Perhaps we could meet on Monday, Wednesday and Friday, with the economic subgroup meeting on Tuesday and Thursday.

Mr M McGuinness: From a practical point of view, given that parties will send different people to the various meetings, and given that you and the other Deputy Speaker will chair most of those meetings, are you both available to do that throughout August?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I am. Mr Molloy?

Mr Molloy: Yes.

Mr M McGuinness: You are gluttons for punishment.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We shall meet on Monday, Wednesday and Friday. The economic subgroup will meet on Tuesday and Thursday. I presume that those meetings will begin at 10.00 am. The staff will rejig their rotas accordingly.

How shall we deal with the running order? Shall we start with institutional affairs or with law and order?

Dr Farren: Start with the institutions.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The first week will be institutions, law and order, and then rights, safeguards, etc.

Mr McFarland: Law and order on Wednesday, and rights on Friday. Is that correct?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes. We have got that out of the way.

Mr Ford: I wish to follow on from a point that Alan made about parties sending their experts to meetings. Some time ago, we discussed the question of parties' entitlement to bring research staff, or whomever, as back-up to their negotiators — I am sorry; I should not use that word in front of the DUP.

Given that we are seeking to go into some detail, I wonder whether other parties have a view at this stage on allowing party staff to attend as note-takers, note-providers, or whatever.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is entirely up to the parties. We took that decision before we decided to bring in Hansard. Everything is a matter of public record, so there is nothing to be gained by secrecy.

Mr Ford: Not only has that changed, but so has the intensity of the work that we are planning.

Mr McFarland: Another issue is that parties have various people who are away. It would be useful to have some form of continuity. Perhaps someone could sit at the back of the room to ensure that members do not drop bombs — metaphorically speaking — on different weeks.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): If parties have whizz-kids who are experts in particular issues, they could sit at the back of the room. We may need to move to a bigger room. That raises the difficult issue of whether we allow the press to sit in on meetings.

Mr McFarland: One of our successes is that, although we have Hansard reports, we are building relationships through people's ability to speak to one another. If a press chap is here, the moment a member says something outrageous, he will be out the door, and when we leave the Committee, it will be on the one o'clock news.

The workings of the Committee will be easier if the reports are in Hansard, and we can do our stuff later. However, if we effectively do it live, we will all be bouncing in and out of meetings to make comments to the press or to appear on 'Talkback', or whatever. That stands to wreck our work, which is building quite sensibly among the parties. We are getting some proper work done.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There is much merit in what you say, Mr McFarland.

The Committee Clerk has suggested that we decide whether we discuss institutional affairs on a Monday, and revisit it on consecutive Mondays, or whether we discuss institutional affairs three days in a row next week. Institutional affairs will be the time-consuming issue. What sort of continuity will we have if we discuss institutional affairs on a Monday, have another bite at it a week later and a further bite the week after that?

Mr McFarland: Chairman, you are involved in only two of every five meetings. The Subgroup on Economic Challenges facing Northern Ireland is to meet twice a week. Technically, there is nothing to stop this Committee discussing institutional affairs on a Monday. If somebody other than you or Mr Molloy were to chair the Tuesday meeting of the economic challenges subgroup, you would both be free on Tuesdays and Thursdays to chair another meeting of this Committee.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Remember that the only difficulty is that a substantial proportion of the membership of this Committee will also sit on the economic challenges subgroup.

Mr McFarland: No; they are different. I said that different people are involved in this.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): At least one member from each party must sit —

Mr McFarland: No. That was the case for the two proposed subgroups, which no longer exist.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The economic challenges subgroup was established under the regulations for subgroups.

Mr McFarland: Yes, and Mr McNarry represents our party on that subgroup. He is the only person who is out of the loop. [Laughter.]

My point is that, in discussions on institutional issues, law and order issues and safeguards issues, our party can be represented by two Members other than Mr Kennedy, Mr McNarry or me. There are no rules in this Committee about that, because substitute members can sit on the PFG Committee.

Dr Farren: We will need to have a big recruitment drive.

Mr McFarland: Had the subgroups been formed, either Mr Kennedy or I would have had to sit on it.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): On that basis, 99 of the MLAs will have eventually sat in this room.

Mr McFarland: Absolutely. There are no rules for this Committee, other than that substitute members can sit on it.

Mrs D Dodds: Would it not be wise to leave the make-up of the delegations to the parties?

Mr McFarland: Yes, but the make-up of party delegations is directly related to how many times a week we can meet.

Dr Farren: Parties must answer to themselves.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is there anything, for example, to stop this Committee meeting on Tuesday to discuss institutional affairs?

Dr Farren: No.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The economic challenges subgroup would meet in the morning and this Committee could discuss institutional affairs on Tuesday afternoons, if needs be. Are you suggesting that as a practical way forward, Mr McFarland?

Mr McFarland: A programme needs to be set out. If you chair a meeting on a Monday, Mr Molloy is present. Similarly, if Mr Molloy chairs a meeting on a Wednesday, you are present. If both Chairmen attend a Committee meeting, they cannot chair another meeting. Although it is useful to have the other Chairman present, it is neither effective nor efficient. If you were a time and motion man, you would be sacked for suggesting that.

The question is whether both Chairmen can afford to continue attending the same meetings. I argue that they cannot. It is very useful and helpful, but you will not be able to sustain that if there are other meetings because, logically, if you chair a meeting on a Monday and Mr Molloy chairs a meeting on a Wednesday, you cannot chair the economic challenges subgroup. Do you see what I mean?

Mr M McGuinness: As we have agreed the number of groups and so forth, I am not that sure that we should begin to work out the detail of how the issues will be taken forward. A more sensible way to proceed is for the two Deputy Speakers to meet a representative from each party to devise a programme for the coming weeks. If we continue as we have, we will be here until midnight.

Mrs D Dodds: There is no reason why we cannot agree to Seán Farren's suggestion that this Committee meet on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays and the economic challenges subgroup meet on Tuesdays and Thursdays. This Committee can sit into the afternoon, if it so desires.

Lord Morrow: Or into the night.

Mrs D Dodds: That would resolve the issue.

Mr Molloy: If it is decided on a Monday that the Preparation for Government Committee must meet on Tuesday, members who do not sit on the economic subgroup could attend the Committee. If membership of the economic subgroup were kept separate from that of this Committee, the Committee could meet on any day of the week.

Mr M McGuinness: The problem is that we are thinking on our feet about this matter. Members must reflect on today's discussion and send a representative to meet the Chairmen to work out a programme of meetings. The arrangements for how and when the Committee and the economic subgroup will meet are likely to be made through an ongoing process of amendment and change.

Mr McNarry: Members of the economic subgroup were issued with a schedule. Therefore, they know what commitments they have until 18 August. A similar schedule would be helpful for the business of the Committee. Members have other commitments at their constituency offices and other people to meet. Committee staff should be able to organise a schedule for future meetings.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Committee is staffed by two experienced Clerks, who have formulated schedules for other Committees. We need to decide whether we wish to spend three days in a row discussing one topic, such as institutions, followed by, if required, three days in a row on law and order, or do we want to take forward business on a Monday-Wednesday-Friday basis? For example, each week, the Committee could concentrate on institutions on a Monday, law and order on a Wednesday, etc.

What is the best way to deal with those issues? That is the only guidance that the Clerks need. Beyond that, we should let them use their expertise. What do members think? Should the Committee discuss institutions every Monday, or should it take one subject and discuss it on Monday, Wednesday and Friday?

Dr Farren: I can see the attraction of trying to achieve much on one of the issues in one week. However, we need to engage others. Next week, we should start with institutions on Monday, use Wednesday for law and order, and discuss rights and safeguards on Friday. One subject — for example, institutions — may gather a head of steam and need more and more time devoted to it. If we address the issues in parallel, the other subjects are less likely to get pushed down the agenda.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are members agreed that we must build in flexibility to ensure that if one issue needs further discussion, that can take place?

Dr Farren: Yes.

Mr M McGuinness: Absolutely.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is a good compromise.

Dr Farren: That would be wise.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Members must decide whether to ask the parties to submit papers. May I assume that we will call witnesses?

Mr McFarland: Time is against our inviting witnesses, unless they could substantially enlighten the Committee. Members have been discussing many of these issues for four or five years, or longer. In some areas, we may need expert witnesses, but we have no time. If we are to have one meeting a week on each of the issues, and we have to report in three weeks' time —

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Can we leave it that, in principle, if we decide that we need to call witnesses, we will do so? That does not mean that we must call witnesses, but that the mechanism is there should witnesses be required.

Mr McFarland: We should err on the side of caution with witnesses because of the time factor and the trouble that we could get into by not inviting all the interested parties who may wish to give evidence.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That brings us to an important issue. To assist the Committee, do parties wish to produce papers for each meeting? If so, papers for Monday meetings will need to be with Committee staff by the previous Friday.

Mr McFarland: There is an awful shortage of time and many different topics to cover. Parties will be pushed enough to get this done with the personnel that they have. Hansard is recording the meetings, and, obviously, parties will be organised within their own systems.

If we are to produce papers for each of the topics, the key people will have to spend all their time engaged in that when they should be at one of the subgroups. Parties may need to submit a paper on a particularly complex issue, but if we have to produce a paper on each topic, we will run out of time, effort and hours available.

Dr Farren: The institutional issues are essentially inter-party ones, and we should not have to call expert witnesses on them. The parties had already prepared papers, some long and some short, in the run-up to the Leeds Castle discussions and what flowed from them and during the review that was undertaken a few years ago. There is unlikely to have been a great deal of change since. We have already initiated the procedure to produce a briefing paper on the issues, and if anything is missing, we will take it from the list that the Committee Clerks have prepared and from what we have prepared ourselves. We can have a paper ready for circulation on Friday. It is helpful if parties can produce brief papers on the issues. Otherwise, no one is very clear about people's approaches until they start to talk.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The problem is that we need to have some structure for Monday's meeting. At the moment, all we have is 10 or 11 points. It would help if the parties could at least provide sub-headings to each point.

May I apologise to the Committee: I simply have to attend an incapacity tribunal in Newry, so Mr Molloy will be taking over from me in five minutes' time.

Do the parties agree that they will be able to produce something for the Clerks on the institutional issues, no matter how brief, by lunchtime on Friday? Then at least we will have some structure to the discussions that Mr Molloy will be chairing. I do not have to worry too much about it. Is everyone happy with that?

Members indicated assent.

(The Chairman (Mr Molloy) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Could we have papers on the law and order issues by lunchtime on Monday and papers on rights and safeguards by lunchtime on Wednesday? It is also helpful for Hansard if the parties, and any witnesses that they may call, provide papers in advance.

The next item of business is the future work programme. Members will have the work plan that was issued by the Secretary of State after the meeting held by the Prime Minister and the Taoiseach. There is also the suggested work plan for the Programme for Government, which is to be dealt with today.

Can we take the work plan issued by the Secretary of State?

Mrs D Dodds: Mr Deputy Speaker, are there spare copies of the work plan?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Yes.

Can we close the windows? There is a terrible smell of diesel.

The Committee needs to decide whether to accept the work programme and how our work will fit into it. Do members have any views?

Mr McFarland: Originally, it was discussed whether the Committee would report by 18 August. Can I get an update? Is there a date by which the Committee must have its work completed in order for the debates on the report to be held at the beginning of September?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We need to go the Business Committee by 25 August in order to meet the date of the proposed plenary meeting on the report.

Mr McFarland: Working back from that date, at what stage do we have to meet as a full Committee to agree the report?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The deadline for the economic challenges subgroup is 18 August. Because this Committee is not forming subgroups, it will have a wee bit of extra time to meet. The date that we are working to is 25 August, at which time we will go to the Business Committee, provided that the report is finalised by that date.

Mrs D Dodds: This Committee must also consider the report from the economic challenges subgroup.

Dr Farren: How fixed in stone are the dates of the plenary meetings? In order to gain a little more flexibility in the Committee's work programme, and that of the subgroup, would the Secretary of State concede a week's delay?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): My understanding is that, unless the Preparation for Government Committee proposes subjects for plenaries, the dates are not fixed at this stage. If the completion of the report were to be delayed by a few days, the Business Committee and the parties, rather than the Secretary of State, would be flexible in arranging plenary meetings.

Dr Farren: It would allow us a little flexibility, and we would not be shackled to dates to which we need not be shackled.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): There could be another way around it: if the economic challenges subgroup's report were ready, it may be debated in a plenary meeting before the debate on this Committee's report. The economic challenges subgroup has been asked to submit a report early so that this Committee can consider it. That will take slightly longer than the other way.

The Programme for Government is one of the tasks set by the Secretary of State for this Committee to conclude by October. A draft Programme for Government and a draft ministerial code will be finalised. That will obviously be completed after the September deadline.

Do members have any opinions on that? Parties obviously need to agree the order of work.

Mr O'Dowd: I am getting a headache from the diesel fumes. Can we adjourn to get some fresh air?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The fumes could be coming from a generator.

Mr McFarland: It seems that the fumes are being pumped into this room.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The order of work is the final issue to be dealt with. Shall we discuss it at a future date?

Mr O'Dowd: Perhaps we can discuss it in future.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We can note the issue today, and parties can return to the Committee with an opinion. We obviously cannot decide everything today. We will meet again next Monday at 10.00 am.

Adjourned at 12.24 pm.

COMMITTEE ON THE PREPARATION FOR GOVERNMENT

Monday 31 July 2006

Members in attendance for all or part of proceedings:

The Chairman, Mr Francie Molloy

Mr P J Bradley

Mr Gregory Campbell

Dr Seán Farren

Mrs Arlene Foster

Mr David Ford

Mr Alan McFarland

Mr David McNarry

Mr Conor Murphy

Mr John O'Dowd

Mr Peter Robinson

Mr Jim Wilson

Observing: Mr Jim Wells

The Committee met at 10.03 am.

(The Chairman (Mr Molloy) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Welcome to this morning's meeting. The minutes of the meeting of 26 July are attached to the papers. Would members like to raise any issues about the minutes? Are the minutes agreed?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I will deal with apologies and changes of personnel.

Mr O'Dowd: I am here on behalf of Michelle Gildernew.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Is anyone else from your party coming?

Mr O'Dowd: No.

Dr Farren: P J Bradley will join me for Mark Durkan.

Mr Ford: Naomi Long is on her way.

Mr McFarland: Mr Wilson is standing in for Mr Kennedy.

Mr P Robinson: Gregory Campbell and I are standing in for somebody or other. Arlene Foster is the new Willie McCrea.

Mrs Foster: Thanks. Has that been minuted?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Hansard will have noted that.

As the meeting is being reported by Hansard, I remind members that they must switch off their mobile phones because they affect transmission, even if they are on silent mode.

Today we will discuss the institutional issues. Parties were given the option to provide papers. I propose that each party takes five minutes to go through its submission, and then we will start the discussion.

Mr Ford: According to the note that the Committee has been given, two parties do not intend to provide papers. How does that fit into the plan that everybody will talk to their papers?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): It will be a challenge.

Mr McFarland: It was proposed at the end of the previous meeting that parties would provide papers. The UUP representatives agreed to that, as we were effectively going out the door. I thought about it afterwards, and I am confused about the purpose of providing papers. At the beginning of this exercise parties submitted papers stating the issues, and they spent many hours questioning one another about what they meant. The DUP was questioned for five hours; Sinn Féin for six; and the UUP for four and a half. Unless there are new issues, which, as we discussed at the previous meeting, people are quite entitled to bring to the table, I am not clear about the purpose of providing new papers.

Issues with which we must deal were identified in the first round. The purpose of the Committee in this format is not to negotiate but to mine down into those and identify whether there are further matters that we have not yet spotted or that need clarification and expansion.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): My impression is that we are to narrow discussions to institutional issues and that members could put forward a paper — to structure the meeting more than anything else — or they could simply talk about the issues that they think affect the preparation for government.

Mr McFarland: The logic is that we have our list of issues already, and some will be important and extensive while others will be minor and fairly limited. For example, the Civic Forum is on the list. There are strong views about the Civic Forum, but it is not particularly complicated and could be dealt with relatively quickly. However, when the Committee comes to items such as the comprehensive agreement and the Belfast Agreement, discussions will be fairly extensive because different parties raised those matters. Matters that are issues for one party may not be for another. I thought that, having got this list, it would be logical for us to decide the order in which we want to deal with the items and then mine down and expand upon them.

Technically, parties could bring forward a whole raft of new issues that did not derive from the first round. If that happens, we will be redoing the scoping exercise.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I agree that there could be other issues; however, if parties feel that some matters are important and should be raised, the Committee should recognise that and deal with them. Issues may have been lost while the Committee was considering the bigger picture.

Can we agree that we open the discussion with five minutes for each party to present their paper or talk about the issues that they feel are relevant?

Members indicated assent.

OK, Mr Ford, over to you.

Mr Ford: I will touch on the issues that the Alliance Party raised in writing or verbally in June 2006. Key issues revolve largely around the Assembly and the Executive. Other issues that we have mentioned, such as the Civic Forum, North/South and east-west bodies, appear to be relatively straightforward in comparison.

The Alliance Party believes that the fundamental issue of ensuring that there is a fair and effective voting system in the Assembly has not been addressed. Such a system is possible only if voting is based on a weighted majority. The removal of designations remains a priority to getting a working voting system.

Although issues on the composition of Committees and the election of Chairpersons are not crucial, fundamental difficulties have been shown with the ineffective and unfair d'Hondt formula, which is currently being used to compose the Executive and which will be used to recompose the list of Committee Chairpersons on at least two separate runs.

The Alliance Party is not content with the current scrutiny of Executive functions, and we are particularly concerned that the Committee of the Centre does not cover all the functions of the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister (OFMDFM). That is, of course, subject to any future functions that OFMDFM may have. We want scrutiny of the North/South Ministerial Council (NSMC) to extend from Ministers merely reporting on meetings to their compiling an annual report on which detailed questioning of the Council's work could be based.

In certain circumstances, the Assembly should be able to use a weighted vote to reverse ministerial decisions. That proposal is somewhat different from that which states that ministerial decisions would stand only if they attracted a weighted majority.

Under the heading of "Executive", there seems to be broad agreement on the need for a statutory ministerial code. The Alliance Party supports that, but there is also a need to enhance the ministerial Pledge of Office.

There are major problems with the formation of the Executive and the Assembly's endorsement of it. Those problems were touched on in some respects by the so-called comprehensive agreement, but they have not been dealt with properly.

There is also a huge issue about the lack of and need for Executive collectivity. Discussions on the devolution of justice have highlighted that point, while other issues have illustrated that there are too many Departments. The structure of Government is ineffective, and that point ties in with the functions of OFMDFM.

There is scope for enhancing the role of the Civic Forum, which perhaps should have the statutory right to be consulted on proposed legislation. There is also scope for ensuring that civic society has a more effective input in the government process.

There is a need to re-examine the scope of the various aspects of North/South co-operation to ensure that opportunities to derive more practical benefits are taken. The comprehensive agreement's recommendation to form a parliamentary tier between the Assembly and the Oireachtas should be advanced. The Alliance Party proposed that in the Assembly some years ago, but it was never implemented.

Similarly, the effectiveness of the British-Irish Council (BIC) on east-west issues should be enhanced. An annual report would be beneficial, but I suspect that we would not get the leaders of all the Governments that are represented to debate that report.

Mr P Robinson: I sympathise with Alan McFarland's point about us being in danger of going over the same material. If the hope is to grind the discussion down further, we must talk about the issues that are listed under the heading of "Institutional issues" on a subject-by-subject basis. We are content to do that.

However, the DUP stands apart from all the other parties who supported the institutions in the Belfast Agreement, although I expect that even the parties that supported that agreement will have recognised, through experience, that it was not a perfect document and that there is scope for improvement. Therefore, between our proposals to change fairly significantly some of the structures of the Belfast Agreement and the view that there is some improvement, some work can be done.

Like the Alliance Party, the DUP is not content with a system that is mandatory and that ensures that all the major parties are in government for all time. A mandatory system in an emergency or other special circumstance could be justified — for instance, in wartimes, all Westminster parties came together in a war Cabinet. One could also reverse the analogy and justify having all the parties sticking together in situations in which a country comes out of war. However, the system must exist for a limited time, and the Belfast Agreement gave the impression that this one was for ever.

One way of doing that is to adopt the Alliance party's suggestion of looking at the voting system, because that leads inevitably towards coalitions that are voluntary, provided they can get the necessary support. I assume that the weighted majority would be struck in such a way as to ensure a level of cross-community support. The DUP is quite content to look at those ideas, and its policy document 'Devolution Now' already advocates a voluntary coalition, which can be brought about by weighted majorities.

10.15 am

As far as the general principles are concerned, the DUP divided its misgivings about the structures of the Assembly under the Belfast Agreement into four — whether they were accountable, stable, effective and efficient. They were demonstrably not accountable, either to the Assembly or the Executive. I enjoyed that free rein as much as some other Ministers, but it obviously meant that decisions could be taken within a Department; the Committee, the Assembly and the Executive could do nothing about it — the only person who could do anything about it was the nominating officer, if he or she determined to do so. That is not a satisfactory situation and, in the long term, could lead to all sorts of democratic perversions. For example, I could foresee one Education Minister leading policy in one direction, only for it to be moved in a completely different direction by another Minister appointed after the next running of d'Hondt — even though the Executive might remain constant. Therefore, there must be some collective responsibility, and the Government's proposals in the comprehensive agreement sought to bring about a greater degree of such responsibility. It is essential that we do that.

If accountability is important at an Assembly level, it becomes more important, at least theoretically, at a North/South level, where decisions should be in keeping with the view of the Executive and the Assembly, rather than the view of the Minister who happens to be present at the time. I understand that the previous Executive did discuss some issues that were intended for discussion at North/South meetings, although in working practice, as opposed to under any legal requirement. Accountability must be on a clear legal basis so that everybody has the comfort of knowing that the decisions taken will have been aired and, hopefully, agreed before such meetings take place.

I do not think that I need to argue the case too much in relation to stability. The repeated suspensions of the previous Assembly, and this Committee's existence, show that we do not have that stability, and a series of issues fall under that heading.

As regards efficiency, even the Secretary of State seems to be wising up to the need to streamline the institutions. The SDLP's paper mentions the Civic Forum. The existing Assembly rules allow for a most massive consultation mechanism whereby any member of the community can be consulted about any initiative. I am not quite sure if there is any benefit in adding to the structures and making the whole process more cumbersome and less efficient. As the Secretary of State has recognised, the issue of efficiency clearly falls around the number of Departments. That does not necessarily go to the heart of the issue of the number of Ministers, because there can be more than one Minister to a Department, as is often the case.

As far as Departments are concerned, there is duplication of work between the Office of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister and not just the Department for Social Development, but other Departments such as the Department of Finance and Personnel. It is hard to separate some of the roles given to Departments, and we had experience of that in particular with regard to planning, where area plans were separated from the regional plan. Similarly, road safety was separated from the Roads Service.

Through running the system even over the short period that we did, that kind of issue arose across a range of subjects. One would have drawn lines between departmental responsibilities differently. It was hard to justify the existence of the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure, which did not have sufficient work. Reducing the number of Departments would have made good sense and would have saved money, allowing funding to go to front-line services to the benefit of the whole community.

I move on to the issue of effectiveness. I suppose it is better openly discussed around the table that although Sinn Féin and the DUP were involved in discussions leading to the publication of the proposals for a comprehensive agreement by the two Governments, neither party signed them off. I suspect that there are elements that Sinn Féin would like to have had otherwise; there are certainly elements that the DUP would like to have had a different way. By and large the proposals sought to address some of the issues of accountability, stability, effectiveness and efficiency.

Criticisms by other parties were made, probably because they were not involved as much, or as much as they should have been, by the Government, rather than because of the content of the document. Most criticism centred on how the First Minister and Deputy First Minister were to be put into their posts; the impact that that might have subsequently on ministerial positions; and whether there was any requirement for the Assembly's approval. I saw less criticism of the processes used to ensure accountability. I must say I found them a bit cumbersome.

We have sympathy with the general principles of the institutional changes that were suggested in the comprehensive agreement, although in many cases we thought they could have been done better.

Issues relating to the North/South structures are seen as those in which nationalists are most interested. I have no difficulty in having a better relationship with the Irish Republic, particularly with respect to mutually advantageous co-operation. The line that the DUP draws is that we want the relationship to be practical, rather than politically motivated. We do not share an ideology where the purpose of institutions and structures is simply to suck Unionists into all-Ireland processes with an eventual political goal. For practical purposes we want to co-operate and be good neighbours. The best way of putting it is that we want to be their friends, not their family. The DUP is happy to go into detail on each of the issues, but I suspect I have run out of time in this brief run around the course.

Mr Murphy: As Alan McFarland has said, parties tabled papers at the start of this exercise. Part of our paper detailed the outstanding institutional issues. We were questioned for some six and a half hours on that aspect. Not all of that time was spent on institutional issues, but there was quite an airing of them. We are not convinced of the need to submit a further paper on these issues. They are well documented.

The institutional issues arise out of the formal review of the Good Friday Agreement, which was the mechanism used by the parties some years back. Those discussions paved the way for the Leeds Castle talks and, eventually, the two Governments' proposals for a comprehensive agreement, which were tabled in December 2004. Several issues were raised at that time in the expectation that the institutions would get back up and running in a short time frame. The DUP was to be involved in that, and, as we made clear when we talked about those issues at the start of this Committee's work, that context no longer exists.

The proposals for a comprehensive agreement no longer exist in their original context. Therefore, at the beginning of this year, when we were asked to submit suggestions to the two Governments relating to outstanding institutional matters, we presented several issues that needed to be addressed. I must stress that, in our consistently held view, none of those issues are an excuse for not setting up the institutions now. All of those matters can be dealt with in the context of functioning institutions. Although we are highlighting issues that we would like to see addressed, our clear view is that that can be done when the institutions are up and running. There is no need to use the matter of outstanding issues to delay the setting up of the institutions.

Nevertheless, in the context of this Committee's work, some of the issues that we highlighted to both Governments when we met them in February to discuss outstanding institutional matters concerned stability. We put forward our long-held view that the Northern Ireland Act 2000, which allowed for suspension, should be repealed because it was the primary cause of instability in the institutions.

On accountability, we asked for legislation to create a requirement for Ministers to attend Executive meetings, which was not the position in the last Executive, when the Democratic Unionist Party did not attend them. That legislation would also require Ministers to attend the North/South Ministerial Council and British-Irish Council meetings, when appropriate. We wanted legislation to create an automatic entitlement for all Ministers to attend North/South or British-Irish plenary meetings, and for Ministers with relevant responsibilities to attend the sectoral meetings of those bodies. Members will recall that the former First Minister interfered with that process and refused to allow my colleagues to attend the appropriate and relevant sectoral meetings of the North/South Ministerial Council.

We also suggested putting the Committee of the Centre on a statutory footing, which it did not have in the previous Assembly. There was a sense that the scrutiny that applied to the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister was not as strong, or did not have the same authority, as the other statutory Committees that scrutinised Departments.

We argued that the Ministerial code should have a statutory basis in order to improve accountability. Issues of that nature arose within the previous Executive, and there was a general sense during the formal review discussions, and in any discussions on institutional matters since, that accountability mechanisms needed to be tightened up. We shared some of those views.

Peter Robinson referred to the proposition on the election of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. In our view, the context for the proposition put forward by the two Governments in paragraph 9 of annex B of their comprehensive proposals no longer exists. We argue that the Good Friday Agreement's position on the election of a First Minister and a Deputy First Minister should be adhered to and should not be changed. We have also argued for the convening of a bill of rights forum.

We have outlined several issues. We are content, however, to listen to the ideas advanced by other parties and see where that takes us. There is a general view — which was brought to the formal review of the Good Friday Agreement — that there are areas of agreement that can be tightened up, such as accountability and stability, and we are prepared to look at all of those. However, to be clear, the context for the issues put forward by the Governments in their comprehensive proposals no longer exists.

Sinn Féin will pursue the outstanding institutional issues as we see them, and I hope that we will reach agreement on all of those matters. However, agreement on those matters does not necessarily predate the establishment of the institutions. That should happen as a matter of urgency. There is nothing that stands in the way of the re-establishment of the institutions.

10.30 am

Dr Farren: I am not as concerned about repetition or revisiting issues as some people seem to suggest, notwithstanding the lengthy discussions and interrogations that parties have had with each other over the past few weeks. I have been involved in these kinds of exercises long enough to realise that repetition is probably the least of our problems. We should not be afraid to revisit issues if necessary, especially given the kind of agenda that we set ourselves last week.

The SDLP's submission follows, in numerical order, the main items listed for discussion last week under the heading of "Institutional issues". I do not intend to go through them all in detail now. A significant proportion of the electorate, North and South, endorsed the Good Friday Agreement, and it remains the bedrock on which we need to move forward. I have always recognised that there are shifts in opinion on the agreement. However, those are more to do with the failure to operate and maintain the institutions because of matters that were extraneous to them rather than any that were inherent in them.

That is not to say that the SDLP has not recognised during the review of the agreement and, more recently, during discussions in this Committee, the need to examine some matters to ensure greater degrees of accountability, effectiveness and efficiency with respect to how the Assembly; the Executive; the North/South Ministerial Council; the east-west structures and the Civic Forum operate, and that is reflected in our submission.

The SDLP believes that the Civic Forum still has a useful role to play. It came into existence in the later stages of the operation of the institutions and, therefore, took some time to find its feet. Given the nature of the Civic Forum, it was never going to be a major public body that would operate in a blaze of publicity: it would be one that would do useful work in bringing together all the strands represented on it. Those strands would not otherwise have an opportunity to hear from each other or to express their views, insofar as they were collective views, to the Executive, the Assembly and the wider public, thereby acting as a challenge on medium- and longer-term policy matters. There would be no obligation on the Assembly or the Executive to adopt the Civic Forum's views but it would still have a useful role to play and should continue to receive our support.

The parties who were centrally involved in comprehensive agreement will say that they did not sign off on it. However, at the time they greeted the proposals from both Governments as historic, and a major breakthrough, and seemed to think that there was considerable potential for progress.

The SDLP was not involved centrally. It made its views known to the Governments and it engaged in discussion with other parties — notably the DUP, and, at times, Sinn Féin — but it had no hand, act or part in the final draft of the proposals, has never accepted them, nor does it regard them as having any formal standing. Some aspects of the proposals could attract the SDLP's interest and support, however, it does not support the proposals for a comprehensive agreement, and it is trying to make the necessary improvements to the operations of the institutions as set down in the Good Friday Agreement.

The SDLP welcomes this opportunity. I am not sure how the Committee will organise its business from now on, and that may be the next issue we will have to address when the initial round of contributions have been concluded.

Mr McFarland: The UUP's detailed views are in the Official Report of 28 June, and I will not go into those again.

The statements made by our Government and the Irish Government continue to say that the Belfast Agreement is the basis on which all parties are having discussions with a view to getting Government up and running. As Peter Robinson said, there are areas in the agreement that did not work properly in the first Assembly. There are areas that in light of our experience of the first Assembly could be tweaked and improved, and it is clear from the first round of discussions in the Committee that most parties are not uncomfortable with that. There is disagreement about which areas need to be improved, but there is agreement that improvements must be made.

There are common issues where agreement has already been reached. For example, no party is uncomfortable with the need for a ministerial code to tie Ministers into exactly what they will do and what their responsibilities will be. Most parties broadly agree that North/South issues should be dealt with on the basis of sensible, practical politics and policies between the two jurisdictions — as Peter Robinson said — and that the east-west part of the agreement was an orphan child because the Governments refused to have a secretariat. The east-west structures must be treated on an equal basis with the North/South structures. Those are obvious issues, and should not cause an enormous amount of disagreement.

There is confusion over the comprehensive agreement. For the past month and a half William McCrea has said that it is inviolate; it is a DUP document, and it has been agreed with the Government and must be delivered. The Minister of State, Mr Hanson, said in the House of Commons that his Government had a deal with the DUP and it would be delivered later in the year. I was encouraged by Peter Robinson's statement the week before last when he said that the DUP was not tied to it.

There is confusion about the status of the comprehensive agreement and the undertakings that have been given on it. It would be useful to get an update, because the comprehensive agreement is a modified version of the Belfast Agreement. Like the SDLP, the UUP was not part of the comprehensive agreement negotiations. We understand that some parties that were part of the negotiations on the comprehensive agreement are not signed up to it. Sinn Féin is on record as saying in this Committee that it is not signed up to the comprehensive agreement, and Peter Robinson is on record in the House as saying that the DUP is not signed up to it. It will be interesting to see where we are with it now, because the comprehensive agreement is the last document that we are examining to establish any useful areas on which we can all agree; and whether those areas on which there is clearly no agreement require tweaking.

The Civic Forum was the enthusiastic brainchild of the Women's Coalition. Arlene Foster will recall that in discussions following the signing of the Belfast Agreement in 1998, we were all so fed up that we went along with the idea of a Civic Forum without having any enthusiasm for it. When the Assembly was first up and running, the Civic Forum proved largely useless. I have spoken to people who sat on it and they agreed that it was largely useless. The comprehensive agreement includes a proposal for an all-Ireland Civic Forum, and I find that even more disturbing. We must discuss that.

The question of dual/ triple mandates is tied in with the Review of Public Administration (RPA) and the number of Departments. They are inter-related issues because large super-councils would have devolved powers, and that will raise effectiveness and efficiency issues for the Assembly. On Wednesday, the Committee, in dealing with policing and justice issues, will discuss whether we need more or fewer Departments. The number of Departments is vital and we need to discuss it. The RPA forbids, by law, Members of the Assembly to be councillors. Interestingly, in Scotland the media led the charge against dual mandates. The media questioned whether MSPs could be doing good work for Scotland if they were sitting in Westminster.

I understand why, at the moment, MLAs may wish to be MPs or councillors. However, if the Assembly were fully up and running, it would be difficult for MLAs to serve their constituents properly at Westminster or in a council while trying to do good work at Stormont. We need to examine how an MP can also be an MLA and a councillor and any combination thereof.

Issues concerning the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister are tied up with the comprehensive agreement. I talked in depth about them and the question of whether the unionist or nationalist veto on who is First Minister or Deputy First Minister should be removed. At the moment, unionists must put their hands up for the nationalist or republican Deputy First Minister and republicans and nationalists must agree on the First Minister. In a way, that is a safeguard because it locks people into a system of jointly supporting the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. The voting system is complicated and we have discussed weighted majorities at various stages. That would lend itself to a full and fruitful discussion of the different options, and we may need some advice on that.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do members want to ask questions or are there issues that they want to raise?

Mr McNarry: I have a question with which the secretariat might be able to help. Despite the Government facilitating the prevarication and vetoes that we have had to endure — which has contributed to a magnificent hatchet job on our credibility with the public — we are trying to create space in which to recover our credibility. My understanding is that the public welcomes the fact that Committees such as this are meeting and working; it sees that as a clear change. Such progress is also building public confidence in our abilities.

The decision to discuss the issues detailed in the schedule — institutions, law and order, rights and economic challenges — separately seems to have been agreed by this Committee. What we are doing here perhaps bodes well for the integrity of a future institution. That is crucial to the points that every member made about stability, efficiency and co-operation. As the Committee discusses the issues, it is important that it presents a report to the Assembly for its approval. We have agreed that, but I merely underscore the importance of doing so.

I am sure that the Prime Minister would embrace the recommendations of a report by this Committee and by the economic subgroup. I assume that a report would contain recommendations. We should also give some thought to establishing the status of such a report. I would not want it to be used simply to promote a debate that we have been calling for in the Assembly. I note, too, that those who previously said that they would not take part in such a debate now say that they will do so. I would not want a report of this Committee to be merely a pitch; it should not be merely an aspiration for a debate. I hope that during the discussions we will think about the outcome of the report.

I do not wish to run a sprint before we get into the marathon, but it is vital that we give some thought to what agreement can be reached on the recommendations that such a report might contain and how those recommendations might be put before all 108 Members and before those in government. That is very important, and it would be a proper signal to send to the public.

Is there some direction percolating in the background about the status of a report to which this Committee would agree?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The content of the report — as opposed to using it merely to get a debate — and the work that goes into it are important.

Mr P Robinson: I assume that the report will indicate the parties' views on each of the issues and where there is, and is not, some agreement among the parties. The report cannot go much further than compiling the level of agreement on each of the subject matters. Some questions were posed during the course of members' contributions, and clearly there were some misunderstandings, so it might be worthwhile touching on some of those.

If anyone can talk about a context no longer existing, surely the context that no longer exists is one where there is support for the Belfast Agreement — the kind of support that is necessary for it to exist. The whole structure of the Belfast Agreement required that there be support from both sections of the community. That support does not exist. There is ample evidence from the last four elections that the Belfast Agreement does not have the support of the unionist community. Indeed, opinion polls indicate that there is some draining away of support even beyond that. Each of us can put our spin as to whether we believe that that is because it was not implemented or because people, having had more time to examine it, recognise that it was folly to have supported it in the first place. The end result is that the Belfast Agreement does not have the support of the unionist community.

The Belfast Agreement, of course, is more than the institutions. It was a series of other decisions about policing and prisoners, and with regard to the institutions, about the fact that people could be in those institutions irrespective of their relationship with paramilitary organisations that may be active. The end result is that it is a context that does not exist. There is no support for the Belfast Agreement in the unionist community. Therefore if people say that no context exists for the comprehensive agreement, we have to face the reality: it is only what we agree here and now that matters. Whatever we call it, that is the only basis on which we can move forward.

As regards the DUP's position on the comprehensive agreement, I thought that that had been made very clear. However, it does not seem to have been understood so I will repeat it. The comprehensive agreement was the product of the two Governments, arising out of extensive discussions with two political parties, separately. We understood, although clearly to a lesser extent with other parties, that the result was not signed off by either Sinn Féin or the DUP. However, the DUP, then and now, regards the proposals contained in the comprehensive agreement as being progress from what had occurred beforehand. It would be a very foolish person who would say that proposals that are not signed off should be implemented if they cannot be improved on. We want to improve on the proposals in the comprehensive agreement, and if we can, we shall — it is as simple as that.

The all-Ireland consultative forum contained in the comprehensive agreement was clearly not a DUP proposal, although anyone in the DUP would regard that as much less worrying than the proposals for an all-Ireland executive body agreed by others. I see no danger in a forum that is consultative; I see it as a waste of time and money. However, in order to get an overall agreement, people will be prepared to take decisions that allow some wastage into the system.

I believe that there is no real benefit in having either a Northern Ireland or an all-Ireland consultative civic forum, although neither of them is particularly damaging to the constitutional position of Northern Ireland.

Dr Farren: David McNarry raised the nature of the report. It would be helpful to gain some clarity on what we can achieve, although some of Peter's earlier remarks clarify at least part of that.

If the Committee is to make a report at this stage, it is unlikely to point to much agreement. The report could outline the parties' positions on various issues. To some extent, there may be degrees of convergence within those positions; in other respects, there will not be convergence. That will be clear to see when the report is presented. We may well have to settle for a fairly modest report, which could form the basis for whatever negotiations will take place in the autumn — unless, of course, we agree to become a negotiating body. However, some parties have clearly set their minds against that at this stage.

Nonetheless, I would like to hear what parties think we can and are likely to achieve with the initial report that we will finalise at the end of this month or in early September. By identifying the issues and detailing parties' respective views, greater clarification will be gained and degrees of divergence and convergence will be more sharply presented. That will be a very helpful exercise and will probably be as much as we can achieve over the next few weeks.

Mr P Robinson: As a possible follow-up to that, the report could list each issue that makes up the component parts of the institutional structures. The report could express each party's views on those issues to gauge the level of convergence.

Dr Farren: The initial list was presented at our meeting last Wednesday — there was some modification to that, but not a great deal. That list is a series of headings, which may need to be further ordered in a more logical way, but it certainly provides scope for a report to be compiled that details the views of the SDLP, the DUP, the Alliance Party, Sinn Féin and the UUP. If we cannot agree to go further than that, people will see for themselves to what extent there is convergence or divergence among the parties. Those speaking about the report in any subsequent Assembly debate may wish to focus on areas where they think there is potential for movement.

That would be a modest report, but possibly the only type that the Committee is likely to be able to present — unless, of course, we turn ourselves into a Committee that wants to go further than simply identifying in more detail where each party stands on the issues. I am ready and anxious to do that, if others are happy to engage in more detailed discussion on where we can — and should, and probably have to — achieve a high degree of convergence and agreement.

Mr Murphy: Seán Farren is correct to say that it would be a modest attempt at producing a report to simply list the issues and individual party positions. The Committee has done that already. Several weeks ago, there was an attempt to complete a report simply because the Committee had met x number of times and had been recorded by Hansard.

In Sinn Féin's opinion, any report should be an attempt, at least, to resolve some of the institutional issues. There are issues on which there could be broad agreement, and it is important that those be identified. If there are other issues on which there cannot be agreement, and that members feel would be better left to later negotiations, the Committee should agree that. However, if the Committee's purpose is to identify issues and to hear the views of each party, it has done that and it is doing it again today. It could do it in more detail, but that would set the Committee's sights very low. The Committee should attempt to put at least some of the issues to bed and to state that because the parties are in agreement on them, they do not need to clutter up any future discussions. That is the sort of report that the Committee should aim to publish.

David McNarry made the point that Sinn Féin has gone public at last with its position on Assembly debates. Its position has been clear since 15 May. If there were genuine business, concerning preparation for government, Sinn Féin would be quite prepared to debate it in the Assembly. Its objection was that Assembly debates were being tabled on issues over which the Assembly has no responsibility. Of course, given its reaction to some of the proposed topics, it has been proven that the Northern Ireland Office takes no heed of party suggestions.

The Committee should not simply be going round the houses, listing issues and saying where it stands with them. It should be considering whether resolution could be achieved on the issues that parties have identified. Members need to ask: Can the Committee move forward? Can it use its time constructively? Can the Committee contribute to getting the institutions to function before 24 November? As I see it, that is the Committee's purpose. Otherwise, why are members — all of whom are busy in their own rights — spending the summer sitting around a table discussing these issues? Why are they doing that if not to achieve some form of resolution?

Peter Robinson remarked that the context for the Belfast Agreement/Good Friday Agreement has altered. The fact remains that it is a sovereign agreement between the two Governments. It was mandated, and the two Governments were mandated to implement it. No such status exists for the 'Proposals by the British and Irish Governments for a Comprehensive Agreement', which were published in 2004, and that should further drive on the Committee to reach an agreement whereby the Assembly can be working again before 24 November.

If the Committee does not reach such an agreement by 24 November, Northern Ireland will find itself with the Good Friday Agreement minus the Assembly, the element to which, I suppose, unionism was most attached. That is what is shaping up for us beyond 24 November. Sinn Féin would prefer that the Assembly was up and functioning, which is why its members have attended this Committee to clear away some of the issues that people feel are outstanding.

The Committee needs to aim for a report that shows the work that has been done, the issues that have been discussed and resolved, and, maybe, highlights those issues that need further work. To produce a report that simply lists how each party feels on the issues would be to ask the Assembly to debate the Hansard report. Members attempted to do that a number of weeks back. Sinn Féin wants to see a genuine report that reflects genuine work.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Will members consider how the issues could be grouped?

Mr McFarland: The task of the Committee in this format is to mine down into the issues and to identify whether there are other more complex issues that members have not spotted. A number of the issues fit together or are included under the same heading. It would be helpful if members could extract the broad headings. In his document, Peter Robinson listed accountability and institutional issues.

If we agree to extract broad headings and make a list within those, we can find out whether there are further issues to be identified. I do not know whether we can agree. The word “negotiation” has been neuralgic. At every meeting of this Committee, William McCrea confirmed that the DUP is not negotiating, although he agreed that the party would identify issues. We should stick to that for the moment to see whether there are other issues within these broad topics that need to be identified and whether they can be solved by this Committee.

We should not become excited about some of the issues that are not solvable by the parties or by the Committee. We should simply log those issues. In negotiations, the parties may be able to solve other matters. If we identify those issues and the party positions, we will be well placed to take decisions eventually.

Mr Ford: Peter Robinson commented that support for the agreement continues to drain away. In recent polls — which I do not have in front of me — there was a clear indication of a significant body of people — a majority — who wanted to reform the agreement rather than do away with it. That is entirely consistent with the position of this Committee.

The parties have set out their priorities in different ways and at different times. The party documents are set out in different ways. They do not differ hugely, but there is no easy way to read across. Seán Farren’s modest first step would at least mean that we set out the parties’ positions on the topics that have been identified. We might well take some of them to a further stage where we could record that there was a broad measure of agreement. For example, we have already highlighted issues such as the ministerial code.

If we start by putting parties’ views together on the individual topics, we might find ourselves at the point where some matters could be resolved in a relatively straightforward way. On other matters we would record a set of conflicting opinions, which would inform an Assembly debate. I would hope that the Committee might have made some decent progress by early September. A report would provide information in real negotiations led by the two Governments, at whatever point the Prime Minister and the Taoiseach decide to parachute in on us.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): There are 12 items on the list. Perhaps we could link them together. The Belfast Agreement and the comprehensive agreement are linked. First Minister and Deputy First Minister issues, the voting system in the Assembly, partnership in government — can we link these together to narrow them down? Is that possible? Understandings and undertakings perhaps fall outside the remit.

Mr P Robinson: This list constitutes not much more than a whinge list that we have produced collectively. If we want to find out the extent of convergence among the various parties on the component parts of the institutions, we need to examine those components. Presumably, there is at least convergence on the belief that there should be an Assembly. We might start falling apart on whether there should be 108 Members, whether it should be elected by single transferable vote, or whether it should have scrutiny Committees. Surely we should examine each element of the institutions to find out what we are agreed on and what we are not.

Dr Farren: Many of these issues were discussed during the review of the operation of the agreement. The types of headings that Peter suggests are probably more appropriate than our current loose and unlinked set of headings. The secretariat has extracted this list from presentations and interrogations in this Committee.

Mr P Robinson: By its nature, therefore, this is where we disagree rather than agree.

Dr Farren: Yes. However, I would not present these for any further elaboration in the manner in which they have been presented. That would lead to a lot of unnecessary repetition. However, we do need to look at the institutions.

I questioned whether we could address the Belfast Agreement and the comprehensive agreement under “Institutional issues”. I do not think that I will ever convert the DUP into saying that it formally accepts the Good Friday/Belfast Agreement. That will not happen. However, we must address the operation of the institutions that were established under the Good Friday Agreement, because both the parties that accepted the agreement and those that did not have identified how the operation of those institutions might be improved.

We can look at whether the Assembly should be of the same size as it is at present, or whether it should be larger or smaller. Parties gave different views about that during the review. There are also issues relating to the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister — the election of the Ministers to those offices and their functions. There are also concerns about collectivity and accountability within the Executive, and we may also have to examine the need for the Government Departments that exist.

We could order the debate that we might enter into over the next few weeks by taking the various headings of the institutions and working through from the Assembly and the Executive to the North/South and the east-west. That would sweep up issues related to the voting systems, etc, that are listed. One issue that is outside that scope is the reform of the RPA; that could be taken separately.

If we were to proceed in some way similar to what I have attempted to outline, we might be able to have all of the parties' positions identified where there is agreement on the kind of changes — if any — that we want, or no changes but agreement to keep things as they are. That could be stated explicitly, but it would be clear anyway from what the parties had said. The debate would then be honed down to the issues where there is no convergence. These discussions will not finish at the end of August.

Mr P Robinson: There are issues on which people will want to see some movement before devolution takes place, but they will not necessarily expect them to be in operation. For instance, people might think that 108 Members is too many for the Assembly, but they would not expect that to be resolved before devolution. In some cases, it would be sufficient to have a process under way, rather than having all issues resolved for the date of devolution.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): How do we want to proceed?

Mr McFarland: Some sensible ideas have been suggested, and if we proceed as Peter and Séan have outlined, then we have a logical structure to move through, and we can record positions as we go.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The list includes the Belfast Agreement, the Assembly, the Executive, departmental Committees, Government Departments, the North/South Ministerial Council, the North/South implementation bodies, east-west issues, the British-Irish Council, the British-Irish Intergovernmental Conference, the Civic Forum, the Human Rights Commission, the Equality Commission and the RPA, which falls slightly outside the remit of the Preparation for Government Committee, but it certainly affects us —

Mr Murphy: The British-Irish Inter-Parliamentary Body should also be on that list.

Dr Farren: Are human rights issues not being addressed at the meetings on Fridays?

11.15 am

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): They will be, yes.

Do members want the Committee Clerks to draw up a list under those headings or do they want to suggest a list?

Mr P Robinson: We are not just talking about the institutions; there are issues about the voting system to, and within, the Assembly and the ministerial code. They are issues in themselves.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do members want to make suggestions?

Mr P Robinson: Officials could produce as comprehensive a list as possible, which could be open-ended so that members can add to it.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Would members like to call witnesses or have presentations from outside organisations on any of those issues?

Mr McFarland: At the last meeting we spoke about time not being on our side. The Committee may wish to call witnesses who have a particular expertise, but colleagues around this table are aware that we have been at this for years; most members know the ins and outs of most of the issues. The Committee may wish to seek professional advice on particular aspects, legal or whatever, but we may waste too much time because all witnesses within a certain grouping must be called, otherwise people get upset.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): If the Committee wishes to call witnesses, even at a later stage, the Committee Clerks must be given a list as early as possible. If parties have suggestions, the Committee Clerks can make applications.

Mr Murphy: I am not convinced that we need any witnesses. The institutional issues need to be resolved by the parties. I am not quite sure whether somebody can introduce an imaginative suggestion about some other way of resolving this matter.

Chairman, you have a list of headings. Under "Assembly", for example, parties have identified a number of topics; they could be broken down into subheadings, under which we could agree issues for discussion. That might be a way to move forward. We could move down through the institutions one by one, list the issues of importance to parties and work through them to find areas of agreement, putting to one side those issues on which we cannot reach agreement.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Peter has made the point that some issues must be resolved before the institutions could get up and running. At this stage, they could be listed and prioritised because they may stop the institutions from getting up and running.

Mr Murphy: Mr Chairman, there would be differences of views on that. In our view, none of the issues has to be resolved before the institutions are restored. If we have time, it would be practical and welcome to resolve some of them, but none of them, we would concede, would be a precondition to re-establishing the institutions. However, I do not see any reason that parties cannot identify issues that they wish to see resolved before the institutions are returned.

Dr Farren: I want to make a similar point. Parties will identify issues that, if not resolved, they believe will prevent devolution. In earlier presentations, the SDLP has said that the basic conditions that brought about the collapse of the operation of the institutions no longer exist and that we should, therefore, be back in business.

I recognise that we cannot be. If there are issues that we can resolve, and that it would be helpful to resolve, let us try to do that. There will be no agreement among parties on which issues must be resolved before devolution can happen. Therefore, we should just go ahead with discussing the issues and let parties say whatever they wish.

Mr P Robinson: Agreement is not necessary. If there is an issue that you believe must be resolved before devolution, it is not just your problem; it is mine as well. Likewise, if we have problems and we indicate that we cannot see how powers can be devolved until x, y and z are resolved, it becomes your problem as well. Agreement is not necessary. It is sufficient for parties to state their case.

Dr Farren: Agreement on what the issues are is unnecessary. That is what I am saying.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The DUP say that there are some issues that must be resolved. It is important to have those matters clarified, whether people agree with them or not. At least we will know that those are the priorities for one party.

Mr P Robinson: Are we then saying that, for every party except the DUP, nothing needs to be resolved before devolution?

Mr McFarland: We have identified a raft of issues that people have problems with. However, as Peter Robinson said, we can solve this problem only when everyone is in agreement, or when everyone can live with whatever is proposed. This is a scoping exercise aimed at identifying issues; if we start delving too deeply into the psychology of who is comfortable with what, we will not get past first base. We were going well until now.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I do not wish to create problems, but it is important to place the issues up front, so that members can prioritise them, and so that we can try to deal with them. I do not think that that is point scoring.

Mrs Long: Unless we identify and address the issues, it will not be possible to restore devolution. However, it would be folly to say that other issues that could lead to the restored institutions being continually destabilized are not as important as the major barriers to setting up an Executive. We have already heard reference to the matter of public confidence in the institutions and in members around the table and colleagues outside the room. Constant instability within restored institutions will not help to boost public confidence. We should try to make the restored institutions as stable as possible. There are issues that may not be barriers to the setting up of an Executive, but which limit the ability of that Executive to function normally, well, and in the best interests of the people of Northern Ireland. From that perspective, it is equally important to address those matters.

The lowest common denominator — identifying the issues — has been discussed, but we must also try to identify some solutions to those problems. That is part of our responsibility. If we come up with problems, we must also come up with potential solutions. We must be prepared to discuss and question one another about those potential solutions. We may not want to negotiate, but most members, when they are discussing problems, can see at the back of their minds ways to resolve those problems. That should be placed on record, so that it is clear where each party stands on individual issues.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): How do members wish to proceed? Can we reach agreement that clerks provide a paper on identifying the issues within the sections that we discussed: the Assembly; the Executive; North/South issues; east-west matters; and the Review of Public Administration?

Mr P Robinson: There has been a question-and-answer session of five or six hours for two of the parties, and of I do not know how long for the others. If, in that period, the parties have not set out the issues that they require to be addressed, they have not been doing their job very effectively.

I presume that if the officials search through all the Committee's work thus far, they will see all the issues that need to be resolved before devolution can be restored. A list compiled on that basis should surely cover everything.

Mr McFarland: In our various discussions parties raised issues that did not necessarily have to be resolved before restoration. They also raised issues that had arisen from the first Assembly: suggestions that might have helped the Assembly to run better but not necessarily matters over which people would die in a ditch. There were degrees of concern about those.

Mr P Robinson: I return to Naomi's point. I do not know whether the list comes in two columns rather than one — a list of issues that have to be resolved before devolution can move forward; and issues that would improve devolution when it was restored.

Mr Ford: It is potentially then a list of three —

Mr P Robinson: Alternatives.

Mr Ford: No. The list should contain that which has to be resolved; that which, if it is not resolved, could destabilise the Assembly after restoration; and that which we might need to do something about at some stage in the future.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I do not think that the Clerks can be expected to do that, because they would be making a political judgement.

Mr Ford: I agree.

Mr P Robinson: They make a political judgement when they decide in which column items belong.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): When the parties were cross-examined, we found that there was no clear line on most of the issues: did a particular issue have to be resolved before 24 November or could it be discussed in future? That is where it becomes more difficult.

Mr P Robinson: If each of the parties was asked to make a written submission about issues that it saw as obstacles —

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): There were quite a few obstacles, and some of them had longer tails than others.

Mr McFarland: If the staff list the issues, we can have a meeting to put them into columns; then the parties can highlight issues that are neuralgic to them.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Surely the list is not so long that each party cannot spell out its priority issues now. That would give the Clerks some political guidance from the parties instead of leaving them to make judgements.

Dr Farren: I am a wee bit concerned about the direction in which we propose to move. As I tried to say earlier, a more acceptable and neutral exercise for our secretariat would be to make a list of the institutions. Let us take, for example, the number of Members. If a party does not agree with the number 108, it will say so. It is not a case of saying, “Unless we start with 70 or 80 and have an election before devolution, we will not agree to devolution.” I do not think that that will happen. I am just using it as an illustration.

Parties may say that unless nominations for First Minister and Deputy First Minister are as set out in the proposals for a comprehensive agreement, they will not allow devolution to take place.

Parties will set out their positions on the items listed under the various institutional headings, such as the Assembly, the Executive and so on. We should not set up columns and leave the secretariat to decide which unresolved issues would be obstacles to devolution. That would put the secretariat in an invidious position. It is not the most helpful way to proceed.

Mr McFarland: Returning to when we were producing the broad headings and preparing to discuss them in turn may reveal the parties’ positions. It would be slower, but it would be useful to have time to think as we go along. When we talk round the table, some issues may become less important, as some parties may have received reassurances or other parties’ positions may have moved. If we go back to producing a list of headings and begin to discuss them —

11.30 am

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): My only concern is that we will continue to produce lists without resolving the issues. There have been two lists and there may be a further one, but, if that is how members wish to proceed, that is not a problem.

Mrs Long: Dr Farren’s suggestion on how to proceed is sensible. The factors that parties believe must be addressed prior to restoration will become apparent only during a negotiation process in which all the issues are brought into the mix. Some issues may be interconnected, therefore, if some are partially addressed, others may become less important. It would be wrong to put those into fixed lists, because that would create barriers before we even begin.

It would be more constructive for parties to state the difficulties that they perceive are in the current arrangements and then try to move that on to their suggested solutions rather than listing things in order of importance. If we did that, we would automatically begin to tie parties into particular positions, and that would not be useful.

Mr Murphy: I share the Chairman’s concern about producing more lists; however, the list that we have now does not allow for a step-by-step discussion through the institutional issues, because we could hop from one item to another and add various topics. Therefore some restructuring may be necessary. Stating the issues within those broad headings may assist the Clerk and Committee staff who are compiling the list.

I am not averse to discussing the RPA, but I wonder how such a topic fits under the institutional discussion. How can we achieve consensus on it or resolve any of the outstanding issues? Representatives from political parties sit on various RPA committees, but, if people wish to discuss the matter at this Committee, I will not shy away from it. However, we may be biting off more than we can chew by including the RPA, especially given our time frame and the number of headings that we already have.

Mr McFarland: It is of direct interest to the Assembly to discuss the RPA in relation to issues that impinge upon the Assembly, such as the number of Departments and what will transfer from Departments to the RPA or to councils, because if we are trying to find —

Mr P Robinson: The number of Departments is the issue, not the RPA. The RPA is a factor that will determine how many Departments there will be. The more power that goes to local government, the less need there will be for so many Departments.

Mr McFarland: The number of Departments can be discussed under the RPA. However, the powers that will be passed to councils from the Department of the Environment (DOE) or the Department for Regional Development (DRD), for example, may impinge upon whether it is worthwhile amalgamating Departments. The RPA is an item under the “Institutional issues” heading, but it may not need to be a separate point, given that parties are dealing with the function of the RPA elsewhere. However, it may impinge upon the issue of Departments and how the Assembly functions.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): It is important that the Committee discusses the Assembly and the institutions and the knock-on effects that those will have on the RPA, as I do not wish to sideline the RPA.

Do members wish to list any items, or do they want to leave that to the Clerks?

Dr Farren: Although we have not yet used the terms, we are essentially considering the institutional issues under strand one, strand two and strand three of the agreement. They seem to be the most comprehensive headings and will likely form an agenda — unless there is something outside those that I have not mentioned. If we took the issues relating to strands one, two and three and spent the next two or three meetings working through those issues as best as we can, we would identify all —

Mr P Robinson: Are you suggesting strands one, two and three as headings?

Dr Farren: Yes, and sub-headings would come from each of those.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): To link those groups together?

Dr Farren: It seems that that is what we are addressing.

Mr Campbell: Surely that would have to be in the broadest sense; you are talking about very broad headings.

Dr Farren: They are broad headings, but within each heading are particular aspects of the Northern institutions, the North/South institutions, the all-Ireland institutions and the east-west institutions, and, insofar as there are inter-relationships between them, they would have to be addressed.

Mr P Robinson: Everything will fall under those three headings.

Dr Farren: That is what I thought. Strands one, two and three are set out in the Good Friday Agreement and could be used as headings. Parties may be happy with a particular issue and want it to continue, or, if they want an issue changed, they should say so. We should proceed in a logical and structured way.

Mr P Robinson: If we use strands one, two and three as headings, what are the sub-headings under strand one?

Dr Farren: The Assembly, the Executive and the voting systems are all issues.

Mr P Robinson: Are we leaving the headings to the Committee Clerks?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): It would be much easier if we could decide the headings, which the Committee Clerks could then tweak out.

We are considering strand one of the Belfast Agreement. Will the comprehensive agreement be part of that discussion?

Mr McFarland: I thought that we agreed that the Belfast Agreement and the comprehensive agreement contain all the issues we would discuss: the Belfast Agreement is the original document; the comprehensive agreement seeks to change aspects of it. Those two issues could be taken out, given that we have decided on a format based on strands one, two and three. There may be other issues of particular concern that may need to be spelt out within those three headings.

If strands one, two and three are the headings, we need to ask the parties for their particular issues for discussion and see whether they fit under those headings. Does that make sense?

Mr P Robinson: If we agree that there should be an Assembly elected by single transferable vote and multi-member constituencies, are we not better to say that we agree? Or are we only talking about issues on which we disagree?

Mr McNarry: We need a structure to follow; otherwise we will jump from one issue to the next. We have been prone to that over the past few weeks. If we are agreed on the headings and are looking for columns to follow, are we saying — and I hope that we are — that there are issues that we accept, issues on which we will seek improvement and on which we will largely focus, and problem issues? We need to present the issues and allow the columns to be filled in from our discussions.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I would like the parties to present the issues, if that is possible. The Committee Clerks can put the issues together and fill in the columns. We accept that the workings of the Assembly are part and parcel of the issues.

Mr McNarry: We should focus on the positives as well as the negatives. If the template is strands one, two and three, will strand one be discussed at the next meeting? Do we look at the positive and negative aspects of strand one and see what needs to be improved?

Mr P Robinson: Before the Committee meets again, can we agree the template and issues for discussion on strand one? It is a case of whether members leave it to the Clerks — and I am sure that they are delighted at the prospect — or whether we put forward a list of issues for discussion.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): It would be useful if the Committee provided a list of issues for the Clerks. If the Clerks were to draw up a list of issues, the Committee would lose a day either scrapping half of it or adding to it.

Mr McFarland: Under strand one, the Assembly and Executive are sub-headings, and voting falls into one of those. Is there a third sub-heading?

Mr McNarry: Departments.

Mr Murphy: That comes under the Executive sub-heading.

Mr McFarland: Under the Assembly heading are First Minister and Deputy First Minister issues, voting systems and so on.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The Committee structure and scrutiny Committees would also come under that sub-heading.

Dr Farren: There are issues relating to safeguards. The sub-headings under strand one of the Good Friday Agreement are: “The Assembly, Safeguards, Operation of the Assembly, Executive Authority, Legislation, Relations with other institutions.”

Those encompass most issues that parties have raised. Other matters may fall outside those sub-headings, but they already exist and have been agreed. Whatever the level of disagreement now, the Good Friday Agreement has been the basis on which we have operated the institutions, insofar as we were able.

Mr P Robinson: There have been Assemblies, Committees and Executives in existence before the Belfast Agreement was conceived. Their roots are not particularly in the Belfast Agreement.

The list of issues for discussion starts with the election to the Assembly, the number of Assembly Members, the election of the Speaker and Deputy Speakers, the formation of Committees and proportionality.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The setting-up of the Executive would also be part of that.

Mr P Robinson: I was taking the Assembly and Executive as two separate categories.

I assume that the ministerial code, and whether it should be a statutory duty or should be revised, comes under the Executive heading. Also under that heading are: the number of Departments; how Ministers are appointed; how the First Minister and Deputy First Minister are appointed — if, indeed, there is to be a First Minister and Deputy First Minister; how decisions are taken within the Executive and how appointments to outside bodies are made.

Dr Farren: I want to mention safeguards, by which I mean issues relating to the petition of concern.

Mr Murphy: The establishment of the Committee of the Centre also comes under the Assembly sub-heading.

I am not sure that legislation relating to suspension necessarily falls under Assembly or Executive, but we need to discuss that under the sub-heading of institutions.

Mr P Robinson: The role of Committees, which concerns the Committee of the Centre and its power to scrutinise and call Ministers, is another issue.

Mr Ford: I appreciate the effort to put issues into either the Assembly or Executive categories. However, given that Seán referred to safeguards and that we have discussed accountability, it may be necessary to examine those two issues, which, in many senses, lie between the Assembly and the Executive, as a separate category.

We have also missed out, possibly deliberately, the Civic Forum, which is a strand-one institution.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We are taking the Assembly as one part. The Executive and the Civic Forum would be other parts.

Mr Ford: We need to discuss safeguards and accountability as a specific issue. If we discuss matters pertaining to the Executive, we may deal with some of those issues, but we need to flag them up.

Dr Farren: Did we mention the issues relating to the Pledge of Office and the ministerial code of conduct?

Mr P Robinson: There is a ministerial code and a ministerial code of conduct; they are separate issues.

Dr Farren: Yes, that is what I meant.

Mr P Robinson: The relationship between the Assembly and the Executive does not fall into either category, but it combines both.

Mr Ford: That is the accountability point.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Accountability both ways.

Mr McFarland: The issue of the role and effectiveness of Committees arose in the first Assembly. I do not know whether it is worth chucking it into the mix, but, technically, Committees were able to introduce legislation in their own right. However, their budget was extremely limited. A Committee that wanted to introduce legislation would have needed legal advice and a team to develop legislation, and that was not available. As far as I am aware, no Committee introduced legislation in the first Assembly.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The Clerk has just told me that that was being developed at the time. The role, powers and resources of Committees will be examined as part of our discussions.

Mr Murphy: It was more a question of resources than powers: they had the powers, but they did not have the resources.

Dr Farren: They had powers over secondary legislation but not over primary legislation.

Mr P Robinson: The review process is also an issue. We talked earlier about issues that had to be resolved for devolution to be restored and about issues that could be dealt with later. The comprehensive agreement set up an institutional review committee to deal with issues that were not essential at the beginning of discussions. It was felt that that was a better way of proceeding than waiting for five-year reviews and so forth.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): So there would be a committee dealing with ongoing reviews?

Mr P Robinson: It is up to us to consider whether it should, but we should at least include it as a heading on the list.

What about the issue of community designation? Does that not need its own heading?

Mr Ford: I thought that that issue was fairly well highlighted in discussions on voting systems. However, if the DUP wishes to include the abolition of designations as a priority, I am happy to agree.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We will include designations and voting patterns and structures as an overall issue.

Mr McFarland: Have we included the number of MLAs and the question of dual mandate?

Mr P Robinson: We should.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Dual — or triple — mandate.

A Member: Or quadruple.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Any other issues? We have a list, albeit not a full one, but, as we said earlier, other issues may arise from it. If we are flexible, we can add to it. The Clerks can identify issues as they come up in the submissions.

Mr P Robinson: It would put more responsibility on the parties if, rather than wait until next Monday, they contact the Clerks if issues occur to them.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): That would be easier.

Mr McFarland: Are we dealing with the Executive separately?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): At this stage we are dealing with categories. We dealt first with the Assembly and strand one. The Executive comes into that as well.

Mr McFarland: There are several issues concerning the Executive. The first — where power is vested — arose when the Assembly was suspended. We discovered that, in 1921, power was not vested in Parliament or its Ministers, but in the Departments.

Therefore it did not matter what happened, and that was why it was so easy to suspend the Assembly. Power is vested from Westminster into the Departments and exercised by the permanent secretaries. If the Assembly is to fly properly, we need to consider whether that power should be seconded from Westminster to the Assembly and from the Assembly to Ministers. That is not at all clear.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): That would come under the suspension legislation as well.

Mr McFarland: It is also about the Executive and how it functions and about Ministers' powers. If power is not given to the Minister but to the Department and the permanent secretary, the Minister can be disposed of at any time and, indeed, the Assembly ignored. An Assembly in which power was vested would be slightly more difficult to dismiss.

Mr P Robinson: Let us be clear about where we are going on this. The issue came up in November 2004. If power were vested in the Assembly, ultimate authority would rest with it. That is completely different from either the Belfast Agreement or the proposals in the comprehensive agreement. It is a more sensible and democratic proposal. We would be vesting power in the Assembly, and only the Assembly could discharge that power. It would no doubt do it on the basis of ministerial recommendations, just as Westminster does. The comprehensive agreement and the Belfast Agreement were more Executive-based devolution. Vesting power in the Assembly would make it very much as I would like it to be — a parliamentary democracy.

Mr McFarland: At present, power rests with the Departments and the permanent secretaries and has done since 1921. Whether we want it to move from there to the Executive or to the Assembly is an issue that needs to be examined.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): It is part of the discussion, although we cannot cover it entirely today.

Mrs Long: Chairman, I do not wish to add to the list. I simply want to clarify when the parties will receive a draft of the list so that we can add to it if we need to before next Monday. It would be helpful for all of us to see the complete list as soon as possible.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): It might be available on Wednesday. If members have additional items, they can be included for next Monday's meeting.

Mr P Robinson: May I tiptoe and drop in the subject of disqualification as well.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Why not? We have had everything else. We need more detail on disqualification.

Mr P Robinson: It could be disqualification of Members, of the Executive, or of parties.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We now need to consider issues relating to strand two.

Dr Farren: We have to address the issue of the nomination of Ministers in a way that obviates the difficulties that were encountered when the First Minister refused to nominate Ministers from a particular party to participate in meetings of the North/South Ministerial Council.

Mr Murphy: I presumed that that was addressed under ministerial code and ministerial code of conduct issues such as rights of participation and the requirement to participate. I suppose that it can be dealt with under either heading.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The Assembly and the Executive have to deal with a ministerial code and a ministerial code of conduct. However, there would be a knock-on effect on strand two through the North/South institutions, so it is a matter of linking the two.

Mr Murphy: That could be dealt with under either heading.

Mr Ford: We have highlighted that, in any event, there will be a certain amount of overlap, but, to me, the strand two issues concern the operation of the NSMC and other cross-border bodies. Compared to the amount of discussion that we have had on strand one matters in the past, I would have thought that those two issues would subsume most North/South points.

Mr Campbell: Further to David's point, the line of accountability of NSMC issues to the Assembly is another point of discussion.

Mr Ford: Yes. I am conscious of your concerns about accountability and of Seán's points about the practical operation of the NSMC.

Mr McFarland: We need to discuss the interdependency of the institutions. After November 2002, we discovered that, in theory, the NSMC should have been suspended but was not. Sanctioned by both Governments, the North/South bodies intended to beaver ahead, when they were supposed to be operating on a care-and-maintenance basis. There was quite a row at the time because they were pressing on with issues. If the Assembly is not functioning, the NSMC should not function. That needs to be either reiterated or discussed.

Mr P Robinson: Certain issues relate to the implementation bodies.

Dr Farren: Are you suggesting that their number should increase?

Mr P Robinson: Under efficiency grounds, we may want to reduce their number.

Dr Farren: I see.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do members want to raise any other strand two issues?

Mr P Robinson: In the context of strand two, there is the question of whether a North/South body is a stand-alone creature or whether it should be part of the British-Irish Council.

Mr Ford: The North/South parliamentary tier also occurred to me, but there may not be that much fuss about it.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We will move on to strand three issues.

Mr McFarland: The operation of the British-Irish Council and its secretariat come under strand three.

Mr P Robinson: Whether there should be a new Council of the Isles is another issue.

Dr Farren: In addition to the present one?

Mr P Robinson: Encompassing the British-Irish Council.

Mr McFarland: The British-Irish Interparliamentary Body (BIIPB) is a strand three issue, and it takes its genus from the Anglo-Irish Agreement of 1985. It would be logical if it took its origins from the Belfast Agreement or whatever, because everyone could then participate in it. Of course, that was not the case in the first Assembly. There were problems, such as when the BIIPB discussed transport and the Committee for Regional Development was unable to meet it.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): That relates to the workings of the BIIPB.

Dr Farren: You can suggest whatever you like, obviously, but I did not hear any justification for that.

Mr McFarland: The British-Irish Interparliamentary Body is a creature of the Anglo-Irish Agreement of 1985. Neither my party nor the DUP sat on it because of its origins. We tried to persuade the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to talk to the London and Dublin Governments to redesignate it as a body that originated from the Belfast Agreement, with the result that everybody could join it. However, that never happened. If an all-islands interparliamentary body is to be created, everyone must be able to comfortably join it.

Mr P Robinson: Whether everyone can join is also an issue. Under the present process, only a select number are appointed. Any Member of Parliament can join any of the other parliamentary bodies in which we are involved. However, other Members of Parliament are denied access to the BIIPB because only the chosen few are invited to sit on it.

Dr Farren: Members who need to be involved in any discussions that we might have on strands two and three do not participate on the Committee on the Preparation for Government. They would therefore need to be apprised of what we intend to discuss, and we might need to provide an opportunity for them to be present.

12.00 noon

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Yes, particularly if they were to appear as witnesses or to give evidence.

Dr Farren: They are part of the decision-making process for any changes to the operation of the institutions. Therefore, it would be rather presumptuous of the Committee to —

Mr McNarry: Whom do you have in mind, precisely?

Dr Farren: The two Governments, of course.

Mrs Long: Is it not the case that the Committee was formed to scope the issues from the perspective of its members? Its findings will be matters for later negotiation. Members of the Committee are not here to take decisions; they are here to scope the issues, to state their party positions, and to put forward any suggestions. Indeed, members may reach agreement, which would be nice for a change. However, although members may reach agreement in Committee, they then have to negotiate with others to bring about those changes. That is fine, but the Committee is here to scope the issues as they are seen from the perspective of its members.

Mr P Robinson: Otherwise, Seán would have wanted Her Majesty's Government at the strand one negotiations. [Laughter.]

Dr Farren: I would have had no objections to that. The British Government are not essential to the operation of the Assembly and the Executive. They are essential to whether the Assembly and the Executive can operate, but that is a different matter.

Mr Campbell: Of course, for strand three issues, it may be difficult logistically to bring over the Manx Government and the authorities from the Channel Islands.

Dr Farren: At the same time, does the Committee not need to hear the voices of all those who are entitled to be present?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): It may be possible to request submissions from the relevant bodies.

Dr Farren: It may well be.

Mr P Robinson: If the Committee were reaching agreement, that would be a good idea.

Mr McFarland: It is scoping.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The options available to the Committee are that it can call witnesses or it can request papers from relevant bodies.

Dr Farren: To make a useful contribution at the scoping stage, it would not be unhelpful for the Committee to hear the voices of those who could also be involved in the process.

Mr McNarry: Perhaps Seán could leave that suggestion in abeyance until such times as the Committee reaches that point and decides whether it would like to apprise those who could also be involved?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The Committee is not taking decisions. It is suggesting issues that may be discussed. Members do not have to finalise those issues today.

Mr P Robinson: Could the Clerks contact the NIO to ask Minister Hanson to provide them with a copy of his report of the detailed discussions that took place about six to eight months ago with all of the parties? I understood that such a report had been, or was being, prepared. It would cover a lot of those issues, and the Committee might find some useful headings in it.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are members agreed that the Clerks ask whether such a report is available?

Members indicated assent.

Mr P Robinson: We might all want to see it.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): It might be useful to see what has been said.

Members have produced quite a substantial list of issues. As was said at the start of the meeting, time is one of the main factors in putting all of this together. Therefore, perhaps we should move on. Parties can approach the Clerks if they have issues that they want to raise. Alternatively, they can bring them up at next Monday's meeting.

The next item of business is the Secretary of State's draft Programme for Government, which he suggested that the Committee considers. Members discussed it briefly at the last meeting and decided to leave it on the agenda for this meeting.

Mr McNarry: May I propose that the Committee notes the issue.

Mr P Robinson: Chairman, can you continue to keep the topic on the agenda? Am I right to think that the Committee has enough to keep itself going?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The main reason that I can give to keep the item on the agenda is to allow the Clerks adequate time to complete any preparatory work that they need to do in advance of a discussion. Do members have any other issues that they feel should be included?

Mr McFarland: At the last meeting, Seán mentioned timescales. Four debates have been timetabled for 4, 5, 11 and 12 September. As I recall, Seán suggested that, as the Committee is firming up its programme of work, it should, perhaps, give early warning that it might need an extra week or so before it publishes its report.

It would give us a bit of leeway. The economic subgroup has to make its report by 18 August. That seems to be quite tight. You might ask for an extra week or more. If the Committee were to take that decision now, it would allow us to plan better.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Any views? The Secretary of State has indicated that the first debates will take place on 4 and 5 September. That means that the Business Committee would need to be notified by 25 August, and this Committee would have to have its work done before that. Are the parties agreed that we should contact the Secretary of State in relation to having an extra week to draw up the reports?

Mr Murphy: He gave us a directive to establish two subgroups, and we have not done that either. The directives do not seem to matter that much. Regardless of the Secretary of State's schedule, or that of the NIO, if we feel that this is becoming a fruitful exercise then we should take whatever time we need.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Can we advise the Secretary of State that the parties are in agreement that we need an extra week, but still work towards the programme that we have, so as to meet that if possible?

Members indicated assent.

Mr McNarry: The economic subgroup is also looking for an extension. Has it contacted this Committee regarding the process that we have just agreed?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): No.

Mr P Robinson: If things are getting very tight, we could ask the Secretary of State to put back the 24 November deadline. [Laughter.]

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I think that that is beyond the remit of this Committee.

Mr McNarry: On the point that I raised, what is the mechanism? Somewhere in Hansard you are reported as saying that there was flexibility on those dates.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We have noticed all along that the Secretary of State will accommodate this Committee if it has a programme of work. The mechanism would be that the economic subgroup would contact this Committee and ask for an extension of time.

Mr McNarry: Could this Committee write to the economic subgroup?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I will be at the economic subgroup tomorrow, so perhaps we can get the Clerks to deal with it.

Mr McNarry: Will you deal with that, then?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Yes.

Mr McNarry: Thank you.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Moving on, a draft programme of work has been set out by the Clerks. Any comments on that?

Dr Farren: Can we anticipate morning and afternoon sessions next week?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I think that that will probably be necessary if we are to get the business through. We are talking about one day per issue, although there is the possibility of extending into the next day. Look at it on the basis of having a full day. Lunch will be provided in the room. You are not going to get out at all.

Any other business? Do parties want to submit further papers on law and order issues or equality, or are we happy to proceed as we are?

Mr McFarland: We have spent hours and hours, and the issues are there. We should start by going through the same exercise that we have just had, for both policing and justice and the rights issue, of fitting those into some structure in order that they can be discussed.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): If parties want to bring researchers, they can be part of the meeting as well, at the back. Madam Speaker suggested this morning that her adviser might also attend, if members are content with that.

Any other issues?

Mr P Robinson: Did I understand you to say that parties can bring an adviser or researcher?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Each party can bring an adviser or a researcher who can sit at the back. That will afford some continuity of party presence, and it will be of benefit should a party wish to receive advice on any of its papers. That is an additional resource for a party when dealing with a particular item at the Committee on the Preparation for Government.

Mr McFarland: That is a reasonable suggestion, considering that the people attending the Committee are changing, due to the holidays. That gives some parties a degree of continuity, knowing that they can have people in different meetings to keep track of what is going on and being discussed.

Mr P Robinson: That is a sensible decision; I was not aware of it.

COMMITTEE ON THE PREPARATION FOR GOVERNMENT

Wednesday 2 August 2006

Members in attendance for all or part of proceedings:

The Chairman, Mr Jim Wells
Mr Alex Attwood
Mr Wilson Clyde
Mr Fred Cobain
Mr David Ford
Mrs Arlene Foster
Mrs Dolores Kelly
Mrs Naomi Long
Mr Raymond McCartney
Mr Alan McFarland
Mr Conor Murphy
Mr Peter Weir

The Committee met at 10.05 am.

(The Chairman (Mr Wells) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Good morning. I will check on the substitutes, as I see some new faces. I will start with the DUP. What is the line-up this morning, Mrs Foster?

Mrs Foster: Peter Weir will join us before 11.00 am, and Wilson Clyde and I are here instead of the other main players. I am Lord Morrow, and Wilson is Ian Paisley Jnr, so to speak.

Mr McFarland: Mr Kennedy sends apologies; he is on holiday. Mr Cobain is representing Mr McNarry as our policing spokesperson.

Mr Ford: I am me again, and I am expecting Naomi Long shortly.

Mr Attwood: I am Dr Farren.

Mrs D Kelly: I am me.

Mr Murphy: Raymond McCartney is replacing Martin McGuinness, and I am the only other Sinn Féin representative today.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I remind members that the quorum for this Committee is seven. We must be careful not to drift below that number, as we would have to stop immediately.

We do not have minutes to approve today as this is the first meeting of the institutions section of the Committee on the Preparation for Government (PFG). The minutes of this meeting will be carried forward to the next meeting of the PFG in this format.

As there is a relatively high turnover of members, I must ask you to declare any relevant interests.

Mrs Foster: I declare membership of the Northern Ireland Policing Board.

Mr Attwood: Fred Cobain might not want to declare that. [Laughter.]

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Cobain, you may wish to declare at this point.

Mr Cobain: I am also a member of the Northern Ireland Policing Board.

Mrs D Kelly: Alex and I are also members, Mr Chairman.

Mr Ford: I should declare my membership of Antrim District Policing Partnership, and, on Naomi's behalf, declare her membership of Belfast District Policing Partnership.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are no members of the PSNI or intelligence services present? I suspect that they would not declare an interest even if they were here.

Mr Murphy: They are so intelligent that they would not be here. [Laughter.]

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will bring a declaration of interest as an agenda item into each meeting in case new members have something to declare.

Those of you who attended Monday's meeting will know that it was decided that we would not be calling for papers from each party today. Therefore we will move straight into the substantive part of the meeting. I suggest that each party gives a five-minute presentation on the important issues, as it sees them, under the subject headings that are listed. I will call the parties in alphabetical order, with Mr Ford to speak first. After each party has given its views, we will open the question session on their positions. That follows the format that was adopted for the institutional strand of the Committee, but without papers.

Are members content with that as a way to start the ball rolling? I cannot see any other way to start the discussion. Members do not have to deal with every issue on the list — there may be issues that some groups do not want to take part in — but it will be useful to get the ball rolling. I am sure that you are all familiar with the routine: it will be the Alliance Party, DUP, Sinn Féin, SDLP and the Ulster Unionist Party Assembly Group (UUPAG).

Mr McFarland: Does everyone have a copy of the list? It would be quite useful for people fresh to the Committee.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There is a copy in members' folders. It is important that new members have the list in front of them during today's discussion. The topic is "Law and order issues", starting at point 1, which is "Criminality" and ending with point 8, which is "Rule of law".

Mr Murphy: There are two additional issues that are not mentioned, or perhaps they are in a different order.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): “Intelligence Services” and “Community Restorative Justice” have been included. They have been inserted in alphabetical order rather than added to the end of the list.

Mr Ford, are you happy to start the ball rolling and give us the views of the Alliance Party?

Mr Ford: A precedent, Mr Chairman.

With regard to criminality and the rule of law, the Alliance Party, having proposed the Independent Monitoring Commission (IMC), believes that it will have a major role over the coming months in assessing criminality by various organisations. I want to put on record that we think it would be better if that opinion were given by the IMC rather than by Government Ministers doing pre-emptive spin on the IMC. However, there is a significant issue on the rule of law as to whether the Pledge of Office that Ministers are currently required to take is actually a commitment to solely peaceful and democratic means. We believe that the Pledge of Office needs to be strengthened in that respect.

The Alliance Party believes that there are still clearly gaps in current Government proposals on community restorative justice (CRJ). There are merits in CRJ as a system. However, we have major concerns about ensuring that those engaged are fully vetted and about ensuring full co-operation with the police as an institution in the operation of CRJ schemes — in particular how dealing with antisocial behaviour measures, which do not fall within the criminal justice scheme, can be applied by CRJ schemes.

The major issue — the devolution of policing and justice — is, it seems to me, almost an institutional one. As the Alliance Party has made clear, we do not believe that any of the four models proposed by the Government satisfy the need to ensure that the community as a whole engages in policing with the confidence of all parties in the Assembly. That can only be done within a single department of justice, which would cover all devolution issues — and we believe that list of devolution issues is more or less accurate. A single department of justice could only operate across the community with respect if it were covered within the context of collective responsibility within the Executive. We do not believe that the current proposal for power division, or, alternatively, mutual veto in the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister (OFMDFM) style, provides a suitable recipe.

The significant issue of timing appears to have been addressed in the most recent Westminster statement. There is, effectively, the triple lock — a cross-community vote in the Assembly, approval by the Secretary of State and approval by Parliament. This is probably on the basis that we need to see a year or so of reasonable progress before we could be sure that an Executive would be capable of dealing with those matters collectively and with confidence.

Those are the key points as we see them. I have not addressed everything, but I have stuck within the time limit.

10.15 am

The Chairman (Mr Wells): You certainly have. Mrs Foster, would you present the DUP submission?

Mrs Foster: Yes. The DUP sees the IMC as having a role, as Mr Ford mentioned, in relation to the issues of criminality and paramilitarism, but we take a wider view. The Northern Ireland Affairs Committee recently published its report ‘Organised Crime in Northern Ireland’. We will take that into consideration and, indeed, take other soundings on criminality and paramilitarism, because that is a huge issue for the whole community.

Members will be aware that the Government have recently issued a protocol for CRJ. Like the Alliance party, the DUP believes that there are still gaps in that protocol with regard to dealing with recognised schemes. This Committee has the power to call witnesses. They do not have to come — they are not compellable — but it would be useful if somebody from David Hanson’s office could speak to the Committee about community restorative justice from the Government’s point of view. Presumably we will return to the list later, but community restorative justice could very easily be broken down in relation to the protocols that Mr Hanson has issued. He has broken that down, and I will come back to it later.

Devolution of policing and justice is not a time-limited matter for the DUP. It can occur only when there is broad community support for it, and it obviously needs cross-community support within the Assembly. The touchstone for the devolution of powers is confidence in the institutions and their integrity, and that cannot be brought about by a timescale alone. In fact, a prescriptive timescale would have the opposite effect on confidence as the timescale would become the focus and not the institutions and their workings and outworkings.

Rule of law is a primary issue for the DUP. The party had a huge issue with the on-the-run legislation when it was before Parliament because it compromised the rule of law. It strongly believes that any devolution of powers must give primacy to the rule of law.

I notice that the office of the Police Ombudsman for Northern Ireland is not on the list. The DUP would certainly like it to be added to the list so that we can discuss in full its role, remit and accountability, about which we have concerns.

I could obviously go into more detail, but, like David Ford, I will limit my comments for now. We can return to these issues.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mrs Foster has raised two important issues. First, it is entirely within the gift of this Committee to add items or subsections to the law-and-order section such as, for example, the Police Ombudsman's office, which she suggested. Other members are perfectly entitled to do likewise, and we will discuss the matter of calling witnesses later. Mrs Foster suggested that we should invite Mr Hanson to appear before the Committee, and the decision on whether we call expert witnesses and Government Ministers can be taken at a later stage.

To return to our batting order, next to speak is Sinn Féin. Mr Murphy, I assume that you will speak?

Mr Murphy: I will give a brief introduction. The Committee's task is, as its official title suggests, to prepare for Government. Members have different perspectives on that; some see its purpose as simply to scope issues. Engaging in more focused work on the issues that the Committee has identified provides an opportunity to resolve some of those issues. Thus the policing and justice issue presents an opportunity for parties to find some sense of agreement or to explain positions that rule out agreement.

Given that this is the Preparation for Government Committee, the devolution of policing and justice powers is a key issue. Although we have made progress on negotiations on policing and justice matters since the Good Friday Agreement, Sinn Féin's stance is that it wants to see the Patten package completed. Sinn Féin wants a time frame for the transfer of powers, agreement on the departmental model and the powers to be transferred, and it wants the British Government to enact the necessary legislation to transfer the powers to a local Assembly and into all-Ireland arrangements.

There is also an issue with regard to the role of British intelligence services in the North and their impact on the proper accountability mechanisms that must be built in to policing.

Therefore there are issues around that, and no doubt the Committee will address them. I see that as one of the priorities given that this is a Committee on the Preparation for Government.

Members have listed issues such as criminality, decommissioning and paramilitarism, and Sinn Féin is happy to discuss those items if members wish to. We have expressed our view that devolution could be restored tomorrow morning and that there are no issues outstanding which would preclude the re-establishment of the institutions. The issues listed here could be dealt with as that is happening. Those relating to loyalist activity and loyalist weapons are of concern to the community that I represent, but no issue is so great as to prevent the immediate reinstatement of the institutions.

We had a lengthy exchange — some might say interrogation — with the DUP and other parties about criminality, decommissioning and paramilitarism. We would like to ask other parties, particularly the DUP, about the weapons of Ulster Resistance and the influence that the DUP may have with that organisation in putting weapons out of circulation and out of action.

There has been an unfortunate, misplaced and politically-orientated hysteria around the operation of CRJ. Not only has CRJ been well able to defend itself and stand up for its own record, but it has been evaluated and assessed by justice oversight mechanisms which have found that to be so. It has also been assessed by human rights agencies, which have found that its methods stand up to scrutiny. However, Sinn Féin is happy to talk about CRJ, and if people want to call witnesses, we will be prepared to talk to them.

One must bear in mind the time frame for the Committee's work and deliberations. That might mitigate against getting into a series of witnesses, because inevitably one person's evidence will spark the need for balance and for other witnesses to be called. However, if that is how the Committee wants to proceed, then we will consider it.

There is a broad range of items under "Law and order issues", and today's meeting will be useful in ordering them. Some of the eight items are practically the same, and there is significant overlap. Today's meeting should be useful in arranging them, as we did on Monday with "Institutional issues".

This section of the Committee — given that it is not a subgroup because the DUP would not partake in a subgroup to deal with policing and justice or the institutions — should proceed with putting the items in the order in which they should be addressed.

Given that this is the Committee on the Preparation for Government, devolution and all related issues should be high on the agenda.

Mr Attwood: One anticipates that there will be a significant difference of opinion on the eight items — or maybe there are more than eight now. However, the SDLP feels that the Committee may come to a greater agreement on some items when they are probed than is expected. I will concentrate on the "Devolution of policing and justice" and the "Intelligence services".

The Patten report recommended two approaches to national security: first, that MI5 take primacy in 2007, which the British have adopted; secondly, that the Chief Constable of the PSNI report to the Secretary of State, or a possible successor body, on national security matters. The SDLP would like to discuss with members why the second recommendation is the better option for the North. If MI5 takes primacy on national security, there will be risks around lack of accountability, mission creep and control. The preferred model is one in which the PSNI retains responsibility for national security and all other intelligence. That is the best way of sustaining policing and political confidence, and it is something that people around this table can sign up to.

I was interested to hear Jeffrey Donaldson MP MLA, on behalf of the DUP on the Floor of the House of Commons during St Patrick's week, asking some probing questions of the British Government Minister at that time about his concerns on the proposed primacy role being given to MI5 in the North.

The second issue on which we can make useful progress is the devolution of policing and justice. That is in the paper that the SDLP will submit. We outline several principles to govern that matter. We believe that parties round the table can sign up to those principles in order to inform the nature and structure of the devolution of justice, if and when that arises.

Included in those principles is the requirement that there be no encroachment upon the Patten policing institutions by any other models of devolution of justice that might be introduced; that there would be devolution, not just into strand one, but into strand two, given that there is a range of all-Ireland justice issues that are of concern to everyone around the table; that there would be cross-community safeguards in respect of sensitive devolved powers, such as the removal of the 50/50 requirement or the power of the Chief Constable to challenge a decision of the Parades Commission.

There are several other principles, which we believe form the correct basis on which to conduct a conversation on policing and justice and which, to a greater or lesser extent, parties can sign up to.

We welcome having that hard and heavy conversation as soon as possible, because there is more that we can agree on than is indicated by the public positions that one or all of us have taken from time to time.

The third matter that I want to raise is policing, which, I recognise, is more limited. Given what the Secretary of State said in his Glenties speech, and other things that are being speculated on, there is a danger that, with regard to policing in the North, we are heading towards a situation in which there are two legitimacies. That is: the legitimacy of the new policing arrangements to which all the parties subscribed; and some other legitimacy, in which one party does not sign up to those institutions and has a different approach when it comes to relationships with the police and signing up to lawful authority and the rule of law.

That is a strategic threat to that part of the Good Friday Agreement, which, over the past few years, has worked best: namely, the policing arrangements. More fundamentally, however, it destabilises not just the prospect of the restoration of the institutions, but their sustainability thereafter. Though that is a limited point, given the range of views around the table, it is one that this Committee needs to resolve. That is why I concur with the DUP that we should call witnesses — though not in large numbers — including the Secretary of State, so that we can probe what he meant in his Glenties speech, and representatives of MI5. I would prefer to hear someone from London, but if not, then Richard Dennis.

Mr McFarland: As you do. [Laughter.] Eliza, get your stuff ready.

Mr Attwood: If she is willing to come. Assuming that she is not going to come — although she might surprise us — then I would want to hear from Richard Dennis, who is the head of MI5 in the North.

The party has a draft paper on all of these matters, but given that you are not compelling us to hand it over, Mr Chairman, it will be submitted in the next couple of weeks. I concentrated on those two or three issues because there is useful work that we can do. I am not diluting issues that others have talked about.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Thank you, Mr Attwood. That witness session would certainly be an interesting one, if ever it comes about. The Press Gallery will be packed.

Mr McFarland: I was much encouraged by Monday's meeting, in which, for the very first time, we had first elevens from each party. I am equally encouraged today, because it looks as if everyone is sitting down for the first time ready to discuss policing.

I want to take a quick look at how my party sees the current situation on some of the issues.

10.30 am

The last IMC report stated that the republican leadership appeared to be serious but that there was still a level of criminality in the organisation. Martin McGuinness and Gerry Adams were then challenged on the issue of criminality in various forums. Their response was that the authorities should deal with it, and that was encouraging. Shortly after that, there were raids in south Armagh. I will not go into detail on that, as we have had that discussion, and the case is still presumably before the courts.

However, a fortnight ago a report by the Organised Crime Task Force confirmed that there had been a reduction in republican criminality. That too is encouraging. Nonetheless, we will have to await the publication of the next IMC report on normalisation at the beginning of September, as that will include a threat assessment. That will be followed by another IMC report at the beginning of October. Last week, the Secretary of State said that criminality and republican paramilitarism had gone. He was perhaps slightly over-enthusiastic in his assessment, but, no doubt, the IMC will inform us in due course.

The DUP raised the issue of decommissioning in its original submission, and that is why it appears on the list. We have on record that William McCrea and Ian Paisley Jnr accepted that decommissioning had taken place, but the IMC report stated that some part of the IRA had held weapons back. Martin McGuinness and Conor Murphy denied that. However, I was taken aback by a recent report in the 'Sunday Tribune' that the south Derry IRA had left, taking with it the cache of weapons that it had held back. Perhaps that will account for those weapons that had been held back. If so, presumably the next IMC report will state that those weapons are now outwith the organisation. We will have to wait and see.

We need to address the issue of where the IRA is going. If it turns itself into a republican legion that meets every Tuesday to tell war stories, that is fine. However, if it is to remain as a fully functioning army, albeit without its weapons, we must question why it should remain in existence in that format, given what the leadership tells us. It will be useful to see movement or to have an idea of where the IRA is going, because it directly impinges on the issue of policing and armies existing in the state. The fact that there may be a second army running around excites the Republic. It is an issue that will affect policing and justice here.

The last take that we had on the devolution of policing and justice was the comprehensive agreement. William McCrea said that it is the DUP's document, and everyone else should get their hands off it. Minister Hanson said in the House of Commons that the Government would deliver it in the autumn. Peter Robinson said in the Assembly that that was not the case, and I think he confirmed that on Monday. Therefore there is some confusion, but it is worth reminding ourselves of Sinn Féin's statement on the comprehensive agreement, which read:

"As a result of our discussions we now have a commitment from the British Government and the DUP to the transfer of powers on policing and justice to the Assembly as soon as possible, a DUP commitment to a speedy, time framed discussion on the departmental model and the powers to be transferred with a view to agreement by the time the Executive is established".

I think that was in December, and the modalities were discussed in February, according to the timetable. It was encouraging that there was a speedy intent at some sort of discussion on the issue.

I wish to cover the intelligence services briefly. Part of the reason we are discussing this is due to the fact that the SDLP has spent the past four years complaining bitterly about Special Branch, what a ghastly organisation it was, and how intelligence handling should be removed from Special Branch immediately, because it was a force within a force. No doubt, the Government listened to the SDLP, as they usually do, and decided to transfer intelligence gathering on republicans outside Special Branch.

Is the SDLP surprised, given all its shouting and demands, that the Government have decided to move intelligence handling somewhere else? It has gone to MI5, partly because it is hard to get one's head round the prospect of Gerry Kelly as minister for policing and justice overseeing a police service handling republican informants. There are logical reasons why it has gone to the intelligence services.

Community restorative justice was an issue when I sat on the Policing Board with Mr Cobain, as it was for other colleagues on the first Policing Board. Various organisations spoke to us. Community restorative justice continues to be an extremely vexed issue, and it is still not right. No doubt we will have healthy discussions on that.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I thank everyone for being so succinct and keeping to time. We are in danger of becoming a well-organised Committee. I am sure that somebody will sort that out.

We have suggestions for new sub-headings. Some interesting points have been raised, and some extremely interesting suggestions for witnesses. We have the basis for some probing questions on those presentations.

Mrs Foster has already indicated that she wishes to ask a question. Does anyone else want to come in at this stage?

Is everyone happy? That is unusual.

Mr McFarland: The suggestion that we need to sort these into some sort of order is quite useful.

Mrs Foster: I want to pick up on some of the comments that were made after I spoke, Chairman, if that is in order.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes. Obviously members took the opportunity to come back on the various presentations. It is only right that you get a chance to answer. I am surprised that no one wants to follow Mrs Foster.

Mrs Foster: I am sure that they will. Alex Attwood is right about the Secretary of State's Glenties speech; dangers present themselves from the distinction that he is trying to create between "constitutional" and "practical" arrangements. It would be worthwhile to hear his thinking. Sometimes he makes these statements and it is hard to clarify where he is coming from. There are inherent dangers if he is suggesting that Sinn Féin can involve itself in what he would call practical support, but not constitutional support, for the police.

In relation to paramilitarism, loyalism and republicanism, a member of the PUP is now sitting on the Policing Board. That does not mean that the UVF is not involved in criminality and paramilitarism, and that needs to be brought out into the open. Just because a party takes its position on the Policing Board does not inherently mean that that party supports policing and justice, and that must be discussed.

Alan McFarland mentioned comments made by colleagues in the Committee about decommissioning. The DUP has accepted that decommissioning took place. However, the manner in which it took place did not bring about the maximum amount of confidence in the community as a whole — that has always been our position. Recent reports from Scotland suggest that weapons are being sold. Therefore, we still say that decommissioning remains an issue because of the lack of confidence surrounding the event that took place some time ago.

Alan McFarland also referred to the comprehensive agreement. The deputy leader of the DUP made it clear where the party stands on that matter. He stated on Monday that the comprehensive agreement was not signed up to by his party or Sinn Féin. Alan quoted from the Sinn Féin document, so it is unlikely that the DUP would have had any input into that.

Mr Attwood: I have a few brief comments. Although the issue of loyalism, raised by Arlene Foster, is already included under the broader subject of paramilitarism, it should be put firmly on the agenda. The various loyalist-related public displays and activities in recent days, the speculation about the UVF and whatever is going on between the British Government and elements within loyalism mean that there is the potential to be productive on issues surrounding loyalism, if they are properly handled. Conversely, loyalism may endure and ultimately destabilise the restored institutions because of what loyalists may, or may not, get up to.

I am also concerned that the loyalist display of strength over the weekend provided evidence that, despite organisations saying that they are going out of business, they maintain their power base and retain their ability to impose their will or culture of control in their communities, something that is not necessarily restricted to loyalist groupings. The broader issue, and the future of loyalism in particular, should concern us.

Alan commented on the SDLP's efforts in relation to Special Branch. The question is not whether there should be a Special Branch, because Patten said that there should be; rather, it is about the nature of intelligence gathering and the management and accountability of any Special Branch or intelligence branch within the Police Service of Northern Ireland. Due to the work on the Stevens, Blakey and Crompton

Reports by Alan McFarland and others on the Policing Board, the Oversight Commissioner has said that:

"Intelligence standards now comply with best international practice".

Although high vigilance must be maintained on intelligence matters, there is no doubt that many corners have been turned, including the deactivation of very large numbers of agents.

Accountability has increased and the standard of intelligence gathering has been raised to an international level. Yet MI5, which has no such standards or accountability, will have primacy over intelligence gathering in the North. Even a senior MI5 operative conceded to me at a meeting in the NIO that there was a danger of mission creep, whereby MI5 would realise that given the unique criminal and terror world in the North —

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Sorry, Alex. Will you explain what "mission creep" means?

Mr Attwood: MI5, the police and anyone who looks at the North realises that the situation here is unique because the threat to national security and the criminal threat both emanate from the same source. The view of the British Government is that the threat to the stability of the state emanates from republican groups that are also involved in crime. Consequently, intelligence that emanates from the criminal side of an organisation's enterprise gives an insight into the national security threat that it poses and vice versa.

Therefore, there is a need for a joined-up intelligence approach in the North. As a result of the work of the Policing Board and the various reports that have been produced, the PSNI has begun to adopt such an approach by applying the best standards to intelligence gathering and accessing that intelligence, wherever it may be, within the criminal and terror organisations.

The danger is that MI5, which was intended to have a strictly national security responsibility, will quickly realise that in order to understand what is happening within the organisation that carries the national security threat, it is also necessary to gather intelligence from the criminal side of that organisation — and indeed MI5 already knows that.

Mission creep happens when MI5 does not restrict itself to gathering intelligence on the national security threat but broadens its intelligence base to access information from the criminal side of the organisations, because that is where information relating to the national security threat may arise. When that happens MI5 will begin to crowd into the area for which the British Government propose that the PSNI should have exclusive responsibility, namely gathering intelligence on the criminal side.

That is the danger and the risk. On a positive note, the views and concerns of the DUP, Sinn Féin and members of the Policing Board on that can be worked through, and we can arrive at a far better place.

10.45 am

I want to echo some of the concerns raised about restorative justice. The protocol deals inadequately with some issues and fails to deal with many others. By a happy coincidence, the life of the Preparation for Government Committee may mirror the life of the consultation period for restorative justice. This Committee will be discussing restorative justice at the same time as the British Government are consulting on their protocol. There is justified hysteria about restorative justice, and a weight of evidence about bad practice. Over the past 10 days, many commentators have stated that we must get restorative justice right.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): If there were to be a question about “mission creep” on a TV quiz show, I would be able to answer it. [Laughter.] It might take me two hours, mind you.

Mr Ford: The issues highlighted by Arlene and Alex are significant for all parties and several organisations. The issues have significant relevance for two of the groups on this Committee. I look forward to all parties, including Sinn Féin, playing a constructive role in future policing. We must examine that role in relation to participation in the institutions and respect for the rule of law and the Police Service. For example, the Alliance Party is not represented on the Policing Board, but it fully respects the position of the PSNI as being the legitimate institution maintaining the rule of law in Northern Ireland. On the other hand, the PUP has a representative in the institutions, but I doubt whether its associates fully respect the rule of law as I, and most people, understand it. We must examine attitudes towards the institutional side of participation, which is why I initially flagged up the matter of the ministerial Pledge of Office. The Pledge of Office covers only Ministers, but many other people should also be covered.

There are differences between loyalist and republican paramilitaries in relation to the intelligence services. Alex said that the national security threat and the criminal threat share the same position. I am not sure that that is the view of the British Government, given the manner in which they deal with loyalist crime. Loyalist paramilitaries are not seen as a threat to national security, although they are, potentially, a destabilising threat in Northern Ireland. If the Police Service is left to deal with all matters relating to loyalist crime, and MI5 deals with republican criminal activity, there will be major concerns about all sections of society being treated equally in demanding respect for the rule of law. That issue could be teased out with the Secretary of State and the head of MI5 — when they turn up.

Mr McFarland: I want to clarify the expression “mission creep”. Your mission is to take a glass of water to the door. You get halfway around the room when somebody says: “Will you open the window on your way out?” You open the window and are halfway between the window and the door when somebody says: “Will you take the jug out with you and fill it up with water?” The basic idea is that you have an original mission and, as you embark on it, the mission grows.

Mr Ford: That is the difference between a lawyer and a soldier.

Mr Murphy: We could have a broad general discussion on all these topics. One of the drawbacks of having a Hansard report is that members feel obliged to set the record straight because it will be read in the future. I would prefer that we got down to identifying specific areas for discussion. We can go round and round, restating our positions on a range of topics, but most of the parties’ positions are well known.

It is time that we got to work on them.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There have been various suggested additions and amendments to the list. Perhaps this is an appropriate time to seek agreement on those. We can then move on to the matter of witnesses, which Mr Attwood and Mrs Foster have already raised.

Mrs Foster: Mr Chairman, do you believe that some issues on that list could be linked? I have added to the list, but perhaps members could try to make it more succinct.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): First, are there any glaring omissions? Secondly, can we combine some of the items? Do we wish to create sub-headings?

Mr Attwood: If Arlene has concerns about the Police Ombudsman, that topic should be incorporated under the “Policing” heading, rather than be a dedicated one.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mrs O’Loan would be keen to state that her office is entirely separate from the policing institutions, and that she heads a completely independent body. However, we could certainly create a “Policing/Police Ombudsman” heading.

Mrs Foster: I have no difficulty with those items being linked, despite the accountability mechanisms being completely different.

Mr McFarland: Mr Chairman, may I tease something out? Colleagues will know that this list was produced from issues that the parties raised during their opening submissions. Criminality, decommissioning and paramilitarism are fairly clear; those matters were raised by the DUP. The SDLP raised the matter of the intelligence services. Community restorative justice (CRJ) was raised as a common issue. The devolution of policing and justice is obviously part of the modalities.

However, the matters of the rule of law and policing — other than where they are bound up with criminality and the general acceptance of policing — are not clear. In particular, Sinn Féin is the only party that does not accept policing or the police. What does “rule of law” mean in that context?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Alliance Party specifically wanted the heading of “Rule of law” to be included. Members took the principled decision that if a party thought a matter was important, it was included. We did not argue that point.

Mr Ford: The Alliance Party raised the rule of law as one of the topics that were covered early on. That does not necessarily mean that it wishes to highlight it as an individual issue. I suspect that it may well be bound up with criminality in the context of any meaningful discussion.

Mr McFarland: Logically, we can do that. I believe that the Police Ombudsman is a separate issue because it concerns oversight, which has been a running issue for a number of years. That matter could fit in at item 8. The other items are fairly clear in that they have a particular slant on the discussion and have particular issues attached to them.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Before Mr Weir speaks, I wish to point out that we received a declaration of interest from each member at the beginning of the meeting. Mr Weir, I think that you may have something to declare.

Mr Weir: Apart from my genius? [Laughter.]

Presumably, that declaration is that I am a member of the Northern Ireland Policing Board.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are you also a member of a district policing partnership (DPP)?

Mr Weir: No. The two positions are mutually exclusive, as I believe Dolores Kelly can attest. I believe that she had to resign from a DPP in order to join the Policing Board.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I am sorry that I had to ask for that declaration, but it was an important step before you make your first contribution.

Mr Weir: I take on board the points that have been raised by my colleague Arlene Foster, by Alan McFarland and by David Ford. On the matter of combining issues, if the rule of law were included with criminality, it is important — as the Alliance Party and others were driving at — that there must be an acceptance by all parties of the rule of law and, indeed, support for the police and the institutions of the law. On one level, that is a slightly separate issue than simply not being involved in criminality, although it can certainly be linked to criminality. Those two matters are inter-related, but it may be helpful to combine them.

Members should not feel restricted to the eight issues listed, if they can think of additional matters. There has not been any discussion on the order of dealing with the items or, indeed, whether we call witnesses. I presume that the topics are simply in alphabetical order at this stage?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes. The order is no indication of importance at all. The topics are simply in alphabetical order.

Mr Ford: Peter Weir’s suggestion has been helpful. We have talked in the past about matters such as a “culture of lawfulness”, which means slightly more than “not criminality”. Moreover, Peter used the word “parties”, and we have emphasised that “Paramilitarism” is not simply a republican issue; it affects society in general.

Mrs Foster: I am loath to lose “Rule of law” from the list, because that is the most fundamental of all the law and order issues. It underlies most of what we shall discuss. If members want to remove it from the list, that is all very well, but, for us, the rule of law is the most fundamental building block in all of this.

Mr Ford: I was attempting to be helpful in agreeing with your colleague that we made the heading “Criminality/Rule of law”, and “Rule of law” was removed somewhere along the way.

Mrs Foster: My point is that we could have “Rule of law/Paramilitarism”, “Rule of law/Policing”, or even “Rule of law/Everything”. The rule of law underlies everything before us. We have not really talked about the criminal justice system in any meaningful way this morning. Obviously, the rule of law also underlies that. I am loath to lose “Rule of law” from the list.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We must have consensus, so it is worth saying, Mrs Foster, that if you maintain that position, “Rule of law” will stay on the list. I just want to point that out, Mr Ford.

Mr Ford: I was seeking to assist the Committee in shortening the list. No doubt, even in this slightly different format, the Committee will continue to be as creative as usual in covering topics.

Mr Weir: The list’s length does not matter greatly as long as the topics are being covered. It does not matter ultimately whether issues are grouped. If we end up with a list of 14 issues, we will cover the 14 issues. We could group exactly the same number of issues under three or four different headings, but the same amount of work has to be done one way or the other, and the same number of topics is to be covered.

It is not overly helpful to get too fixated with having a short list; what is important is that the topics get covered.

Mr Murphy: My suggestion is along similar lines. At Monday's Committee sitting, we agreed a couple of broad, generic headings for the institutional issues, with sub-headings underneath those.

It strikes me that there are a number of issues. One is around the issue of devolution, and there are issues that come under that heading, including intelligence. Then there is the broad issue that members are calling "Rule of law", and all the issues that fit into that. Separate issues may be the Ombudsman's Office and community restorative justice.

If we could agree, the Committee could discuss a broad topic, under which would be a number of sub-headings, at its next meeting, and take a day to deal with that topic. If we were to take a list of eight headings, there would be a substantial amount of overlap, and one day's business would drift into another day's or would revisit a previous meeting's discussions. It might be more helpful to proceed as we did on Monday, where three or four broad, generic headings were agreed, under which members were happy to have a list of sub-headings that they wished to see included.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I sat in on Monday's sitting, and the way in which the matter was dealt with by that Committee, which is this Committee but with a very different membership, was very useful.

Before I call Mr McFarland, it is worth saying that if the fear is that the Chairman will not allow for debate some burning issue that a member or a party wishes to raise because it is not on the list, Mr Molloy and I both gave an assurance at last week's meeting that that would not happen. If an issue is related to law and order, it will be ruled admissible, so no one will be restricted.

To follow on from Mr Murphy's comments, once we agree headings, we will try to insert the sub-headings. That was done much more easily at Monday's sitting, because the parties had given their views in writing on what the sub-headings should be. We do not have views in writing before us today, but we do have the opportunity to discuss the matter now.

Mr McFarland: We agreed on Monday that a useful template was to dig out the Belfast Agreement, because it contained headings for the institutions. I wonder whether the agreement contains headings for policing and justice. Do we have a copy handy?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will soon find out for you.

Mr McFarland: The agreement may only contain one heading, in which case it will not be helpful. However, the agreement proved quite useful in providing headings for institutional changes, because it divided up the institutions into bite-sized chunks, as it were.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will look at that for you, Mr McFarland.

Mr McFarland: Does it have sub-headings under which each of these might readily fall?

11.00 am

Mr Weir: The problem with many law and order issues is that because the agreement essentially set up the Patten inquiry, they were put on the long finger. Many law and order issues will not be mentioned at all.

Mrs Foster: Can we have three sub-headings? The generic term "Policing" would cover policing and the Police Ombudsman. The second generic term "Rule of law" would cover criminality, paramilitarism, decommissioning and community restorative justice.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Can you take it slowly? It is good stuff, but we are trying to write it down.

Mrs Foster: The third heading would be "Devolution of policing and justice", which would include the intelligence services.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Has everyone been able to —

Mrs Foster: That is all the subheadings that I have to suggest.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are those suggestions simply vehicles for discussion?

Mrs Foster: Yes.

Mr McFarland: Might CRJ not fit more readily under policing as an issue or is it essentially a paramilitary issue?

Mrs Foster: I have no firm views about under which heading it might fit.

Mr McFarland: It could fit under one or the other; it depends on how it is viewed.

Mr Weir: It depends on whether it is viewed a paramilitary issue.

Mrs Foster: It could be viewed as a rule of law issue.

Mr Ford: Is there an argument, on the basis of what Mr Attwood was saying, for making CRJ a stand-alone item, given the significance of the consultation taking place on it?

Mrs Foster: We could have four sub-headings.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do members have any comments? Remember, we have to reach consensus.

Mrs Long: I wish to declare an interest: I am a member of Belfast District Policing Partnership.

What specific sub-headings were suggested under "Policing"?

Mrs Foster: "Policing", which was at number 7; and the "Police Ombudsman".

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do members have any suggestions on that position? Do they feel that it might prejudice their position? We went through this same routine on Monday, which I found very helpful.

Mr McFarland: Is everyone happy with CRJ? It makes sense to have it as a stand-alone issue, as it would be possible to deal with it and produce a sub-report on it that relates directly to the consultation period. That would save it getting caught up in other issues.

Mr Raymond McCartney: I do not understand why CRJ should be seen as a separate issue from the devolution of policing and justice. We could say that MI5 and criminality should be under one sub-heading.

Mr McFarland: It was a purely practical suggestion.

Mr Raymond McCartney: There is a danger of people weighting the issues in a particular way. The suggestion that CRJ should be in a sub-heading with paramilitarism shows the intention of some people. I cannot understand why CRJ should be a stand-alone issue.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Where should CRJ be placed?

Mr Raymond McCartney: It could go under “Devolution of policing and justice”.

Mr Ford: I suggested that CRJ should stand alone because I saw it not just as an issue of paramilitarism. It is not the same as devolution, which is more to do with the institutional issues. CRJ concerns a range of issues, but because it is a hot topic — and Mr Attwood mentioned the consultation period — I suggested that it stand alone.

Mr Attwood: It is hard to find the best place to put CRJ. If we put it under “Policing”, we will create a sense that CRJ is a policing project, which it is certainly not meant to be. Also, it does not sit naturally under the heading “Devolution of policing and justice”. I agree with Raymond that putting it under the heading “Rule of law and criminality” would make it very loaded, so that is not the place in which to put it.

A fourth category could be created: some justice issues need to be flagged up.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr McCartney’s view is that there should not be a separate category.

Mr Attwood: Such a category would be for justice issues and could include restorative justice.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is a possible way forward.

Mr Attwood: There are some residual items. A fourth category could obviate any difficulties that might be created by making CRJ a stand-alone item, as Mr McCartney put it, and would integrate it into something broad, which is more appropriate.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Everyone seems to be happy with that compromise.

Mrs Foster: I suggested that “Intelligence services” should go under the heading “Devolution of policing and justice”, but I wonder whether it should go under the heading “Policing issues”.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes.

Mrs Foster: Therefore the first category would be “Policing issues” and would cover policing itself, the Police Ombudsman and the intelligence services.

Mr Murphy: It will be a burning issue in the devolution of policing and justice. However, as you say, where issues are formally listed does not preclude their being raised under other headings. This issue is very relevant to the transfer of powers: in fact, it will be key to the transfer of powers.

Because issues are in one box or another does not prevent them from being raised during discussions on policing. The issue fits into both categories, and there will be a degree of overlap in some topics that will have an impact across a broad range of areas.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It might be worth putting on record that we have moved various items back and forth. As things stands, the first heading will be “Policing issues” and will include the intelligence services, the Police Ombudsman and policing itself.

The second heading will be “Rule of law” and will include criminality, paramilitarism and decommissioning.

The third is “Devolution of policing and justice”, which will include justice and CRJ.

Mrs Foster: CRJ is a separate issue.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is correct. It has been scribbled out.

Mrs Foster: Under the sub-heading “Justice”, you could put residual justice issues.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do we have agreement on the content so that it can be minuted and so that we know exactly where we stand on each strand of issues? We will then need to prioritise them.

Mrs Foster: Will a new list be issued?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes. A new list will be sent out.

We need to prioritise the issues in order of importance — those, presumably, with which we will want to deal first. That will concentrate our minds on the witnesses that we may need to call for each section. It might be more difficult to reach agreement on that. Which is the priority: policing, the rule of law, devolution of policing and justice, or justice?

Mr Murphy: I made the point in my initial submission that, since we are the Preparation for Government Committee, devolution should be given priority, although I accept that all the issues are important. We can discuss the rule of law, but we could end up spending six and a half hours restating the Sinn Féin position and more than four hours restating the DUP position. That can be useful, but in order to get work done we should hone issues on which there is likely to be some agreement among the parties, and the devolution of policing and justice is the most likely to offer opportunities for resolving issues.

Mr McFarland: There are some issues into which the Committee can have direct input because all five parties are represented; there are others on which we would wish to state our opinions but on which the Committee's direct effect is less. That may influence our thinking.

Logically, we would pick the easiest issues, agree them and stash them away. Unfortunately, these issues are neuralgic, and I am not sure that we will get any quick fixes.

As Conor said, rather than restating party positions, which are noted in the Hansard reports of the first month and a half of meetings, it is a question of deciding what the Committee can usefully do to make a difference.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Can the other parties give their views on this?

Mr Attwood: As was said at the beginning, the SDLP thinks that common positions can be found on the devolution of policing and justice and intelligence services. Given that that potential exists, the SDLP would like the devolution of policing and justice to be dealt with first. Thereafter, the SDLP is not dogmatic about where the Committee should go. Policing and intelligence services seem to be the natural second topic, and, as I said, the SDLP is relaxed about what should be discussed third and fourth.

The four categories are useful. Given the time frame to which the Committee is working, the categories show a natural order and a realistic amount of work.

Mr Ford: Like the SDLP, the Alliance Party is fairly relaxed on this. However, there is logic in Conor's comments that, as this is the Committee on the Preparation for Government, the institutional links between the Monday discussions and the devolution of policing and justice indicate that it would be logical to deal with those issues first. I will certainly not veto other members' thoughts on what should happen after that.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Three parties are in favour of discussing the devolution of policing and justice first. It will be interesting to see whether the Committee reaches consensus on this.

Mrs Foster: This is where the wheels come off.
[Laughter.]

I have already stated that rule of law is the DUP's priority. Other parties might believe that the devolution of policing and justice is the most important item on the list, but the DUP cannot subscribe to that. However, if the Committee is trying to agree a work plan, without prioritising the issues, that is a different matter. I do not want it to be recorded that Arlene Foster felt that the rule of law was less important than the devolution of policing and justice. Therefore, to me, prioritisation is the issue. I want to clarify that.

Mr Ford: In my presentation this morning, I did not suggest anything other than that the rule of law was very important — it was the first thing that I highlighted. However, formulating a work plan is not the same as overall prioritisation.

Mrs Foster: Yes, I am just clarifying that because the Chairman initially said that members were to prioritise. If that is the case, the rule of law would be the DUP's top priority.

Mr Weir: Our particular reason for highlighting this is that if the Committee is considering these issues to prepare for government — the reason that the Committee was created — the DUP regards acceptance of the rule of law and support for policing institutions as fundamental and of key significance to preparation for government.

From a timetabling point of view, the DUP can be flexible as to where issues are slotted in. However, although the Committee has a reasonable amount of time, if there are opportunities to agree a broad view, there may be merit in having a debate on restorative justice, on which there has, at least, been consultation.

It depends on future discussions, but I would caution members that if they think that the devolution of policing and justice will be an easy issue to crack, they are being overly optimistic. There may not be the consensus that members expect.

Mrs Foster: The second issue that I want to address is that, if the Committee is to call witnesses, Committee staff will need some time to set up those meetings. Members do not want to be here next Wednesday without the witnesses that they felt should attend. I do not know how long those arrangements would take.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Members will need to take a decision on that today.

Mr McFarland: Chairman, you will be aware that a key element of the initial submissions from the UUP and DUP was that it is difficult to see any progress being made without an end to criminality and paramilitarism and an acceptance of policing, by republicans in particular. That remains the case, and until an IMC report is published that says that those issues have been sorted out, it is difficult to see how discussions on policing will progress seriously.

11.15 am

Having said all that, I return to the point of whether it would be more useful for the Committee to attempt to tease out the issues on which the parties can have some influence, rather than the parties simply restating their positions on activities that, pending the IMC's reporting that they have stopped, will continue to block the devolution of policing. It would be wrong to think that, because the Committee is trying to deal with issues on which it can do proper work, those issues take priority; clearly they do not.

Party positions on the background to this are recorded in Hansard. The question is, would the Committee be better off spending its time examining new issues on which it could have some practical bearing in the event of the conditions for the devolution of policing and justice being right?

Mrs Long: I reiterate that as far as the Alliance party is concerned, the rule of law is the foundation on which all the other structures will be built. Whatever the architecture for devolution of policing and justice, the transition must be built on a foundation whereby everybody has a similar view as to what the rule of law entails and concept of what justice and policing are about. It must be a shared definition because, when policing and justice are devolved, there will be a degree of collective responsibility for them. It is important that that be established. Putting it further down the list in no way diminishes its importance. As far as the Alliance Party is concerned, it is the key that will unlock the whole issue.

Alan McFarland talked about criminality "by republicans in particular". I am not sure why that should be the case. His Assembly party has structural links to armed, active paramilitary organisations, so it seems ludicrous to suggest that only republicans need to address the issues of paramilitarism and criminality. The Committee needs to consider paramilitarism and criminal activity across the board.

The point was made that republican paramilitarism could be viewed as a threat to national security, but both loyalist and republican criminality and paramilitarism have a destabilising effect on Northern Ireland. Also, those activities have a negative effect on local people and a huge bearing on the effectiveness of policing across the community. Members need to go into this with open minds and balanced viewpoints, not in finger-pointing mode, which would not be constructive.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I will allow Mr McFarland to answer that.

Mr McFarland: The reason I was —

Mrs D Kelly: Sorry, Chairman, but my point was essentially the same. Members have sat here for over an hour and have yet to hear one mention of loyalist paramilitarism from the Ulster Unionist Party. That causes grave concern, given the level of activity by loyalist paramilitaries, not only in Belfast but across the North.

Mr McFarland: There is no doubt that loyalist and republican paramilitarism needs to be sorted out, but members need to remember why we are here. We are members of a Preparation for Government Committee. We are not in Government trying to sort this out. Sinn Féin is the only party with its own private army that could end up in Government.

Mrs D Kelly: What about the UUPAG?

Mrs Long: I must contend that my point was that your Assembly group now has a direct link, through the PUP, to the UVF. Therefore, it is not sufficient to say that Sinn Féin is the only party at the table with a direct link to paramilitarism. That needs to be recognised. The UUP has gained benefits from its link to the PUP, but there will also be disbenefits, including the link that it now has to the UVF.

Mr McFarland: The Committee has spent five hours on this, with the Alliance Party getting very exercised. We went through it in enormous detail.

Mrs Long: It clearly has not sunk in.

Mr McFarland: The ins and outs are all in here. If you want to have a row, we can have a row.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We are discussing the prioritisation of topics.

Mr McFarland: The reason I said "in particular" was that Sinn Féin "in particular" might be going into Government.

Mr Ford: Will Alan McFarland confirm that by that statement he means that he does not expect the UUPAG to be in Government?

Mr McFarland: Nobody is going into Government until this Committee sorts out what is happening. These are not issues at the moment, but when the time comes, we will see whether they are. My point is that —

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Things were going too smoothly, so that was bound to end. Let us get back to the issue.

Mrs Foster: For clarity, and to bring the discussion back on track, we are not talking about priorities; we are talking about a work plan.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): "Priorities" was perhaps the wrong word; "sequencing" would have been better.

Mr Attwood: To emphasise Arlene's point, the rule of law and the acceptance of democracy are the parents of this. Everything arises and flows from those.

Therefore any work plan is not meant to make any issue any less of a priority.

Alan talked about the business of this Committee, but we should also consider what is happening in the real world. There are several issues to consider in the natural order of things. First is the devolution of policing and justice. That is a meaty issue that is relevant to the restoration of the institutions.

Policing is a pretty natural place to go for our second item, given the live debate around it, which was demonstrated by the Secretary of State's speech in Glenties. Policing is a real-world issue.

Restorative justice is the third topic that we should discuss, given its fundamental and primary impact on the rule of law and given that we will have consultation on the protocol soon.

The fourth subject should be the more global issue of the rule of law and criminality. It suits our time frame, given the report that is due in October on the rule of law and criminality, which Alan mentioned.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): One of the great benefits of having Hansard is that everyone has now explained that, by agreeing to a certain sequence, we are not putting any weight of importance on particular matters. You may be hung out to dry on that decision because you have made it very clear.

We seem to be reaching broad agreement. Assuming that that is the case, we need to consider two issues. First, should we call witnesses? I am very conscious of Mr McFarland's point about how calling witnesses could create a long process for the Committee.

Secondly, given those concerns, whom do we call? I take it that the devolution of policing and justice is agreed as the first subject — although perhaps not the most important — with which we deal. If we accept Alex's suggestion that policing, including the intelligence services becomes the second issue, members seem to be reasonably relaxed about what become the third and fourth.

Mrs Foster: I am happy to say that the DUP is OK with that work plan. If the rule of law is the last topic, it is almost like a catch-all that will deal with anything that has been missed in the previous three.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): On that basis, we have our sequence: the devolution of policing and justice; policing; justice issues; and the rule of law. Is everyone happy with that?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Good; I am very pleased to hear that.

We need to discuss witnesses. I have scribbled down a few ideas.

Mr Cobain: Before we start discussing that, I should say that we are a time-bound Committee. I do not mind calling witnesses, provided that they will add to the debate. I am not in favour of calling witnesses so that we can have a bit of a brickbat with them. Some of the issues that we have talked about are irrelevant. There is no possibility of having an in-depth discussion about the intelligence services in this Committee; that goes over my head.

We have no direct link to the Police Ombudsman, who reports directly to the Secretary of State and then to Parliament. If we are looking to enhance the debate or bring witnesses to give us a better understanding of the subject, that is fine, but I am not happy with bringing them here for no reason other than to have a bit of a brickbat with them.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The economic subgroup has dived in, invited a huge number of witnesses and heard some wonderful stuff. However, my experience of the subgroup has been that members can get bogged down in an awful lot of material. We accept that we must be very selective. Some core people must be invited because, without their input, we will get nowhere. However, I will be guided by the Committee on how extensive that list should be.

Mr McFarland: Chairman, I raised this issue on Monday. Everyone around the table has been at this for a number of years: members have had discussions within their own parties, with other parties and in Leeds Castle or wherever. Indeed, three Northern Ireland Policing Board members are present. Within this room, there is a fair degree of expertise on most of the issues. Fred is right: if we are unsighted on certain issues, or do not have the necessary details, it may be worth calling witnesses who can enlighten us. However, we do not have time to fire people in just to have a tilt at them.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Obviously the NIO must be on that list, whether at ministerial or permanent secretary level, no matter how we deal with the issue. The Police Service of Northern Ireland or the IMC are other suggestions, but I am just throwing out ideas.

The devolution of policing is an NIO issue. That brings us to the decision: will we invite the Secretary of State — or one of his Ministers — to this Committee, and is he likely to come?

Mr Murphy: I am not averse to the Committee calling any of those witnesses or taking the time that it needs. However, the devolution of policing and justice involves deciding on modalities, the powers that members would like transferred, time frames, types of departmental models and so on. We know what policing and justice powers currently rest with the NIO and Whitehall — all we have to do is get a list. The parties will have to agree on the type of model. It will not be handed down to us from the NIO as this virtual Hain Assembly was.

As I said, I am not averse to calling witnesses, but we can resolve many of the issues ourselves. Given that Hansard records all our positions and we ensure that we reinforce them for that record, there may be a tendency to call witnesses simply to balance previous evidence. I take a more minimalist approach to calling witnesses unless there is a very clear and compelling case to hear evidence.

Much of the first element of work on devolution matters that we have agreed to undertake involves matters that parties have been discussing for several years; within their own party, with other parties and certainly with both Governments. The institutional section of this Committee has decided not to call any witness because the parties can deal with those matters themselves. That approach may be more conducive to getting business done quickly than the economic subgroup's approach.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): From a procedural point of view, if folk want to discuss any particularly sensitive issues, the Committee can at any stage — by consensus — decide to have sessions without Hansard.

Mr Murphy: My point is that members feel obliged to take their party's perspective, and I understand that. For instance, Arlene Foster felt obliged to say that the DUP's priority was rule of law, and, from the DUP's perspective, that is fair enough. I refer to Hansard because it is inevitable that if a witness is called there will be a need to balance their evidence by calling a counter-witness to give an alternative or contrary view. Therefore as far as some of these topics are concerned, we should think long and hard about the need to call witnesses at all.

11.30 am

Mr Weir: Some subject matters lend themselves more to the calling of witnesses than others. We should call witnesses on the basis of real need.

As with almost any subject, one could call witnesses for meetings once a week from now until Christmas 2008, but it is questionable how productive that would be. Witnesses should only be called where it will be of benefit.

Representatives from the police should be invited to give evidence at some stage, and to get the best use out of witnesses they should not be tied down to one subject. Someone from the police, for instance, might not want to be drawn on the devolution of policing and justice, because it is such a political issue, but they would have things to say on policing and intelligence. They might also be questioned on community restorative justice and certain aspects of rule of law. There is no point in having a police representative here one week to talk on a subject and then another representative two or three weeks later to talk about something else. We must use our time constructively.

I am not convinced that getting a witness from the NIO would be helpful when discussing the devolution of policing and justice, because they would merely give a technical list of the aspects that they regard as being covered under policing and justice. I suspect that they are trained not to answer particular questions — like in a police cell in Castlereagh or some other organisations. The NIO will fit in with whatever agreement is reached on the modality, timing and circumstances. It will take a neutral position and throw it back to the parties. In ways the NIO is right to do that, because these things should not be imposed over our heads. Therefore, there would be no benefit in getting witnesses from the NIO, apart from getting a technical list to make sure that we are covering all aspects of policing and justice.

I am keeping an open mind that someone will suggest a suitable witness for discussions on devolution of policing and justice; I cannot think of anyone. It would be useful if someone could come up with a relevant witness, but it is a matter for the parties.

Mr Murphy: There is also the option of asking for written papers and submissions.

Mr McFarland: We have our list, so I suggest that we start and see how we go on this. If we hit blockages of information, we may need to call witnesses. However, we should get going on it. The police might be useful witnesses towards the end, because we might build up the odd question here and there. As Peter Weir suggested, we could do a wrap-up of some questions to the police on areas that we are not sure about and on which we need further information.

We should start off and see what witnesses we need as we go along.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There are expert witnesses who are not directly involved. John Simpson spoke at yesterday's economic subgroup meeting, and he produced some excellent ideas and novel views that stimulated the subgroup's thinking. The Committee on the Preparation for Government could go down that route as well as asking for the real players.

Agreement must be reached because of the modalities of what we are doing. Letters to potential witnesses would have to go out today to give them adequate warning. Would it be useful if the Clerk gave you a briefing paper on the NIO devolution document?

Members indicated assent.

If we do not reach consensus on witnesses, we will not have any. However, no one is dying in the ditch on this either way. I can hear various views being espoused.

Mr Attwood: I agree with the last two members who spoke. I do not think there is any need for witness evidence on the devolution of policing and justice. There are probably questions that need to be raised with the NIO arising from the consultation document because, while it is a fairly neutral document, it does have a few dark corners.

As for the other three categories, from my party's point of view, we might have to call three witnesses: someone from the police to discuss relevant matters; the Secretary of State, to discuss the global policing issue; and perhaps an official to talk about justice and CRJ concerns. It will be a small number — that is the best way to go. However, for the purposes of next week and the immediate work programme, we can proceed without witnesses.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): You would not call the IMC or the intelligence services?

Mr Attwood: I would like to see someone from the intelligence services, but I do not see the need for any more than three or four witnesses in total.

Mr McFarland: The parties have met the IMC at various stages. We would get no more from the IMC than the contents of its most recent report. The police are currently preparing their report on normalisation for publication at the end of August. We will probably get nothing new from the police until they have told the IMC and the IMC has produced its next report at the beginning of September.

There is an issue there about what useful new information we are likely to get from these organisations. We have three meetings in which to sort this out before the end of August. We got an agreement from last Monday's meeting that we could work into the first week of August, so we are asking the Secretary of State to put the first debate back to 11 September.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will be coming back to that later.

Mr McFarland: So we have time, but there is not a great deal of it and some of these issues, particularly devolution and policing and justice, are potentially complicated.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will not need witnesses next week, but just to give staff some guidance, Alex has suggested a small core group of witnesses. There does not seem to be much enthusiasm for calling in the Police Ombudsman or the IMC. It would be interesting to see whether the Secretary of State would come if we invited him. We need to tie up these loose ends.

Mr McFarland: Should we not call someone from the police so that, towards the end of the week, we can wrap up questions that have arisen? We might get something from Assistant Chief Constable Sheridan, for example, or indeed, the Chief Constable himself, if there were policing issues of concern. Perhaps we should warn them now that we might want to speak to them. The question is whether they would be willing to come.

Mr Murphy: In relation to issues such as CRJ, my party would reserve the right to make further suggestions depending on which witnesses the Committee agrees to call. That is why I would have argued for a minimalist approach. We must think long and hard about what value can be added, but we will reserve the right to look at the witnesses that have been called and determine whether we wish to call others ourselves.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Issues may develop in such a way as to make that apparent.

Mr Cobain: As far as witnesses are concerned, the devolution of policing and justice is really a matter for the parties. We have skirted around this for long enough, and there is no added value in bringing individuals in to talk about policing. It is for the parties to agree, and the Secretary of State will play it with a straight bat when he comes anyway, so it is a waste of time.

As far as CRJ is concerned, all of the protocols are in the public domain. If the Committee wants to produce a report on CRJ, all of the information is accessible. Conor Murphy is right. If we bring one witness in we will have to balance that with another. It is a matter for the Committee if it can reach a consensus on CRJ to make a report. We cannot get involved in bringing one witness from one side and one from another. If the Committee has a view on community restorative justice then it should make that view known.

These are important issues. We could produce a report that would go some way to assisting the debate on the issues, but the time frame will not allow us to have a stream of witnesses. However, if a report is produced with which some parties are uncomfortable, they will naturally want to redress the balance by questioning witnesses. There is a great deal of information in the public domain, so the Committee can make pronouncements on those issues. Who needs witnesses about CRJ? All the issues are in the public domain, and members are au fait with CRJ. I cannot imagine how inviting witnesses to talk about CRJ would enlighten the UUP's view on it.

Mr Attwood: I will think about that, because it is a valid point. We have been around the houses on that issue and others. Even though our overall work programme is heavy, it is critical to the Committee's understanding of the issues to call the Chief Constable, the Secretary of State and a representative from MI5 as witnesses.

Mrs Long: They may be key players in the implementation of decisions or agreements, but to call them as witnesses may not shed any light on our discussions. We need to strike a balance. There was a kernel of an idea that the Committee does not need to call witnesses, but, if questions arise, we may need to seek expert advice in future. We would be better to proceed as best we can, on the understanding that we reserve the right to re-open the issue about witnesses if expertise is needed to guide and inform our discussions. At this stage, no one has identified any witnesses for at least one session, possibly two, and it would be a waste of time to invite them for the sake of it.

Mrs Foster: I am also conscious of the time frame, for more than one reason. If we proceed on the basis that we do not intend to call witnesses — with one exception, and that is the Secretary of State, because of what he said in Glenties in County Donegal about policing — we need clarification on that point, and that would not take long. If experts could provide written evidence to the Committee, that would short-circuit the process. Other members have also suggested that. However, we need to speak to the Secretary of State about what he said. I presume that he is going on holiday at some stage.

Mr Weir: There would be an opportunity for him to be flown back at vast public expense.

We need to question the Secretary of State on what he said. One advantage of adopting a flexible approach, which is not to depend on witnesses at this stage, but to consider where they are needed, is that — with the possible exception of the Secretary of State — we may be able to identify individuals. However, almost all the potential witnesses represent institutions or bodies. They do not tend to be individuals; for example, they may be representatives from the police or the IMC.

Other Committees try to focus on a couple of individuals, but the advantage of adopting a flexible approach is that, if the Committee decided that it would be useful to invite someone from the police in a fortnight's time, we would not be tied to a specific individual. The bodies concerned should be able to provide senior representatives at short notice, if necessary.

That is what gives us a degree of flexibility, unlike the economic subgroup, which has a range of individuals and is a much smaller organisation in that regard. I support Arlene's comments.

The Committee has had enough lectures from the Secretary of State over the past few months, and it would be nice to be able to question him. We would all appreciate that.

11.45 am

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We have different ideas floating around. We have Mrs Long's view that we do not call witnesses unless something materialises during our discussions that we feel requires us to take evidence. We have the DUP's view that we do not call anyone other than the Secretary of State to answer questions, particularly in relation to his Glenties speech.

Mr Weir: We are not precluding other witnesses. Apart from asking the Secretary of State to attend, our view is similar to Mrs Long's.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There is also Alex Attwood's view that we should call a very select number of witnesses — maybe two or three — including ones from the intelligence services.

Mr Attwood: You can reconcile those positions. You can decide on the Secretary of State now, and keep a small number of witnesses under review.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We are in danger of having seven agreements in a row at one meeting, which would be an astonishing achievement.

Is there consensus to call the Secretary of State to answer questions on policing issues and then, taking up Mrs Long's proposal, if any other issues arise to call witnesses as and when we need them by consensus?

Do we have agreement on that?

Mr Murphy: I am OK with that. However, Sinn Féin reserves the right to review matters when the other witnesses are known. Flexibility is important. I am not confident that the Secretary of State will agree to come along.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): You could well be right.

It is important to understand that the Committee will ask the Secretary of State to come along, today fortnight, to answer questions on general policing issues — not on the devolution of policing and justice. That gives us two weeks to fly him home from wherever he is.

Mr Weir: If the Secretary of State does come, the Committee may not get an enormous amount out of him if he is pushed on the devolution of policing and justice. However, I would not preclude particular questions. The general topic will be law and order issues. I do not think we should say to the Secretary of State that he would not be questioned on particular issues.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): If the Committee managed to get the Secretary of State to attend next week's meeting, as opposed to today fortnight, would that cause any difficulties? Of course, we do not know what his diary is like.

Mr Weir: I think that he is away.

Mr McFarland: I have two problems: first, if he comes next week, we can write off the session, because we will not get into the devolution of policing and justice issue until the following week; secondly, he may decide, given his previous dealings with the Committee, that he is not the best person to come and speak to us and produce one of his officials.

Is the issue to get information out of the Secretary of State, in which case the official can give it and that will be OK, or is it to have a go at the Secretary of State? Will we be happy with an official if the Secretary of State does not want to come?

The Committee must get a head start on its business. It should start with the key issue next week, even if it all falls apart two weeks later. The Committee may need to talk to the Secretary of State, but that should be done at a later stage rather than have it interfere with its work up front.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is a useful comment.

Mr Weir: I agree in part with what Alan McFarland has said. It would be foolish to ask the Secretary of State to attend next week's meeting. Some work needs to be done before then. Also, I suspect that he is on holiday. The Committee should hold out for someone at a political level. I would not be happy to be palmed off with an official. The Committee wants to know the Government's direction on policing. An official may reflect the official line, but we would get a lot more depth from the Secretary of State.

I would accept Paul Goggins, in his role of Security Minister, as a replacement for the Secretary of State, but I would certainly not be happy with an NIO official.

I want to question the Secretary of State on the remarks that he made about policing and justice and law and order in his Glenties speech and on other occasions. It is important to hear the Government line, and that must come from a politician rather than from an NIO official reiterating what the Secretary of State has said. I want the Secretary of State to be properly questioned. There is no value in the Committee being offered an official from the NIO as a replacement witness.

Mr McFarland: Is that essentially related to CRJ?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): No; it relates to the general policing issue.

Mr McFarland: An earlier statement related to the rule of law and the operation of parallel policing systems.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): On Wednesday week we will ask to hear from the Secretary of State. We can then request any further witnesses that we deem necessary as the discussions develop. May I put that to the meeting?

Mr Murphy: A way round that may be for the Clerks to write to the Secretary of State telling him that the Committee is dealing with certain issues and that it is interested in hearing his views. They could ask whether he is willing to come and, if so, when he is available.

If the Secretary of State comes before the Committee, there will be a range of questions for him on every topic; his evidence would not fit neatly into one single-issue discussion. I suspect that he may not be willing to appear before the Committee, but it may be better to ascertain that rather than try to slot him into our agreed work programme. If the Secretary of State agrees to come, the Committee may decide to take the time to engage in discussion with him.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is everyone happy? For the seventh time in a row, I was about to say that we have consensus, but perhaps not.

Mr Cobain: I do not mind witnesses attending meetings of this Committee, provided that they have something to add to the discussion. I thought that this Committee was working towards the devolution of policing and justice. At the end of the day, irrespective of what the Secretary of State may say, that will only happen if this Committee is happy with it.

If the Secretary of State is brought to this Committee, people will want to make political points about his recent speech. I do not know how that would add to the work of the Committee. I am becoming lost in all this. His statement about whether people are bound into the constitutional issue has obviously antagonised some people, but what has that to do with the work of the Committee?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Murphy and others made the point that the Secretary of State would not be questioned solely about his Glenties contribution and that other issues would be raised.

Mr Cobain: Such as?

Mr Murphy: I am not jumping out of my skin to have the Secretary of State as a witness, as I think that it would lead to a political discussion, although some members think that his coming here would help in the overall generic discussion on policing and justice. However, his availability or otherwise should not interfere with this Committee's work programme. If he is available to come at a certain time and members want to quiz him on a range of issues, that is well and good.

We should make a start on the programme of work — whether the Secretary of State comes or not could be a distraction to that. If the Secretary of State indicates a willingness to come — and I will be surprised if he does — we should slot him in whenever we can and members can ask him whatever they want.

Mr Weir: We should have an opportunity to question the Secretary of State on a range of issues. We all know that just about any issue involving law and order or policing will have some political overtone. Even if there is consensus on a particular issue, there will be political overtones. Politics will be behind just about everything that is discussed in this Committee. We cannot get away from that.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Cobain, I thought that we had reached consensus. Will you oppose that?

Mr Cobain: No.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Secretary of State may not come, so time may not be an issue.

Mr Cobain: My concern relates to the principal task of this Committee and to the fact that it is time-bound. The issues are on the table, and the arguments of all parties have been well rehearsed.

To reiterate: it is my view that very few witnesses could add to the discussions on these issues. I am concerned that if a witness were to appear before the Committee, there would be political toing and froing, but members would get little out of it.

Mrs Foster: For the record, Chair, the Glenties speech was ground-breaking in so far as the Secretary of State had moved away completely from anything he had said previously. He spoke about the dichotomy between support for the institutional arrangements for policing and support for practical policing on the ground. We wanted to clarify that issue with him, which is why I feel strongly that we should invite him to appear before the Committee. Members may wish to raise other issues. He may not come to the Committee, but we should still invite him.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We are agreed that we should write to the Secretary of State and ask him when he is available. We are not wedded to Wednesday 16 August; we will have to meet his diary commitments and slot him in on another date. We have reached consensus on that issue, and now strikes me as being a suitable stopping point. "Quit when you are ahead" is the phrase that is going through my mind. Are members content that we call it a day on the substantive business?

There are a couple of practical issues. We agreed that the economic subgroup would have five Chairpersons. The Committee Clerks wrote to the Secretary of State, who has now written to the parties. The Ulster Unionist Party has been very diligent; it has nominated Jim Wilson as its representative to chair the economic subgroup. It would be very helpful to Mr Molloy and me if we could adopt Mr Wilson almost immediately into our work programme. Have the Alliance Party and the SDLP given any thought to their nominations?

Mrs Foster: We will have to come back to you on the nominations issue.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Unfortunately, as far as the DUP is concerned, you are stuck with me.

Mrs Foster: As I said, we will have to come back to you on that. [Laughter.]

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Has the SDLP communicated with the Secretary of State?

Mr Attwood: I do not know. We will get an answer to him by close of business today.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Has the Alliance Party communicated with the Secretary of State?

Mr Ford: I am not aware of having yet received a communication from the Secretary of State.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The letter was dated 1 August and was addressed to: Mr Ford, Alliance Party of Northern Ireland, 88 University Street.

Mr Weir: In Mr Ford's defence, and from our party's experience with the Speaker's Advisory Group, letters about wind-up arrangements sent out under the Secretary of State's name were not received by many DUP Members. Certain items seem to get lost in the post, and perhaps Mr Ford's letter has gone walkabout.

Mr Ford: I anticipated this situation and am happy to confirm that, in the democratic structures of the Alliance Party Assembly group, we agreed yesterday to nominate Naomi Long. I will formally communicate that nomination in writing before I leave the Building today.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I am sure that the SDLP is dealing with this important issue as we speak. Can we factor those names into the work programme?

The Preparation for Government Committee meets on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays, which is quite a commitment for Mr Molloy and me. It would help us enormously to have all five Chairpersons working in rotation. I am here every day this week because of commitments to this work.

At yesterday's meeting of the economic subgroup, we agreed that I would write to myself — given that I chair this Committee and the subgroup — asking for an extension. The economic subgroup faces a huge workload. We have called many witnesses from the public and private sectors. There have been some excellent presentations and some very useful discussions between members and witnesses.

Things are moving along very well in that subgroup, but we are having difficulty with timetabling, so I have written to the Committee to ask for an extension until 25 August. That will create a knock-on effect, and we may need to revisit the matter of plenary meetings. Do members feel that it is reasonable to give the subgroup an extra week?

Mr Ford: As someone who has sat on that subgroup, I believe that it is entirely reasonable to allow an additional week for its work to be done properly. As you say, that will have a knock-on effect on plenary meetings. It would be logical at this stage for this Committee to recommend to the Speaker and to the Business Committee that we delay the first plenary meeting in September by a week.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We have already contacted the Secretary of State on this issue. We have had no response, and this is all predicated on his agreement. If he does not agree to that, we shall have great problems.

Mr McFarland: We have had our ears bent all summer about the importance of sending business from this Committee to plenary meetings. The Secretary of State had pencilled in 4, 5, 11 and 12 September for those meetings. Logically, we asked on Monday of last week that he give us an extra week, so that the plenary meetings start on 11 September. That seems sensible, given that we did not get started as quickly as we had hoped. That ties into the subgroup's business. I cannot see how that should be a problem; I would be very surprised if it were. We should get neuralgic if that is a problem.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): On principle, are members agreed that we ask for that extension, and that we write to the economic subgroup?

Mr Murphy: Write to yourself?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): No, we would write to Mr Molloy on this occasion — he is chairing tomorrow's meeting — to say that that has been agreed. We would then have to wait for the Secretary of State's decision on plenary business.

Are there any other issues?

Mr McFarland: Given that we are now starting our proper business, may I suggest — as was agreed during Monday's meeting on institutional matters — that we meet all day on each of our allotted days next week?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is exactly what I was about to propose. It is very good that that came from the floor, rather than as a diktat from the Chairman. This could be our ninth area of consensus, which may be a record. Can we agree to meet all day next Wednesday, with lunch provided in the middle of the day to enable members to continue, perhaps finishing at 4.00 pm or 4.30 pm? That is a council night for many members who are councillors.

Mr Weir: Speak for yourself.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The first Monday of the month is normally our council night. Dolores, does that present a problem for you?

Mrs D Kelly: No. I have another point.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Can we reach agreement on this?

Mr Ford: As I plan to be on holiday next week, I am very happy to give consent to the rest of you working late.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I am sure that Mr McCarthy, or whoever it is, will be delighted with an all-day sitting. Are we agreed that Wednesday will be a full day?

Members indicated assent.

Mrs D Kelly: Mr Chairman, you mentioned at the outset that each party would today be asked to give only a short oral presentation. However, you then said that papers would follow in relation to party positions on the issues.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I thought that the request for papers was aimed at outside bodies. However, that is an interesting point. Should we look at that matter?

Mr McFarland: It was originally intended that each party — for each meeting on Monday, Wednesday and Friday — would produce a paper to which they would speak. On Monday, some parties did that, and some did not. However, we agreed that parties were going over exactly the same ground as they covered a month ago. If there was something new that a party wished to add to the mix, they could produce a paper on it, but otherwise, we agreed to get on with our business. That is what we did this morning.

Technically, we had been asked to produce papers for today. On Monday, most members agreed to dispense with that and to go straight into our discussions. Most of the issues raised by most of the parties are in the Hansard reports of a month and a half ago. Obviously, we will discuss those matters in turn in more detail as we go through next week. Therefore, I do not see the need for papers.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mrs Kelly has raised an issue. We have skirted around the question of whether we call for papers from outside bodies on policing and justice. I cannot recall our tying down a decision on that.

Mr Murphy: When we discussed witnesses, we said that there was the option to call for papers, rather than call for people to appear before us. We should apply the same broad flexibility that we have applied to calling witnesses: as our discussions progress, if we feel that somebody should appear before the Committee or that somebody should provide us with a paper, we will agree on that.

Mr McFarland: Most of the issues that we are about to discuss are well documented; we have been at them for some years. The Government have an entire discussion paper on devolving policing and justice, and that, presumably, is our starting point. We have asked Committee staff to prepare a briefing paper on their analysis of that paper. As Conor says, we may need to call on extra advice as we go on, and that advice can be in written form or in the form of oral evidence. We can deal with that matter when it arises.

Mrs D Kelly: Two separate points were raised, one of which was to do with witnesses. My point, however, concerned party positions on the different issues that were outlined and put before us today. We understood that a paper would be required from each party. Those papers would be succinct, but at least they would reveal parties' common understandings and show how easily agreement could be reached. As a result, some success could be made of this Committee.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We have decided not to do that. The DUP produced a paper, but nobody else did.

Mrs D Kelly: We have produced a paper.

Mr Attwood: We have produced a paper, which, subject to some correcting for accuracy, we shall circulate. You never know, it might inform people.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That decision is voluntary. The next meeting of the Committee will take place on Friday, and it will deal with safeguards, equality issues, rights and victims. There will probably be different personnel in attendance, but our next meeting will be at 10.00 am on Friday.

Adjourned at 12.06 pm.

COMMITTEE ON THE PREPARATION FOR GOVERNMENT

Friday 4 August 2006

Members in attendance for all or part of proceedings:

The Chairman, Mr Francie Molloy
Mr Wilson Clyde
Rev Dr Robert Coulter
Dr Seán Farren
Mr Michael Ferguson
Mr David Ford
Mrs Arlene Foster
Ms Patricia Lewsley
Mrs Naomi Long
Mr Dermot Nesbitt
Mr John O'Dowd
Mr Edwin Poots
Ms Kathy Stanton

The Committee met at 10.00 am.

(The Chairman (Mr Molloy) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Members should ensure that their mobile phones are switched off, because they interfere with the Hansard recording system.

I draw members' attention to the requirement to declare any interests that might be relevant to the work of the Committee. I am not sure what those interests might be.

I ask the deputies from each party to confirm whom they are replacing.

Mr O'Dowd: Michael Ferguson, Kathy Stanton and I are standing in for our party's usual team.

Ms Lewsley: I am standing in for Mark Durkan.

Rev Dr Robert Coulter: I do not know whom I am replacing. I was told to be here in a telephone call last night at 11.00 pm.

Dr Farren: You have a choice of three members to replace.

Mrs Foster: Mr Clyde, Mr Poots and I are standing in for our party's usual Committee on the Preparation for Government (PFG) team.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We have copies of the paper that the PFG Committee agreed on the issues to be considered under the title of "Rights; Safeguards; Equality Issues and Victims". I propose that we work our way through that list to identify which issues members wish to deal with first. Before we do that, each party may present a five-minute introduction. The Alliance Party will start.

Mrs Long: Thank you, Mr Chairman. The list covers many of the issues that the Alliance Party raised in its initial submission; namely equality issues, community relations, rights and safeguards, victims, and dealing with the past. Although the Alliance Party wishes to highlight several items on the list, it does not have a comprehensive list of concerns.

We welcome the work that the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission (NIHRC) has done to develop human rights legislation. That work represents a step forward, but a bill of rights is necessary and must be developed. Our particular concern is that the focus should be on the rights of the individual, not on those of groups. Our fear is that those who are not associated with groups would find that their human rights were diminished. Therefore, it is important that the exercising of human rights is based on an individual's rights, not on group rights.

If people choose to exercise their rights in groups, that is entirely a matter for them, but a person's ability to exercise his or her rights should not be in any way diminished because he or she has not chosen to be part of a group. That is particularly important in a changing Northern Ireland, which has an increasing ethnic-minority population and higher levels of inward migration. Individuals must be reassured at both a policy and political level that their rights will be respected in the same way as those of people who associate with the larger and more traditional groups in Northern Ireland. Therefore, the Alliance Party wishes to highlight that matter under the "Rights/safeguards" heading.

The Alliance Party's view is that, in addition to establishing people's rights, there must be provision for the responsible exercising of those rights. Everyone has rights that should be established in law. However, how rights can be exercised in a responsible way must be established to ensure that other issues, such as good relations and stability in our communities, are not affected negatively. It is important that collective responsibility and a sense of community are maintained in order that, although the rights that are determined under law can be exercised, that is not done in a negative and destabilising way. At all times, people must respect the rights of others.

There are clearly issues surrounding dealing with the past, and truth and reconciliation. There are several models for dealing with issues from the past. The Alliance Party has made it clear in all its submissions that simply transplanting the mechanisms that have been used in another community is not necessarily the way forward. It will have to be explored in detail, for the definition of a victim is a very sensitive issue in our society. We have to deal with it, because the rights of those who have suffered most have to be protected if any process that we take forward is to be stable and healing for our community.

I will link “Good relations” directly to the shared future agenda. If we are to move forward as a society and have a stable base on which to build institutions and democracy, we must have some shared sense of community. That must be at the forefront of people’s minds.

Returning to some of our discussions on the institutions, we believe that the ministerial code of conduct should include a responsibility to behave in a way that is conducive to the promotion of good community relations.

There are several overlapping issues in relation to a shared future. Parades have been identified as one issue, but we see them as part of an overall community relations remit. The way in which those issues, and the rights and equality issues around them, are handled is a mark of how we handle other disputes in our communities. The parades issue is often a touchstone rather than the core issue. We need to look at it in that context.

We wish to see a good-relations responsibility placed on statutory authorities, so that Departments and statutory agencies, when deciding how to administer their finances and discharge their responsibilities, would have to consider the impact of those decisions on community relations.

We also wish to see the implementation of policy appraisal for sharing over separation in order that future decisions would be considered on whether they increase or decrease segregation. That is an important consideration. We recognise that it will not be the deciding factor on every occasion, but it should at least be an important consideration.

That is a brief overview of some of the key points. We will raise and elaborate on other matters in future meetings, but that is probably sufficient for the meantime.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Thank you for being precise.

Mrs Foster: Thank you, Chairman. I agree with Naomi that this is a huge area. I want to skirt through a couple of the issues and draw them out. When we get to the work plan we will be able to flesh them out in more detail.

A bill of rights would require the support of an overwhelming majority of people in Northern Ireland, and it would also need cross-community backing in the Assembly. The Human Rights Act 1998 achieved many of the desired objectives and balance, but the DUP is not averse to discussing how to move the debate forward on a bill of rights. We have engaged with various non-governmental organisations (NGOs) on that. I am sure that we will discuss it when the time comes.

The Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission has exceeded its terms of reference as set out in the Belfast Agreement. Its focus should reflect the circumstances of Northern Ireland, but, unfortunately, in many cases it has exceeded that and has commented on issues that fall firmly outside its remit — issues that are the responsibility of the legislature.

As for the other commission, it is no secret that we believe that the Parades Commission should be abolished. It is part of the problem — it does not provide a solution to issues around parades. An alternative framework needs to be found for dealing with them. The Parades Commission is an unelected quango that has made many inconsistent determinations; it has punished those who have obeyed the law and rewarded those who have engaged in or threatened violence. We believe firmly that the Parades Commission is one of the issues that need to be discussed.

The sub-heading “Culture” on the generic list is broken down into “Ethnic communities”, “Nationalist” and “Unionist”. Each party will have a view on what is important under each of those. There is no necessity at the moment to go through the list of what the DUP believes should be included. We will consider those individually when we come to the work plan.

It is suffice to say that the ethnic-minority problem is new to this part of the UK. The nationalist and unionist issues are probably well rehearsed, but the ethnic minority issue must be foremost in our minds when we discuss the issues, and it must be tackled.

As far as the DUP is concerned, “Dealing with the past” encompasses quite a few other sub-headings. However, I do not see the plight of the disappeared on the list, and it must be included. The DUP also wants to include: compensation for victims, dealing with unsolved crimes, and sustainable funding for victims’ groups, which was highlighted most recently in a report from the Interim Commissioner for Victims and Survivors of the Troubles.

The DUP agrees with Naomi Long that, when considering how to deal with truth and reconciliation issues, Northern Ireland’s unique circumstances must be taken into account rather than simply copy something from another area or country. It is unhelpful to look at what is being done in other places, because people there are dealing with their own specific issues.

I have already highlighted that good relations are not confined to the unionist/nationalist divide. They also concern what is happening within the ethnic minorities. That will be discussed later.

Finally, “Confidence building” is included on the list. Since the Belfast Agreement, the unionist community has suffered a huge loss of confidence, and it is no secret that the DUP has made a number of suggestions to the Government on how to build the confidence of the largest community. The DUP will be happy to expand on those measures when the time comes.

Mr Ferguson: Sinn Féin has consistently pressed for progress on the human-rights and equality agendas, and it will continue to do so. Some detail of what is required to advance those agendas is set out in this paper.

Much of what Sinn Féin has pressed for to advance those issues is, however, the responsibility of the British Government. The Irish Government also have a responsibility to advance this agenda in the Six Counties. The Irish Government have a co-equal responsibility to implement the Good Friday Agreement and to ensure that the British take the necessary steps to give effect to that agreement.

There is an obvious need for an all-Ireland harmonisation of human-rights protection and equality provision. The Good Friday Agreement envisaged the establishment of a Human Rights Commission in the North and one in the South. It also envisaged a joint committee of representatives from the two commissions that would act as a forum for the consideration of human-rights issues on the island of Ireland, with a view to establishing a charter of rights for everyone, North and South.

Sinn Féin is, of course, prepared and willing to engage with any party on how to progress that agenda. Agreement among the parties on this Committee on how best to progress the various human rights issues and the equality agenda would send out a positive signal that all parties are committed to the achievement of what was envisaged in the Good Friday Agreement in respect of both human rights and equality.

However, reaching agreement on how to progress those issues is not a prerequisite for the restoration of the political institutions. Discussions on those issues will, presumably, continue beyond the restoration of the institutions, but they must not be used as an excuse to delay restoration. Issues raised by parties are listed under the heading, "Rights; safeguards; equality issues and victims." Further issues may be added to the list in future. Although many issues are self-explanatory, it is not clear how the various parties will approach them or whether they will attempt to make a case that discussion or agreement on each issue is part of a necessary preparation for Government.

It is not clear, for example, what any party will raise under the heading of "Confidence building", although a couple of references have been made to that today.

10.15 am

Sinn Féin's template is the Good Friday Agreement, and the positions that we have formulated on the identified issues are, therefore, consistent with the Good Friday Agreement. As regards prioritising the issues and the importance of moving forward on the bill of rights, British Minister Hain agreed in February to establish a round-table forum to facilitate grass-roots consultation and provide a momentum to move forward with a bill of rights. The Irish and British Governments must support that. Sinn Féin hopes that a round-table forum will provide the momentum, information and recommendations for the Secretary of State to introduce legislation.

The Human Rights Commission and its powers are also important, and those powers are high on our priority list. Sinn Féin believes that the British Government need to come forward with their review of the HRC's powers, so that political representatives and the wider community can ascertain whether they are sufficient. We want more powers to be given to the HRC and more resources made available to it. We want it to be allowed to investigate more thoroughly. The resourcing of the HRC is of primary importance, because only 80% of it is located in salaries.

An independent mechanism must be put in place to facilitate the method by which appointments are made to the Human Rights Commission, as it is an important issue. Sinn Féin believes that those appointments should not be political, but that they should comprise human-rights experts and representatives from NGOs and trade unions. Appointments should be Paris Principles compliant — international best practice should apply.

The issues of "Dealing with the past" and "Truth and Reconciliation" have come up. My colleagues have referred to them, and they are important. All the relevant parties need to have a genuine focused debate on the timing and purpose of any truth process. I do not accept the notion that we cannot learn from other experiences. Central to that must be the acknowledgement by the British state of its role as a primary protagonist in the conflict. Clarification of actions throughout the process is also important.

Ms Lewsley: The SDLP also has important points to make, but the issues that we will debate did not give rise to suspension. We hope that none of the parties will elevate those issues into a precondition for restoration.

The SDLP is saddened by the fact that the bill of rights has taken so long to come to fruition. We have worked for a long time with the Human Rights Consortium to ensure that it is brought about. It has been mentioned today that British direct rule Ministers promised many times to establish a round-table forum. The SDLP wants such a forum, with an international chairperson who is independent of Government, parties, the NIO and the NIHRC, with its own secretariat. Most importantly, it must bring together all the political parties. The round-table forum should report to the NIHRC, which, in turn, should report to the Secretary of State. That would not prevent the NIHRC from contributing to the forum, if the chairperson requests it to do so. A worthwhile provision of the comprehensive agreement was that the forum could get under way before restoration, so the SDLP calls on all the parties to ensure that that happens.

With regard to the issue of “Confidence building”, a peace process has been in place for a decade, and often we have taken small, minimal steps.

We must now take a very large step to ensure that there is restoration of the institutions for the people of Northern Ireland.

The key to the culture and identity issue is contained in page 2 of the Good Friday Agreement, which says:

“parity of esteem and of just and equal treatment for the identity, ethos, and aspirations of both communities”.

Parties must take that collective approach.

“Dealing with the past” has been included as an issue, and the SDLP would like the disappeared to be included under that heading. There is a need for a victims’ and survivors’ forum, which should be victim-centred and victim-led. More funding should be made available for the work that the Historical Enquiries Team (HET) and the Police Ombudsman are carrying out on the past. Of course, all that work must be human-rights compliant; there should be no return to the failed proposals of the Northern Ireland (Offences) Bill.

“Shared future” and “Good relations” have been identified as issues, and they must include everybody. It should not be a matter of those who shout the most getting the best rewards. Often people have no involvement with particular organisations, but as individuals their voices still need to be heard. We must therefore ensure that our approach is inclusive.

The SDLP has called on all parties to encourage dialogue between the Parades Commission and residents, because that is the only way forward. The party is opposed to any dilution of the Parades Commission’s powers and to any reviews that would bring that about. I have touched on a few issues, and I am sure that the debate around this table will enable the Committee to discuss them in more detail.

Mr Nesbitt: This is my first opportunity to participate in the Committee on the Preparation for Government, and I welcome this chance to engage in dialogue. I view the subject of human rights and equality — in the wider sense, as distinct from the aspects on which the Committee will focus — as fundamental to making progress in Northern Ireland. Members would probably all disagree with each other’s citizenship, but we could all agree that we are citizens of a greater Europe. Looked at from that wider perspective, I, as a citizen of Europe, can expect no more or no less than to enjoy the same rights and equalities that obtain elsewhere in the wider Europe.

I note the remarks of Sinn Féin, the SDLP and the DUP, and I am sorry to have missed the early part of the Alliance contribution. There is a coalescing of views. I could not disagree with Sinn Féin that human rights and equality are important — it says that in nearly every one of its statements. The party says that the Good Friday Agreement is the template and that it wants to achieve what has been set out in that agreement. I agree with that as well. Therefore this Committee must have rigour and structure, and it must adhere to and address those issues in that context.

Not to cherry-pick, but I note that, only this week, Prime Minister Blair referred to the human spirit, and that is very important. When he was in California, he referred to the essential elements of democracy: rule of law; justice; and human rights. In fact, any functioning political institution — the establishment of which is the purpose of this Preparation for Government Committee — must have an effective democracy, underpinned by an understanding of and adherence to human rights. That understanding and adherence form the basis of any democracy. Thus I hope that the Committee will take those two words on board — it must first understand the issues and then adhere to them.

I note also that, in the past 10 days, the UK Government, the Irish Government, Sinn Féin and many others have said that we must abide by international law. Indeed, one of the Sinn Féin representatives in the Oireachtas said that if the Israeli Government do not abide by international law, they should be subjected to European trade sanctions. I agree with abiding by international law. That principle underpins many of the topics that this Committee should be examining.

We talk about structure and rigour in the Committee, but if we do not understand the problem, we cannot address the issue and find a solution. We are told that a lack of equality, a feeling of second-class citizenship and even the British presence in Ireland are part of the problem. We certainly have an identity problem; it is mentioned in the Good Friday Agreement, or the Belfast Agreement, as it is properly known. I look to human-rights legislation to address that difficulty.

As I understand it, only one piece of hard law that deals with group accommodation is currently invoked — the Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities. I do not wish to play on the words “national” or “minority”, because I am conscious that the word “minority” may make people feel inferior. I do not use the word “minority” in any such context. It just means a lesser number.

The framework convention has been ratified by the British and Irish Governments — the latter having done so under the terms of the Belfast Agreement. Therefore we need to understand what that convention says in order to make progress on human rights.

I have tried to lay down some parameters for examination during the Committee's discourse on human rights. However, I am content that an outside agency be called to give evidence. I would very much like to hear the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission's view on what rights need to be addressed. Without any party predisposition, I would like to hear from Colin Harvey, a professor of human rights law at Queen's University. He is a former member of the SDLP and a member of the Human Rights Commission, so he could not be viewed as a unionist. I would like him to help us in our discourse. The economic subgroup has called many witnesses to give evidence and advice, so I do not have a problem with people coming to speak to the Committee.

Those are my views on the human-rights dimension. It is an important issue and is central to our deliberations. We need rigour and structure, and we need to know what the problem is and where we are coming from. We already have a framework in situ, which is laid down in international law, and which we should abide by. I use the phrase "abide by", because in my initial comments I talked about an understanding of and adherence to human rights.

I agree with the sentiments of the DUP person to my left.

Mrs Foster: My name is Arlene, in case you had forgotten.

Mr Nesbitt: Yes, I know. This time yesterday I was in an aeroplane somewhere north of Iraq, so I am just trying to find my feet. I apologise, Arlene. This will be suitably transcribed, so I apologise on the record for not remembering Arlene's name. I had no doubt she would remind me as she did.

As Arlene stated, let us take, for example, a bill of rights, which is important. We already have an international bill of rights comprising the UN Convention and political rights. Therefore, we should again adhere to what is in the agreement.

10.30 am

I welcome Arlene Foster's comment about adhering to the Belfast Agreement.

I will move quickly to my second point. I am sorry that I will have to leave at 11.10 am.

Equality is the second dimension to this important issue and, again, structure and rigor are needed to address it. The issue of equality was seen as a problem, but I have no difficulty with officials from the Equality Commission telling the Committee what the problems are. We must find the problems and see whether issues highlighted in the 1998 agreement have been dealt with, and if not, why not, and find a way to rectify the problem. Indeed, we must consider whether the problems were properly analysed in 1998 and, if they were or were not, were solutions properly derived to combat the problems?

Discrimination featured very strongly in 1998. Was that addressed or is it still a problem? That all builds into a shared future. The summary by Darby and Knox, 'An Analysis of the Responses to the Shared Future Consultation', stated that equality of opportunity will lead to a better future and understanding of each other, rather than the other way around. In other words, better community relations will result from equality of opportunity, rather than the other way around. The cause and effect is important. I am more than happy for Bob Collins, the Equality Commission's Chief Commissioner, to speak to the Committee about discrimination.

Robert will make a few concluding comments on truth and reconciliation and victims.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): At this early stage, parties are meant give short, five-minute presentations. Can you sum up quickly, Robert?

Rev Dr Robert Coulter: This is my first time at the Committee, and I am not sure of the usual format.

I have been asked to speak about victims. The first thing that comes to mind is that the old maxim of philosophical reason remains true: if the first premise is flawed, all that follows, including the conclusion, will be flawed. We must define what constitutes a victim. As there is diversity of opinion on that, it is vital to determine the definition at the beginning, so that all that follows can be debated within that context.

The post of victims' commissioner should be made permanent and not an interim post, as it is at present, because of the importance of the victims issue in the future. Victims' groups should be registered and their financing should be regulated to ensure equitable treatment among groups and clear and understandable administration.

Truth has been one of the rarer commodities in Northern Ireland in the past, and, like Pilate, I could ask: "What is truth?". Again, we must have a definition of truth. On the issue of reconciliation, because victims have such a diversity of need, I agree that the emphasis should be on the individual and that each individual should be treated in his or her own right. There are many diversities among victims: a diversity of need; a diversity of reaction; a diversity of suffering; a diversity of memory — I could continue.

Wearing my other hat in relation to forgiveness, we must look at the two sides of forgiveness. Both sides must be in operation if forgiveness is to take place: there must be a willingness to be forgiven, and a willingness to forgive.

Far too much emphasis has been placed on the willingness to forgive without the willingness to be forgiven being brought to the fore. Perhaps a truth and reconciliation forum is not the best way forward for Northern Ireland; no one size of shoe fits everybody. Each individual has his or her own requirements: some people want to be left alone with their grief; some want to contact the Historical Enquiries Team, so that they might discover the truth; and some want to be part of a support group. There is diversity, and the situation in South Africa is not comparable to the situation in Northern Ireland.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): All the issues will be discussed in detail later. This is an introductory stage, and we will identify categories as we proceed.

Rev Dr Robert Coulter: My apologies if I have overstepped the mark.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I am sorry to have cut across you. We will deal with individual issues presently.

The Committee Clerks have compiled a list of suggested themes headed "Rights; safeguards; equality issues and victims", of which members now have copies. Members can suggest additional issues — a couple of items have already been mentioned. We should try to position any new issues under the existing headings rather than create new categories. Items on the list are not in any order of priority and nothing is written in stone. Future evidence sessions may be informed by these headings.

Mrs Foster: Can "The disappeared" be included under the heading "The Past"?

Mrs Long: Perhaps "The Past" is not the best heading under which to include "The disappeared". People continue to be exiled from society, and victims are being created even as we speak. "Legacy issues" might be a better heading.

Mrs Foster: We could change the generic term.

Mrs Long: I understand the thinking behind the heading "The Past", but new victims can be created at any time.

Mr O'Dowd: In previous meetings of this Committee, Sinn Féin said that it is happy to discuss any issues that are presented by any party. We are more than happy to discuss the issue of the disappeared. However, parties cannot come to meetings wanting the latest news headlines to be included on the list of issues. This Committee has been up and running for seven weeks, and the DUP has had plenty of opportunities to introduce the issue of the disappeared. We are more than happy to discuss that issue, but we do not want it to be used as a political football or as a point-scoring exercise. The way to proceed is to discuss the issue sensitively and constructively in order to help families to retrieve the bodies of their lost loved ones.

Mrs Foster: I must respond to that. The person who has just spoken knows that it was not only the DUP that raised the issue of the disappeared. It is not simply a reaction to this week's news; the disappeared has always been an issue. It is contained under the sub-heading "Victims issues", and the DUP insists that it be included on the list because the issue must be dealt with. Other parties will feel the same way.

Mr Ford: The Alliance Party mentioned the issue of the disappeared at an early stage, as did the SDLP. Should "The disappeared" appear as a separate category under the sub-heading "Victims issues"? This is not about grandstanding; some of us have been talking about this issue for years.

On the list, "Shared future" is a sub-heading under "Equality issues", and "Good relations" is a sub-heading under "Culture and confidence issues". "Shared future" means significantly more than "Equality issues" and should be linked to "Good relations".

Dr Farren: I wish to focus on David Ford's last point. Along with "Good relations", "Shared future" must be identified as an issue in itself, because, as the term suggests, it points to the future. I suggest that that sub-heading be removed. I do not see any distinction between the concept of a shared future and that of good relations. I want to see the issue of a shared future treated distinctly. Whether people refer to that as "Good relations" is neither here nor there in one sense, but it is of such significance that it must be identified as a heading in itself.

Mr Ferguson: "Good relations" should be taken out from under the heading "Culture and confidence issues". That sub-heading very clearly belongs under the heading "Equality issues", primarily because the Equality Commission should be clearly identified as the public authority responsible for dealing with that matter. That matter should not lie with the Community Relations Council. The Equality Commission already has responsibility for promoting good relations in respect of race. "Good relations" should not be dealt with under its current heading; its home is with other equality issues.

Ms Stanton: I wish to reiterate that point. The Equality Commission should be clearly identified as having sole responsibility for promoting good relations. Sinn Féin supports the establishment of a commission for national reconciliation under the authority of the North/South Ministerial Council, which would report to the Executive and to the Dáil, and would instigate and participate in consultation and research on the question of inclusivity.

Mr Nesbitt: I largely agree with the points made by Seán Farren and David Ford, followed by those of Michael Ferguson. Although the issues are placed under four discrete headings, there is, nonetheless, overlap and interplay among three of the four headings. The heading “The Past” is slightly different — Arlene Foster has referred to the phrasing of that — but the other three headings clearly overlap.

In my introductory comments, I said that John Darby and Colin Knox’s Government-commissioned policy document ‘A Shared Future’ was very clear in one of its conclusions that equality of opportunity would lead to good relations, rather than vice versa. Good relations will not lead to equality of opportunity, so there is a highly important relationship between equality and good relations. If we have equality and good relations, we will have a shared future. All those matters are subject to interplay.

Under the sub-heading “Culture”, the sub-entries are “Ethnic communities”, “Nationalist” and “Unionist”. I have no problem with those wordings. However, it is highly important that, from an international law perspective, to which all Governments are expected to subscribe, a cultural dimension is fundamental to a bill of rights and to human rights.

Culture is not decoupled from rights and safeguards — quite the reverse. The right to one’s culture is an integral part of one’s rights. I have no problem if we keep those matters separate, so long as the Committee accepts the fact that rights, safeguards, equality, culture and confidence issues may all interrelate and that there is interplay among them. Each matter is somewhat dependent on the other.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): All those issues are interrelated. The Clerks have decided to allow four days for evidence sessions and four days for this Committee to meet. As I said at the outset, there is no order of priority among the issues that are listed. The list consists of groupings to cover the issues. All the issues are interrelated and overlap at times. There is no order of priority in the groupings, and the Committee can decide which grouping it wishes to consider first.

Mrs Long: This discussion does not concern only the structure of the four days of meetings, although I understand that that is the idea behind setting out the list. Simply placing “Good relations” under the heading “Equality issues” would limit our discussions, because that already frames that matter as simply an equality issue, which it is not.

“Good relations” has a much wider scope than simply that of an equality issue. That is the point that we were trying to make. “Good relations” is not limited to equality, and it is quite clear that a wider discussion is required on that matter.

Sinn Féin has gone further than disagreeing with the placing of “Good relations” under its current heading for the purposes of discussion. That party has said that it is within the remit of the Equality Commission to promote good relations. I made it clear in my earlier statement that we believe there should be a statutory duty on all Government Departments and agencies to promote good relations. That is already an issue for discussion, but we cannot prejudge that discussion by subsuming “Good relations” and “Shared future” under the banner of “Equality issues” because, as far as we — and to some extent, the SDLP and the UUP — are concerned, they have a much wider remit.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Let us start at the beginning of the list. There are four categories in the suggested list. Is “Rights/safeguards” an accepted heading?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): What sub-headings do members wish to include under that heading?

Mr Ferguson: “Bill of Rights”.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are members agreed that “Bill of Rights” belongs under “Rights/safeguards”?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do Members have other issues?

Mr Ferguson: “Human Rights”.

10.45 am

Dr Farren: What distinction are you making? A bill of rights is more specific than the concept of human rights in general, but what is the specific distinction?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): That may not matter, because the list is based on parties’ submissions.

Dr Farren: OK. If someone sees a clear distinction, that is fine.

Mrs Foster: I assume that there are separate headings because a Human Rights Commission exists, and we have some difficulties with it.

Mr Ford: It may have been the case that two separate parties suggested different wording covering the same issue.

Dr Farren: Fine; let us leave that for now.

Mr Nesbitt: Mr Chairman, could you briefly summarise for me — the new boy at the table — in what context this agenda will be dealt with? That is not a negative question; I am simply seeking information.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I am not sure that I understand the question.

Mr Nesbitt: Someone mentioned parties making submissions, four days of meetings, etc. I am conscious of how the Committee has operated previously, when party submissions were made and party representatives were questioned. How will the Committee handle the four issues that we are trying to agree?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The list emerged from the presentations made by all of the parties during the early stages of the PFG Committee. Clerks drew out of that list—

Mr Nesbitt: I am not disputing that.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): It was suggested that we break the work down into four days of evidence sessions, because that is the time limit within which we are working. We have been given an extension of one week for the preparation of a report, but if we are going to take evidence, we will break that down into four days.

It is up to the Committee how to deal with each item on the list. Members may wish to call witnesses, for example. Is that clear enough?

Mr Nesbitt: Yes.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Parades was another proposed topic. Is that agreed?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Would anyone like to add anything else under the “Rights/safeguards” heading?

Right, there is nothing else at this stage, but we can come back to it. Let us move to “Equality issues”. Are members content with that heading?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The first sub-heading under “Equality issues” is the obvious one of “Equality”. Are members content with that?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do members have any comments?

Dr Farren: Those sub-headings are “Equality” and “Shared future”. As I said earlier, someone looking at this list might suggest that “Shared future” was being subsumed into some of the other topics.

If we have four days, there is no reason why a morning cannot be devoted to “Equality” and an afternoon to “Shared future”, so that “Shared future” appears in bold type. That is an important concept, and not to have it recorded as such would convey an incorrect message.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Therefore we add it to the title, which becomes “Equality and shared future”.

Dr Farren: Yes. That is the proper way to deal with it.

Mr Ferguson: I would like to see “Good relations” included for the reasons that I have already given. The power and responsibility for that clearly lie with the Equality Commission.

Mr Ford: Mr Chairman, Michael can keep repeating that if he wishes —

Mr Ferguson: Excuse me. Mr Chairman, I was speaking.

Mr Ford: Sorry. I thought that the member had given way.

Mr Ferguson: You did not ask me to give way.

I think it would be remiss not to include “Good relations” along with discussions on “Shared future”. They both fall within the remit of equality and, for that matter, human rights. From the point of view of responsibility for moving forward and ensuring that it is enshrined within a legal framework, “Good relations” must come under the heading of “Equality issues”.

Mr Ford: Michael can repeat as often as he wishes that “Shared future” and “Good relations” fit solely under “Equality issues”. That is simply not accepted by at least two parties at this table. There is not much point in his continuing to repeat that point if we have to continue repeating our disagreement.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Let us all calm down. We have a number of new members in attendance today who have not dealt with this matter before.

Mr Nesbitt: We have read the Hansard report, Mr Chairman. We are very conscious —

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I am not saying that you have not read it.

Mr Ferguson: In the Middle East, no less.

Mrs Foster: I was going to make a suggestion along the lines of Seán Farren’s. Just because we have four days does not necessarily mean that we must have four topics. I received the paper on the institutions yesterday, and there are considerably more than four topics in it. I suggest that we leave “Equality issues” with “Equality” and have “Good relations” and “Shared future” as a separate bold heading. We will probably deal with those on the same day because we are working within such a tight time frame. That is where we would like to see that topic placed.

Mrs Long: At the very least, it should be a bold heading. If we are going to rework it as one session, I suggest that the heading should be “Equality and shared future” with separate sub-headings of “Equality” and “Good relations” underneath. Simply to subsume “Good relations” and “Shared future” under the equality remit is to prejudge the outcome of these discussions. That would not be acceptable to us or, I suspect, to other parties.

Ms Lewsley: I agree. Let us be clear: the Equality Commission oversees the duty to promote equality of opportunity and the duty to promote good relations.

However, the Community Relations Council also has a role in promoting good relations, as set out in the document ‘A Shared Future’. Therefore, there is not only one body dealing with this matter. We agree with Naomi’s recommendation.

Ms Stanton: We can leave that as it is and discuss it under “Equality issues”. However, the Equality Commission already has responsibility for promoting good relations in respect of race. Therefore, it should be given the additional responsibility of promoting good relations between people of different religious and political beliefs. However, that is open for discussion.

Mr Nesbitt: To repeat what Patricia and Naomi said, the Equality Commission has a clear legal remit — section 75(1) and section 75(2) of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 deal with equality of opportunity and good relations — but just because it has the sole remit does not mean that it is the only body with any responsibility. As Patricia rightly said, the Community Relations Council has a role. I referred to the Darby and Knox policy document ‘A Shared Future’. All of that is to do with community relations, so it is much wider than simply a matter for the Equality Commission.

Mr Poots: There appears to be general agreement around the table, so can we move on instead of waffling on?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are members agreed that the main heading should be “Equality and shared future” with the sub-headings “Equality”, “Shared future” and “Good relations”?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We now come to “The Past”.

Mr Poots: I suggest that heading “The past and its legacy” and the sub-heading “Dealing with the past and its legacy”. That covers what has happened already and what is happening now.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do we have agreement?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We will move on to the sub-heading “Truth and Reconciliation”. Was another title suggested?

Mr Poots: My suggestion was “Dealing with the past and its legacy”.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Is this the right place to insert the issue about the disappeared?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are members content that “Victims issues” be inserted here?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Should anything else be added to this section?

Members indicated dissent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We move to the heading “Culture and confidence issues”. The sub-heading “Good relations” has been removed from here. The first sub-heading is “Confidence building”. The second is “Culture”, and no priority is ascribed to the order in which the items within that sub-heading have been printed.

Mr Nesbitt: I repeat that culture, in the understanding, definition and acceptance of those dealing in human rights, is a central element of human rights. The same is true of the sub-headings “Good relations” and “Shared future”, which are under the heading “Equality issues”. I am not sure that culture can be segregated from human rights, but if the Committee wishes to do so then I do not mind. The subject matter will be dealt with whether it is under a sub-heading or a separate heading.

Mrs Foster: I recognise what Dermot is saying, but this is much wider than just the legalistic aspect of human rights. The DUP wishes to bring many issues to the table under the sub-heading that would not be on the human rights agenda. I would prefer that the sub-heading remain under the heading “Culture and confidence issues”.

Mr Nesbitt: I do not disagree with what Arlene is saying but, as a lawyer, I look forward to hearing what she is going to ask this Committee to do that is not based on the law.

Mrs Foster: You will just have to wait and see.

Mr Nesbitt: The problem is that we have got an illegal lawyer.

Mr Ford: We should not tell the judiciary that we said that.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Dermot, are you finished? [Laughter.] I do not mean that in any derogatory sense.

Mr Nesbitt: What did you say? I hope that Hansard records what you said.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): All I said was: “Are you finished?”

Mr Nesbitt: Yes.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I did not mean any disrespect.

Dr Farren: I am at a loss to understand what confidence building might mean under the heading “Culture and confidence issues”. My understanding of the term goes back to the agreement. There is a host of measures, some of which would fall under the previous headings. However, if someone has a clear understanding of what it might mean in this context I would like to hear it. I do not recall in earlier meetings of the Committee any specific discussion of what confidence building might mean apart from the totality of measures that amount to building our confidence in our commitments to whatever we have to do.

Mr Poots: There is a huge number of issues to be addressed under confidence building. Sinn Féin in particular in the past has derided the unionist community as being on its knees. A substantial element of that occurred in the aftermath of the Belfast Agreement and is about how the unionist community has been treated during that period. As things go on, I am sure that we will get our teeth into the meat of this.

Dr Farren: That still does not indicate anything specific. Some of the measures I might understand Edwin to be referring to have to be dealt with in other sessions of the Preparation for Government Committee. We will soon be turning to the question of who we are going to invite to speak to us about the issues — and who we will be inviting to speak to us about confidence building. I am not terribly sure about who that will be. On the other issues that we have identified I am sure that I would have some suggestions for witnesses.

11.00 am

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I take it, Seán, that you are looking for sub-headings.

Mr Poots: I can provide the flavour for which Seán is looking. We have an Equality Commission, and two thirds of its make-up is Roman Catholic, yet it is supposed to be delivering on equality issues. We have a divided society, yet we have an Equality Commission, which oversees businesses on equality and fairness issues, that has not delivered fair and equal employment in its own organisation. That has to be challenged.

There is an issue with the Housing Executive and the number of houses that are being built in unionist areas. There is also the issue of the chill factor against Protestants in our universities. Another example is the Queen's University Belfast School of Law, in which the unionist community is vastly outnumbered. Why has that not been dealt with? That is a small flavour of the range of issues that we wish to look at and challenge.

Dr Farren: Those are specific issues that relate to equality measures, and those can be discussed under the heading "Equality issues". I have no problem with the DUP raising those issues. However, if we take confidence-building measures separately, that would mean calling a lot of the same people back. I am just at a loss to understand that.

Mrs Foster: I do not understand, Seán. We are not calling witnesses — except, perhaps, the Secretary of State — to attend the PFG Committee meetings on "law and order". There is no need to call witnesses on every single topic. Parties will be aware that the DUP submitted to the Government a 64-page document on confidence-building measures for the community. I have it in front of me, but I am loath to go through every single part of it now. Suffice to say, it should stay on the agenda.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Can the Committee agree that Arlene wants "Confidence building" on the agenda and that if other parties have papers on confidence-building measures that they want to put forward — from whichever community they come — those papers can become part of their submissions?

Ms Stanton: Sinn Féin does not have a problem with that, but we believe that confidence building is about showing leadership. When it comes to political representation, it is about restoring the institutions. Confidence-building measures involve the restoration of the institutions and power sharing. That is where confidence building begins — it is about leadership and about giving people confidence.

Mr O'Dowd: I just want to correct a statement by Edwin. Sinn Féin has never stated that the unionist community is on its knees. We do not wish to see the unionist community on its knees. It is the DUP that is saying that there is no confidence among members of the unionist community, something with which I do not agree.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We shall not go into that.

Mr Ferguson: John has raised one of the issues that Edwin has brought to the floor. I understand Edwin's concerns, and we will probably agree that an independent mechanism should be put in place for appointments to the Equality Commission.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We are actually identifying what the issues are; we can debate them later. Confidence building forms part of them. Do we agree that "Ethnic communities", "Nationalist" and "Unionist" should go under the sub-heading "Culture"? Are there any additions?

Mr Ford: We are happy enough, Mr Chairman, as long as we do not regard those as comprising an exclusive list under "Culture", but as exemplars. Otherwise, there could be people left out who do not belong to an ethnic minority and are neither nationalist nor unionist, which would hardly be inclusive.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Is there anything you want to add to the list at this stage?

Mr Ford: As long as they are taken as exemplars and are not definitive, I have no problem.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Is that agreed?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We have four headings now: “Rights/safeguards”; “Equality issues”; “The Past”; and “Culture and confidence issues”.

Can we select the issue that we want to deal with first?

It is not a priority, but one issue is the work programme. If the Committee decides to call witnesses, the time involved in that must be factored in. As many issues will have to be agreed by the parties, witness evidence may not be of much value.

Mr Poots: Many of these issues are cross-cutting, and some have been discussed in the past. We should not get too hung up about the order, because some issues will cut across two or three headings. I do not see any difficulty in dealing with them as they are set out.

I imagine that witnesses will be called to give evidence on the bill of rights and on human rights in general. The Equality Commission may be called to speak about equality. If witnesses are called, it may be better to deal first with the issues that do not require witnesses, in order to allow more time to arrange for witnesses to appear before the Committee.

Mrs Long: Perhaps the least contentious solution would be to discuss the issues in the order in which they are presented. If we rearrange them, it might suggest that we were trying to prioritise one issue over another. I do not think that anyone would suggest that the order in which we deal with the issues in any way indicates their priority. I suggest that we deal with them in the order that they appear at present, accepting that that does not give them priority.

We do not object if the Committee decides to call witnesses. However, the economic challenges subgroup has become bogged down with many delegations, and that has absorbed a lot of time. The subgroup has had a much longer time frame in which to continue its work. This Committee needs to bear in mind that, if witnesses are called, the tendency will be for other members to call witnesses to dispute the witnesses that they do not like, and that will result in a cyclical situation. Unless witnesses are urgently required to speak about human rights and parades, which are among the first issues for discussion in the proposed order, it may be better to reconsider calling witnesses later. A long list of witnesses may not be constructive.

Mr O'Dowd: We have no difficulty with calling witnesses in principle. However, I accept what Naomi has said. Time is against us, and we have four, possibly five, sittings ahead of us. As the Chairman said, it is for the parties to put their points and to reach agreement on the issues, and we should proceed with that.

Mr Poots: Will the order give Committee staff flexibility to move issues around if there is difficulty in arranging when witnesses appear before the Committee? We should not be too hung up on the order.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Yes. Are members agreed on the order as set out? At the next meeting, the Committee will deal with rights and safeguards.

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are there any particular witnesses that members feel should be called to speak about rights and safeguards?

Ms Lewsley: The Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission.

Rev Dr Robert Coulter: The Equality Commission for Northern Ireland.

Ms Lewsley: The Northern Ireland Council for Ethnic Minorities (NICEM).

Dr Farren: Equality issues are separate.

Mr Ferguson: The Committee on the Administration of Justice (CAJ).

Mrs Foster: If we call NGOs, we will be here for a heck of a long time.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We can keep adding to the list and toing and froing.

Mr Ferguson: Surely we are not going to be prescriptive either?

Mr O'Dowd: Thirty seconds ago, most parties said that witnesses would not be required; now we are producing a list of potential witnesses. If we do not have an agreed list of witnesses, we will have no witnesses.

Mrs Foster: I would be happy not to call any witnesses.

Mr Ford: Mr Chairman, when this Committee met to discuss another strand of issues, you highlighted the danger of inviting witnesses unless they have something specific to add. Unless the witnesses are limited to a very small number of statutory bodies, this tit for tat will continue.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): That is the problem. Many of the witnesses that have appeared before the economic challenges subgroup — and no disrespect to any of them — have concentrated on the issues that are important to them rather than deal with the main issues and impediments.

Mrs Long: Would it be best for the Committee to do as it did on the policing issue? Parties would discuss the issue, and witnesses or written submissions could be requested to answer questions or technical points that we do not have the expertise to answer and where the input of witnesses is necessary. That may be a more constructive way forward.

I am conscious that our first meeting on this is in one week's time, which is a very short time considering that our remit is essentially unclear now. If the Human Rights Commission were to appear before the Committee to talk about human rights, a couple of weeks would need to be set aside — not just a morning. We must be realistic when calling witnesses and ensure that there are discrete issues that we want them to cover. The best solution may be for the Committee to have its preliminary discussions and identify areas in which that type of support would be necessary.

Dr Farren: Perhaps this Committee needs a clear sense of what it is trying to achieve in relation to human rights. As things stand, there is a Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission, a requirement to prepare a bill of rights and considerable disagreement among the parties about how to make progress.

The Human Rights Commission has been charged with developing a bill of rights. This Committee is not here to reinvent a bill of rights or to consider existing fundamental human rights. Our consideration is the specific requirement for a bill of rights in Northern Ireland, problems that will arise in obtaining that and the issues that the bill should address.

It would be helpful to hear from the Human Rights Commission as to the current state of play on the preparation of the bill of rights, so that the Committee can be well informed. If members can reach a collective position, we could consider how we want to see the bill of rights taken forward in the medium term. The Committee is not reinventing the wheel; it is dealing with specific issues that have arisen over the past few years and with which the parties have identified problems.

Mr Ferguson: In general, I do not disagree with you, Seán. However, the parties around the table know that there was an agreement to set up a round-table forum for the purpose of generating a momentum, which is currently absent, in the creation of the bill of rights. If I am not mistaken, four of the parties agreed to that, and Sinn Féin wants that round-table forum up and running by the autumn. Reaching agreement on that would be a positive step. I do not know whether it is necessary for the HRC to come in to tell the Committee what needs to be done, because we have already agreed to it.

Mrs Foster: I broadly support what Naomi said: the Committee should start the scoping exercise and any specific issues that arise can be raised with invited witnesses or requested in written form.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): This Committee works on the basis of consensus, so if some parties do not agree to call witnesses at this stage, perhaps we should first examine the issues that have been raised, as Naomi suggested. The Committee could return to the question of calling witnesses if members feel that they want specific answers from specific people.

Ms Lewsley: Does the timescale allow for that?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Our next meeting is next Friday.

Ms Lewsley: I understand that. What I meant was that if the issues that are raised result in members wanting to invite witnesses, will there be there additional time for that? Already, four days have been assigned to the different topics. That schedule brings us into the fifth week.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We are tight for time. However, the Committee could have an extra day to call witnesses under the “Other” heading on the paper. Some issues may not take up a full day, so there is that flexibility. It would probably mean sitting for an extra day to hear from witnesses, as their presentations can be quite lengthy. Are members content with that?

Rev Dr Robert Coulter: I agree with what has been suggested and with what Arlene has said, because from my experience on the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety, I know that inviting a lot of witnesses led to a great deal of repetition. The Committee needs to define the areas on which it wants information in order to avoid that.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do members agree?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The Committee has received a letter from the Secretary of State notifying us of three Members who will be added to the list of Chairpersons for the economic challenges subgroup. They are: Naomi Long, Jim Wilson and Alban Maginness. Are members content with that?

Members indicated assent.

11.15 am

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The economic challenges subgroup will be notified of those changes.

The Committee has received another letter from the Secretary of State regarding its request to postpone the first plenary sessions from 4 September and 5 September to 11 September and 12 September to allow more time for the Committee to produce its reports. The Secretary of State’s response relates more to the part of the Committee that is dealing with “Institutional issues”, which this part of the Committee has already discussed, rather than to our request for a meeting with Mr Hanson to discuss the devolution of policing and justice. I suggest that we forward the letter to the part of the PFG Committee that is dealing with “Institutional issues”, which will meet on Monday 7 August. Are members content to do that?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The next PFG Committee meeting is on Monday 7 August, but the next meeting of the Committee dealing with “Rights; safeguards; equality issues and victims” is on Friday 11 August.

Mr O'Dowd: It is perhaps not for discussion now, but it would be useful if advisers to the political parties sat closer to the parties, rather than at the back of the room. I do not wish to debate that now, but it could be included on an agenda for a future meeting.

Ms Stanton: They do not want to sit at the back of the bus.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Members should prepare for an all-day sitting next Friday.

Adjourned at 11.17 am.

COMMITTEE ON THE PREPARATION FOR GOVERNMENT

Monday 7 August 2006

Members in attendance for all or part of proceedings:

The Chairman, Mr Jim Wells
Mr Gregory Campbell
Dr Seán Farren
Mrs Arlene Foster
Ms Patricia Lewsley
Mrs Naomi Long
Mr Kieran McCarthy
Mr Alan McFarland
Mr Michael McGimpsey
Mr Patsy McGlone
Mr David McNarry
Mr Conor Murphy
Mr John O'Dowd
Mr Peter Robinson
Observing: Mr Francie Molloy

The Committee met at 10.02 am.

(The Chairman (Mr Wells) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Wells): As members will be aware, the meeting will go on until 4.00 pm. I propose that we break at 12.20 pm to enable the caterers to bring in the food; however, after a short break we will work through lunch. I hope that everyone is happy with that. I hope that you all have your diaries cleared until 4.00 pm.

We should go through apologies and deputies.

Mr Campbell: I am here, Chairman, but I do not know whom I am representing.

Mr P Robinson: I am representing whomever Gregory is not representing.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will make Mr Campbell represent Lord Morrow; Mr Robinson will be Dr McCrea. Are you expecting Mrs Foster?

Mr Campbell: Yes.

Mr McFarland: I am expecting Mr McGimpsey to join me on behalf of Mr Kennedy.

Mr McCarthy: I am representing David Ford.

Mrs Long: I am just myself.

Ms Lewsley: I am representing Mark Durkan.

Mr McGlone: I am representing Alasdair McDonnell.

Mr Murphy: John O'Dowd is representing Martin McGuinness; Michelle Gildernew will not be here.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We wrote to the Secretary of State about the issue of Chairmen for the Subgroup on Economic Challenges facing Northern Ireland. He has written back to confirm that Naomi Long, Jim Wilson and Alban Maginness have been added to the panel to chair the subgroup's meetings. The subgroup has been advised of that decision. When those individuals slot in, that should free up the two existing Chairmen to chair this Committee. It has been quite an onerous task this past week or two.

Mr McFarland: We have had a difficulty with Mr Wilson's appointment. I am hopeful that he will be replaced later today, but it is difficult to get in touch with people on holiday.

Dr Farren: Are you calling a press conference?

Mr McFarland: No, he has other commitments.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): You will have to notify the Secretary of State. It would be helpful if Mr Maginness, as the next person on the list, could chair tomorrow's meeting, so that we are not prevented from adhering to the new schedule. It is either that or Mr Molloy and I are in the Chair every day every week, which is perhaps a bit much.

The minutes of the meeting of 31 July have been tabled. I hope that members received them in reasonably good time. Does anyone have any additions or corrections to the minutes? Do members agree that they are a true and accurate record?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There is one other matter to get out of the way, simply because we do not know when this meeting will end. Members will recall that we wrote to the Secretary of State to ask him to move the first plenaries from 4 September and 5 September to 11 September and 12 September. He has written back to us, in a letter dated 3 August, stating that he is minded to agree to that. The Speaker has been informed accordingly. Therefore, both this Committee and the economic challenges subgroup appear to have a bit more time in which to deliberate. Is everyone content with the Secretary of State's decision?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I hope that members will inform their Whips and parties that the first plenary is likely to be on 11 September.

Mr Robinson had asked for a copy of a report that was prepared following meetings some months ago between Mr Hanson and the parties. The Secretary of State has referred the Committee to the list of institutional issues that we already have. Do members wish to comment on the Secretary of State's decision?

Mr P Robinson: Is the Secretary of State saying that Minister Hanson did not do any work after he spoke to the parties, or that he did work but will not show it to us?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): From my reading of the letter, I think that it is the latter. It is clear that the Secretary of State is not prepared to give us anything more than the briefest outline of the issues. What do members feel about that?

Mr P Robinson: It is a very poor performance by the Secretary of State. One would have thought that he would have had some desire to assist us in our work; it is regrettable that he does not.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): What do other parties feel about that issue, or do they have no views on it? Dr Farren, do you have any views on that?

Dr Farren: I think that it is mainly our own responsibility at this stage. I agree with the dates for the first plenaries being changed.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Secretary of State will no doubt read this meeting's Hansard, in which he will find Mr Robinson's comments.

Having got those preliminaries out of the way, we now move on to the substantive issue, which is the list of institutional issues that the parties agreed at the previous meeting. The up-to-date list is contained in your papers. Members were given an opportunity to point out any problems with the list and to request additions, corrections or deletions, but we have not had any comments.

Therefore we will use it as the basis for this morning's discussion. The issues to be discussed have been placed under headings and sub-headings within strands one, two and three of the Belfast Agreement, and, as no changes were received by 4 August, I consider the list to be agreed.

Both Chairmen gave the commitment that any relevant issues that are raised will be discussed. Therefore, do not feel that we will prevent someone from raising a legitimate issue because it does not fit neatly under one of the headings.

Are members content with the list?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will start with strand one, and "The Assembly" and the sub-heading "Accountability/Safeguards". The items listed have been included because all parties stated that they were important issues; that is the only reason. No item has been given priority, because they are listed alphabetically, and I propose that we go through them in order. Members should feel free to speak on whatever issues they feel are important.

I want to avoid a repeat of the material that was raised during the intensive question-and-answer session that we had last month. Do not regard this meeting as an opportunity for a rerun of what has already been said, because that will not achieve much. The objective of these sittings is to dig deeper and expand on what has already been said on the matters.

Mr McFarland: Chairman, I understand that the list is in alphabetical order, but it would be logical to discuss the election of the First Minister (FM) and the Deputy First Minister (DFM) before discussing the approval of the First and the Deputy First Minister. It seems illogical to discuss the "Approval of FM/DFM and Executive" before there has been any discussion on their election. It would be useful if we could discuss the election before the approval.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Your point is entirely in order. The alphabetical list does not fit neatly into discussions, so I am happy to take "Election of First Minister and Deputy First Minister" first. Does anyone have anything to add?

Mr P Robinson: If we are to discuss the issues in chronological order, "Voting system" should be taken before "Election of First Minister and Deputy First Minister".

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Discussions on "Voting system" followed by "Election of First Minister and Deputy First Minister" would be the obvious order.

Mr P Robinson: There is also an issue about the number of MLAs, but I am not sure what that would come under.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): "Number of Assembly members" currently falls under the sub-heading "Efficiency/Effectiveness" in strand one.

Mr McFarland: On one level, I agree with Peter Robinson that there is logic to tackling the issues chronologically. However, our deliberations will not affect the number of MLAs that there are at present before another election, whereas other issues could be agreed in the autumn, as they are practical measures that could be introduced before the Assembly fires up again. That said, if there is an election before the Assembly returns, the issue of the number of MLAs becomes more urgent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): OK.

Mr P Robinson: Chairman, I assume that some of these matters will require little more than a sentence from members when they are giving their opinion, but discussion on some other areas will take longer.

Mr McFarland: Some discussions might take days.

Dr Farren: I get worried when members start to rearrange lists. We have set out the list alphabetically, and the way in which parties attack or speak to the issues will depend on the importance or emphasis they put on the need for change or the need to keep things as they are.

The initial presentations that parties made several weeks ago were not as focused as this agenda invites members to be. Perhaps we will distil our significant points of difference from this exercise, if we do not know them already, but I cannot imagine that we will overcome those differences today. We may come to a greater understanding on parties' differences, but we should defer the challenge of trying to overcome them for some other discussion. I suggest that we leave that as it is and let parties speak to the issues as they consider appropriate.

10.15 am

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is one view. Mr Robinson's view is that we should go through the list in chronological order, as if we were sitting down in September 1998.

Dr Farren: What is chronological?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We would start with "Voting system", followed by "Election of First Minister and Deputy First Minister", followed by "Approval of FM/DFM and Executive", and so on.

Mr McGlone: "Election of Speaker and Deputy Speakers" should come under that list.

Mr Murphy: "Community Designation" should come before "Voting system". The Committee could try to rearrange the list almost by working off Standing Orders. "Community Designation" should be the first item before "Election of Speaker and Deputy Speakers", followed by "Election of First Minister and Deputy First Minister". They all fall under one broad topic. I imagine that members will dip in and out of each item as we discuss them.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): "Community Designation" should be followed by "Voting system", followed by "Election of First Minister and Deputy First Minister", followed by "Election of Speaker and Deputy Speakers". In fact, the latter would come before "Election of First Minister and Deputy First Minister". The Speakers are more important even than the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, so that would be the third item. That would be followed by "Approval of FM/DFM and Executive", so that would get up and running.

Mr P Robinson: Yes, but would it be up and running by a voluntary coalition?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): "Voluntary Coalition" would be next on the list. There is logic to going through the sequence of events that would occur if devolution were restored. I am loath simply to throw out all those topics and start a general discussion on them, because it would result in an endless series of contributions on disparate issues.

Mr Campbell: Many phrases have been used to describe what we are doing — scoping, identifying, defining —

Mr P Robinson: Grinding down.

Mr Campbell: Apart from getting some order and logic to the way in which we address the issues, does a great deal depend on where the items appear and how we deal with them?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It would have helped the flow of the discussion, but it is clear that we will not reach agreement on it.

Mr P Robinson: I have no emotional capital tied up in the order in which we address the issues, except that some items will be subject to the outcome of others.

Mr McNarry: I agree. I have participated in other meetings, and it seems that, with all due respect to Seán, members go round the table — it is something that we all indulge in — and then we become confused. We need some sort of order and a strike system, because there are items that we will not spend a great deal of time on. However, there may be serious obstacles and members will probably need to refer to other parts of the list of "Institutional Issues" for further discussion. I wish that we could reach some consensus and approach things in a logical step-by-step way, as it would help me to follow things more clearly.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Could we consider starting with "Community Designation", followed by "Voting system", followed by "Voluntary Coalition" — though it is a difficult one — followed by "Election of Speaker and Deputy Speakers", followed by "Election of First Minister and Deputy First Minister", followed by "Approval of FM/DFM and Executive".

Mr P Robinson: Presumably the voting system to the Assembly should come before "Community designation".

The Chairman (Mr Wells): "Voting system" means the voting system in the Assembly. Yes, "Community Designation" must come before that. The Alliance Party flagged that up as a major concern.

From that point on, the order becomes not quite so difficult because the remaining issues relate to the mechanics of a working Assembly and could come anywhere on a chronological list.

Dr Farren: I am happy that members go with the order that you suggest, Chairman. We will not reach agreement if we all put forward our preferred options.

Mr Campbell: Seán, do you think that we will abide by any direction from the Chairman?

Dr Farren: Let us see how it goes for today.

Mr McNarry: Willie McCrea was not buying into that last week.

Dr Farren: I will object if I do not find the Chairman's direction appropriate.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The order is as follows: "Community Designation"; "Voting system"; "Voluntary Coalition"; "Election of Speaker and Deputy Speakers", which is a most important issue; "Election of First Minister and Deputy First Minister"; and "Approval of FM/DFM and Executive".

Every point after that concerns the workings of the Executive and Assembly. The order in which we put those points does not really matter, because they could come anywhere in the sequence.

We have now agreed six topics, and I will throw the rest open to discussion. This could be our tenth consensus in a row, which would be remarkable. Dare I ask whether there is consensus?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Good, I am glad to hear it.

As the Alliance Party highlighted community designation as a major issue, it is only fair to give it the opportunity to lead the discussion.

Mrs Long: As community designation is almost inseparable from the voting system in the Assembly, it would be almost impossible to deal with one without the other. If members will indulge me, I will probably cross the line between the two at different points.

At present, the Alliance Party probably feels the impact of community designation most acutely. However, it is conceivable that any party that chooses not to designate itself as "Unionist" or "Nationalist" in future could also experience the same discrimination that Members from my party have experienced over the term of the agreement. It is an anomaly, and recognised by the community at large, that, in a so-called cross-community vote in this Assembly, the votes of the Alliance Party are discounted, although it is the only cross-community party. That anomaly must be dealt with.

One of our main concerns about community designation is that in recent correspondence from the Secretary of State and in discussions about the comprehensive agreement, reference was made to MLAs stating their community designation at the time of nomination for election, as opposed to on arrival at the Assembly after election. That would further entrench the divisions in our society rather than address them. The community-designation system was put in place in order that the voting system could function and to offer protection to minorities in the Assembly. However, the most significant minority within this Assembly is those who are neither unionist nor nationalist, and the voting system affords them no protection.

The Alliance Party believes that the voting system can provide protection for minority communities and viewpoints within the Assembly without entrenching division. The voting system should deal with the deeply divided nature of Northern Ireland society and its political system. We accept that there is a need for checks and balances and that a strict 51% majority would not be acceptable, particularly on contentious issues.

However, the system must be designed in such a way as not to entrench further the divisions in society. If this Assembly is about anything, it is about trying to bring the community together to work towards a single aim or purpose. The introduction of what the Alliance Party believes to be a discriminatory voting system encourages people to regress into tribal camps. Those who may wish to break through the barriers and cross those lines may feel inhibited because of the voting system. The system must also be flexible enough to accommodate demographic and political change.

The current voting system is designed to protect the nationalist minority. However, it is clear that demographics, time and politics will change, and the voting system must be flexible enough to deal with such change.

The Alliance Party does not want a system that would allow a minority in the Assembly to hold the entire operation of the Assembly to ransom — that was most starkly evidenced when the anti-agreement minority in unionism barred decisions that would otherwise have been carried by a majority of Members. However, that is not exclusively the case, as other Members have used the veto to their own end.

The voting system must be democratic. The votes of all Members of the Assembly must count at the same level as every other Member. It is a basic right that should be reflected in the voting system. It should also be easily understood; therefore, that the way to marry all those concerns would be to remove the designation system — other than for party membership — completely and move to a weighted-majority vote system. The weight of that majority would have to be closely considered. A threshold of between 60% and 70% has been suggested.

In cases in which the unionist majority was much larger and stronger, the argument of 70% was very strong. A cross-community vote could meet the 60% threshold, without having the approval of the nationalist minority. Therefore 60% is too low and 70% too high. About 67% would ensure that everyone's votes are counted equally and would allow every Member to exercise that vote, and that no section of the Assembly, or the community that Members represent, would be excluded from any part of the voting system.

In particularly sensitive votes, such as the establishment of an Executive or the election of a First Minister and Deputy First Minister, the cross-community threshold — the percentage of weighted majority — could be set higher than for other votes. It would therefore be possible to have a structure in which, if people felt that there was need for more cross-community support from Members who would have a particular responsibility, the threshold could be set slightly higher in order to ensure that those Members would feel fully included in the system.

The number of MLAs has been raised and will be discussed later, but if we have 108 MLAs, the Petition of Concern should remain at the threshold of 30 Members.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): You are right, Naomi. There is clear overlap between designation and the voting system, so I am happy to allow members to deal with both. I cannot see how we can deal with one and not mention the other.

The Alliance Party has stated its position.

Mr McFarland: Designation was brought in because the communities did not trust each other. Have we reached the stage where the communities fully trust each other and that each in turn should have a veto on what goes on? Would changing the percentage to 67% guarantee, in all scenarios, that communities could stop agreement being reached on something that they did not like?

Mrs Long: The voting system should not be used by Members to bar something that they did not like: that would be like setting up a series of vetoes for parties, and it would not be a constructive way to move forward in Government. The voting system should protect the rights of minorities to express their views democratically on issues debated in the Chamber and in the Executive. That is not the issue. Building trust and confidence is not enhanced by people having to regress into tribal designations at the very outset. More confidence would be built if people had the freedom to build allegiances across the community, as opposed to along tribal divides. The Alliance Party believes that that would enhance cross-community support and would encourage people to move out of entrenched positions and build across the community. A threshold of 67% would ensure that people's views were properly taken on board and that the issues of minorities were properly dealt with. The Assembly would need a minimum number of unionists or nationalists on board.

10.30 am

You simply could not reach that degree of cross-community consent without the co-operation of unionists and nationalists. Sixty per cent would be too low because it would be feasible to reach agreement without the co-operation of nationalists. Therefore there is an issue around which weighting must be set. In order to build confidence in particular offices, for example the election of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, a higher threshold may be desirable. Members elected to such offices require a higher level of approval and acceptance by the whole community to facilitate them in discharging their duties.

The current system may provide a veto for some parties, but it has not enhanced confidence or co-operation — we are sitting around this table during a suspension of the Assembly.

The argument that a particular system will build confidence is folly, but it is possible to protect minorities and provide safeguards for them. Weighted majority, without designation, provides such safeguards and avoids further entrenching existing division.

Dr Farren: We may consider what happens in other Assemblies, but our responsibility is to address the situation that faces us. The evidence is that most people in Northern Ireland regard themselves as either unionist or nationalist, and they use religious affiliation — Catholic and Protestant — as shorthand to describe their identity. Representation in the Assembly has been like that since Northern Ireland was created: it was the cause of its creation in the first place.

However they may be defined and however distasteful others might find it, we have to live with those communities and seek to reconcile each to the other. A clear principle, then, underlies the adoption of designation. Mr McFarland referred to the practical point that each community has to grow and develop confidence and trust across the divide. Members recognise that there are problems with respect to designation, particularly as to the voting system to be adopted and whether designation should be used in perpetuity. Had things worked out otherwise, I would have hoped that, at this point, we might be some way towards changing the form of some of the safeguards for minorities in the Assembly, the Executive and the other institutions. However, we have not been able to achieve that, and we are faced with a task — perhaps all the greater now — of creating trust and confidence between our “communities”, as they have been traditionally described.

There is a sound principle of building trust and confidence between our communities that applies not just to how we describe our affiliations but how generally we work the institutions of government. However, that is not without its problems in selecting a voting system.

I note that when Naomi talked about weighted majorities, it was essentially with the intent of safeguarding either unionism or nationalism. Therefore in a sense, the same objective was underlined.

Mrs Long: Seán has misunderstood my point. The Alliance Party fully recognises the need, in a divided society, to accommodate divisions. However, the party's main aim is to protect and place on an equal footing those who choose not to be part of that divide.

Dr Farren: Naomi will note that I said that I recognise that anomalies and difficulties must be addressed. Therefore the SDLP is prepared to consider voting systems that will ensure that all Members and parties in the Assembly are treated equally and fairly. All parties should set themselves that challenge when exploring alternatives to the current system. However, at this point in time and history, the basic principle of designation is necessary, so we should stick with it. I certainly hope that we can work towards something different and better in the future. The SDLP stands by the principle of designation, although it recognises its operational problems and is prepared to explore options with other parties to see if a different — and perhaps better — means of implementing the principle can be found.

Mr P Robinson: The practice of community designation is a Northern Ireland attempt to meet the South African principle of sufficient consensus. Nobody has indicated that we do not want a system that ensures that any decisions taken have the support of the broad swathe of the community, and, as it is a divided community, that the decisions are broadly acceptable to those on both sides of the divide.

The difficulty with the community-designation proposal is that it tends to be divisive; it sets the two communities up as two separate communities at all times. On a practical level, the Assembly voting system is fairly complex. However, I am not sure that the two proposals — weighted majority and community designation — are necessarily mutually exclusive. Two different voting mechanisms flow from the community-designation system to provide that cross-community support. It is clear that a weighted majority, if struck at the right level, will require community support as well. Why should we have alternative systems? Why not have the ability to use whichever system? Thus a proposition would be agreed if it met requirements under the community-designation mechanism or the weighted-majority mechanism.

We must recognise that a section within the Assembly does not designate as either “Unionist” or “Nationalist” and that, to some extent, its vote is excluded — perhaps not excluded, but devalued. An alternative would be the weighted-majority system, which, if set at a particular level, could exclude the DUP. However, that is democracy and that is politics. If that is the direction in which the vote goes, so be it.

However, it would be set at such a level that it would bring both sections of the community — although perhaps not a majority of both sections — along with it.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Regarding the structure for the rest of this meeting, I will be asking the party that feels most strongly about a subject and which required it to be on the list to speak on it. Then members can question that party; when we have finished, the lead party can have its final say and perhaps make a proposal that can be put in the normal way and made subject to consensus.

After Mr Murphy and Mr McNarry, we will return to Mrs Long to summarise, then we will put a proposal to the vote.

Mr Murphy: The safeguard mechanisms in the agreement are complicated and the designation mechanism can be blunt. However, they are also necessary, given the experience of nationalists in institutions such as this and their ongoing experience in some councils across the North. Stringent safeguards and mechanisms to protect rights in this institution were necessary to get people to sign up to the agreement in the first place. We might wish that that were not the case, but the voting and community designation system that was designed to offset abuse or denial of rights of any sector in the Assembly reflects experience. Designation may be a blunt instrument, but Sinn Féin believes that, unfortunately, it continues to be necessary.

One could be flippant and say that because the voting system works through a majority of Members, unionist and nationalist, being present and voting in the Chamber, there are not enough “Others” — if they constituted a majority on their own, they too would have a veto. However, that is the system that we must have. I recognise the difficulty that it creates for those who have not designated as “Nationalist” or “Unionist” and that they feel that their vote is devalued. However, I have not yet heard any alternative proposition, including Naomi's, which offers the safeguards that we needed to get people to sign up to the agreement. Therefore Sinn Féin is not in favour of any change to the system.

Nevertheless, Sinn Féin is willing to discuss the issue. The Alliance Party put this forward in the review of the Good Friday Agreement that took place some years ago, and there was lengthy discussion on it. Parties were willing to explore the Alliance Party's alternatives with it. Thus far, however, I have not heard an alternative that provides the requisite safeguards; therefore the present ones cannot be abandoned yet. We are moving on to issues such as voluntary coalitions, but we must recognise that one person's voluntary coalition is another person's exclusion. I accept the bluntness of the designation mechanism and the difficulty that it poses for “Others”, and we will continue to discuss alternatives to it. However, only the current safeguards protect the guarantees of the Good Friday Agreement.

Mr McNarry: Provided that we are still here and working, there are unlikely to be any consequential challenges to an Assembly on the constitutional position for the foreseeable future. Unionists have worries about what might happen if there were no Assembly.

The Assembly that we would like to talk about is one that delivers devolved rule in both legislative and administrative forms.

10.45 am

Does Naomi think that there is there any difference between voting on legislative matters and voting on administrative matters? Would both matters need to carry the 67% to which she has referred?

The utopian position would be that we had matured sufficiently — my colleague Alan McFarland mentioned this issue — for there to be a simple-majority vote on most issues. If we are to reduce the level of difference, will Naomi consider whether the Assembly could have a simple-majority vote on this issue and let us get on with it?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I will ask Peter to come in briefly, after which, Naomi can sum up her case. We will then proceed to a proposal.

Mr P Robinson: I had assumed that, whether we were discussing community-designation voting or weighted majorities, they were introduced only when required by a petition of concern or a statutory obligation. All other votes would be by simple majority. Mr Murphy referred to his experience of abuses of the system. I too have some experience of abuses of the system, when designations were changed fraudulently. A particular Assembly vote could not be carried unless there was a fraudulent change. Does Naomi agree that that type of abuse does nothing to commend the system?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Naomi, I suppose your defence is that you were not an MLA at that time.

Mrs Long: I do not wish to distance myself, in any way, from decisions that my colleagues have taken. I do not wish to duck the issue, and I will return to it.

A couple of issues have been raised. Seán said that the SDLP would be willing to re-examine the voting system; that is important. However, he also said that most people are happy to use the shorthand of “Unionist” and “Nationalist” to describe their position in society or the group to which they belong. Most people may be happy, but a recent Northern Ireland Life and Times Survey concluded that up to 14% of people are not happy with those designations. When people refuse to state a designation, civil servants spend much time examining the religion of people’s referees, the sports that people played at school and, indeed, the schools that they attended to try to force people into community boxes when, clearly, those people are not happy to designate themselves. The fact that, by your standards, a minority is a small minority does not lift our responsibility, as elected representatives, to treat those people with equality. The suggestion is that, because most people are happy with the system, the minority who are not happy should accept the inequality.

Dr Farren: I do not think that I used a word such as “happy”. It would not occur to me to use that word to describe people’s feelings about our society. The SDLP wants to ensure that parties do not feel excluded and that no attempt is being made to devalue their vote. In the framework laid down by designation, the SDLP is willing to explore ways whereby anomalies could be addressed. It will not be easy to arrive at a satisfactory situation, but we should try to take that small step forward. Community designation is a reflection of, if not the entire reality, a considerable reality. It is the reality on which a large majority of people are represented in the Assembly.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mrs Long, before you conclude, it would be useful if you were to deal with the issue that Mr Robinson raised about there being three options: a simple majority, a weighted majority, and —

Mrs Long: I intend to do that. I am attempting to deal with the issues in the order in which they were raised. I shall not argue about whether the word “happy” was used. I wrote down that word, and Hansard will reflect whether I incorrectly transcribed it.

From our perspective, just because equal voting rights are afforded to those who designate as “Other” in the Chamber, that in no way diminishes the rights that other parties around the table currently enjoy. That is the point that the Alliance Party is trying to make. We understand the current realities of our society; we acutely understand the divisions that exist and the protections that communities wish to have. However, we are not dealing only with the current reality but — we hope — a changing reality, in which people increasingly wish to move away from old divides and form new allegiances with one another in order to move society forward. We must have a voting system that can accommodate that change if we are to encourage such change in wider society.

I do not believe that anyone at this table believes that it would make one less of a unionist or a nationalist if one did not have to write that in a book in the Chamber when one signs the Roll of Membership. This is not a matter of attempting to diminish anyone’s position, but simply of affording equality of representation to everyone around the table.

Peter Robinson raised the idea of a weighted-majority vote being run in parallel with the designation system. We have a fundamental objection to the designation system, but if weighted-majority voting were introduced in tandem with it, that would at least be a step forward, and it would represent progress.

Although that would not be our mechanism of choice, it would be preferable to not addressing the issue at all.

We accept that safeguards are necessary, and I entirely accept what Conor Murphy said about the necessity of safeguards in order to get certain parts of our community to buy into the agreement. Our argument is not with safeguards but with their current form, which we believe discriminates against our Members. This is not simply a question of the number of Members that we have, because I accept that, as a party, we can cast only six votes. I do not object to that but to the fact that those votes do not carry the same weight in the Chamber as six Sinn Féin votes or six DUP votes. That is the issue at stake, not the number of seats that our party holds, which is a matter for the electorate and for our party to address.

When we were discussing that matter, Conor said that the denial of rights of any member of this society would not be acceptable. Surely it can be no more acceptable to Sinn Féin that my rights or Kieran's rights or any of our colleagues' rights in the Chamber are in any way more diminished than anyone else's. That is the point that we are making. We are not arguing that there should be no safeguards but that those safeguards should be designed to protect my rights every bit as much as other MLAs' rights. That is a fairly simple point.

David McNarry mentioned the difference between legislative and administrative functions. The current position is that, unless there is a petition of concern, a simple-majority vote carries. That should continue to be the case. It is certainly our wish that there should be fewer petitions of concern, because, as business becomes more normalised in our society, they should be less necessary. However, when a petition of concern is laid, there is an opportunity for a weighted-majority vote to ensure cross-community support for whatever measures are under discussion.

As I have already outlined, that weighted majority does not need to be a consistent majority for all types of votes. The particular weights that would apply to particular types of votes — whether they be administrative or legislative, or, indeed, the election of an Executive and a First Minister and a Deputy First Minister — should be set out in the structures beforehand.

It is clear that there is no consensus around the table. Therefore my proposal only exposes that lack of consensus; it does not move the process forward. However, we certainly wish to see the issue of designations and the voting system dealt with in a way that would bring about weighted-majority voting on those matters that require a petition of concern.

We propose that the Committee move to that now. However, we are open to the discussions, to which Seán Farren and Peter Robinson referred, about how it could be introduced as one of several Assembly voting mechanisms. We are happy to engage in those discussions with other parties in order to further that objective.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is that a formal proposal?

Mrs Long: It is a formal proposal that we change the voting system in the Assembly to weighted majority and that the weighting should be set by further discussion.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Would that replace the present system?

Mrs Long: Yes.

Mr McFarland: Chairman, we are discussing "Community designation"; we have not reached "Voting system". Are you taking the two together? I am happy to do so if you are.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I think that we have to, because I cannot see anything new arising when we move on to discuss "Voting system"; we will get exactly the same arguments. There is nothing there that is not relevant to "Community designation".

Mr McFarland: Are we dealing with the topics and ticking them off one by one? Is there consensus to change community designation? My sense is that there probably is not. The question then is: is there consensus that we look at the voting system? You may get consensus if parties are happy to re-examine whether we have weighted majority, etc.

Mrs Long: The issue of designation is not simply about people stating whether they are "Nationalist" or "Unionist"; most of us can work that out before people sign a book. The issue is that the voting system should work. The two things are intimately entwined and cannot be separated. That is why I raised the issue of the voting system along with designations, which exist to facilitate the voting system. It would be a pointless exercise unless the voting system actually used the designations.

Mr P Robinson: At our last meeting, there was a vision that we kept in mind, which was whether the issues that we were discussing were of such enormity that they were an obstacle to our agreeing to devolution. Is this issue such an obstacle that Naomi would not agree to devolution taking place if it were not changed?

Mrs Long: None of the Alliance Party's proposals is a precondition for devolution; we are making proposals on the basis that I described last week. There will be issues that some parties feel are a precondition; we do not have such issues at this time.

Mr P Robinson: Therefore it is not an obstacle to devolution.

Mrs Long: No. However, if devolution were restored, it would be an obstacle to good governance and to the stability of the Assembly. Given recent instability and the frustration of the community at our inability to stabilise the institutions, we believe that these are valid issues to raise.

Mr Campbell: Chairman, before we take the proposal from Naomi, I want to try to get my head round this. At the end of the series of issues that we have identified, will we have proposals on which there is consensus? What, in effect, will that mean? If we have two or three issues on which there is consensus — “Community designation” and “Voting system”, for example — and a series of other matters on which there is no consensus, what will we have at the end of our discussions?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will have a report that will go before the Assembly on 11 September, where it will be noted that the Committee reached agreement on some issues and not on others.

Mr P Robinson: Then there might be a need for more than one proposal. Naomi could propose that community designation be scrapped in favour of weighted majority.

Mrs Long: Which I have done.

Mr P Robinson: Equally, I could propose that I am content with weighted majority as an additional voting mechanism.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I would be happy to take that proposal. As I said, we are not excluding anything. The discussion is structured this way to give it flow, and that has worked quite well. We can take a vote if any member wishes to do so; if we do not get consensus, I am willing to take another proposal.

11.00 am

Mr McFarland: I was very interested in what Peter said at the previous meeting. When our report goes to the Assembly, it could help the parties, when we hold negotiations in the autumn, if we identify the areas that are unlikely to be neuralgic and the areas on which some negotiation will be needed. It will clear the decks and distinguish between the clutter and the serious aspects, and that will be quite useful. It will assess what is a major problem and what is unlikely to be a major problem.

Ms Lewsley: I would like some clarification. I assume that Naomi is proposing that we scrap community designations and go for weighted majority. Is she asking us to return to the Chamber and sign the Roll without designating?

Moreover, is Peter Robinson suggesting that we keep community designations but introduce weighted majority, so that we would have both simultaneously? My worry is what the consequences will be if we get the community designations but do not get weighted majority, or vice versa.

Mr P Robinson: First, I am content with the Alliance proposal. A weighted majority is a much more understandable system. It is a system that operates in other parts of the world for key votes. For many reasons, it is a more sound system. I made the other proposition because I thought that it was more likely to get a wider degree of support from other parties. However, there would be no difficulty operating it. The Speaker would simply hold a vote. The Speaker could determine from the Members who had voted whether by way of one or both mechanisms the proposition had passed. It is as simple as that. It is a mathematical, computer exercise, which would take no more time than the present arrangements.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We could go down the route of having three proposals: one from Alliance to remove the designation system completely; one to move to a weighted-majority vote; and the third to have the option of any one of three voting systems.

Mrs Long: Mr Chairman, we could not divorce the first proposal from the second. Unless designations are removed and weighted-majority voting introduced, the current voting system will not work. For example, if, by some miracle, the first proposal were agreed and the second were not, the Assembly voting system would be in chaos, because the designations are necessary to operate the system as it is. Our argument is that we should introduce weighted-majority voting, which does not require community designations. That is our principal proposal.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I detect that there is some opposition to that.

Mrs Long: I detect that also, but it still remains our position.

Mr P Robinson: I want to comment on one or two other issues under the joint heading that we now have. In her presentation, Naomi referred to the time when it is necessary for elected representatives to designate. The argument that it should be done at election time seems to me to be altogether reasonable. If candidates are to take a major decision on what designation will apply to them for all Assembly votes, it might be a tad unreasonable for the community not to be aware of it. Designations should be part of the nominating process, so that people know exactly for whom they are voting. It would also stop abuse of the system whereby people designate as one thing on one day only to change their designations on the next. That is not something that many of us would do, but some Members were prepared to do it before. The public would then have a mandate to vote on that designation as well.

Other issues arise out of the voting system. Although we have a separate heading for it, one issue would be the petition of concern, which is an integral part of the voting system. We start blending together the various headings on the list.

It is a central part of the voting system; indeed, it is an essential part in a community designation or weighted majority system. I presume that there is support for the general principle of a petition of concern. It was referred to, but nobody else mentioned it.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Naomi said that she was happy with the rule that 30 Members' names would be required to trigger a petition of concern.

Mrs Long: That is on the assumption of an Assembly of 108 Members.

Mr P Robinson: On the assumption that my party continues to have no less than 32 Members, 30 Members seems reasonable.

Mr McNarry: Some big assumptions are being made here.

Mrs Long: A point was raised about whether candidates should designate when they are nominated for election. That simply further entrenches division. People are aware of the politics of the candidates for whom they vote; therefore the idea that candidates should have to designate before they stand for election is nonsense. Indeed, the names of at least three parties at this table already give an indication of whether they vote "Unionist" or "Nationalist".

Given that some members of Peter Robinson's party went to the electorate under a different party designation but have changed party since the election, it seems ironic that the DUP would press for candidates to declare their stance in advance of an election. I would defend the right of a Member to change parties; I would also defend the right of Members to change designation, if they wished. However, it is not something that my party intends to do in any future Assembly session.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Can we move to the proposals made by Mrs Long and Mr Robinson? I definitely sensed a hint of dissention in the Committee on some of those issues.

Mr P Robinson: What finely tuned antennae you have. [Laughter.]

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We may not get consensus on the proposals anyhow.

First, Mrs Long's proposal was to move to a weighted majority system and remove the present community designation system. We will vote on that. Does everyone support that?

Members indicated dissent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I see that there is no consensus on that.

Mr P Robinson: Do you want to quantify the dissention?

Mr Murphy: My earlier remarks made it clear that Sinn Féin was willing to discuss this issue, as we did at length during the review of the Good Friday Agreement when the Alliance Party put forward various propositions. We are happy to discuss this further, following the reinstatement of the institutions, but I do not support a change to the community designation system at this time.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Not that it is needed, but can parties outline their position on this proposal?

Mr McFarland: In previous meetings Mr McCrea got slightly fraught that dissention was recorded. However, if there was not consensus, there was not consensus. In fact, most decisions were four votes to one. Mr McCrea quietly objected to votes being recorded. The agreement was that, where there was not consensus from any one party, the proposal fell. We did not vote on whether there was consensus. I do not mind what we do.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): If a party wishes to record its view, it should be allowed to do so. Does any party wish to record its view on Mrs Long's proposal formally?

Mr P Robinson: We consider that we have done so.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It will be apparent from the text of the Hansard report.

Mr Robinson's proposal was to keep the present community designation and use a weighted majority and the current cross-community voting system. Does anyone have views for or against that?

Mrs Long: Given that our proposal was unsuccessful, we see Mr Robinson's proposal as a step forward — albeit a small one — from our perspective. Therefore we welcome the proposal.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Any views against?

Mr Murphy: The proposal may need further explanation. Under the current arrangement in the Good Friday Agreement, there are the cross-community consensus and the weighted majority systems. Perhaps there is some difference between Peter Robinson's proposal and the current arrangements. I am not quite so sure.

There are two possible voting mechanisms. One would require a simple majority from the "Nationalists", "Unionists" and "Others" present at the vote; the other would follow the weighted-majority system for which, to achieve an "Aye" vote, 60% of members must vote in favour of the motion, and, of that 60%, at least 40% of "Nationalists" and 40% of "Unionists" must vote in favour of the motion.

Is the suggestion that the designation requirement be scrapped completely, leaving a simple weighted majority, without any reference to the 40%? I would like to be clear that that is the proposition.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is worth reminding members of the four statutory votes that currently require the cross-community voting system to be triggered. They are the election of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister; the election of the Speaker and the Deputy Speakers; the vote on the Budget; and a vote when a petition of concern, which must be signed by 30 Members, has been lodged.

Mr P Robinson: Our suggestion is for a weighted majority, without reference to designations, but set at a level that would require cross-community support.

Mr McFarland: It is worth separating the four statutory votes, because the vote for the First Minister and Deputy First Minister requires a 50:50 outcome, while the other three votes need a 60:40:40 outcome.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is right. They are different votes, but they still require a mechanism to reflect cross-community support.

Mr McFarland: Yes.

Mr Murphy: This proposition is to do away with the 40:40 element. The weighted majority in that system is 60%. There is no proposition as to what the weighted majority would be in a new system.

Mr P Robinson: We have suggested 70%.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Naomi suggested 67%.

Mrs Long: We determined 67% as the level at which cross-community support would be required. It would achieve cross-community support; 67% could not be achieved without cross-community support.

Mr McFarland: Would that change if the unionist/nationalist weighting of the Assembly were to change? I presume that the level at which cross-community support would be achieved would fluctuate and would, therefore, have to be changed for each Assembly. It might need to be changed repeatedly, whereas, regardless of the number of "Unionists", "Nationalists" or "Others" in the Assembly, the current system is easily understandable. Logically, if a percentage that would guarantee cross-community support were adopted, each Assembly would have to reassess the necessary level.

Mrs Long: Yes.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Such a decision would probably require legislation, or at least a change to Standing Orders.

Dr Farren: There should be a mechanism that applies in almost every circumstance.

Mr P Robinson: The requirement for 70% would do that.

Dr Farren: I am happy to explore the issue in a little bit more detail than it might be possible to do so at the moment. I would not be unhappy if members decided to consider the situation in the context of the review. I am easy enough with either doing that in the next few weeks or after the report has been presented to the Assembly. However, the issue needs further exploration.

The exploration should be based on the principle that I outlined earlier and on the recognition that there are anomalies and some inequities in the present voting mechanisms that leave parties unhappy and, in a sense, that devalue their votes. To address that, we should commit ourselves to overcoming those difficulties. However, at present, I do not approve of, or support, any of the changes that have been suggested in Committee.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Robinson's proposal has not achieved consensus. However, perhaps it was a bit stark. Can members agree on the suggestion that further consideration be given to a change to the Assembly's voting system? I think that it was a Sinn Féin proposal.

The Committee Clerk: It was Seán Farren's.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I am sorry. I noted it as a proposal made by "SF".

Mr Murphy: You need to change your designation.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Could everyone sign up to the proposal that further consideration be given to a change to the Assembly voting system?

Dr Farren: I am not necessarily committing myself to change. It may be that we have to live with what we have. I am certainly open to exploring the voting systems in order to remove anomalies, but I cannot make an a priori commitment to change.

11.15 am

Mr McFarland: The various scenarios have implications for parties: if the Assembly were to be reduced to 90 Members, or to 72 Members, or if the balance between the communities changed. It might be worth parties having a think. We could revisit it in our discussions when we have had more time to study possible outcomes.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The way to square that circle is for the parties to give further consideration to the Assembly voting system.

Mr McFarland: Do we lodge that as part of the report and revisit it after examination or do we leave consideration until the autumn? How do we leave it? What goes into the report — is it that the parties are considering the matter or that we will revisit it to come to a decision?

Mr P Robinson: There is another alternative. In the two Governments' proposals for a comprehensive agreement, it was proposed that there be a standing institutional review Committee. The matter could be referred to such a Committee — as might several others.

Mr McFarland: As we said at the beginning of our discussions, it would be beneficial to sort out the issues that need to be sorted before the Assembly fires up again. Clearly, some issues cannot be sorted out, and they may have to go to a review Committee. However, if there are issues that can be sorted out in time for restoration — and if there are more effective and efficient ways of operating — it would be worth trying to get them into action.

Mr Campbell: I took it that the proposal amounted to further consideration of possible changes to the voting system in the Assembly. Is anyone saying that there is not consensus on that?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is a fairly mild proposal.

Mr Campbell: I cannot think of a more vague, indefinite proposal.

Mr P Robinson: Does anyone refuse to consider this any further?

Dr Farren: I am not saying that.

Mr Murphy: Is it also clear that, given the suggestion of a formal mechanism for considering this and other issues after the restoration of the institutions, that this is not considered a blockage to the return of devolution?

Mrs Long: I have already set out our position with regard to this being a blockage.

Mr Murphy: You have made your case clear. However, should there be consensus to revisit the issue, it might be helpful if there were also consensus that we do not consider it an issue that blocks the return of devolution.

Mr P Robinson: It might also be helpful to the Alliance Party if everyone were to say that this matter could be considered by a review Committee.

Dr Farren: Including the words “should be considered” would make it a little stronger.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is that the way forward? Does anyone have any problems with that suggestion?

Mr McFarland: What if it were possible to get changes to the Assembly’s voting system decided before the Assembly fires up again so that it could tackle proposals that would make it more efficient and effective straightaway? The issues were identified in the last Assembly, and we examined them in some detail in the review in 2002. We did not take a decision at that stage, but parties were aware that there might be better ways of doing things.

Will it be possible to get a decision on change — if change is the parties’ wish — before the Assembly fires up again? It would make sense to do that, rather than leave a whole swathe of issues to bubble up in the middle of the next Assembly — if there is a next Assembly — because we were still reviewing matters. Some issues will have to be left to a Committee such as Peter suggests. Is this one? Can we deal with it so that it comes into effect when the Assembly fires up again?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There are two suggestions. We can consider the voting system in more detail later in our deliberations; or we can refer it to a review Committee. At this rate we will still be discussing the matter at Christmas.

Mr Campbell: Which Christmas?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Exactly. We have spent 45 minutes getting to point 2. We need a quick decision.

Mr Murphy: The best-case scenario is that there are issues that we can identify that we can agree on and get out of the way. There are other issues that need further work, but we can agree that they are not a blockage to devolution and, therefore, we do not expect them to be raised in the autumn as issues that have to be sorted out before we can get the Assembly functioning again. Then there are those issues that people want resolved before the Assembly can function again.

Whatever the chosen mechanism — an institutional review Committee or something else — this issue could be resolved in an agreed format by the Assembly following restoration of devolution, if it is not possible to resolve it now. Equally, it is not a blockage to the return of devolution. It can be referred to whatever mechanism is agreed for resolving this and any other issues that we decide need to be resolved when devolution returns.

Mrs Long: The Alliance Party is not saying that this is a barrier to devolution, but it is a destabilising influence on the Assembly. That must be borne in mind. The fact that we are not placing roadblocks in the way of devolution does not mean that we give this any less weight than those who do attach roadblock status to their issues. It needs to be addressed if the Assembly is to be stabilised. It would be preferable if it could be addressed before devolution, as Mr McFarland suggests. If it cannot, devolution can still occur, but the Assembly will not function efficiently.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I will have to call this section of the discussion to a halt. I will put two proposals —

Mr P Robinson: Chairman, may I say one thing, because there is a distinction to be made. It would not be unhealthy for the Assembly, on a continuing basis, to look at improving the way it does business. One of the problems with the Belfast Agreement was that everything was permitted to run along and then suddenly there was a review every four years, or whatever it happened to be.

It is better to have a review as part of an ongoing process, rather than happening every four years or after a fixed period. Therefore, there is a need for a standing Committee to look at those issues. If consensus is not reached today, I do not think that it will be reached between now and the restoration of devolution. It is better to identify issues that can be the business of such a standing Committee, rather than pretend to ourselves that we will return to them when everyone knows that we will not.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That leads on neatly to Dr Farren's proposal that further consideration be given by this Committee to the Assembly voting system, and Mr Robinson's proposal that voting systems should be referred to a review Committee.

Dr Farren: I do not want to prolong this discussion, but are the proposals mutually exclusive? If the Committee has the time and the will to do so, there is no reason why we cannot come back to the matter, and if it is not resolved at that point it can be referred to the type of Committee that Peter suggests. Rather than create division, could not the two proposals be melded together?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are members content that further consideration be given to the Assembly voting system by this Committee and, if consensus is not reached, that the matter should be referred to a review Committee of the Assembly?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Having effectively parked that issue, we move on to "Voluntary Coalition". This featured prominently in the evidence given by the DUP in the question-and-answer session in June, as well as more recently when we were discussing the headings for today's deliberations. I will ask Mr Robinson or Mr Campbell to speak to this issue, and then we will go round the parties as usual.

Mr P Robinson: The best kind of Government is one into which all the participants have freely entered because they recognise that those whom they are partnering in Government share basic principles and, therefore, have chosen to work together. It is the system that works in virtually every democratic country in the world; where one party cannot secure sufficient support to be in Government, it seeks a partner. It is a system known to us all. It operates on democratic norms without mandatory requirements and will provide the best form of Government.

In Northern Ireland there will, of necessity, be some stipulations, and that is why the weighted-majority issue has been a requirement. However, whether you have a weighted majority or community designations, a voluntary coalition would be unable to get up and running unless it received wide support. Clearly, it would be a voluntary coalition that would have a cross-community ingredient. If the system of voting is satisfactory, why should it be mandatory? If a voluntary coalition can get the degree of support that the voting system requires, let us remove the mandatory requirement.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are there any views on that proposal?

Mrs Long: The Alliance Party also raised the issue of voluntary coalition in 'Agenda for Democracy'. We raised it for the reasons that Peter Robinson has outlined — it provides for stable governance and provides direction to Government. For Government and the Executive, in particular, to function well, there must be a collective view about the future of the Executive.

Leaving aside the unionist/nationalist divide, there are other divides in our society. For example, it is hard to imagine how conservative, socialist and liberal perspectives could be melded together inside one Executive on all occasions. There is also an inability to negotiate priorities in the same way as there would be in setting up a voluntary coalition in other societies, because the coalition is mandatory and, therefore, people's participation in it is not based on whether they are content with programmes for Government. It is actually done in reverse, and we do not believe that that gives stable guidance.

This impacts on other issues. The Assembly was set up so that everyone could participate in Government. In a healthy society, it is not Government that everyone should participate in, but governance. It is possible to be part of the governance of a country without being in Government. That distinction is unclear in our current structures.

Strong opposition is key to good Government. The current mandatory coalition system does not provide for larger parties to be represented in opposition. In the current Assembly, a maximum of nine Members do not belong to parties that would be in Government. That does not lead to a healthy opposition, notwithstanding that, as one of those parties, Alliance has challenged on the basis of good opposition. There is a role for strong opposition.

The corollary of having no opposition is that there is little opportunity for the public to change the Government. They can change the internal make-up and complexion of it, in terms of the numbers of seats apportioned to different members of the Executive, but under the current arrangements for mandatory coalition it would be very difficult to have a wholesale change of Government. That could permit stagnation and many other things to creep into Government that would not happen in a voluntary coalition, where there would be negotiated outcomes.

A voluntary coalition allows for good government and strong accountability mechanisms for the public, and it ensures that, ultimately, people have the sanction to change the Government.

11.30 am

Mr McFarland: By way of a philosophical question, suppose that, by the autumn, Sinn Féin has passed all the tests that it has been set and that the DUP considers it to be fit for government —

Mr Murphy: And is considered fit for government by the UUP too.

Mr McFarland: If we got to the stage at which Sinn Féin is acceptable to everyone, would Peter and the DUP be comfortable with Sinn Féin, the Alliance Party, the SDLP and the UUP forming a voluntary coalition that left the DUP out of government? I wonder whether it is acceptable to the DUP that the major party in unionism would be excluded from government.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Would Mr Robinson like to answer that?

Mr P Robinson: I thought that I had answered the question before it was asked. During the discussion on weighted majorities, I pointed out that a voluntary coalition could lead to the Democratic Unionist Party not being in government. That is a fact of life. If the other unionist party wanted to run with the nationalists rather than with its partner in unionism, that would be an obvious outcome.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are we reaching consensus on a voluntary coalition? I have not heard any opposition.

Dr Farren: I indicated my opposition to the idea a few minutes ago. As with the previous issue, it is a question of where we would like to be and from where we start in order to get there. Whatever the parties' views on the Good Friday Agreement, I like to think that we all subscribe to the aspiration of creating a society that is "peaceful", "exclusively democratic" and in which the question of greater understanding, respect and reconciliation between our communities is being addressed.

Given the clear and prolonged absence of consensus on the structures of government, we have an overriding responsibility, as political representatives, to ensure that we achieve as much consensus as possible on the new structures. At the end of the day, that is a matter for political judgement.

In the initial stages, a clear degree of support for, and participation in, the institutions is required. The level of participation must reassure all sides of the community that they are represented at the highest levels of decision-making and, therefore, that respect for their identities and aspirations is being fully upheld.

The whole notion of the inclusivity of the Executive flows from that type of thinking. We do not necessarily have to see ourselves wedded to that for ever and a day, but the experience of our recent and not-so-recent history indicates the need for a high level of participation in decision-making by representatives from all sides.

The inclusive formation of an Executive is not quite as mandatory as people tend to represent it: it is represented negatively rather than positively. Parties have the option of not participating. However, the option is there for the parties that qualify on the basis of their mandate to participate and lend support to building consensus. That is essential in the initial phase, which will be as long or as short as we make it. The greater the degree of consensus, the more fluidity that can be achieved in our political system, and the more rapidly people want to move to different ways of structuring our political system, the better.

With respect to the loss of opposition in the Assembly that an inclusive Executive would seem to suggest, a strong Committee system would be the location for much of the challenge that opposition can provide. People should remember that we are not a sovereign territory; we do not have the same responsibilities or degrees of discretion with respect to a whole range of matters that sovereign parliaments have.

The consensus that is needed here overrides the issues related to left/right politics that apply in other situations. The inclusivity principle is essential to the successful working of the Assembly and other institutions because of the nature of our society and the consensus required for those institutions.

Mr Murphy: As with the community-designation system, the safeguards around the ability to participate in Government according to mandate were a necessary part of the agreement. We are not operating under democratic norms in this state, and never have. Therefore safeguards and mechanisms that allow people to participate as of right in the institutions and the Executive are necessary to get past that experience. The right to participate in Government has the potential to form an inclusive Executive that, ultimately, with people working together on issues — and having to work together in order to make it work — leads in the longer term to better working relationships and ways of addressing issues such as reconciliation, trust, confidence, and other issues that people currently find to be blockages to the return of the institutions.

Ironically, the next item on the agenda is the election of the First and Deputy First Ministers.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Correction: it is the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker — a much more important issue.

Mr Murphy: I suppose that that should have come before “Voluntary Coalition”. Unless the voting system is changed, the First and Deputy First Ministers require 50% of nationalist votes and 50% of unionist votes, so the only people that would potentially be excluded under a voluntary coalition mechanism would be the smaller parties on each side of the community designation. The votes of the larger parties would be required to elect the First and Deputy First Ministers.

Sinn Féin has never been in favour of excluding parties. Whether we like what parties stand for or not, we have always argued that in the system that we have under the Good Friday Agreement it is their democratic mandate that entitles them to be part of the Government — or not, as the case may be.

We stand by that. We are not in favour of exclusion at local government level, or any other level. We contend that a party’s right to be part of Government, according to its mandate, is a central issue for this institution and for the Good Friday Agreement as a whole. It should be adhered to.

Mr McNarry: We should establish that the principle of voluntary coalition should not be an impediment to good government. Many unionists, myself included, are sceptical of an imposed mandatory Government or an agreed voluntary coalition that includes those who have not yet convinced us of their commitment to good government. I wonder whether that brings us to the role of a formal opposition. A significant party may opt for voluntary exclusion. One of the matters that is not covered here is whether a party excluding itself, and playing the role of the official party of opposition, would be formally recognised as such. I do not suggest that such a role would be totally similar to that played by Her Majesty’s Opposition. Colleagues may have a view on that or wish to consider it either now or later.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is there any reaction to that?

Mr P Robinson: Dr Farren and Mr McNarry have both misunderstood. This is a mandatory coalition. Neither Sinn Féin nor the DUP can choose to be in opposition. If they so chose, there would be gridlock. Both would have a veto under the voting mechanisms that we have talked about. It is not a matter of choosing to be in opposition. It is a requirement to be in government. It is a mandatory system. That answers Mr McNarry’s point.

Mr McNarry: That applies only where a party finds itself in the position currently occupied by Sinn Féin or the DUP.

Mr P Robinson: Yes.

Mr McNarry: It does not apply to a party such as my own.

Mr P Robinson: And?

Mr McNarry: There is no formal provision for such a party to exclude itself from Executive positions.

Mr P Robinson: There is. You do not nominate anyone.

Mr McNarry: I accept that. I do not want to get into technicalities. There would then be no formal recognition that an opposition could be posted in the Assembly.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Any other views on that? Again, I detect opposition to this proposal. All the parties have stated their positions, which are in Hansard.

Dr Farren: What is the proposal?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The proposal is that the Executive should be formed by voluntary coalition. That is Mr Robinson’s view, and it is supported by Mrs Long.

Mrs Long: Mr Murphy referred to voluntary coalition as a mechanism for the exclusion of parties. The Alliance Party has never viewed it in that way. It has always been viewed in the context of inclusive governance, where parties actively participate in governance through the mechanism of opposition. That is a role that the Alliance Party does not diminish in any way, as it is a role that my party has fulfilled. It is an important role in government.

It has never been about including or excluding any specific party. That is not where we are coming from. It is a suggested way to have stability and good governance.

Mr P Robinson: It also comes from a peculiar view of democracy. There seems to be a view that a vote at an election entitles one to a share in government. That flows from what Dr Farren said. One can support institutions without being in government. I support the institution at Westminster, but I am not in the Government.

One does not have to be in government to support the institutions; therefore inclusive government is not a requirement. It is the politicians whom people most trust who form a government, and they are required to meet a certain standard — the rest are in opposition. That is the best way of keeping government on its toes. It allows continual scrutiny of what government is doing and continuing examination and questioning of what Ministers are up to. That is the stuff of democracy, and it is a most certain way of ensuring that there is no abuse in the system.

Mr Chairman, you look as if you are dying to say something.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I am. The Committee has received an encyclical from Hansard. Once again, somebody in this room has kept their mobile phone on, and it is causing problems with the recording system. We recently lost a complete section of the Hansard report because somebody had left their phone on. Please turn them off completely; they cannot even be left on silent mode to receive messages. We just cannot afford to lose this important material.

I am sorry, Mr Robinson, for interrupting you.

Mr P Robinson: I am not guilty on that score; I turn my phone off.

I would not like anybody to miss my comments in the Hansard report, so I hope that whoever has left their phone on will turn it off now rather than wait until I have finished.

Collective responsibility is also one of the imperatives of government. It is nonsense for one Government Minister to oppose what another Government Minister has brought before the Assembly. That is absurd, and it would not happen under a voluntary coalition. A Minister who moved away from the collective decision of the Executive would be fired.

We must also look beyond the immediate. The best that can be said of the arguments that have been presented against a voluntary coalition is that some special, peculiar and immediate need must be addressed because we are a divided society, full of instability and distrust. The argument is that that necessitates an inclusive and mandatory form of government. If that is accepted, the next question is bound to be: will that be the position for ever? A voluntary coalition, however, allows a cross-community system, and it allows us to grow into the norms of democracy and to establish a normal democratic society in Northern Ireland. On the other hand, if we become entrenched in a mandatory system, moving to the next stage means stopping, wrecking what we have, and creating something else.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I will ask Gregory Campbell to speak, followed by Alan McFarland. Rather than simply go round and round, I will then see whether the Committee can reach consensus.

Mr Campbell: I will be brief, Chairman.

The concept of voluntary coalition, like many concepts in Northern Ireland, suffers as a result of being viewed in completely different ways by those who are either in favour of it — as the DUP is — or those who totally oppose it. The purpose of a voluntary coalition is to ensure that there is not an implacable veto on establishing a government. The DUP believes that the formation of a government should not be prevented because one party is inextricably linked to criminality, gangsterism, terror, the importation of guns, and punishment beatings. Government should not be held up because of that, irrespective of the size of the mandate of those who advocate that type of activity, and, in some cases, take part in it.

That is how the DUP views voluntary coalition. Others claim that a voluntary coalition will circumvent the need for support across the community — which is why we had a discussion about the voting system and community designation. Peter outlined the issues regarding mandatory coalition. We must grasp the nettle and establish a system that allows government to function. Just as others have talked of their background and their history of resentment about how institutions were governed in the past, some of us remember how systems were run in the more recent past.

We want to arrive at some form of voluntary coalition — some system of government — that is not held, almost literally, to ransom by one party that will not budge and that says that there will be no Government without its endorsement. We need a device to ensure that if the operation and interaction of one party is unacceptable, the system of government can nevertheless get up and running and will not grind to a complete halt due to the position that that party adopts.

Mr McFarland: In a normal society, Governments operate by voluntary coalition. If a party can form a government, it does so; if it cannot, it joins with others to form it. However, the Belfast Agreement is, rightly or wrongly, the template that we are discussing. The Prime Minister said so, so we are discussing how we can modify and improve it. The Belfast Agreement does not cite a voluntary coalition but a mandatory coalition.

Earlier, the Committee heard from the SDLP, which made it quite clear — [Interruption.]

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do you wish to take a point of information?

Mr McFarland: Yes.

Mr P Robinson: For goodness' sake, that is a crazy argument. Is Alan saying that we should not consider the Belfast Agreement because it does not mention a voluntary coalition? The Belfast Agreement does not and will not include any of the other changes that we want either. Is he saying that we should not look at making changes because they are not in the Belfast Agreement?

Mr McFarland: No. As Peter said earlier, we are here to modify and improve the Belfast Agreement.

Mr P Robinson: I do not think that I said that.

Mr McFarland: The SDLP made it clear earlier in Committee that it is not prepared to enter into a voluntary coalition. It is an aspiration for us all for when society here allows everyone to be comfortable with discussing their politics and trying to form a Government with those of a like mind. The political reality is that we are not currently at that point.

The SDLP has made it clear that it will not exclude Sinn Féin and go into government with the rest of us. That is the only voluntary coalition that is likely to happen, for the reasons that Gregory has just outlined. The DUP finds Sinn Féin not to be acceptable. The only other cross-community way in which the DUP could go into government is with the SDLP; and the SDLP said on the Hansard record at the beginning of the proceedings that it will not do that. However aspirational it may be at the moment, it is not achievable. We would like to see it happen down the line, but it will not happen immediately.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Of course, the eloquence of the DUP is such that it could persuade the SDLP.

Mr McFarland: Absolutely.

Mr McGlone: Or vice versa.

Mr P Robinson: Or something else might persuade the SDLP. I have had private meetings with the SDLP in which it was nuanced, somewhat. It was not saying that there were no circumstances in which it would participate in a voluntary coalition. If, for instance, the IRA were to take off on a terrorist campaign akin to that in 1972, would the SDLP really hold out for Sinn Féin to be in government?

Dr Farren: Let us deal with the realities that face us rather than get into hypothetical discussions.

Mr P Robinson: That indicates that there are circumstances in which it would be possible.

Dr Farren: Many things are possible if the premise upon which we are working is changed. However, we are not changing it; the premise is the premise.

Mr P Robinson: Others could change the premise.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The proposal is that the Executive should be formed by voluntary coalition. Do we have consensus?

Members indicated dissent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We do not have consensus; one if not two groups are opposed to it.

The next issue — a very important one — is that of the election of Speaker and Deputy Speaker.

Mr Campbell: Jim, that is twice that you have described that as important business.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): This is a big issue.

Ms Lewsley: A declaration of interest? [Laughter.]

Mr P Robinson: As a first question, do we need Deputy Speakers?

Ms Lewsley: And if so, how many?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): They are absolutely essential.

As members know, the election of Speaker and Deputy Speaker is an issue that requires a cross-community vote. That has not occurred in the Assembly, because both Speakers were —

Mr P Robinson: Imposed.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): They were arrived at by other means. We have had elections for the Deputy Speakers when three of them were elected in 2000.

Several parties, including the DUP, flagged up that issue. It has not featured prominently in cross-examinations. Does any party feel that the issue (a) poses an impediment to devolution or (b) should be dealt with after devolution?

Mr P Robinson: Some of us resent the fact that the Secretary of State appoints the Speaker and the Deputy Speakers. The Assembly should elect its Speaker and Deputy Speakers, whatever voting system is used.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are members content that the Speaker and the Deputy Speakers be elected by a cross-community vote?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There seem to be no burning issues about this topic.

Mr McFarland: May I raise an issue for further discussion? Who holds the Speaker to account? During the Assembly's first mandate, questions were asked about the absolute power of the Speaker, with the Speaker having a budget and the Assembly having no input into what it thought the Speaker should be doing. Is there an issue about the Assembly's ability to advise, influence or control the Speaker?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I clearly remember the day when a motion of no confidence was brought against the Speaker, and Jane Morrice had to take over the Chair. That mechanism exists, as do the Assembly Commission and the Business Committee, both of which the Speaker chairs. Should the Assembly have more control over the Speaker's activities?

Mr McFarland: Ministers must agree a Programme for Government, and so forth, with the Executive. Committees and other areas of the Assembly have oversight mechanisms. During the first mandate, there was no oversight mechanism, and the Speaker could not be challenged, other than by tabling a motion of no confidence, which is fairly high on the seriousness scale.

Mr P Robinson: That is the mechanism, and it is also the mechanism that is used elsewhere. Under the Northern Ireland Act 1998, there are several circumstances under which a Speaker can be replaced, one of which is that the Assembly can elect a member to hold the position of Speaker. What decisions does the Speaker take beyond his or her judgement in the Chair during debates? The Speaker is subject to controls on every other issue: he or she is under audit controls; he or she is in the Chair at meetings of the Assembly Commission, but only members of the Commission can vote. Where are the dangers in the system?

Mr McFarland: Peter sat on the Shadow Assembly Commission, and, at that time, members commented on the jaunts around the world and the amount of money that was being spent. It may well be that the auditors audited the books, but my understanding is that the Speaker had a budget, and he could decide when and where he went, and what he said about the Assembly. There was no mechanism in place to report back on what he had been doing and why he was doing it. It seemed to be outside the Assembly's control.

Mr P Robinson: Surely the Commission should have controlled that.

Ms Lewsley: Or the Assembly.

Mr McCarthy: The past Speaker, the present Speaker and the Deputy Speakers have been people of the highest integrity. There is no problem. They have conducted their business impeccably.

Mr P Robinson: He really could not say anything else, could he?

Mr McCarthy: Absolutely not.

Ms Lewsley: Surely the Speaker is ultimately accountable to the Assembly? Any questions about inappropriate action could be raised in the Chamber.

12.00 noon

Mr P Robinson: On spending matters, the Speaker is accountable to the Assembly Commission, which holds the voting power to take decisions. As regards adjudicating in the Assembly, the Speaker is ultimately subject to the will of the Assembly.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): This does not seem to be a burning issue. Is the Committee content with the present arrangements in Standing Orders for the election of the Speaker and Deputy Speakers?

Members indicated assent.

Dr Farren: If we could just agree the nomination.

Mr Campbell: That is a slightly different matter.
[Laughter.]

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The next issue is perhaps slightly more complex: the election of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, which several parties, including the DUP, have raised as an issue of concern. This matter brings us back to the earlier discussion about designations, voting systems and so on. Does any member wish to lead the discussion by outlining what they feel is unsatisfactory with the present arrangement?

Mr P Robinson: If you want to get the row going, I will start. If there is a mandatory system, with the resultant requirement to ensure automaticity in everything, then why have an element that is subject to something other than a mandatory system? Ministers are automatically nominated by a process, but, from somewhere out of the blue, having recognised that there is a need for a mandatory form of Government, people say that the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister should be elected via a different process. There is a nonsense in that contradiction.

If anyone has looked at the difficulty that we had in trying to agree a Speaker, or the difficulties that we had in trying to determine who should chair meetings of this very Committee, they will know the difficulties that there would be in reaching agreement on a First Minister and a Deputy First Minister. On that basis, why put measures into place that will cause, at least, an obstacle, if not gridlock, and why not continue with an automatic system such as the one for Ministers? That is the obvious way forward. Many mechanisms could be used to do that, but I have explained the principle behind our position.

Mr McFarland: The essence of the agreement was that parties were pushed, so to speak, into sorting themselves out. The essence of the office of First Minister and Deputy First Minister, which is clear right the way through the legislation, is that it is a joint post, and that the Assembly votes for the pair. Members may not like the people concerned, but the posts are voted for as an entity because the office operates as an entity. It does not operate as two separate entities — there is no separate First Minister or Deputy First Minister. The office comprises both the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister.

If we are to completely move away from that situation and have a separate Prime Minister and a Deputy Prime Minister, then that is a different matter. However, in the comprehensive agreement, as I understood it, the DUP and Sinn Féin accepted that the office was joint — that is what it says in the agreement — but there was an attempt to have the election of that joint office done separately. Why was that? Why would we wish to do that?

One interesting thing about electing the office jointly is that unionists, nationalists and republicans have a veto over who their First Minister or Deputy First Minister will be. If they are not happy with the person nominated, they can refuse to vote. The process continues until such times as a pair that is acceptable is voted into office. If we get to a stage where the DUP accepts Sinn Féin as partners for Government — the only scenario in which this becomes relevant — it could be that the DUP will find Martin McGuinness unacceptable.

Under the current system, the DUP could ask Sinn Féin to reconsider its nomination if it were not happy to have Martin McGuinness as Deputy First Minister. It could ask Sinn Féin to put forward Conor Murphy, for example, if it felt it could vote for that option. Similarly, Sinn Féin could be neuralgic about Rev Ian Paisley as First Minister and could ask for someone else to be nominated. Therefore there is a degree of cross-community say in who is nominated.

In the comprehensive agreement, it looks as though the DUP was unhappy about public perception if it had to vote for Martin McGuinness. They came up with a cunning system in which unionists could vote for unionists and nationalists for nationalists, so that they would not have to stand up in public with dirty hands, having voted for Martin McGuinness. How would that operate in a joint-office situation as the two people nominated to those posts must operate jointly? That seems to be a bit of a smokescreen in order to avoid voting for the opposition. There was another strange system suggested in which the Ministers all went out, and there was a wrap-up vote.

The difficulty with the comprehensive agreement, which was negotiated by the DUP and Sinn Féin, was that if the SDLP and the Ulster Unionists did not support the candidates for First Minister and Deputy First Minister, they would be excluded from government for the entire life of that Assembly, leaving the DUP and Sinn Féin in government together. As I understand it, it is the DUP's worst nightmare to be left in government with Sinn Féin and with no other cover. Therefore the system negotiated in the comprehensive agreement, and which was within a hair's breadth of implementation in December 2004, seems slightly daft, and negotiated for all the wrong reasons.

Mrs Long: We are not exercised about the decoupling of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister — having them coupled did not show that they had a good working relationship. However, we do believe, having lost the argument this morning on voluntary coalition, that we should now examine how to increase coherence and collectivity in the mandatory coalition. We want to move from a situation in which there is power dividing among parties in the Executive to one in which there is power sharing. At the bare minimum, that requires all members of the Executive to be willing to support the collective responsibility of the Executive and to recognise all other participants as equal members. At the sharp end, that requires parties to recognise those who are sharing power with them in that Executive and, indeed, in the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. It should be part of a collective vote in the Assembly to approve the First Minister and Deputy First Minister. We would prefer to see that vote coupled, because it would enhance collectivity.

We realise that a vote will not make people work together, but it would indicate a willingness to take the first steps towards working together. If people are not willing, at a bare minimum, to endorse other peoples' positions in the Government, yet will go into government with those same people, there is something inherently unstable about that. Our argument is that there should, therefore, be a collective vote on electing the First Minister and Deputy First Minister. The office should remain coupled in the way that it is at present.

Mr McNarry: The discussion so far says to me that we need to redefine the role of the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister (OFMDFM). My experience in the First Minister's Office told me that "jointery" between the Ulster Unionists and the SDLP simply did not work. I cannot recollect that I could compile a list of great successes. With regard to redefinition, it was inappropriate that, apart from other duties of little consequence, the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister had — and the Civil Service and the back-up team wanted to prove "jointery" more than anyone else — responsibility for community relations.

Consultation documents came out of that office as if paper had just been invented and was something novel to play with. In effect, nothing of any substance or benefit to the community came out of it. The First Minister and the Deputy First Minister spent their time fire-fighting community disputes. I thought that it was menial that the two titular representatives of the Government of Northern Ireland — and I am not belittling community relations as a departmental issue; it is very important — had that responsibility but could not make a decision between them.

The First Minister — and what is the point in calling him that if that is not what he is? — could say or do nothing without the approval of the deputy. In one instance, the First Minister could not visit a Protestant area, because the Deputy First Minister would not go with him. The First Minister was told that he could not and must not go — it was not "jointery". One would have thought that the relationship between the two parties at that time and the personnel involved would have been pretty amenable to sorting things out. Given who we might have as First Minister and Deputy First Minister, I see a crazy situation arising; obstinacy would kick in, and that would be that.

There is an interpretation of the working of this office in which "jointery" is key. If asked, the last First Minister would not agree that he operated a joint office, and that is the problem: the First Minister is the First Minister, and the deputy is deputy. The First Minister should always have a deputy, but it might be better if he or she chose the person rather than have the crazy "jointery" with which the office is bedevilled. Unless we agree and recognise that, we are going nowhere. We need to redefine the workings of that office.

Mr Campbell: My contribution is a variation on what David said. It is clear that, under the old system, the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister was not just about the establishment of a Department. It was also about the perception of the “representatives” of the two communities and of the two largest parties acting in unison, and that gave out a particular message, whether said or unsaid. It was said many times, and left unsaid some times, but that was how it was perceived. Its practicalities under the old system were as David McNarry said.

My party knows less about it than David does, but if that was the case under the old system, will anybody claim that under any new system such a projection would be anything other than a pretence? Any system that we agree must acknowledge and allow for the difficulties of the past; it must be sufficiently fluid and flexible to permit Government to continue and to permit the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to be elected. It must not perpetuate the urban myth that this is a joint office with the two Ministers acting only after prior consultation and agreement with each other with neither able to do anything without the consent of the other. Either we accept that that did not work or we do not, and most people accept that it did not.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr McNarry has provoked much interest. Mrs Long, Dr Farren, Alan McFarland, Peter Robinson and Mr Murphy wish to speak. As there is quite a lot of debate forthcoming, members will please try to keep it as snappy as possible.

Mrs Long: The issues concerning the functions of the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister need to be resolved later. This debate is specifically about how that office is elected. The Alliance Party has some firm proposals as to how the office should be shaped. We oppose Members simply being put into those positions — particularly such responsible positions within the Executive — on the basis of simple mandatory coalition rules, where Members are placed in positions and that is the end of the line. There should be a joint election for the posts of First Minister and Deputy First Minister, in the context of the Executive also being subject to an Assembly vote to endorse it. It is important that that should take place.

The DUP has said that it would not be in favour of a joint election of First Minister and Deputy First Minister. The position between that and simply adopting a mandatory template is to choose a First Minister and a Deputy First Minister, fill the remaining Executive posts and endorse them on the Floor of the Assembly. Is the DUP suggesting that position, or does it propose that those posts should simply be filled on a mandatory basis with no endorsement from the Assembly?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The DUP can either interject with a point of information or wait until its next turn.

Mr P Robinson: I have other things to say, so I will take Mrs Long’s views on board as well.

Dr Farren: Experience has much to teach us in this matter as in others. I am not sure that all the bedevilment of the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister that has been mentioned can be attributed to the joint nature of the office. Indeed, it is a challenge to the principle on which the joint nature of the office is based. I also recognise that we can point to anomalies, as Peter has done, in respect of the operation of the election of Ministers under the mandatory principle.

Let us look at what we expect of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister and why we would have two such Ministers on a coequal basis. In a sense, it comes back to the underlying objective of what we are trying to achieve: reconciliation; respect; and co-operation between our communities.

The Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister is not, therefore, a functional set of responsibilities for each office-holder, whereby business of the Executive is managed. However, there is a clear representative function on behalf of the Assembly as a whole and, indeed, on behalf of the entire enterprise — the people of Northern Ireland. Therefore, for the Assembly to jointly elect both posts goes some way to endorsing that particular representative responsibility, in that representatives of each community have confidence in the Minister from the opposite community who holds one or other of the two offices.

There is no doubt that, if two people and two parties are involved, more than two parties will be involved in any decision-making process. Before we get too tied up with the problems that arose in the past and directly attribute them to the joint nature of the office, we should recognise that reaching a decision in this case will necessarily be a little more complex and lengthy than if there were only one person and one party.

The most efficient form of Government might well be one that is run by a dictator, who simply tells the rest of us what to do. However, when parties and their representatives are involved in the decision-making process, we must accept that there will be some inherent complexities and, if nothing else, delays in the way in which decisions are reached. That is part and parcel of that type of process. Indeed, in this society, it is probably an essential part of building consensus and ensuring that reconciliation will flow from that consensus.

Therefore, before we rush to address the practical difficulties, let us not lose sight of the underlying principles that have informed some of the procedures adopted in the Good Friday Agreement. I have some fairly close experience of the way in which things operated. Decisions were reached, meetings were held under joint chairmanship, and the process of government was conducted in such a way that gave at least the prospect of matters improving. However difficult, complex, tedious and lengthy some of those procedures and processes, we must weigh them against our ultimate goal.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Gentlemen, ladies, it is 12.21 pm, and the food is about to arrive. I am looking for your guidance.

Mr Campbell: The food wins the vote, Chairman.

Dr Farren: On this one.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The next members to speak will be Alan McFarland, followed by Peter Robinson. Are members happy to break for lunch now, or would they rather conclude the meeting first?

Dr Farren: How long will it take to finish the meeting?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): At the rate we are going, we will be having food in about two hours' time.

Dr Farren: Let us have the food. It will be sustenance for the battle that lies ahead.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will take a 15-minute break.

The Committee was suspended at 12.23 pm.

On resuming —

12.47 pm

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Clerks arranged a very pleasant lunch. If that trend continues, it will be very welcome.

We broke after Dr Farren's contribution; Mr McFarland is next, followed by Mr Robinson and Mr Murphy. After that we want to move quickly on to the next topic.

Mr McFarland: The joint nature of the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister (OFMDFM) was a core safeguard in the agreement. David McNarry has highlighted various problems. There were major problems with the personalities involved in the first Assembly. That does not mean that the actual joint nature was wrong; rather, it did not work particularly well because those involved were, shall we say, not comfortable with each other.

Many issues were assigned to that office that perhaps should not have been. There are issues that are outside the office, but that might reasonably be put in. There is a whole discussion to be had about what OFMDFM as a Department should contain. There is also an issue about the oversight of that Department, but it is hard to see how we can move away from the essential safeguard of the joint nature of the office. It is not ideal — in many ways it is far from ideal — but it was put there because the communities did not trust each other to operate independently.

It is difficult to see how one could interfere with the joint nature of the office, which is in the legislation, without having a complete renegotiation of the entire agreement. I do not think anyone is suggesting that; it would take years. The chances of us getting agreement on anything similar ever again are nil, I should think.

Mr P Robinson: I have a slight distaste for people who put forward propositions without explaining how they are so. How is it a "core safeguard"? What is it safeguarding? What does one method of electing a First Minister and a Deputy First Minister safeguard over another? You still end up with a First Minister and a Deputy First Minister. There is no safeguard within the election.

Mr McFarland: I think that Peter has misunderstood. I have moved on to the essence of the Department. I agree that we should go back to the issue of elections. My comments were in relation to the essence of the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister and the joint nature of it; they were not specifically to do with the voting mechanism for it, which I covered earlier.

Mr P Robinson: I agree with David McNarry. He has identified something that is not on our agenda: the role of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister.

When there was a First Minister and a Deputy First Minister, I was startled to see that they felt that they had to go about hand in hand and even go to the toilet together. It seems absurd that there could not be a sensible division of the workload and still have it considered to be a joint office. That should be done.

We do not expect the two of them to stand up and answer questions by chanting the same answer at the same time, so they do not have to do everything together at the same time. The Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister has a joint responsibility rather than the two Ministers being expected to do everything jointly together.

Therefore it would be worth having the role of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister as an item on the agenda.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The functions of OFMDFM are included under “Efficiency/Effectiveness”, and they would be better discussed under that heading.

Mr P Robinson: I will perhaps return to it when we are discussing that heading.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We are currently discussing the mechanism for electing the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister.

Mr P Robinson: The definitions of the functions are distinct from how those functions are exercised, and David McNarry’s point was about how the functions are being exercised. Therefore as long as you are happy to add “the exercise of those functions” we can deal with this point under “Efficiency/Effectiveness”. I am not sure that it is a matter of efficiency, but it is certainly a matter of effectiveness.

I will deal with the principle of the election of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister and its practice. With regard to the principle, I would contend that no violence is being done to the institutions by the mechanism that is used for the election, and no underlying principle is harmed by having it elected in a different way.

Someone asked how the elections would be carried out. The most obvious way is to use the same kind of format that exists for the election of Ministers. Therefore the nominating officer from the largest party in the largest designation will make the appointment of the First Minister and the nominating officer for the largest party in the second largest designation will make the nomination for the Deputy First Minister. Just as there is no requirement for a vote to elect Ministers under the existing practice, so it would be for the First Minister, the Deputy First Minister and other Ministers.

The SDLP and the Ulster Unionists protested about the fact that if they did not vote for the ministerial state, at the end of the day they would be excluded from Government. They did not explain to me how they felt it would be proper for them to be a part of an Executive that they were not prepared to vote for. If they answered that for me, they would probably give me a stick to beat them with where the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister are concerned.

If they were willing to serve in an Executive with those who have been nominated by other nominating officers, I cannot understand why they would not be prepared to vote collectively for that Executive. If, however, that is the case, they add to the argument that there should be no similar requirement in respect of the appointment of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister.

I now turn to the practice of this election. The DUP preferred a voluntary coalition; in that way you can choose whom to take along with you. If we do not have that system, why should one be asked to vote for people whom one did not choose to be in Government? It is as simple as that. If members want a mandatory system, let it be a mandatory system; if they want a voluntary system, let it be a voluntary system; but let us have consistency in one or the other. That is the principal argument. Just as this Committee was deadlocked in its decision to elect a Chairman, MLAs will be deadlocked if they have that requirement for a future Assembly. Is that really what members want?

Mr Murphy: There are two discussions: one is on the mechanism for electing the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, and the other is on the operation of that office. The previous incumbents did not operate as well as they could have, but they managed to agree to limit the scope of the scrutiny function of the Committee of the Centre. They also agreed to take matters that related to the Strategic Investment Board into the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. They found agreement on issues that the rest of us had difficulties with, but that is not an argument for changing the current mechanism.

There are anomalies in the Good Friday Agreement. The issue of electing the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister was meant to have symbolic significance, but the operation of that office by the former First Minister and Deputy First Minister did not lend itself to that. Nonetheless, Sinn Féin does not believe that there is an argument to change that now. We advocate that it stays as it is, under the Good Friday Agreement.

Alan McFarland mentioned ideas that had been put forward by the two Governments in the latter half of 2004. Sinn Féin has made it clear time and again that any proposals that were considered at that time were in the context of the situation that pertained at that time. We also made it clear that our approach to matters involving the Executive or the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister was one of inclusivity and of locking people into the Executive; it was not about locking anyone out of the Executive. Sinn Féin is unique among all the parties in that it has no history of the practice of exclusionist politics.

On the election of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, we advocate sticking with the Good Friday Agreement as it is.

Mrs Long: The Alliance Party has stated its position on a voluntary coalition. However, if we were to have a mandatory coalition, our argument would be different to that of the DUP. We would try to amend that coalition to increase and enhance the amount of collaboration and collectivity within it, rather than diminishing those on the basis that if it is mandatory, let it simply be mandatory and nothing more. The Alliance Party would like that collective role and nature to be enhanced.

The Alliance Party proposed that the Executive should be subject to a vote of support in the House, and that Members who enter into a mandatory coalition could choose to absent themselves from nominating to ministerial posts if they are unhappy with the make-up of the mandatory coalition. However, if Members are going to nominate to that coalition, it is important that they at least acknowledge that other Members have a right to be at the table with them.

The DUP seems to prefer not to have a joint election for the posts of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. Is the DUP therefore willing to vote for them as a collective with the rest of the Executive or is it simply a matter that that would be mandatory and nothing more?

Mr P Robinson: The terms of the proposal are what would matter. The terms of the proposal that we agreed to vote for in December 2004 were that those who are nominated would be in the Executive. That is slightly different.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Everyone has had adequate opportunity for discussion. There seem to be two proposals: one from Mr Robinson and one from Mrs Long. I shall put the first to members. Mr Robinson proposes that the positions of First Minister and Deputy First Minister be filled by separate nominations. The largest party would nominate to the post of First Minister, and the second largest party would nominate to the post of Deputy First Minister.

1.00 pm

Mr P Robinson: No, that is incorrect. The largest party would nominate to the post of First Minister, and because the two largest parties may be from the same designation, the larger party from the second largest designation would nominate to the post of Deputy First Minister.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes, sorry, I get your point. The proposal, therefore, ends with the second largest designation nominating to the Deputy First Minister post. Do we have agreement on that?

Members indicated dissent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): As there is no agreement, that proposal falls.

Mr P Robinson: I assure you, Mr Chairman, that it does not fall.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It falls as far as getting the agreement of this Committee is concerned. It will arise again in future discussions.

Mr P Robinson: May I identify that as an issue that must be resolved?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): OK.

Mrs Long's proposal is that the election of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister be the subject of a collective vote in the Assembly.

Mr McFarland: That is the current position.

Mrs Long: No, I raised two issues. The Alliance Party's preference is for the First Minister and Deputy First Minister to be elected with a collective vote, which is the current situation. However, we recognise that at least one party has significant issues with that, and we wish to seek a compromise that does not diminish the collectivity of that joint office, but increases the collectivity of the entire Executive. Therefore the Alliance Party's proposal is that the entire Executive, including the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, should be endorsed by a vote in the Assembly.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): In that case, "the entire Executive" must be added to your proposal.

Mr Murphy: The election of the Executive is included in the next item on the agenda.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): How should we deal with this?

Mrs Long: I am indifferent as to how we deal with it.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is it still a proposal?

Mrs Long: If it would be better to consider the proposal under the next point, I am happy to defer it until then.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Thank you.

We move on to the next item, which is the approval of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister and the Executive. Clearly, there is a high degree of overlap between this discussion and the one we have just had, so we do not wish to rehearse all those points again. Does anyone from the DUP wish to say anything? Other parties raised this issue, but the DUP made the lengthiest submission.

Mr P Robinson: We have dealt with at least part of this point, and my comments referred to the approval of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister and the Executive. There can be no argument for requiring the approval of the nominations for the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister but not of the Executive. That seems to be a point made by both the Ulster Unionists and the SDLP.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is there any reaction to that?

Mr McFarland: I want to clarify whether the vote on the nominations to the Executive would be cross community. Presumably it would be.

Secondly, what would happen if the cross-community vote were to go against the nominations? Technically, a particular party or designation may be unhappy with one Minister only. What mechanism would there be to tell the party that nominated the so-called objectionable Minister that its nomination had been rejected and that to get approval for that position, it might have to nominate again? What would be the consequential outflow of a vote against the collective Executive? The vote may have been against one Minister, two Ministers or whatever, but how could that problem be identified?

Mr P Robinson: There is a further issue: are we saying that we would operate a system in which a nominating officer could be overruled?

Mr McFarland: The current system for electing the First Minister and Deputy First Minister is that a nominating officer can be overruled in the Assembly by a party of another tradition saying that it is not happy.

Mr P Robinson: There is no nominating officer for the election of First Minister and Deputy First Minister.

Mr McFarland: The Assembly can express a view on the election of First Minister and Deputy First Minister and it does not matter who the nominating officer has put forward. The Assembly can tell the nominating officer that it is not happy with the nomination, and to think again.

Effectively, there is a nominating officer: the largest party puts forward person A to represent its party, and the other tradition puts forward person B to represent it. They are nominated but not by a nominating officer — although presumably they are nominated within their party.

The Assembly does not have the ability to say that it is not happy with the ministerial choice.

Mr P Robinson: It could have.

Mr McFarland: Yes, but how could that be identified? Everybody could be happy with nine of the 10 Ministers, but how could the Assembly identify the Minister that one or more parties, of whatever tradition, are not happy with, and tell the party concerned to think again.

Mr P Robinson: Presumably a party would say whom it is opposed to. What happens after the Assembly has identified that person, or persons?

Mr McFarland: There would be a debate.

Mr P Robinson: You want the nominating officer to change the nomination.

Mr McFarland: There is no point in voting if the Assembly does not have that option.

Mr P Robinson: Absolutely. There must be consistency one way or the other. Either the Assembly has the right to choose its First Minister and Deputy First Minister and its Ministers, or it is mandatory throughout.

Mr McFarland: But you are choosing your First Minister and Deputy First Minister with the current system.

Mr P Robinson: You are. I am proposing something different.

Mr McFarland: Chairman, the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister share joint office and they are voted for jointly. The Assembly can say that it is not happy with that pair being in the lead. That is the choice at the moment. It has been suggested that there should be a vote for the Ministers as well. However, Peter Robinson seems to be saying that even if the Assembly says that it is not happy with those Ministers, it cannot gainsay the nominating officer of a particular party by saying that the Assembly may not be happy with that Minister. What is the point of having a vote if the Assembly cannot influence the choice, and how does the Assembly identify whether it is a particular Minister that the Assembly is not happy with, or whether the Assembly is not happy with five of the Ministers?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Presumably there would be a debate.

Mr McFarland: That was my question. There should be a debate after the nominations, in which case, Members could say who they like or dislike, and have a vote. What would that achieve if you were gainsaying the nominating officer?

Mr P Robinson: That is why it should be either mandatory or voluntary, throughout the system. Mr McFarland seems to think that because the Belfast Agreement says that this is a joint office and they must be elected jointly, that that is it. I do not accept that. I accept that it should be the same system for the election of First Minister and Deputy First Minister as it is for the Ministers.

Mr McFarland: Chairman, we have a system — [Interruption.]

Mr P Robinson: We do not have a system. We have deadlock at the moment.

Mr McFarland: A system is laid down in law, and the only way to get away from that — in theory — is by some sort of consensus that we need to move away from it. We are trying to work out the blockages that people have problems with, and whether there is any consensus to sort them out or not. Sinn Féin is deemed to be acceptable in Government, but we will not progress unless those problems can be sorted out and there is consensus.

I am not trying to argue, I am just trying to tease out the position on the various proposals, and the consequences of those proposals. If a vote were taken in the Assembly on the election of Ministers, could the Assembly do anything if a party refused to re-nominate? How could we identify which Minister the Assembly is not happy with? I am speaking to the people who proposed the system.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Dr Farren and Ms Lewsley have been waiting a long time.

Dr Farren: I am interested in whether Peter will answer those questions.

Mr P Robinson: My proposition is that nominating officers should nominate for all positions, including First Minister and Deputy First Minister.

Dr Farren: We have little of substance to add. I have outlined reasons why the process of nominating the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister should remain the same. If we move to a situation where nominating officers nominate Ministers from the parties entitled to hold office, I am unsure as to what purpose a vote after that would serve. If there were a negative outcome, the only way of disapproving of the nomination of one Minister would be to disapprove of them all, identify during the debate the identity of the Minister in questions and hope that the nominating officer would act accordingly. However, I cannot imagine that any nominating officer would.

The alternative might be for a party so minded to enter a vote of no confidence naming a particular Minister. Again, that would not have the intended effect. Disapproval of a Minister would have to achieve a level of cross-community support for it to have any impact.

Ms Lewsley: With respect to the collective voting of Ministers, it would be hard to identify which Minister is disapproved of, unless he or she is named in a vote of no confidence, which Seán mentioned. My concern is that it would descend into a personality contest. If parties enter an Executive in good faith, how can one party say that it does not accept a nomination from another? Parties will make recommendations for their own reasons. It is unreasonable for a party to claim that it does not agree with another's nomination because they believe that that person is unsuitable for the job.

Mrs Long: This discussion highlights the specific problems of trying to achieve inclusivity and collectivity within a mandatory coalition system. The vote to endorse the Executive ought to reinforce its collectivity, but it is being viewed as a means of pillorying individual Ministers. That is not the context in which such a vote should take place. However, that says something about the attitude of parties around the table in that they will see that vote as an opportunity to attack Ministers from other parties.

Bearing in mind that those Ministers and their colleagues will serve in the same Executive as members from other parties, it seems ludicrous for members of the same Government to attack its Ministers. When Minister publicly turns on Minister, it is a sign of a failing Government.

This discussion highlights that establishing a sense of collective responsibility in the Executive at the outset is critical to its functioning. The election of Ministers to the Executive should not be a mechanism of declaring no confidence in an individual, but a mechanism by which a party recognises that other parties have the same rights and responsibilities to nominate the appropriate Ministers from within their party teams. It is not about simply about picking and choosing other parties' nominations, but about reflecting the fact that a party accepts the right of other parties to make those choices and accepts that they are part of a collective.

There was a strange situation in the last Assembly where Members were Ministers, but not members of the Executive. That is not a recipe for good governance, and it certainly does not enhance collectivity within the Executive or create stability. It would be better if Members endorsed the notion of the Executive. Peter Robinson used a form of words by which nominations would be accepted. That might be a lowest common denominator, but it would be better than no endorsement whatsoever, which would suggest that parties have not bought into the idea that, once in the Executive, they are part of the same Government.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): No one else has indicated a wish to speak. I have a proposal from Naomi, although I am open to others. The proposal says that the entire Executive, including the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, should be subject to a collective vote in the Assembly. That is obviously a combination of earlier proposals. Are there any other proposals?

Mr P Robinson: I want to ensure that everyone understands the process. My argument was that the nominating officers should nominate a First Minister and a Deputy First Minister in the way in which I outlined, and there would be no vote. Ministers would then be nominated by parties' nominating officers, as was the practice. Collectively, all the Ministers would make up a team, and, as proposed in the comprehensive agreement, the proposal that Ministers A, B, C, and so forth, would form the Northern Ireland Executive would be put to the Assembly. Therefore, the requirement is clearly an acceptance — as opposed to a desire — that those Members will be in the Executive. It gives, at least, a higher degree of approval for their work than has been the case heretofore.

Mr McGimpsey: In the first mandate, the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister were not elected on the same day on which the rest of the Executive were appointed, and they were subject to different mandates. The First Minister and the Deputy First Minister are elected under the principle of parallel consent and the rest of the Executive are appointed under d'Hondt. If both the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister and the Executive are to be elected at the same time, how will those mandates be changed? It seems much more sensible to keep the election of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister separate, and, once they are in place and the Assembly has consented to and approved the individuals concerned, they will form a Government, albeit a mandatory coalition formed under d'Hondt.

Mr Murphy: Following on from what Michael McGimpsey has said, and this is an issue that the DUP has raised on several occasions, it is up to the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to decide on the number of Departments. If all were elected on the one slate, it strikes me that that would end that debate. Nonetheless, we are content with the system as it currently stands under the terms of the Good Friday Agreement.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I think that our lunch has slowed us down.

Having listened to what the DUP delegation has said, I believe that we have another proposal. Mrs Long's proposal is that the entire Executive, including the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, should be subject to a collective vote in the Assembly. Have we consensus on that?

Mr McFarland: What are the implications of a "No" vote on that?

Mr P Robinson: The same as they are for the election of a First Minister and a Deputy First Minister — deadlock.

Mrs Long: Whatever the mechanism, parties can contrive a deadlock if they are intent on doing so.

Mr McGimpsey: Is Mrs Long talking about parallel consent?

Mrs Long: If the composition of an Executive is endorsed after a vote in the Assembly, that, as far as the public is concerned, at least shows a willingness to work together in the Executive. It also sets down a marker for parties in that they have recognised other Members' right to participate fully in the Executive.

Mr McFarland: First, is Naomi saying that the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister and the Executive should all be voted for together, as Peter has suggested?

Secondly, should the vote be subject to the principle of parallel consent or 60:40:40?

Mrs Long: First, I will reinforce the Alliance Party's stated position. The party's preference would be for the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to be jointly elected in a separate vote. However, it is clear that there is no consensus on that proposal. My new proposal accommodates those who do not wish to have a separate vote on the election of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. At the same time, the proposal enhances Executive collectivity in general. The party believes, on principle, that progress must be made on that issue.

It is not that we are unwilling to see a First Minister and a Deputy First Minister elected; we have made our position clear on that. The DUP in particular is not content with that position. We are saying that there is a way of ensuring that the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister are elected and that collectivity in the Executive is simultaneously enhanced by putting the entire team to a vote.

Mr McFarland: By parallel consent?

Mrs Long: That would not be our choice. Weighted majority would be our preference, but I imagine that it would be at least a cross-community vote.

Mr McFarland: What does the law say on this? I understand that the law is specific on the roles and functions of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister and the order in which all this takes place.

Mrs Long: If we are here to discuss how the Assembly will function, discussing the laws that surround the framework of previous Assemblies is not necessarily useful.

Mr P Robinson: We are talking about how to change the law.

Mrs Long: The law is a moveable feast; it can be changed if necessary to accommodate any agreement that might be reached around the table. The issue is not whether the law permits it, but whether we agree it.

Mr McGimpsey: Yes, but it is better to do it within the existing framework if we can. Otherwise we will need agreement around the table on every jot and tittle.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Members, there is a slight addition to Mrs Long's proposal that a vote in the Assembly should be cross-community. We have looked at this from every angle.

Mr McFarland: Parallel consent, is that right?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): No, cross-community vote.

Mrs Long: My proposal is for a cross-community vote, the definition of which has already been discussed.

Mr McFarland: Therefore we are dropping the requirement for the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister under 50:50.

Mrs Long: Yes. That is what the proposal involves.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): To reiterate, the entire Executive, including the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, should be subject to a collective vote in the Assembly by a cross-community vote. Do we have consensus on that?

Members indicated dissent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The proposal falls.

I detect a proposal from the DUP, stating that the nominating officers should nominate the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister and the other Ministers, and that nominations to the Executive should be put to the Assembly for the vote. It does not say what type of vote. Perhaps we should beef that up a bit; I am summarising from the various contributions.

Mr P Robinson: Having the nominating officers nominate the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister and the Ministers is the way forward. If we want to get more collectivity, we can make it subject to a cross-community vote in the Assembly.

Mr Murphy: Is that the same proposal that we just discussed?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): What is the difference between that proposal and Mrs Long's?

Ms Lewsley: None. Except that Mr Robinson was saying that the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister would be nominated, then a team of Ministers would be nominated and voted on collectively; whereas Mrs Long proposed that the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister and all the Ministers would be voted in and on collectively.

Mr P Robinson: I understood Naomi's proposal as almost two separate votes in the Assembly, one for the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister —

Mrs Long: No. That would be our preferred option, but my proposal was specifically to accommodate those who did not want —

Mr P Robinson: Chairman, you were wrong in assuming that there was another proposal.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There seems to be little or no difference between the two, so it is not worth putting it to a vote.

We will move on to the other issues: proportionality, petitions of concern, the Assembly referring to the Executive, etc.

Proportionality was listed as a concern by the DUP. However, we could not tease out what was behind that issue.

Mr P Robinson: I do not think that it was put forward as a concern. At one stage we needed to go through all the facets of the structures and institutions, agreeing on some and not on others. It was not being raised as a concern; it was being put forward as one of the elements of the institutions.

Mr McFarland: Can you refresh us about what it is?

Mr P Robinson: We are talking about the proportionality representation on Committees, etc.

Mr McFarland: Do you mean d'Hondt?

Mr P Robinson: At present it is d'Hondt.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We do not need to dwell on that issue.

Mrs Long: In previous discussions the SDLP has said that, rather than run d'Hondt separately for ministerial posts, for Committee Chairs and so forth, it should be run just once. That would be a good thing. Our problem is not with proportionality itself, but with the d'Hondt mechanism. The fewer the number of posts, the larger the number of groups and the larger the disparity between the groups, the less proportional d'Hondt becomes and the more anomalies that are possible. That will be an issue during the discussions about the number of ministerial positions and Departments, because fewer Departments means less reflection of proportionality. Is the SDLP still of a mind to look at that issue under the heading of "Proportionality"?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are you suggesting that d'Hondt become a very long process, starting at the top with the Executive and going all the way down to the last Committee position?

Mrs Long: Yes.

Mr McFarland: All the big parties would get completely disenfranchised on the Committees.

Mrs Long: That is not, of course, the case.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We have a heading "Formation of Committees".

Mrs Long: It was not my proposal; I was simply asking the question of the SDLP.

Mr P Robinson: Surely we are mixing jelly beans with liquorice allsorts.

Mrs Long: Given that the SDLP raised the issue in earlier discussions about proportionality, I was simply asking for its views. Is that not the point of holding these meetings — to ask questions?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): “Formation of Committees” is a separate heading under “Committee System”, and we can address the issue of proportionality when we get to that.

Dr Farren: I would not want Naomi to be held in suspension until then. [Laughter.]

The SDLP suggested that the clock should not be restarted after d’Hondt is run to form an Executive; that would lead to a more proportionate and representative allocation of positions. In practical terms, we would want to examine in further detail how far the clock should continue to run. The principle that proportionality should be operated in that way should be considered.

Mrs Long: To restate our position, we would prefer to see the formation of an Executive, and elections to other positions, being conducted through an STV ballot of Members, rather than simply by running the d’Hondt formula. I do not expect that to become a proposal, nor do I expect it to get consensus, but that is my party’s position.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): In the absence of any motions, we have consensus to move on to the next item, “Petitions of concern”. A petition of concern must be signed by at least 30 Members, and it triggers a cross-community vote. This issue has featured in many submissions, although I do not detect much concern about the actual mechanism. Does any member wish to raise concerns? Petitions of concern have been used on seven or eight occasions that I can recall, including the famous “Easter lilies” debate.

Mr P Robinson: If ever there was a safeguard in the system, this is it.

Mr Campbell: The only concern was that the petition of concern would be dropped.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are members content with the petition of concern as it stands?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Everyone wants to retain the petition of concern. We have consensus, and we are on a roll.

This is a slightly more controversial issue: a proposal for an Assembly referral to the Executive. Again, this is an issue that the DUP has raised.

1.30 pm

Mr P Robinson: This matter is relevant in the context of a wider discussion about the accountability of the Executive and of Ministers. However, it is only one element of that wider issue. At our last meeting, David McNarry mentioned that powers were devolved by legislation to the Departments, as opposed to the Assembly. That meant that the Assembly does not have control over business — it does not have the final say. Individual Ministers have that final say. Therefore, the question is: who is accountable, and to whom?

The mechanism of which this is a part is intended to introduce some accountability into the system. Our proposal allows the Assembly to refer matters with which it is not content to the Executive. Obviously, our preference is that power should be devolved to the Assembly, which ultimately could decide against or in favour of a Minister’s proposal.

If power rests with the Assembly, this proposal becomes irrelevant. However, if power rests with a collective Executive, this measure is a safeguard that allows the Assembly to keep batting a matter back to the Executive for whatever number of times we allow. If power is to rest with Ministers, we shall not have any accountability.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): This and the next two issues for discussion — the statutory recognition of the supremacy of the Assembly, and the power to reverse ministerial decisions in certain circumstances — strike me as having such a degree of overlap that it would be best to discuss all three matters at once. There is bound to be overlap, and a single debate would neatly finish off this section. The entire relationship between the Assembly and the Executive, and the control thereof, is the issue here.

Mr McFarland: The question of where power resides concerns fundamental issues of law that are quite complicated. Without a detailed legal study it is hard to say whether that can be solved. The other two issues are potentially solvable among the parties. The idea of referring topics back to the Executive seems to be quite healthy. The question, I suppose, is whether one needs cross-community support before one can refer a matter back to the Executive. Under the comprehensive agreement proposals, the Assembly could have sent a matter back twice. The difficulty was that even if the Assembly disagreed with something it still did not have any power, other than referring it back twice, to actually do anything about it. Therefore, the question is whether the Assembly should have the ability to gainsay the Executive and the Ministers. It is also tied in with the reversal issue.

Technically, the issue should never arise. Logically, Ministers should confirm their position with their own parties, and there would be no one in the Assembly to vote. However, members will vividly recall the GP fundholding vote, when the Assembly put back fundholding for a year under Minister de Brún. I am not sure whether there were any other instances where the Assembly rebelled against what the Executive had collectively agreed.

There are times when that tension is extremely healthy, but how far do we go? Do we simply allow for the embarrassment of referring a matter back to the Executive twice to lead to an outcome? Alternatively, do we agree that if a matter is returned three times, the Assembly's writ runs?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It strikes me that this debate will go nowhere if one party says that the Executive must be supreme in every instance. If parties believe that the Executive must have complete control, we shall not make much progress on the other issues. It is important to see where the various parties stand on this crucial issue. I shall ask Naomi Long and then the other two parties to let us know where they stand on this matter.

Mrs Long: Our position is that, in certain circumstances, which should be very tightly defined, the Assembly needs to have the power to negate a ministerial decision on the basis of a cross-community vote. That is distinct from ministerial decisions that require cross-community support to pass. We have detailed proposals on this, and we would be happy to circulate them, if that would be helpful.

Our proposal is that if someone were to put forward such a motion, it would have to be signed by at least 20 other Assembly Members in order to reach the stage where the Speaker would judge whether it was competent — given the rules that would have to be set up to strictly limit the degree to which that could happen — or whether it was vexatious. Once it had been agreed as competent, it would be debated. If there were a cross-community vote in favour of negating the Minister's decision, the motion would come back to the point at which no decision had been taken. That is our proposal for accountability between Ministers and the Assembly.

Of more importance, however, is the issue of collectivity within the Executive. It is clear that at different points during the last Assembly, all members of the Executive were not supportive of individual ministerial decisions. We do not want to set up a series of vetoes, whereby Ministers would be hampered in the conduct of their duties. We want to see some form of enhanced collectivity within the Executive. Again, we envisage a mechanism for a Minister to be called to the Executive to debate a particular issue if it were judged to be contentious by a number of his or her Executive colleagues.

We can submit more detailed proposals on that, but we believe that the Assembly should have the right to negate a decision in certain circumstances.

Dr Farren: This is a complex issue, and I am not sure whether, in the course of what will be a fairly cursorious discussion, we will be able to make all the necessary distinctions to arrive at a consensus. If we consider practice elsewhere, we can take the maxim of the Mother of all Parliaments that Parliament is supreme. However, the exercise of ministerial responsibility is not so circumscribed to the point where every decision that a Minister makes is subject to the approval or otherwise of that Parliament. We have to recognise some distinctions, among which would be ministerial decisions made in the context of the Executive responsibility that Ministers have, so that there is not the potential for gridlock to be created by the decisions that they take.

In one sense you can say yes to the principle of the Assembly's being supreme in a democracy. However, we must consider carefully the distinctions that must be made between the kinds of ministerial decisions that are to be subject to the ongoing approval of the Assembly. Although we do not want to inhibit the smooth operation of government, we must recognise that MLAs have the right to challenge, question and, indeed, where appropriate, express their disapproval or, if necessary, approval of what has been said.

At this point, I am not so aware of the fine distinctions that need to be made and I recognise that we may have to revisit the issue. Is it an issue, in the way that the question has been posed previously, that is regarded by any one party as a block to restoration?

Mr P Robinson: Yes, it is, because it goes to the heart of accountability.

It appears to me that what is being said does not move that far away from the proposals contained in the Governments' comprehensive agreement. First, they did not go for 20 — and I can see why Naomi might go for 20 — they went for the standard 30, which is the trigger mechanism for the petition of concern. That stops it from being used for some vexatious challenge made for some simple local reason and ensures that a significant body of people will use it for what they believe to be a matter of importance.

The Speaker would then have to subject the request to a test to ensure that it is important — the fact that a Minister wants to change to orange street lights may not be considered to be as important as some other issues. If the Speaker decides that it is an important matter, it would then be subject to a debate and a decision by the Assembly on whether it is referred back or not. There would be that criterion of importance, and it would be put into the impartial hands of the Speaker to decide on a non-party basis.

Mr Murphy: Also, there was a stipulation in that set of proposals that a matter could only be sent back once. It could not be sent back again by the Assembly. I do not think it is simply a matter of whether the Executive or the Assembly is supreme. There can be sensible discussion on enhancing the accountability of Ministers to the Assembly, and that discussion, I suppose, does cut into the one about placing the ministerial code on a statutory basis. These are things that parties can reach agreement on. Sinn Féin does not consider those issues as a block to re-establishing the institutions. They are important matters. It is simply a matter of finding ways in which Ministers can rightly do their business and the Assembly can feel that it has proper accountability mechanisms in place.

It is very rare that a significant decision does not require legislation, which means that a Minister has to bring legislative proposals to the Assembly. There is scope for discussing accountability mechanisms and trying to get the proper balance between getting the Assembly's business done and the Assembly's role vis-à-vis Ministers. It is not simply a matter of whether one or other is supreme; it is a matter of getting the balance right, and that is something that the parties could discuss in even more detail than we are able to here. It is something that I can foresee agreement on.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That was useful because no one has ruled out some form of control over the Executive by the Assembly, albeit that some wish for a stronger mechanism than others. I am just going to read the three tentative proposals that are before us at the moment. From the DUP:

"There should be a mechanism for the Assembly to refer ministerial decisions to the Executive for consideration."

Mr P Robinson: Let us be clear: the DUP says:

"In the absence of the Assembly having overall authority..."

which is our preference.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): OK. From Naomi Long:

"The Assembly should have power on a cross-community vote to negate a ministerial decision."

Mrs Long: Under certain specific controls. It would obviously not be unfettered. Unlike Peter Robinson, I can foresee a situation in which 30 people wished to be vexatious.

Mr P Robinson: There could be issues concerning schools or hospitals, and you could get the lower figure quite easily because many people would think that such issues were important. It is a matter of the degree of support that there would be.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): And then from Seán:

"Further consideration should be given by the Committee to the mechanisms of accountability between the Assembly and the Executive."

That strikes me perhaps as being at the lower end of the scale. Those are the three proposals. Do members wish to start at the bottom and work their way up, as it were? How do you wish to deal with it? It is quite clear that there is some agreement that a mechanism is needed; it is just a matter of degree.

Mrs Long: I raised an issue about accountability within the Executive, which is pretty important, because a lack of accountability in the Executive often results in issues reaching the Chamber. As regards the DUP's proposal to refer a matter back to the Executive, what mechanism is there to deal with that at Executive level?

1.45 pm

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Far be it from me to cut you short, but "Executive" is a separate heading. We will consider that as a separate issue.

Mrs Long: My question is pertinent because I want an explanation. If, for example, the Assembly chose to refer something back to the Executive, what powers would the Executive have over an individual ministerial decision? In the previous Executive, that power was very limited.

Mr P Robinson: That is the reason why I would prefer that power to be vested in the Assembly, rather than the Executive. As I indicated, that is only one element of accountability.

Let us be clear: Executives will never be perfect; they will make mistakes and ignore issues because of time pressures or whatever. If the Assembly identifies an issue that should have been dealt with differently or with a greater degree of urgency, the Assembly can send it back to the Executive, which would have an opportunity to reflect on its previous decision. The Executive would also be able to take into account the weight of opinion and the nuances raised during an Assembly debate on the issue.

My proposal gives the Executive a second chance, as it were. It is a poor alternative to the Assembly having the authority.

Mrs Long: That proposal is not mutually exclusive with my proposal, whereby a decision could be sent back to the Executive for further consideration. The Assembly could even choose to negate a decision. The two proposals are not mutually exclusive in that sense.

Mr P Robinson: I prefer the proposal to allow a decision to be negated, because that gets back to Assembly authority.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We must do what we did previously, in that where agreement is reached on a set of proposals, they are combined.

Dr Farren: We will not reach consensus on either the DUP or Alliance proposals, and perhaps we will not reach consensus on my proposal. However, the argument in favour of my proposal is that it subsumes the other two proposals, in a sense, and does not exclude them from the discussion that we would commit to undertake. To shortcut the discussion, we could vote on my proposal. Obviously, if there is no consensus, there will be no consensus on any of the proposals.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will move up the ladder to see which proposal achieves the greatest degree of consensus.

The SDLP proposal is that the Committee should give further consideration to a mechanism of accountability between the Assembly and the Executive. Do we have consensus?

Mr P Robinson: That proposal is too limited for us to approve. This is a key issue of accountability that must be dealt with; further consideration is simply not sufficient. We require that that matter be resolved.

Dr Farren: With respect, that is your position.

Mr P Robinson: I can only give my position.

Dr Farren: I know that. That will be made clear in our further discussions.

Mr McNarry: I am not taking a position on the proposal. However, with all due respect, it seems that there is a move from the other side of the table to move these issues along. We are trying to produce a report. My concern is that, if we continue on this basis, our report will state that we want further discussion on almost every issue. I understand why that position is being adopted, but could we revisit some issues? Accountability is important.

Dr Farren: That is what I am saying.

Mr McNarry: We could come back to those issues in order to fulfil our obligations to produce a report in a more definitive way. What Seán is saying, with all due respect, is that the report will say that the Committee was unable to agree so many items in the time allotted. It should be borne in mind that the report will be put before the Assembly to debate, and it is hoped that there will be an outcome from that. I do not want the Committee to produce a report with so many ifs.

Mr McFarland: Can I just find out —

Dr Farren: Given that the question was directed at me, can I reply?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Let Seán answer the question.

Dr Farren: I have made it clear that I have never viewed the report that the Committee hopes to present on 11 September as a final report in which all the issues have been wrapped up. Last week, I think that it was agreed that the Committee might have made only a modest achievement by then, whereby parties —

Mr McNarry: Consensus is a matter at which the Committee arrives. However, if the Committee's failure to reach consensus is simply because it cannot achieve it by a specified date but may be able to do so later after a certain amount of reconsidering, perhaps we should dispose of the issue now.

Dr Farren: That would be the effect of my proposal.

Mr McFarland: Does the SDLP need more time to consult or does it feel that this issue should be left to the negotiations? If either of those applies, should the Committee move on and come back to the issue when the report is being drafted?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The proposal was for further consideration by the Committee. I see this as simply parking the issue and coming back to it at a future meeting.

Mr McFarland: Yes. I am just trying to tease out that that is what Seán means by his motion.

Dr Farren: Yes.

Mr McFarland: Therefore the Committee will revisit the issue before the report is completed.

Mrs Long: Before moving to Seán's motion, it may be better to test the two proposals to determine whether they have consensus because it —

Mr McNarry: He just said that there was no consensus.

Mr McFarland: Seán said that because there was no consensus —

Mrs Long: It would be logical to test the two more detailed proposals first, and if neither of them reaches consensus, we should move to Seán's proposal to suggest further reconsideration by the Committee.

Mr Murphy: Part of the difficulty is that the proposals are not detailed enough. It is a complicated issue that is tied in with the ministerial code, which the Committee has not yet discussed. It is not enough to use a half-hour discussion and a verbal proposal to deal with accountability between the Executive and the Assembly. We need to consider other issues, such as how the proposals would affect the ministerial code. If members have proposals — and I am not averse to agreeing proposals to get some of these issues dealt with and out of the way — the Committee would need to see significant, detailed outworkings.

The problem does not lie with the detailed proposals; it lies with the lack of detail in the proposals and, perhaps, with a lack of consideration of how they might impinge on other areas that the Committee has not yet discussed.

Mrs Long: If Seán's proposal were expanded to say what the mechanism would be, it may be possible to reach consensus on it. Several matters have been deferred for future consideration already today. Will there be more detailed papers on those issues? What mechanism is there to allow those of us who have suggestions to make them to ensure that when the Committee comes to discuss this issue again it is not put on the long finger?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Consensus was not reached because the DUP objected —

Mrs Long: Yes, I am aware —

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We need to hear from the DUP whether there is any possibility of moving the issue forward on that basis.

Mr P Robinson: I do not mind discussing the issue again; I am merely making it clear that it is in the deal-breaker category. Rather than being put on the long finger, this matter requires resolution.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): On that basis, if I were to put Seán's proposal again, could members reach consensus?

Mr P Robinson: I have a fear — I am sure that it is unrealistic — that by the time the Committee finishes this process, the Assembly's first sitting will be upon us. After the Assembly has debated the Committee's findings, the November deadline will have arrived, and there will be very little time to fix anything.

Mr McFarland: I propose that the Committee recognises that this is a key issue and that it comes back —

Mrs Foster: Is it a priority?

Mr P Robinson: Either here or during the negotiations.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is there a specific date on which the Committee will return to the issue?

Mr McFarland: The business of where power lies was mentioned earlier. It would be useful if the parties could do a little bit of work on that. I suggest that those three issues be lumped together as a specific accountability issue to be taken after item 4, if not before, in strand one. That would allow us time to take legal advice on the accountability of the Assembly and the extent of its authority. At that stage, the Committee could revisit the issue, with parties having had more time to discuss it privately.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Would slotting in those three issues, in order that we do not miss them out, allay the DUP's concerns?

Mr P Robinson: I am quite content with that.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We seem to have got around the problem. The proposal is that the Committee should give further consideration to the mechanisms of accountability between the Assembly and the Executive. Do members agree?

Members indicated assent.

Mr McFarland: May we make that a fifth heading under "The Assembly"?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): After "Stability"?

Mr McFarland: Yes.

Mr Campbell: Do you mean that points 9, 10 and 11 under "Accountability/Safeguards" become a fifth heading?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes.

Mr McFarland: We need some legal advice on the implications of having power devolved from Parliament to the Assembly rather than to the Departments. That will impinge on what Peter asked earlier. We are now saying: "Well, if it is this way, it will be this; if it is that way, it will be that." That will give us some guidance on whether it is possible to look at devolving power to the Assembly, and that will obviously have a bearing on the issues of who has the authority to challenge the Executive, etc.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Let us take that as a formal proposal in order to get consensus on it. Are members agreed that we have a fifth heading, after "Stability"? That would guarantee that the Committee would return to the issue.

Mr Murphy: I would be content with that. However, I am conscious that we would deal with the fifth heading before any discussion on the ministerial code, which has an impact on the issues to be discussed under the fifth heading. The ministerial code comes under the heading of "The Executive". There is a great deal of overlap. What we are discussing here has a significant bearing on the discussions around the ministerial code.

Mr McFarland: We could make it a new item 2 under "The Executive". That would put it back slightly further.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Clerk reminds me that we have also agreed to look again at the voting system. We need to put that in as well, so that we do not forget to return to it. It will all be in Hansard and in the minutes, so I do not see how we can forget about it, but in case anyone fears that we will try to pull a fast one —

Mrs Long: Mr Murphy's point about the impact that collectivity in the Executive has on any proposals for accountability is important. It is a point that we have made before, and we want the fact that we are dealing with it to be recognised in some way. There will be considerable overlap, and it will not be possible to achieve a perfect formula, so we are not going to be difficult about it.

Mr McFarland: The issue of where power is vested in Northern Ireland is already mentioned under "The Executive", at the last bullet point under "Accountability/Safeguards".

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We still have this suggestion that we take some form of legal advice on the mechanism for transferring power.

Mr McFarland: At the current rate, we could do that between now and when we get around to discussing the Executive.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): As long as we agree to do that.

Mr P Robinson: We would not have any great difficulty in putting it under “The Executive”. The important point is that it should be considered before we finish with strand one issues.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is everyone happy enough with that? Our research staff can have a look at the whole issue of how to devolve power to the Assembly rather than to Departments.

Members indicated assent.

Dr Farren: We are beginning to identify some substantial issues that parties indicate are possible deal-breakers, and also issues that, although they may not fall into that category, are quite important. It may be useful to have brief papers from the parties at some point on some or all of those issues. As we get into them, it will be difficult to treat them on the basis of oral discussions without having given prior consideration to what other parties think about how those issues might be resolved.

The parties probably have position papers available anyway, so it would be good if some of their proposals for resolving the issues were circulated in advance. Today’s discussion has been very helpful, but that seems to be the direction in which we will head as we get into more detailed discussion on the issues.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are the parties content? We have lost a party. Naomi Long has gone to the ladies’.

Mr McNarry: She said that I could vote for her by proxy.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I do not think that it is permanent.

Mr Campbell: Losing an entire party could be down to carelessness.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Clerks have confirmed that it is possible to do that sort of research. Our researcher, Dr Gilleece, has moved on to the economic challenges subgroup, but we can certainly get that done.

Are we happy to draw “Accountability/Safeguards” for the Assembly to a conclusion?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I am very encouraged because, reviewing the evidence that has been presented this morning, there has been little or no overlap with the long question-and-answer session that we had in June. Members have clearly taken advice to try to present new material and to mine a little deeper, and that is much appreciated. Let us hope that that continues.

2.00 pm

We move on to “Committee Systems”. There are four items under that sub-heading, the first of which is “Committee Structures”. We have had first-hand experience of the Committee system, which, incidentally, met for 30 months. I understand that the Assembly lasted for 97 months, and the Committees operated for 30 months of that — about one third. In that, I am including such Committees as the Committee of the Centre. Therefore we have had some experience of their operation. Do members have any concerns about Committees?

Mr P Robinson: Can we deal with the Committee of the Centre first? Hopefully, we will reach agreement on that. As OFMDFM is a recognised Department, the Committee of the Centre should have the same statutory rights of scrutiny that other Departments’ Committees have. Not only junior Ministers should be answerable to that Committee. OFMDFM should be answerable in the same way as Ministers of other Departments.

Mr Murphy: When the Committee of the Centre was being set up under Standing Orders — I do not know whether we need to see a list of the functions to agree all of this — there was a discussion about the range of matters that it would scrutinise. The Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister brought forward its own draft Standing Order that limited the scope of the Committee of the Centre’s scrutiny functions to a number of areas within the Department, and excluded some others. Given the Department’s discussions, I would have thought that it would be difficult to reach agreement on a valid argument for non-scrutiny of certain functions. However, if we were to look again at placing it on a statutory footing, we would also need to re-examine the range of issues in OFMDFM that the Committee of the Centre can look at under current Standing Orders.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Does anyone have any other views on the Committee of the Centre?

Mr McFarland: There is an issue over its size. Previously, there was an attempt to have every party represented on the Committee of the Centre, but if it is going to be a Statutory Committee, it will make sense to have it constructed on the same basis as other Committees.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It presently has 17 members.

Mr McFarland: It used to have 19 members, did it not?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I presume that that included the Chairman and the Deputy Chairman.

Ms Lewsley: I was a member of the previous Committee of the Centre, and I agree with what Conor said about its wide remit. There were many issues that some of us would have liked to have been given priority, but they did not see the light of day in the Committee.

Alan McFarland commented on the size of the Committee of the Centre. Many Committees found it difficult to get a quorum at times. For example, the Committee for Finance and Personnel, which often sat on a Tuesday afternoon when the House was sitting, often found itself inquorate. However, the Committee of the Centre got through a fair amount of business because it had so many members.

Therefore, I would be cautious about reducing its membership dramatically, because we often found that it was difficult for other Committees to get a quorum and get business done.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): All of those issues are covered by the DUP suggestion that the Committee of the Centre be established on the same basis as a Statutory Committee. That simplifies it.

Mr P Robinson: The DUP's suggestion is that all of the business of OFMDFM be scrutinised; nothing should be hidden from scrutiny.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Unusually for a Committee, the specific issues that can be dealt with by the Committee of the Centre are listed in Standing Orders, but other Committees can deal with the entire remit of their Department. That is why the Committee was constrained in what it was permitted to examine.

Are there any fundamental problems with that?

Ms Lewsley: The Committee of the Centre had a large remit and, as far as I remember, it was the only Committee that had the opportunity to create a subcommittee on European issues; there was a lot of commitment asked of it. It was later decided that we needed to look at subcommittees in an attempt to deal with some of the business that was coming before the Committee.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There would be 11 Statutory Committees, assuming that there are 11 Departments.

Mr P Robinson: The Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister had fewer functions than most of the larger Departments. It dabbled in some issues on which it overlapped with other Departments, and that probably extended its role beyond what it should have been. That comes back to the question of the role of OFMDFM.

Mr McNarry: It would also be normal to factor in issues, not of national security, but of high specification, about which the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister would have been reluctant to talk. Some understanding should have been given when probing the First Minister or the Deputy First Minister about meetings that they had separately, or jointly, with international figures. I do not think that Peter was saying that everything should be divulged.

Mr P Robinson: The amount of information that is divulged will always be up to the Minister. Seán, Michael and I may have, from time to time, decided that certain things were not ready to be made public.

Mr McNarry: Surely not. On water, for instance?

Mr P Robinson: Ministers made it very clear that they were against water charging and privatisation. There was no reluctance on that one.

Dr Farren: I will not start to divulge state secrets here.

Mr P Robinson: Please do. When I stepped down as Minister at the Department for Regional Development, I made an effort to obtain all the papers that a former Minister is allowed. I went over them, page by page, during a debate in the House of Commons, and anyone can read that in Hansard. No one in the House challenged any issues, including the then First Minister.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I am glad that there is no political point scoring going on this afternoon.

The Committee of the Centre would be reduced to 11 members were it to become a Statutory Committee. The Assembly decided to put the Chairman of the Committee of the Centre on the same footing as the 10 Chairmen of the other Committees. Therefore it recognised at an early stage the important work of that Committee.

Do we have consensus that we put the Committee of the Centre on the same footing as the other 10?

Mr McNarry: Does the Public Accounts Committee operate on the same basis?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The other Standing Committees do not.

Dr Farren: Does that include all Statutory Committees?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Committee of the Centre was not a Statutory Committee.

Dr Farren: I know, but you are talking about the other Statutory or departmental Committees.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There are 10 Statutory Committees, and the Committee of the Centre would make 11. We are talking here only about the Committee of the Centre. Committees such as the Public Accounts Committee and the Committee on Standards and Privileges are different issues altogether. There are not the same burning issues there.

Are members agreed?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will move on to “Committee Structures”, “Formation of Committees” and “Role and effectiveness of Committees”. Are members happy with how Committees were set up, and how each party was represented on them, and so forth?

Mr McFarland: The UUP introduced the point about the “Role and effectiveness of Committees”, because one role of Committees was to introduce legislation. Several attempts were made to make that happen, but I am unsure whether it happened in the end. One issue that constrained Committees was the fact that they did not have a budget or the research staff to develop the legal framework for introducing legislation. Members who served on Committees were always busy with issues, and those issues often ran in parallel. Unless there was a burning issue, Committee members were unable to persuade their party colleagues on the Executive to introduce legislation. Therefore Committee members were asked by party colleagues on the Executive what sort of legislation they intended to introduce and whether it went against ministerial decisions. What happened if a Committee could not get the Executive to introduce a burning piece of legislation, so it decided to introduce the legislation itself and needed a substantial amount of money to pay drafting staff, etc?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Individual Members had the right to introduce private Member’s Bills, and work had started on a couple of those before the Assembly collapsed. The advice and assistance from researchers and clerical staff that Members received was also available to the Committees.

Mr McFarland: I looked into introducing legislation, as did the Committee for Regional Development, and the difficulty was that it requires a substantial amount of money. The Assembly research staff did not have the time for legal drafting, and there is also a massive shortage of legal drafting staff in the Departments. The lack of draftsmen or draftswomen meant that much of the legislation that the Executive tried to introduce became bogged down.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Assembly Commission, of which I was a member, had a separate budget set aside for drafting legislation, and it was barely used. The Commission never became involved in the introduction of a private Member’s Bill or a Committee Bill, because there simply was not enough time.

Mr McFarland: My understanding was that there was no one to write the legislation.

Ms Lewsley: There was.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes, there was.

Ms Lewsley: As my private Member’s Bill was due to go to the House on the day of suspension, I have gone through the whole process. There are only four legal writers in the entire UK. However, the opportunity was there for individuals or Committees to go through that process and the money was available. In fact, before suspension the Speaker was quite keen on legislation being introduced. The support was there and it was a case of looking for a gap in Assembly business.

However, there is a proper process involved in introducing a private Member’s Bill. The Bill must be subject to an equality impact assessment and must go out to consultation. My private Member’s Bill went out to consultation twice and had the backing of the relevant Department. A lot of background work is required, but it certainly is possible for a Committee or an individual to introduce legislation.

Mr McGimpsey: Nevertheless, there is a shortage of resources in the system. Several Departments shared a Bill team, so it was necessary to prioritise.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There was a separate fund for the Assembly to pioneer and progress Bills. For instance, one Member wanted to give farmers the right to build bungalows, and that Bill was in the process of going through to the Assembly.

Mr McGimpsey: Are you talking about money or about Bill teams? Bill teams have particular expertise; it is not only about money.

Ms Lewsley: I can speak only from my own experience. I had the support of the Business Committee, whose team liaises with the legal writers. Departments differ in that they have teams to put together legislation.

Mr McGimpsey: The problem is that some Departments do not have their own teams.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Alan, I can assure you that that is not the case. If a Member had had the time to go through the process, the resources were available.

Mr McFarland: Conor sat with me on one of the early Committees that examined the introduction of legislation. When Assembly staff advised us that the resources were not available, we backed off. Things may have changed since, and perhaps additional staff have been brought in over the last two years, or there may have been money available that we were not told about. We were assured that the infrastructure was not in place to allow the Committee to introduce legislation.

Dr Farren: Why are we discussing this?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes, I was going to say that we are going down a route that —

Mr McFarland: We are discussing this because it is directly related to the role of the Committees. There is a question as to whether Committees should introduce legislation. Perhaps not, and in that case there would not be an issue. However if, as under the current legislation negotiated as part of the Belfast Agreement, Committees can introduce legislation, the problem is that in the first Assembly, Committees were told that the resources were not available to allow them to do so. That is why, since 2002, the UUP has included this issue in its list for discussion in a forum such as this.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): This is not an institutional issue. The Commission can release as much or as little money as is necessary to ensure that the Committees are properly serviced when introducing Bills. That is entirely an Assembly Commission decision, but it does not relate to the structure of the Committees.

Mr McFarland: My point is that when a Committee tried to introduce a Bill in the first Assembly, it was told that no money was available.

Mr P Robinson: In that case, you had a right to tell the Assembly Commission to fulfil its obligations.

Mr McFarland: We were told that there was no money.

Therefore, my point is twofold. First, in the light of the experience of the first Assembly, do Committees need the ability and the funding to introduce private legislation when the parties on those Committees are in the Executive, which could do it for them? Secondly, we must ensure that if Committees retain the ability to introduce legislation, funding is available to pay for draftsmen and research facilities.

2.15 pm

Mr Murphy: As well as being a member of that Committee, I chaired the Committee on Procedures, which carried out various investigations into how the business of the House was conducted. I am clear in my recollection that the Committee was advised that there were resource issues, not necessarily financial, and that drafting resources were tied up on Executive work and would not necessarily be made available to the Committees. I recall that, towards the end of the Assembly, limited resources were made available to allow individual Members to introduce Bills, but not necessarily to the Committees.

It was discussed earlier that given the nature of the Administration, Committees are the first line of opposition to the Executive. I agree that that is the case. Committees should be able to introduce legislation if their members feel that an issue is important and the Department or the Minister does not share those feelings. It is part of the agreement. I wore a number of different hats in the last Assembly and it was always clear to me that resources were an issue. However, if that were not the case, and all necessary resources — not just financial — would definitely be made available to any Statutory Committee that wanted to introduce legislation, could we have written evidence of that?

Alan McFarland asked whether Committees should have the right to introduce legislation, and I agree that it is important that they do. Given that we have a mandatory coalition, it very often happens that opposition to the Executive comes from the Committee system, and that should not be diluted in any way.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are you proposing that the necessary resources and expertise should be made available to enable Committees to introduce independent Bills?

Mr Murphy: If members can be assured that resources have always been available, the proposal is unnecessary. Could the Committee receive confirmation that resources were available?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will do that. We will delve in to this to find out where the perception came — [Interruption.]

Mr P Robinson: Surely a Committee should not have to concern itself with resources. If it believes that it is right to introduce legislation, it is up to the officials to source the resources.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I am trying to move things on. This is not the main issue on the effectiveness of the Committees.

Ms Lewsley: It is not right to put members of Committees in the position where they have to put pressure on Ministers from their parties. A Minister may have totally different priorities to those of the Committee. Committees should make their own decisions to introduce legislation, which, hopefully, would have the sanction of the Ministers.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We can get this issue sorted out. However, given the 30 months' experience gained from the previous Assembly, there must be more substantive matters of concern about the role of the Committees and their effectiveness.

Mr McFarland: By and large, the Committees were the one element that worked well in the first Assembly. In most cases, the Ministers were co-operative. Two of the Ministers that I served under are here, and although I am slightly reluctant to say it, both of them were very good to their Committee. However, some Committees did not have good relationships with their Ministers. I do not know whether anything can be done about that, because part of it depends on the temperaments of the Minister and the Chairperson of the Committee. In most cases, however, the Committees worked well when there was goodwill on both sides.

Most Departments were open with their Committees, which I think was the key to their success. There was no major problem in the two Committees on which I served in the first Assembly.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): This question is for the older Members of the Assembly. Were there any other — [Laughter.] Can I say “more experienced”?

Ms Lewsley: So you do not mean “older”, as in “age”, but “older” as in “more experienced”. Thank you very much. I am glad that you qualified that.

I served on five different Committees during the last Assembly and they worked very well. As a member of the Committee for Finance and Personnel, I know that some Members had an issue about scrutinising the Budget before it came to fruition. The Committee for the Environment found that, since the greater part of the Budget was being spent according to EU directives, there was no significant contribution to be made, and that any of the Committee’s priorities were overridden by demands on the Budget. In the round, the Committees worked very well, and Members used their positions well in making Ministers accountable on many issues.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We do not seem to have concerns about the present system.

Mr P Robinson: There are some issues relating to Committees bringing forward legislation and some parameters must be accepted. A Committee’s legislation on a subject should give way to the Department’s legislation if they are on the same issue. No one wants two different bodies going head-to-head with legislation on the same issue.

There are also finance issues. Dr Farren will know more about that than I do, however, most legislation has a price tag attached. A Committee should not attempt to enlarge a departmental budget by legislation. There is a requirement for the cost to be approved by the Department of Finance and Personnel.

Dr Farren: The protocols would spell that out. Most legislation has resource implications. If Committees did not take those implications into account, they would be ignoring significant aspects of their responsibilities. Committees would want to take account of resources — and enhancing departmental resources is something that Committees would want to see as a priority. At the end of the day it is a balancing exercise about what is possible across Government.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There are two safeguards in this respect. First, any legislation requiring reallocation of resources has to be approved by the Minister of Finance and Personnel. That is normal. Secondly, if the Business Committee saw legislation coming from a Committee and from a Department, presumably it would rule as to whether it was appropriate to have both on the Floor at once.

Mr McFarland: I disagree with Mr Robinson’s first point. If Members are to operate Committees as a safeguard, it is essential that those Committees can bring forward legislation that is not agreed or in keeping with the Department’s policy. He is right on his second point. It is daft for a Committee to try to bring forward legislation that has no money attached to it, unless it is something that does not need finance. It is questionable whether a Committee may bring forward legislation that is not cleared by the Department of Finance and Personnel or indeed the relevant Department. There is a question here about the right of a Committee to bring forward legislation. That is sacrosanct. However, if there is a cost attached to it, that Committee has to understand that it is not going to succeed without clearance from the system.

Mr P Robinson: Let us be clear about the first point. I would have thought that there is no contention about it. If a Committee wishes to bring forward legislation on subject A, and the Department says that it has already taken steps, the Committee should give way to the Department. The Committee may well seek to amend the Minister’s legislation, but I do not think that two sets of legislation should be prepared.

Mr McFarland: If that is the scenario I accept it.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We can get around that concern. I am concerned that these have been flagged up as issues of concern and yet hearing various individuals, generally, as the structures stand, there seems to be general contentment.

Mr P Robinson: You keep going back to this “flagged up as issues of concern”; in many cases these were flagged up as component parts of devolution, some of which may well be agreed.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is true, although I have been alerted to the fact that issues such as proportionality in Committees and d’Hondt might be of concern to individuals. Are people content not so much with how Committees operate but about how they are formed? Naomi raised a point earlier that she would prefer that we start with the Executive and run right down through the Committees on a very elongated d’Hondt system — presumably because the smaller parties would be better represented.

Mrs Long: No, because the overall reflective balance would be much fairer. D’Hondt operates best when there is a large pool of posts; when the pool is small, d’Hondt is not as representative. Huge anomalies are created. When the Committee discusses a reduction in the number of Departments, members will no doubt see huge anomalies in the division within the Executive. Those anomalies are thrown up when there is a small pool of posts. The SDLP raised the issue of running d’Hondt, and I sought clarification on proportionality. The Alliance Party’s preferred system would not be d’Hondt, but, given that the Committee gave my party’s preferred system the thumbs down when it was raised at a previous meeting, I am exploring option B, which is to run d'Hondt with a larger pool of posts, thereby creating a more reflective balance.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do you propose that d'Hondt be run the whole way down the line, including in the formation of Committees?

Dr Farren: I would be happy to join Naomi in proposing that.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are there any views on that? My council, Down District Council, adopted that approach, and the smaller parties did much better as a result.

Mrs Long: That is news to me, but welcome news.

Mr Campbell: That did not mean that you got the chairmanship post that you wanted.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): No, it did not.

Mr Campbell: That is another matter.

Mrs Long: You will get it.

Dr Farren: You will, if you stick around long enough — another 20 years.

Mr Campbell: He has only been there for 30 years.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do folk think that d'Hondt should be run once only for the appointment of Ministers, for Committee Chairpersons and Vice-Chairpersons, and for membership of Statutory and Standing Committees? In other words, do we run d'Hondt for more than 150 positions?

Dr Farren: That is not problematic.

Mr Campbell: That is just crazy.

Dr Farren: We will have to run d'Hondt for 110 places on Statutory Committees, in any case.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): If we are to have 11 Statutory Committees, there will be 121 positions on Statutory Committees.

Mrs Long: Only 11 posts are being added, so that can hardly mean that the situation moves from being completely acceptable to completely ludicrous.

Mr P Robinson: The Member who gets the first choice can say: "Do I want to be the Minister of Finance and Personnel, or do I want to be Deputy Chairman of some obscure departmental Committee?"

Mrs Long: If the Member thought that the latter post was so obscure, I imagine that it would be a simple choice for him or her to make.

Mr P Robinson: It is back to the jelly beans and liquorice allsorts. We are dealing with two entirely different matters, and d'Hondt must be run for matters that are similar. Chairman, if it is a lack of consensus that you want registered, I register it.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is the end of that argument.

Dr Farren: What if Naomi breaks her own maxim and says that this is a deal-breaker as far as the Alliance Party is concerned?

Mrs Long: The Alliance Party is not here to be difficult, not even when I am taking the lead.

Mr P Robinson: There was a time when the Alliance Party was not even here.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We have really highlighted only two issues: legislation and d'Hondt. Mr Robinson made the point that we should not necessarily see it as being a problem, so can we therefore get past Committee issues with very little difficulty?

Mr P Robinson: Are you dealing with "Committee structures"?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): "Committee structures" and "Formation of Committees".

Mr P Robinson: I want to raise two issues under "Formation of Committees". The first we may come to later under "Efficiency/Effectiveness" and is the need to constantly examine the efficiency of devolution and the way in which the Assembly operates, and the need for a Committee for that purpose.

The other matter, which has almost been accepted, is the mechanism/institutional review Committee. We referred a matter to that Committee earlier, so we can assume that it exists.

2.30 pm

The proposals for a comprehensive agreement stated that Assembly Committees should have the power to call the chairpersons and chief executives of North/South implementation bodies before them annually. Because those bodies are of a North/South nature, that power does not currently exist. Committees could do so by grace and favour, but it is better to have the power — the Dáil has the power to do so.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Under the strand two headings are "Assembly scrutiny of implementation bodies" and "Operation (efficiency) of North/South bodies". Would it be preferable to discuss that now rather than under the strand two heading?

Mr P Robinson: It is more relevant to an Assembly Committee than it is to a North/South implementation body.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Let us get it out of the way. What are members' views? Currently, chairpersons and chief executives of North/South bodies can be invited to appear before a Committee but they do not have to come. Should Committees have the right to compel them to give evidence and answer questions?

Mr McFarland: In essence, it is a good idea. There is a question in relation to the legal basis of those bodies: were those bodies not established by an international treaty and are therefore separate from other legislation? I seem to remember that hiring staff, duties of staff, functioning of the bodies and so on were discrete issues between two nations, as it were.

What are our powers, or the powers of an individual Government, to effect that option?

Mr P Robinson: The international treaty is between two parties — the British and Irish Governments. Those are the parties who made the proposal and, whatever their mechanism, it is presumably they who will agree that it can be done.

Mr McFarland: I see what you mean.

Dr Farren: I see no reason why chairpersons of North/South bodies would not have more or less the same position vis-à-vis Committees as permanent secretaries and so on. They are discharging functions on behalf of the public, and are answerable to Ministers on a day-to-day basis, through the North/South Ministerial Council, but they do not appear before Committees, except, as Peter says, by invitation. I am not sure what the effect of moving from that position to a “power to compel” would be. However, they should attend; if that requires those posts to have the same status as permanent secretaries, that is fine. I do not know what the pitfalls of that might be, but the more information that is available to Assembly Members about how the implementation bodies operate, the better.

Mr Murphy: I presume that, if Sinn Féin is content with the arrangements in the Oireachtas in relation to these matters, it will be content with similar arrangements here. If those people appear before Oireachtas Committees, I do not see why we would not have them here.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We seem to have consensus that Assembly Committees should have the power to summon chairpersons and deputy chairpersons of North/South implementation bodies at its meetings.

Mr McFarland: Does that include chief executives?

Mr P Robinson: It would have to.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes. Chairpersons and deputy chairpersons are different to chief executives. Do you want to expand that to include chief executives?

Mr P Robinson: I said chairpersons and chief executives.

Mr Murphy: It was mentioned that the provision to call such persons would be at least yearly.

I presume that that would be scrutinised so that vexatious demands would not be put on people to appear every other week before a Committee. Safeguards would have to be built in to ensure that it is proper scrutiny and that people are not being put through their paces too often.

Mr McFarland: If a certain Committee were at war with its relevant permanent secretary and was behaving in a silly way, that would quickly become clear and would get back to the Minister and questions would be asked in the House. The Committees would have to be sensible, and separate guidance is not required. All parties are represented on Committees, and parties would have to agree in order to haul in permanent secretaries or whoever every week. Safeguards are already built into the Committee structure, so it would be somewhat strange if specific safeguards were created for this issue.

Dr Farren: North/South implementation bodies are part of the agreement between the British and Irish Governments, and it would be appropriate to take their views on the matter. We want to achieve this, but we need to hear what the Governments might have to say. I do not imagine that they would be awkward about it.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do we have consensus about chairmen and chief executives?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Peter Robinson proposes the establishment of an institutional review Committee for the Northern Ireland Assembly to examine the operational aspects of strand one.

Mr McFarland: Did Peter say that one proposal was on procedures, or was one on something else and one on the institutions? Can the existing Committee on Procedures, which examines how the Assembly does business, be expanded?

Mr Murphy: The Committee on Procedures examines Standing Orders.

Mr McFarland: Could that Committee examine the workings of the Assembly? Once Standing Orders are in place, and unless something specifically changes, by and large the Committee on Procedures has a monitoring role. We are bedded down fairly well after the first mandate of the Assembly, but Standing Orders may have to be tweaked if the Assembly gets up and running again. Could the Committee on Procedures monitor the areas that Peter wants to be monitored?

Mr P Robinson: No, it could not. The Committee on Procedures examines, within the existing legal framework, the Standing Orders on Assembly procedures. We are discussing a change to the legal framework, so it is a wider remit. The proposed Committee would not meet every week. It would be a Standing Committee, so it could meet when a party feels that an issue needs to be resolved.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are we content, with those few additions, to leave the “Committee System” behind and move on?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will move on to “Efficiency/Effectiveness”. I did not expect to get this far today, so we are making good progress. We will then take Peter’s proposal formally. We have discussed at length why it is felt that this Committee is needed.

Mrs Long: The Alliance Party supports the creation of an institutional review Committee. It was referenced earlier in the context of the four-year reviews that were set up under the agreement. We would not accept that the proposed Committee would be a substitute for those four-year reviews, although the Committee could examine institutional issues. The agreement was signed by other parties, including the two Governments, therefore, the all-encompassing review process would still need to stand because of the involvement of the two Governments. An institutional review Committee would be a useful mechanism to deal with any changes to the institutions.

Mr McFarland: We are happy enough with the fact that such a Committee may be needed. Some issues will need to be left to that Committee because they are either not solvable at the moment or they are wider issues, and it would be useful for this Committee to have a view on those issues.

As I mentioned earlier, if we can solve issues to improve the effectiveness and efficiency of the Assembly before it is fired up again, it would be useful to do that, rather than to put everything off until some time during the next Assembly mandate. If some issues can be dealt with in advance, we can leave other issues that are so large or complicated that they may need to be left to an institutional review Committee.

Mr Murphy: It is clear that there is a need for a mechanism, beyond the reinstatement of the institutions, for the conclusion of some of the issues outstanding from the formal review of the Good Friday Agreement. Perhaps that formal process has not been concluded and needs to be tidied up in some way; it is unclear. However, there is some need for an agreed mechanism to address some of the outstanding issues.

The difficulties in setting up an institutional review Committee are that we would need to know its remit and make-up, its lifespan, and whether it is an Ad Hoc Committee to sort out issues that are outstanding from our work, or whether it will continue to examine issues as they arise. Where does that fit in with the formal review of the Good Friday Agreement that takes place every four years? To my knowledge, that review started but was not concluded.

At the start of this meeting, an issue was raised about a paper that David Hanson has on some of these issues. That paper has not made its way to us, and there has been no communication from the Government about that. That paper may be on matters that the Government were working on, which may cut across the work of this Committee.

We may be able to agree, in principle, a mechanism to deal with these issues, but a lot more flesh needs to be put on the bones. I do not have difficulty in agreeing in principle that a mechanism be established, but we would have to see what exactly that is and how it relates to the other work that is still out in the ether, which has not yet been concluded.

Mr P Robinson: Mr Chairman, there is sense in what Alan McFarland said. If the Government bring forward legislation to make changes so that we can move forward with the institutions— as I believe they must — that will be the best opportunity to make any other changes that might be considered by other people to improve the institutions. Any changes will require legislation at Westminster, because they will require alterations to the Northern Ireland Act 1998. Time will not be readily available at Westminster for that type of legislation, so if we wish to take the imminent opportunity for change, we should try to resolve some of the other issues now, rather than simply let them hang around.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We seem to have two very similar proposals. Mr Murphy has proposed that a mechanism be established in the Northern Ireland Assembly to examine the operational aspects of strand one. Peter has proposed that an institutional review Committee of the Assembly be established to examine the operational aspects of strand one. Is there enough between those two proposals that we need to deal with them separately, or are we happy to run with one of them? It strikes me that there is not an awful lot between those two positions.

Mr P Robinson: The further element is whether, in conjunction with the Executive, consideration might be given to changes to strand two. We are not attempting to say that strand two is perfect, are we?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We could opt for a similar mechanism when we discuss strand two issues. I am trying to finish the strand one discussions today, if we can, although I have my doubts.

2.45 pm

Dr Farren: Let us not complicate the issues. I am happy with either proposal, as long as we are clear that the general overall review of the agreement stands. As somebody said, there are far more participants than those represented around this table.

I am a little concerned about the institutional review. However, as long as it is understood that the review is of the operation of the institutions rather than a fundamental review, I am happy to accept the proposal.

Mr Murphy: The proposal should be more vague — it is fairly specific in relation to strand one. We can agree to consider the creation of a mechanism to deal with all outstanding issues on the operation of the institutions, pending the review of the Good Friday Agreement, which has yet to be concluded.

However, there are outstanding strands to be picked up, including what has been done in this Committee, that will probably be dealt with on the other side of devolution. If there are issues that can be resolved here, that is well and good, but there are outstanding issues that can be resolved after devolution. The parties can agree a mechanism to do that, which must take into account the outstanding work of both Governments and pick up those issues as well.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will keep the ball rolling. I will put the DUP proposal and, depending —

Mr P Robinson: I want to make it clear that it is a stand-alone proposal without reference to any wakes that might be held for the Belfast Agreement.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The proposal is that an institutional review Committee in the Assembly should be established to examine the operational aspects of strand one. Do we have consensus?

Mr Murphy: The proposal is fairly narrow. I would prefer to have some detail about how the Committee will conduct its business. Alternatively, the proposal should be sufficiently vague to allow us to determine the detail of the Committee's remit, title and so on at a later stage.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is there consensus?

Members indicated dissent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The second proposal is that a mechanism should be established in the Northern Ireland Assembly to examine the operational aspects of strand one. Do we have consensus?

Mr P Robinson: It is too vague.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is there a halfway house between a mechanism and an institutional review? If both proposals fail, we have nothing.

Mr P Robinson: We could perhaps agree that there should be a mechanism or institutional review.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Would that be a possible compromise?

Mr Murphy: I do not mind. That allows for a number of variations, and it is not specific on the title or remit of any such Committee. However, there are issues that we are dealing with here, issues that have been dealt with in the review and outstanding issues in the ether, currently within David Hanson's remit, that need to be picked up. We therefore need to leave sufficient scope and flexibility in how we deal with those on the other side of restoration.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Peter, you said that we could agree "a mechanism for an institutional review"?

Mr P Robinson: A mechanism or institutional review.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is there consensus on that proposal?

Mr McFarland: What is the precise wording of that?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The proposal is that a mechanism or institutional review be established in the Northern Ireland Assembly to examine the operational aspects of strand one. Do we have consensus?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We come now to "Dual/triple mandate". Many members will have an interest to declare on this matter. There are members with dual and triple mandates; I do not think that anyone has a quadruple mandate, although there have been such cases in the past. This issue concerns the right of an MLA to be an MP, a district councillor, or whatever. Who raised that as a concern?

Mr McFarland: We did, Chairman.

The Review of Public Administration (RPA) legislation sorts out the business of being a councillor and an MLA, as we understand it. The Scottish Parliament did some soul-searching on this matter, and there seemed to be no effort to stop anyone being an MP and a Member of the Scottish Parliament (MSP).

The press took up the issue, asking how Members could be at Westminster and in Edinburgh at the same time. It ended up with a campaign, and they may have won the dual-hatted status, but all the rest decided that they were either Members of the Scottish Parliament or Members of Parliament at Westminster. If we had devolution, the only things that would be left at Westminster would be Defence, Foreign Affairs and the Treasury. Everything else would be here. How can someone be a full-time MLA, giving of his or her best as a member on, perhaps, two Committees, serving his or her constituents, or even being a Minister, and also attending Westminster for all the debates? There is a problem if the Assembly is settled. I can understand why people would not want to bale out of councils, the Assembly or from being a MP. One could argue that it is unhealthy for political parties, and for politics generally, to have double-, triple- or quadruple-hatted folk, because they are clearly not giving of their best in their various elected positions.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Dare I ask whether there is any reaction to that?

Dr Farren: To borrow from an old slogan: one mandate, one person. It could also be possible that we might have Members of the Irish Senate, the Dáil—

Mr P Robinson: Or the House of Lords.

Mrs Foster: Do not tell Lord Morrow.

Mr P Robinson: Or John Taylor.

Dr Farren: The House of Lords, indeed; I knew that there was a third one. Timing is an obligation. Given the instability of the first mandate of the Assembly, it would have been unrealistic and unfair to have required those people who were councillors to choose between council membership and Assembly membership at the time of the first Assembly election or, indeed, soon thereafter. It is a question of when it could be brought into effect. The more stable the Assembly, the greater the case for bringing it in sooner with respect to Assembly Members.

Mrs Long: I agree with Seán about a phasing-in period, given the changes that the RPA will bring to local government. Many experienced councillors may be removed from their posts because of their role in the Assembly, and that will have an impact on how those institutions deal with all future changes and challenges. We must be aware of the level of change that is taking place in local government. Our preference is against multiple mandates, and I say that as someone who has one. However, whether I am seen to do both jobs well is largely a matter for the electorate. If it feels that I am not serving my roles well, I can be unseated. We should not become too caught up on whether people can discharge their functions. Perhaps the management of any conflicts of interest is a more important issue.

Mr McFarland: The issue of multiple mandates affected the running of Committees. For instance, on a day when a Committee was meeting, we reached 4.30 pm and you could see the agitation rising round the table. The councillors who had to make it back to council meetings were busy shuffling their papers, and then suddenly, at some key point in the evidence session, half the Committee was out the door like whippets. There are important long-term issues for the Assembly to function effectively and to do good for constituents.

Mr P Robinson: Every political party wants to have this issue resolved. We discussed the issue internally, and all parties want to eliminate multiple mandates. However, the Assembly has not been sufficiently stable for Members to say that they would like to give up their Westminster seats in order to be a part of it. An institutional review Committee might deal with this issue more appropriately when the Assembly is stable.

Mr Murphy: Or other mechanism, I suppose.
[Laughter.]

We broadly support the proposal, especially in relation to council mandates. It is a conflict of time as well as a conflict of interest. However, we are obviously not as preoccupied with attending Westminster as other parties. Sinn Féin has discussed the issue and is broadly against the idea of multiple mandates, although it has a different stance on Westminster. We are quite happy to consider the matter and certainly see the logic of the proposal in relation to council, as opposed to Assembly, mandates.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Members will recall the debate on this issue in the Assembly four years ago. Councillor Close MLA made a very impassioned plea — one of the best contributions ever made in the House. There seem to be two suggestions. Mr McFarland has suggested that legislation should be introduced to prevent multiple mandates.

Mr McFarland: The issue need not necessarily be resolved through legislation. In Scotland, the issue was dealt with through media pressure. It would be sensible for the parties to have a gentlemen's agreement, perhaps. The issue logically rests with the mechanism/institutional review Committee. There is no point in asking Members to relinquish a particular job if their Assembly job is unstable and may cease in November. However, multiple mandates are generally unhealthy.

Whether it is through legislation, whether everyone agrees that it is better for politics here if we do not have multiple mandates, or whether it is as a result of media pressure, some way must be found of resolving this issue in the longer term.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There appears to be a consensus to refer the issue to the mechanism/institutional review Committee. When that is up and running, in whatever form, we will refer the issue to that Committee for consideration. Is there consensus?

Dr Farren: I did not hear any dissent in relation to abandoning multiple mandates in principle.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I detected a slight dissent.

Dr Farren: I did not hear it; not even from the DUP.

Mr P Robinson: We do not disagree in principle. The general principle is that an elected representative should not have a multiple mandate where a conflict of interest arises within that mandate. That could be the case with council and Assembly mandates in the future. However, stability is the important aspect in this issue.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The timing is the issue here, rather than the principle.

Mr P Robinson: Parties will have to develop and broaden their bases. It will be in their interests to encourage other people to come forward within their systems. This issue cannot be resolved by fixing a date, in November or January, for example, by when multiple mandates should stop.

Mr Campbell: There is broad consensus on the principle. It is not an identical anomaly, but there should be an overlap of council membership to allow the new councils created by the Review of Public Administration to bed in. Therefore I am not in favour of the abandonment of multiple mandates in the run-up to the shadow council elections. However, I would be in favour of it beyond that period, once the new councils have had time to bed in.

Similarly, with the Assembly, I would not be in favour of the abandonment of multiple mandates within the next 12 or 18 months. In the long term, however, parties should be in favour of abandoning multiple mandates. I hope that a statutory obligation would not be required, but that parties would move towards the principle over the period of an Assembly term, for example.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Could the circle perhaps be squared by saying that further consideration should be given to whether Members should be allowed to have multiple mandates?

Mr P Robinson: You could say that there is general agreement that multiple mandates should be phased out.

Dr Farren: The suggestion to phase out multiple mandates could be referred to the mechanism/institutional review Committee. Not to suggest that multiple mandates should be phased out would certainly attract adverse comments. This is perhaps minor on the scale of everything else, but it is nonetheless a popular issue, and the media will latch on to it. If we have that strong commitment, and we recognise that phasing out multiple mandates is an issue, we should aim for the strongest possible consensus.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Therefore in principle, members agree that multiple mandates should be phased out.

Dr Farren: Yes.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The only remaining issue is the timing of that.

Mr Murphy: I pointed out that compared to the other parties, Sinn Féin does not have the difficulty of Westminster attendance. Sinn Féin's general policy is that it is against multiple mandates. Therefore, in principle, I agree that parties should consider phasing out multiple mandates.

3.00 pm

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Members seem to be happy enough. There was general agreement that multiple mandates should be phased out. Do members agree also that the timing of that should be referred to the mechanisms/institutional review Committee?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is 3.00 pm. I have to rush away to an important meeting of Down District Council at 4.00 pm. [Laughter.]

Mrs Foster: He is declaring another interest.

Ms Lewsley: That was a declaration of interest.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I must be totally honest: it is the planning committee. Therefore, it is very important.

Mr McNarry: How many houses will you pass today, Jim?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We have an hour to go —

Mr P Robinson: If you had told us that before, we might have taken a different view on this subject.

Ms Lewsley: We might have taken a wee bit longer.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): On a housekeeping issue, we will break in a couple of minutes when the tea and coffee arrives. We are going extremely well.

Mr Campbell: We are?

Dr Farren: Keep reminding us of that, please.

Mr P Robinson: We have agreed so much.

Mr McFarland: We are in danger of reaching point 5, which we referred for legal advice.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I would like to think that we will have got to the bottom of "Stability" by 4.00 pm.

Mr Campbell: We will never get to the bottom of stability. [Laughter.]

The Chairman (Mr Wells): If we could get to the bottom of "Stability", that would be a natural break in proceedings, and we could pick up again next Monday. Are members content that, after our tea and coffee, we try to run through to 4.00 pm on those issues?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will have a five-minute coffee break before finishing off today's business.

The Committee was suspended at 3.02 pm.

On resuming —

3.10 pm

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We come to the sub-heading “Number of Assembly members” and the sub-entry “Elections to the Assembly (STV)”. Again, that was a DUP issue.

Mrs Foster: We believe that 108 Members is too many, and we have maintained that position for some time, especially in the light of the RPA recommendations. The matter needs to be looked at again. It is not going to be sorted out before devolution comes back again, but it should be referred to a committee on efficiency. Such a committee was envisaged in the comprehensive agreement to deal with issues such as this. We propose that an efficiency committee be set up within the Assembly.

Do you wish to take comments on STV at this time?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes.

Mrs Foster: We are not seeking to change the voting system. We are happy enough with it.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): What do other members think about the number of Assembly Members and the voting system?

Mrs Long: There are a couple of points. We have proposed a reduction in the number of Assembly Members to approximately 80. We recognise that the ratio of Members to the size of the population makes our Government unwieldy in comparison to other parts of the UK and Europe. It is certainly a higher ratio than in Dáil Éireann, for example.

We are in favour of the single-transferable-vote system of proportional representation because it is the fairest system. However, the use of STV in smaller multi-member constituencies tends to create a slight imbalance towards larger parties, and particularly towards the largest party in a region.

Mr P Robinson: I do not think that you said that right.

Mrs Long: Yes I did.

Mr P Robinson: It is not the smaller constituency —

Mrs Long: It is the smaller number of members per constituency.

The initial decision to return six Assembly Members from each of the 18 constituencies was taken in order to allow for a greater diversity of membership. That has not worked; it has not really achieved great diversity. It would be possible to reduce the number of Members and increase diversity at the same time by having a more reflective proportionality. We would have larger multi-member constituencies returning more Members, but a lower total. For example, you could have 12 constituencies returning between six and eight Members, which would give around 80 Assembly Members.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Any views on that interesting proposal?

Dr Farren: It is a view that is being expressed at the minute. As Mrs Foster said, it is not likely that we are going to reach a resolution on it today. It may well need to be referred to the institutional review committee, or some such committee, following restoration.

In our submission to the Review of Public Administration, the SDLP recognised that the public is concerned about the high number of public representatives in Northern Ireland, between the councils, the Assembly, Westminster and the European Parliament, and that there should be some cutback. Our submission suggested that there should be 90 public representatives, giving five to the existing constituencies, and that we should persist with the STV system.

3.15 pm

However, there will be a significant problem in getting public representatives of high quality, and there will be a challenge in achieving the numbers that have been proposed in the RPA along with the elimination of the dual mandate for Assembly Members. Recognising that the ratio of Members to the electorate is quite low compared to many others, a smaller number of Assembly Members is recommended. There are many practical considerations impelling us to look at reducing the number of Assembly Members.

Mr McFarland: It is generally agreed that there are too many MLAs, and that the number needs to be reduced. The question of how far is a matter for further discussion and would have to be referred to the relevant Assembly Committee.

Mr Murphy: We are happy to look at this with other parties and see what agreement can be reached when devolution is restored.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mrs Foster proposed that an efficiency committee be set up within the Northern Ireland Assembly to consider issues such as the number of Assembly Members and that Members of the Assembly should continue to be elected by STV — but STV did not really arise as a problem.

Mr McFarland: Can this be filtered off to the famous mechanism, or institutional review, Committee that will look at issues relating to structures, numbers, etc; it is the same topic. The danger of creating a committee for each area is that we end up having more chairmen, and then the question of payment for chairmen arises. If we are doing jobs for the MLAs, we are in danger of creating extra committees when they are not needed.

Mr P Robinson: Do chairmen get paid?

Mrs Foster: The chairmen of Ad Hoc Committees do not get paid.

Mr Murphy: There is a danger of creating inefficiency committees by creating too many of them.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr McFarland, are you suggesting that we do not have an efficiency committee, but that this matter is referred to the other mechanism suggested?

Mr McFarland: An efficiency committee makes lots of sense, and we support having some sort of organisation that will examine, for instance, effectiveness, efficiency, who is doing what, and how we develop and re-examine different areas. However, if we keep establishing committees for every topic that needs to be examined, we will have trouble getting Members to sit on them. An institutional review Committee — or mechanism — could examine how to better the Assembly; whether the institution needs to be changed, and which bits of it are not working properly. Regardless of what the committee is called — effectiveness and efficiency Committee or institutional review Committee — it would have the same objective.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mrs Foster, it was your proposal.

Mrs Foster: Yes. We envisaged the institutional review Committee as being a Standing Committee, whereas the efficiency review Committee would be appointed to deal with issues such as the number of MLAs and the size of departmental structures, etc. I would have preferred if it had stayed where it was.

Naomi made a point about larger constituencies. Members will be aware of the recommendations in the RPA concerning the size of the constituencies, but they detract from the connection that the public will have with their representatives. That is particularly important for the DUP in the west of the Province. I am not in favour of increasing the size of the constituencies. Fermanagh and South Tyrone is, I think, the second largest geographical constituency in the United Kingdom, and I cannot envisage making it any larger. Therefore we want to address that point.

The points have all been made. There is public concern, and members know fine well that the 'Belfast Telegraph' runs articles every now and again about the 108 people who do nothing for their money. It is something on which we have consensus, and I hope that we can go ahead with it.

Mr P Robinson: In the comprehensive agreement, the proposed efficiency Committee has been scaled down to a panel appointed by the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to deal with efficiency matters. We will probably get general agreement somewhere between that and the more institutional issues being dealt with by the institutional review Committee.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There should be an efficiency panel in the Northern Ireland Assembly.

Mr P Robinson: The First Minister and the Deputy First Minister would appoint a panel under proposals by the two Governments. They have a responsibility under the Northern Ireland Act 1998 to consider the number of Departments, and so forth. They hold that rolling function, so it is simply a matter of widening it to consider additional issues.

Mr McFarland: That panel should reflect the Assembly, rather than two parties appointing colleagues to examine efficiency. The UUP would not have a problem with a body being set up that is similar to a Committee and which reflects the percentages of the Assembly. However, leaving it to colleagues to identify issues that may be helpful to parties would not necessarily be healthy.

Mr P Robinson: We have already agreed a principle of proportionality, have we not?

Dr Farren: We have agreed a commitment to reducing the number of MLAs. Can we agree to defer the question of a mechanism until we find the most appropriate one to be established? That is a second issue.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are members agreed?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We have agreed, in principle, to a reduction in the number of MLAs, and we will defer consideration on the mechanism. Do we need to raise "Elections to the Assembly (STV)"?

Mr P Robinson: Yes, you said that you agreed to it.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It was put down as an issue, but everyone spoke favourably on it. Are members agreed?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We move to "Standing of MLAs", which Mr McFarland raised.

Mr McFarland: I worked for some years at Westminster, where, if someone wanted to get access to a Minister, the gatekeeper was the MP: a constituent wrote to the MP, and the MP organised matters from there. Therefore the MP was of some standing — they were someone in the community.

There was a strange situation in the previous Assembly in which — and perhaps it was in an effort to get us close to our constituents — we sometimes ended up with Ministers taking delegations from anyone who wrote to them. There were all sorts of people, including councillors and individuals, leading delegations on issues to see the Minister. As a result, MLAs became irrelevant, or at least not of the same standing as MPs. That was because MLAs were not the gatekeepers; they had nothing to deliver to someone who wanted to meet a Minister, because that person could write to the Minister, and the Minister would receive a delegation.

We should use the same system as Westminster, where people who wish to contact a Minister write to their MP. MLAs should be important in getting access to a Minister. If councillors and the general public can access Ministers themselves, what is there for an MLA to do? The answer is: not a great deal.

The standing of MLAs is important for the next time. An MLA should be a key figure in getting justice, access or changes made for constituents. At the moment, MLAs are largely irrelevant.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Does anyone have a view on that suggestion? The same applies to the Northern Ireland Commissioner for Complaints. Members of the public cannot approach the Commissioner except through an MLA.

Mr McFarland: Absolutely, that is the one thing that a MLA can do. People cannot access the Ombudsman without going through their MLA.

Mr P Robinson: Where do we draw the line? Are we saying, for example, that if representatives of Belfast City Council wish to meet with the Minister with responsibility for the Department of the Environment, an MLA must sponsor them? Are there no groups of sufficient standing to merit a meeting with a Minister should they request one?

As happened many times when I was the Minister for Regional Development, if trade union representatives requested a meeting, I met them, and the same applied to the Institute of Directors (IoD) or the Confederation of British Industry (CBI). I am not sure that that is appropriate in all cases, but it was for those groups.

On account of the division in our society, some groups might find it difficult to be associated with a particular MLA. That would lead to a situation whereby all the MLAs for a particular area would need to be dragged along to each meeting. It would end up that Windsor Park would be needed to accommodate some of the meetings, especially if Naomi were to get her way.

Mr Campbell: I want to expand that point. If, at some point in the not-too-distant future, there is a reduction in the number of MLAs, there could conceivably be a number of constituencies in which a section of the community does not feel that it is represented by any of the MLAs. That could effectively create a barrier between the Minister and a community group, or various people within a constituency, because they do not feel that they have an elected MLA, not only from a political party of their choice, but from the community of their choice.

Mr McFarland: The current situation is no different: if a nationalist from east Londonderry wishes to gain access to the Home Secretary in London, he goes through Gregory, or if uncomfortable with that, through Martin McGuinness. If MLAs cannot deliver something that Joe Public could not achieve simply by writing a letter to the Minister, they are largely irrelevant.

Councillors have greater access to councils than MLAs. If people want to raise issues with councils, they would normally approach their local councillors who would make the arrangements. They would be brought to the council and, if councillors agree to speak with them, that would go ahead. In the first Assembly, our experience as MLAs was that when it came to accessing Ministers, we were largely irrelevant.

If the title of MLA is to mean anything, or if MLAs are to have any power as gatekeepers, we must act. Otherwise, we may as well pack it in and become super-councillors, and if people want to come to us, that is OK. They will be able to drift in to see the Minister whose time will then be occupied by loads of wee groups from all over the place who want to have a word with him or her.

Mrs Long: I am not sure that I understand Alan's motivation. As an elected representative, I do not wish to see myself installed as a gatekeeper to prevent my constituents having full access to the people to whom they wish to speak. I would not be particularly eager to take on that role.

It is true that councillors can sign in MLAs at their local councils and that they can request deputations. As MLAs, we have the right to sign in anyone who wants to sit in the Assembly's public gallery. However, I do not imagine that any council would turn away an MLA who has phoned about a particular constituency issue. Therefore, I am not sure that that holds true.

It is up to MLAs to justify their existence to their constituents and the electorate. When we have legislative and scrutiny functions, we must demonstrate that we discharge those well and in the interests of our constituents. We must demonstrate that we listen to what they say and that we are making representations on their behalf.

Much of what our constituents seek from us will relate to our individual powers of persuasion and argument and to our understanding of the political system. They will not expect us to take on a gate-keeping role to prevent them from making a direct appeal to a Minister, which they may feel would get them further.

3.30 pm

Dr Farren: I hope that it is not too indelicate to suggest that this issue arose because of difficulties the UUP had with the Ministers in office. That is a flippant remark.

I did not afford individuals immediate access. However, if individuals nabbed me by the collar at a public event, or when I walked down the street, or if they got hold of my telephone number and phoned me at home, then I would engage with them insofar as I wanted to or could do. However, some delegations consisted of one person, and that person was there because of a corporate responsibility. MLAs, councillors, or both, accompanied many delegations, and I am not sure what would have been achieved by being restrictive in any formal way. In practice, time is rationed anyway. It is rationed between the delegations and people you want to meet according to their needs. People should have access. MLAs were accessible to the electorate and were available on many occasions within constituencies and elsewhere in a way that people had not experienced prior to devolution, and I hope that will be retained.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I do not think that we are going to get consensus.

Mr Murphy: I agree with Seán Farren. One of the successes of the Assembly was having accessibility to those who were making decisions — and that is one aspect that people miss. MLAs have a role and it is up to them to make themselves relevant in whatever role their party has given them or whatever role they can carve out for themselves. The problem that Alan McFarland refers to has not arisen as far as Sinn Féin is concerned, and it is certainly not an issue. People have roles, and they work as effectively as they can within those roles.

Naomi Long referred to MLA's being gatekeepers, and I share her concerns that there are too many gatekeepers in this society. They become apparent when you try to gain access to Ministers through the Civil Service and the NIO. I would not be comfortable with such a role in relation to my own constituency. If people have issues that they do not want me to bring forward on their behalf, then another representative can do that for them. Sinn Féin has not experienced that problem and does not see any necessity to bring in specific mechanisms to deal with it.

Mr McFarland: I am not against institutions having direct access to Ministers. However, the first Assembly was made up of Members who were also MPs and councillors and therefore had access to Ministers. When Members are acting as MLAs only — and are not also MPs, councillors or anything else — what specific attributes can they deliver within that role? My understanding is that a Home Office Minister can only be accessed through an MP — as an individual — and I suspect that a Dáil Minister can only be accessed through a TD.

I think it will be important to find out what MLAs can deliver after they have shed their roles as MPs and councillors. There is no consensus, and I accept that. This will be an issue as people start to divest their roles and Ministers start — [Interruption.]

Mr Murphy: I do not think that that is correct in relation to the Dáil. I know of constituents who write to Dáil Ministers.

Mr P Robinson: Neither is it correct in the case of the Home Office: the Association of Chief Police Officers of England, Wales and Northern Ireland, the Prison Officers' Association, and all the other groups who have an interest in Home Office matters could go along there. I did not meet individuals when I was a Minister. I met representative groups, but I do not think I ever met individuals. No individual wrote to me and was invited to meet me as a result.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr McFarland, I take it that you do not want to formally move your proposal?

Mr McFarland: No. This is not necessarily a problem now, but it may be a problem in the future. There are issues around it that need to be aired.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will move on to a very significant issue, an Alliance Party issue that has come up several times; the power to raise or to vary our own tax.

Mr P Robinson: Do you mean to vary Members' own tax or to vary somebody else's tax?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It will be interesting to see. The phrase used is "tax-varying powers". Mr McNarry, do you wish to comment on this issue?

Mr McNarry: Yes. Could the Committee give an opinion on this matter to the subgroup?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes. You were quick to point out that we should not cut across their work. If we take decisions or do anything on this issue, it is important that the Committee let the subgroup know immediately. Naomi, what is the main thrust behind the suggestion?

Mrs Long: The Alliance Party has a principled position that the Northern Ireland Assembly should have the ability — similar to the Scottish Parliament — to vary taxes within Northern Ireland to take account of its specific economic situation. If the matter is better dealt with through the subgroup, my party is happy with that. It is not concerned about where this is discussed.

Mr P Robinson: There is a misunderstanding. The Scottish Parliament does not have power to vary taxes; it has power to raise its own tax. There is a great difference. If the Assembly had power to vary our own tax, we could reduce income tax, corporation tax, VAT and everything else.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is a good idea.

Mr P Robinson: I do not think the Chancellor would like that.

Mrs Long: Within a Northern Ireland context it would be feasible to decide that rather than have separate charges for rates, water charges and the plethora of other local taxes, they could be rationalised in such a way that the outcome would be varied.

Mr P Robinson: We have complete control over the regional rate and authority over the local rate and water charging.

Mr McFarland: Dr Farren, I am sure, will keep us right, but my understanding from the first Assembly examination of this issue is that the Chancellor would be delighted if the Assembly would abandon the Barnett formula and adopt its own tax-raising powers because an enormous slice would be removed from the subvention that Northern Ireland receives. That idea was examined in the first Assembly and was found to be slightly dangerous.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The subgroup is looking at corporation tax and industrial derating at the moment. This matter would be best taken by the subgroup. You were not to know when this item was listed that the subgroup would be looking at those items.

Mrs Long: We raised this issue in our initial submission and at that time the agenda for the subgroup had not been finalised. This was part of our overall submission on preparation for Government. If it is now best dealt with through the subgroup we are content.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I think that is a reasonable decision.

Mr McNarry: I am sure Mrs Long will be impartial when this matter arises during her time as Chairperson of the subgroup. [Laughter.]

Mrs Long: As always.

Dr Farren: The subgroup will report to this Committee. Therefore, this Committee will have a say if it wants to.

Mr Murphy: I am content to allow members of my party on the subgroup to air views on the matter. Sinn Féin is, in general, for the maximum transfer of powers, so that would include all of these matters, but my party will let members of the subgroup spell it out in more detail.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The next issue is “Stability”. I do not know if this meeting will conclude by 4.00 pm, but a series of issues has been raised, mostly by the DUP. The first is a major issue: arrangements for a fail-safe mechanism in the event of recurring terror and criminal behaviour. Does anyone wish to speak on that?

Mr McNarry: We have moved remarkably quickly through this part of the agenda, and I understand that there is to be a full session the next time we meet. The issue of “Stability” cannot be properly considered in 20 minutes. I suggest that we return to it later with fresh minds.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Seán, you are happy with that.

Mr P Robinson: I am quite content; we do not want to begin to discuss the topic with only 20 minutes left. Could some work be prepared for the Committee on the issue? We need to know the existing arrangements with regard to the Independent Monitoring Commission (IMC) reports and recommendations and the legislation as it stands. What is the responsibility of the Secretary of State or the Governments if the IMC recommends the disqualification of a party, for instance, in the event of terrorism? If the Assembly were started up because the IMC had judged that there was no ongoing paramilitary or criminal activity, and six months later the Ulster Bank was robbed — or something as outlandish as that — what mechanism would be in place to deal with that? The IMC might report that the party should be disqualified from Government for a period of time, but my understanding is that that disqualification would be subject to a decision by somebody else. The IMC can only make recommendations. If we could be apprised of the legal and factual position in the present situation, it might be worth considering how it could be strengthened.

Mrs Long: Mr Chairman, I would like some clarification on that. Mr Robinson, when you mention the situation as it currently stands, do you mean during suspension, when the decision to follow through on recommendations is at the Secretary of State’s discretion; or are you referring to the Assembly’s ability to follow through on recommendations, or both?

Mr P Robinson: I am assuming that the Assembly is running.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is everyone happy? I take David’s point; the Committee will not get through this issue in less than 20 minutes. Considerable progress has been made in getting through the agenda. Would everyone be content if we stop now and return to the issue later?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): One or two small issues remain.

First, are members happy with the revised work programme that is in their papers, which gives the dates and the names of those who will chair the meetings? Obviously, it is a moveable feast and will depend on whether we make more or less progress than expected. However, it gives members an idea of what will be happening over the next few weeks so that they can check their diaries. Is everybody happy with that?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The next meeting will be held on Wednesday 9 August at 10.00 am in room 144. It will be on policing and justice issues, and it will be an all-day meeting.

Does the Committee want another all-day meeting on Monday 14 August, from 10.00 am to 4.00 pm, to try to get through this? Is everyone happy with that, even the councillors and the MPs? I take it that no one has to rush off to any other meetings?

Members indicated assent.

Mr P Robinson: I do not think that “happy” is the word that we would use.

Adjourned at 3.45 pm

COMMITTEE ON THE PREPARATION FOR GOVERNMENT

Wednesday 9 August 2006

Members in attendance for all or part of proceedings:

The Chairmen, Mr Francie Molloy and Mr Jim Wells
Mr Fred Cobain
Mrs Arlene Foster
Mrs Dolores Kelly
Mr Gerry Kelly
Mr Danny Kennedy
Mrs Naomi Long
Mr Raymond McCartney
Mr Alan McFarland
Mr Alban Maginness
Mr Alex Maskey
Mr Sean Neeson
Mr Peter Weir
Mr Sammy Wilson

The Committee met at 10.06 am.

(The Chairman (Mr Molloy) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I remind members, as usual, to switch off their mobile phones, as they interrupt recording, and we have lost some proceedings before because of them. We will break for lunch at 12.20 pm, which we will have in this room. Jim Wells will chair the afternoon session, as I am going to a wedding. I have to get my priorities right.

Are substitutes present?

Mr McFarland: Mr Chairman, we expect Mr Kennedy shortly; Mr Cobain is standing in for Mr McNarry today.

Mr G Kelly: I have no idea who I am deputising for; I just came along. [Laughter.]

Mr Raymond McCartney: I am deputising for Martin McGuinness.

Mr A Maginness: I am standing in for Mark Durkan.

Mrs D Kelly: I am standing in for Alasdair McDonnell.

Mr Neeson: David Ford sends his apologies.

Mrs Long: I am here as me.

Mrs Foster: I am here for Lord Morrow; Sammy Wilson will be joining me soon for Ian Paisley Jnr; and Peter Weir will be here for Rev McCrea.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do members have any relevant interests to declare?

Mrs D Kelly: I am a member of the Northern Ireland Policing Board.

Mrs Long: I am a member of Belfast District Policing Partnership (DPP).

Mrs Foster: I declare Policing Board membership.

Mr Cobain: I too declare Policing Board membership.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Gerry, do you have any interests to declare?

Mr Cobain: The Policing Board. [Laughter.]

Mr G Kelly: How did you hear?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Our next agenda item is the draft minutes of last week's meeting. Are members content?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Under "Matters arising", Mr Wells wrote to the Secretary of State seeking his attendance at this Committee. However, we have not received a reply. There has been communication between the Committee Clerk and the Northern Ireland Office (NIO), but there has been no reply.

We also have the revised list of law and order issues, which was agreed at last week's meeting. The first heading on the revised list is "Devolution of policing and justice"; the second is "Policing", under which are "Intelligence Services", "Policing issues" and "Police Ombudsman"; the third heading is "Justice issues", under which fall "Community Restorative Justice" and "Residual justice issues"; the fourth heading is "Rule of law", under which come "Criminality", "Decommissioning" and "Paramilitarism".

Members should be aware that those issues will be discussed in the following sessions, so we will try to avoid straying into them today.

Today, we will discuss two sections of the revised list: devolution of policing and justice; and the Northern Ireland Office discussion paper 'Devolving Policing and Justice in Northern Ireland'. It is up to members how we handle this, but it has been suggested that the discussion on devolving policing and justice be separated into two categories: the option for ministerial and departmental structures; and matters for devolution. Are members content?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Everyone has a copy of the discussion paper, which contains the models. I suggest that members discuss the paper, and then I will take proposals arising from that discussion, rather than interrupting the discussion with proposals that may be counteracted later on. We will take it as we go, but if members are happy to have the general discussion followed by proposals and recommendations at the end, we will proceed.

Mrs Long: There are three issues around the devolution of policing and justice matters: the structures; matters which will be devolved; and the timing of devolution. There are, therefore, three components to be discussed. We have decided how to deal with the first two, but when will we discuss the timing?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The timing should be the next issue to be discussed.

Mr G Kelly: I hazard a guess that the longest discussion will be on the NIO discussion paper, so it might be helpful to discuss the timing first or second.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are you suggesting that we discuss timing in the first session?

Mr G Kelly: I am open to that, but since you suggested discussing the models first, let us do that. However, timing is relevant and, I hope, discussions on it will not take as long as those on the actual discussion paper will take.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Nothing is ruled out in these discussions, and I have said that from when the PFG Committee meetings started. Both Chairmen are content to permit discussions on whatever members think relevant.

Mr McFarland: Following the meetings of the past six weeks, it is obvious that a number of parties are still not confident that the background scenario is one in which the devolution of policing and justice or devolved government could be easily dealt with at present. Part of the reason why members were content that the “Rule of law” was put at the end of the list was because they realised that it would cause the drama. Members will be asking if the conditions are right for the devolution of policing and justice, and they will be stating whether they are comfortable and confident that all the parties have fulfilled their obligations to enable it to occur.

The question of timing, one would argue, is directly related to that confidence and the last issue on the list, “Rule of law”. Therefore, while timing is important — and I understand that it must be discussed — it would be beneficial to tease out the practical steps that are not directly related to whether parties feel comfortable to have devolution of policing and justice yet. One could argue, therefore, that timing is directly related to the last topic for discussion, “Rule of law”, and it could be discussed alongside criminality, decommissioning and paramilitarism. Those areas will all have an important bearing on when parties will feel comfortable with the devolution of policing and justice. We must remind ourselves that none of this will happen until there is an Assembly vote on the issue.

It makes sense to leave the discussion on the timing of devolution of policing and justice until the end of today, or perhaps until we discuss “Rule of law”, which impacts on timing. The Committee can discuss detailed structures without prejudice, but, as soon as we begin to discuss timing, we will enter into other complex issues that may interfere with the flow of our day.

10.15 am

Mr G Kelly: Was it agreed that the devolution of policing and justice would take place midway through a sitting of the Assembly, or in an equivalent period? Have we moved away from that?

Mr McFarland: The Committee has worked hard to deal with the straightforward matters, and the more fundamental issues have been put off until the end. The DUP has spent six weeks having a go at Conor and Martin over various matters, including whether paramilitarism and criminality have stopped. Such matters cannot be resolved in advance of the publication of Independent Monitoring Commission (IMC) reports confirming that they have stopped. We can sit here all day arguing about that; we have done that, and those discussions have been reported in Hansard. All parties have stated their positions on the issue.

If we try to address the timing issue, the question will arise about whether other parties feel that Sinn Féin is ready to address policing, and whether Sinn Féin is ready to address policing and support the rule of law. If Sinn Féin says that it is ready, the DUP will say that it is not, and we will not get anywhere. I suggest that we stick to the business of examining the models, as that is philosophical and uncontentious. If we started with timing, we would spend the next two hours having a barney, rather than getting on with some solid work.

Mr G Kelly: If Mrs Long and the other parties are content, I am happy to discuss the models, and then we can come back to the other issues.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Sammy, do you have any interest to declare?

Mr S Wilson: No.

Mr Neeson: I was a member of the Police Authority for Northern Ireland before the ceasefires.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Those issues are relevant to all the parties.

Mrs Long: With regard to the options for ministerial and departmental structures, the Alliance Party wishes to comment on the four models.

The Alliance Party believes that the Patten Commission proposals represented a fundamental review of policing and the creation of a single professional police service. Those proposals have been largely implemented. Therefore, we would like to see progress, with all parties accepting the rule of law as the baseline and becoming involved in the various structures and offering their unequivocal support to the police.

Unlike other parties, the Alliance Party does not simply view this as an issue for Sinn Féin, which is the most notable absentee from the Policing Board. Other parties must also show their support for the rule of law when it is exercised. Often, parties are critical of how the police exercise the rule of law in their communities, but, when they exercise it in someone else's community, they are supportive of it. We would like people's approach to policing to be consistent.

The Alliance Party believes that it would be unhelpful if policing and justice were to become politicised by its devolution and become an issue of contention. Policing and justice will cut right to the core of people's sense of security, and, from that perspective, it is important that the entire community has confidence in how it is devolved, operated and managed.

The structural issues relating to the devolution of policing and justice cannot be divorced from those concerns that the Alliance Party raised during the institutional strand of discussions: different sections of the community will still perceive that there is the potential for policing and justice matters to be devolved into the wrong hands. That concern cuts right across the community, not only one section.

The Alliance Party's preference is for policing and justice to be devolved in the context of an Executive that assumes collective responsibility and within which there is a higher degree of accountability over ministerial decision-making and decision-taking than under the previous arrangements. It is also important that matters relating to the accountability structures between the Executive and the Assembly are resolved.

I wish to comment on the four models of ministerial and departmental structures that have been proposed. It is worth noting that in Iraq, where there is collective and ethnic tension in regard to policing, much pressure was applied to ensure that policing and justice matters were not placed into the hands of any particular section of the community, but were taken on by a neutral body.

The existing Executive structures are inadequate to deal with devolution, because they provide few incentives for moderation and accommodation. Therefore, the review of the institutional dimension is critical in getting the devolution of structures right. None of the structures offered in the joint declaration provides an ideal way forward. I assume that the Committee will consider each model in detail, but I will take a cursory look at them now.

If, as suggested in model 1, policing and justice were devolved to a single Department under the current arrangements, without the Executive having full collective responsibility, the fear throughout the community would be that policing and justice matters could somehow be manipulated, or that the Minister could interfere, with little recourse, in operational matters.

Model 2 suggests a single justice Department with two Ministers. That throws up the same questions that we have already discussed relating to the unwieldiness of OFMDFM structures in the last Assembly, and to productivity having been fairly low in comparison to the amount of effort made. A single Department with two Ministers is also something of a curate's egg. In the institutional format of this Committee, we talked about trying to strip away some powers and vest them back in other Departments. That would conflict with giving policing and justice to a Department led by two Ministers.

Model 3 proposes extending the remit of OFMDFM to cover policing and justice. Although a single justice Department with two Ministers operating in conjunction may give people a sense of confidence, as the two Ministers would have to agree on every decision, it is unlikely to prevent a political tug of war.

The Alliance Party's concern about model 4, which suggests two distinct Departments with separate functions, is twofold. First, there is already a division between the powers to be devolved and those that Westminster will retain. Model 4 involves a further split between a policing Department and a justice Department. The substantial capacity for confusion among the general public as to where the remit for individual issues of policing and justice would lie would be unhelpful.

Furthermore, that model would not address the specific concern about the unfettered power of Ministers in each Department. Although policing and justice would be divided between two Departments, each with a lower remit, the powers to take decisions without recourse to colleagues would be the same. Therefore, model 4 does not address the structural issue.

Currently, the Alliance Party is not particularly exercised about the matters to be devolved and is fairly happy with the list that has been drawn up. However, we have a concern about issues relating to security and the security services.

The policing and security structures in Great Britain are not as politically accountable as the proposed structures in Northern Ireland, and the Alliance Party is therefore concerned about the retention of security issues, such as MI5 and so on, because of that lack of accountability.

There is a significant disparity in how republican terrorism and loyalist terrorism are viewed. The Government view republican terrorism as a national security threat to be dealt with by MI5. Loyalist paramilitarism, however, is seen more as criminal activity and is dealt with by the police at a local level and under the devolved structure as it is not perceived to be a threat to national security. However, the Alliance Party sees no difference between them. Its main concern is that there is a disparity in how the two are dealt with; it wants to see that disparity resolved so that people will have confidence that the paramilitary threat is being dealt with in the same way and through the same accountable structures — regardless of where it emanates from.

The Alliance Party has more detailed papers on this issue, and it is happy to submit them for consideration, but, as an opening statement, that is probably more than enough.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Can members keep to the first part? The models are divided into two parts, and the matters for devolution are in the second part.

Mrs Foster: Like the Alliance Party, the DUP believes that this issue must be set in the context of an institutional review, accountability structures, and the scaling-down of Departments to make way for whatever will be proposed on policing and justice. That is an acknowledgement of what the DUP has been saying about timescale, and I note what Alan said about that. If we had started off with a timescale, there would have been a brief discussion, Chairman. The Committee organises itself on consensus, and as far as the DUP is concerned, the timescale — if put in place — would have done more damage to confidence in the DUP's community than anything else. It is not about a timescale; it is about gaining the confidence to put structures in place.

The DUP has difficulties with all the various models that have been put before the Committee, and that is what we are here to discuss. The DUP also believes that there would be difficulties about agreement and that the problems that have arisen with OFMDFM would also arise with a single justice Department. It would be unwieldy and would, in many cases, lead to deadlock. We were all aware of the unfettered powers of Ministers in the previous Assembly, and a single justice Department would bring difficulties.

OFMDFM's remit is large enough already, without extending it to cover policing and justice. Putting something as important as policing and justice into OFMDFM would be a non-starter.

Policing and justice are inextricably linked, and dividing them into two distinct Departments would lead to severe difficulties — especially if one were held by a unionist and the other by a nationalist or republican. That must be addressed.

We are dealing solely with ministerial and departmental structures. However, in relation to policing, Naomi was right when she said that GB does not have the same accountability structures as Northern Ireland does. Following the Patten Report, policing here is one of the most scrutinised — if not the most scrutinised — matters in the world, with the Police Ombudsman, the Oversight Commissioner and the Policing Board.

Many policing matters have been sorted out. The Committee may take that into account in considering departmental structures. The DUP is suggesting a single justice Department with senior and junior Ministers, the junior Minister having responsibility for policing. Policing relates mainly to operational matters; justice would be the more senior portfolio. That is something to be discussed. My party will not be prescriptive about that. Those are my initial thoughts.

10.30 am

Mr G Kelly: I begin by putting the discussion into context. When we are talking about models, the context must be borne in mind. The Alliance Party and the DUP have discussed institutional problems and their difficulties with Executive power. Transfer of power is the mainstay of the model of policing envisaged by the Patten Commission. Without that, the potential for a new beginning for policing is seriously undermined. In paragraph 7 of the policing and justice section of the Good Friday Agreement, the two Governments agreed to a transfer of powers on policing and justice. From Sinn Féin's point of view, that requires taking power away from London and out of the hands of the British securocrats in Whitehall and Stormont Castle.

Recommendations 20 and 21 of the Patten Report of 1999 explicitly recommended the transfer of powers to enhance, not diminish, the new arrangements for policing. The 'Review of the Criminal Justice System in Northern Ireland' in 2000 also supported the transfer of powers to local democratically accountable arrangements.

The Patten Commission envisaged that the transfer of powers would have positive implications for policing arrangements in many ways, for example, the appointment of chief police officers and civilian equivalents would become subject to approval by members of the power-sharing Executive, who would also be empowered to call upon the PSNI Chief Constable to resign in certain circumstances. The Patten Commission also foresaw the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister as jointly assuming responsibilities previously exercised by the British Secretary of State following the transfer of powers, such as the appointment of independent members of the Policing Board, determining the remuneration and expenses of board members, and so on.

The key distinction between Sinn Féin's position and those of other parties is that Sinn Féin wants to achieve that which was set out in the agreement as the basis for a new beginning for policing. For that to happen, agreement on a time frame is needed. This is important. Previous negotiations were already centring what that time frame should be. Agreement is also required on the departmental model, which we are dealing with now, and, perhaps most importantly, the powers to be transferred. Unlike Mrs Long, I believe that there are issues in the document that will necessitate the longest discussion we will have. The first step in the enactment of the necessary legislation was taken a week or two ago, and Gerry Adams has said that he will go to our party's national executive and call a special Ard-Fheis.

Sinn Féin has been pressing the British Government to honour its commitments by transferring power to local democratically accountable arrangements under an Assembly. However, the all-Ireland arrangements are also important. They are interdependent institutions, set up under the Good Friday Agreement, and must also become a part of the Committee's discussion.

A huge issue, which is getting bigger, is Peter Hain's statement that MI5 should have primacy in policing the Six Counties. That is after the long negotiations that have taken place and would be a reversal of the Patten recommendations. It is not only Sinn Féin that strenuously opposes that. The SDLP has spoken publicly about it. The Irish Government, the Police Ombudsman for Northern Ireland, the Oversight Commissioner and the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission are now forcefully voicing their opposition. Sinn Féin wants to see the role of British securocrats in our country reduced and ended; not supported and expanded. That should apply not only to MI5 but also to those anti-agreement elements and securocrats still operating in the PSNI and in other associated agencies.

Fundamental principles should underpin the transfer of power: a speedy, time-bounded process; maximum transfer of powers on policing and justice in so far as they relate to the island of Ireland; democratic accountability within the Six Counties and in all-Ireland arrangements; freedom from partisan political control; entrenchment and primacy of human rights; and the safeguarding and demarcation of roles and responsibilities.

The following items will also necessitate long discussion, depending upon which type of ministry is decided upon: the Northern Ireland Policing Board; the Police Ombudsman for Northern Ireland; the Chief Constable of the PSNI; and the number of protocols necessary in implementing and validating the transfer of powers.

With regard to the type of models that have been proposed, and in the light of all the issues that have been raised previously, I should say from the outset that, from Sinn Féin's point of view, trust is an issue. Whatever happens in the longer term, we must take some sort of shared approach to this matter. Naomi talked about neutrality, but the fact remains that sections of the community are affected by this matter in different ways and should therefore be involved in this. While Sinn Féin is very open to discussing different models, the party's immediate attitude is that a shared approach must be adopted so that both sections of the community — in political terms — can be involved. We are open to suggestions as to what the combination should be; although, unlike the DUP, I think that the suggested model of a single ministry with two Ministers is possibly pushing slightly ahead.

Mr A Maginness: It would be premature to be prescriptive this morning. In effect, a number of different models have been proposed by the British Government, but it is very difficult to evaluate them without agreeing a set of principles, which can then form a basis for evaluating individual models and reaching a collective conclusion on one of the models under discussion today, or another model. The SDLP believes that we must get the principles right before we can construct a model that could be blessed by consensus around this table.

The whole discussion on the devolution of policing and justice powers must be viewed in the context of power sharing and partnership. The Executive, and the parties within it, must be generally supportive of the different Ministers and Departments, so that there can be collective goodwill and a sense of shared responsibility. A sense of shared responsibility creates partnership, that partnership creates goodwill, and, in turn, that goodwill creates good government for all the people of Northern Ireland. That is an opening contextual basis for discussing policing and justice, and devolution.

The SDLP also believes that the current policing institutions — the Policing Board, the DPPs, the Police Ombudsman and the Police Oversight Commissioner, whose office will exist until the end of May 2007 — should continue as at present in the event of devolution of policing powers in the future. That is an important principle to assert; there should be no interference with what is presently established.

The devolution of powers must not only involve strand one of the Good Friday Agreement, which deals with Northern institutions, but also strand two, which deals with North/South institutions. The latter is part of the current basis for government on the island, and therefore should be the basis for the administration of justice and policing on the island.

The fourth principle concerns the need for detailed consideration of the future structure of the justice Department or Departments, the number of Ministers, etc. That must be consistent with the second principle on the protection of the present institutions. That should also be consistent with the Patten Report.

The fifth principle is that there is a range of important and sensitive powers held by the British Government that the SDLP believes should be devolved, with necessary cross-community protections. Those would include: appeal powers by the Chief Constable against a ruling of the Parades Commission — a power that has not been used to date, but is still a residual power held by the Secretary of State; the protection of fifty-fifty police recruitment, which currently requires renewal every three years; and protection against a devolved Minister from one community vetoing a Policing Board inquiry without cross-community agreement. The SDLP emphasises the importance of those sensitive and potentially crucial powers that are held by the British Government.

The sixth principle is that the gathering and managing of all intelligence must remain with the PSNI. The SDLP has been very firm on that point. That includes national security intelligence, the threats presented by organised and serious crime, and international terrorism. It is important to develop and maintain confidence in policing. If intelligence gathering were removed from the PSNI, which would be left with a fairly minor residual function, PSNI capacity would be effectively weakened. The SDLP believes that that would be wrong.

The seventh principle is that — independent of the requirement for elements of justice and policing powers to be devolved — there are particular issues that require all-Ireland integration as part of strand-two arrangements. The SDLP believes that an all-Ireland assets recovery agency should be created and that there should be an upgrading of all-Ireland mechanisms to address organised crime. The SDLP believes that that is of critical importance.

The eighth principle is that the British Army and security services should have no role in the North aside from that outlined in the Hillsborough declaration and in the Patten Report. In particular, the British Army should have no function in relation to intelligence gathering, management, or other intelligence capacity. That should be a principle that parties should adopt as a prerequisite for proper negotiation on the devolution of justice.

Our ninth principle is that there is a requirement for the transfer of powers to the maximum threshold. That would be healthy for the credibility and authority of a restored Assembly and would protect against undue influence from the Government or agencies in London. After examination of the discussion paper, the SDLP believes that that area must be fully assessed and robustly challenged to ensure the maximum transfer of powers. That should include matters where constitutional conventions exist or where issues are not fully governed by statute.

The tenth principle is that there should be a fixed and firm deadline for the devolution of justice. That would create a degree of certainty, avoid doubt, and create momentum. At an earlier stage, the SDLP argued that a target date of six months was realisable. Arguably, a more limited time frame is now justified.

10.45 am

The devolution of justice is a further test against which to judge each party and against which each party can judge itself. We strongly urge other political parties, the Governments and other interested parties to adopt the principles that we suggest. That is the best way to ensure that, should the devolution of justice arise, it is done correctly. If we get the principles right, we can move on to considering the specifics of the modalities and search for as wide an agreement on a preferred modality as possible within the context of these political discussions.

Mrs Foster: Will the SDLP share its paper with the rest of us?

Mr A Maginness: We will present it in due course.

Mrs Foster: Does that mean that it is not sharing it at this time?

Mr A Maginness: No, not at the moment — we may want to make some adjustments to it.

Mrs Long: We discussed the submission of papers. The Alliance Party is happy to submit one, if it is decided that that is necessary. It may be worth discussing at the end of this initial session whether parties want to present written papers.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I do not want to disrupt Alan's flow, so please continue.

Mr McFarland: It was agreed at the previous meeting that if parties had papers they should circulate them. Some have; others have not. If parties have a tome of wisdom, they should circulate it.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): It was not a precondition.

Mr McFarland: I know that.

It is worth reminding ourselves of the context of all this, because it is key to the discussions. The first point is that none of this will get up and running until the Assembly is up and running. For that to happen, there has to be agreement between the DUP and Sinn Féin, and the DUP has to accept that Sinn Féin has met all the commitments that the DUP believes that it should. In theory, we are discussing this matter against a background of a new era of harmony. That does not mean that there are not any safeguards, but that is the context in which all this will happen. Current difficulties may not exist when we get to that stage. We must remind ourselves that what we are talking about can be triggered only by cross-community vote in the Assembly; therefore everybody must be in agreement. It is important to keep that in mind.

There is clearly a question about the number of Departments. All the parties are agreed — and it is in legislation — that there cannot be any more than 10. Therefore if there is to be a Department or Departments for policing and justice, then either the law must be changed to allow 11 or 12 Departments, or we consider a regrouping of the Departments to make them more effective and efficient. Every party that contested the previous election said that it wanted to look at that issue, which cross-fertilises into the institutional talks that we have on Mondays.

There is a fair amount of agreement that it would be more efficient to have policing and justice together in the system. In England, where those functions are separate, consideration is being given to drawing the two together to make them more effective and efficient. In that case, it seems daft for us to split them. The Government also expressed that view in their paper, which suggests strongly that those functions should be kept together as an entity.

The other thing to remember — and I think that this was brought out in the paper that has been prepared for us — is that much of policing and justice is not under anyone's direct control. The Chief Constable is independent, so we cannot interfere in his operational policy.

The Policing Board is probably the biggest conundrum. Ten Assembly Members sit on the Policing Board. If there were a Department for policing and justice, it would presumably need a Committee, so that would account for another 11 Members. That adds up to 21 MLAs. The question is whether the same people could sit on both.

Mr S Wilson: The rest could be fitted in somewhere.

Mr A Maginness: We will run out of Members.

Mr McFarland: Are we perhaps looking at having a Policing Board that is made up of independent members? A Policing Board with agency status would conduct the hands-on, day-to-day work, but the Committee with responsibility for policing and justice would supervise it. Some fairly major issues must be sorted out down the line. The Northern Ireland Prison Service operates independently, as does the Police Service of Northern Ireland (PSNI), and the criminal justice and legal profession has always been, as Arlene will confirm, a slightly ethereal world.

Mrs Foster: I will not confirm that.

Mr McFarland: The judiciary is independent and almost runs itself. Of course, input is provided when selecting people for positions, and so forth, but, by and large, the Northern Ireland Court Service and the courts system operate independently. We are discussing organisations that are already well on their way to being stand-alone agencies, unlike, for example, at the Department for Regional Development (DRD) or the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (DHSSPS), where the Minister is in the middle of everything and has a direct input. A Minister would not be able to wade into and tinker with policing and justice at will; that is not the way in which policing and justice work. We should bear that in mind.

The issue of cross-border policing and justice between two sovereign Governments must be debated. How do we deal with two police forces and two justice systems on the island? As far as I can see, there is a major drive on the part of the two Governments to slot in as many cross-border policing and justice measures as possible before any of those heathen MLAs from Northern Ireland get their hands on policing and justice. There seems to be a major push to implement cross-border agreements, policies and protocols before the Assembly is given responsibility for policing and justice.

What safeguards will be in place? Let us say that the DUP and Sinn Féin hold the posts of First Minister and Deputy First Minister respectively and are hugging each other in Government, and all the problems that those parties had with each other have been resolved.

Mr S Wilson: An ethereal world.

Mrs Foster: He is back in dreamland.

Mr McFarland: It will still take the communities some time to accept that one or other — or, indeed, any — of the parties can be allowed unfettered access to the post of Minister for policing and justice. Therefore, safeguards are necessary.

Do we have only one Department, dealing with both policing and justice? Could we afford to have two Ministers at a time when we are downscaling Departments and complaining about costs? How could we justify having two Ministers, each on £76,000, or whatever a Minister is paid these days?

Do we give the policing and justice portfolio to the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister? As some colleagues have already described, the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister in the previous Assembly lived in a schizophrenic world in which they were the ambassadors for and the face of the Assembly, opening shopping centres and glad-handing the world, while, at the same time, trying to run a Department that had responsibility for odds and sods and had to carry out other strange functions. At Monday's meeting of the PFG Committee dealing with institutional changes, it was pointed out that we are required to completely re-examine OFMDFM's responsibilities. Therefore it would appear slightly overenthusiastic to give the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister responsibility for policing and justice on top of all their other responsibilities.

If we opt for one Department, how do we provide safeguards? Two Ministers would prove quite expensive. We could decide to have a Minister and a junior Minister, and to alternate their roles. Should that junior Minister be what might be termed a “super junior Minister”, who would have access to all the papers? Although only one Minister would be paid £76,000, the Minister and the “super junior Minister” would be required to operate in the same way in which the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister operated. The “super junior Minister” would have to agree any changes that the Minister proposed. That would provide a safeguard.

There are both costs and benefits with all of those models, and we will need to tease those out as we proceed.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Danny, you have just come in recently. Members of the Policing Board and other organisations have been making declarations of interest.

Mr Kennedy: I am a member of the Policing Board.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Thank you. Members, we have had discussions on the issues. Have we any definite proposals?

Mrs Long: That might be somewhat premature. I would like to go back on a few things that have been said. First of all, I wish to confirm, in case it was not explicit in my original statement, that Alliance is in favour of the devolution of policing and justice. As someone who is always slightly sceptical, I have a tendency to focus on the problems and on trying to resolve them. The questions for us are: “How?”, “What?” and “When?”, not whether it should happen. I want to make that quite clear.

The SDLP said that there should be a firm time frame, and there has been some discussion about that. We believe that to set a firm timescale would be counterproductive. We need to set a target date so that people can see when it may be able to happen — two years from the restoration of devolution seems sensible. That would allow time for devolution to establish itself and become stable. However, we do not want to be prescriptive about it. I am intrigued that the SDLP has said that it thought that it could happen in fewer than six months, yet today it said that it would be premature to discuss the structures. If we are not prepared to do that in some detail now, I do not know how we could be ready for policing and justice to be devolved in fewer than six months. I would like to explore that a bit.

With regard to the neutrality of the Department — and I think Gerry Kelly raised this — it is not just about the Ministers having no political affiliations or opinions; that is not conceivable. We are talking about the community having confidence in Ministers discharging their duties in an impartial way, particularly given the sensitivities of those roles. We are not talking about which Ministers could hold the posts; we are talking about how they would discharge their functions. That is why we feel that the ministerial code and Pledge of Office are important. People from the unionist community, for example, do not lose interest in policing and justice simply because a republican or nationalist happens to head that Department, just as they do not lose interest in education or any other matter. It would be important for the Ministers to discharge their functions in a neutral way, as opposed to the individuals being politically neutral.

Those are the main issues that I felt that I should come back on in order to clarify Alliance’s position.

Mr A Maginness: We want agreement on the principles. Once they are agreed, the chosen model can be worked on and there would be a greater chance of agreement there — it is as simple as that. Without having agreed principles, it would be premature to decide on the model.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Mr Maginness listed a set of principles. Does the Committee want to explore further the matter of what principles it would want to put in place before it talks about the models? Do we want to deal with that in more detail?

Mrs Foster: You cannot take the all-Ireland devolution of powers as a principle in a vacuum; you need to know what powers you are going to put in. It strikes me that that goes entirely against the principle of consent that was meant to underlie the Belfast Agreement. I do not see any possibility of agreeing principles such as that. That is why I asked to see the SDLP paper. I am not being prescriptive in any way, but you cannot just state blandly and in a vacuum that you want to see the devolution of powers to all-Ireland institutions.

11.00 am

Mr A Maginness: We are willing to share our thoughts on the principles that I have briefly outlined as soon as we can, and further discussion might come from that. Equally, we would like the other parties to put their thoughts on paper to allow us to evaluate them and to judge them against our thoughts. It would be good if parties submitted in writing the principles on which they feel that the model for the devolution of policing and justice should be based.

Mr McFarland: The difficulty is that the Committee has a fortnight, or perhaps three weeks, comprising two or three meetings, to get through its entire remit. At that point, it is expected to produce a report to be debated in the Assembly, and, as Peter Robinson said at the last meeting, the report may well form the basis of discussions and talks in the autumn. If nothing else, it will clarify the minds of the five parties as to what is not possible. We may well have to negotiate what is possible, and the report would be helpful for that.

During the review in 2004, the parties were able to exchange papers and parse them and examine them, but the essence of having the parties in the same room is that we can actually discuss these issues. There is no time to pass papers round and for the parties to examine them. We need to have a discussion. We may need to pause and park issues from one meeting to the next, but the momentum must be kept up.

At Monday's meeting it was clear that certain issues could not be decided: either the Committee needed further advice on them or they were too complex. Those issues were parked and the Committee moved to the next item on the agenda. The idea is to filter out a common understanding of what is not achievable. That leaves the Committee a number of options. Members may not be able to decide those here, but at the negotiations in the autumn, the subjects for discussion will be fairly clear, which will be quite helpful.

The danger of having papers is that MLAs are quite busy. The idea behind being in a room together was to give momentum to the discussion.

Mr S Wilson: If members want to have a productive discussion rather than simply talking in generalities, Mr McFarland's suggestion of filtering the issues on which we can have sensible discussions from the party wish lists that we know we will not reach consensus on — or that we know will be decided above our heads — is useful.

Mr Maginness has been the most specific on the principles. We might as well cut to the chase: there are a number of issues on which it would be pointless for the Committee to expend a great deal of time. We would not get very far with them.

The first issue relates to the discussion at the start of the meeting. There is no point in our having a long discussion about timing and setting a maximum period for devolution. From a unionist perspective, the devolution of policing and justice will not occur until there is sufficient confidence that the context and atmosphere have changed. It will not be achieved by the setting of a deadline of six months or two years. Deadlines can be counterproductive. Devolution of policing and justice will depend on how parties behave. I do not want to get into a wrangle with Sinn Féin, but it will depend on that party's attitudes to the police and security. It would be a waste of time for the Committee to have a long discussion on that issue.

The second point is exercising both Sinn Féin and the SDLP. I do not know whether there is any point in having a long discussion about intelligence-gathering. As I understand it, that decision has already been made. Protocols have been put in place between the police and MI5 to ensure a flow of information. We can discuss it, and members can express their views, but we will be wasting our time, because that is fairly well advanced.

When this first came up at the Policing Board we had some discussion about it; I am no longer on the Board, but the matter has moved on. The Police Service of Northern Ireland would be the only service in the United Kingdom to retain national intelligence-gathering within its remit. I do not see that happening. Any argument that we could have would be fairly contentious, and what would be the point?

Alban Maginness is obviously keen to add another political layer to cross-border police co-operation. He mentioned it two or three times, as did Sinn Féin. We are not against cross-border co-operation on policing or asset recovery. Wherever we can learn from the Republic and harmonise what we do with what happens in the Republic to make policing and dealing with organised crime more effective, we are happy to do. However, it must be in the context of co-operation between our police service and justice system and the guards. There does not need to be a political layer at strand two laid down for that.

From my own experience in the Policing Board, I think that what probably works more effectively is when individual officers from the two police services on the island decide to work together on projects and ventures. To introduce a further political layer in strand two would be counterproductive. Much good work is being done and is getting support from both nationalists and unionists in the structures that exist.

Mr G Kelly: I do not want to get into a wrangle between Sinn Féin and the DUP either, but a couple of things need to be said. The DUP position on the devolution of policing is the same as its position on the institutions. We should not talk as if this is a clear issue that only deals with policing. The DUP is demanding all sorts of things before the institutions are set up, and, if the institutions are not set up, the argument over models can become redundant.

Mr Wilson mentioned intelligence-gathering. The original statement was made by Paul Murphy. The matter is at an advanced stage, but the issue is not about the flow of information; it is about accountability. It is not only national security, to use the British term; they have talked about becoming involved in areas such as serious crime. They have talked about a difference between gathering intelligence on republicans and gathering intelligence on loyalists. I find it hard to accept that any party in an Executive would give up easily the necessary accountability for the area that they represent and over which they pass laws.

I also take a different view on the cross-border issue, as might be expected. Sammy Wilson needs to say what he means. This ministry will be a Department in an Executive. Every other Department is involved in the North/South Ministerial Council; is he arguing that this Department should not be involved? If he is talking about the cross-border implementation bodies or areas of co-operation, let him say either that he agrees that it should be an area of co-operation or that it should be an implementation body, which is more formal. I do not think that anyone will argue about the practicalities of what it means if someone says: "This is what it means practically and this would work better, or that would work better".

To take a position that runs contrary to what happens with every other Department and rule out the all-Ireland aspect, especially at this stage in this discussion, is putting a brake on the discussion rather than having a sensible debate.

Mrs Foster: Regardless of who is Minister with responsibility for policing and justice in whatever departmental structure is agreed, they will not be responsible for national security — that is an excepted matter. That is why MI5 will retain primacy over national security.

Mr McFarland: There should not be a problem with MI5's position because, following this, the only thing that MI5 will be dealing with will be al-Qaeda terrorism. Republicans will be completely peaceful.

Mr Kennedy: It did not seem like that in Newry last night.

Mr G Kelly: Danny makes a fair point. It has been said that MI5 is taking over responsibility for serious and organised crime, so the definition of national security is not as narrow as Mr McFarland makes it. I also have a difficulty with accepting who decides what national security encompasses. To give an easily understood example: is a PSNI officer who is doing work for MI5 still accountable to the Chief Constable and the Police Ombudsman as regards investigations, or are they taken entirely outside that accountability structure, because it is an excepted matter, and can do anything that they want. If that is the case, we are travelling backwards in time.

Therefore, "national security" will not mean the same here as it does from the British point of view. The British Government have made statements — I have not made them up — about serious and organised crime coming under national security. They have singled out two sections of intelligence-gathering — loyalist and republican — and have said that the Committee's opinion does not count; the Executive do not count; none of us will count; and they will do whatever they want.

As a republican, I want MI5 to go. However, even if I were not a republican but merely someone involved in a democratic institution, I would want to know what the accountability mechanisms would be. I am surprised that unionists do not want to know that as well.

Mr McFarland: Serious and organised crime is a matter for the Chief Constable and the PSNI. I think that Gerry is concerned that an overlap may be construed as occurring when a republican organisation is involved in organised crime, for example. However, we are trying to get to a stage where republicans are not involved in serious and organised crime. The DUP and the Ulster Unionist Party have made it clear that we are not getting involved in Government with Sinn Féin while republicans remain involved in organised criminality.

Devolution can only happen if those involved in organised crime are unconnected to republicans or, indeed, loyalists. By then, it is envisaged that only "ordinary" criminals will be involved in criminality and that they will be dealt with by the police. There may be a period during which some people who were active republicans, and whose activities were not sanctioned by the leadership, cannot give up criminality. In such cases — as Martin McGuinness and Gerry Adams have said publicly — let the authorities deal with them.

If, by then, MI5 is dealing with national security issues, threats by al-Qaeda and other external issues, we will be in the same position as the rest of the United Kingdom. Sinn Féin does not believe that we are the same as the rest of the UK, but that is how the agreement worked. Until we get consent from the people of Northern Ireland, we will remain part of the UK, and, under UK law, MI5 deals with national security.

At the last meeting, I said that this has all come about because of the enormous fuss that Sinn Féin and the SDLP made about Special Branch. They went on and on about Special Branch for four or five years. The Government clearly listened to them and removed responsibility for investigating republican activity from Special Branch, because it upset nationalists and republicans, and gave it to MI5. One could argue that they have been hoist by their own petards. Logically, when republican criminality ceases, the fact that MI5 will be dealing with al-Qaeda should not exercise republicans.

11.15 am

Mr G Kelly: I do not want to accuse Alan of being naive, but if Gerry Adams's phone is bugged it will not be because he is in al-Qaeda. If a conversation between a British Minister and Martin McGuinness is bugged, I presume that it will not be because the British Minister is in al-Qaeda. It would be for some other purpose. Forgive me, but it is simply naive to think that everything will be hunky-dory because the issue in the North has been sorted out.

I ask Mr McFarland again: is it acceptable that a PSNI officer — for whom certain members fought quite hard, argued for, and agreed accountability measures for — can be taken outside those accountability mechanisms?

It is not only Sinn Féin and the SDLP that are worried about that. The Oversight Commissioner and the Police Ombudsman are also worried about it. The type of accountability that we are discussing does not cover repo powers and other powers. The Assembly should be given power to do something about that. Mr McFarland is accepting that this matter should be simply handed over to MI5 and that things will be OK.

Mr McFarland: My understanding is that PSNI officers who are involved in intelligence-handling for MI5 will remain part of the PSNI and under the supervision of the Police Ombudsman. There is no question of any PSNI officer not being supervised by the Police Ombudsman. She may be trying to extend her empire to include MI5 operatives here, but that is a different issue entirely. She also attempted to extend her empire into supervision and surveillance of the Army here. It has been reduced to garrison status and although most of the soldiers' families are here, the soldiers themselves are in Afghanistan or Iraq. Alban Maginness raised an issue about the Army, but that will probably not be an issue in a few years.

We must be clear about whether there is a problem. Protocols are being developed, and there are issues about them. The Policing Board, of which I was a member until April, is taking a very close interest in them. The Intelligence and Security Committee at Westminster and the Police Ombudsman are also interested in what the protocols will be.

There are issues about the production of intelligence, who handles it and what the protocols will be. For example, if information on organised crime is uncovered by MI5, can we guarantee that it will be passed to the Chief Constable? That is technically what the protocols will ensure. The protocols will be safeguard mechanisms, and there is a need for them. We do not want any organisation to withhold information for political reasons because it does not suit.

I heard an accusation on the radio this morning that the Bloody Sunday Inquiry is being prevented from publishing its report because it may interfere with the political process. If information has been gathered on organised crime that may reflect badly on republicans, it would be wrong for MI5, under Government influence from London, to withhold that information and not pass it to the PSNI.

Colleagues who are still sitting on the Policing Board can keep me right on the date, but I believe that those key protocols are due to be introduced by November. I agree with Mr Kelly that it is vital to get the protocols right. However, his fears are greater than they need to be.

Mrs D Kelly: Members seem to forget that the British Government had the choice either to agree with Patten, whereby national security remained the responsibility of the Chief Constable, who would then report to the Secretary of State, or to decide that MI5 should have supremacy. The British Government chose the latter option. The earlier comments about the Ombudsman and PSNI officers were unfair.

The real problem concerned the handling of agents: what they were allowed to do and the level of criminal activity in which many could become involved. Many people who examine the handling of both republican and loyalist agents will wonder whose war it was. Did the situation here merely provide a training ground for many British policies?

We are straying from the agenda and getting bogged down in the question of MI5, as opposed to discussing models and principles. The MI5 debate is important, but it is not right to say that the British Government did not have the choice of adopting an alternative approach — they could have been true to Patten.

Mr McFarland: As the Policing Board is true to Patten.

Mr Kennedy: As, indeed, is fifty-fifty recruitment.

Mrs Long: Alan has said that the restoration of devolution would happen in the context of an end to paramilitarism. However, we must bear in mind that it could happen in the context of ongoing paramilitarism.

The Alliance Party raised the issue of the different approaches to — and responsibilities for — republican and loyalist terrorism. The former would be addressed at a UK level, because it is also seen as a threat to national security, whereas the latter would be addressed at a Northern Ireland level, because it is seen to be more characterised by criminal activity.

That differentiation would remain even if everyone were confident that the IRA had completely disappeared, because any remaining republican dissidents would be perceived as a threat to national security. Therefore, republican paramilitarism would be dealt with differently from loyalist paramilitarism, which could continue in the context of devolution, as it did previously.

Attempts to ensure that all paramilitarism is dealt with in a fair and equitable manner and that the accountability structures are balanced and equal are not of concern only to those with a particular interest in paramilitarism. It is in everyone's interest to know that when paramilitarism becomes a threat to society, it will be properly dealt with and that accountability structures are in place.

The Alliance Party has already expressed its concerns about the lack of UK-wide accountability structures. Part of the solution lies in more generalised reform of UK structures for tackling issues such as terrorism and national security. Although this Committee has no control over that, it must be part and parcel of our discussions.

The context in which loyalist and republican paramilitarism may be treated as two completely different entities does not exist in Northern Ireland, because both threaten the stability of the society in which we live. The difficulty in regard to intelligence-gathering and defining where the PSNI remit ends and the MI5 remit begins is that none of the paramilitary organisations operating in this region can be easily separated into those with criminal empires and those without.

There will be some crossover, because some of the criminal activity that the PSNI will be tackling is directly related and inextricably linked to a paramilitary organisation and its orchestration of such activities. It would, therefore, be difficult to see where that division starts. This area needs further exploration, because it comes down to the rule of law and people's understanding of that. One cannot simply say that the problem will be resolved because paramilitarism will not exist after the restoration of devolution.

We must have structures that can withstand any resurgence of post-devolution paramilitarism, although we hope that that will not be the case. We would prefer devolution without any paramilitary threat. However, the structures must be robust enough to deal with that threat, should the need arise.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Can we conclude discussions on this section? We are talking about various subjects, and it is unlikely that we will get consensus on the form of the models at this stage. Alban Maginness suggested a discussion about the principles. Do members agree that we should set first out the principles that would govern the type of model?

Mr Cobain: Alban Maginness made the point that we do not have the time for that. Three meetings have been allocated to discuss policing and justice, and I have not yet seen the principles. We talked about discussing the principles next week. We cannot progress until we discuss the principles. We are still discussing the models, and that leaves only one week.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We are discussing the models this morning, although members may be straying from the point.

Mr Cobain: Alban Maginness's point is that we cannot move on and discuss the models until we agree the principles, and the principles lead on to the discussion about the models. We are discussing the models this morning, but, as far as Alban is concerned, it is akin to putting the cart before the horse. I want to discuss the models this morning so that we can reach some consensus. We have spent an hour and a half talking about an issue over which we have no control. I want to spend the rest of the day talking about issues over which we do have some control, such as models for the devolved institutions.

Mr S Wilson: The Committee does not have the SDLP's paper, but I listened carefully to the 10 principles enunciated by Alban Maginness. I am not sure how many of them — if any — would inform us about the shape of the Departments or the models that we need. Some examples of those principles are: no role for the Army in intelligence-gathering — that is his view, but I do not know how that informs us about which models might be most suitable; protection of the present institutions in policing — again, I am not sure how that informs us about models 1, 2, 3, or 4; intelligence-gathering capacity to remain with the PSNI; and an all-Ireland assets recovery agency. I jotted down some points on Alban's list, but I cannot make out some of my own writing.

Some of those matters may exercise the SDLP. However, to come back to Fred Cobain's point, we could discuss those matters for one or two days, but would we be any nearer to a conclusion on whether model 1, 2, 3 or 4 — or some other model — would be the most appropriate? I agree with Fred Cobain; we might have an interesting discussion if we started to go through the principles, or if we produced our own principles.

We are up against a tight timescale of three weeks, when we may not be any further forward. However, if that is our objective, rather than having a good chinwag about the issues, we should steer away from that route.

Mr G Kelly: The discussion was about the models. It would be better if we had a discussion on the principles surrounding the models. Must policing and justice be shared among the parties in the medium to long term? There are four models. Could some of the models be ruled out? Everyone is opposed to the model of extending the remit of OFMDFM to cover policing and justice, so that could be ruled out for a start.

I get the impression that everyone is arguing against the fact that the Minister might come from a specific party; that is a matter for d'Hondt.

Is there a view that there should be some sort of shared approach to policing and justice? Do those have to be dealt with as one? That might at least narrow it down.

11.30 am

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I take it from the views expressed, by the Democratic Unionist Party in particular, that there is not the consensus that we need to deal with the principles before we move on to the models. We should look at the models one by one.

Mr S Wilson: We want to get down to business, Chairman.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I am all for that. By all means, let us cut to the chase. What should the Committee rule in and rule out? That is on the basis of the structures being in place, not on the preconditions.

Mr S Wilson: There has been a degree of consensus that at least two models could be ruled out. Almost every party has said explicitly that the Committee should try to cut back the remit of the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. That structure did not work very well — it was a mishmash. To narrow the discussion down, model 3 could be taken out; no one feels any attachment to it

Mr McFarland also made a point about this. The Committee is probably being directed away from recommending two distinct Departments. Members' instincts would be to reduce the number of Departments rather than manufacture more. The Committee should focus on models 1 and 2 and rule out models 3 and 4. My party is happy to do that because one has been shown not to work, and the other one runs contrary to our ideas for slimming down Government.

Mr Neeson: Following on from what Mr Wilson said, there is a form of consensus that a single Department would be the most suitable option. If members could agree on that, we can move forward.

Mr G Kelly: That is the reason why I raised the matter. There were discussions about that among some parties, although those probably did not include the DUP. We have no attachment to models 3 and 4.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The proposal is that models 3 and 4 be excluded from discussion. Are members agreed?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We have narrowed down the discussion to models 1 and 2, unless any party wants to suggest a completely new model.

Mr G Kelly: We have agreed one principle. It is shared.

Mr Kennedy: The Swedish model, no?

A Member: We are all agreed on that. [Laughter.]

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Hansard is still recording proceedings.

Let us focus on which of the two models members prefer.

Mr Neeson: One important aspect that the Committee needs to consider is that, whichever model is chosen, there must be acceptance of collective responsibility. When we had devolution before, there was no collective responsibility.

Equality is another consideration. In the last Assembly, voting was largely on sectarian lines. I refer in particular to the debate about maternity services and whether they should be located at Belfast City Hospital or at the Royal Victoria Hospital. If we are to move forward, any agreed set-up must be based on collective responsibility, equality and, to a certain extent, neutrality.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): That strays into the old issue of the institutions and the need for collective responsibility within them. Can the Committee focus on the two models under discussion in particular? The difference is that one model proposes two Ministers and the other proposes one Minister and a junior Minister.

Mrs Long: Sean said that the context would predetermine the outcome. If the Alliance Party were asked to state its preference, it would opt for a single ministry with a single Minister. However, that would have to be in the context of an Executive with collective responsibility and the right accountability structures so that, if Ministers took decisions or were seen to apply pressure or to act beyond their remit, they could be stopped.

That was not the case in the previous Executive, and it remains to be seen whether it will be the case, as changes to the institutional arrangements are still being discussed. We cannot prejudge the outcome of those discussions. Nonetheless, the Alliance Party would prefer an Executive with some type of collective responsibility and sense of direction.

Our party believes that the proposed Department should be headed by a single Minister, who would no longer act on behalf of his or her party but as a member of a collective Executive. That is completely different from a mandatory coalition Government, with a single Minister, in charge of a Department, yet acting in his or her party's interest, and with no accountability structures in place to inhibit that in any way. In that case, model 2 would be the preferred option.

Mr S Wilson: Naomi, can I interrupt? A fairly strict ministerial code is needed to ensure that there is confidence in that Minister.

Mrs Long: Absolutely. The Alliance Party stated that the ministerial code and the Pledge of Office would have to be strengthened in order to achieve that. Model 2 must be considered. Institutional arrangements cannot be divorced from this discussion because we are essentially discussing institutional arrangements for a particular Department — albeit one of the most sensitive ones. We must consider this matter in that overall context.

The Alliance Party's position is reasonably clear. We now need to hear how other parties feel about collective responsibility because that cannot be divorced from the issue of policing and justice.

Mr Maskey: It is good that the Committee has narrowed its focus on this matter. A fairly clear consensus seems to be emerging that models 1 and 2 are preferable. However, as Gerry Kelly said, we should not dismiss any option at this stage of the game, because the context may change. There may or may not be a reduction in the number of Departments — that has not yet been decided. In a sense, therefore, this is a hypothetical, without-prejudice discussion. Nothing should be ruled out because it might be decided in the fullness of time that the separation of ministries is a good idea.

The clear attraction of models 1 and 2 is that one Department will be created to focus on these very important issues. Sinn Féin's reading of those models is that they include an element of joint working between both communities, which is very important as regards the partnership element embodied in the Executive.

I do not know how much more detail can be covered in this discussion. However, if members feel that models 1 and 2 are looking good — if I may put it that way — and if the Committee could set that aside for a moment, it would be a good idea to begin discussing the transfer of powers. It was said that a time frame could not be agreed. I do not think that anybody here wants to set a date. However, we could start to discuss the transfer of powers in principle. Sinn Féin certainly wants powers to be transferred as soon as possible.

Are members prepared to discuss the transfer of powers? I am not saying that they must commit to a time frame. However, if everything was all right and all things were equal — without prejudice to what anybody thinks that that may be — are members generally in favour of an early transfer of power?

Mr McFarland: As the Committee will recall, our task is to mine down into the issues. That is going fairly well. As regards having one Minister or two, I am thinking about the public's view of the Assembly. Currently, the perceived wisdom is that we are a complete waste of time and rations and cost a fortune. Members probably saw last night's 'Belfast Telegraph', in which there was yet another attack on our pensions. The article said that the only part of the Assembly that has continued to work during suspension is the section that deals with Members' pensions.

Mr Maskey: It does not look as though you will be needing one anyway.

Mr McFarland: How can we argue that there is a need for two Ministers on the grounds of effectiveness and efficiency? That troubles me slightly.

If we are going to have trouble explaining to the public that there is a need for two Ministers, we are back, in theory, to the suggestion that there should be only one. There are several options as regards having one Minister. Logically, in a new Assembly the d'Hondt system would be run and one party would choose policing and justice as its favourite ministry. It would then be logical for that ministry to be selected as part of the pecking order. However, that does not get us away from the difficulties regarding safeguards. Although we might have Utopia, with agreement, collective responsibility, the ministerial code, and with parties being comfortable — halcyon days ahead indeed — the difficulty is that our communities have not yet reached that point.

The republican community is still fairly far away from full inclusivity on policing, and unionists are still fairly far away from full inclusivity for republicans. Indeed, republicans and nationalists are still fairly far away from inclusivity for loyalists. Such issues will not be resolved quickly, and we will end up needing some safeguards, as much for public perception and protection as for ourselves as parties.

What if we decided that it would be healthy for the Assembly if Ministers took turns within a term of office? If you need a safeguard then you are into the area of having some form of junior Minister. There are two options. First, you could have a junior Minister who is a "super junior Minister" and sees all papers, and who, as with the arrangement for the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, would have to agree matters with the Minister. It would be an arrangement that involves a safeguard and some form of agreement.

Secondly, you could have a system whereby you rotate the office. The difficulty with that is that you would have to change a Minister's pay and status perhaps every six months or every year. For example, a short time ago Gerry Kelly might have been Minister for policing, and we might have booked him to go to some kind of function in Rosemount in Derry next year. Then we find that Sammy Wilson turns up because he has become Minister of policing in the interim. That could lead to a lot of confusion, and it might take you back to having a Minister who is slotted in under the d'Hondt system —

Mr S Wilson: Mr McFarland has outlined issues such as pay and engagements. However, the real difficulty is that no one would be able to get a handle on the job because he or she would be doing it for such a short time. The ministry would be very ineffectual.

Mr McFarland: Sammy is right; turnover is an issue.

Mrs D Kelly: Just like the DUP the last time around.

Mrs Foster: It keeps the continuity, Dolores.

Mrs D Kelly: Revolving-door ministries.

Mr McFarland: There are issues about whether you go for "super junior Ministers" who have blocking and safeguard powers or for the turnover system, which has the drawbacks that I described. It strikes me that that is the ground that we are on.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Is it possible to tie this down to one model?

Mr S Wilson: You are very ambitious, Mr Chairman.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I know, but you have to be at this stage.

Mrs Foster: I do not see them as two separate models. Both provide for a single justice Department. The difficulty arises in deciding whether there is a single Minister, a Minister and a junior Minister, or two Ministers in the one Department. We have reached some degree of consensus in so far as people have indicated that there should be a single Department. Frankly, that is as far as we can go.

Mr A Maginness: On examination, models 1 and 2 are essentially the same; the difference is marginal. The rotation of the Minister in the first model is similar to Ministers acting jointly in the second. One of the important questions is: what mechanism will be used to appoint the Ministers? Will a straightforward d'Hondt procedure be used, or will the process be similar to the appointment of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister? That must be thrashed out.

Essentially, models 1 and 2 are variants of the same model; they are the same in substance and in practice. However, that reflects my earlier point about shared responsibility and Mr Neeson's point about collective responsibility. A measure of trust is being placed in the Minister or Ministers to carry out their duties and to defend the interests of the people who elected them.

It would be very difficult for the parties represented here to come to a specific conclusion about models 1 or 2. We have general agreement on having one Department and on a form of sharing within that Department. That is a major step forward in trying to achieve consensus on the modality.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I ask members to address that issue as we proceed. Do we have agreement that the ministerial arrangements in a single Department should be addressed at a later stage? That discussion will include the ministerial code and various connected issues.

Mrs Long: As I have already stated, the Alliance Party would be happier with a single ministry. Model 1 is not actually a model; it is a series of options for a model. Therefore, we are talking about a single justice Department with a single Minister. Then come the different options about how that Minister would work. The second model offers joint ministerial power, so there is only a slight difference. Alban is right to say that we are talking about the checks and balances that are needed in a single ministry. The later discussion will need to focus on that.

The difficulty is that we often design unwieldy architecture to try to create accountability in situations in which we do not have confidence. That is the experience with the Good Friday Agreement. The principles in that were correct — and they are still valid — but some of the architecture was very unwieldy.

Public confidence is a key issue when considering the rotation of Ministers. We said in our initial statement that that confidence is important because it goes to the core of people's sense of security. We should also bear in mind that that relates not only to unionists' or nationalists' sense of security: it relates to the sense of security of those of us who are neither unionists nor nationalists, people who come to Northern Ireland as foreign nationals, and those who are from ethnic minority backgrounds and who may not judge the matter in the same way as others. All of those people need to have confidence in policing and justice. Therefore, wider community confidence must be considered.

The Alliance Party does not believe that a rotating ministry sends out a particularly confident message. We are concerned that it looks almost as though one is playing games with one of the most important Departments. There is something about the idea of Ministers coming and going on a six-monthly or annual basis that suggests an impermanence and lack of direction in policing and justice. That may not be the case, but that is what it would suggest to the public. When we are looking at the structures and considering accountability, we need to look at public confidence in those structures so that people feel that the Executive is taking those matters seriously.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Arlene made the point earlier that the furthest that the parties can go today is to reach consensus on whether to have a single Department for policing and justice. Ministerial arrangements would require further discussion.

Mr McFarland: Can we agree that no party would be happy for there to be a single Minister running a policing and justice Department unfettered? Therefore can we remove option 1 from model 1? Is that generally agreed?

Mrs Long: No. Chairman, we have stated that that would be our preferred option if the accountability mechanisms in the Executive and the Assembly were correct.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Therefore we do not have agreement on that.

Mrs Long: Yes.

Mr McFarland: There is another issue here. Most of the options in model 1 are to do with the Minister and/or junior Minister being elected under the d'Hondt system. I notice that option 5 is unrelated to d'Hondt. Presumably, the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister would appoint, after agreement, those from their respective parties who will look after policing and justice. It is important to make clear that model 1 deals with two separate appointment systems: one employs d'Hondt and the other is that the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister divide up the posts between their parties.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): That is set out in the 2006 Act.

Mr McFarland: Yes, it is, but the distinction does not necessarily jump off the page. Option 5 would mean that the two biggest parties decide who will have responsibility for policing and justice, and the other options mean that everybody has an opportunity, under d'Hondt, to go for the portfolio. The two largest parties have a choice as to whether they choose policing and justice early on and therefore get it, or risk another party getting it.

When we look at the matter in due course, whether that be in October or whenever, it is important that we separate those two outcomes. The smaller parties may be unhappy with the DUP and Sinn Féin carving up policing and justice between them.

Mr A Maginness: May I just comment on that without prejudice to any final position that the SDLP might adopt? There is an implicit assumption here, which we do not necessarily accept, that, given the Assembly's present configuration, either the DUP or Sinn Féin should run a Department of justice. We certainly would not heed that position. We would say robustly that all parties on the Executive should at least have an opportunity to be appointed or elected as a Minister for justice and policing. I make that point because of the language that is used in option 2 of model 1. It reads:

"A single Minister acting on his/her own but rotating between the parties at set intervals".

People usually use "between" when they mean "among"; however, it should be "among" in this instance, because to use "between" is to assert that only two parties provide the Minister.

If we are to embrace the concepts of collective responsibility and shared responsibility, it is important that parties should not be excluded from holding the policing and justice portfolio.

Mr G Kelly: To some extent, I agree with Arlene Foster. I do not think that we necessarily need to get into that level of detail. It is important that those points have been raised, but in order to get into or, at least, to come to an agreement on the detail that Alban and Alan talked about, we must realise that all the options in model 1 are interconnected.

At this stage, it is enough that most parties agree on a shared approach. That is not being prescriptive, because we must talk about time frames and what exactly is to be transferred, and all that has an impact. Naomi has an entirely different view on the overall institutional arrangements, which could also have an impact. We could end up agreeing clear details, which could go into the middle of negotiations and come to nothing. It could look as if parties had reached agreement on details but wanted to reverse them. A Department for policing and justice must have a scrutiny Committee, and the relationship between that Committee and the Policing Board is important. Alan said earlier that it could be a Mickey Mouse ministry. However, a Minister can make laws, and the Executive can make laws, so it will be an important ministry.

I am happy if there is agreement that we are moving towards a shared model. The responsibilities and structures of OFMDFM are already agreed. Members have said that policing and justice should not be in OFMDFM's remit because that Department already covers too many areas — that is the position of all the parties — but that does not wipe out the OFMDFM model of jointery. I am not worried about the unwieldiness. Let us find out the issues on which we can agree on and work out the rest later.

Mr Neeson: Alan raised a useful point. We have been discussing the need for a Minister to have the confidence of the public. It is also important that a Minister has the confidence of the Assembly. Whatever mechanism is chosen to appoint a Minister, it is important that he or she should have that confidence.

Mr S Wilson: We do not want to go any further than we have gone today. Say we had gone for the last option on which Alan had a query, and an appointment were made by the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister — that should be subject to a cross-community vote by the Assembly.

Mr Neeson: It is important for any appointment to have the support of the Assembly.

Mrs Foster: I was going to make that point. If there were one Minister, he or she could be straightforwardly appointed using d'Hondt. There could be a cross-community vote or there could be an OFMDFM appointment, subject to a cross-community vote. The cross-community-vote option would not exclude parties such as the SDLP and the Ulster Unionist Party from taking the ministry. I do not want to be prescriptive or exclusive about our list of issues for appointing a Minister, but we could put down a heading "Appointment Structure" and list the different options.

Mrs Long: That would fit in entirely with what the Alliance Party has been saying about the institutional strand. The Executive should be endorsed by a cross-community vote as part of that overall package, particularly in relation to justice issues.

Mr G Kelly: I do not want to prolong this discussion, but sometimes people take consensus as meaning assent. The DUP and the Alliance Party arguments about the institutions do not correspond to Sinn Féin's position. The idea that a Department for policing and justice should have a cross-community vote — whereas, for example, the Department of Education should not — is a new configuration for which the DUP has been arguing for some time; Sinn Féin is against that proposal. We are straying into a different process.

Mrs Long: Can we have some clarity on this issue? Reference has already been made to OFMDFM structures, and you are arguing that that Department requires a cross-community vote, separate from the rest of the Executive.

Mr G Kelly: That is not what I said.

Mrs Long: That is the argument that has been made in the institutional structures strand. OFMDFM is already distinctive because of the importance of its particular roles. We are not arguing for specific arrangements for the policing and justice ministry. Our view is that the entire Executive should be endorsed by a cross-community vote.

12.00 noon

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Can we keep the two issues separate?

Mrs Long: The two issues are completely inter-dependent. It is impossible to keep them separate.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): With due respect, it is possible. They are separated into institutional issues and law and order issues because there are separate groupings to deal with them. It could be interpreted that these discussions involve matters that are not within the Wednesday remit.

Mrs Foster: I am not making a determination. I am just highlighting the options that may be available.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We will leave that issue to Monday's meeting, which will deal with the institutions.

Mr McFarland: Are we agreed, therefore, that there is another option, which Naomi mentioned? Parties would nominate MLAs to the policing and justice ministerial positions, subject to a cross-community vote, in the same way as for the posts of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. Is that the proposal?

Mrs Long: That is not a new proposal. It is included in the Alliance Party's proposals for the institutional changes. Although members have been advised that we are not to refer to those proposals at this meeting, I fail to see how we can discuss the devolution of policing and justice without referring to the institutional arrangements. I understand, however, the need to confine the discussion.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): At this stage, we are dealing with the models.

Mr McFarland: When we deal with policing and justice, if we decide to opt for a joint ministry, is it proposed that we would structure it in the same way as the joint team in the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): That matter is for the Preparation for Government Committee dealing with institutional changes to —

Mr McFarland: No. Hold on. I am saying that there are several options, one of which would be to use the same appointments process as exists for the posts of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. Parties would nominate their candidates, and MLAs would vote —

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): That is stipulated in legislation.

Mr McFarland: I understand that, but, as members know, it is up to the Preparation for Government Committee to propose anything that its members wish. The Secretary of State has said that on numerous occasions. If the Committee decides to go in a particular direction, that is permitted.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): However, the Secretary of State did not say that he would agree with the Committee's decisions.

Mr McFarland: I know that he did not say that he would agree with the Committee, but the Committee is free to make proposals as its members see fit.

If the Committee agrees to opt for two Ministers for policing and justice, rather than allowing for the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to appoint them, will those appointments be made by MLAs in the Chamber in the same way as for the appointment of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister? Would Members be allowed to jump up and nominate, for example, Ian Paisley and Gerry Adams for the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, and Sammy Wilson and Gerry Kelly as Ministers for policing and justice? As is the case with the posts of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, would there be a cross-community vote? Is that a suggested option for the appointment of the Ministers for policing and justice?

Mr G Kelly: We are miles ahead of the earlier discussion on which we had reached some sort of conclusion. We have shot off on a tangent. There is a fair amount of consensus for the concept of a single Department on a shared ministerial basis, which is far enough to be going for now. There was not a particularly deliberate attempt to do it, but we have ended up in a whole different discussion on the institutional —

Mr McFarland: No, Chairman, I am not —

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Hold on for a second, please.

Mr G Kelly: If Mr McFarland has another option, he should produce it and say that it is another option.

Mr McFarland: I thought that Naomi was suggesting that the two policing and justice Ministers were —

Mrs Long: May I clarify?

Mr McFarland: If that is not the case —

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): One member at a time, please.

Mrs Long: I was not suggesting that; I was responding to a comment made by Arlene Foster, who said that there would be a number of options to ratify the appointments. May I also —

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We agreed that the Committee would return to that issue.

Mrs Long: Yes, we did, but I want to make it clear that the concept of a single ministry, not necessarily headed jointly, was agreed by assent. I want to make that clear because —

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Nothing has been agreed yet.

Mrs Long: Gerry Kelly inferred that a single ministry had been agreed.

Mr G Kelly: Nobody has said —

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I wish to make this clear: nothing has yet been agreed.

Mr A Maginness: Our discussion is becoming a bit raggedy. At this point, we must not be overambitious. Members have agreed on a single Department.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We have not actually agreed on that. We are trying to get to that stage.

Some Members: We have.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We have a proposal.

Mr A Maginness: We have not yet formally agreed on that. It might be wise to not formally agree until —

Mr McFarland: Until everything is agreed.
[Laughter.]

Mr A Maginness: By discussing methods of selection by the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, or by the Assembly, we are getting too far ahead of ourselves. We need to consult within our parties before we plough ahead.

Mr Weir: Nothing has been agreed or ruled out on models 1 and 2. Confusion has arisen because there are two sets of options. There seems to be broad agreement that a single Department is needed, whether responsibility is shared or not. There are a range of options for how that single Department should be run, which are outlined under models 1 and 2. That can range from a single Minister acting alone to two Ministers. There are options as to how the Department should be run, and there is a separate issue about how the Minister or Ministers should be appointed. Those two matters are becoming meshed together and confused. The second issue flows from the first, to some extent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Mr Kelly's proposal was that we agree on a single Department with shared ministerial responsibilities. Do we have consensus on that?

Members indicated dissent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We do not have consensus. Mrs Foster proposed that we agree on a single Department, but that the ministerial arrangements need to be addressed later.

Mr G Kelly: We are dealing with concepts. A number of people, including DUP members, have said that they want to go back to their parties on this matter. However, there is a fair degree of consensus on the concept, although there is some disagreement about whether responsibility should be shared. I am happy enough with that.

Mr Maskey: Most members talked about models 1 and 2. The first bullet point refers to a single Minister acting alone, but it goes on to refer to rotation. There must be some sharing of responsibility.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We do not have consensus on that at this stage. We seem to have consensus that there should be a single Department, with the ministerial arrangements to be sorted out at a later stage.

Mr Maskey: If people want to decouple the concept of a single Department from the notion of sharing responsibility, that is different option from what is proposed.

Mrs D Kelly: We have agreed that there should be sufficient safeguards for both communities to have confidence.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Have we agreed that there should be a single Department?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Does the Committee want to come back to the ministerial arrangements at a later stage and leave the issue of mechanisms to the PFG Committee dealing with institutional arrangements?

Mr G Kelly: Although we do not want to enter into a long, drawn-out discussion on timing, the issue is affected by it. Those matters are all parts of one discussion. We have gone some distance on this matter; let us deal with some of the other issues.

Mr S Wilson: We must come back to this matter; we cannot leave it as vague as it is at present. It could be discussed at our next meeting.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Have we agreed to return to the question of ministerial arrangements, and to pass the issue of structures to the PFG Committee dealing with institutions?

Members indicated assent.

Mrs Long: If we are to come back to this matter, can we also agree when we are coming back to it? It is important that everyone should come prepared for that discussion so that we do not end up doing what we have done today, which is to go around the houses with no outcome.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The Clerks will try to arrange that. Timing is the other issue.

Mr Kennedy: It may be important to have a preliminary discussion at least to expand on this matter before we refer anything to the PFG Committee dealing with institutional matters, because matters are slightly vague at the moment.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We will meet again first.

Mr Kennedy: Will the matter be referred to the PFG Committee dealing with institutional matters after that?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Yes.

What about the issues of the timing of the devolution of policing and justice?

Mr G Kelly: In 2003 and 2004, there was some idea of a time frame. Sinn Féin wanted a fairly sharp time frame of around 12 months, and there were arguments and discussions on a two-year time frame years. As Alban pointed out, the SDLP wanted a time frame of six months and then 18 months, and there should be some discussion on that. Some people argue that time frames are not helpful, but, in the negotiation process, time frames have been important in moving the process on, although there have been some exceptions.

Mr McFarland: What was the agreed timescale within the comprehensive agreement? I believe that the DUP had agreed to a timescale for the devolution of policing and justice.

Mrs Long: The timescale was two years from restoration.

Mr G Kelly: Naomi is right. The DUP will speak for itself, but the timescale was two years from restoration or halfway through a four-year Assembly mandate.

Mrs Foster: I do not want to labour this point, but Alan is fully aware that the DUP did not sign up to the comprehensive agreement. Unfortunately, I must reiterate that every time that Alan says so. He knows full well that the comprehensive agreement is the two Governments' document, and that neither the DUP nor Sinn Féin signed up to it. He can keep making that point ad nauseum or he can deal with the realities.

Mr S Wilson: The DUP has made its position clear, and there are three strands attached to it. First, we want to see the devolution of policing and justice. Secondly, we do not believe that there is any point in moving towards devolution of policing and justice if we do not have confidence in the behaviour of those who represent republicans. Thirdly, certain things still have to be done. The quicker that they are done, the better.

That answers Alex Maskey's earlier question when he asked whether the Committee could at least take a view on whether we want devolution of policing and justice as quickly as possible. Those were not his exact words, but it was something along those lines. We do.

If our indication that we want the devolution of policing and justice to happen sooner rather than later helps to affect Sinn Féin's behaviour, we will be more than happy, and the community will be more than happy. However, if a timescale is set — and this is the difficulty — people are not encouraged to address the issues that are preventing the devolution of policing and justice; they just sit and wait for the specified time. However, if devolution of policing and justice is based on certain conditions being met, those who make the decisions are encouraged to move towards meeting those conditions.

Therefore, the DUP's position on achieving the devolution of policing and justice is a positive one. We have stated the conditions that must be met, and they have been well articulated. I could go into detail, but that is not necessary. If those conditions are met, the DUP will be up for the devolution of policing and justice. If they are not met, it will not happen anyway, because there will not be sufficient votes in the Assembly or sufficient confidence in the community to make it happen.

Mr G Kelly: I am trying to resist reacting to the DUP being judge and jury on when it thinks that Sinn Féin, or anyone else, has reached the mark that it has set. The difficulty is that the DUP has set an arbitrary mark as a precondition. Nevertheless, Arlene and I have agreed on a great deal today. She is correct in saying that no one signed up to the comprehensive agreement.

In fairness to Mr McFarland, however, he merely stated the point that had been reached in discussing the devolution of policing and justice — he did not mention an agreement. The DUP's view was that it would happen at some time around two years after restoration, but Sinn Féin wanted it to happen sooner. Let us deal with some sensible time frame.

The preconditions that the DUP set down are also the preconditions for setting up the institutions. We will not resolve this matter unless the institutions are restored anyway, so there will be a time frame after that. It is not the same discussion. However, one may assume that, at that point, the DUP will have accepted that we are in an entirely new situation and, therefore, the time frame will not be an unlikely discussion. The time frame that we are discussing is in the context of the institutions being set up, so what is the problem?

Mr McFarland: I stand to be corrected on this, but I recall Dr Paisley saying in Downing Street that there was only issue left to be resolved, and that was decommissioning. That is why I keep raising the matter.

The Committee has spent six weeks with William McCrea telling us that we should all keep our hands off the comprehensive agreement, because it was a DUP deal with the Government, and the Government would deliver on it in the autumn. In the House of Commons, Minister Hanson also said that it was a DUP deal, and that he would deliver on it in the autumn. Since then, Peter Robinson and Arlene Foster have said that that is not the case. While that is encouraging, it is also confusing.

Dr Paisley stated that decommissioning was the only outstanding issue, and the DUP agreed to begin modality discussions in February. Within two years, or halfway through an Assembly mandate, devolution of policing and justice would take place. That is not to say that the DUP has not changed its mind, but, at that time, that was its position.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We do not wish to get into that debate again.

Mrs Foster: I wish that Alan would read our statement in the comprehensive agreement, as there is no mention of time limits in it. I will share that with him over lunch if he wishes, but it will probably give him indigestion. [Laughter.]

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Is there agreement that we should set a time frame in the context of the date of restoration?

Members indicated dissent.

Mr Weir: The DUP has stated its position that the conditions are qualitative, rather than quantitative.

Mr G Kelly: Can I seek clarification on that?

Mr Weir: The DUP wants devolution, but it can only be in a context in which there is trust in the community. We do not accept a specific time frame.

Mr G Kelly: When the institutions have been set up, does the DUP agree that it will have accepted that Sinn Féin is ready for Government?

Therefore, if Sinn Féin is ready for Government, the logic is that it is also ready to be involved in policing.

That is the DUP's view. Sinn Féin is ready any time. Where is the logic in the DUP's position of not agreeing a time frame for the restoration of the institutions now, and that it will still not agree a time frame, even when the institutions have been set up?

Mrs Long: The question is whether to set a deadline or outline a potential time frame. My understanding was that the comprehensive agreement set a two-year target. Setting a target is slightly different to setting a deadline and saying that devolution of policing and justice will happen in two years. Both the comprehensive agreement and the Northern Ireland (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 2006, which includes controls for each of the four models, take into account that the conditions in society must be right.

This should not be about targeting individual parties, in this case Sinn Féin. All parties must make it clear to the community that they have given their commitment to policing. However, simply sitting on a Policing Board while hotly criticising the police and playing games with policing issues does not fulfil that requirement.

It is not a question of whether a particular party is fit to have the policing ministry, but whether the institutions are sufficiently robust and stable to take on one of the most contentious and sensitive issues to be devolved. Therefore, a two-year time period would ensure that we had lived through most of what was required to know that that was the case. From the Alliance Party's perspective, it is not simply about saying whether an individual party is fit to take the ministry, but whether the institutions can withstand the pressure.

Mr A Maginness: The discussion today has been useful.

First, it has been useful to hear Sinn Féin's view that there is no obstacle to embracing policing or justice arrangements, other than the devolution of those powers to the Assembly. Secondly, the DUP's statement that timing was not the issue, and that a qualitative assessment was necessary, was useful, although the SDLP does not necessarily accept that. The DUP is saying that it is happy for policing and justice to be devolved to the Northern Ireland Assembly, if Sinn Féin fulfils certain conditions.

If those statements are definitive, they are important. It means that timing is not a problem, other than in relation to the administrative and operational problems that would arise with the actual transfer of policing and justice powers to Northern Ireland. I do not know how that would be carried out; it is an administrative operation that may take a certain amount of time. Nonetheless, if everything were in order, both the DUP and Sinn Féin agree that timing is not really the problem.

Both Sinn Féin and the DUP are uncomfortable about mentioning the comprehensive agreement: perhaps a DNA test of that agreement should be carried out to see exactly who its parents are.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): May I remind members — and it may speed things up — that the food is outside. [Laughter.]

Mr G Kelly: I thank Alban for summing up Sinn Féin's position.

There is nothing new in Sinn Féin's statement that it perceives the transfer of policing and justice powers to be the key and core outstanding issue on policing. However, it is totally erroneous to say that the time frame is irrelevant. That could lead to a situation where, 10 years after the decision has been made, powers are still being transferred.

I was at a debate with Nelson McCausland last night during which he said that criminality, equality and human rights were now the key issues that the DUP had to sort out before that point was reached. That is hilarious. We are getting mixed messages. The main issue concerning the transfer of powers is accountability.

We must agree the time frame. We must also get to the discussion paper containing the detail of what is transferred. We have not even started on that discussion paper, but I hope that we will some time soon. The people who are against the transfer of powers, especially within the system, have been spending their time trying to shift the status of powers from reserved to excepted, making that transfer ever more difficult. Considerable debate is still needed.

Mr Kennedy: We would do well to remind ourselves that the Northern Ireland (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 2006 confirms that the devolution of policing and justice, and when that happens, is a matter for the Assembly to determine.

Mr Maskey: Gerry Kelly was very clear when he tried to focus on the DUP's position on timing. Sammy Wilson said that the DUP wanted the transfer to happen as soon as possible. Sinn Féin does not agree with the DUP's argument on timing and so-called benchmarks. This discussion is in the context that the institutions will be up and running, so we will have already met all the benchmarks that the DUP has set up. Let us presuppose that we have already got over all the obstacles and that the institutions are up and running. The timing is important, because we need an indication from parties as to what they feel the time limit could be. It is not a matter of a deadline; it is about how long we think that it will take. We must do whatever is practical to make the transfer of power a reality.

We must decouple the argument from the need to be satisfied. In other words, from the DUP's point of view, it must satisfy itself that its conditions have been met. This discussion should concern the context of functioning institutions. We must focus the discussion or we will never resolve that issue. That is why we are having this conversation on policing and justice.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We have a proposal that the date for devolution of policing and justice should be set when the conditions have been agreed between the parties.

Mr Maskey: My point — and the point that Gerry Kelly made and on which he tried to get a response from the DUP — was that this discussion should presuppose that those conditions have already been met, whatever they are. Obviously, Sinn Féin does not agree with all those conditions, but this discussion should be set in the context that the institutions are fully functioning. Therefore, there is no reason why any party would not want the transfer of powers. We should be discussing the practical steps that need to be taken to secure the transfer of powers and how long we think that will take.

Mr S Wilson: There are certain requirements that the DUP feels are necessary for devolution, and Gerry Kelly seems to know them very well. Naomi Long put it very well when she said that this would probably be one of the most difficult and most contentious issues that the Assembly will have to handle.

Given the special significance of policing and justice, the problems associated with that in the past, the functioning of the Assembly, the powers that it will have, how parties handle those powers and how they handle the situation after devolution will provide a measure of confidence, or lack thereof, within the community as to whether or not devolution can take place.

A decision on when that level of confidence has been reached will depend on all of the following variables: how the Assembly functioned; how the parties behaved in the Assembly; and what has been happening in the community. That is why it is impossible to attach a timescale to the devolution of policing and justice.

Sinn Féin sought an assurance, but the best that our party can do at the moment is to say that we are not being obstructionist, nor are we seeking an excuse to delay devolution of policing and justice for 10 years, as Mr Kelly said. Our stance is aimed at ensuring that, when this important function is devolved, the situation will be workable, will not create difficulties, and the parties and the community are comfortable with it.

The assurance that I have given is the best that can be hoped for at present. My party wants the devolution of policing and justice to happen as soon as possible, but not in a context in which it will create political difficulties and difficulties for the Assembly. I do not believe that setting deadlines or timescales — whatever euphemism is used for fixing a date to which everyone will point — is the best way of ensuring that people meet the conditions for confidence-building.

Mr G Kelly: My difficulty, as we get further into the mire, is that we now have two sets of preconditions from the DUP: one for setting up the institutions, and another for deciding when people are fit for government. The DUP will decide arbitrarily when those preconditions are met. We are trying to secure an agreed time frame for all the parties that would sit in an Assembly. That is not an imposed time frame, yet the Committee cannot agree even an indicative time frame.

Mr S Wilson: Let us stop at that point. All parties and the two Governments agreed that policing and justice would be devolved a step after the Assembly was set up. Everyone recognised that there was something different about policing and justice, which meant that they could not be a part of the initial package. We all know why they are so significant. This is not a new set of preconditions. It is an acceptance of a position that everyone has taken: given the significance of policing and justice, devolution of those issues should take place a step after restoration.

Mr G Kelly: It is a new bar.

Mr S Wilson: Not at all.

Mr G Kelly: To return to Mr McFarland's point, the DUP were in those negotiations and clearly understood the time frame. The DUP will not agree even an indicative time frame. I repeat this with some sadness: even by its own criteria, the DUP is declaring that it does not care up to what bar Sinn Féin, the nationalist people or the republican people measure. After the institutions have been restored, the DUP will put Sinn Féin through all that again, and the DUP will be the arbiter of when the bar is met. Never mind the Assembly — the DUP will decide when devolution of policing and justice will take place. The whole idea of the step-by-step approach that Mr Wilson mentioned was precisely the steps that were needed. That was how the time frame was worked out. People were already working on the basis of a time frame.

Mr Weir: The legislation states that the Assembly will decide when policing and justice will be devolved, and we are happy to stick with that. I am not going to flog a dead horse; there comes a stage where the argument goes round in circles. Policing and justice have been treated separately throughout this entire process. As part of the Belfast Agreement, they were not devolved in 1998. Far be it from me to defend the Belfast Agreement. [Laughter.]

Mr G Kelly: Is that on the record?

Mr Weir: I am more than happy for the phrase: "Far be it from me to defend the Belfast Agreement" to be on the record.

When the initial institutions, including the Executive and the Departments, were set up in 1999, policing and justice powers were not devolved because it was felt that they were a separate issue; those powers were clearly beyond those given to the other Departments. The same approach was taken on each occasion that other institutions were set up between 1999 and 2002. The idea that the issue of policing and justice is not separate and different from the issues dealt with by run-of-the-mill Departments is not accurate, politically or historically. The DUP has made its position extremely clear on that.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I do not think that the Committee is going to reach consensus on this matter.

Mrs Long: For policing and justice powers to be devolved, the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister must put a motion jointly to the Assembly, which would be subject to a cross-community vote. The Secretary of State would then have to ensure that the appropriate conditions were in place, and a vote would be held in Westminster. That is laid out in the Northern Ireland (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 2006. Therefore, the powers cannot be devolved unless they achieve cross-community confidence.

Taking that as read, is it possible to set a target date by which policing and justice powers can be devolved? It is possible to suggest that conditions must be right and, at the same time, suggest that a target date should be set — those propositions are not mutually exclusive. Setting such a date puts down a marker — members are not saying that devolution of those powers will happen in two years' time, but simply that it is their wish that it should happen then. It shows that they are prepared to commit to working towards it. That is important for those who believe that the issue of devolution is a key part of this negotiation process. Indicating at least a willingness to move forward does not mean that in two years' time all the other locks can be unpicked. It is simply a matter of showing willing, and it is important that members are willing to set a date.

I do not want to set a prescriptive date or deadline. It would be pointless to suggest that if this issue were not cleared up in two years' time, the entire matter should fall apart on that hook. However, it is important to set a target towards which we can work in respect of the legislative framework, and so on. At a certain point, the Secretary of State will also need to introduce legislation to allow for policing and justice powers to be devolved. A process must be entered into, and a two-year target is not an unreasonable one.

Mrs D Kelly: Naomi has covered the theory of the restoration of the institutions quite well. However, for the past 10 minutes we have heard the DUP and Sinn Féin grant mutual vetoes to each other. On the one hand, the DUP says that if Sinn Féin signs up to policing, it will have confidence in Sinn Féin's ability, and Sinn Féin says that it will not sign up to policing unless a date for devolution of policing and justice powers is established. Therefore, they seem to be giving each other a by-ball.

Mrs Long: Chairman, I am still not clear what the very vague term "sign up to policing" means.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We must draw this matter to a conclusion because we are running way over time.

Is there consensus that a target date for the devolution of policing and justice should be set at two years after restoration?

Members indicated dissent.

Is there consensus that the devolution of policing and justice should occur as soon as possible?

Mrs D Kelly: Chairman, I think that the consensus —

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do we have consensus or not?

Members indicated dissent.

Mr Weir: Who said no?

Mr G Kelly: I did.

Mr A Maginness: Chairman, could you repeat the question?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I asked whether the devolution of policing and justice should occur as soon as possible.

Mr G Kelly: That does not mean anything.

Mr A Maginness: I think it could mean something.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We do not have consensus on it.

Mr McFarland: My sense is that this will play a key part in the October discussions.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Mr Jim Wells will take the chair after lunch.

The Committee was suspended at 12.39 pm.

On resuming —

1.09 pm

(The Chairman (Mr Wells) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Wells): First, I wish to apologise. I intended to be present a bit earlier this morning, but I had a meeting with the Speaker that overran, so I did not arrive until the tail end of the previous discussions. The Committee Clerks have brought me up to date with what took place, but forgive me if I do not completely follow members' train of thought for a few moments.

I do not know whether there have been any changes in personnel over the lunch break, but I understand that we are up to the issue of matters to be considered for devolution, which is paragraph 12 of the NIO discussion paper.

Alban, your team looks a bit thin. Are there more to come?

Mr A Maginness: Yes. Alex Attwood has been held up at a Policing Board meeting. Dolores Kelly should be here in a few minutes.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are you happy to proceed alone? You can handle that.

Mr A Maginness: Yes.

Mr Maskey: Gerry Kelly has been delayed. He will be here.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Members have before them a list of the matters that are to be considered for devolution to a Minister for policing and justice, when he or she is appointed. Without discussing who should be the Minister, when policing and justice powers should be devolved and what must happen before they are devolved, it would be best to go through these matters and ask members whether they are content that these issues be included within the remit after the aforementioned has been sorted out.

We will then move on to those issues that have been excluded. We need to check whether members are content that the matters identified in paragraph 12 are in line with their views.

The first matter is "Criminal law and creation of offences and penalties". Does anyone have any strong feelings about that power eventually being devolved to a Minister?

Mr McFarland: It strikes me that the matters identified in paragraph 12 all fall within the remit of policing and justice. There is probably not a great deal of contention in them. The paragraph on areas in which the devolution of functions would not be possible, may not be appropriate or should be subject to further consideration is perhaps more important.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is my reading of it, Alan, but I did not want people to say that I did not give them a chance to state their point of view on one particular issue. The subjects all look pretty innocuous, but I do not know parties' positions on them. Does anyone want to point out anything with which he or she has a difficulty?

Mr McFarland: As Mr Molloy said earlier, parties have the option of adding to and modifying the list as we progress. If an issue that pertains to one of these matters has not been spotted now but arises later, it is up to parties to raise it.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): In my experience, the fact that parties have not responded does not mean that they have had a diligent meeting, worked it all out and reached that position. Sometimes the speed at which this Committee moves means that the issue is overlooked.

I take it that the various parties' silence means that, if and when policing and justice is sorted out, you are happy enough with the powers listed in paragraph 12 being devolved?

Members indicated assent.

Mr A Maginness: The Court Service is currently an agency. If the powers outlined in 3(k) of paragraph 12 were devolved, would that change? Can you provide clarification on that?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): No, it would change. A devolved Minister rather than a direct rule Minister will head the Court Service.

Mr A Maginness: On the judicial responsibilities of the Lord Chancellor, my understanding is that the Lord Chief Justice of Northern Ireland is the head of the judiciary; it was formerly the Lord Chancellor. May I receive some clarification on that?

1.15 pm

I do not expect an answer now, but a change was made. I am not certain as to what that change means in practical terms. If, for example, an individual had wanted to query a judge's performance in court, he or she would have written to the Lord Chancellor. It is now the Lord Chief Justice of Northern Ireland's office that replies. What is the significance of that change? Perhaps there is no significance at all. Could I receive clarification on that?

Mrs Foster: It might have more to do with changes that have been made to the Department for Constitutional Affairs at Westminster.

Mr A Maginness: That could well be the case.

Mr McFarland: Mr Chairman, paragraphs 15.4, 15.5 and 15.6 in 'Devolving Policing and Justice in Northern Ireland: A Discussion Paper' relate to that.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I am conscious that I am surrounded by a posse of barristers and solicitors, so I will be very careful to seek out the explanations that you have requested.

Mr McFarland: At paragraph 15.4, it says:

"The Lord Chancellor is responsible for the administration of the Northern Ireland courts."

Paragraph 15.6 states:

"The Lord Chief Justice of Northern Ireland, as head of the Northern Ireland judiciary, is responsible for functions relating to sittings of courts and the times and places of those sittings".

Therefore there may a dual role. The Lord Chancellor's slice of those duties passes to a Northern Ireland Minister for policing and justice upon devolution.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Either way, Alban, do you foresee a concern from the SDLP on the matter?

Mr A Maginness: I am merely seeking clarification. I do not foresee any serious problem.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We can provide that clarification.

Mr Raymond McCartney: Notwithstanding some of the conversations that we had this morning on the definition of British national security, we will deal with any issues as they arise. However, we have some reservations. We have clear views on national security issues.

Mr Maskey: There is quite a lot in the document, and the NIO has provided notes on the discussion paper. We want to see the maximum powers, as they relate to the whole island, transferred as soon as possible. We covered some of that this morning.

Mr Weir: I was not aware that Westminster could transfer powers to the whole island. I do not know what the member is driving at there, apart from it being a general point of principle.

Mr Maskey: Powers are to be transferred to a Department. Its Minister will be on the Executive, and the Executive and the North/South Ministerial Council are related.

Mr Weir: That is almost a separate issue. It is a step beyond us. When we talk about the transfer of policing and justice powers, we are talking about the transfer of those powers from Westminster to a Northern Ireland Department. If, at some stage, the Executive agreed to work with the Irish Republic on those matters, that would be a separate issue. Initially at least, powers will only go directly to the Department. The level of co-operation is a separate issue.

Mr Maskey: In a way, there is no point in the issue being bandied about. Peter was quick to point out this morning that he was not in agreement. The interdependence of members of the Executive is not really an issue.

Mr Weir: That is not what I am arguing. Policing and justice powers are to be transferred from Westminster to a Northern Ireland Department, and whether that Department shares any of those powers with the Irish Republic is a separate matter.

Mr Maskey: We can agree to disagree, because it is not a major issue. I am merely making the broad statement that Sinn Féin wants the maximum number of powers to be transferred as soon as possible.

I want to put on the record that Sinn Féin is concerned that there seems to be an attempt to plunder the reserved matters and to make a number of them excepted matters. I will elaborate on that concern when we come to discuss those matters.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I see the point that you are trying to make, Mr Maskey, but it refers to excepted matters, which we are to discuss next. You seem to have indicated that although Sinn Féin is content with the list of excepted matters, it wishes to add to it. There will be opportunity for that when we discuss paragraph 13.

Mr Maskey: Some of these issues are vague. Therefore, for the record, just because Sinn Féin has not challenged specific issues, it does not mean that it supports them.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Hansard has recorded your point. Therefore, if the subject comes up again, you will be covered, as it were.

Mr A Maginness: The Northern Ireland Judicial Appointments Commission (NIJAC) seems to have been excluded.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): If members wish to discuss issues that have been excluded, are they happy that we park those issues that have been included and move on to paragraph 13?

Members indicated assent.

Mr A Maginness: I have not examined the excluded list in any great detail, but is there an explanation for its contents? The Northern Ireland Court Service and the Public Prosecution Service for Northern Ireland have been included, and the omission of NIJAC seems to have been deliberate. Whether it is —

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Would paragraph 13(p) cover that?

Mrs Foster: Perhaps I can be of assistance. I think that Alban is saying that we do not want to place anything from paragraph 13 on to the lists of reserved or excepted matters and that we are happy that everything on that list will be transferred. Is that correct?

Mr A Maginness: Yes.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Can we agree that? If so, we can have a free and unfettered discussion on paragraph 13 and the issues that we would like to be included.

Mrs Foster: Yes.

Mr A Maginness: NIJAC is not on the list; that is a significant omission.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will come back to that. Am I right to assume that no one is dying in a ditch about the current list?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Paragraph 13 includes a list of specific exclusions, which runs to over 20. I suspect, therefore, that the discussion on it will take quite a while. Members may agree with some of the exclusions, but I suspect that some will be the source of quite a bit of debate.

Paragraph 13(a) states:

“the Secretary of State should retain responsibility for offences related to terrorism and treason — these are excepted matters”.

Is treason something that members would like the Assembly to take within its bailiwick?

Mrs Foster: I would be quite happy to try some people for treason.

Mrs D Kelly: That is an internal DUP matter. Leave Jim Wells alone.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I know the feeling. Some of us have been through that process already.

Mr Kennedy: Your private life is no concern of ours. [Laughter.]

Mrs Foster: As far as the DUP is concerned, offences related to terrorism and treason sit naturally as excepted matters.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do any of the other parties feel differently about that?

Mr A Maginness: I will reserve the SDLP’s position for the moment. It may be more appropriate for a Northern Ireland Assembly, rather than the Westminster Government, to deal with some issues that relate to anti-terrorist legislation.

Mr Raymond McCartney: Sinn Féin feels that responsibility for offences relating to terrorism and treason should be transferred.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Therefore one party is neutral, and one party is opposed to its remaining an excepted matter. Do the other parties have preferences?

Mr McFarland: The legislation is quite clear. The agreement, to which most of us signed up, sets out the excepted matters and those matters that could be transferred, and we have acknowledged those matters that could be transferred. The excepted matters tend to relate to national security. I can understand why Sinn Féin would want them devolved, but the Ulster Unionist Party wants them to remain as excepted matters. That is what they should be, as part of the national effort.

Mrs Long: The Alliance Party is content that responsibility for offences related to terrorism and treason remains an excepted matter. However, this morning's discussion on where terrorism ends and criminality begins needs to be explored further.

Mr Weir: The DUP believes that it should remain an excepted matter.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is quite clear that we do not have consensus.

Mr Raymond McCartney: The concept of British national security needs to be defined. That is the sticking point for all these issues. Some parties are comfortable with the concept of British national security, but Sinn Féin is not, which is why it has reservations.

Mr McFarland: We are back to the agreement and whether Sinn Féin accepts the consent principle, which states that the people of Northern Ireland will remain citizens of the United Kingdom until they vote otherwise. My understanding was that Sinn Féin accepted the agreement. Of course, people are free to try to change everyone's minds, but, for the time being, Northern Ireland will remain part of the United Kingdom.

British national security will take precedence until such times as Northern Ireland becomes part of the Irish Republic, when, presumably, the Irish Republic's national security interests would take precedence. The agreement set out that process, and I understood that Sinn Féin had signed up to the agreement.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Of course, those terms are repeated in the Northern Ireland Act 1998, which lists the excepted matters.

Mr McFarland: Absolutely.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Therefore, issues in two documents would have to be overcome.

There is a clear divergence of opinion. All we can do is accept that and minute it. We do not have consensus on the matter.

Mr Maskey: That is true. As Mr McCartney said, it is all very well to talk about —

[Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.]

— in some cases, transferred matters are being extracted and placed in the excepted matters category. That is not acceptable to Sinn Féin. Where will it end? As Raymond said, who defines what constitutes national security? We have been discussing criminal law. What does that have to do with national security?

Mr McFarland: The British Government, in the same way as the Irish or German Governments, determine matters of national security. That is what Governments do.

Mr Raymond McCartney: Only within their territories, though.

Mr McFarland: Members need to keep reminding themselves that the Northern Ireland Assembly is a devolved institution, not a sovereign Government.

Mr Maskey: The agreement, the Patten Report and so on identified issues that should be transferred to Northern Ireland. Sinn Féin believes that “national security” is being used as a cover-all to prevent the transfer of certain issues. What does the right to investigate crime have to do with national security?

Naomi discussed the difference between the approaches being taken towards “republicanism” and “loyalism”. It is a mishmash. Under the guise of the national security banner, there is a clear attempt to remove some reserved matters. In effect, that would remove powers from locally accountable Ministers and Departments and the Executive. It is not right and should not be allowed.

National security needs to be defined. Who defines it? Where is the line drawn? It is not good enough to simply say that a matter comes under the heading of national security and, therefore, because of the agreement and the principle of consent, it must be accepted. The agreement is a given. Sinn Féin very much accepts the agreement, but it is not prepared to allow it to be used as a spurious banner to remove those powers that rightfully reside with locally accountable Ministers.

Mr McFarland: I am not saying that we should not examine those matters. Paragraph 13(a) of the NIO discussion paper relates to the ability to pass legislation and to decide what offences relate to terrorism and treason. The Government have decided that those are excepted matters. I am not saying that we cannot examine other issues that have been taken away that rightly belong here, but terrorism and treason are excepted matters, and they have been excepted matters from the beginning. If that is incorrect, perhaps some legal eagles could describe whether those powers were going to be transferred but have suddenly been removed. However, I understood that they were excepted matters.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Maskey, you are not saying that there are no issues that are excepted matters. There are issues of state security that would remain at Westminster. You are questioning what is defined as those excepted matters.

1.30 pm

Mr Maskey: I do not want anything in respect of this country to be dealt with at Westminster. We are dealing with matters that are currently reserved and that should be transferred as soon as possible to locally elected accountable Ministers. We are also dealing with issues that are supposed to be excepted matters. Sinn Féin believes that there is a clear attempt by the NIO and the British Government to take reserved matters back as excepted matters, under the banner of national security. That is not right; it is spurious and unacceptable.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will not reach a common view on this matter.

Mr McFarland: There are reserved matters, and it was recognised at the time of the agreement that those matters could be devolved. There is a list of those matters, relating to the courts and so forth, because it was recognised that policing and justice would be devolved eventually. There are also excepted matters that will never be devolved. It would be useful if Mr Maskey could point out areas that were in the reserved category but that have now been put in the excepted category.

Terrorism and treason have always been excepted matters. There was never an expectation that terrorism, treason and national security would be devolved. It would be useful to know which reserved matters are now excepted. These matters were excepted, and they remain excepted. We are merely acknowledging the fact that they continue to be excepted matters of national security. Does that make sense?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Maskey, you are not expecting matters such as the positions of Russian nuclear submarines to be devolved to a Northern Ireland Executive — or are you?

Mr Maskey: Criminal law is a reserved matter, and there is now an argument that some matters that appear under the heading of “national security” would be excepted. There is a blurring and a vagueness. Under the banner of national security, some aspects of investigations into serious crime and so forth remain excepted matters. Mrs Long discussed that at length this morning, and there are further examples. I am seeking clarification rather than simply saying that we agree that certain issues should remain excepted matters.

Mr McFarland: National security issues are a matter for Westminster.

The investigation of organised crime remains the responsibility of the PSNI. My understanding — and I know that some people will disagree — is that only responsibility for issues relating to republican terrorism and the handling of republican agents will remain with the national organisation, MI5, until the threat of bombs in Great Britain has gone away.

Northern Ireland has seen its first court case and sentencing of an individual operating on behalf of al-Qaeda, and more cases are in the pipeline. As a result of the massively increased threat from al-Qaeda it has been decided, rightly or wrongly, that the examination of worldwide terrorism should remain with MI5. No responsibility for actual crime investigation rests anywhere other than with the PSNI.

Mr Weir: I do not wish to deny anyone the right to argue the case that a previously excepted matter should become a transferred matter, or even that reserved matters should become transferred matters. However, the DUP is extremely unlikely to be persuaded that a previously excepted matter should become a transferred matter.

I am not altogether clear whether any matters listed in the Northern Ireland Act 1998 as reserved matters have since changed to excepted matters — Alan McFarland may have been driving at something similar, and in the light of the lack of clarity, some matters may bear closer examination.

Arguably, although every issue must be examined, those matters that have shifted from being reserved to excepted, or vice versa, are more of a grey area and therefore merit particular attention. However, I am not aware of anything that has changed from being a reserved matter to an excepted matter during that eight-year period. A list of any such changes in status may help.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is a good suggestion, because we are getting bogged down, and some of those matters will come up time and time again.

Mr Maskey, if you will provide the Committee with a list of any matters that you feel should be devolved but that remain excepted, that would help point the Committee in the direction of what you feel needs to be changed. Until those matters are identified, we will not get very far.

Mrs D Kelly: Part of the problem is that the definition of terrorism is confusing. There has been a mass exodus of loyalist paramilitaries to England; perhaps they will pose a national security threat and the entire definition will change.

In ‘Devolving Policing and Justice in Northern Ireland: A Discussion Paper’, chapter 5 on ‘Criminal Law and Creation of Offences and Penalties’ states:

“The Secretary of State is currently advised on this by the Criminal Justice Directorate of the Northern Ireland Office.”

Is terrorism defined as financial gain from the proceeds of crime — and is that based on the fact that paramilitaries are engaged in criminality, which goes back to Naomi’s point — or is terrorism defined as blowing places up? Why should the Criminal Justice Directorate not report to the Assembly Minister, as opposed to the Secretary of State, on the legislative requirements for the creation of offences and court procedures?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We need more information. We are not going to square the circle, and there are similar issues on the list.

Mrs Foster: May I suggest that we compare the list of transferable, reserved and excepted matters, as it was in 1998 — that is not something that I am often heard to say — and compare it to the list on the discussion paper to see if anything has changed? Some matters, such as judicial appointments, were not up for debate in 1998. That is a key issue for the SDLP and something new that we could discuss.

If a matter is excepted, the likelihood of Government transferring it in the future is nil. The Committee should get into the realms of reality and deal with reserved matters and those that Government have perhaps moved to except. There is a case for that. If something has been excepted for eighty years —

Mr Weir: Eight years.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Would such a table be helpful? Members could tick off the matters that they feel are in the wrong columns. In the absence of that, the Committee will get heavily bogged down.

Mr Maskey: Members belong to political parties, and our job is to win a mandate and achieve our party objectives, whatever those may be. If members simply say that the Government will not change their minds then — [Interruption.]

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The beauty of such a list is that members can say that x, y and z should move from one column to the next.

Mr Maskey: A fundamental question should be addressed. How do members feel that they can define national security? One need only look at the intention to give MI5 an increased role in policing. That muddies the whole issue, never mind the morality or the correctness of the situation. A British security system would interfere in matters that are rightfully the preserve of locally elected and democratically accountable Ministers.

Consider, for example, the relationship between an Attorney General who would be appointed here and the Crown Prosecution Service. That relationship would be fundamentally different here to what it would be elsewhere. Who, then, will define national security? Members seem to be saying that nothing can be done about national security matters, or that they want to do nothing about them. Sinn Féin is asking when the term national security will be defined.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I have asked the Secretary of State to come along to the Committee, and it may be appropriate for members to ask him to define what he means by national security. The record of that request is in Hansard, and, no doubt, his staff are working on that as we speak.

Mrs Long: The national Parliament will define national security, and therefore none of the devolved Administrations may define the term. The Government of the nation will define it. Members may be able to influence Government decisions on that.

As you have said, Mr Chairman, the Alliance Party has highlighted the potential for anomalies in the treatment of paramilitaries. If, for example, republican paramilitarism were viewed as a threat to national security but loyalist paramilitarism as a criminal issue, my party would be concerned about parity. National security is not an issue that I foresee being reviewed on the basis of what members think. That is not to say that we accept the status quo, but, in the context of this discussion, I imagine that to be the situation.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I must step in here or the Committee will get bogged down. May we have a view on Mrs Foster's proposal that we have a list of reserved and accepted matters for guidance? Can we agree that, if the Secretary of State appears before the Committee, one issue that will be flagged up is his definition of national security and how he sees its relevance to this discussion?

Mr McFarland: The Secretary of State is likely to appear at a later stage in the process. It would be useful if, alongside that list, we could obtain the NIO's definition of national security and who decided it. If this discussion continues, the factual position will be quite useful.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I like to get at least 10 consensuses in these meetings, so can we have the first?

Mr Weir: It would be helpful if we could have a table with three columns that we could read across. We could then compare lists of transferred and reserved powers, for example, the position in 1998 and the historical position in 1921. I suspect that Sinn Féin's position will be that almost everything should be transferred; but the rest of us will need to be persuaded that something on the list of excepted powers eight years ago should now suddenly be transferred.

It would be particularly difficult to persuade us that a matter that had never been transferred to Northern Ireland should now be transferred. We need a three-column table that would enable comparisons and contrasts between reserved and excepted matters at different stages, with a separate list for items such as the Northern Ireland Judicial Appointments Commission, which is an example of a power transferred since 1998.

Mr Raymond McCartney: No one here wants to offer their definition of British national interest. However, this matter has practical implications because people have been vetted and refused employment or contracts because they were deemed to be contrary to British national interests. Therefore, if a Minister is running a Department, who decides for him or her what the national interest is?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I will let Alban speak, and then I will move to the vote because we have been bashing this issue around for some time now.

Mr A Maginness: I want to make a general comment. The list of matters that are being retained at Westminster contains some significant items, while others are purely procedural and quite insignificant. However, reservations can be voiced and arguments raised in objection to their retention.

Members should study the list very carefully, because the powers that be at Westminster could well have an agenda that involves keeping things back for specific reasons that are not consonant with good government in Northern Ireland and that do not help the devolved institutions. I encourage members to take a more sceptical view of matters that are being reserved.

Chairman, you suggested getting advice on matters that are reserved and excepted and so forth, and that would help to inform the debate.

The powers of the Northern Ireland Judicial Appointments Commission should be included in the matters that are being transferred. From more careful consideration of the NIO discussion paper, I notice that it mentions the Lord Chancellor's responsibility for the appointment of listed judicial offices and that the First Minister and Deputy First Minister, acting jointly, will be responsible for judicial appointments through the Judicial Appointments Commission. According to this text, therefore, that would be a devolved matter.

Mr Maskey: Chairman, I apologise, I know that you want to move to the vote, but, in a way, my comments will colour the entire afternoon session, so please indulge me a little — it is not treasonable yet.

Mr Weir: That is for us to decide.

Mr Maskey: Peter Weir made a proposal that I would like to hear again. He proposed carrying out an exercise to find out what matters were reserved a number of years ago and what matters would now be excepted, and so on. It is important that we can compare what was in the Good Friday Agreement, the Patten Report, the 2006 Act, and the NIO discussion paper.

Sinn Féin is arguing that those in the British securocrat system are trying to emasculate the powers that should be transferred, which Alban just mentioned. Sinn Féin believes that a number of attempts have been made in the 2006 Act, and in the NIO discussion document, to make reserved matters excepted or to split them in some vague way. I would like a list of any regulations or protocols that relate to British national security, and a list of the powers devolved to the Scottish Parliament. That would be a useful comparison.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is a fair point. Let us take the proposals in order. The first proposal, from Peter Weir, is to get a list of excepted and reserved matters in read-across form so that we can see exactly where we stand; that the Northern Ireland Office be asked to produce a written definition of national security; and that we should raise that with the Secretary of State. That is purely for information. No emphasis is being placed on these points — we merely want to clarify the position.

Mr Weir: The other matter is Alban Maginness's point that we should request an additional column to detail the functions that were not mentioned in 1998. An obvious one is the Northern Ireland Judicial Appointments Commission, but there may be other matters that are dated post-1998.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do we have consensus on that proposal?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Maskey has asked for an explanatory text that details the protocols, any relevant documents and, of course, the powers of the Scottish Parliament in relation to national security. I do not believe that the Scottish Parliament has any role in that area. However, it is important that we get that information.

Mr Weir: I presume that one could describe those as Home Office matters.

Mr A Maginness: My understanding was that Mr Maskey was not referring to matters of national security per se, but to justice matters. I understand that traditionally, Scotland has had a great deal of judicial independence over and above any other part of the UK. I could not foresee the Scottish Parliament not having additional powers.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That information would be useful.

Mrs Foster: Scotland's legal system is entirely separate from those in England, Wales and Northern Ireland, and the Lord Chancellor does not have as much power in Scotland as he has in those jurisdictions. If we want to be absolutely thorough, we should also find out the position of the National Assembly for Wales.

Mr McFarland: Chapter 18 of the NIO discussion paper details which functions are excepted and why.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The idea of a read-across table —

Mr McFarland: That idea is fine, but if members want to read up on specific issues before we get that table, they are set out in that chapter.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are we agreed that we should get the additional information that Mr Maskey requested?

Mrs Foster: As long as we get information from the Scottish Parliament and the National Assembly for Wales.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do members have any problems with that? Is that agreed?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The research team will no doubt use that, plus Hansard, to track down that material.

We move to paragraph 13(b) of the NIO discussion paper — “Criminal records, checks and disclosures”. Those are devolved matters in Scotland.

Mr Weir: I do not want to cut across this discussion, but I thought that the purpose of getting the paper was so that we could deal with all of those issues. It strikes me that when you have a paper that also details the situations in Scotland and Wales, you are in a better position to put all those issues into context. To be honest, if we work through this list of 15 or 20 separate issues before we get that paper, we will merely be using our insufficient knowledge to rehearse arguments.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): You must be a mind reader, Mr Weir, because the staff are saying exactly the same thing.

Mr Weir: Great minds think alike.

Mr Kennedy: And fools seldom differ.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): When we get the additional information we will be able to have a more educated discussion.

Mr Maskey: Could we get additional information on international human rights obligations?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): How does that relate to matters that are excluded from the remit of a possible Minister with responsibility for justice in the Executive?

Mr Maskey: If we want to be elected and accountable, we will need our own human rights obligations. If some of those matters are excepted, how do we, as elected representatives who are accountable to people here, defend those obligations? Where do they lie?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is an interesting point, but I do not see how it lies in paragraph 13.

Mrs Foster: I would not consent to that. We are straying into the realms of trying to find out how many things we can get from this paper. We must be realistic. Rights, safeguards and human rights issues are dealt with by the Preparation for Government Committee that meets on Fridays. If Mr Maskey would like to attend, I am sure that Dermot Nesbitt will give him an exposition on human rights, and we will be all the wiser for it.

Mr Maskey: I have heard Dermot’s exposition; I was not terribly enamoured with it.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We do not have consensus for Mr Maskey’s additional proposal. If the research team produces all that we have asked for, we will have enough material to be going on with.

We are whizzing very quickly through the agenda. We have reached paragraph 13q, so we will have to park this issue for the week and hope to continue that discussion next time.

We do not know whether all that material will be available within a week, but we have plenty to be going on with while that research is being done for us.

The Preparation for Government Committee’s work programme is continually revised and updated, and we like to let members know when we shall be meeting, who will be chairing the sitting, and so forth. The economic challenges subgroup is doing the same. Do members have any practical difficulties with the work programme? Mr Molloy and I will be present throughout, so no problems will arise with the chairmanship of any sittings.

Mr Kennedy: The scrupulous attention of one of the doorkeepers prevented one of our observers from attending this morning. It has now been established that our observer should have been given access. The doorkeeper has apologised to the individual concerned, but, nevertheless, it is important that observers are eligible to attend meetings and that doorkeepers be informed of who will be attending sittings. Procedures should be consistent, and consistently applied.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Normally the parties would inform the staff of who will be attending. The observers in attendance have been here quite often, so we have got to know their faces. The gentleman to whom you refer was a new face to the staff, and they did not know in advance that he was to attend. If he wants to attend our future meetings, the problem has been resolved.

Mr McFarland: Chairman, logic dictates that somebody stick his or her head around a door to check whether anyone else plans to attend. We were told that we could have an observer in attendance. In fact, I raised the issue of observers attending our meetings. Had I realised what had happened this morning, I would have done something. To be turned away in such a fashion is silly.

Mr Maskey: It comes under the heading of “National Security”.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We shall speak to the doorkeepers about that, but had they known in advance, the issue would not have arisen.

Mr Weir: On a related point, it may be useful if each party were given an additional set of papers in advance of each meeting. That could be made available to the party or to an adviser.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We discussed that, but the view was taken that, as we are already distributing 30 sets of papers, it was the responsibility of the parties, who receive papers well in advance of meetings, to give them to researchers.

Mr Weir: If that was to be increased from 30 to 35, it should not —

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We would still not have known that this gentleman was coming, so we would have had no —

Mr Weir: I propose that an additional set of papers per party be made available. It would be up to the party to decide whether that went to its staff or to whomever. I do not know whether anybody has a particular problem with that.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): To whom would that pack go?

Mr Weir: It would go to the general office of each party. All parties have general offices in Parliament Buildings. From a practical point of view, that should not prove all that difficult.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): What do members feel about Mr Weir's proposal that one extra pack, with which parties can do what they feel fit, be provided to the parties' general office?

Mr Kennedy: It may also be helpful, Chairman, if you could be provided with a register of additional party staff. You would then be able to identify party researchers or observers. Perhaps it would be helpful if the parties could produce a list of names so that party staff could be easily, or more easily, identifiable.

2.00 pm

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The DUP seems to be happy enough, so can we agree that? That will overcome some of the difficulties we have experienced this morning. There is no deliberate attempt to exclude people, I assure you.

There is a letter from the Secretary of State — members will be aware that we wrote to him on 3 August — in which he says that he is minded to move the first plenary sitting after recess to 11 September, a date that we will all recall. That will give the Preparation for Government Committee and the economic subgroup a bit more time to finish their work. I mentioned this to the Speaker today, and she is content with the arrangement. The Business Committee meeting will also move back a week. Is everyone content with the contents of the Secretary of State's letter? It was, after all, this Committee that, by consensus, asked for the plenary sitting to be put back.

Mr Kennedy: Chairman, it was reported in the press yesterday, so it is already a done deal.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I have to put it formally to the Committee.

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Item 6 on the agenda is a letter that the Committee received from Prof Sir Desmond Rea, the chairman of the Policing Board. We have members of the Policing Board here, so he will need no introduction. It is a very helpful and positive letter. The Policing Board is offering to give us any help or provide any evidence that we require. I suggest that we keep this on file, and if any issues arise on which we feel that we need input from the Policing Board, we can ask for an answer or for written evidence, and perhaps reserve the right to call it to give evidence. That is entirely at our discretion.

The last issue today is one that was raised by Mr McNarry at yesterday's meeting of the economic subgroup, which some of you will have attended — Mr Maginness chaired the meeting so he is aware of it.

The first thing Mr McNarry has asked us to decide upon is:

"whether it is appropriate for a substitute to attend specifically in place of the nominated PfG member representative".

My view — and I am sure that it is the view of many others — is that it has been extraordinarily difficult to keep this Committee going during the summer period. In fact, the turnout has been quite remarkable. The full Preparation for Government Committee has never been in a position where it has become inquorate. Even today the attendance is in double figures. The economic subgroup has found it more difficult. There have been times when it has been hard to achieve the seven members that are required. Indeed, on one occasion we did become inquorate, and that evidence was lost.

We have had a fairly flexible attitude to this — members have come and gone, but it has not disrupted the flow of the Preparation for Government Committee or the economic subgroup. As someone who has had to chair these meetings, I feel that that flexibility has helped enormously in enabling us to keep going. We get our daily lambasting from the press — usually when we turn to the front page of the 'Belfast Telegraph' — but a lot of hard work has been going on during the past six weeks, and that is because members have been able to get capable substitutes to cover for them. However, other members of the Committee may feel that we need a more rigid approach.

Mr Weir: Chairman, I was at the economic subgroup meeting yesterday. From a practical point of view, it would not have been able to function, to be brutally honest, if you had said that we must have seven out of the same 10 people there at all times.

There is a slight degree of irony. I do not want to be disparaging towards the member who raised the issue, but I think that the economic subgroup and the Preparation for Government Committee have become inquorate on only one occasion. As it happens, it was when Mr McNarry left the room.

From a practical point of view, a bit of common sense must be adopted. It would be a different matter if the Preparation for Government Committee and the economic subgroup were meeting in the middle of October, when we could reasonably expect most MLAs to be available. In most places, seven out of 10 members would be considered a pretty high quorum. From a practical point of view, I doubt that more than one or two meetings could have functioned if a quorum of 10 named members had been stuck to rigidly.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Alban, you chaired the meeting, so it is important that we hear from you.

Mr A Maginness: I did, and Mr McNarry raised the point. I asked the Committee Clerk for advice on the matter, and the position is explained in the aide-memoire.

It is my view that flexibility is the most important aspect of the Preparation for Government Committee and the economic subgroup's functioning well. If a situation arises that restricts membership, the Committee and the subgroup will run into all sorts of difficulties, not least becoming inquorate. I hope that I am right in this, but, by and large, there is consensus that the rules governing the membership of the Committee and the subgroup should not be too strict. They should allow the Committee and the subgroup to work, and let the parties get on with the job of presenting their views. That is my opinion.

It seems to me that there should be no problems with members chairing the Committee or the subgroup. Those members will act independently and will have no voting rights.

Mr Neeson: For an Assembly that is supposed to be in recess, it is incredible that such a good attendance record has been maintained at the Committee and the economic subgroup. Yesterday, I made the point about the role of the Assembly's Deputy Speakers. When they are not in the Chair, the Deputy Speakers can participate normally in Assembly debates. I see some similarities between that and the role that Naomi is performing. Also, I think that it is incredible that she has been able to attend so many meetings during recess.

Mr McFarland: This is specific to the economic subgroup because it alone remains under the Secretary of State's rules. The Secretary of State ruled that the subgroups should comprise one member of the Preparation for Government Committee from each party and A N Other expert from each party. The UUP nominated two members plus a substitute. It is the middle of the summer and members are away all over the place; they can attend one week but not the next. Essentially, the UUP took a sensible approach to the Committee. Members have subbed as best they could and, on a week-by-week basis, have identified the member whom they were to replace.

The logic is to take that approach to the economic subgroup. I can understand why the larger parties might be slightly confused as to why more members of their teams were not permitted to attend the Committee and the subgroup. However, the Alliance Party may well have problems over the summer. Am I correct to say that, with the Speaker out of the equation, the Alliance Party has five available members?

Mrs Long: Yes.

Mr McFarland: Therefore, perhaps it would not be unreasonable to take a relatively easy approach to Committee and subgroup membership.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The rules are silent on the issue. Therefore, it is up to us to decide whether we wish to continue in this way. Another issue is that the way that the Committee and the subgroup have worked has allowed each party to field a specialist team for the Preparation for Government Committees dealing with institutional changes and policing and justice. That is why a plethora of MLAs who sit on the Policing Board is here today: they are the experts on that issue. Such arrangements would not have been possible if we had stuck rigidly to Mr McNarry's suggestion.

Given the fact that it is the middle of August, I cannot see any other way round the issue. However, Mr McNarry insisted that it be raised, and, therefore, we were obliged to deal with it. It would be useful to have consensus one way or the other on whether Mr McNarry's suggestion should be taken forward.

Mrs Long: I do not wish to discuss the detail of my participation and the consternation that it caused yesterday — [Laughter.]

At least three of the parties around the table today have fielded teams at the main Programme for Government Committee that have not included one of their formal members of that Committee. Therefore, to suggest that parties should not be allowed to field substitutes to be their Programme for Government Committee representative on the subgroup seems ludicrous.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There seems to be consensus. Are members agreed that we should retain the flexible approach that we have had up to now and allow parties to field substitutes as and when necessary?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): A separate issue, to which Naomi referred, is the fact that she has been made a Chair of the economic subgroup, but is attending meetings of the PFG Committee also.

Mrs Long: I have attended one meeting.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Sean's point is that Deputy Speakers can attend the Assembly with no problem. I suspect that it would cause great difficulties for the Alliance Party if that were not the situation for the Committee and the subgroup. The party's numbers would be reduced even further.

Mr Cobain: I see that Alex has arrived. It is OK, Alex; we are finished. Hurry up, Chairman.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): If you would just sit down, Alex, I will mark your attendance.

Mr Attwood: I have important matters that I want to raise.

Mr Cobain: Some chance.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is the Committee content that Naomi — and it also applies to Alban — can continue to adopt both roles, unless there is an obvious conflict of interest, which I doubt?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is good. Thank you, Mr Attwood. I will just put your name on the record. [Laughter.]

The date of the next meeting will be 11 August, at 10.00 am in room 144. Mr Attwood, have you any comments? We will be discussing rights, safeguards, equality issues and related matters. I alert members that the meeting could last a full day.

Mr McFarland: It will last a full day. Last week, the Committee voted for an all-day meeting.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The meeting on Wednesday 16 August could also be for a full day. Would that cause difficulties for anyone?

Mr McFarland: I understood that we had decided that, until the back of the business is broken, we would be meeting for full days. We will have three more meetings, with the last meeting to finalise what will go into our report. We will have a couple of Wednesday meetings before we start hitting the buffers.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That meeting will deal with policing, intelligence services and the Police Ombudsman. We will not roll this format into that one. It will be a separate meeting. We will return to the matters raised today after the research team has prepared the paper.

Mr McFarland: Can a paper not be prepared in a week? If that is the case, we are in deep trouble. The idea was that we would have an agenda and an order. Some issues have been parked until the end because they are difficult and need further discussion. Does this issue also need to be parked or are we waiting for information? My understanding was that we were seeking information. If we cannot get information within a week, we are in deep doo-doo.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We cannot guarantee that, Alan. Remember that one of our researchers has been redeployed to the economic subgroup, which has an awful lot of work to do.

Mr Maskey: There is no reason why today's discussion cannot be put off for two weeks.

Mr McFarland: There is no problem with that.

Mr Maskey: The Committee needs the relevant documents that it has asked for today, and a little time to absorb them.

Mrs Long: Surely if next week's meeting is on issues such as the security services, the issues that we have raised today about where the power over national security is vested will be pertinent to that discussion? We could run up against the same brick wall.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I have spoken to the Committee staff, and it is a needs-must situation. We will have to get the information. It will be difficult, but we will do it.

Mr McFarland: It occurs to me this is recurring issue. We had this at the beginning with Hansard. We have sat in abeyance for a number of years. We are now functioning for the first time within the last few months and are back in action. You would have thought that the team would be very keen to get fired up to produce the information.

At one stage, we were told that Hansard could not produce the Official Report for a week.

This is the only show in town. The parties are all here around the table, and staff difficulties should not be an issue. I could rustle a report out in a couple of days with the documentation that is available in the Assembly.

Mr Weir: Do we subcontract the work?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Alan, your eloquence has convinced us. We will provide the material to you; with difficulty, but we will do that. Then we will be able to continue the discussion.

Adjourned at 2.15 pm.

COMMITTEE ON THE PREPARATION FOR GOVERNMENT

Friday 11 August 2006

Members in attendance for all or part of proceedings:

The Chairman, Mr Jim Wells
Mr Michael Copeland
Mr Michael Ferguson
Mrs Arlene Foster
Ms Patricia Lewsley
Mrs Naomi Long
Mr Kieran McCarthy
Mr Alan McFarland
Mr Alban Maginness
Lord Morrow
Mr Dermot Nesbitt
Mrs Pat O’Rawe
Mr Edwin Poots
Observing: Mr Francie Molloy

The Committee met at 10.03 am.

(The Chairman (Mr Wells) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Ladies and gentlemen, our meetings have settled into a well-tested format. Lunch will be delivered at 12.10 pm. There will follow a short adjournment, and, when the meeting resumes, I encourage members to take their places and continue their lunch. I expect the meeting to finish at 4.00 pm, which will probably be the case for each meeting from now on.

I hope that no one needs to be reminded of the mobile phone issue. Members may put them in the hold, but they cannot bring them into the room.
[Laughter.]

Folk are still trying to slip their mobile phones in, keep them on silent mode, and receive text messages. I must insist that they are switched off. I say that at the beginning of each meeting, and during each meeting, I hear the little “beep beep, beep beep” that tells me that members are receiving text messages.

The full complement of DUP members is now present. Therefore, we will go through the apologies and list the deputies. Lord Morrow, will you indicate who is representing whom from the DUP?

Lord Morrow: I will do so if I can think clearly.

Mrs Foster: Unfortunately, I am not Lord Morrow today; I am probably Ian Paisley Jnr.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is a big improvement. Am I right to presume that Mr Poots is representing William McCrea and that Lord Morrow is himself?

Lord Morrow: Yes.

Mr McFarland: Mr Nesbitt is representing Mr Kennedy, and I am expecting Mr McNarry to arrive shortly.

Mrs Long: I am myself, and Kieran McCarthy is David Ford.

Mr A Maginness: I am representing Seán Farren.

Ms Lewsley: I am representing Mark Durkan.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): What about the SDLP’s third representative?

Ms Lewsley: There is no one else coming.

Mr Ferguson: Pat O’Rawe is representing Michelle Gildernew, and I am representing Conor Murphy.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Will a third member from Sinn Féin be attending?

Mr Ferguson: No.

Mr Nesbitt: I attended a meeting of the PFG Committee for the first time last Friday. Before the meeting, my colleague Alan McFarland said to me on the phone that my first words to the Committee should be to tell the Chair that I am Alan McFarland. I asked him what he meant, and he told me that I would be deputising for him. I would have thought that attendance would have been as simple as three members coming from each party. It seems odd to ask members to state who they are and to hear them say, for example, that they are Seán Farren or Alban Maginness. I accept that that is the procedure, but it struck me as odd to ask members who they are.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Each of the four largest parties, plus the Alliance Party, formally nominated three of their members to attend the Committee. However, confusion has arisen when a fourth member from a particular party has attended, and no one knew who was deputising for whom. That is why we ask members to state the member for whom they are deputising. The system has worked well, and the Committee has maintained a good, quorate turnout.

Mr Nesbitt: As I say, I was curious to know why that happens. I thought that parties could count —

Mr McFarland: To clarify, this is the Committee on the Preparation for Government, and three members from each of the four largest parties, plus the Alliance Party, attend its meetings. Parties are allowed to substitute their named members with members who are experts on particular subjects, which means that extra light can be shed on the topics that are being discussed. That is why members are brought in to deputise.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): To prevent members swapping, with each pretending to be the same member, something that has happened, it is important to know whom members represent.

Mr Nesbitt: Does that mean that if three members name themselves at the beginning of a meeting, there can be no duplication for the duration of that meeting?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There could be duplication, but the members would have to name the members whom they were replacing. For example, a member could replace Mr Smith who had been deputising for Mr Jones. I am sure that that is clear.

Lord Morrow: It is, but I think that it should be left for now.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The next item on the agenda is to agree the minutes of the meeting of 4 August. They have been circulated. Are members content that the minutes are an accurate record of proceedings?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Normally we would move straight to the substantive issue, but we have received a letter from the Northern Ireland Human Rights Consortium —

Mr Nesbitt: I am sorry, Mr Chairman, but I have another point to make. I do not disagree with the minutes, but I am conscious that although they show when a member enters or leaves the Committee room and show which members were present at particular times, Hansard reports do not. Members know the purpose of Hansard. However, Hansard reports do not show whether I was present for something or whether I did not speak or vote. That may be because I was not there or I declined to the opportunity to speak. Given that Hansard indicates certain timings, would it help with clarity if the times at which members enter or leave meetings were recorded in small italics in the Official Report? The reader would then know whether members had been present for particular debates. That is only a suggestion; I am not saying that it must happen.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Hansard lists —

Mr Nesbitt: I have mentioned this matter to officials. That is why I have held back until now.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We can check that matter with the Editor of Debates, Mr Burrowes. Hansard reports include references to the time every 15 minutes. The difficulty is that those must be cross-referenced with the Committee minutes.

Mr Nesbitt: Mr Chairman, one cannot cross-reference those documents.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): One can work out whether a member was in the room when a decision was made.

Mr Nesbitt: I am sorry, Mr Chairman; one cannot do that.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): If you check the minutes, you will see that they list very clearly when members arrive and leave.

Mr Nesbitt: That is correct. For example, the minutes might state that I left the meeting at 11.05 am. However, one cannot detect from Hansard whether I was present for a certain discussion.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We can ask Mr Burrowes to consider that matter.

Mr Nesbitt: I have asked officials about the matter. I hoped that a comment might have been forthcoming this morning.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Obviously, Mr Burrowes will be upstairs, listening to this discussion. He will look into the matter, and we will ask him to come back to the two Chairmen and to make a ruling.

Mr Nesbitt: I am not trying to be awkward, Mr Chairman, I am just trying to ensure that there is clarity on who is present when a discussion takes place.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Members of Hansard staff are present at meetings to list members' names as they speak, so that the voice on the recording matches the name in the record. Are members content that we seek clarification on that matter?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Members will have a copy of a letter received from the Northern Ireland Human Rights Consortium. In the letter, the Human Rights Consortium requests the opportunity to appear before us to make a presentation. I have mentioned the letter now, because there is little sense in discussing a bill of rights and coming back to the letter later.

We have considered calling witnesses, and we took the view that, no matter how valid their relevance to the work of the Committee, if we went down the route of inviting one set of witnesses, inevitably — this being Northern Ireland — within five minutes that information would get out, and people would question why we took evidence from the Human Rights Consortium, but did not take evidence from whomever else. That is the problem that we face.

So far, we have decided not to call witnesses unless a burning issue emerges on which we require further clarification from a group or an individual. However, because of time constraints, and having seen the amount of work that calling witnesses has created for the Subgroup on the Economic Challenges facing Northern Ireland, that has been our position. However, Maggie Beirne has written to us to say that her organisation is keen to appear before us.

What do members feel about that?

Mr Nesbitt: I noted the discussion on that matter in the Hansard report, and the comments that I made last week. There is a distinction to be made between the two statutory bodies — the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission and the Equality Commission, which, as Government agencies, are tasked to deal with those two issues — and other interested groups. I would decouple them from, as you rightly say, a plethora of other interested groups. If we invited one group, where would we stop?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is not the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission that has asked to appear before us; it is the Northern Ireland Human Rights Consortium.

Mr Nesbitt: I am not saying that the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission has asked to appear before us. You raised this issue because Maggie Beirne and Patrick Corrigan asked to appear before us. Mr Chairman, you posed the question: if we invite one of those groups, where do we stop? I am trying to point out the distinction between the Human Rights Commission and the Equality Commission, and the rest of the interested groups.

Ms Lewsley: I wish to clarify that the Human Rights Consortium is an umbrella organisation for the majority of those other groups. It is different from the Human Rights Commission in that it is a self-contained body. Mr Chairman, you have rightly pointed out that, at our last meeting on 4 August, we decided that we would prefer to get on with the work in hand, and then decide whether we wished to call witnesses for any type of evidence or questioning. I propose that we do that.

Mr Poots: I second that.

Mrs Foster: The DUP supports that contention. In her letter, Maggie Beirne clearly makes the point that she has met all the political parties. We are all very aware of the work of the Northern Ireland Human Rights Consortium. Therefore, unless there is some other burning issue to address, we should move on.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The caveat is that, if we feel that we need to go back to any group, we can. Are members content with that position and the decision to advise the Northern Ireland Human Rights Consortium accordingly?

Members indicated assent.

10.15 am

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The next issue is the revised list of rights, which has been broken down into headings. Are members content to proceed on the basis of those headings? I emphasise again that they are in no particular order of priority; the list simply gives us a structure in which we can debate the issues in a rational manner.

Mr McFarland: Chairman, unfortunately I was unable to attend last week, but I see from the Hansard report that the Committee did not carry out the exercise that it did on the other topics that it has covered. That exercise involved giving some thought to issues that could be influenced by decisions that the Committee can make. In its other guises, the Committee decided that there were certain issues that it could flag up and make noises about but, in essence, would have to park either for the Assembly or others to deal with. Would it be worth bearing in mind what effect we can actually have on the matter that is under discussion? We can spend quite a long time going round the houses on lots of interesting stuff without making a difference to anything.

I raise this matter because the agreement was specific about the bill of rights. It might be worthwhile to refresh our memories about what it says in paragraph 4 of “Rights, Safeguards and Equality of Opportunity” before getting into three hours of discussion on issues that do not fall within the agreement, around which the parties here are focusing their discussions. The Prime Minister referred to this, and Peter Robinson is on record as saying that we are here to try to improve and modify the agreement. Clearly, if we get into areas that fall outside that scope, we will be wasting our time. We have two meetings left to get through this enormous list, some of which is extremely complicated, so it would be helpful if we could go through the issues and note those that it is possible to deal with and those that it is not.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I do not think that there is any great disagreement about the parties’ desire to have a bill of rights. Looking at the submissions, everyone is agreed on that.

Mr McFarland: May I read what the agreement says, Chairman? It states:

“The new Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission...will be invited to consult and to advise on the scope for defining, in Westminster legislation, rights supplementary to those in the European Convention on Human Rights, to reflect the particular circumstances of Northern Ireland”.

That is a fairly clear definition of what we should be looking for in a bill of rights. It attempts to define the rights, specific to Northern Ireland, which are not enshrined in law. Previously, we discussed the wish of the Human Rights Consortium and others to include socio-economic rights — healthcare, and so on — in the bill of rights, but that is outwith the agreement. This Committee is about preparation for Government, about getting the Assembly up and running. However nice it might be to examine, in the future, whether the agreement got it wrong, the fact is that this is a wide topic. As colleagues have pointed out, if we start taking evidence from all the parties here and all the groups that believe that they should have the right to medical care, regardless of cost, we would be into a long and protracted discussion.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is a valid point. However, as I found when chairing the discussions on the institutions, any issues that are major impediments to devolution for one or more of the parties were parked, to be dealt with at a later stage.

There are issues on which parties disagreed but felt could be resolved after devolution. There are minor issues on which the parties agreed; indeed, all the parties have agreed on issues that we thought would be impediments. The Committee is agreed that there should be a bill of rights. There may be some argument as to its content; however, this is not the vehicle in which to discuss the contents. However, no member has stated that the omission of a certain issue in a bill of rights is a major impediment to devolution.

Mr McFarland: Absolutely. I wanted to clarify that up front, rather than spend three hours discussing it.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The proposed format is to allow each party a couple of minutes to outline its major concerns on each of the three headings, and then open up the discussion. Each party submission raised issue. No one party highlighted a bill of rights as a major issue.

Mr Poots: Mr Chairman, some members seem to think that they can discuss everything but the items listed on the agenda.

You asked whether members were satisfied with the headings. The third heading is listed as “Dealing with the Past and its Legacy”. It should be “the Past and its Legacy”, with the subheading “Dealing with the Past and its Legacy”.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I did not hear any objections to the list, but Mr Poots has raised that amendment to the headings.

Mr Poots: That is how it is referred to in Hansard.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The heading is “the Past and its Legacy”, with a subheading of “Dealing with the Past and its Legacy”.

Ms Lewsley: The heading is wrong.

Mrs Foster: It is on page 14 of Hansard of 4 August 2006.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I was present for that discussion. Mr Poots is correct. However, it does not greatly change the thrust of our discussion. Before we move to the substantive debate, are there any other problems with the headings? Again, no reasonable issue will be excluded because it is not included on the list.

Alan is right; we could spend a long time discussing the bill of rights. However, that will not make much practical difference to whether we discuss the more difficult issues.

Mrs Long: Can we be clear? My understanding is that today’s discussion would be on rights and safeguards, which some parties have already specified that they wish to discuss. Thus far, the procedure has been that if a member specified an issue for discussion, we discussed it. The second issue is human rights and the third is parades. Those three subjects form today’s agenda. To cut short the discussion on the bill of rights and human rights does not actually progress the Committee, because those were the subjects for discussion today.

Mr Nesbitt: I note, and concur with, what Naomi has said. She summarised correctly that it was agreed at the last meeting that one meeting would be spent discussing each issue. I am also very conscious that everyone around this table, and elsewhere, emphasises the importance of equality and human rights to democracy. To give a two-minute presentation, and to say that we must get through the issues, would demean those issues. We are supposed to be spending time dealing with those matters. I am here to spend some time, not two minutes, giving my views.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I did not make it clear. Each party will give a presentation, and then we will have an open discussion. The presentations are simply to start the ball rolling and to set the scene for the bill of rights. Any subsequent discussion will be open-ended, and members can discuss the topics for as long as they like.

I was making the point that, further to Alan’s comments, this issue may not be a major impediment to progress because there is general agreement that there should be a bill of rights. There may be arguments as to the content, but there is not much disagreement as to whether there should be a bill of rights.

Ms Lewsley: The time is now 10.25 am, and we have not even started the business. Naomi and other members are correct: we have an agenda, which I want to start. Many members will agree that we should not get into huge amounts of detail today. Hopefully, this discussion will glean some consensus and agreement on the way forward and how we progress that. We can consider the detail at a future date. I just want to get started.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The normal procedure is to take the parties in alphabetical order, which means that the Alliance Party will start.

Mr Nesbitt: I agree with Patricia that we should get started, but she said that we would consider the detail at a future date. When will that be?

Ms Lewsley: That needs to be agreed.

Mr Nesbitt: We have four issues to discuss and four meetings in which to discuss them. That will take us into September. On which future date will we consider rights and safeguards?

Ms Lewsley: That can be agreed during the discussion today.

Lord Morrow: This is just a scoping exercise.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): In the other formats of the Committee, we have discovered that certain issues can be resolved without the need for future debate. There are also one or two thorny issues on which we disagreed and to which we will have to return. Until we have the discussion, we will not know whether a bill of rights falls into one category or the other. The number of issues that we thought would be difficult, but on which we have agreed, has been surprising. To allow everyone a chance to speak, we will not limit the discussion.

It is unfortunate that Naomi always ends up going first.

Mrs Long: That is not unfortunate at all.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Naomi, could you start and give us a general overview.

Mrs Long: May I seek clarification? Are we to make a presentation on all three topics — a bill of rights, human rights and parades?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): No, we will deal with the three issues separately.

Mrs Long: The Alliance Party does not make a distinction between human rights and a bill of rights. We will address the two issues together.

The Alliance Party has been a long-standing supporter of human rights and supports the introduction of a bill of rights for Northern Ireland. The incorporation of the European Convention on Human Rights into domestic law, through the Human Rights Act 1998, went a long way to addressing human rights needs. However, the Act was drafted in 1948 and deals only with civil and political rights. Since then, several European and international conventions have been drawn up that deal with economic and social rights and the rights of persons belonging to minorities. The British and Irish Governments are signatories to those conventions. Those social and economic rights, and the rights of persons belonging to minorities, must be addressed. Therefore, the Alliance Party supports the creation of a Northern Ireland bill of rights, which should draw, to a large extent, on the relevant and appropriate sections of the European and international conventions.

There will be further debate on whether the mandate of the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission, which stems from the Good Friday Agreement, extends to advising the Secretary of State on the scope of a bill of rights and the drafting of that bill. We want to put on record that we support the Commission's interpretation that its mandate does extend that far.

The Alliance Party supports a round-table forum of political parties and civil society to engage in the process of drafting a bill of rights. However, we want to ensure that such a forum would not detract from the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission's role as the primary body advising the Secretary of State. The forum would market-test the current thinking of the Human Rights Commission and look for ideas during the drafting and consultation process rather than try to draft a bill of human rights from first principles.

We want to reiterate a point that we made in our opening submission: we believe in rights for individuals rather than group rights. We support economic and social rights and rights for persons belonging to national minorities, provided they are framed in terms of the individual. Any such protections — that is those associated with persons belonging to national minorities — must be multi-directional and not applied to one section of society only.

We are opposed to any explicit rights for unionism or nationalism. We are also opposed to any form of wording that would entrench a vague notion of parity of esteem and further institutionalise sectarianism. International norms also recognise the right of people not to be treated as part of a minority against their will, and that is an important right.

We support a draft bill of rights that focuses primarily on general principles, the interpretation of which should be a matter for the courts.

During our discussions on this Committee, we should not try to delve into those issues in too much detail or negotiate individual aspects of what should, and should not, be included in a bill of rights. If we could agree the nature of a round-table forum, and its relationship with the Human Rights Commission, and so forth, we could make a useful contribution to the process. However, the actual drafting of a bill of rights should be left to the commission.

10.30 am

The Good Friday Agreement envisaged that an all-Ireland charter on human rights, which has been subject to consultation, would be developed by the Northern and Southern human rights commissions. The Alliance Party sees the charter as a means of ensuring a similar high standard of protection in both jurisdictions — not as a dissolution of national sovereignty, which would be contrary to the Good Friday Agreement and the principles enshrined within it.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Thank you, Naomi. That was an interesting point; Naomi decided to take the bill of rights and human rights as one topic. Members seem to be content to take them together. Obviously there is a huge overlap, so it would save time to deal with them simultaneously.

Mr Nesbitt: Chairman, I wish to decouple them, but it does not really matter.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Will you agree to debate them in tandem?

Mr Nesbitt: Yes.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The DUP will now address the issue.

Mrs Foster: The human rights remit was set out in the Belfast Agreement of 1998 and the joint declaration of April 2003 extended that remit. The development of the NIHRC's proposal for a round-table forum comes from annex 3 on page 20 of the latter. The DUP believes that the NIHRC has exceeded its remit on a number of occasions and intends to exceed it when it comes to the bill of rights.

The bill of rights should be confined to those areas of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) that do not reflect adequately Northern Ireland's specific circumstances. In response to your question, Chairman, the DUP is indeed in favour of a bill of rights for Northern Ireland, but only in relation to that narrow remit. That remit has been vastly exceeded to date, and people are still trying to push the boundaries.

The terms of reference cover matters that are of special concern to Northern Ireland, but lengthy consultation by the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission has sought again and again to draw that out.

The DUP has spoken to the Human Rights Consortium and other groups that raise the issue of economic and social rights. Clearly, many of the groups within the consortium have issues that need to be addressed. We have said that on many occasions, but we do not believe that the bill of rights is the correct vehicle for dealing with those issues. Issues such as the healthcare system should be tackled through legislation before the Assembly. Although it would be remiss not to point out that the cost of social and economic rights is a huge issue, it is not an overriding factor. The DUP believes that the best place for those rights to be outlined is in ordinary legislation.

The proposed round-table forum has not been established to date. The DUP met with Minister Hanson several times to discuss the modalities of that forum, but there has not been any agreement. Agreement will be very difficult to achieve, given the history of unionism and its engagement with the human-rights agenda. I have long argued that the unionist community has nothing to fear and everything to gain from human rights. However, because of our history, human rights are seen, regrettably, as a nationalist issue. Work must be done to build confidence and a sense of ownership of human rights. If, when it does come about, the round-table forum can help to build that confidence, that would be most welcome.

The DUP as a party continues to have fundamental concerns about the Human Rights Commission and its composition.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Sinn Féin will now address the issue.

Mr Ferguson: The Human Rights Commission's remit for consulting and providing advice on a bill of rights for the Six Counties is in paragraph 4 on page 16 of the Good Friday Agreement. I restate that, as it will always be our reference point. I welcome confirmation from the other members that that will also be their starting-point.

In Sinn Féin's opinion, however, the first Human Rights Commission failed on several levels to present to the general public a non-partisan rights-based approach to the more sensitive conflict-related issues that require safeguards in any bill of rights. That failure has led to hostility, suspicion and political polarisation on several key issues. For example, the commission made a dangerous attempt to dilute long-established safeguards contained in equality of opportunity legislation, such as community-designation monitoring

Another example was the Human Rights Commission's attempt to undermine the status of the Irish language, which is protected under the EU Framework Directive and the Good Friday Agreement. Furthermore, the Human Rights Commission has failed to provide clear direction on rights to reflect parity of esteem and the principles of mutual respect for the identity and ethos of both communities, as contained in the Good Friday Agreement.

Those criticisms aside, and in the hope that we can progress to a more substantive bill of rights enshrined in law, Sinn Féin acknowledges the sterling educational and outreach work that the first commission did to raise awareness of rights in general.

However, the bill of rights has, sadly, been in hibernation, and the team working on it is nowhere near bringing to a conclusion its advice to the British Secretary of State before the bill can enter the legislative process at Westminster. Sinn Féin therefore recommends that the bill of rights be progressed by means of the establishment of the round-table forum by the autumn. I welcome the fact that the Human Rights Consortium also referenced the need for the round-table forum to be established. Sinn Féin reinforces that by stating that an internationally appointed person must chair the forum.

Both Governments and four parties at this table have agreed to the establishment of the round-table forum, which should engage in an open, transparent and wide-ranging grass-roots consultation process with civic society and the political parties. Sinn Féin recommends that the two Governments consult with established human rights bodies on potential chairpersons for the round-table forum.

The two Governments must conduct a short, sharp consultation process with representatives of civic society to determine who will be their representatives at the round-table forum. It is also important that recommendations emanating from the forum be given due weight when the Human Rights Commission formulates its advice to the Secretary of State on the content of the bill of rights. The bill of rights must be as strong as possible and include, at its heart, a robust commitment to social and economic justice. The bill of rights must be placed in the legislative process at the earliest possible date, and it must be a document of enforcement, not of aspiration.

Ms Lewsley: I welcome the opportunity to contribute to today's debate, which represents a step forward. The Committee may not have a round table, but all parties are sitting around an oblong table and discussing the issue, and that is important.

I want to point out at the beginning of my presentation, as I did at our previous meeting on 4 August, that I hope that any decisions that the Committee makes do not become preconditions to restoration. The SDLP, like many other parties, wants to see the best possible bill of rights for Northern Ireland, one in which not only political rights but socio-economic rights are reflected.

Above all, the SDLP wants a bill of rights that everyone in Northern Ireland can buy into, so that the rights are not solely for nationalists or for unionists but for every single individual who lives in Northern Ireland today.

The best way in which to reach agreement on a bill of rights is through a round-table forum that involves political parties and civic society. The chairperson of the forum should be a person of international standing, appointed by the two Governments and should be able to choose his or her own independent secretariat. The round-table forum should report its findings to the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission, which in turn should report to the Secretary of State. The Human Rights Commission could also, at the request of the chairperson, contribute to the round-table discussions.

Finally, the round-table forum should get under way without delay, and its establishment should not depend on restoration.

As Arlene Foster said, that was agreed some time ago in the Good Friday Agreement and in the comprehensive agreement. Like the DUP, the SDLP has made numerous representations to Minister Hanson, and to Minister Spellar before him, to get round-table discussions up and running.

The SDLP believes that the Human Rights Commission has made a vital contribution to rights in Northern Ireland. When it was first set up, the Human Rights Commission launched a consultation on a proposed bill of rights. It has a role to play, but that role should be an independent one, separate from the round-table forum. However, as I said previously, it could be called to appear before the forum.

In a wider context, the SDLP would like not just a bill of rights for Northern Ireland, but an all-Ireland charter of rights. We want the devolved Administration to human-rights proof its policies in future. It is also important that the Administration engage with the Human Rights Commission and work with it to ensure that policies are human-rights proofed in all the Departments.

I have outlined the SDLP's main issues. Alban will deal with the parades issue.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Parades will be dealt with separately. It will be a slightly more contentious issue.

Mr Nesbitt: I welcome this opportunity for the main parties in the Assembly to have a lengthy discussion about rights and, in particular, a bill of rights. I will have more to say later on a bill of rights, but, Chairman, I will subscribe to your guidance that we should take only a few minutes for our introduction. I will deal only with definitions now, and I will give a further explanation of our position later.

It is clear from the agreement that we are to have rights supplementary to those in the ECHR, and that those rights will reflect the particular circumstances of Northern Ireland. One discrete sentence in the agreement outlines these additional rights, which are:

“to reflect... the identity and ethos of both communities and parity of esteem”.

Naomi Long mentioned international norms, and I agree with that comment.

I am very clear about the definition of identity. It is one's culture, language, education and religion. Article 5 of the Council of Europe's Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities describes it as such. I am also clear about what ethos means. It is defined as the attitudes, aspirations and feelings of a community. Culture is one's customs and social behaviour. Parity of esteem means that people are given equal respect. Thus, I am very clear what a bill of rights is, as stated in the agreement. I am clear that equality of treatment in identity and ethos is also covered. The agreement also refers to equality of opportunity, which is dealt with by the Equality Commission.

It is clear what a bill of rights should be. I note that the Alliance Party, the SDLP and others have stated that they wish to support economic and social rights. I will deal with that matter in due course. I will give one quotation at this juncture. I will not give unionist quotations in the hope that I will not be seen as being biased. The Forum for Peace and Reconciliation, which the Irish Government established in 1994, asked for various papers to be commissioned. Nothing has changed since then, but Prof Boyle, Prof Campbell and Prof Hadden made a submission to the Forum for Peace and Reconciliation. Those of us who are old enough will remember that Prof Boyle is Kevin Boyle of the former civil rights movement.

10.45 am

That submission made it clear that any bill of rights for Northern Ireland should include provisions to ensure that communal rights are guaranteed. They suggested incorporating the major provisions of the Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities into a bill of rights. I support that position, and I have written to that effect on numerous occasions. A bill of rights for Northern Ireland should be based on what is contained in the ECHR and in the Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Once again, I thank everyone for being so succinct. The presentations have been easy to chair. Five members have set scenes. I do not detect any great dissension — it is more the minutiae on which members are homing in. Several parties referred to their impatience with the delay in the establishment of a round-table forum to consider a bill of rights. Do we have a proposal to advance that?

Ms Lewsley: I should have said that the SDLP proposes that. There is consensus that members want a bill of rights, and the best way in which to achieve that is to set up a round-table forum, made up of political parties and members of civic society. Therefore I propose that we do that.

Mr Ferguson: I second that proposal.

If we are to get any dynamic into this process, a round-table forum must be set up by the autumn. We should not delay any longer. Such a forum will offer an opportunity for members to get widespread grass-roots involvement in consultation on the need for a bill of rights, and on human rights in general. We must do that as expeditiously as possible.

I welcome my UUP colleague's constant references to the ECHR. That should be taken as a minimum standard, but we must put the strongest bill of rights in place. We should not be prescriptive by implying that, if it is not in the ECHR, we should not accept it.

Ms Lewsley: On a point of information, Mr Chairman. Are we not trying to agree on a proposal before we discuss the detail? Perhaps I am wrong.

Mr Ferguson: I think you are wrong. It is usually useful to ask the member to give way.

Ms Lewsley: I did ask.

Mr Ferguson: I did not give way.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Committee protocol is that members normally give way on a point of information, and that certainly was a point of information.

Mr Ferguson: I was in full flow.

Mr Nesbitt: Will Mr Ferguson take a question before we come to the proposal?

Mr Ferguson: Yes.

Mr Nesbitt: He said that if something is not included in the ECHR, that does not mean that we should not include it, or words to that effect. In other words, he is being wide ranging.

On numerous occasions, Sinn Féin has referred to international law. Only recently, Bairbre de Brún referred to it. Mr Ferguson's party referred to the requirement for Israel to abide by international law; Dermot Ahern and Tony Blair talk about abiding by it; and Mrs Long talked about abiding by it this morning. Last week, I said that this debate we must have rigour and structure, so my question to Sinn Féin is simple: does it wish to abide by the rules of international law?

Mr Ferguson: Sinn Féin supports the European Convention on Human Rights.

Mr Nesbitt: I asked a simpler question than that.

Mr Ferguson: I am sure that the member did, but let me finish. My issue with what he said is simple: we should not use the ECHR to prescribe or redevelop our bill of rights. The ECHR is the minimum standard. One advantage in setting up a round-table forum here is, I hope, that it will let the grass roots on this island, North and South, develop a bill of rights that is stronger than the rights that are enshrined in European law. The simple answer to your question is yes, but it should not prescribe what we do.

Mr Nesbitt: Does Sinn Féin believe in subscribing to international law or not? It is quite a simple question to answer. I am prepared to subscribe to international law.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Let Mr Ferguson answer that. Mrs Long has been quite patient.

Mr Ferguson: I thought that I did answer it. I said that, although we welcome the ECHR and accept its recommendations, it does not go far enough. It will not restrict either the debate that we, or the public, will have. We should not be constrained by a minimal framework.

Mrs Long: There are a couple of issues. The Alliance Party agrees with Ms Lewsley's proposal that a round-table forum be set up. We may need to explore other issues if that is the starting point; for example, the structuring and chairing of the forum. It must be chaired by someone of international standing, although not necessarily by an outsider. It could be chaired by a local person of international standing. So the proposal needs to be qualified. However, the forum does require that kind of leadership.

The relationship between the round-table forum and the Human Rights Commission should be looked at closely. It would be good to explore people's views on the roles of those two bodies. An independent secretariat is needed to service the round-table forum. There are other issues to be explored, but, in principle, my party agrees that a round-table forum should be set up.

Mrs Foster: My party agrees that there should be a bill of rights for Northern Ireland, based on its rigid and particular circumstances. It is rich for members to talk about adopting a maximum approach. Although I am not an advocate of the Belfast Agreement, it is clear about what is to be included in a bill of rights. Sinn Féin is glad to move away from the Belfast Agreement when it suits it. The Belfast Agreement and the joint declaration mention Northern Ireland's particular circumstances. That is where we believe the debate should be.

Although my party can join the consensus that there should be a Northern Ireland bill of rights, it cannot, at this stage, agree that a round-table discussion should be set up. That is because of the way in which discussion on human rights has taken place since 1998. My party believes that the bill of rights will be subject to a cross-community vote in the Assembly, and therefore a round-table forum is not the way in which to proceed at present.

There is no point in a round-table discussion until the Assembly is restored and until we see where we are with it. That is the DUP position.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): May I check that with you? In earlier comments, you indicated impatience that the forum had not been set up.

Mrs Foster: No, I did not. I said that my party has had discussions with the Human Rights Consortium, on the round-table forum. I said we had met Minister Hanson but that we had difficulties with the chairing and composition of that forum. Check Hansard on that. My party's position is that the round-table forum should not be set up until the Assembly is restored.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I will. What is the Ulster Unionist position?

Mr Nesbitt: I refer specifically to the round-table forum. My party leader and I met with David Hanson. We met also with the Human Rights Commission and discussed the matter. My party's position is clear. It is not opposed to a round-table forum, but it is mindful of the contribution that that could or could not make. We have severe reservations.

My party does not cherry-pick the Belfast Agreement or international law. We subscribe to international law and to the tenets of the agreement. Every party around this table subscribes to the fundamentals of the agreement. It clearly states that there should be a bill of rights for Northern Ireland.

To have a round-table forum would prolong the process. The Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission said in September 2001 that it had been working on a bill of rights since 1999. It then said it would be giving its advice to the Government in early 2002. Therefore, we have been working on a bill of rights for six years, yet we have merely scoped what should and should not be included in it.

We received a letter from David Hanson on 28 December 2005. All the other parties received that letter. We should all be accountable, and it is good that this quotation from his letter will be recorded and will be available on the Internet. David Hanson wrote to my party leader, and I presume that he wrote to the other party leaders. He said:

"The Commission plans to prepare advice during the first part of 2006, share that advice with shareholders in June and then forward its final advice to the Secretary of State in September 2006."

When I put that statement from David Hanson — who is responsible for the bill of rights — in the context of where we are now in August 2006, it is no wonder that people are a little bit disillusioned.

I even refer to the British-Irish Intergovernmental Conference report of 25 July 2006, in which a round-table forum for the bill of rights was considered in a rather nebulous comment:

"Prospects ... on the establishment of a roundtable forum ... were reviewed."

In Civil Service parlance, "were reviewed" could mean anything under the sun.

We have a difficulty here. Our party is clear. We know what should be included in a bill of rights — and we know what that means grammatically. We are not opposed to rights. I have not yet spoken on economic and social rights, but I will come to those.

We are conscious that six or seven years after the agreement, the scope for a bill of rights has not been put to the Government. One reason for that is that the Human Rights Commission went way beyond its remit.

Now we plan to have a round-table forum. When we met with the Minister in January, he was talking about the forum meeting in September. We asked him why he was waiting until September. Do not ask me why, because he is the only person who can say why, in January, he was waiting until September to have a round-table forum. It is no wonder that we are behind: the Human Rights Commission cannot stick to its remit, and we have to have a round-table forum, which will only elongate an unnecessary process. The process should have been much clearer and simpler, and that could have and should have been done sooner.

I hope that I am making myself clear. I do not oppose a round-table forum in principle, but I do not see the benefits of drawing the process out.

Ms Lewsley: I am getting confused. Is Mr Nesbitt asking why we have to wait until September for a bill of rights, or does he mean a round-table forum?

Mr Nesbitt: I mean waiting until September for a round-table forum.

Ms Lewsley: He is saying why wait until September for a round-table forum, but he has just said that he does not agree with a round-table forum.

Mr Nesbitt: I did not say that. I said that we are not advocating a round-table forum. We do not see merit in it because a bill of rights is simple. We are looking at scoping it. We have already taken more than seven years since early 1999, so why elongate a simple process that could be dealt with easily.

In January, all we asked Minister Hanson was to tell us why, when he was suggesting a round-table forum, would he wait until September to form it?

Ms Lewsley: Does the UUP support a round-table forum?

Mr Nesbitt: If one is formed, the UUP shall participate, because it believes in advocating its case. It does not advocate a round-table forum, but it shall participate in one.

11.00 am

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Nesbitt, are you saying that if we seek consensus on this matter, the UUP would support a round-table forum?

Mr Nesbitt: No. We do not see the need for a round-table forum, and we will not support one. However, if the Minister uses his authority to form such a forum, we will participate; we will not abstain. I hope that I have made that clear.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do you wish to make any specific proposal on that matter?

Mr Nesbitt: I have no specific proposal to make on a round-table forum.

Mrs Long: On several occasions, it has been stated that the context for work on a bill of rights is the framework that is set out in the Good Friday Agreement. Now, the interpretation seems to be that to claim that one is a supporter of the Good Friday Agreement, one must agree with its every dot and comma. A similar debate took place at the PFG Committee dealing with the institutions. Both the Alliance Party and the DUP argued that, if one takes that view, there is no discussion to be had on, for example, institutional matters. Rather, we should discuss the potential for improvement within the confines of the principles established in the agreement.

Any suggestion that there is no discussion to be had on a bill of rights and how it is framed, because it is framed in a particular way in the Good Friday Agreement, does not reflect the wording of the agreement, which states that the Human Rights Commission:

“will be invited to consult and to advise on the scope for defining, in Westminster legislation, rights supplementary to those in the European Convention on Human Rights, to reflect the particular circumstances of Northern Ireland, drawing as appropriate on international instruments and experience.”

As part of that consultation and advisory process, the commission may decide that, for example, its terms of reference be reconsidered. After consultation, the commission may advise that issues concerning language and how those rights are structured be rethought.

The definition of the commission’s job is quite clear. However, after consultation has taken place, advice that is given at that point is not open to interpretation simply by examining the terms of reference. Therefore, we must be very careful.

Our view on human rights and our support for the round-table forum is clear. We believe that it is important that those matters be properly enshrined. However, we have concerns about the language that is used about the ethos and identity of “both communities”. We ask how that sits with those who are not members of the two main communities. We ask also how that sits when considering international norms and the rights of persons who associate themselves with national minorities. There is a difference.

We have stated also our position on the right of people not to associate themselves with national minorities. We must consider that matter very carefully, and I suspect that the issue is not as simple as some members are painting it to be. We must engage in much deep discussion, particularly in the context of the changing situation in a Northern Ireland, in which we have ethnic-minority groups, mixed marriages, and those who dissent and prefer to identify themselves in a more pluralistic way. It is their right to do that. We must look at the way in which the matter will be framed. It is not as simple as stating that there is no work to be done.

Mr Ferguson: Thank you, Mr Chairman. In my opening remarks on 4 August, I said that we must not hold human rights or a bill of rights to ransom. Patricia Lewsley referred to that earlier. Progress on those issues should not be subject to the restoration of the institutions. Comments by Edwin Poots and his party colleagues imply that, because they are prepared to hold the country to ransom by not nominating to the institutions or supporting the restoration of those institutions, the human rights of, and a bill of rights for, the rest of the country, North and South, should be held to ransom as well. That is a matter of concern. My colleagues from the UUP have said that they will not openly support the round-table forum, but that they will not openly oppose it either. Therefore, both Governments and four parties have agreed to promote a round-table forum.

If that is the case, we need to progress it. Anyone who does not support that will simply be holding the work on human rights and bill of rights to ransom in the same way that the DUP is holding the country to ransom over the institutions.

Ms Lewsley: I would like clarification on some points. My understanding of what Arlene said is that, unlike the UUP, the DUP is supportive of round-table discussions but has an issue about the timing.

Mrs Foster: We do not believe that round-table discussions should be held in a vacuum. The institutions need to be up and running. There is no point in having a discussion on human rights when the matter has to come back to the Assembly and be subject to a cross-community vote. The other concern that we have, and we have communicated this to the Human Rights Consortium, is that it would be a round-table forum stacked heavily with human rights “experts” and that the majority of its members would not be those people — politicians — who make the decisions.

Ms Lewsley: In principle, though, the DUP is supportive of a round-table-forum?

Mrs Foster: I do not have the authority to answer that today. I have set out the problems that the DUP sees with it. The discussion should move on to the matter of cross-community support for a Northern Ireland bill of rights. In an attempt to get some kind of consensus, I can confirm that the DUP agrees that there should be a bill of rights. How we get to that stage is a matter that can be discussed later.

Ms Lewsley: Dermot Nesbitt has made his party’s position clear on the issue of round-table discussions. He mentioned also the six years of debate about the bill of rights and the problem of trying to get consensus among the political parties. We were worried, for instance, that the British Government would introduce a watered-down version that would not do a lot for the people of Northern Ireland.

At this stage, Chairman, I would like to change my original proposal and, perhaps, break it into two. As I said, it is great that all five parties are around this oblong table, talking about a bill of rights. I propose, first, that we support a bill of rights and, secondly, that we support a round-table forum.

Mr Nesbitt: First of all, in reply to Ms Lewsley’s asking whether there is any difference between the DUP and the Ulster Unionists, I say with a smile, “Good try, Patricia”. There is no substantial difference in unionism on that level. I am not speaking on behalf of the DUP, nor could I even begin to.

Mrs Foster: Please do not.

Mr Nesbitt: However, I make this point seriously: unionism sees the need for a bill of rights; unionism is not opposed to rights. I believe that people should have economic and social rights. Also, as a grandparent, I believe that children should be protected, but that does not mean that children’s rights should be included in the bill of rights. Unionism’s position does not mean that it is opposed to rights; it is not.

I repeat my party’s position that, for various reasons, it does not advocate a round-table forum. Such an approach would prolong the issue. Arlene cannot comment for her party now, but no doubt she will do at some point. I do not say that to be provocative, and I mean that. However, if there is a round-table forum, the UUP will participate. It does not absent itself from the issues.

I shall address Naomi’s comments. First, she mentioned every dot and comma of the agreement. This is not a dot-or-comma issue — it is a substantive matter about what should be contained in the terms of reference for a bill of rights. Indeed, because there has been political disagreement and people have tried to go beyond the scope of the agreement, six years down the line, there is still no bill of rights. As Patricia rightly said, we could not agree.

Secondly, Naomi questioned whether there was any use in discussing institutional matters. The discussion on institutional matters came from the comprehensive agreement of December 2004, which came from the Belfast Agreement, which said that the operation of the institutions would be reviewed. The Belfast Agreement provided for a review of the operations of the institutions. Therefore, a review of the institutional matters, the operations of the agreement and accountability of Ministers has already been agreed. It is not correct to say that discussing institutional matters is beyond the terms of the Belfast Agreement because that agreement provided for a review of institutional matters.

Naomi said also that it was incorrect to say that there is no work to be done. I am not saying that. All I said was that the issues that must be addressed are very clear. Let us address them, and move to other subjects.

I shall comment on economic rights later.

Michael Ferguson made the point that if the Committee does not make progress, it will hold up the process. I do not want to hold up the process; I have never wanted to do that. We have constantly advocated that the Government and the Human Rights Commission address this issue as it should have been addressed long ago. We are not holding up progress; it is those who wish to interpret the agreement in a different sense who are holding up progress.

Mr A Maginness: I shall make some general comments. A specific proposal has been put forward. We should make a decision on that, rather than continuing a rather elongated, and probably very academic debate, about the content of a bill of rights. That does not serve any great purpose.

There is clearly a difference of political opinion as to the contents of a bill of rights. The question of its content can be resolved in the future. The proposed round-table forum is a mechanism for doing that. When the forum takes place is, again, a matter for debate. However, we will not resolve whether political rights alone are covered in the bill or whether social and economic rights will be included. There is a clear difference of political opinion on that. That will not be resolved today and, even if we spent the next number of days on it, we would not resolve it.

For the sake of progressing our business, therefore, we should make a decision on the proposal. There appears to be general support for it. Arlene has indicated that she will require a further understanding from her party on the proposal, which is fair enough. Nobody objects to that, but there is no point in prolonging the debate on issues that have clearly been established.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is a very valid point, Mr Maginness. The next members to speak are Mr Ferguson, Mr Poots, Mrs Long and Ms Lewsley. Given that nobody has opposed Ms Lewsley's proposal to accept the concept of a bill of rights in principle, if we could reach agreement on that, those members could address the problems that some parties have with the round-table forum, and we could try to reach consensus on that.

Is everyone content with Ms Lewsley's proposal, supported by Mrs Foster, that the Committee supports the creation of a bill of rights for Northern Ireland? Is there any dissension?

11.15 am

Lord Morrow: There was no dissension before we started. [Laughter.]

Mrs Long: Perhaps we could create some dissension by talking about the issue a bit more.

Ms Lewsley: I think that that is why we are trying to cut the debate short.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It was insisted that we air the subject.

Lord Morrow: Perhaps you were hoping that dissension would arise.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I hope that dissension does not arise while I am in the Chair.

Do members accept in principle that Northern Ireland should have a bill of rights?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will now move on to the second proposal, which is that the Committee supports the formation of a round-table forum to help to establish a bill of rights. The main issue seems to be the timing rather than the principle.

Mr Ferguson: I want to pick up on something that Patricia said about the timing issue. I am at a loss as to know why Patricia wants to split hairs and reframe the proposal. The only outcome would be that, on paper, the five parties agreed to a round-table forum.

Ms Lewsley: I did not split the proposal about the round-table forum. I put the bill-of-rights proposal and the round-table-forum proposal together.

Mr Ferguson: I do not mind that we have on record that all five parties agreed to that. Like Alasdair —

Ms Lewsley: Do you mean Alban?

Mr Ferguson: Gabh mo leithscéal. Like Alban, I want to progress the proposal that we agree to the round-table forum meeting either this November or as expeditiously as possible.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is a pretty specific proposal.

Mr Poots: I want to respond to earlier comments made by Michael Ferguson about holding up the process. It is not my colleagues who are engaging in criminal activity and pumping acid from diesel laundering into our rivers and streams. It was not my colleagues who murdered Denis Donaldson, and it is certainly not my colleagues who are holding up the process. It is the criminal terrorists in the IRA who are holding up the process by not going away.

Mr Ferguson: I ask my colleague to allow me to respond to that. It would be remiss of me to sit here and allow a member to suggest that I am in any way associated with any form of criminality. That is offensive, and I want that to be noted as a matter of record. I ask the member to desist from making such correlations in his contributions.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I am pretty certain that Mr Poots did not name any individual.

Mr Ferguson: That may be so, but his remarks are offensive, unacceptable and disrespectful.

Mr Poots: The fact that the IRA still exists is offensive. As I understand it, both Sinn Féin and the IRA are part of the republican movement. No one has denied that in the past. If Mr Ferguson were to consult his leader, perhaps he would explain the republican movement to him. The paramilitary wing of the republican movement must disappear if we are to make progress by November.

We will not progress a bill of rights in a vacuum. A bill of rights for Northern Ireland needs the support of both communities, and the only way to identify that support is through the parties and an active, working Assembly. However, the DUP is not holding up the process; the paramilitaries, who will not go away and leave the people of Northern Ireland alone, are doing that. One party in the Assembly, which aims to get into Government, is associated closely with that paramilitary organisation; they are the people who are holding up the process.

Mrs Long: May I respond briefly to Dermot's interpretation of my comments? When I made my dot-and-comma comment, it was not to suggest that it was not a substantive point. It was simply to say that it was established in other meetings that we are not confined to discussing these issues only in the context of the Good Friday Agreement. For instance, we have discussed alternative institutional arrangements and the devolution of policing and justice in much more detail than the Good Friday Agreement ever did.

We should not become prescriptive; we should allow parties to raise the issues that they wish to at these sessions. If consensus cannot be achieved, it will be on the record. However, the right to raise issues remains. It would be a backward step to remove that right from the Committee.

Mr Nesbitt: Will you take a point of information?

Mrs Long: I will.

Mr Nesbitt: I am glad that you have clarified that your dot-and-comma comment referred to a substantive issue. The phrase "dot and comma" implies minutiae of detail, as distinct from substantive issues.

You talk about the devolution of policing and justice. Of course, we can refer to the agreement; it is clear that that is open to discussion, as are the institutional arrangements. However, the agreement is grammatically specific as to what the bill of rights should contain.

Mrs Long: What is specific are the issues on which the Human Rights Commission is to consult and advise. The extent to which its advice and consultation may change the general context is not specified. That is a reality of consultation.

Mr Nesbitt: It is not reality.

Mrs Long: The other issue that you mentioned was the comprehensive agreement, which you outlined in the context of a review of the agreement. The comprehensive agreement went further on the arrangements for a review of the Belfast Agreement than those envisaged in the Belfast Agreement. Government recognised that even within the context of the comprehensive agreement — which was neither comprehensive nor agreed, incidentally —

Mr Nesbitt: Will Mrs Long take another point of information?

Mrs Long: No, I will not. I want to finish my own point before I take anyone else's points.

Government recognised that there were issues that would have come under the review arrangements that were set out in the agreement but which were not dealt with in the comprehensive agreement. At a meeting of the PFG Committee dealing with institutional issues, it was remarked that the discussions in the PFG Committee dealing with rights and safeguards would not completely encompass all the matters that could fall into the review of the agreement. From that perspective, the suggestion emerged that a Committee might be set up to review the institutions. The idea that the two are completely coterminous is nonsense, and that has been established in our previous discussions.

As regards the round-table forum, the Alliance Party believes that, at this point, work could be done to establish the relationship that it would have with the Human Rights Commission and the way in which it would be structured. None of that requires devolution to have been restored. A bill of rights for Northern Ireland should not be a hostage of the political context. It should be allowed to proceed. There is no guarantee of devolution in the autumn.

The Alliance Party still believes that the introduction of a bill of rights is an important matter that must be addressed. We do not see waiting for devolution as a way to progress it. If it must go via the Secretary of State and through Westminster legislation — as would be required anyway — we would be content for that to happen. Our distinct preference is that it should come through a devolved Assembly, but, in either case, we believe that the work must continue.

We support the SDLP's proposal that the round-table forum be set up now as opposed to post-restoration.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There seem to be two proposals. One is that there should be a round-table forum, and the other is that it should meet in November, which is pretty specific.

Lord Morrow: Is that 23 November or 24 November?

Mr Nesbitt: Who is trying to spin it out now?

Ms Lewsley: For the third time, I will say that I believe that even meetings such as today's are a big step. There are five political parties around a table, talking about the issue. We are trying to find consensus on the principle of a round-table forum. My proposal is that we get consensus that we will support a round-table forum.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is important that the DUP come in on this, because it has a difficulty with the timing of the proposal.

Mrs Foster: I am not saying that the DUP will not consent to the SDLP's proposal at a subsequent meeting, but I cannot give its consent today.

Some members seem to think that just because four parties have signed up to something, we will go ahead with it. This is a scoping Committee that works by consensus, and I wish that some members would get with the game.

Naomi has said that we need to start discussing human rights. The DUP will continue to discuss human rights with all relevant parties and to put forward its opinion that the bill of rights should not be the vehicle for all rights, a point that Dermot made too. There are other vehicles for introducing economic and social rights, and the DUP wants to explore those options with some of the interested parties.

Naomi said that the introduction of a bill of rights should not wait until the Assembly is up and running. My response is simply to ask how else could cross-community support for a bill of rights be tested. The best way to test support is in the Assembly. Given the non-engagement of the unionist community with the human rights agenda, a cross-community vote in the Assembly would be vital to testing its acceptability to the entire community, which is what we are striving for.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): After Mr Nesbitt has spoken, we will vote on Ms Lewsley's proposal.

Mr Nesbitt: If I may use the phrase in a different context, there is a clear, inextricable link between establishing a round-table forum and having more substantial rights than those contained in the Belfast Agreement.

In June 2005, the Northern Ireland Human Rights Consortium brought us its proposed bill of rights for Northern Ireland, which said that:

"Such rights were to reflect the particular circumstances of Northern Ireland and, taken together with the European Convention on Human Rights, would constitute a Bill of Rights for Northern Ireland."

Of course, a sentence describing the particular circumstances was cleverly omitted. I even looked to the words of Ann Hope for a definition. On 3 February 2003, when speaking on behalf of the Irish Congress of Trade Unions (ICTU), in answer to why there should be social and economic rights, she said that it was:

"to reflect the particular circumstances of Northern Ireland, as it is charged to do".

Of course, it is charged to deal with the particular circumstances, but Ann Hope omits to define them also. I could go on and on. Amnesty International says exactly the same thing. I leave you with one further comment: the Committee for the Administration of Justice (CAJ) said in the January 2006 issue of its 'Just News' publication that:

"CAJ has long argued that any Bill of Rights for Northern Ireland must protect socio-economic rights on a par with civil and political rights".

I agree that economic and social rights should be protected, but that is different from saying that it must be done through the bill of rights. I draw that distinction, but other parties have not, and some of their phraseology has been mischievous, as they have interpreted "particular circumstances" as meaning any particular circumstances.

Ms Lewsley: May I ask that the vote on my proposal be deferred to a future meeting, not because some members are unwilling to take part, but because their circumstances require them to seek direction from their parties?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Will the DUP be in a position to give a view on Ms Lewsley's proposal next week, Mrs Foster?

Mrs Foster: I hope so, yes.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is that sorted out. We have given the issues of human rights and a bill of rights a good airing.

Mr Nesbitt: We have not, because I wish to talk about social and economic rights. Will we discuss that next week?

The Ulster Unionist Party puts on record its support for economic and social rights as distinct from a bill of rights. I am quite happy not to talk about that now if I can speak on the principle of economic and social rights when we return to the matter next week.

11.30 am

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We have caught the drift that you are in favour of that, because you have mentioned it at least three times.

Mr Nesbitt: Each time I mentioned it, I said that I want to put on record the fact that the UUP is for economic and social rights. This is an important Committee; it is a Committee of record.

Ms Lewsley: With the greatest respect, everyone has raised the issues of a bill of rights and socio-economic rights, but none of us has gone into the detail of what we mean by that. I do not know whether this is the place to open up that whole debate. The proposed forum or a consultation on a bill of rights would give us the opportunity to discuss what we mean by a bill of rights and what it should contain.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I will be in the Chair next Wednesday. Mr Nesbitt, you have my assurance that you can raise the issue then.

Mr Nesbitt: Next Wednesday?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): No, hang on —

Mr Nesbitt: You will not be in the Chair next Friday.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): No; you are right.

Mr Nesbitt: Mr Molloy — dare I say — your partner, will be in the Chair next Friday.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The other Chairman will be in the Chair next Friday. We can contact him to make certain that the matter can be raised.

Mr Nesbitt: I want to make this absolutely clear. The UUP has been pilloried at many forums because of claims that the party is not for various rights. Hansard is covering this Committee, and I wish to put on record the party's position on economic and social rights.

Mr McFarland: My understanding is that we were to first discuss the bill of rights — and we had a good discussion on that — and then move on to human rights. Presumably, it would be possible to raise a number of issues during the discussion on human rights.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I take the view of the parties to my left that there is no point —

Mr A Maginness: There is no point.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There is no point because, until we hear the DUP's view, there will be no consensus on establishing a forum. Arlene is not opposing the proposal — she simply cannot tell us the party's position today. However, she will be able to do so at next week's meeting. The issues that Mr Nesbitt has raised would be better addressed by that forum, if it is to be set up. It is not the Committee's role to deal with those issues.

Ms Lewsley: It is not our place to go into the detail.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Sorry, Mr Ferguson, I did not call you because I thought that if there was no chance of reaching agreement on the general proposal to establish a forum, there would be even less chance of reaching agreement on holding a forum meeting on 22 November. However, if you insist on putting forward your proposal, I will certainly allow you to do so.

Mr Ferguson: I am happy enough for the record to show that I reiterated the importance of holding round-table forum talks. Dermot has been at pains to point out that we have dilly-dallied for over seven years. The Committee is now agreeing to put off the decision for another week, so that we can all agree next week that there should be a bill of rights, but that perhaps it should be introduced in 2010.

Mrs Foster: We have already agreed that there should be a bill of rights.

Mr Ferguson: The problem is that we must get the forum up and running if we are to make progress on the issue.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do you want to put your proposal that a forum be set up by 22 November?

Mr Ferguson: I am happy enough for the record to show that Sinn Féin has requested that.

Mr McFarland: It is worth reminding ourselves that the parties raised issues of concern to them during the past two months' discussions. It was agreed that any issue about which a party had concerns could be put on the list for discussion. It was also agreed that if parties raised an issue belatedly, they could still add it to the list. No party was to be prevented from raising an issue for discussion. Chairman, you were an advocate of that.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Absolutely.

Mr McFarland: I know that other members do not wish to discuss what Mr Nesbitt wishes to discuss, but the Ulster Unionist Party Assembly Group (UUPAG) wishes to have a discussion —

Ms Lewsley: It is not that we do not wish to discuss it; we do, but we just do not feel that this is the appropriate time.

Mr McFarland: However, there have been occasions in the past two months when four of the parties have thought that the fifth was blethering about something about which they should not have been blethering, but we went along with it, because that was the essence of the Committee. [Laughter.]

Ms Lewsley is absolutely right; it is the first time that the five parties have been in a room with the option of discussing any issue that any party wishes to discuss. It has never before been the case that parties have said that another party has no right to raise an issue because the time is not right to do so. I understand that members wish to bring it up. My point is that Mr Nesbitt has made it quite clear that he would like to say something about these issues.

Although we have come around to the bill of rights discussion — and we are on the verge of parking it, which seems sensible to me — there seems to be nothing to stop Dermot — from discussing whatever he wishes under our next topic, which is human rights.

Ms Lewsley: Exactly.

Mr Nesbitt: And I shall.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Throughout the debate, we have moved back and forth from the bill of rights to human rights; therefore, I have taken this debate as being a debate on both subjects.

If Mrs Foster attends the Committee next Friday and says that the DUP is content to have the round-table forum established, the Committee, if it has any sense, will decide that social and economic rights should be discussed at that forum.

Mr McFarland: That is in order, and we are happy with that. However, if Mr Nesbitt —

Mr Nesbitt: I have told you to call me Dermot.

Mr McFarland: If Dermot wishes to say something, and we have never before told a member that he or she cannot say something —

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Nesbitt is correct that I will not be in the Chair next Friday. We are out of sync because I chaired Wednesday's Committee. I will ask the other Chairman to assure Mr Nesbitt that social and economic rights will be raised next week, after Mrs Foster's update on the DUP's position.

Mr Nesbitt: Alan correctly said that no one has been precluded from speaking before on this rubric. I have not always been here, but I will take his word for it.

Body language is important. I am perturbed, as I noticed that when I said, "And I shall", Ms Lewsley gave a big sigh and looked at the clock, as if to say that she does not want to listen to a discussion on the bill of rights and human rights. I find that disturbing.

Ms Lewsley: I am sorry.

Mr Nesbitt: Those are important matters that we want to discuss.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The question is when.

Mrs Foster: If Dermot feels so strongly, he should be allowed to make his points today, and if other parties wish to engage in the discussion, that is a matter for them.

Mrs Long: I agree. My point was that this discussion should be as wide ranging as members wish. However, I caution people against reading too much into people's body language in these meetings. For example, Lord Morrow looks very relaxed, but I assume that it is not because he is disinterested in what is happening. Reading too much into people's body language would add a complicated layer to the Committee.

Lord Morrow: I am relaxed because I simply cannot wait to hear what Dermot has to say.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It seems that we have consensus to allow Mr Nesbitt to comment on social and economic rights.

Ms Lewsley: I am not trying to stifle debate in any way; I am merely trying to get as much work done as possible and get consensus around the table, so that the meeting will be productive.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Ms Lewsley: It is not that the SDLP does not wish to participate in the debate on socio-economic rights; it is a question of the timing of that debate.

Mr Nesbitt: I am pleased that Patricia said that she wishes the meeting to be productive, because that is why I want to mention economic and social rights under "Human rights". It is the first time that the five parties have sat around the table to discuss human rights, and it is good that we express our views. We should not be stymied on this all-important issue.

Economic and social rights came to the fore through legislation, not through bills of rights, in the Factory Act 1833 and the Coal Mines Act 1842. The statutory reports on those gave credence to economic rights. Those economic rights were based in statute. We want rights, but it is a question of the vehicle by which we get those rights. That is why I encourage members to recognise that there are more vehicles by which we can get rights than simply a bill of rights. The welfare state today is all about economic and social rights. It is a rights-based welfare state, and it is based in law. I am sorry that Alban is not here, because he is the lawyer — in a sense.

Ms Lewsley: It has nothing to do with his body language.

Mr Nesbitt: I mean no disrespect by that. I am not talking about a charitable dimension to the welfare state, but about the welfare-to-work programme, which is positive, whereby one tries to get work.

We are talking about benefits for all. The European Social Charter, which the UK signed up to in 1999, is about economic and social rights.

Yesterday, for example, I found the following website. On the website www.adviceguide.org.uk, I found some 18 pages of advice on economic and social rights. Those rights, which relate to work, holidays, holiday pay, sickness, health and safety, notice of dismissal, are enshrined in law. Should, for example, an employer tell his employee that he can have only two weeks' holiday a year, the law can overrule the employer. There is a legal right to a minimum of four weeks' holiday a year. Pay rights are dealt with on another page of the website. Workers are entitled to be paid if they cannot work because they are off sick, on holiday, on maternity leave, paternity leave or adoption leave. The website provides complete lists of pay rights and basic rights at work.

There is a plethora of economic and social rights in law. Most people who advocate a bill of rights state that most of that will have to be manifest through law anyway, because rights provide the framework upon which the law is built. The law is already there. Therefore I cannot understand what economic and social rights are not already in place. The Institute of Directors' submission was clear about that.

I leave members with a good comment that I forgot to mention on why rights should not be broadened out:

"It is our view that any issue which falls outside the reconciling objectives and the specific terms of the Belfast Agreement should not be included in the Bill."

The reference is to reproductive rights, and it was written by the Catholic bishops of Northern Ireland in their submission to the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission, in January 2002.

The Ulster Unionist Party's position is clear. It is for economic and social rights, and for the rights of the child. We are not opposed to any of those rights. However, that is not what the Belfast Agreement was about. That is not about a dot or a comma but about a substantive element of the agreement.

Mr Poots: I assume that the Committee has completed its discussion on the bill of rights.

Mrs Foster: That is the point that I was trying to make on the bill of rights. I hope that Mr Nesbitt will agree with me that it is not necessary that we put everything into a bill of rights. There are other legislative vehicles. Dermot, I have said it already —

Mr Nesbitt: May I interject? As I tried to say earlier to Patricia Lewsley, she has had a good try at trying to split us, but she did not succeed.

Mrs Foster: Absolutely. You and I will never be split up.

Ms Lewsley: I am guilty of so much this day, I am telling you. [Laughter.]

Mr Nesbitt: Arlene made a serious point, to which I gave a serious response. There is more unanimity in our discourse on this side of the table than may be perceived outside.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Far be it from me to break up the love-in between Dermot and Arlene. We are not finished, as some members have indicated that they want to make their views known on what Mr Nesbitt has said.

Mr Poots: I thought that the Committee was moving on to discussing human rights.

Mrs Long: This debate has been useful in that it has clarified the parties' positions. The Alliance Party referred to economic and social rights; however, it is not prescriptive as to how those rights are to be protected. Those protections are necessary, but they do not need to be included in a bill of rights. There is less distance between our positions than might have been assumed at the beginning of the discussion. The bill of rights should be directed towards protecting equality of opportunity, treatment and access; equality under the law; and minimum standards of labour conditions, healthcare, education and the environment for everyone in the community.

A balance must be struck, however, so we do not offer unqualified support. Voters have the right to choose a Government, who will direct public spending in particular ways and prioritise different issues. That must be done in such a way that the Government retain the flexibility to prioritise certain aspects.

Our stance is that necessary protections must be provided. However, the rights of Governments and Assemblies to direct public spending in particular ways must not be interfered with. We are not talking about the all-encompassing rights agenda that some people have suggested, as that would prescribe certain actions that the Government could take.

Mrs O'Rawe: I have listened to members' views on social and economic rights. Sinn Féin believes that those need to be ingrained firmly in a bill of rights. We would welcome the Human Rights Commission's acknowledgement that social and economic rights constitute an area of work that it will be concentrating on over the next few weeks.

Ms Lewsley: That detail can be ironed out when we debate the content of the bill of rights at the round-table forum. We will have our opportunities, as political parties in civic society, to decide what should be included and what should not. Mr Nesbitt frequently makes the point that rights are enshrined in legislation, so what is the problem with including them in a bill of rights?

Mr Nesbitt: There is an expectation gap. People think that if they have a right to something, they are entitled to it. Money determines allocation. Just because we have a right to something, we do not necessarily manifest or receive the outworking of that right. I have a problem in attending seminars organised by the Human Rights Commission or others at which experts tell us that we need social and economic rights.

I will give two examples: on 11 November 2005, the University of Ulster's transitional justice institute hosted Prof Sandra Liebenberg from South Africa and Prof Csilla Kollonay Lehoucq from Poland, and each said how important it was to have economic and social rights. However, South Africa is the third most unequal country after Brazil and one other in the world, and people there did not have any social and economic rights. Poland is moving from a centralised communist society to a libertarian market economy, whereby it needs a lot of social and economic rights. In the UK, where we are residents — I choose the word "residents" instead of "citizens" — there are legal rights that places such as South Africa and Poland do not have.

I do not need to be lectured to, in the best of senses, by scholarly professors from South Africa and Poland who say how important it is to have social and economic rights. I say to them, "You need them, but we do not need them here because we already have them."

Mr Ferguson: I want to reinforce the comments from this side of the table on the need for social and economic rights to be included in a bill of rights and, after that, to be enshrined in law. It would be remiss of the Committee to presume on the good will of any Government on social and economic justice given the history of the Six Counties since partition.

We are sitting in this room because of the Good Friday Agreement. We had the agreement because of bad government and because of a history of discrimination and inequality. That is the very reason why we need to ensure through a bill of rights that that does not happen again.

Those rights must also be enshrined in law so that we have protection before the law, whether that be for individuals or groups. It is important that we do not forget our history and why we are here sitting in this room today.

Mr Nesbitt: Mr Ferguson said that discrimination was one rationale for the Belfast Agreement. That will be for another day. Next week, we will lead with equality, as I mentioned.

Mr Ferguson: I look forward to that.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We have had a composite discussion on the bill of rights and human rights. Is there any issue under "Human rights" that was not dealt with during that discussion?

Mr Poots: There are, perhaps, several issues that have not been addressed. I would like to address the issue of the Human Rights Commission. That body was established by the Northern Ireland Act 1998, which stated:

"The Commission shall promote understanding and awareness of the importance of human rights in Northern Ireland".

Prof Brice Dickson said in 1999 that the commission's role includes:

"convincing people, especially those perhaps of a unionist disposition that human rights are for all, not just for one particular community".

Looking at the history of the Human Rights Commission, it is clear to me that that has not been done. A particular problem with the Human Rights Commission is the balance of its make-up. At its outset, no one sat on the Human Rights Commission who represented my political views.

I was very surprised that, of all the people in Northern Ireland who have similar views to mine and those of my party, no one was deemed capable of sitting on the Human Rights Commission. That was even more surprising when one looked at some of the people who did sit on the commission. I am well aware that a number of people who were very well qualified to sit on the Human Rights Commission were rejected in the most recent round of appointments. It has been hard to establish why that was. In fact, there is no means of finding out why that was. If we have a Human Rights Commission that is unbalanced in the first instance, how is it to bring on board people whom it wishes to persuade that the human-rights agenda is inclusive and for everyone?

We must look at the current imbalance in the make-up of the Human Rights Commission. Our party recommended that a deputy commissioner be appointed to the Human Rights Commission to help to re-establish some balance. We continue to recommend that.

As for human rights per se, much of what a bill of rights would deal with is a matter for Government bodies. In Northern Ireland, there are people who wish to do the job of Government bodies. For example, there are people who wish to engage in policing without conforming to any bill of rights. Instead, those people conform to the rights of the street and of the back alley. There is not much point in addressing a bill of rights to Government while ignoring what is going on in our backstreets, where paramilitary organisations are still evicting people from their homes, exiling people and brutally attacking individuals.

We cannot address a bill of rights to the Government in isolation from the fact that paramilitary organisations still exist in Northern Ireland and are still dispensing rough justice to individuals. That must be dealt with.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do you propose that the Human Rights Commission should appoint a deputy commissioner?

Mr Poots: Yes.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Does any member wish to comment on that or raise other issues about human rights?

Mr Nesbitt: I am conscious that it is almost noon, and if there is nothing more to be said on human rights, we shall discuss parading. We were supposed to be here until 4 pm to talk about human rights, which is a very substantive issue.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I suspect that the parading issue might take some time.

Mr Nesbitt: Perhaps not. We have had a very quiet summer. Who knows?

I view human rights as a more general matter than a bill of rights. I am talking about human rights that are additional to a bill of rights. We have talked about identity and ethos. This is why I asked Sinn Féin earlier whether it abides by international norms. I think that the answer was yes, and I hope that Hansard reflects that. However, that was not entirely clear.

Mr Poots: It was a qualified yes.

Mr Nesbitt: I note that UNISON, the public services union, made it very clear that all our citizens are entitled to protection by the highest international standards of human rights and civil liberties. We may not agree on whether we are British or Irish, but we can all agree that we are citizens of the European Union. I ask for the same rights — no more or no less — as other citizens of the EU. Those rights are enshrined in article 17 of the European Convention on Human Rights. Moreover, article 5(1) of the UN International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights states that no party should:

“engage in any activity or perform any act aimed at the destruction of any of the rights or freedoms recognized herein”.

In its mission statement, the Human Rights Commission says that it uses international human rights standards as a yardstick. Some of the most sensitive issues are human-rights issues; for example, cross-border, or North/South, co-operation. As I said at the meeting on 4 August, democracy works on the basis of an understanding and an acceptance of human rights.

We are in favour of cross-border co-operation on the basis of the agreement as ratified by referendum. Co-operation must be for the mutual benefit of both sides, and both sides must agree, which means unionism and nationalism. The comprehensive agreement of December 2004 did not seek to change the North/South-co-operation dimension. My difficulty is that my right is being denied by the Government's proposals.

On 6 April 2006, the Prime Minister said that North/South co-operation was for the express recognition of the identity of the two aspirations. That was not what was agreed in the referendums. He is going beyond the agreement of an international treaty and beyond international norms. He is siding with the Sinn Féin perspective, which is not what the people of Northern Ireland agreed by referendum. The written record will show that.

Human-rights standards place great importance on the rights of the majority. That is clearly enshrined in article 20 of the Council of Europe's Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities, which states:

“any person belonging to a national minority shall respect the national legislation and the rights of others, in particular those of persons belonging to the majority”.

The majority clearly expressed a view on the form that North/South co-operation should take. The Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, in changing the terms of reference for North/South co-operation, is denying my right under article 20.

Even worse, if there is no devolution after 24 November, the Prime Minister has said that a more rigid will shall be imposed from outside. The Taoiseach, Bertie Ahern, made it very clear that that would marginalise the entire political process. The Prime Minister will put everything in Northern Ireland, including its elected representatives, into cold storage if a form of government is not signed up to, yet he is predisposed to co-operation not being based on an international treaty — namely, the agreement between Belfast and Dublin.

There is a general rule in international law that, where treaties affect minorities, which could include those living in Northern Ireland, those minorities participate in the agreement to guarantee their rights. We would be denied that right after 24 November 2006. The Prime Minister is not acting in line with international human rights, looking to the Office of the High Commissioner on National Minorities in the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE).

Remember what we are doing: we are talking about preparation for government. If we are to enjoy our human rights, full participation is clearly required, particularly on issues that affect us. The two Governments are proposing that we be totally marginalised from participation.

12.00 noon

I am concerned about the Government's position on wider human rights. The Government have ratified a convention, which they are obliged to implement, that they shall create — not that they might, or that they think it right or wrong — effective participation in Northern Ireland, particularly on decisions that affect us.

My final point is on the wider dimension of human rights in relation to the intrusive nature of the neighbouring Government. For the record, the Venice Commission has considered the relation of a kin state — in this case, Ireland — to its kin minority, the nationalist population in Northern Ireland, residing in a home state, namely the United Kingdom.

The Venice Commission stated clearly that a kin state could only give preferential treatment to its kin minority in education and culture, save for exceptional cases. I am not sure where Sinn Féin's desire for speaking rights in the Dáil fits into that. Let me be very clear, in case members wonder why I mention that: Sinn Féin prefaces its wish for speaking rights in the Dáil by saying that it is a basic right and entitlement. Sorry, but that is not a right under international law. There is, however, a right to full and effective participation in the state in which one resides.

I do not wish to be awkward; I simply repeat what I have said from the outset: I am — as we all are — a citizen of Europe. I ask for no more and no fewer rights than other citizens. However, those rights are not those articulated by Sinn Féin — they are quite the reverse. Sinn Féin has a jaundiced view of rights that goes back to the Europe of the 1930s.

Mrs Long: I want to discuss the issues raised by Edwin Poots.

In relation to paramilitary violence, the Alliance Party has pushed the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission and other human rights groups to focus on non-state sectors, including paramilitaries. Traditionally, human rights have concentrated on the duties of the state. We define human rights much more broadly, as other organisations can impact on and, indeed, compromise, people's rights. That must be taken on board. We believe that that falls within the definition of the particular circumstances of Northern Ireland and is, therefore, within the Human Rights Commission's remit.

In principle, we are not opposed to having a deputy chief commissioner in the Human Rights Commission. However, we want to explore Edwin's comment about balance and how he perceives a deputy chief commissioner would be appointed. The Chief Commissioner, and any deputy chief commissioner, of the Human Rights Commission should be appointed on merit and ability and not to create sectional interest or balance within the team.

We have said several times, and say again, that anything that entrenches the two monolithic communities, and solely represents those communities at the expense of diversity within Northern Ireland, is unhelpful in addressing change in society. Change in our society should be undertaken from a more pluralist view, not from society in general, but a more flexible view of people's individual identities, particularly in the context of human rights. The right of people to define themselves is fundamental to that.

We are very conscious that any attempt to entrench traditional divisions in our society runs contrary to the point of human rights. There would, therefore, be a conflict at the heart of the Human Rights Commission. In principle, we have no problem with the idea of a deputy chief commissioner, but we want to ensure that the person is appointed on merit.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Poots, in order to help the discussion, can you clarify that point?

Mr Poots: I am aware that several people with legal backgrounds, and who specialise in human rights law, applied to join the Human Rights Commission and were not accepted. In my view, the people who were accepted had less human rights expertise than some of those who were rejected. I am concerned about this issue, and perhaps the entire appointment process should be addressed. If we want to reach out to the wider community, there must be balance in the commission, which would include the positions of Chief Commissioner and deputy chief commissioner.

Mrs Long: Can I clarify? Balance in an organisation is not necessarily achieved by appointing people from the two traditions, or even by taking that issue into account. Balance can mean monitoring the composition of an organisation, encouraging under-represented people to apply, and so forth. Is that where the issue of balance is going, as opposed to so-called positive discrimination? I contend that there is no such thing as positive discrimination. If someone from a perceived unionist background is appointed as Chief Commissioner, must the deputy chief commissioner be a nationalist, and vice versa? I used the word "perceived"; people could be appointed to those positions who would not define themselves as "unionist" or "nationalist" but whom others may perceive to be unionist or a nationalist. If people define themselves as "neutral", it would be difficult to achieve that balance.

Mr Poots: The Human Rights Commission has a statutory duty to reflect the composition of the community. The point that was made about merit is valid, but appointments must comply with that statutory duty. That is the case with the Policing Board, where the chairman and the vice-chairman come from the two sections of the community. In the first instance, appointments to the commission should be made on merit, but perhaps the positions of Chief Commissioner and deputy chief commissioner could reflect community balance.

Mr Ferguson: The remit, functions and composition of the North's Human Rights Commission are set out in paragraph 5 of page 17 of the Good Friday Agreement. Paragraph 9 of page 17 and paragraph 10 of page 18 set out the comparable steps to be taken by the Irish Government to further strengthen and underpin the constitutional protection of human rights.

As Edwin pointed out, the membership balance of the Human Rights Commission has been a contentious issue since its formation. It is out of step with the United Nations' Paris Principles, which require membership to be pluralist and representative. The Human Rights Commission is not inclusive or representative. I support Edwin's comments.

The commission does not have sufficient powers of investigation to compel witnesses or documents, to enter places of detention or to take its own cases. I want to make several recommendations. The Human Rights Commission must be given additional powers and resources to enable it to carry out its remit. It must be given powers to investigate, to compel documents and witnesses, to enter places of detention and to take cases of its own without necessarily having to send a victim elsewhere. It is important that the British Government publish their response to the review of the powers of the Human Rights Commission as expeditiously as possible. Additional funding is needed, which should be made available to the Human Rights Commission to ensure that it can carry out its remit fully.

Membership of the Human Rights Commission should be reviewed and appropriate action taken to ensure that it fully represents all communities. We do not want colleagues sitting around this table to feel that the commission excludes them or their communities. That would be unacceptable by any terms. It is crucial that we secure the establishment of an independent mechanism to oversee appointments. That will ensure that we have a pluralist and representative commission.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Ferguson, were those proposals, or was that a statement of your party's position?

Mr Ferguson: It was a re-statement of our position. It is obvious, for example, that Edmond — gabh mo leithscéal, Edwin — sees the membership of the commission to be as contentious as Sinn Féin does. It is important that we address that matter.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): At the moment, the only proposal is that of Mr Poots for a deputy chief commissioner.

Mr McFarland: I take it that Edwin's proposal is that the Human Rights Commission should observe proper community balance, as stated in the agreement. I think that his suggestion was that, along the lines of the Policing Board structure, the leadership — the Chief Commissioner and the deputy chief commissioner — should also be balanced to reflect the community. That seems quite sensible.

Patricia mentioned the joint human rights commissions, North and South. They were tasked with examining the possibility of establishing a charter for the island. They got ahead of themselves and produced a charter, although that was not their remit in the first place. Can anyone tell me how far the Irish Government have got with their "clear, comparable steps"? The agreement sets out what the Irish Government have to do by way of human rights, such as setting up a commission in line with that in Northern Ireland, etc. Does that fit into an institutional discussion — whether a human rights commission has been set up in the Republic, according to the agreement — or is it a human-rights issue? Can one of the experts perhaps explain where we have reached with the Republic of Ireland's establishing an equivalent organisation and safeguards?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We could ask the researchers to check up on that.

Ms Lewsley: The South has established the Irish Human Rights Commission.

Mr McFarland: Does it have the same safeguards that apply here, as laid out in the agreement? They are very specific.

Ms Lewsley: It is fully compliant.

Mr McFarland: OK.

Ms Lewsley: The SDLP does not see a need to appoint a deputy chief commissioner to the Human Rights Commission. The Chief Commissioner is appointed on merit and by process. The appointment of the other commissioners should be reflective of the community, and we believe that that is the case. However, we are supportive of enhanced powers and resources for the Human Rights Commission, and have voiced our opinion about that on a number of occasions.

Perhaps we need to go further than that. Appointments to both the Human Rights Commission and the Equality Commission for Northern Ireland are currently made by the Secretary of State, and are excluded from the remit of the new Commissioner for Public Appointments. Those appointments should be transferred to the new office, which at the minute plays only an advisory role.

Dermot has talked about the connection between North and South; Alan has asked for clarification in regard to the Irish Human Rights Commission in the South. I hope that, in future, when the issue is raised, the UUP will support a charter of rights for the island of Ireland to ensure that all our rights are delivered.

Lord Morrow: On a point of clarification, Patricia, did you say that you believe that the commission is reflective of the community?

Ms Lewsley: Yes.

Lord Morrow: Despite our telling you that it is not reflective of our community, do you still think that?

Ms Lewsley: The commissioners have been selected.

Lord Morrow: Thank you.

12.15 pm

Mr Nesbitt: Naomi talked about merit versus balance and came down on the side of merit every time. However, I subscribe to Edwin Poots's position: the statutory duty is to have balance, as far as is practical. I know that others support fifty-fifty recruitment to the police.

Mrs Long: Do you take the point that the Alliance Party does not support that?

Mr Nesbitt: It is accepted that fifty-fifty recruitment to policing is discriminatory. I do not question the individual merits of any one person on the Human Rights Commission or on the Equality Commission. I look at it in the round.

I read the press statement in July 2005 on the appointment of new commissioners to the Human Rights Commission. The political affiliations of the new commissioners are: two from the Women's Coalition, two from the SDLP, one from Alliance and one from the DUP — and, in case Naomi was about to ask, Geraldine Rice is the commissioner affiliated to the Alliance Party

Mrs Long: I am well acquainted with Geraldine Rice.

Mr Nesbitt: When judging whether the Human Rights Commission is balanced as a collective entity, it would be difficult to say that it is, given the political affiliations of its commissioners.

Michael mentioned the Paris Principles, to which Sinn Féin also alluded last week. The Paris Principles refer only to national human rights bodies: the Human Rights Commission is a regional body. There is no direct link between the two.

I want to clarify a North/South issue, after which I will conclude.

Mr Ferguson: I referred to the Paris Principles primarily because they insist on pluralist and inclusive representation. Presumably, you wanted to lecture me, Dermot, but I want to point out that I made that reference simply because they recommend that approach.

Mr Nesbitt: I do not want to lecture you. I could have picked up your point wrongly, but I understood that you were extending the reference to the Paris Principles in order to suggest additional powers, which you went on to list.

Mr Ferguson: I did, yes. On a point of clarification: are you opposing my recommendation, for example, that the Human Rights Commission should have additional powers and resources?

Mr Nesbitt: My party has made a clear and detailed submission on that. The UUP's position is that although it sees merit in powers per se, it would not support additional powers for one simple reason: the Human Rights Commission has not implemented the powers that it has already, most obviously, its power to consider the scope for a bill of rights. The Human Rights Commission has taken six years to do that.

When a body, such as the Human Rights Commission, which has certain powers, asks for further powers, it makes me say wow. It has powers; it has expanded those powers; it has taken six years to consider a bill of rights; and now it wants new powers. The Human Rights Commission has received much additional money to exercise its existing powers. At this juncture, therefore, the UUP, as clearly stated in its written submission, does not support its receiving additional powers. The Government have many reservations also on the granting of certain powers, such as the right of entry, etc. The UUP is in favour, not of additional powers, but of the implementation of existing powers.

Patricia Lewsley referred to North/South matters. Let me be clear: I am not saying that borders can never change. The provision for holding a referendum to remove the border was enshrined in law long before the Belfast Agreement, which changed the period of time required between polls from 10 years to seven years. As the original law was passed by Parliament some time ago, it could change. For change of any nature to take place, there must be agreement. The UK Government and the Irish Government are doing that without the agreement of the majority.

Turning to international law, I return to the remarks of Prof Boyle, Prof Campbell and Prof Hadden, three legal experts in human rights. In their submission to the Forum for Peace and Reconciliation, they said that unionists are entitled to retain their constitutional link with the United Kingdom, and they asked whether that means that a reciprocal right to equivalent constitutional or institutional links with the Republic of Ireland should be granted to nationalists. That is a proposition put by Sinn Féin. If unionists have their links, nationalists should have their links as a right. The professors concluded that the only support in international law and practice — not just law, but practice, too — is the right of members of a minority to develop and maintain cross-border linkages. Naomi mentioned individual rights and the right to opt out and not be part of a national minority, which, again, is enshrined in international law. Therefore, Sinn Féin is beyond the pale, if I can use that Dublin phrase, with respect to international law.

Mr Ferguson: Dermot, the most respectable place on the island is beyond the pale, and you are a national minority.

Mr Nesbitt: We could debate that, and we will.

Ms Lewsley: Mr Chairman, I would like Lord Morrow to clarify one point.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The fact that we are going to eat lunch does not mean that we cannot return to the debate.

Ms Lewsley: I would just like one small point clarified. I was asked about representation on the Human Rights Commission, and I said that I felt that it is balanced. Is Lord Morrow saying that the unionist commissioners are not representative of the DUP community, even though Jonathon Bell, a DUP councillor, is one of them?

Lord Morrow: The membership does not adequately and equally reflect the unionist community.

Ms Lewsley: As a whole?

Lord Morrow: As a whole.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are members in a position to take a vote on Mr Poots's proposal that a deputy chief commissioner be appointed to the Human Rights Commission?

Mr Ferguson: No, I do not think that we are.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We are not in a position to take that vote now, so we will break for lunch

The Committee was suspended at 12.22 pm

On resuming —

12.51 pm

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Ladies and gentlemen, I hope that you all enjoyed your lunch. It was up to the usual high standard. We have a quorum, but we must be careful to maintain it if people drift away to make telephone calls.

Mr McFarland: Michael Copeland is deputising for Mr McNarry.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is this the first time that you have attended the Committee, Michael?

Mr Copeland: That is correct, and I must commend you on the quality of the lunch.

Mrs Foster: It will not be his last. [Laughter.]

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We normally ask members whether they have any interests to declare.

Mr Copeland: I declare that I have an interest in parading, by virtue of my membership of the Loyal Orange Institution for more than 30 years.

Mr Ferguson: I hope that that will not make you a bad person.

Mr Copeland: Thank you very much indeed.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I assume that there are no other first-time members present who have not made a declaration of interest. It probably relates more to institutional issues and to policing and justice than to this part of the Preparation for Government Committee.

I welcome Mr Copeland. He has become about the fifty-seventh MLA to sit on either the Committee or the subgroup: everyone is involved.

We have not yet concluded on Mr Poots's proposal to appoint a deputy chief commissioner to the Human Rights Commission. However, I detected some opposition to that.

Lord Morrow: I presume that you have given up on the idea of completing the agenda today.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): If we get to the end of "Parades" today, we will be doing well. I saw that as the difficult issue, not human rights. Mrs Foster said that she wished to speak to Mr Poots's proposal.

Mrs Foster: That is correct.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Does anyone else want to speak on that, or can we move to the vote after Mrs Foster has spoken?

Ms Lewsley: I have had an opportunity to speak, so my name can be removed from the list.

Mr Ferguson: I wish to speak on membership of the Human Rights Commission, but I will wait my turn.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mrs Long also wishes to speak to the proposal. When those three members have spoken, we will seek consensus on it.

Mrs Foster: The Human Rights Commission's statutory duty is contained in section 68(3) of the Northern Ireland Act 1998:

"In making appointments under this section, the Secretary of State shall as far as practicable secure that the Commissioners, as a group, are representative of the community in Northern Ireland."

There has been some discussion about that matter, but my party does not accept that the current Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission complies with that statutory duty. Reference has already been made to the current commission and to the fact that some commissioners are — or have been — directly linked with political parties. We do not live in a vacuum, so that has an impact on how people view the commission. I do not say that those people have no right to be on the commission. Of course they have a right to be there, but their political links have an impact on how people in my community view the commission and its workings.

Naomi asked whether my party supports direct positive discrimination. I want it put on record that we do not. We are against that. We oppose the positive discrimination that exists in the recruitment of PSNI officers. Therefore we will not oppose that for one institution and support it for another. If the Human Rights Commission is to fulfil its role and be representative of Northern Ireland society, we feel that a deputy chief commissioner must be appointed, based on the statutory duty and on merit.

Mr Ferguson: Sinn Féin does not support the proposal for the appointment of a deputy chief commissioner. The Irish Human Rights Commission does not draw its membership from political parties. Edwin meant well when he highlighted the fact that all political parties but one — Sinn Féin — are represented on the Human Rights Commission. We take the view that there should be no political representatives on the commission.

Mr McFarland: The Ulster Unionist Party is not represented on the commission.

Mr Poots: I did not mention any political party.

Mr Ferguson: I was just being facetious. I take Mr McFarland's point. Sinn Féin is of the opinion that, like the Irish Human Rights Commission, the commission in the North should have no political representatives on it. It is worth pointing out that the Irish Human Rights Commission is seeking to amend the Human Rights Commission Act 2000 in the South, because it is concerned that the Government are not paying due regard to its recommendations. The scandal around the residential home issue bears witness to that. Sinn Féin supports the Irish Human Rights Commission's proposal to amend the 2000 Act to ensure that the Government pay due regard to its recommendations.

Mrs Long: The Alliance Party accepts that the Human Rights Commission must be representative of the community in Northern Ireland. That is different, however, from saying that the membership should be proportionate to numbers of elected representatives. There is a distinction. The commission can be broadly reflective of the wider community and take account of ethnic minorities, without being rigid.

Mrs Foster: The commission lacks ethnic-minority representation.

Mrs Long: Yes; that is a concern. No one has an issue with the commission's need to be broadly reflective of the community. Mr Nesbitt was perturbed to find that I was unaware that Geraldine Rice sits on the commission. None of those who sit on the commission at the moment is a political nominee. Commissioners applied and were appointed. They had to declare political and other interests, as one does for public appointments. However, they are not political nominees. The Alliance Party opposes any change that would permit the appointment of political nominees.

Another question is how one defines "reflective". There was much criticism of the original commission. It was panned by nationalists as being too unionist, because they counted the numbers of Protestants on it and assumed that they were all unionists, and claimed that unionists were over-represented.

Similarly, the commission was panned by unionists as not being unionist enough, and, therefore, too nationalist. Unionists viewed the protestants who were on the commission as not really being unionists. Therefore there is an issue about how one uses "protestant" and "catholic" when it comes to political aspiration and whether people see the body as reflective of the community. It could not have been too unionist and too nationalist simultaneously. There is a conflict and a paradox in the way in which people view the commission.

Edwin Poots's proposal that there should be a deputy chief commissioner has been put in very narrow terms. The Alliance Party does not object to his proposal; however, we cannot support it on the basis of his suggestion that it will achieve balance. If the Chief Commissioner were from an ethnic minority, how would the balance have been redressed.

Mrs Foster: The balance would certainly be improved if there were someone from an ethnic-minority community on the Human Rights Commission.

Mrs Long: If the Chief Commissioner were a member of an ethnic-minority community, how would community balance be restored by appointing a deputy chief commissioner? That is the premise on which the proposal has been based, and that is the problem that I have with it. I do not have a problem with there being a deputy chief commissioner.

Lord Morrow: I cannot understand why Naomi finds it difficult to support the concept of a deputy chief commissioner. It does not matter what others have said about having a deputy chief commissioner — we are talking about the post. What difficulty does Naomi have with supporting the proposal for a deputy chief commissioner?

Mrs Long: I am not opposed in principle to the creation of the post, but it must be looked at in the context of our discussions. We cannot divorce proposals from the context in which they are being discussed. A deputy chief commissioner was not proposed in order to relieve the burden of duties from the Chief Commissioner or to deputise for the Chief Commissioner when she is not available. The proposal was that the post is needed in order to reflect balance in the community. I cannot support the proposal on that premise.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Poots, are you going to press the issue, or do members have an alternative proposal?

Mr Poots: I felt that there was considerable support for the proposal during the earlier part of the discussion. Sinn Féin was first to break ranks. There was no apparent reason for parties breaking ranks and moving away from the proposal. I am not sure whether they have been pulled on this during the break, but there was no opposition earlier. There is no reason for the objections now.

Mrs Long: My position has been consistent from the beginning of the discussion. My first action, when Mr Poots's proposal was made, was to explore the premise on which it was based. He made it clear that he felt that it was necessary in order to reflect the community. At that point, I said that I would not be comfortable with the proposal. Hansard will reflect that.

This is not about people changing their position. We are not opposed to the creation of the post, but we are opposed to the use of the post in the way in which Mr Poots has suggested.

Lord Morrow: That is an argument for another day and another place.

[Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.]

— if that deputy chief commissioner were to be appointed in a particular way to do a balancing act.

Mrs Long: I have not heard any other argument being put for having a deputy chief commissioner.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is a good point.

Lord Morrow: Mrs Long has an argument.

Mrs Long: I did not. I have suggested that there is a range of options, but none of them has been proposed.

Ms Lewsley: I said that I was against the proposal. I do not see the need for a deputy chief commissioner.

Lord Morrow: Ms Lewsley said that she felt that the post was reflective of the community.

Ms Lewsley: I said that it was reflective of Lord Morrow's community, which was the question that he asked me. It is not reflective of the ethnic-minority community.

Lord Morrow: That is not what Ms Lewsley said.

Ms Lewsley: Lord Morrow was asking me in the context of its reflecting —

Lord Morrow: Therefore, does Ms Lewsley think that one unionist on the Human Rights Commission does reflect our community?

Ms Lewsley: I think that there is more than one, but that depends on your definition of "unionist".

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Poots, do you wish to put your proposal to the Committee?

Mr Poots: Yes. However, there is little point in pursuing it if three other parties oppose it at this point. I do have clarity from the Alliance Party on its concerns, which can be addressed. However, I do not have clarity from the other parties as to why they would object.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Therefore you will not pursue it.

Mr Poots: Patricia thinks that the make-up of the Human Rights Commission is balanced, and she is entitled to that opinion. The commission is far from balanced; that must be made clear. Sinn Féin has no clarity on the issue.

Ms Lewsley: My argument is that, if Mr Poots believes that the make-up of the Human Rights Commission is not balanced, creating an extra post will not help. The structure of the appointments process must be changed.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I cannot see the restoration of devolution on 24 November hingeing on this one issue.

Mr Nesbitt: My party sees merit in having a deputy chief commissioner for many reasons, one of which is to assist the commission's work. I agree with Arlene that this is not about positive discrimination. If we cannot support fifty-fifty recruitment in the PSNI, we cannot support it elsewhere.

There is another way. Generally, in any appointments system, affirmative action is taken, by which I mean that particular people are encouraged to apply.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is an adequate airing of views on the bill of rights and human rights.

Mrs Long, do you wish to speak on an issue that the Committee has not heard before?

Mrs Long: Yes. The Republic of Ireland has incorporated the European Convention on Human Rights into its domestic legislation. That commitment was set out in the Good Friday Agreement. Other countries have simply adopted the ECHR, but the Republic of Ireland has opted to enshrine similar protections in domestic legislation. Can we clarify the position in the Republic of Ireland — without making a value judgement on the approach — because a cross-border dimension is clearly involved?

Mr Nesbitt: I understand the DUP's difficulty. At the time of the appointment of the most recent Chief Commissioner, I recall the DUP party leader made it clear that his party would have nothing to do the Human Rights Commission while there was only this Chief Commissioner. However, that has nothing to do with this matter.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I was about to say that I could not see the link.

Mr Nesbitt: I was not making a point; I was simply reflecting on the DUP's difficulty.

Mr Ferguson: Nice try.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): You have placed it on the record, Mr Nesbitt.

Mr Nesbitt: Thank you, Mr Chairman.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Poots, do you wish to say something about Mrs Long's proposal?

Mr Poots: I referred to the relationship between human rights organisations other than Government-sponsored organisations. We cannot ignore that issue in Northern Ireland. When we are ready to roll with devolution, Mr Ervine, Mr McGuinness, Mr Adams, and others currently associated with human-rights abusers, could be nominated.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I assume that you mean Martin McGuinness, not Alban Maginness.

Mr Poots: Yes. This Committee must address that issue, because those people could be going into government while human-rights abuses may be ongoing within the organisations with which they are associated.

Mr Ferguson: Edwin is making an art out of insulting people today. That comment is another example. Sinn Féin made the point that there should be no political representation on the Human Rights Commission, and that should allay Edwin's unfounded fears. If Edwin wants to make a proposal on which we can all agree, perhaps it should be that we review the appointments process.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That strikes me as an argument that should have been made earlier.

Mr Ferguson: Yes, but do you see how easily I picked it up?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I hear what you are saying, Mr Poots. Do you want to make a proposal?

Mr Poots: A separate discussion is required on people's associations with organisations that are engaged in human-rights abuses. I do not mean second-rate criminal organisations in Manchester or organisations that are part of the gang culture; I am talking about organised criminality and organised paramilitary groups.

Mr McFarland: Lord Morrow will confirm that we have had two months of detailed discussions on that issue. My understanding was that the DUP would go nowhere near a Government with Sinn Féin until criminality had ceased. The issue would therefore arise only in that context. Whether Martin McGuinness is Deputy First Minister or not, the DUP will only enter Government when it is happy that criminality has ceased.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The PFG Committee dealing with law and other issues will also discuss that.

Mrs Foster: Reference was made to human rights applying to states. We are raising the issue of human rights applying to other bodies, such as paramilitary organisations. Should the human-rights discussion concern people's rights vis-à-vis the state or should it include rights vis-à-vis paramilitary organisations? It is not solely about Government.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): My point is that the issue of criminality and punishment beatings will be dealt with in meetings of this Committee in a separate format.

Mrs Foster: That does not mean that it should be separated from a human-rights discussion in this format of the PFG Committee

Lord Morrow: The issue still relates to human rights.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): If the issue can be adequately discussed in another format of the Committee, do we need to have a long discussion on it? I am asking a question; I am not stating an opinion.

Mr Poots: We will deal with the past and its legacy later. Perhaps we can leave the issue until we discuss the disappeared and other human-rights abuses as part of the wider issue of the past. Human-rights abuses have occurred in the past, but they do not need to happen in future. We have an opportunity to ensure that they do not happen in future.

Mr McFarland: When negotiations begin in the autumn, the Democratic Unionist Party will have to decide whether to go into government with Sinn Féin. That decision will presumably take those issues into account. Irrespective of whether we need to debate this issue in more than one strand of this Committee, the question of whether criminality and paramilitarism have ceased will remain. If the DUP accepts that criminality and paramilitarism have ceased, and those are the criteria on which the DUP has said that it will enter Government, this issue does not arise.

The issue will arise, however, if it is suggested that anyone who has ever been connected with a paramilitary organisation has a residual legacy of human-rights abuses and is therefore unacceptable to be in government. Sinn Féin uses the same argument when it says that anyone who has ever been a member of the RUC is unacceptable as a PSNI officer because, as far as Sinn Féin is concerned, RUC officers were human-rights abusers.

Those are daft arguments. The DUP will presumably make a choice as to whether Sinn Féin is acceptable, at which point we will all move on.

Mrs Foster: This point has been made at the PFG Committee dealing with institutional issues: even if the premise is accepted that the Provisional IRA is no longer in business, does Alan seriously suggest that there will no longer be residual terrorism from loyalists, dissident republicans or other groups in Northern Ireland?

Safeguards must be put in place, so that the instability of the in-out, in-out situation that has existed since 1998 is not perpetuated. We are talking about human-rights safeguards as well as safeguards for the institutions, so that those safeguards are in place after devolution, should it occur.

Mr McFarland: We have yet to discuss the stability of the institutions in the PFG Committee dealing with institutional issues.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is the next topic to be discussed.

Mr McFarland: Edwin Poots raised the point about whether Martin McGuinness was acceptable, in human-rights terms, as a Deputy First Minister to Rev Dr Ian Paisley. He seemed to suggest that human-rights safeguards should be in place to prevent Martin McGuinness from becoming Deputy First Minister. We will never get to the stage at which Martin McGuinness is Deputy First Minister until the DUP believes that Sinn Féin has stopped all criminality, paramilitarism, and so forth.

There will be no deal and no Government until the DUP accepts that Sinn Féin is clean, so to speak. Therefore what point was Edwin making?

1.15 pm

Mr Poots: The acceptability issue does not relate to Sinn Féin exclusively. For example, if the leader of the Ulster Unionist Party Assembly Group (UUPAG) decides to appoint one of its members, namely Mr Irvine, to a ministerial post, that would create real problems on the back of Mr Haddock's attempted murder, and on the back of the attack on and murder of a gentleman in Tobermore.

Mr McFarland: As we discussed, the Assembly has safeguards related to the ministerial code, conduct of Members, etc. Those are clearly laid out.

Mrs Foster: They did not work very well in the previous Assembly.

Mr Poots: Mr McFarland has just made the case for discussing this matter.

Mr McFarland: That is a different type of safeguard. That is not a human-rights issue; it is a matter for discussion in the PFG Committee dealing with institutions.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): When Mr Nesbitt raised a matter that he felt was important to his party, we allowed him to have his say.

Mr McFarland: Absolutely.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): On the same principle, Mr Poots sees this as an important matter.

Mr Poots: I am happy to leave the matter until we deal with the past and its legacy.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That would be helpful, because we must allow a significant amount of time for discussion of parades. Thank you for helping us, Mr Poots. We can now move on with the agenda.

Mrs Long: What about the issue that I raised on the need for research on the position of the Republic of Ireland on European human-rights protections in its domestic law?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do members agree that that research should be carried out?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is our protocol that we always agree to any member's request for research to be carried out.

The next issue is parades. I suggest that we use the same format for our discussions as before. We will allow each party, in alphabetical order, to give a short presentation on its current position on the matter. We will then open up the discussion and try to reach some agreement on the way forward. I think that we all accept that this is a rather contentious issue.

Mrs Long: I wish to preface my remarks by referring to the context in which we are discussing the parades issue. From the Alliance Party's perspective, parading is a cross-cutting issue. In addition to the human-rights context, "Parades" must also be considered in the context of "Good relations" and "Shared future". Parading also has ramifications on matters such as "Rule of law", which the PFG Committee dealing with law and order issues will discuss. It is a cross-cutting issue, and that must be reflected.

In setting out our position today, the Alliance Party is looking at the issue from the human-rights perspective, because today's meeting was set aside for human rights. Parading was subsumed in that topic. That is the context in which I am prefacing our statements.

The Alliance Party does not accept that there is an unqualified right to parade or to object to a parade. The claimed right to march, parade or walk is derived from freedom of expression and freedom of assembly. It is not an absolute right, and it must be balanced with the competing rights of others to freedom of expression, freedom of assembly and freedom of movement.

The Alliance Party also believes that the alleged distinction between traditional and non-traditional parades — in a human-rights context — is largely meaningless. There is a clash in our society of competing rights, and parades have become a forum for a debate about much wider communal and cultural battles over territory and resources.

We accept a predisposition to allow parades. That is the current reality, given that most go ahead and only a small number are disputed and contentious, and therefore come under additional scrutiny. There must be some form of independent body to mediate and, finally, to arbitrate on those competing claims and rights. Before the Parades Commission was set up, that arbiter was the police.

Our concern about the police being the arbiter is that they tended to err on the side of considering the weight of the threat of public disorder.

That could skew the decision-making process, rather than allow each case to be considered on its merits outwith the threat of violence from those who want to parade or those who do not want the parades to take place.

The Alliance Party, therefore, believes that the Parades Commission, as a vehicle, is welcome in that — to some degree at least — it has been able to detach the issue of the merits of the individual parades from the threat of violence and public disorder, although we realise that that is not a complete distinction.

We have concerns also about how the parades issue fits into the context of a shared future and good relations. For example, some people may wish to establish the right to have a parade but choose, on the basis of good relations and a shared future, not to exercise that right. Similarly, others may wish to establish the right to oppose a parade, but choose not to exercise that right and permit parades to go ahead. That type of mutual-accommodation approach is more likely to be successful than a more legalistic and arbitrary approach, but an independent body is needed to arbitrate when local agreement cannot be reached. Such a body represents an important mechanism.

I do not wish to go into the other aspects of the parades issue — good relations, rule of law and shared future — although they all have an effect. Examining the issue in the context of human rights, as I have done today, covers our position.

Lord Morrow: I shall quote from article 11 of the European Convention on Human Rights:

"1. Everyone has the right to freedom of peaceful assembly and to freedom of association with others, including the right to form and to join trade unions for the protection of his interests.

2. No restrictions shall be placed on the exercise of these rights other than such as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security or public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others. This article shall not prevent the imposition of lawful restrictions on the exercise of these rights by members of the armed forces, of the police or of the administration of the State."

Mr Nesbitt: Was that quotation from article 11 of the ECHR, or are you reading its expanded interpretation?

Lord Morrow: It was article 11.

Mr Nesbitt: That was the full article about the forces of the law?

Lord Morrow: Yes.

Solving the problems that have been associated with parades is a fundamental prerequisite to political progress and stability in Northern Ireland. Although there are no easy answers to dealing with those issues, it is clear that the Parades Commission has failed to bring about a solution to the problems. In fact, very often, its approach has exacerbated difficulties within the community and it has proved to be part of the problem, rather than part of the solution.

The problems with the Parades Commission are not simply questions of the personalities involved or questions of detail, but matters of fundamental principle, which are not capable of being addressed within the present structures. In a number of crucial regards, the Parades Commission is structurally unable to meet the challenges with which it is faced.

Although no structures can be a panacea to the difficulties that are faced in this area, it is possible to create arrangements that can play a valuable role in helping to solve the problem. Just as the difficulties that surround the question of parading cannot be divorced from wider political questions, it is also now true that wider political issues cannot be divorced from a solution to the parading question.

There are clearly a number of problems with the current arrangements. Decisions are seen to be arbitrary, unfair and inconsistent. The Parades Commission lacks the confidence of the majority of the community. There is a lack of transparency in the process. Bad behaviour is rewarded, and there is no regulation of parade protests.

The DUP's proposal outlines a long-term solution to the problem. The proposal includes splitting the mediation function from the determination function, and establishing two separate bodies: one to deal with mediation, the other to deal with determination, where necessary. That would allow the mediation body to concentrate on resolving issues affecting contested parades and agreeing arrangements without the need for a formal determination hearing. That would establish a process whereby contested parades could be identified and dealt with separately from the vast majority of uncontested parades, which will not require any determination.

Where it is impossible to resolve a contested parade to the satisfaction of the affected parties, the determination body — that is, the parades tribunal — would operate as a tribunal in a quasi-judicial capacity, with decisions taken in accordance with established law and guidelines. The parades tribunal would regulate the contested parade and any contested parade protest.

The formulation of guidelines would be critical, but would be predicated on a presumption in favour of a parade's proceeding. The traditionalism of a parade would weigh further in its favour, and each determination would be tilted towards providing incentives for good conduct. The guidelines would be established in statute and would have the force of law. In order to allow proper time for matters to be considered, 28 days' notice should be given before the planned event, with a determination at least 21 days in advance of the event. That would allow time for attempted resolution or appeals of the decision.

To be allowed to continue, any protest against a contested parade would be subject to any and all conditions set by the parades tribunal. The tribunal would sit in public and, where possible, take evidence in public and publish the detailed reasons for its determinations. The mediation body or the parades mediators could be called to give evidence to the tribunal about their efforts to resolve the matter, as could the parties involved. The police could also give evidence, where necessary. The panel from which the parades tribunal would be drawn would be limited to between five and seven members. A former or current judge would chair the tribunal.

The issue of disorder, either as a result of a previous parade's going ahead or not going ahead, would not be a factor that could be taken into account by the tribunal in favour of those who are responsible for the disorder. In the final analysis, however, police decisions would always be critical. More emphasis would be placed on the conduct of those parading and on those protesting against the parade. If a previously lawful parade were illegally interfered with, that would count in favour of the next parade. However, where parade conditions have been breached, that would count against the next parade. The parades tribunal would weigh the value of any proposal made to rectify a previous breach. It is important that good behaviour — rather than bad — is rewarded.

Notification of uncontested parades would be given to the police, but a determination would not be required. The parades tribunal would periodically review the list of contested and uncontested parades. Where it is proposed to change the classification of either a contested or uncontested parade, an opportunity shall be given for representations to be made.

In conclusion, the Parades Commission is part of the problem, rather than the solution. The solution must, therefore, lie in creating new arrangements that seek to avoid, where possible, the requirement for a determination. However, where a determination is needed, the process must be seen to be open, transparent and fair. A first step is a process that can enjoy community confidence, operated by those who command respect. New arrangements cannot solve the problems associated with parading, but they offer the opportunity to get out of the present cul-de-sac and provide the potential for a better way forward.

Mr Ferguson: Mr Chairman, members' previous contributions imply that this issue is simply about the right to march. It is more fundamental than that. For example, there are more than 2,000 loyal orders marches every year. Only a few of those are contentious.

1.30 pm

When a parade is contentious, the loyal orders should demonstrate some common sense, and not insist that those marches are forced through communities where they are not welcome or wanted. That seems like good common sense to me.

Mrs Long: You mentioned that good common sense would suggest that, when a parade is contentious, the loyal orders should not force the issue. Would it also be good common sense if, on some occasions, communities that may not want a parade to go through their area were flexible and gave consent? It might be good common sense to do that on some occasions.

Mr Ferguson: Nice semantics, Naomi. Perhaps you should put that to the residents' groups in the areas where people wish to march, rather than to me.

Mrs Foster: He does not represent them.

Mrs Long: I am asking you because you mentioned good common sense. I am seeking clarity.

Mr Ferguson: I cannot speak for residents who do not want an unwelcome parade to go through their community.

As I said, there are over 2,000 marches every year, only a small number of which are contentious. When a community does not want a march to go through its area, the loyal orders should respect that, should not march, and should not insist that any commission or other body create a situation where that march is forced through an area. When the loyal orders feel that they cannot be reasonable in that respect, they should have the courtesy to sit down with residents' groups in those communities. They should facilitate dialogue and pay residents the courtesy of asking.

Members would have to admit that some of those parades go through communities only because there are Catholics living there. The loyal orders should at least pay residents the courtesy of asking first. That is not unreasonable. The assertions that parades are traditional and that there is a right to parade cannot simply be taken for granted.

I have watched marchers in parades down the Ormeau Road, putting five fingers in the air in reference to what happened at the Ormeau Road bookmakers. That was insulting, offensive, and should never have happened. We have seen many such marches, and we have seen horrible things, such as the scenes on the Springfield Road last year. If that sent out any message, it was that the leadership of unionism is poor and weak. They should have encouraged those people who wanted to march down the Springfield Road, or elsewhere, to sit down with those communities to ask them whether it was OK. Political unionism failed to provide that leadership.

This year, however, we saw some changes. Michael Copeland is sitting across the table, and he and I spoke on the eve of one such march. We tried to use our influence to support common sense and peace.

The points that I have made are fairly simple. If you want to walk through an area where you are not wanted, do not go. If you feel that you must walk through that area, sit down and talk to the residents first.

Mr A Maginness: The SDLP's position on contentious parades and the Parades Commission is well known. We supported the formation of the Parades Commission because there was obviously a difficulty, not just in relation to contentious parades, but in the manner in which the police determined decisions at the time. It was clearly unacceptable for the PSNI to make determinations, and to police those same determinations. It made a lot of sense for an independent body to make determinations on contentious parades.

We were, and continue to be, very supportive of that regulatory mechanism for parades. We feel that the Parades Commission has done a reasonable job in very difficult circumstances. That is not to say that we agree with everything that the Parades Commission does. We accept its decisions, because it is important that if a body is established to be impartial and act independently, people should accept its decisions whether they like them or not.

We know the history of contentious parades. Loyal orders wish to assert what they regard as traditional marching or walking rights in areas that have undergone radical demographical changes over a number of years. The SDLP's view is that when communities do not accept that, the loyal orders should not exercise what they regard as their traditional right to march. Alternatively, they should talk with the local communities affected by the proposed parades.

If effective dialogue were taking place between the loyal orders and local communities, many contentious parades could be resolved very quickly. Failure by the loyal orders to engage in such dialogue is preventing resolutions to what are really local problems. There can be no blanket resolution of the parades issue. Although contentious parades are localised and affect a small number of areas, they are important because they affect the political temperature and atmosphere of our society when they either go ahead or are prevented. In those circumstances, we urge the loyal orders to pursue dialogue vigorously to reach a local accommodation.

We have a divided society, and contentious parades are symptomatic of those divisions. Having a united society that was agreed on the way in which it should go forward would help to eliminate some of the contentious aspects of parading. There is no doubt that, in some areas, contentious parades are exacerbated by the negative overall political situation. Building a society here that is based on partnership, co-operation and power sharing should lead to an easing of the community tensions that give rise to contentious parades.

Lord Morrow seems to be referring to a document. It would be interesting if our DUP colleagues would share that document with us, so that we can see the rationale behind its proposals. However, subdividing the functions of the Parades Commission by creating two separate bodies, a mediation body and a determination body, which would introduce a tribunals system, would be wrong and counter-productive because it would involve a quasi-judicial system of tribunals that would become more and more legalistic and hidebound by professional legal intervention.

In such circumstances, greater problems are created. At the moment, the Parades Commission deals, on a very pragmatic level —

[Inaudible due to mobile phone interference.]

— by legal complexities. People go to the Parades Commission, present their points of view plainly and clearly, and the commission makes a determination on that basis. To subdivide the functions would be wrong and unhelpful in the present situation and, I stress, would not be a substitution for intensive dialogue at a local level.

The Parades Commission conducts a degree of mediation, which is to be welcomed and should be sustained, and, to that extent, it does a reasonably good job. Perhaps more resources could be made available to the commission so that that function could be enhanced.

The criticisms that Lord Morrow levelled at the Parades Commission are unfair. The commission has acted as openly and transparently as it can in the circumstances, and, in the main, it has acted fairly. It is important to recognise its independence and its intent to serve the interests of the whole community, not just a section of it. It is important also that the commission, when making its determinations, takes into account not simply what could be regarded as traditional rights, but rather the impact that a parade could have on community relations, security and public order.

Finally, article 11 of the ECHR is so qualified that there can be no sense of an absolute right to parade or to walk or to march — whichever one wants to call it. The very reasonable restrictions that have been put in place by the state through the Parades Commission, and through the policing of parades are consistent with the requirements, in a democratic society, for the preservation of public order. There is no solace for the loyal orders in article 11. I re-emphasise that it is up to the loyal orders to engage in local dialogue to resolve what are essentially local problems.

The SDLP is opposed to any review of the Parades Commission at this time, or in the near future, and it is opposed to any dilution of the commission's powers.

Mr McFarland: I will provide a little background, and my colleagues will expand on various issues during the discussion.

Karl von Clausewitz once said that:

“war is the continuation of politics by other means.”

In the past 10 years, parading has become the continuation of war by other means because it has become a political weapon that is being used to destabilise society.

How do we know this? Well, Gerry Adams told us in Tullamore in 1994 — an RTE journalist listened to a briefing of Sinn Féin faithful and heard Mr Adams ask them whether they thought that the parading issue had just happened. He said that it had not, and that it had taken Sinn Féin three years to stir up community groups and to get them on to the streets.

According to that report, there is no doubt that the parading issue was a political weapon to get people on to the streets. The result has been riots and the PSNI's having to remove people forcibly from the streets, with the accompanying television pictures that we have all seen. There is no doubt that it became an issue with which to beat the police and unionist culture generally.

1.45 pm

A few years ago, good sense came into the situation when some very wise people in the loyal orders in Londonderry decided that there had to be a better way. They got together with businesses, and the result, interestingly enough — until this year when they ran into a funding problem — was a week-long Apprentice Boys' festival, with people coming from all over the country to examine unionist culture in a non-threatening way.

That good sense has been followed by work from some equally wise heads in the North and West Belfast Parades Forum (NWBPF), and, for two years, we have had the makings of solutions to the parading issues — although there was a breakdown last year. Today, newspapers are reporting that it appears that a recent meeting with Ardoyne residents appears to have found agreement on a parade that will pass the Ardoyne shops. That is to be welcomed.

The NWBPF comprises members of political parties, indeed both unionist parties, community groups — some of which have very close links with paramilitary organisations on both sides — churchmen and representatives of the loyal orders. That seems to be the logical way of dealing with the situation, with people discussing and resolving issues. As Sinn Féin starts to move towards Government, and as it is clearly starting to discuss policing issues seriously and to become responsible, it is interesting that the tension over parades has decreased, as I have just evidenced.

Could it be that Sinn Féin's political weapon on policing has ceased to be as important regarding parades, and that the recent accommodation on parades is due to Sinn Féin's moving, perhaps by the autumn, to take up a responsible position on policing, meaning, therefore, that it no longer needs the parades issue with which to beat up unionists?

Goodwill all round will solve the issue. My colleagues will set out other issues during the course of the discussion.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Thank you, once again, for sticking to time. We have heard disparate views on parading — to put it mildly. The only proposal that I detected was from the DUP on splitting the mediation and determination functions in the Parades Commission. I will come back to the DUP to see whether it wishes to beef that up into a formal proposal. However, other members got their retaliation in by saying that if it were proposed, they would shoot that idea down in flames. That is politics.

Mrs Long: There may have been another seed of a proposal. Alban said that the DUP proposals were quite detailed and that it might be useful to have sight of them in order to study them in more depth. I would second that proposal, because it would be useful.

I agree that with good will on all sides, local dialogue is probably the way in which this matter will be resolved. However, discussion does not always lead to agreement, as we have found in this Committee on more than one occasion. There has to be some method for dealing with residual issues, which cannot be agreed locally.

With regard to the DUP's proposal on separating the arbitration and mediation function in the Parades Commission, the Alliance Party has been quite clear about its support for the Parades Commission and the principle of having a body to deal with the parading issue. However, separating the arbitration and mediation function is something that should be explored further. It has merits, if the situation is considered dispassionately.

Mediation is the first step in the process, but parties may be hampered, as they may be unprepared to make generous offers that could colour the outcome of arbitration at a later stage. If the same people arbitrate as mediate, people could become less flexible during the mediation process.

The decision of those who arbitrate should not be influenced by the demeanour of parties during mediation. People may be overenthusiastic with their generosity during mediation, knowing that agreement will not be reached, but they may try to create a good impression in the hope that arbitration will go in their favour. That is not beyond the bounds of belief, and it could influence decisions. There is a corollary here. If a person is intimately involved in a mediation process immediately preceding arbitration, it may be difficult to remain impartial during the arbitration process, even though impartiality is critical. Therefore splitting arbitration and mediation merits further consideration.

We may not all reach consensus on that, but it would be interesting to explore it further, because the processes in the Parades Commission have created difficulties in how it discharges its functions. The previous commission focused mainly on arbitration, because initial attempts at mediation were unsuccessful. We are cognisant of the fact that engaging in a lengthy mediation process could affect the Parades Commission's ability to arbitrate.

Things are slightly different now, and, to some degree, Alan has outlined the context for that change. There has been a change in dynamic, which has allowed the new Parades Commission to be more hands-on with mediation. However, it will be increasingly difficult if it then has to arbitrate in those situations. That warrants further discussion.

I share Alban's concerns that one could end up with an unwieldy, legalistic process, which may counteract what people say around the table about goodwill being the solution, rather than an unwieldy process. However, the DUP's proposal merits exploration through discussions.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is interesting, because I thought that the only issue on which the Committee had reached consensus on parading was the fact that we would discuss it on Fridays.

The proposal is that the DUP provide more information on its proposal. If no one wishes to speak against that, we can reach consensus. Did you read from a prepared document, Mr Morrow?

Lord Morrow: The DUP has a prepared document, and we are happy to distribute that, so that all the parties can read our proposals.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is there more detail in that document, or is it simply as read out?

Lord Morrow: Other parties had not seen the DUP's proposal, and that is why I read it out in full. It will all go on the record, so members will have an opportunity to read it in Hansard. However, if we can get photocopies of the proposal, we can pass those around.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Hansard would also appreciate a copy of your document. A member of the Committee staff will distribute copies to all the parties. That seems to be agreed. Alban has stated that he is unhappy with the DUP's proposal, and I suspect that Sinn Féin is also unhappy.

Mr Poots: Alban seems to be confused about not having had an opportunity to read it, and I can understand that.

The tribunal was something that would be set up after mediation. Alban was concerned about its quasi-judicial nature, but the first aspect would not have any quasi-judicial nature to it — it would be purely mediation.

Perhaps the main issue that we have identified with the Parades Commission is that it has two roles — one is mediation and the other is quasi-judicial involvement in determining what happens in parades. The DUP feels that to separate those functions would assist and improve the current situation.

Lord Morrow: Has there not been a request for mediation right around the table?

Mr A Maginness: I accept that the Parades Commission involves itself in mediation; that is an established fact. That role is right and proper, and it should be pursued and enhanced. However, I reiterate that the DUP's proposal would create a complex legal process, which would go over and beyond a simple determination by the Parades Commission. It would involve a panel drawn from Parades Commission members in tribunals, which would be chaired by judges or ex-judges, and that would inevitably become complex. As we all know, tribunals, including industrial tribunals, were set up to be simple, straightforward means of resolving differences in the workplace. However, industrial tribunals are now among the most complex of legal processes. One enters that process at one's peril if one does not have a lawyer.

Lord Morrow: Even if you have a lawyer.

Mr A Maginness: It is certainly more expensive when you have one.

Mrs Long: Is that an advertisement for legal services? [Laughter.]

Mr A Maginness: I think that there is a danger inherent in that. As has happened on many occasions, once the Parades Commission makes a determination, judicial reviews are sought. Those matters are heard in the High Court. That is an already existing remedy for people who are dissatisfied with a Parades Commission determination. To go along those lines would be to make determinations more and more complex and legalistic.

Mr Copeland: At first glance, I find much merit in the document that Lord Morrow read out. I do, however, feel that such is the content that I would like time to read and consider the document. I am probably the least experienced person at the table in putting forward views in this format, and I therefore ask that members judge my comments with a degree of kindness.

In New York in the late 1800s, an attempt was made to ban a procession — or a parade — celebrating the Twelfth of July. Varying degrees of influence were applied, and the parade was permitted, under protection of the law, to proceed. During the ensuing trouble, between 12 and 16 people lost their lives, some of them at prestigious addresses such as Central Park and Park Avenue. The following year, the Grand Lodge of America, having concluded that it had established the right to parade, took a decision to no longer exercise that right, and over the next decades it slipped into obscurity.

We look at the issue of parading through the colour-tinted glasses of our respective communities. We are not specifically talking about orange parades, although the practicality is that we are; we are not specifically talking about loyal order parades, although in Northern Ireland we are.

English is a very peculiar language. I came in here this afternoon and was offered boiled goats' cheese, and I had to determine whether it was the goat or the cheese that had been boiled. The way in which we use language can create difficulties. Mr Ferguson continually uses the words "marching" and "through". That terminology is a consequence of a decision that was taken at some time to make parading an issue. He may consider it to be legitimate, politically and historically, to have done so.

2.00 pm

My view is that in a democracy — and we are enjoying a degree of what passes for democracy here — every time a citizen's foot falls on the road in protest or on parade, that very action defends the rights all those who may or may not agree with that parade.

The more that we reinforce the legalistic hullabaloo that has surrounded the Parades Commission, the less likely it is that responsibility will be accepted by those who can affect the issue. The same people who have made parading an issue can make it a non-issue.

I have been an orangeman for 30 years. I cannot recall participating in anything that remotely resembled, or could be described as, a march. Indeed, the term "marching" has only recently come into parlance, even within the unionist and loyalist community. They were described as walks, parades or processions. I fully accept that people may have objections to parades taking place.

My baseline is that, in a democracy, anyone who wishes to parade should be afforded the right to do so under law. Anyone who wishes to demonstrate against a parade should also have the right to do so under law. There is a massive misunderstanding in some quarters about the reasons, history and traditions that are associated with parades. I am sure that Mr Ferguson will recall inviting me, and some prominent elected members of the DUP, to join him at the head of a procession that went down the Falls Road. He may recall my answer on that occasion.

Mr Ferguson: How quickly can we go?

Mr Copeland: He was not able to provide a flute band or a banner, and I had another appointment.

Lord Morrow: You said that you would provide them. [Laughter.]

Mr Copeland: I had another appointment. He had no issues with my parading down the Falls Road. When a certain section of our society exercises a freedom as opposed to a right, surely it must be in the interests of all society that it be allowed to do so.

Last year, a group of white-supremacist fascists — Nazis, for want of a better word — exercised a right, protected under the Constitution of the United States, to parade through Toledo, Ohio. It would have been a non-event except for the fact that those opposed to the parade allowed the situation to descend into lawlessness.

The current Parades Commission is immeasurably different from the previous one, which retreated into a bunker and took a legislative approach. The lack of knowledge and understanding that it displayed, which has been inherited by the current commission, is astounding on occasions.

On one occasion the Parades Commission claimed that some pieces of music were contentious. When I asked the commission how its decision was arrived at, it told me that it was as a result of heavy and continual lobbying by nationalist groups.

I have always held the view that music itself cannot be contentious — songs can be contentious, depending on their lyrics. It transpired that the Parades Commission had accepted that there was a level of contentiousness, purely on the basis that people claimed to be offended. An examination of some of the music concerned led the Parades Commission to re-examine their own attitudes and to accept that they were neither fit nor qualified to take the decision to apportion contentiousness to certain pieces of music.

The pieces of music were, in particular, ‘The Sash’, ‘Derry’s Walls’, and ‘The Billy Boys’. It can be demonstrated that ‘The Sash’ contains an Irish air called ‘My Irish Molly’. The onomatopoeic structure of the music indicates that it was originally written to be sung in the Gaelic language. The music for ‘Derry’s Walls’ came from ‘God Bless the Prince of Wales’, and ‘The Billy Boys’ is a Glasgow Rangers razor-gang song from the 1940s or 1950s. It astounds me that people are invited from America by Sinn Féin to make judgements about the music that is played at parades. The tune of the ditty referred to as ‘The Billy Boys’ comes from ‘Marching Through Georgia’.

I have seen documentation from people of some calibre from the United States, who, on hearing the tune of the Union Army’s most famous marching song during the American civil war, called it a Belfast street-song.

The parades issue will be resolved when we accept that there are two different opinions, and that one section of the community’s attempt to prevent an outward expression of the cultural identity of the other damages us all. In other words, we may find a way forward when those who have made it an issue cease to do so.

Mrs Foster: I thank Alan for mentioning where this issue originated. I am from the Protestant community in Fermanagh, which is very much the minority community. It is at the sharp end of intimidation and attacks on orange parades. Republicans use the parades issue as a weapon to do just that. Church parades consisting of 10 or 12 men with an accordion band, which have been held for years, are suddenly deemed offensive because republicans think that they can stop them with the threat of violence.

The kernel of the DUP’s paper is that good behaviour should be rewarded and bad behaviour should not. I think in particular of the Parades Commission’s determinations on parades in Newtownbutler and Rosslea in County Fermanagh. The Protestant community in those areas has been decimated by ethnic cleansing, and through a range of other means of intimidation and attack by republicans. Republicans cannot abide Protestants demonstrating their culture on one Sunday in the year; they cannot show tolerance to that small lodge. Sinn Féin finds such demonstrations completely offensive, and that speaks volumes about its intent on a range of issues. I want that put that on record because some very colourful descriptions have been given of loyal orange parades. I have no experience of such parades in County Fermanagh.

Alban said that the SDLP would not even consider a review of the Parades Commission, and that is very disappointing. The DUP is asking for a review, although, frankly, it wants the Parades Commission to be done away with. However, it is very prescriptive to take the view that a review should not even be allowed. It is also the first time that I have heard a colleague from the legal profession say that he does not want any extension of the legal process in tribunals. The Parades Commission, as it stands, is part of an illegal framework. As Alban rightly said, people take judicial reviews to the High Court.

I firmly agree with Naomi Long that it would be best practice to split the mediation and determination functions. It would be good practice, and it might create movement on the parading issue. That is what the DUP suggests in its paper. I do not accept that some of the Parades Commission’s decisions have been necessary and proportionate, in accordance with article 11 of European Convention on Human Rights. They have been wildly disproportionate in some cases — again, I am thinking specifically of Fermanagh.

At the very least, a review of the Parades Commission should be considered. The DUP’s position is that it wants the Parades Commission to be scrapped, and we have made our reasons very clear.

Lord Morrow: I want to respond to one or two of Alban’s comments.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I will let Mr Ferguson speak, and then you can raise those points, Lord Morrow.

Mr Ferguson: I want to pick up on comments that Alan McFarland and Michael Copeland made.

To accept their comments would be to imagine that there had never been any difficulty with any orange parade for the past two centuries, when we know that that is not true. The attempt to say that Sinn Féin is responsible for the mayhem that emerges from loyal marches is completely unacceptable. It is worth repeating that several thousand loyal or orange marches are contentious. People are welcome to parade up and down — if the word “march” offends, Members can call it what they will. I will not fall out over a word.

We cannot divorce orange marches from the history of this state. We cannot divorce them from the experiences of unionist misrule, discrimination, inequality, triumphalism, loyalist death squads, and all that goes along with that.

If we have learnt any lesson in recent times, it is that commissions, arbitrations and tribunals have not been the way in which to resolve those issues. When local communities and the loyal orders have been willing to discuss parades, they have found a way forward. There are good examples of that.

Naomi asked whether communities would be happy for parades to march through their areas. We have seen the answer to that on the Springfield Road, the Ormeau Road and elsewhere. When dialogue between the loyal orders and host communities takes place, common sense prevails and a way through is found. That must be the way forward.

A million parades tribunals could be established, and the Parades Commission could be reviewed, but the way in which to resolve this issue is through dialogue. However, let us not for one minute try to divorce the problems behind these marches from the historical experience of being nationalist, republican and Catholic on this island, particularly since partition. A century ago, there were pogroms in Catholic villages after orange marches.

Let us put it in context, folks, and understand why we are around this table discussing the issue. It is not a case of people being unreasonable about others wanting to march down their street. A blind eye cannot be turned to this issue: it will not go away, because it has an historical association with unionist misrule, discrimination and inequality, and the impact of loyalist death squads on Catholic and nationalist communities.

Mr Nesbitt: I have five points to make. The first concerns the balancing of competing rights, which Naomi raised initially. I do not totally subscribe to the idea that we are balancing competing rights, although it gives a nice balance to the argument.

A large number of the Parades Commission's determinations are laid out in a pro forma, with various rights attached and the judgement reached. The rights of the organisers, primarily the orange institutions — although in Kilkeel, it is the Ancient Order of Hibernians (AOH) — are to be considered in the context of articles 9, 10 and 11 of the ECHR.

Article 9 refers to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; article 10 to freedom of expression; and article 11 to freedom of peaceful assembly. As Alban and Lord Morrow highlighted, all those rights contain a caveat about ensuring a balance to preserve a democratic society and national security. Alban pointed to article 11 as the crucial element, although he said that it gave no solace to the loyal orders.

On an interpretation of case law, those freedoms oblige states to ensure that conditions exist for public meetings and assembly to take place. States have a responsibility to ensure that. Determinations in such cases mostly err on the side of the threat, implying a skewed logic and, perhaps, an overall bias.

It is right of assembly versus the threat of public disorder. That threat is not a competing right, therefore, there is an imbalance in allowing freedom of assembly, but not if it is likely to result in disorder. The Parades Commission often says that a decision on a parade is based on the fact that to allow it would damage community relations and would be likely to lead to public disorder — one could almost write the script. The matter is skewed, because the right of assembly is being balanced with the threat of public disorder. The Parades Commission must find a balance between competing rights.

Secondly, the rights that it says that it, as a commission, must uphold are contained in article 8 of the ECHR and article 1 of the ECHR's protocol. The commission must consider those who live, work, shop, trade and conduct business in the communities.

Article 8 deals with respect for a person's private and family life, home and correspondence. The Parades Commission has used a rather bad interpretation of that article. In case law, the right to private and family life is more a matter of, for example, whether a stepfather who marries has the access rights to his stepchildren. In other words, how is family life defined and what rights do people have as a family? That does not exactly fit in with the parading issue.

Article 1 of the first protocol deals with entitlement to the peaceful enjoyment of possessions. I presume that individuals primarily enjoy their possessions within their own curtilage, because they are one's own possessions.

I have a difficulty with the matter of balancing rights. The Parades Commission balances rights with the possibility of public disorder, and that skews its decisions.

Thirdly, if I can paraphrase Alban correctly, he said that a better political environment might be conducive to resolving the parading issue. Why do we not have a better political environment? I will not rehash the issues, but if all parties were to subscribe to the principles and practice of governance that apply elsewhere in Europe, Northern Ireland would not be without governance.

Fourthly, I agree with Arlene and Naomi: it seems that bad behaviour is rewarded instead of good behaviour. That also skews the issue.

My fifth point concerns Mr Ferguson's comments on discrimination, inequality, unionist misrule and loyalist death squads. Regrettably, that mantra has been thrown at us for years. Unionists have not been in government in Northern Ireland since 1972. That was a long time ago, so I am not sure what misrule he refers to. That was another generation. I simply ask Sinn Féin to abandon its myopic perspective of Northern Ireland and to look instead to the world of the twenty-first century.

All the statistical evidence that has been gathered since the fair employment law was established in 1989 — 17 years ago — shows that there is no discrimination against the Catholic community. We will examine that issue next week. There is no inequality, so please do not ask this generation, and this Committee, to have visited upon it Sinn Féin's perception of what happened to past generations.

Lord Morrow: There is a perception that when unionists, orangemen or Protestants celebrate their culture, it is triumphalism. When nationalists do the same, they are just celebrating their culture. Whether it be a fleá cheoil, or whatever, they can take over a village and celebrate their culture.

I was interested to hear some members say that there are only a few contentious parades — and that is true. We hear much about minority rights. Does a minority have the right to march or parade in a peaceful and lawful manner? Where is the threat when 10% of the community want to parade in a lawful and peaceful manner? That is something that they have been doing since they were the majority community, but because they have been ethnically cleansed, they have been pushed out.

The inference is that they must ask the community that ethnically cleansed it for permission to walk down a road. It would have been a fine gesture if the majority community had approached the Parades Commission and said that although the other community was in the minority, it was prepared to demonstrate that it believes that the minority community's culture is legitimate and lawful, and that it is that culture's right to walk. It would be a fine gesture for the majority community to tell the minority community to go out and enjoy its parades in a lawful and orderly manner.

If any members feel that the status quo is sufficient and that "no change" will be the way forward, they are saying that we are going nowhere. Dermot made a salient point. We hear about 50 years of misrule. Direct rule was imposed in 1970 or 1971, which was 36 years ago.

Mr Nesbitt: You were able to count that; I could not.

Lord Morrow: Since then, almost 3,500 people have been killed under the utopian system that we have had. Would someone like to tell me how many people were murdered in this country during the previous 36 years? I have no doubt that they would not come up with a figure of 3,500 — I suspect that it would be in the hundreds.

I do not want to be beaten over the head all the time with talk of 50 years of misrule. I was but a child then.

Mrs Foster: I had not even been born.

Lord Morrow: We knew all about the 36 years of misrule when we were at the cutting edge of republican terrorism; our communities were ethnically cleansed from the border areas and our people were driven out; our orange halls were burned to the ground; and our parades were interfered with and stopped. I speak not as a member of the Orange Order. If any members think that the Parades Commission is the only solution, and that there should be no change, they are saying that there will be more of the same.

Every attack and every demonstration against an orange parade leads inevitably to another orange hall being burned to the ground. That will continue until the nationalist community has someone with leadership qualities to say that enough is enough. The unionist community has a right to exist, to celebrate its culture and to parade in a peaceful and lawful manner. Until some nationalists have the courage to stand up and acknowledge that, we will see much more of the same trouble.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There appears to be a slight dichotomy between the two positions. The two sides do not seem to be moving closer. [Laughter.]

Mr Ferguson: I got that impression too.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): To give a fair reflection of the membership, we will hear three more contributions. After Mrs Long, Mr Ferguson and Mr Copeland have spoken, I suggest that the DUP proposal be put to the meeting. If it is unsuccessful, members may consider other proposals.

Mrs Long: Given that the proposal is going to be put, I will state the Alliance Party's position on it.

The Alliance Party cannot endorse the DUP paper today. We have given it only a cursory reading, and we have noticed some areas that need amendment. However, we have seen some merit in the proposals also, so we want to explore the paper in more detail.

Discussion has moved away from human rights to parades, but the interpretation of fundamental human rights has arisen again. Michael used the phrase "driven through a community". The people who live in a particular area or community have certain rights, such as the right to live free from threat and intimidation. However, they do not have the right to deny others access to and through that community. That brings us to territorial rights over particular areas. These apply not only to Orange Order parades through nationalist communities, but equally to republican parades that border onto unionist communities — or, indeed, to many other parades that occur despite the discomfort of the host community. Although we are focusing on loyal order parades, the issue is not exclusively for the loyal orders.

There seems to be an assumption that community identity takes ownership of physical location. That is contrary to good practice on human rights. We must be very cautious about how we proceed. I accept that communities have the right to live free from fear of threat and intimidation, but that is very distinct from being able to ring-fence pieces of territory and deny access.

That leads on to a wider discussion, which we need to have at some point but perhaps not today, about the conduct of parades and protests. Often a parade is deemed contentious simply because the host community is not comfortable with it. However, I see parades that appear contentious to me; I may not be a member of the host community, but I can still find a parade offensive.

Therefore, the conduct of parades and the perceived threat that emanates from them is another issue. I will give two examples. If you take a loyal order parade, the parade in itself may not be particularly contentious, but the conduct, the attire and the demeanour of some of the individuals involved in the overall procession may cause people to feel intimidated or threatened by their behaviour. We must address that. Likewise, I have seen some republican parades where the conduct, attire and demeanour of individuals could cause fear and intimidation in the community.

We are caught on the hook of this territorial issue with parades. There is a wider issue about the impact of parades on good relations. I did not touch on it earlier because I was referring to human rights, not good relations. However, they are interlinked. An individual's right to live free of intimidation is at times affected by the conduct of particular parades and by protests against parades, which can be violent and disorderly. We must explore those links.

2.30 pm

The Alliance Party contends that the idea to split the Parades Commission's functions of arbitration and mediation merits close scrutiny. That does not necessarily mean splitting the body, but it may mean splitting the functions and changing the way in which it does business.

I reiterate that the Alliance Party is not in a position to endorse the DUP paper, but we would not want it to be set to one side. We should discuss the paper, as it raises some key principles. For instance, in recent times, rewarding bad behaviour has worked both ways. A move from that to the predication of decisions upon the reward of good behaviour would have a positive impact on the parades scenario.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are you suggesting, in the event of Mr Poots's motion falling, a proposal to give the paper further consideration?

Mrs Long: Yes.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Well, we will keep that proposal on the stocks per chance Mr Poots is not successful.

Mr Poots: It is Lord Morrow's proposal.

Mr Ferguson: With the greatest respect, sometimes Naomi presumes that the defence of individual rights will protect group rights. This is clearly one of the cases in which it does not.

Mrs Long: Will you take a point of information?

Mr Ferguson: Yes.

Mrs Long: I have never argued in favour of the protection of group rights. My only interest is the protection of individual rights. The protection of group rights leaves gaps, because individuals are not protected. The protection of individual rights protects all people. If they wish to associate in groups, to claim and exercise those rights, that is a matter for the individual.

Mr Ferguson: As I said, with the greatest respect, Naomi often confuses individual rights with group rights and somehow thinks that group rights undermine individual rights. I reiterate that because —

Mrs Long: Reiteration will not make it fact, Michael.

Mr Ferguson: No, but it makes me feel good, OK?

Mrs Long: I do not deny you your right to feel good.

Mr Ferguson: OK. However, we are not talking about the denial of an individual's right to walk down the Springfield, Garvaghy or Ormeau Roads. Individuals can walk down those roads at any given time. We are talking about parades through those areas, without the community's consent, and where it is offensive. Parades cannot be divorced from the way in which communities experience them. It is a mistake to suggest that stopping those parades would diminish individuals' rights.

Dermot and Maurice are right: we have had direct rule since 1971. Due to the paraphernalia of discrimination and inequality that has been institutionalised since partition, we are sitting around a table talking about human rights and equality. We are dealing with institutionalised discrimination and a situation in which Catholics are twice as likely to be unemployed as Protestants —

Lord Morrow: So, nothing ever changes?

Mr Ferguson: Maurice, if we did not think that there was an issue, we would not be here discussing human rights and equality agendas and trying to improve matters to ensure that everybody is treated equally. Unionists have a responsibility —

Mrs Foster: That is right.

Mr Ferguson: To be honest, my colleague across the table who interrupted me is all the more responsible because she is not prepared to go into Government and do what needs to be done —

Mrs Foster: You are right.

Mr Ferguson: While she is not prepared to do that, direct rule British Ministers are eroding the education and health systems.

Mrs Foster: Martin McGuinness did a good enough job of ruining the education system while he was the Minister.

Mr Ferguson: I think Martin did us a favour by eradicating academic selection; the majority of communities suffer from that.

Setting that aside, we cannot airbrush history just because my colleagues across the table want to take a revisionist view of it, or want to ignore, for example, the fact that if you were a Catholic, you could not necessarily get a job or a house.

Mrs Foster: Are we talking about parading, or are we talking about jobs?

Mr Ferguson: The statistics reinforce that to this day.

Lord Morrow: So, you never move on.

Mr Ferguson: Quite the opposite, Maurice.

Mr Copeland and I and other people who work in interface areas have demonstrated that we can move on.

If individuals want to march down the Springfield Road, that is fine, but let us not have sectarian banners belonging to murder gangs, and let us not play offensive tunes with sectarian connotations. It is time for local residents to bring that to an end, agree accommodation and move forward. Let us put the institutions back in place so that we can get on with the bigger issues that will support stability.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I am conscious of the fact that Mr McCarthy has played a blinder today — he has not spoken once.

Mr McCarthy: Do you want me to start?

Mrs Long: He has been biting his tongue.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): He has not had a chance to say anything.

Mr McCarthy: I am happy to listen. Naomi is doing a good job, as is everyone else. I am looking at the clock in the hope that we will finish by 4.00 pm.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It has been a faultless performance, Mr McCarthy.

Mr Copeland: Mr Ferguson and I represent two different constituencies that are, broadly speaking, similar. Each has a substantial population, with a diversity of people. They are similar in every way, except in their religious beliefs and, perhaps, political opinions. Surely, the time has come for tolerance, where we can appreciate the exercising of a freedom by someone with whom we disagree, as a reinforcement of our own freedoms in society.

There may be misconceptions of my perceptions of what an orange parade is about. Mr Ferguson's views on those have been placed upon him by history, but we are where we are. The Orange Institution, the Apprentice Boys of Derry and the Royal Black Preceptory will not go away, nor will the organisations or cultural exhibitions or outworkings of the section of the community to which Mr Ferguson belongs.

We must examine a way forward whereby the people who can solve those serious issues are not permitted to hide in the smoke of quangos and legislation. One can enforce views from the top down, but, unless there is broad acceptance and toleration, the police will be brought into conflict with more people.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Nesbitt will be the final member to speak. This must be the last word on the matter.

Mr Nesbitt: Is that it, at 2.40 pm?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will then vote on the two proposals.

Mr Nesbitt: Will it take an hour and twenty minutes to vote?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): No, but I have not heard anything new for a while.

Mr Poots: For about 30 years.

Mr Copeland: For about 300 years.

Mr Nesbitt: Thank you for your words of support and encouragement.

Naomi is correct. She is not complicating the matter between individual rights and group rights. International human rights law does not recognise group rights, but individual rights. I shall give an analogy: if a person decides to play for a soccer team, that is an individual choice, but that team acts as a group and plays as a team.

Therefore, individual rights do not preclude the accommodation of the rights of individuals who have chosen to act as a group. That is Naomi's point, and it is correct.

I am sad that Mr Ferguson has forgotten nothing and learnt nothing. That may sound patronising, but it is not meant to be. I am serious. He said that Catholics are more likely to be unemployed than Protestants, and that the unemployment rate of Catholics to Protestants is 2:1, but that is statistically invalid. I will not go into that today, but I want Mr Ferguson to show me where it says that he, as a Catholic, is more likely to be unemployed. It is quite the reverse: unemployment is due to other factors.

The chances of getting a job are determined by three factors: discrimination, educational attainment, and population change. Ian Shuttleworth's book entitled 'Fair Employment in Northern Ireland: A Generation On' stated that the larger the family, the less chance of its children receiving a grammar school education and gaining qualifications. There is a correlation between family size, population increase and one section of this community.

Statistics show that, over many years, the Derry City Council area has seen one of the highest employment growth rates in the UK; yet, in the past, it also experienced one of the highest unemployment rates because the number of people entering the workforce was disproportionate to the number of jobs being created. There is an imbalance in the proportion of Catholics and Protestants entering the workforce, which skews unemployment statistics. However, there is no evidence, from statistics produced since the establishment of fair employment law in 1989, that discrimination is the cause. Rather, structural and population factors are the cause.

Nothing has been learnt and nothing has been forgotten. We will return to the issue next week — this is merely a warm-up.

Mr Chairman (Mr Wells): First, I wish to take the DUP's proposal. Members have received a copy of the proposal. The proposal is to split the Parades Commission's functions to create a mediation body and a determination body.

Do we have consensus?

Mr McFarland: Mr Copeland and Mrs Long said that the proposal has merit, but, as parties have only received a copy of the proposal today, it would be sensible for parties to discuss the proposal and revisit it in the Committee. The parties have stated that we will not reach consensus. However, it would be unfortunate if the proposal were ditched now without an opportunity to examine it. The proposal could raise its head again later in the year, and it would be sensible to try to refine it. Therefore, if the proposal does raise its head again, there will be a greater level of consensus, as members will have had an opportunity to examine it.

Lord Morrow: I agree.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will not put the DUP proposal today. I will put Mrs Long's proposal, which is that we give the DUP's document further consideration.

I encourage parties to bring documents on any issue to the table for consideration. Although I do not want to influence decisions, it would set a difficult precedent if we began to ditch documents without considering them in detail.

Do members agree?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We have reached consensus three times in a row — that is extraordinary.

Are there other parades issues or do parties feel that they have aired their views?

Mr McFarland: There are cross-cutting issues. Naomi mentioned the conduct of protests and parades and how that impinges on good relations. I have no doubt that this issue will raise its head again in discussions on equality, sectarianism and all the other issues that come under the banner of a "shared future". Indeed, I suspect that, on several occasions over the next weeks, we will debate issues that wander all over the place.

2.45 pm

Mrs Long: That is a valid point. One issue was the impact of the rule of law, and how that specifically impacts on parading. Clearly, removing the threat of violence from a situation changes the context for all discussions on parades. Related issues are bound to arise in other discussions.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is now 2.45 pm. We have finished our discussion on rights and safeguards. We could move on to discuss equality and shared future issues.

Mr Nesbitt: Mr Chairman, I said that it would take you an hour and 20 minutes to organise the vote, so congratulations to you on completing it in five minutes.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do members wish to continue our discussions? I am available all afternoon, so there is no problem. I have already lost many brownie points at home.

Mrs Foster: I suggest that we return next week to discuss equality and shared future issues.

Mrs Lewsley: I second that.

Mr Poots: Consensus has been achieved again, Mr Chairman.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes. That is four times in one meeting on parades and human rights.

There are some housekeeping issues. Item 4 on the agenda is the revised Committee work programme. Again, this keeps changing, but the programme gives members an idea of when the Committee will meet, the likely subjects for discussion, and who will chair the meetings. It allows members to keep their diaries free and to plan ahead. There is not much for the Committee to decide — we are basically stuck with this programme for the next few weeks.

Mr McFarland: The actual content of Committee meetings varies week by week because it is related directly to how well the Committee progresses. Apart from needing to know who will chair the meetings and the make-up of the party teams, we will just have to deal with the issues on a meeting-by-meeting basis. We may get two days' work completed in a day — not that I think that we will — but the content of each meeting will have to be monitored.

Discussions on parades could have lasted into next week, but they did not. As we have finished those discussions slightly early, we know that the Committee will discuss equality next week. I do not see a way around taking a day-by-day approach.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Next week, members will be prepared with their contributions on those issues. Up to now, proceedings have gone extremely well. Folk have kept to the point, and to time, and have obviously put a bit of effort into the meetings, which is appreciated.

The next meeting to discuss institutional issues will be on 14 August 2006 at 10.00 am. Mr Molloy will be in the Chair. The next meeting on rights, safeguards and equality is on Friday 18 August 2006. Again, it will be an all-day meeting, which should last until 4.00 pm.

Adjourned at 2.49 pm.

SUBGROUP ON THE ECONOMIC CHALLENGES FACING NORTHERN IRELAND

Thursday 20 July 2006

Members in attendance for all or part of proceedings:

The Chairman, Mr Francie Molloy
Dr Esmond Birnie
Dr Seán Farren
Mr David Ford
Ms Michelle Gildernew
Mr Barry McElduff
Mr David McNarry
Mr Sean Neeson
Mr Ian Paisley Jnr
Ms Margaret Ritchie
Mr Peter Weir

The Committee met at 10.05 am.

(The Chairman (Mr Molloy) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Proceedings will now be covered by Hansard.

Mr McNarry: If we are meeting on Tuesdays and Thursdays, how difficult will it be for Hansard to produce a transcript of a meeting on a Tuesday by the Thursday?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): It probably will be difficult. It will depend on the evidence sessions and the length of our meetings. Many of the evidence sessions will include presentations, which may shorten the production time. There has been some pressure on Hansard to turn the transcripts round in 48 hours. More staff are required to deal with the other subgroups. The big problem is staff holiday leave.

Mr McNarry: I do not want to be picky, but members are present, and a number of people, on this subgroup and on the Preparation for Government Committee, have rearranged their holidays. I am at a loss to know why Hansard has this problem. May I make a request that every effort be made for a record taken on a Tuesday to be available on a Thursday?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I agree that it is important that members can correct the transcript of one meeting before any subsequent meeting.

Ms Gildernew: I appreciate the difficulties and the time constraints in trying to facilitate everyone, especially as Hansard is trying hard to get it right. People need their holidays, and three months ago, no one thought that we would be meeting throughout the summer. People cannot easily rearrange pre-booked holidays. It is difficult when children are involved. I suggest that witnesses prepare presentations. Obviously, that will not be possible for question-and-answer sessions. If witnesses came with presentations, it would help Hansard.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Yes. That is important.

I will deal with the declaration of interests. Assembly Standing Order 20(d) states:

“Before taking part in any debate or proceeding of the Assembly, a Member shall declare any interest, financial or otherwise, which is relevant to that debate or proceeding, where such interest is held by the Member or an immediate relative.”

Members should have already received a copy of ‘The Code of Conduct’, together with ‘The Guide to the Rules Relating to the Conduct of Members’, which advises on the registration and declaration of Members’ interests. Those are included in today’s papers.

We have dealt with the issue of privilege in the Preparation for Government Committee. There is limited privilege.

The Committee Clerk: Schedule 1, paragraph 6 of the Northern Ireland Act 2006 states:

“A written or oral statement made by a member in or for the purposes of the Assembly is to be privileged from action for defamation unless it is proved to have been made with malice.”

I do not know how that would be proved, but that is the ruling. This privilege also extends to meetings of Committees, subgroups, or whatever. Members should note, however, that privilege does not extend to press conferences or statements made to the press. That is our legal advice.

Ms Gildernew: Do you have a copy of that?

The Committee Clerk: I will get a copy for you.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): If members have any interests, could they declare them now? Otherwise, hold thy peace.

Mr McElduff: I am a former corner forward for Carrickmore Seniors. [Laughter.]

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Dr Peter Gilleece, senior researcher, will give a research presentation.

Dr Gilleece: There is a copy of the paper in the pack. I will briefly run through the main points of the paper — it will only take five minutes. On the surface, it would appear that levels of unemployment in Northern Ireland are at a record low of 4% and that there is continuing economic growth. There is a consensus view that Northern Ireland needs a significant additional policy boost to rebalance the economy. Progress is considered to be insufficient to catch up with other regions based on the GB average.

In terms of developing a more sustainable and balanced economy, and for the public and private sector mix to achieve the UK average, the private sector gross value added needs to treble in size. It is the view of the Confederation of British Industry (CBI) in Northern Ireland that something radical needs to be done.

University of Ulster economist Mike Smyth thinks that if one accepts the argument that the current structure of the Northern Ireland economy is the result of a unique set of circumstances over the past 38 years, it can be argued that what is required to return the economy to a more normal growth trajectory is an equally unique or abnormal set of policies.

What might those policy options be? Mike Smyth has identified four policy options. First, there is the status quo — that Northern Ireland continues to depend on public sector expenditure to maintain living standards. Secondly, there could be enhanced capital allowances and research and development (R&D) tax credits. For example, Amgen, which is one of the world's leading independent biotechnology firms, recently located a global R&D centre in Cork because it was not feasible to consider Northern Ireland as a location. However, a 300% tax credit might have changed the position.

The third option is a corporation tax concession to match that in the Republic of Ireland. Mike Smyth's fourth option is high-level North/South industrial development co-ordination to capture some of the positive economic spillovers from the very rapid growth of the economy in the Republic of Ireland. To illustrate those examples, he points to the fact that 20 of the Fortune 100 companies are located in the Republic of Ireland and 50 of the Fortune 500 companies are in the Republic of Ireland. None are located in Northern Ireland.

Both the Industrial Task Force and the Northern Ireland Business Alliance have proposed actions including significant fiscal incentives to attract foreign direct investment that would encourage various higher levels of indigenous investment. They believe that, although Government strategies on skills and innovation are welcome, only by combining indigenous growth with high quality foreign direct investment can we meet the projected employment deficit.

Economist John Simpson believes that Northern Ireland needs a radical series of initiatives to build more successful outcomes and to start to catch up with other competitive knowledge-based regions.

The debate about the size of the public sector versus the private sector in Northern Ireland continues. The Republic of Ireland's public sector is 33% larger than it was in 1988. Economist Mike Smyth believes that the task for economic policy development in Northern Ireland for the foreseeable future is to achieve private sector growth, and not necessarily to cut the size of the public sector per se.

Philip McDonagh, chief economist with PricewaterhouseCoopers, believes that the picture is far from bleak, as long as existing levels of public expenditure are sustained. With the £14.7 billion infrastructure programme commencing, and Northern Ireland having one of the few growing workforces in the EU, there should be a continued boost to investment and no shortage of labour to deliver it. That situation will become even brighter if there is a managed transition from the public sector domination in the economy to it becoming one that is private-sector-led.

Entrepreneurship and innovation are now firmly established on the public and private sector agendas as priorities for economic growth. It has been three years since the launch of the strategic documents designed to embed entrepreneurship in Northern Ireland in the form of an accelerating entrepreneurship strategy, and the innovation strategy entitled 'think/create/innovate'.

Since then, in respect of entrepreneurship performance, Northern Ireland remains ninth out of the 12 UK regions in its level of entrepreneurial activity. The most recent data on innovation activity places Northern Ireland tenth out of the 12 UK regions, a drop from sixth place in 2000.

A key determinant of innovation activity is investment in R&D. The spend on R&D by businesses as a proportion of value added is 0.8% compared to the UK average of 1.4%.

Levels of university/business collaboration, a key objective of the innovation strategy, remain low. Only 2.2% of R&D spend in Northern Ireland universities is derived from UK business, compared to 5.5% across the UK.

10.15 am

Relative to investment in R&D, universities in Northern Ireland are the least efficient of the 12 UK regions, in terms of patent applications and non-software licences granted and their intellectual property income from large commercial organisations. Universities perform slightly better in terms of income from small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs) and the number of spin-outs.

In conclusion, the challenge for economic policy in Northern Ireland is to assist the transition to a higher performance economy. The challenge is considerable. A low-growth, low-productivity, low-innovation economy has powerful self-reinforcing barriers to change. There appears to be general agreement among business leaders that we need to concentrate on the crucial areas of building skills and supporting innovation.

Leslie Morrison, the chief executive of Invest Northern Ireland (INI), offers a more optimistic view. He believes that Northern Ireland must play to its strengths: a young, well-educated and adaptable workforce; a high-quality research base in the universities; a telecommunications infrastructure that offers 100% broadband access; our near-shore locations for North America and Europe and our world time-zone centrality; our excellent system of commercial law and protection of intellectual property; and an environment that is supportive of, and responsive to, the needs of business.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I thank Dr Gilleece for his presentation.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Dr Gilleece's paper is an exceptional piece of work, and it will serve as a useful template for the subgroup when it draws up its report. The paper highlighted several points that need to be reflected in our briefing paper and in our terms of reference.

One issue that emerged from Dr Gilleece's paper, which has also emerged from other studies, is how the entrepreneurial spirit is a driver to economic success in other economies. The low levels of entrepreneurial activity in Northern Ireland and the impediments to such activity rank fairly low in our briefing paper, but the matter of how we encourage entrepreneurial activity should be brought to the fore, and we should try to focus on that. Although issues such as infrastructure and poor literacy and numeracy skills are important, many things have been thrown into this just to tick boxes. If we are to talk turkey, the issue of lack of encouragement for entrepreneurial activity must be placed up front and addressed quickly, and I am glad that Dr Gilleece identified that in his paper.

Another important issue on which we must focus is the unique circumstances that Northern Ireland finds itself in as a result of a generation of the troubles and IRA violence. From the 1970s on, Gerry Adams directed a campaign against economic targets, and the bombing of our economic targets has obviously been a long-term impediment to our economic success. We must consider putting up front a special measure — such as investment or additional resources from Government — that takes account of the terrorism war and recognises that Northern Ireland needs extra-special help in emerging from a terrorism campaign. Getting those additional resources from the Government should be high on our agenda.

The paper also implies that, while there are successful economies and individuals elsewhere, Northern Ireland has its fair share of successful individuals who have demonstrated entrepreneurial drive. Many of us could point to very successful individual businesses throughout Northern Ireland — not in the public sector, but in the private sector — that have done extremely well, in spite of terrorism and all the impediments. That will probably affect our list of potential witnesses because that list relies very heavily on the public sector. We should be asking private companies that are successful, innovative and entrepreneurial, such as Wrightbus Ltd and Moy Park, to come here and tell us how they have done it.

Let us consider things that could help us to draw up a report and make recommendations, as there are people who have been successful through thick and thin. Let us find out how they have done that and learn from them, as opposed to trying to learn from organisations that are teachers, not doers. Let us talk to the doers in life as opposed to the teachers.

Ms Gildernew: I too thank Dr Gilleece for a comprehensive paper, and I welcome the fact that, in his opening remarks, he acknowledged that a quarter of Northern Ireland's children live in poverty. As elected representatives, we must take that seriously.

There have been various economic challenges for the private sector here, not least partition. The border has created huge problems for businesses to grow, and when communities are socially and economically cut off from their hinterland, that has a huge impact. There has been a lack of investment in infrastructure, particularly west of the Bann. It is also widely recognised that the private sector is not big enough and needs to grow. However, one of the barriers to that is that there have been years of political instability here, and we still do not know whether there will be an Assembly in November.

The business community constantly reminds us that we need to do our job in order for them to do theirs. As Peter Hain pointed out last year, the North is a failed entity from an economic point of view, as well as, I believe, from a political point of view. The Six Counties cannot exist alone economically. We must seriously consider the harmonisation of tax regimes. Corporation tax, in particular, has a big impact on my constituency of Fermanagh and South Tyrone, where people can look at investment opportunities a few miles across the border in Monaghan or Leitrim that are not available to them in Fermanagh and Tyrone. The comparisons between the Twenty-six Counties and the Six Counties must be considered and the fact that we must step up to the mark.

I welcome Mike Smyth's comments that something unique or abnormal will be needed. We are consistently tied to the common theme of keeping this place in line with the UK. It was also a constant theme in previous Committees that we needed to keep our policies close to those of the UK. We have much more stacked against us with high energy costs, high transportation costs, lack of infrastructure, and the investment and development that must take place in the border corridor. We cannot tie ourselves to Britain; we must look seriously at harmonising the regime across the island and working as an all-Ireland entity. InterTradeIreland and INI are doing what they can, but they have their hands tied behind their backs, as they are unable to work with the bodies across the border.

There is much more potential here for tourism, but it saddened everyone to hear the news last week that tourists were unable to find anywhere open to get a bite to eat. We have to consider seriously the whole July scenario and the orange parades, as we are again cutting off our noses to spite our faces. If we cannot attract people to visit here, we have less chance of attracting them to invest in this place. We face serious challenges, and a great deal of work must be done to bring the private sector up to the necessary level.

Mr Weir: That contribution could have been a set speech from any stage over the past 70 or 80 years. We need to look forward, but there has been some degree of progress. I welcome the previous member's commitment for us to build on the Twelfth of July as a major European cultural festival. That shift in thinking at least shows that there is a realisation of the importance of the Twelfth as a key event in our calendar and that there is a need to build on its obvious tourist potential. I welcome those remarks and hope that they can be built upon.

I do not accept the broad concept outlined by the previous member who spoke and also, unfortunately, by the Secretary of State. If he is trying to sell Northern Ireland abroad, it is highly counterproductive for him to refer to Northern Ireland as an economically failed enterprise. I do not accept that as a notion.

There are many things that we need to do. We must focus on the broader picture and look more outwardly rather than simply look down South. The notion of moving towards a much wider market will not be helped by the idea of detaching ourselves economically from a larger market and tying ourselves much more closely into a smaller market that is less than one-tenth the size.

We must be open in our co-operation across any border or boundary. We should be careful about tying ourselves in with the Republic of Ireland. We should be looking at the global market because we have seen the effect that globalisation is having in our constituencies. There is a realisation that there is no point in fighting particular battles. For instance my area, like many others, had a strong textile industry. Apart from concentrating on certain specialisms, the Northern Ireland textile industry will be a thing of the past because, with the best will in the world, we will not be able to compete with north Africa or China. The only way that some of those markets can be sustained is by moving into the high-value-added side and specialisms that cannot be supplied by way of the same level of cheap commodities elsewhere.

I welcome the paper as it provides a useful steer for the subgroup. The long list of issues under tab 8 is useful because we should not rule out any options at this stage. The paper identifies options involving research and development and corporation tax. There is clearly a range of issues to be explored, such as industrial derating and high energy costs, which are identified elsewhere.

The subgroup ought to concentrate its efforts on the private sector and considering a role for Government in removing obstacles to the private sector. If the subgroup gets into too much of an argument about the balancing effect of the public and private sectors, the danger will be that we will be making a rod for our own backs. If rebalancing is required, the Government reaction will be to reduce the size of the public sector — and that will not be particularly helpful to Northern Ireland. We need to look at indicators that will help the private sector to grow.

The subgroup's thoughts and solutions on reducing obstacles are likely to be in the form of a cocktail of measures. As with most things in life, there is no magic bullet or single measure that will solve all our economic problems. There must be a wider context. As Ian Paisley Jnr said, we must increase the entrepreneurial spirit because — whether it has been a reaction to a range of things, be it economic circumstances or the troubles — many of our brightest students from Queen's University or the University of Ulster are heading towards the professions.

I am as much a victim — or perpetrator — of that as anyone. I considered being a lawyer or an accountant and I am sure that many others did the same. Some even went down the route of lecturing, and I should perhaps refer to Ian Jnr's remarks about addressing this not as much to the teachers, but to the practitioners. I am sorry; I did not mean that in any particularly bad way.

People of my generation and from my background automatically assume that having a good job means being a lawyer, a doctor, an accountant or a teacher. We must consider how to encourage people to become entrepreneurs. Our society has been somewhat lacking in entrepreneurship.

10.30 am

Finally, I reinforce Ian Paisley Jnr's point that we need to talk to business practitioners. A criticism that has run through a number of issues is that there is almost too much of a Soviet-style command economy. We should consider how to remove barriers to allow entrepreneurs to flourish.

It is useful to hear from those in Government who deal with investment and are trying to bring in overseas investors. However, I want to hear the real problems and the real solutions. Therefore, I most want to hear from the horse's mouth, from people who have been at the coalface and have succeeded and delivered. It may also be instructive — although it may be more difficult to arrange this — to hear from those who have tried to compete in the economic world and have not succeeded; perhaps they can tell us the pitfalls. Sometimes one can learn from other people's mistakes as much as from their successes.

Mr McNarry: I add my thanks to Dr Gilleece and to those involved in preparing his presentation. I am sure that we all concur that the package was well put together and very helpful.

This meeting was OK at the start and then went downhill. At the start of a meeting of the Subgroup on the Economic Challenges facing Northern Ireland, Sinn Féin regrettably introduced political nuances. Perhaps Sinn Féin has now got that off its chest, and I hope that we will be spared that in future meetings.

I take issue with an earlier comment. I do not agree that Northern Ireland is a failed economic entity. I was saddened by the Secretary of State's choosing to say such a thing, as it has given succour to the remark being repeated. Perhaps the Secretary of State is a somewhat failed political entity in Northern Ireland and needs to be careful.

I listened intently to Ian Paisley Jnr, and I agree that it is time to hear from those who have succeeded. Perhaps we do not need to hear the full elixir of their success, but rather how they got there, what they thought, where they got their ideas and how they were helped or not helped. Listening to some of their practical experiences may help others.

No member of the Government knows where my constituency of Strangford is. Anyone who lands in either of the Belfast airports is directed to other parts of Northern Ireland. The Government have brought no new industry to Newtownards for 37 years, despite the large population of that town.

I am sure that we all have particular grievances in our constituencies. I do not want to personalise this, but my constituency has a business centre whose record on start-up companies is highly successful. Having proved their success and wanting to expand, those companies must move outside the Strangford constituency because there are no facilities for them there. Invariably, they move into another constituency, which has a knock-on effect on the workforce. Local people are trained, and companies move elsewhere.

I reiterate that I want to hear from successful entrepreneurs, if they will come to speak to us. I also want to put down a couple of markers to identify, where possible, which of the potential witnesses can and will attend.

People involved in the economy must tell us exactly what educational standards are required, and we must educate our young people to fill those jobs and meet future economic demands.

Young people are gaining qualifications that prove that they certainly have ability, but those qualifications bear no resemblance whatsoever to their jobs. We need an indication of what jobs will be required in Northern Ireland over the next 10 to 15 years, what schools will be required and then find out whether we are teaching young people to go in that direction.

It may be mentioned somewhere in the report, but we must raise the level of the cost of power in industry. We need to see the damage and effect that has on us in competition terms. If it were possible, the subgroup might agree to speak to some young people — not to give evidence, but to hear their futures being discussed.

We are concerned about, and have highlighted, the brain drain. However, it is not just about that, it is about poverty — as Michelle said. It has been shown that young children in poorer areas are not coming forward into full employment, and we want to find out what we can do for them. It may be a task for some young people to come to the subgroup, but there are competent young people in Northern Ireland, and I am very proud of them. It would be helpful to know what they are looking for. It would also be good if we were able to tell the business community what young people want.

Ms Ritchie: I thank Dr Gilleece for his paper and the members of the secretariat for the documents presented in advance of the meeting, which were useful.

We must identify all the economic challenges facing the people of Northern Ireland — including the impediments — and ensure that whatever Government we have knows how to meet those challenges. That includes the business and economic world, the trade unions and any competitor involved. We are trying to achieve a better way of living and better wealth for the people in the North of Ireland. We must also ensure that there is a fair distribution of wealth and that all the population has a fair and equal opportunity to benefit.

In looking at Dr Gilleece's paper, I was taken by the views of Mike Smyth. The Secretary of State is anxious to chide us that we have invested too much in the public sector. However, we have always had a small private sector, and to displace the public sector with the private sector is not necessarily the answer. The private sector is mobile, and it could move investment out of the North of Ireland — and even the island of Ireland — to other countries with low-cost economies and put people here at a disadvantage.

We must realise that agriculture and fishing are no longer the principal industries: they have been put in second place, and we must ensure that the people in those industries are given all the opportunities available.

We must consider issues in a North/South context. Political stability is related to economic stability, but, over the past 35 to 40 years, there were many reasons that we did not have economic stability, not least of which were paramilitary and state violence, which cannot be discounted. We need more pragmatic North/South co-operation. We must examine the options so that opportunities are available for everyone.

Recently, the International Centre for Local and Regional Development, which has links to Harvard University, published a study into the two spatial planning strategies on the island: the regional development strategy in the North, 'Shaping our Future', which is currently under a five-year review; and the National Spatial Strategy in the South. The subgroup could tap into that study. Perhaps we should take evidence from Dr Driscoll and others who are involved in that collaborative research, because they might be able to tell us how we can work together to achieve economic opportunities not only in border areas that were impacted on because their natural economic hinterlands were cut off, but on issues of social interaction. That should be looked at as well.

In the North, we depend heavily on the roads network. Most freight is carried on roads that are, of course, also used for domestic travel. The subgroup should examine the North/South railway infrastructure and the Derry-Belfast line to ensure that business can be conducted more efficiently and effectively. We need proper investment in the roads infrastructure. We must ensure that the downturn in the structural roads maintenance budget does not turn an asset into something that requires reconstruction; we could be robbing Peter to pay Paul. We must ensure that that does not happen. The North of Ireland needs a well-developed and internationally competitive physical infrastructure that meets the needs of existing businesses and attracts inward investment.

Mr Paisley Jnr: That is a good point. Business people from outside Northern Ireland are amazed that cargo and freight cannot be carried on the Belfast-Dublin train. Freight must be carried on the roads network, or an alternative network must be used. In Northern Ireland, certain commodities must be distributed via the roads network. That is absolutely crazy. This issue merits examination, so that we can find out if cargo can be carried on trains.

Ms Ritchie: I thank Mr Paisley Jnr for his comments. The subgroup could take evidence from representatives from the freight and haulage industry, who contribute to the economy. From their experience, they could tell us about any impediments or challenges that need to be overcome. We need to develop the roads and the public transport infrastructure.

The Planning Service should be more sympathetic and friendly to the business world. Something simple like a planning application for a business project or a factory takes a long time to process. That issue should be examined, so perhaps we should take evidence from the Planning Service as well as the Economic Development Forum. We should not be restrictive about whom we invite to give evidence. We must examine all the opportunities, and, most importantly, we must move on. If we continue to look to the past, we will miss opportunities. We must avail ourselves of all opportunities.

We also need to look at examples in the European Union, because we may be able to take evidence from the academic perspective in the directorate and from practitioners too.

10.45 am

Dr Birnie: I have a number of points, and I will respond to some things previous members have said. Entrepreneurship, which Ian and others stressed, is critical, and we need to look at that, because there is a danger that we could focus so much on promoting inward investment and the development of companies whose ownership lies outside the Province that we neglect indigenous or locally controlled manufacturers and service companies.

That would be a mistake because there is abundant evidence from our experience in other parts of the world that locally owned firms have a greater tie-in with the local economy. They are less likely to be mobile and, as previous members have said, up sticks with their capital and hop to other jurisdictions when markets or tax conditions change.

Although I am happy to acknowledge the considerable achievement of the so-called Celtic tiger economy South of the border, particularly since 1990, when annual economic growth in the Republic has been in excess of 5%, and, in some years 10%, many experts in Dublin concede that the outstanding weakness in the Southern economy is the heavy dependence on foreign direct investment. It is working at the moment, but there is no guarantee that it will continue to work. We need to learn that lesson from the Southern experience. We should not only look at promoting external firms; we should also look at the promotion of the local business sector.

The cost of the troubles was emphasised by other members, particularly Ian Paisley Jnr. This is an unusual feature of our economy and has been one of the impediments to economic progress over the past 30 to 40 years. We cannot say that the cost no longer exists. The recent Northern Ireland Affairs Committee report on organised crime gave considerable evidence about how paramilitary and other organised crime groups have almost set themselves up as medium-sized businesses leeching off the legitimate sector of the economy.

Being a multi-hundred-million-pound enterprise — although not the sort of one we are keen to encourage — it is sucking the lifeblood out of the economy.

Experts feel that this is just one of the causes of our economic predicament rather than the only one. It is not even the biggest cause. Our experience since the mid-1990s suggests that, while being a necessary condition for economic dynamism, the achievement of greater peace and stability, and ultimately a stable and workable form of devolved Government here, is not a sufficient condition for it — we need to look at other things.

There is the issue about what might be called economies of scale. Michelle made a point about this: the old adage about Northern Ireland being a failed entity, going back to Mr Haughey and other commentators. Obviously, Northern Ireland has a small economy, and in many cases it is sensible for us to seek economies of scale by linking with outside markets. However, we need to be pragmatic about that. I have no objection in principle to greater co-operation with the Southern economy provided that it is on the basis of mutual benefit — that is the rubric within the 1998 agreement.

Of course, ours is also a UK and European Union regional economy. Therefore, as Dr Gilleece said, in a sense we should not narrow our horizons, as successful businesses seek profitable expansion opportunities anywhere in the world.

I thank Dr Gilleece and all the staff for their background notes for today's meeting. The point was raised in Dr Gilleece's paper, and our deliberations will have to dig into this crucial question, that Mike Smyth has given the economy a number of options. We could reduce the headline rate of corporation tax, perhaps to the Southern rate of 12.5% or lower, as was suggested, or, we could increase tax allowances. The crucial point is that we have a choice. Lobbying from business community groups such as, on the one hand, the Industrial Task Force, which is headed by Sir George Quigley, and the Northern Ireland Business Alliance on the other, has given me the impression that there are strongly differing views about which of those routes we should go down. We need to be very careful to ensure that we get into that question in some detail, because there are good arguments for both strategies.

One could say that, on the surface, both those routes increase the net or post-tax profits of a company and that they are mathematically equivalent, but that lowering the tax rate or increasing the allowance is another matter. Business experts seem to feel that there are arguments for and against both routes, and we will have to get a handle on that.

I should perhaps declare an interest as a former academic economist and say that in seeking witnesses to give evidence to the subgroup, there is a strong case for us to hear from groups such as the Economic Research Institute of Northern Ireland (ERINI), which is the successor to the Northern Ireland Economic Council (NIEC) and the Northern Ireland Economic Research Centre (NIERC). Prof Richard Harris has done some fundamental research in that area, so we should consider that.

We should also question officials from the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment and other Departments. Northern Ireland should have had its regional economic strategy in place; indeed, it was scheduled to be so in autumn last year. We are nearly past the middle of summer 2006, so something in the official policy-making process has clearly slowed down. That is a concern.

Dr Farren: I welcome the opportunity that this subgroup has given us to look at economic challenges. I hope that in doing so we will shed our almost innate tendencies. On the one hand, whenever the South is mentioned, we say: "Ah, but" and talk of dark clouds on the horizon and that we should not go down that road in case those clouds cover us. On the other hand, there is another almost innate tendency to say that the North is such a basket case that the only place from which we can start is in the context a united Ireland.

The Good Friday Agreement set down the framework within which we must operate, and, given that we have such a short time at our disposal, our initial report should concentrate on the opportunities that we can identify — beyond August, this subgroup may have further work to do.

I say to Esmond Birnie that a strategy, the Economic Development Forum, is in place.

Dr Birnie: My understanding is that that is contained in 'Economic Vision for Northern Ireland'. There is to be a response from Departments, with regard to existing policies, by the autumn.

Dr Farren: I imagine that, essentially, the Department will adopt the main thrust of that report. From the discussions that I have been involved in over the last two or three years, and from observing the situation generally, I am satisfied that a clear consensus has emerged with respect to the economic vision that people share and believe that we should aim for. That vision concerns the adjustment from an economy that is overly dependent on the public sector to one in which wealth creation is a much greater contributor to overall economic development. Within that vision, there are a considerable number of identifiable targets that need to be aimed for and worked towards, including some matters that have been raised this morning.

We are not without a great deal of work on entrepreneurship. I endorse Ian's suggestion that we should talk to successful entrepreneurs, many of whom have succeeded in spite of what might have been done — with the best of motives — by the Government. Many started off on the shop floor with little or no third-level education. Although a few may have attended courses on how to succeed as an entrepreneur, they have all become successful because they saw opportunities and had the guts to go for them.

That tends, however, to be rare. We will not be able to reproduce Tony O'Reilly or Willie Wright and his family just by listening to them and then tapping whatever juices they have and squirting them into other people in order to make new Tony O'Reillys, Willie Wrights or Tony Ryans. That is not the way that it will happen; we will have to create and provide the opportunities.

Notwithstanding the high-flyers, there still needs to be a network of support systems in place to help people lower down the chain — and I say that without any pejorative suggestion — of entrepreneurial activity. We are not without a great deal of that already. On our journeys here this morning, even though it is a holiday period, we will all have overtaken, or been overtaken by, large trucks carrying goods to and from Northern Ireland, either South or across the Irish Sea to Britain and further, so do not imagine that we are starting from scratch.

There is a great deal that we can enhance in the support systems that are already out there, and we can draw on the examples of what has happened down South. Having been brought up there and having received my primary, secondary and third-level education there, I was told often by my mother to make sure that I got a job in the Civil Service as it would be permanent and pensionable.

Mr Paisley Jnr: You should have listened to her. Honour your father and mother.

Dr Farren: Perhaps I should have taken her advice.

My point is that advice was given to everyone in my class at school to move in that direction or become a teacher — and teachers are getting a bit of a battering around here. Nevertheless, that is the road I chose to follow.

11.00 am

Going into business was not even mentioned. It is mentioned now, and all around us we can see good examples of people taking up business opportunities. Michelle Gildernew can see the Sean Quinns of this world — not all of his business is located in the South. Fermanagh depends considerably on the employment he offers north of the border, as well as south.

Let us hear from successful people and from those who have already been involved in developing the strategy. I am a firm believer in the importance of a social partnership, and I point to the Southern experience of that as a clear example of the success that we should try to follow, where successful social partnerships have worked to underpin the economic strategies adopted by the Government over the past 10 to 15 years.

The Economic Development Forum provides us with a rather unwieldy, but nonetheless similar, opportunity for such a partnership to be created and developed here. We should hear from it because it represents the leading players who contribute to economic strategies as regards education, the business world, Government and — at the other side of industry — the trades unions, which are missing from our list but which should be consulted.

We may not have time in the next few weeks to consult individually, so it might be worth starting with the Economic Development Forum, given that it has produced a document that covers all the issues. It may not provide all the answers, nor answers with which we might agree; however, it would be a useful starting point in hearing from the outside world. Moving on from that, there are the Northern Ireland Business Alliance (NIBA), agencies such as InterTradeIreland, and Invest Northern Ireland itself.

Over the next few weeks, let us identify a set of achievable objectives to compile an initial report and see then where we are as regards further work.

Mr McElduff: The briefing papers are good material to reflect upon. There is no escaping the political impediments, and we should listen to civic society and the business community. The Northern Ireland Business Alliance came to this Building on 16 May, talked of economic challenges, and highlighted the requirement that the Assembly and the political institutions must function without delay. As elected representatives, that responsibility is ours and we can do something about it. Page 10 of the NIBA presentation refers to the need for a stable Government and a stable society.

The NIBA clarified what that meant when it gave its presentation.

I do not apologise for emphasising, as Michelle Gildernew did, that the cost of partition to our economy must be factored in strongly. The fact that there are two separate economic systems has resulted in great inefficiency and heavy duplication of spending, and we are certainly not making the most of our finite resources. That is in view of the fact that this island has a population of fewer than six million people. I welcome the fact that Mike Smith highlighted the difference in corporation tax between the two states; that is definitely a major impediment.

During the past couple of days, I have engaged with the man and woman in the street about our economic challenges. Yesterday, I asked a gentleman in Omagh what he thought the economic challenges were. The two issues that kept being mentioned were investment in infrastructure and corporation tax. I did the same vox pop in a shop in Pomeroy on my way here today, and the shopkeeper in Pomeroy gave the same answer. It is fascinating that the people in the street have firm views about the difference in corporation tax between the two states and the need for infrastructure. If we want to create balanced regional development for our economy, we should also emphasise the west of the Bann and the greater north-west of the island of Ireland.

Some years ago, at a Question Time, I asked the then Minister for Regional Development what were the number of dual carriageway and motorway miles in Counties Tyrone, Fermanagh and Donegal. I think that the answer was in single figures. There is also a total absence of rail infrastructure in those areas. A map of Ireland shows that the north-west has no rail infrastructure provision whatsoever. The state of the A5/N2 road from Derry and Donegal to Dublin is also an issue. The road is of poor quality, coupled with the fact that there is no rail option.

Common sense tells us, and the people are telling us, that proper, functioning, democratic institutions are needed to give confidence and stability to our economy. People are also saying that investment in infrastructure, balanced regional development and the difference in corporation tax are the issues that need to be addressed.

There is an emerging consensus that the subgroup should hear from successful practitioners — perhaps those who have experienced hurdles and barriers to success and who might want to share those. That could happen in evidence sessions, although, as Séan Farren said, our immediate challenge is probably time-limited. Briefing papers could also be provided to the subgroup. I would like a briefing paper on the contribution that the education system in the South has made to an education and skills strategy for its economy.

Chairman, you represent the Mid-Ulster constituency. Four of those dual carriageway miles that I mentioned earlier are between Cookstown and Moneymore, for whatever reason.

Mr McNarry: You are not doing your job.

Mr McElduff: You need to get back to your constituency, Mr Chairman.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I thank Dr Gilleece for his presentation.

The first decision for the subgroup is whether its evidence sessions are open or closed. That decision can be made now, or when each meeting takes place. Can we make a decision one way or the other?

Mr Weir: Mr Chairman, there should be a general presumption that evidence sessions should be open. Certainly, any meetings with Government officials should be open.

If, say, an industrialist wants a closed session, we should accommodate that, but as a general rule we should sit in open session.

Mr McElduff: I agree with that. The presumption should be in favour of openness.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): That is grand. On top of that, we have a list, but it is not complete; members may propose other names for that list. As I listened, I thought of the Northern Ireland Manufacturing Focus Group (NIMFG), as it deals with issues related to industrial derating. It is important to remember that evidence reports can be very longsome. We do not have sufficient time at this stage to produce such a report.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Margaret Ritchie pointed out, and I fully agree, that we should have someone here from the Planning Service. David Ferguson, Chief Executive of the service might helpfully be put on notice.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Yes. With the handout is an outline timetable of evidence sessions — two a week. Changes can be made to that, but if we want to hear evidence from Ministers, departmental officials and businesspeople, we should give adequate notification.

The Committee Clerk: I have pre-warned certain witnesses that they may be called for next Tuesday's evidence session. I will call them back after this meeting to tell them the times we have arranged. In my view it is important that we should have NIBA and the Federation of Small Businesses (FSB) up first. They can tell us what they believe is wrong before we bring departmental witnesses. That might give members food for thought about what they wish to ask Departments.

Liam Nellis, Chief Executive of InterTradeIreland, is off next week. We had also intended to call the Minister, Maria Eagle, and officials from DETI.

As for timings, we planned to give everyone roughly an hour: NIBA from 10.00 am to 11.00 am; FSB from 11.00 am to 12.00 noon; Liam Nellis from 12.00 noon to 1.00pm; a break for lunch from 1.00 pm to 2.00 pm; and Maria Eagle from 2.00 pm to 3.00 pm or later. On Thursday we were intending to call David Hanson and hoped that the Chief Executive of the Strategic Investment Board (SIB) would also come. Leslie Morrison is in Canada at the moment so we planned to slot him in on Thursday also.

We are aware that we need to hear many more witnesses. Esmond Birnie mentioned ERINI, and we envisage hearing them the following week, as well as the Northern Ireland Council for Voluntary Action (NICVA).

As for economists in general, we should decide whether we want to hear Mike Smyth and John Simpson, for example. I have made a list of some people members have mentioned. Margaret Ritchie mentioned Dr Driscoll.

Ms Ritchie: He is based in Harvard at the International Centre for Learning. I could give you his address.

The Committee Clerk: He probably would not come, but we might get written evidence from him.

Ms Ritchie: Yes, we could get written evidence from him, and also from the officials involved in the co-ordination of both spatial strategies. They are available in the Department for Regional Development. Officials worked with colleagues in the South who were working on the National Spatial Strategy there. Dr Driscoll led the project, highlighted the issues for them and brought it all together.

11.15 am

Dr Farren: The EDF is a very representative body. I am concerned about the time available to us. The EDF has brought together thinking from a lot of the separate bodies that are being proposed around this table, and we need to consider it at some point. Since that thinking is available in the form of 'Working Together for a Stronger Economy', whether we start off with that or finish with it, we ourselves should be confident with the document's contents. Perhaps we should invite a representative panel, which might include some of the people mentioned on the list, to take a different approach. I suggest that we contact the EDF and ask it how it would like to play it.

You have suggested that the Minister should appear next week. Would that be in the first session?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Yes.

Dr Farren: That decision may have been made because she is not available later on.

However, I would like to bounce the ideas that we obtain in the course of further discussion off the Minister later on, rather than early on, because she is one of the policy-makers.

Mr Weir: I have no problem with asking some officials from DETI to give a general overview, but I agree that the Minister should be scheduled a good deal later. That may mean that we take two bites of the cherry on the Government side. We could take an initial view of matters from DETI officials, and schedule the Minister for a later date.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We would need to check on that.

Mr Weir: Yes; we need to check up on that. It is a common theme of my party, but we should not see ourselves as hammered too heavily by deadlines.

It is important that we have an initial draft report according to the timetable that has been laid out for us. That is fair enough and no one would disagree. Given the number of issues and the number of people that have been identified around this table, it is important that we do not rush this matter. Whatever initial work is done between now and the middle of August — which is the first deadline — to some extent, we will get only a little bit into it. Irrespective of what the future holds, there could be enough work for us to meet every week between now and November, and I am not even saying which year.

There is clearly much work in that. We can bank what we have got by the middle of August, but it is important that we see that as part of a longer continuum. August is a staging post.

It is also important that we line up a number of people to speak to us. We have a relatively packed agenda for next Tuesday's meeting. We have mentioned William Wright, for example.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Perhaps Trevor Campbell.

Mr Weir: It may be useful if each of the parties contact the Clerk with names of potential witnesses. I am wary of shooting from the hip on that matter. We cannot just throw out a few names now and be definitive. There may be many important people that we have forgotten about, whose names have not occurred to us at this stage.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): It would be helpful if Members submit names to the Committee Clerk.

Mr Weir: Yes. We must give a degree of thought to that and try to schedule those people.

Mr McNarry: It is important that we are charged to report to the PFG by that date. If that report is significant, work would continue, if the PFG consented. I hope that there will be a debate in the Assembly on that report, in which all parties around this table would participate. More issues will arise when our colleagues get their teeth into that report. We could put all of the names of potential witnesses in a hat and draw them out, because we are not going to get them all. We know most of the views of those people; we have heard them before, and they all have an agenda.

It is important that we do not hear their agenda, but that we hear what they can contribute. It is also important, therefore, that the staff relate that. I do not want to be lobbied in this subgroup. I have gone through all that and heard it and I am interested in it, but I want to hear what they think they can contribute, on the broader base as well as on the individual one.

The renewables sector seems to be growing in importance. I do not know how we can address the economy without looking at that, nor am I sure how to find out about it, because it is highly commercial. Nevertheless, we should have something on that.

I agree that the Ministers perhaps should be left towards the end.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Are you suggesting Ministers and the private sector in week four?

Mr McNarry: Yes.

Mr Paisley Jnr: That is a good idea.

Ms Gildernew: I am glad to see that NICVA is included, given the number of jobs in the community and voluntary sector. The Irish Congress of Trade Unions (ICTU) should be represented in the light of the changes to the public sector.

It is also obvious that a perspective on the rural economy is missing. Perhaps Martin McDonald of the Rural Development Council should be asked to give an overview of the challenges it faces, because we must not forget that jobs in the rural community should be maintained and sustained.

Mr McElduff: I support Michelle's point that the trade union perspective needs to be heard. I am intrigued to hear from the North/South Ministerial Council's joint secretariat about the experience of the economic round table, in which George Quigley and others are involved. I would like to get some perspective from there as well.

Ms Ritchie: I agree with other members about our discussions concerning the public sector and the role of Ministers. We need to hear from other sectors in order to be able to ask the Ministers about issues that may arise.

In my first submission, I mentioned the need to take evidence from the road haulage and freight industries, because they make a major contribution to the economy, not only in Northern Ireland, but on the whole island of Ireland, in an east-west direction and in Europe. We should talk to them about current challenges and future opportunities.

The quarry products industry is a major one. Dr Farren referred earlier to the important contribution of Sean Quinn to that industry. It is represented by the Quarry Products Organisation and the Construction Federation.

Mr McNarry: Where do we end this list? I could throw in agriculture, fisheries —

Mr McElduff: Perhaps we should have a mix of briefing papers and evidence sessions.

Ms Ritchie: I take Mr McNarry's view on board, but perhaps, when we have identified the issues in the earlier weeks, there may be work to be done at a later stage, when we could take evidence from those people. The other issue is whether those groups will be submitting evidence in advance so that we can study them before coming to the meetings and be well briefed.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): That will be important. However, as David McNarry has said, they should be asked to speak within this subgroup's terms of reference, which have already been set in relation to the PFG. That gives us a guideline and ensures that they are not just coming in to lobby on their own issues, or even on the issues within the subgroup itself.

Mr Paisley Jnr: There is an issue around duplication in the groups. It is important to get on top of that. If we brought in the Ulster Farmers' Union and the Federation of Small Businesses and took the muck and the metal out of it, the issues that we are going to hear about are red tape, bureaucracy, duplication, form-filling and all of those things.

It would be useful if the subgroup could get the briefing papers as far in advance as possible so that we could tell the witnesses that we would like them to talk about the intriguing points.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): If we want to get the briefing papers in advance, we must notify the witnesses as soon as possible. The earlier we can put together the list, the better our response will be.

Mr McNarry: I agree with Ian's point. If the organisations can be identified and their briefing papers forwarded to the subgroup, they can be alerted that they may be required to address one or two points from their submissions.

Dr Farren: The work of this subgroup is meant to be strategic. As David McNarry said earlier, its purpose is not to hear organisations rehearse their own perspectives, legitimate as those may be. It is right that we ask a range of different organisations to appear so that they can focus on how they see the strategic issues that are related to the economy's development. It is not a matter of what we can do for them, but of what they think needs to be done for the benefit of the whole economy into which they and many other organisations fit. Otherwise, we will end up with lots of different papers, none of which meets at the top. We are trying to stitch everything together in a very short time. Our time is fairly limited, regardless of whether the subgroup meets beyond August, and the expertise that is available is not infinite. We must keep focused.

This may be separate to the current discussion, but many parties have frequently referred to financial packages, peace dividends and so on; I think that Ian Paisley Jnr mentioned that earlier. We must ask ourselves what any economic or financial package or dividend will be used for. It is all very well calling for £100 million or £10 billion or whatever, but we must have a clear idea of what we want to use it for.

Mr McNarry: It is important — certainly to the Ulster Unionist Party — that this subgroup does not try to negotiate wish lists and requests. Members may recall that a figure of £10 billion was mentioned at the PFG Committee. Dr Farren, you did not want to state a figure when I asked you what you thought, but it is important that we differentiate between the margins of negotiation with regard to a peace dividend and where we go with that. I agree with you to a point, but we must reach a stage whereby we can refer the matter to the PFG Committee. It is for that Committee rather than this subgroup to take it forward. I see that as a hand-over exercise.

Dr Farren: Speaking through the Chair, I hear the rhetoric about peace dividends all the time, but I have never heard what it means. We have not revealed to each other what we mean, and if at some point we want to pursue them, we at least need to know what it might mean. Whether we agree on how they might be applied is a different matter — that is where the negotiations come in. It is important that we know what it means, rather than simply putting £10 million or £10 billion on the table and then deciding what we will do with it — it will not happen that way.

Ms Gildernew: It is hugely important that we discuss a peace dividend and what is needed. We must face facts: there has been huge underinvestment in the infrastructure here throughout my lifetime. We must seriously examine where the deficits are and what needs to be done to have an impact on them.

What I have heard is no surprise to me. With respect, Mr McNarry and Dr Farren represent constituencies that are closer to Belfast than mine. If they knew the difficulties that face constituencies such as West Tyrone and Fermanagh and South Tyrone, they would realise that there are huge issues there.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Newcastle is not close to Belfast.

Ms Gildernew: I did not interrupt you when you were speaking.

There are huge issues that need to be addressed. We are not simply throwing out figures. The figure that Sinn Féin put forward is based on clear research and evidence from the Business Alliance and others. It is not merely a figure that we have dreamed up and thrown out there. There is a solid basis behind it.

11.30 am

Dr Farren: With all due respect, I was not denigrating the idea of a peace dividend. I was simply saying that we would need to know what people mean by it.

Mr McNarry: I do not think that anyone is knocking the issue. I was merely wondering how far the subgroup could take it.

When I was growing up, Belfast was sometimes referred to as Beirut, and the streets resembled what is going on in Beirut now, but here we are now. I have been listening to entrepreneurs, business people and the Government on the news, and they have been saying how devastated they are because they had only begun to put Beirut back together and, in particular, the economic infrastructure of Lebanon, but now it is all up in the air because of the violence.

People from your side perhaps have a different perspective on a peace dividend than those on my side. I do not see the peace yet.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We need to get back to discussing the economy. Dr Farren's point was that it would be beneficial to know how the money would be used; for example, how it would deal with the infrastructural neglect and other issues.

Dr Birnie: I agree with Ms Gildernew about the Northern Ireland Committee of the Irish Congress of Trade Unions (NICITU) attending as witnesses. If I remember rightly, NICITU has produced an interesting paper on the economy, so it would be worth considering inviting it, given that we should also have a trade union perspective.

The list is very impressive, and I agree that the Business Alliance should attend at an early stage. However, I go back to my earlier point. It may be a misperception on my part, but I do not think so. The Business Alliance has taken a particular view on the question of allowances versus corporation tax. It seems to argue for allowances on the grounds of practicality and what will work with HM Treasury. The Business Alliance seems to downplay corporation tax, and perhaps it is right about that, but maybe not.

However, for balance, we need to hear the other view from the industrial taskforce, which we have all heard about through the 'Belfast Telegraph' and other parts of the media, Sir George Quigley and so forth. Someone mentioned that there is no magic bullet, and that is probably right. However, the other view seems to be that bringing the headline rate down to the southern rate, or close to it, would unlock many of the so-called impediments.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are you suggesting that we should examine those two perspectives rather than having the Minister's attendance?

Dr Birnie: Yes.

Mr Paisley Jnr: It would be useful if the witnesses could see a copy of this discussion in Hansard prior to attending the meeting of the subgroup, so that they would have an idea of the type of things that we would like to know. For example, we could ask witnesses how they would apply a dividend to best effect. Then, if we are attracted by their proposals, we could put them to the Ministers in week four. It would be good to get into those issues at an early stage.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Is there agreement that we should circulate Hansard, or a synopsis of it, to witnesses to give them an idea of the type of thing that the subgroup is looking for?

Ms Gildernew: Is that doable? Is it practical, as dozens of people have been mentioned during this morning's presentation? I think that witnesses only need a copy of the part that we have been talking about.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The witnesses need to know what evidence we want them to provide. We do not want them to lobby on various issues. Witnesses could potentially come here and talk for two hours without suggesting any ideas for a peace dividend.

The Committee Clerk: Their invitation letter will contain a copy of our terms of reference and tell them that they can speak only on those three points and nothing else.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Perhaps that would be a better way of doing it.

Mr McNarry: I come from a business background, and it is about profit and loss. I have noticed, through the period of direct rule and more recently, the emphasis with which business has introduced itself to politics and given itself a political voice. It has been highly critical of many MLAs and of what they do. What we seek from businesses is their advice and guidance. We want to hear what they would do with the changes in the current education system, and what they would do with a peace dividend.

All of those things are important, but it is right that we question them and seek their advice and co-operation. We want that; there is no point in sitting with a businessman for an hour, and he walks away thinking: "They're a bunch of flipping dozos, that lot!"

[Laughter.]

OK, a couple of dozos.

You have to give him the confidence that he is actually going to divulge things, co-operate and give help.

Mr Paisley Jnr: For the benefit of Hansard, there are two "p"s in "flipping".

Ms Gildernew: I do not think that there are any "p"s in the word that he used.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Let us deal with the work in hand. Our first task is to send out the invitations for next Tuesday. Could we finalise that?

The Committee Clerk: Could we agree the timetable? Are you happy to hear the Northern Ireland Business Alliance from 10.00 am to 11.00 am?

Members indicated assent.

Are you content to hear the Federation of Small Businesses from 11.00 am until 12.00 noon?

Members indicated assent.

Are you content to have Liam Nellis from InterTradeIreland from 12.00 noon until 1.00 pm?

Members indicated assent.

Do you want the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment officials, without Maria Eagle, on Tuesday?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): What about the task force?

The Committee Clerk: Or do you want the Economic Development Forum or the Industrial Task Force?

Dr Farren: We will need both at some stage.

The Committee Clerk: We could put one in place of the officials on Tuesday, and put the other in on Thursday, if we can get them.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We need some flexibility as regards who is available.

The Committee Clerk: Do you want the officials from DETI to tell you what they are doing about their economic strategy?

Ms Ritchie: Could you not bring them with the Minister?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I do not think that we would get them separately. We are looking to get all the others, and then the Minister and her officials at a later stage.

Mr McNarry: They will be reading Hansard; that is for sure.

The Committee Clerk: So we will not have the officials at all at this stage? Is that agreed?

Dr Farren: We could see after next week's meeting.

The Committee Clerk: We will leave it until then. We will have EDF on Tuesday, or the Industrial Task Force, whatever way availability works out.

Mr Weir: Could I ask for clarity on something? We are making a substitution on Tuesday, from 2.00 pm until 3.00 pm. With regard to timing on Thursday, we have agreed a third speaker.

The Committee Clerk: Yes, from 12.00 noon until 1.00 pm. We have the Business Alliance, FSB, Liam Nellis and either EDF or the Industrial Task Force. Shall we keep it to 2.00 pm to 3.00 pm for Tuesday's meeting to give an hour's break for lunch? Are you content?

Members indicated assent.

On Thursday, we will not have David Hanson, but will we still have officials from the Strategic Investment Board?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): That would be important.

The Committee Clerk: And Leslie Morrison from Invest Northern Ireland?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Yes.

The Committee Clerk: The other will be one of EDF or the Industrial Task Force. Thursday's meeting should conclude at 1.00 pm. We must have a quick chat, either before 10.00 am or after 1.00 pm, about the list of potential witnesses. What way do members wish to do that? Do members want us to invite them to give written evidence? Do members want to do that before 10.00 am or after 1.00 pm?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We could wait to see how Tuesday's meeting goes.

The Committee Clerk: There may be some time between witnesses if a presentation perhaps lasts only 45 minutes. For the following week, from Tuesday 1 August 2006, the list of potential witnesses includes NICVA and the Economic Research Institute of Northern Ireland, with a question mark over inviting an economist as a witness; Michelle also mentioned NICICTU. Other people were mentioned, including Martin McDonald from the Rural Development Council and representatives from the road haulage and freight industry. Do members want to leave all that and make a decision on Tuesday, which would leave a week?

Dr Farren: Could we put them on notice that they may be asked to make a submission and may be called as witnesses?

The Committee Clerk: Do you mean that NICICTU should be put on notice?

Dr Farren: NICICTU should attend, but perhaps the more sectoral areas, such as an economist being called as a witness, could be put on notice.

The Committee Clerk: I have a list of potential witnesses. Do members want David Ferguson from the Planning Service to make a presentation or a submission?

Ms Ritchie: A submission.

Mr Paisley Jnr: A submission, but with a view that he may be called as a witness later.

The Committee Clerk: Should that also apply to Martin McDonald from the RDC? I shall write to the organisation that represents the road haulage and freight industry to request a submission. Quarry products are also on the list, and young people were mentioned. Should we write to the Northern Ireland Youth Forum?

Mr McNarry: Yes, if that was what was agreed.

Dr Farren: The Youth Council for Northern Ireland would be the correct channel, would it not?

Mr McNarry: If there were time, and if Maria Eagle is willing and the subgroup agrees, can she double up on education? We need to discuss certain issues with her.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): It is important to give Ministers some notice, because the August holidays mean that availability will be an issue.

The Committee Clerk: Do you want Maria Eagle to double up and discuss both education and DETI?

Mr Weir: She holds the brief for DETI too.

Mr McElduff: I feel strongly that education, skills and experience in the South should be factored in.

The Committee Clerk: Perhaps Peter Gilleece will write a paper on that for us.

Dr Farren: May I suggest another organisation because of its overarching responsibilities? Reference has been made to the tourism industry. It may be worth hearing from Tourism Ireland and the NITB because tourism touches on the constituencies of most members. Tourism Ireland is a North/South all-island body that came from the Good Friday Agreement.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Adding to what Seán has said, I think that we should put the Planning Service and the NITB on notice that they may be required to give evidence. Although we will receive their submissions, we would probably like to hear from them as well. We could extract strategic ideas from them. Perhaps they should be called on week four? I read an article in the 'Belfast Telegraph' about sick leave and holiday leave, and some of those officials may take long holidays.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The Planning Service impacts across the spectrum. Tourism, agriculture and every aspect of life have planning issues.

Mr Weir: In relation to scheduling, I appreciate that we may be looking for specific people in some organisations. However, the NITB and the Planning Service are more insulated from holiday issues and will be able to provide witnesses because they have more staff.

However, if we want to hear from specific individuals, such as Maria Eagle, we should ask them to check their timetables urgently. If she is on holiday, that will have an impact on the timetable.

The Committee Clerk: What are we agreeing to do? Shall we put the Planning Service and the NITB on notice?

Mr Weir: Perhaps we should discuss that issue next week. However, if we identify specific people, we need to chase them up quickly.

That could be done now, particularly as, at some stage, we will want to ask Maria Eagle to attend. We need to contact her office as soon as possible to find out her timetable.

The Committee Clerk: David mentioned renewable energy. The Enterprise, Trade and Investment Committee of the previous Assembly held an inquiry into energy, and Brian Norton from the University of Ulster at Jordanstown, who is an expert on that subject, attended. Should we ask him for a submission?

Dr Farren: Brian is now president of the Dublin Institute of Technology and may not be available. However, there is an umbrella group for the renewables industry, but I do not know its title. The wind farms and such like are members of it. The Department will know.

11.45 am

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We will move on to other business. We discussed issuing a press release about the subgroup's first meeting.

The Committee Clerk: We have drafted a press release, and if members want it sent out, we can do that.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): A press release would be useful for organisations that might want to make presentations to the subgroup.

The Committee Clerk: Anyone who clicks on the Committee on the Preparation for Government's page on the Assembly website will be directed to the subgroups. The minutes of proceedings, the press release — if issued — and Hansard will all be available to the general public.

Ms Gildernew: The statement to the press is grand and factual, but it does not cover the work that has been done. The chart shows that we are hitting the ground running and that we intend to dedicate ourselves to this matter over the coming weeks and get good work done. It would help if people could see that we are serious about the subgroup and the work involved.

Mr Weir: Can I suggest two things? First, I appreciate the point made about the draft work programme. Reference should be made to the fact that the subgroup has agreed to meet twice a week. A complication arises because some people have not yet been contacted, and therefore I do not think that it can be released.

Ms Gildernew: I am not suggesting that.

Mr Weir: I was not suggesting that you were. We need to make specific reference to the fact that the subgroup will meet twice a week and will continue its work throughout the summer. The press release would also be useful as it would save any confusion by having the press state that all parties were represented at the first meeting. There may appear to be a boycott by one party — I could say: "not the usual suspects".

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): That would be useful, and it would also underline that the subgroup will take evidence throughout the summer.

Dr Farren: Touché.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are we all agreed on that?

Ms Ritchie: Should we not also specify the terms of reference of the subgroup and that we will be seeking evidence from other groups as well? We may benefit from the advice and expertise of groups not mentioned in the press release.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): It might be worthwhile to invite other groups to make written submissions. They could then be called to give evidence if we thought it necessary.

Dr Farren: Will the contribution of higher and further education be captured in any of the submissions? Barry mentioned the Southern experience, but we need to hear what our Northern institutions are doing.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): That would be important, particularly with the Minister's line.

Dr Farren: Shall we write to Queen's and the University of Ulster?

The Committee Clerk: We have suggested bringing in people from Queen's University.

Dr Farren: Yes, I see that. Is that just Queen's?

The Committee Clerk: No; that means people from Queen's and the University of Ulster at Jordanstown (UJU). It is a joint briefing.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do they have some sort of a joint approach?

The Committee Clerk: There is a joint briefing between the Research and Regional Services directorate in Queen's and the Office of Innovation and Enterprise at the University of Ulster.

Dr Farren: OK. Is the further education sector involved through the Association of Northern Ireland Colleges (ANIC)? If so, that means that we would get them all.

The Committee Clerk: We will get a submission from that group as well.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We also had a letter for the Secretary of State.

The Committee Clerk: That is a courtesy letting him know that we intend to invite his officials.

Mr McNarry: Does the letter say: "Dear Peter, while you are lying on the beach sunning yourself"?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are members content with that letter?

Members indicated assent.

The Committee Clerk: Are members content for us to make changes to the press notice and issue it.

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Is there any other business?

Mr McNarry: If the room is going to be as warm as it is now, will we get air conditioning?

Dr Farren: The heatwave may have passed.

The Committee Clerk: We could borrow an air conditioner that is used for some of the server rooms, but it can be noisy, so it may affect Hansard.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The next meeting is scheduled for Tuesday. To clarify, as happens in the Preparation for Government Committee (PFG), the Chairman who is observing will also sit in on the next meeting. That is so that the Chairmen can be continually involved.

SUBGROUP ON THE ECONOMIC CHALLENGES FACING NORTHERN IRELAND

Tuesday 25 July 2006

Members in attendance for all or part of proceedings:

The Chairman, Mr Francie Molloy
Dr Esmond Birnie
Mrs Diane Dodds
Dr Seán Farren
Mr David Ford
Ms Michelle Gildernew
Mr Mitchel McLaughlin
Mr David McNarry
Mr Sean Neeson
Mr Edwin Poots
Ms Margaret Ritchie

Witnesses:

Mr Frank Bryan	}	Northern Ireland Business Alliance
Mr Declan Billington
Dr David Dobbin
Mr Stephen Kingon
Dr Michael Maguire
Mr George Dorrian	}	Federation of Small Businesses
Mr John Friel
Mr Glyn Roberts
Mr Aidan Gough	}	InterTradeIreland
Mr Liam Nellis

The subgroup met at 10.08 am.

(The Chairman (Mr Molloy) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I welcome members and remind them to switch off their mobile phones. The session is being recorded for Hansard, and mobile phones interfere with the recording equipment.

The mother of Cathie White, the Committee Clerk at last week's meeting, died on Friday and was buried yesterday; there is a sympathy card circulating if members wish to sign it.

The Committee Clerk: We have received apologies from Alasdair McDonnell — Seán Farren will attend in his place — and from Ian Paisley Jnr and Peter Weir, who will be substituted by Diane Dodds, who will be slightly late, and Edwin Poots, who will be here in a moment or two, as will Michelle Gildernew, who is on her way back from Westminster.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Members will have copies of the draft minutes of the meeting held on 20 July. Can they be agreed?

Members indicated assent.

The Committee Clerk: Members should bear in mind that the minutes will appear on the website and will be available to the public.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The Economic Development Forum (EDF) was invited to attend this session but declined. As it is an overarching body, and as the subgroup will be taking evidence from a number of its constituent groups, it felt that its attendance would be inappropriate.

Mr McNarry: For the record, who are “Hutchinson, Graham” and “Lamb, Edel” who received a copy of the e-mail? This is an Assembly Committee, and this e-mail has been circulated to people that I do not know and those sitting at the top table do not know. Who are they and for what purpose have they been circulated the e-mail?

The Committee Clerk: I have just arrived back, David, so if you pass me a copy of the e-mail I will check it out.

Mr McNarry: It is on the file.

Dr Farren: I recognise one of the names: Graham Hutchinson is associated with the EDF.

The Committee Clerk: I think that they are all associated with the EDF.

Dr Farren: It would be appropriate for them to be informed, since the EDF was invited. They are the civil servants who service the forum.

The Committee Clerk: That is the explanation.

Mr McNarry: If that is the case, fine. I am not sure that I would expect them to be circulated on this issue.

You could infer from the EDF communication that as it claims to represent the majority of key players, perhaps we should dispense with inviting the key players and just ask the EDF. It has a dual role. However, I do not want that interpretation because the EDF is presumptuous in its communication. It is important that the EDF attend as a representative, stand-alone group.

This subgroup is an offshoot from the Preparation for Government Committee, to which we are asked to report back. I cannot accept that, in making preparations for Government, it would be inappropriate to ask the people whose primary role is to provide advice for Ministers to share that advice with the subgroup. It is an important role, and I would like to know what advice the EDF is giving to Ministers.

Will the subgroup concur that we advise the EDF that we require a senior presence to co-operate with the subgroup?

Mr Neeson: I would not get so hot under the collar. All of the bodies that sit on the Economic Development Forum are coming to give evidence. Members of the subgroup have attended meetings of the EDF on occasion. It would be duplicating the evidence given to us by the other bodies that have been invited.

Dr Farren: I agree more with what David McNarry said. The advice of the EDF is not given to Ministers in private. A publication — which is a distillation, I take it, and an agreed document — come from the consultations with the EDF. Since we will not be in a position to reinvent the wheel, and since we have a short time to make an initial report, it would be helpful to have a sense of how the EDF arrived at this consensual document. That does not mean that we agree with it or that all of the members represented on the forum agree with it. However, it would be helpful to hear some of the independent voices represented on the forum, as they may not all agree with everything. We can study what the EDF produces ourselves, but it would be helpful to hear from some of the key players in it and then arrive at our own decisions.

If this subgroup manages to produce even a single document, it will be one for which people have had to tuck and weave their own views and allow them to be meshed with those of others. All policy documents are compromise documents, based on the input of those involved.

I find the situation strange. Perhaps EDF could come before the subgroup at a later date because, of course, the Minister has been invited to attend later as, regrettably, she is not available until September.

10.15 am

Mr McLaughlin: My experience of EDF is that it comprises a disparate group of people and there are significant internal dynamics. Its published report — to which Seán referred — was based on a loose consensus, and I suspect that it would not be the most difficult task to get amongst them and discover that, at times, there are radical differences of opinion. The chronology that Seán suggested might allow this subgroup the opportunity to talk to EDF, but perhaps we should talk to its representatives at the end of the sequence, as the work of the subgroup is developed.

EDF may be reluctant to come forward because it does not feel that it has a position that is coherent and cohesive enough to withstand rigorous cross-examination. EDF processes its work by commissioning and discussing reports and, in my experience, they quite often disagree on their content. We could end up spending a lot of time exploring EDF's disagreements, rather than concentrating on issues that are salient and useful to the subgroup.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Yes; we could spend time refereeing. It seems that it would be more beneficial if EDF were to meet as a group and then come before the subgroup. Seán's point about EDF coming here later is a possibility.

Dr Birnie: I will be brief, because I agree with David and Seán. It is relevant to us to know what advice EDF is giving the Secretary of State, and it would be a pity if its real reason for declining the subgroup's invitation was that it does not want the public — through the subgroup — to have access to that.

In a sense, EDF is the current substitute for the old Northern Ireland Economic Council (NIEC). If NIEC were still in existence, we would have had no difficulty in getting its representatives to come to give evidence. It indicates a regrettable change in how advice is given on economic policy-making here. It has become less transparent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are members happy for me to write to EDF to invite its representatives here and to make the point that the subgroup wishes to speak to them due to their experience in advising Ministers? The subgroup cannot compel a witness to come forward; it can request that it does so.

Mr McNarry: We said from the outset that we did not want lobby groups coming here to lobby us. We said also that we would facilitate those who did not want to make public statements but who would be content to give statements less publicly. It is important that EDF attend the subgroup, and I thank those who have supported that request. I know that we cannot compel EDF to attend, but I put on the record that even though it may be a ministerial decision, I will take a dim view if it refuses to attend. I see no reason for its refusing.

I do not wish to be pedantic about it. Sean Neeson is right to say that there is no need to get hot under the collar; I am not getting upset about it. However, its correspondence to the subgroup is a "go and get lost" letter, and I do not like those.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We will proceed, because there are evidence sessions this morning.

To deal with the issue of privilege, I restate that limited privilege arrangements apply to subgroup members, in the same way as in the Assembly. However, those arrangements do not extend to those who give evidence to the subgroup. Therefore, I will point that out to today's witnesses.

Members have copies of the list of potential witnesses. Also, I can advise members that we hope to receive the Hansard transcript of this meeting within 24 hours.

The Committee Clerk: Members should report any suggested amendments to the transcript to Colin Jones on Ext. 21767 within 24 hours. The 24-hour turnaround for suggested amendments will apply to witnesses also.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Therefore, if members have any comments to make or questions about the evidence, they should contact Colin Jones.

Alan will now take us through the revised programme of work.

The Committee Clerk: We did not receive many phone calls with additional suggestions for the transcript of last week's meeting. However, a lot of suggestions are contained in the transcript. We have listed those and circulated them to members. There are two lists, one of which shows confirmed evidence sessions. Members have also received the revised work programme, which includes the confirmed evidence sessions.

If the subgroup runs with the idea of three evidence sessions per meeting and two meetings per week, the revised work programme offers a minimum of eight slots to take evidence from witnesses. I suggest that three evidence sessions are as many as members would want to take in one meeting, as it would mean three hours of witnesses plus the other business of the subgroup.

In theory, members could invite three groups of witnesses on 10 August, but that would leave us with limited time in which to produce the subgroup's report. From speaking with Committee on the Preparation for Government staff, my understanding is that there may be a couple of day's leeway on the 18 August reporting date. Therefore, I have suggested that in week commencing 15 August the subgroup provide a draft report, outlining its recommendations and conclusions. If PFG agrees those, it would allow us to fill in the details. It is really the recommendations and conclusions on which we need to have absolute agreement and clarity.

If we run with that approach, the final draft report will be ready for members on 17 August, which is the day before the deadline. It is a tight timescale, particularly if members decide to include an extra evidence session on 10 August.

The list of confirmed evidence sessions has been circulated to members. The transcript of last week's meeting highlighted that there are a lot of other potential witnesses. Given that the subgroup has only a month to conclude its business, it is important that members focus strategically on hearing evidence from appropriate witnesses in order that the subgroup should meet its terms of reference.

There have been many cross-party suggestions that it would be useful to include the doers — those people who are successful practitioners — in the list of witnesses. We have listed those people among the potential witnesses. I suggest that members include some of those people and groups. However, it is for the subgroup to determine its priorities. There is a minimum of eight evidence slots, and a maximum of 11. It is for members to decide whom it would like to invite, on top of those already invited.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do members have any suggestions as to who would be a priority?

Dr Farren: Are the first sets of suggested witnesses included in the sessions identified so far?

The Committee Clerk: Yes.

Dr Farren: Therefore, we are moving through the additional proposals and highlighting any people or groups not there whom we think should be there.

The Committee Clerk: Yes. If the three Departments are taken separately, there are 12 groups, meaning that there is one witness more than the maximum number of evidence sessions. It may be that members would wish to invite just one of the economists. Mike Smyth was mentioned quite a lot during last week's meeting.

Dr Farren: Would it be possible when inviting the Mike Smyths of this world to have Mike Smyth and John Simpson together?

The Committee Clerk: That would be subject to their diaries.

Dr Farren: If that were the case, I suggest inviting John Bradley from the Economic and Social Research Institute (ESRI) in Dublin, who has been involved as a consultant to the former Northern Ireland Economic Research Centre. Esmond and others might be familiar with his work on the all-island perspective.

He contributed to a conference in Armagh not so long ago on this very subject. I would like to propose him, and I just wonder whether the three of them could be taken in one session. Perhaps it could be lengthened by half an hour, so that we would have both the local and wider perspectives, which are essential.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are members content with that? We will bring in all three — depending on their availability, of course.

Ms Ritchie: I think we could then counterbalance that by hearing what practitioners have to say — such as the Quinn Group; William Wright's company, Wrightbus Ltd; and perhaps Moy Park.

Mr Neeson: I know through the Assembly Business Trust that Ivan McCabrey of Mivan has been very active with international success.

Dr Farren: Are all strategic interests represented? I suggested John Bradley not only to have another name but to have a strategic overview. Is there any other individual, a doer as it were, who could add to what the existing set of doers are going to say in a strategic sense? It is not personal stories that we want; it is what those personal stories can teach us about the strategic direction to be followed. That is important.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): All of it has to be kept within the terms of reference of the subgroup. Are there any other names?

Mr Poots: Graham Gudgin is another name. He was involved with the last Executive and has considerable knowledge about people who are advisers.

Tourism is an area in which we anticipate significant growth, and we should be getting significant growth. I should like to see the tourism industry represented via written and oral submissions. Agriculture should also be represented, as is still the largest single industry in Northern Ireland's manufacturing economy. The freight haulage industry is an industry with particular problems, but it is of critical importance given Northern Ireland's peripheral location. It would be useful to get oral or written submissions from those three groups.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The Ulster Farmers' Union will link in agriculture when we come to hear from the trade unions.

The Committee Clerk: As mentioned last week, the witnesses on the list are all organisations and entrepreneurs. The subgroup may want to consider whether the Northern Ireland congress or whoever should be included as a key witness.

Dr Birnie: Chairman, the Northern Ireland Committee, Irish Congress of Trade Unions (NIC.ICTU) has produced a report on the economy.

Mr Poots: I do not think that the Ulster Farmers' Union is associated with the Irish Congress of Trade Unions. It is not a public-sector body; it represents a particular industry.

Mr McLaughlin: Perhaps we could consider inviting submissions from the three cross-border organisations. They represent a significant social and economic interest. I have done some work with these groups over the years, and I am aware that they have up-to-date material that would be relevant to the work of the subgroup. We should not crowd the calendar, but they would be glad of the opportunity to write to the subgroup and make a submission.

The Committee Clerk: In that case, we will ask them for it.

To recap for the benefit of members: if we work with a maximum of 11 including the meeting on 10 August, we have more than three per session at this stage, and 13 if we include NIC.ICTU and the Ulster Farmers' Union as oral submissions. Then there is Mivan and Ivan McCabrey, so you have got 14 at the moment.

Therefore, members can choose to prune the list of potential witnesses, or we can invite the full list and organise an additional meeting.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): It may be that some of the potential witnesses will be unable to attend within the time available to the subgroup.

10.30 am

Mr Ford: Seán Farren made a good point a few minutes ago. We need to see how witnesses might fit together. For example, Moy Park might fit into one neat section with the Ulster Farmers' Union. Hearing witnesses such as those together would provide us with different aspects of the one basic protest.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Yes. They might tell also of associated problems.

We will leave that at this stage to let the clerks try to piece our discussions together.

The Committee Clerk: To give people the opportunity to meet with others if they have to, and to make written submissions, we need to issue the invitations today.

Dr Birnie: Chairman, Seán suggested John Bradley in addition to Mike Smyth and John Simpson. If any of them are not available, I suggest you look to the Economic Research Institute of Northern Ireland (ERINI), and possibly, in that context, to Prof Richard Harris, who has done some studies on investment incentives.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): OK, representatives from the Northern Ireland Business Alliance will make the first presentation. We will ask them to complete their presentation and take members' questions. We are trying to tie it down to one hour.

The Committee Clerk: Once we start, the red button will be pressed, meaning that the session will be transmitted across the Building. Members should bear that in mind when deciding what to say.

Dr Birnie: I have always done that.

Mr McNarry: No four-letter words, Esmond.
[Laughter.]

Dr Birnie: You keep me in order, then.

Mr McNarry: I will.

Dr Birnie: Don't let me get too excited.

The Committee Clerk: The button has been pressed.

Dr David Dobbin (Northern Ireland Business Alliance): Good morning.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Gentlemen, you are very welcome. Sorry for keeping you a little late. We have been trying to finalise the other witnesses that we wish to invite to give evidence to the subgroup. Hansard is recording this session, and its transcript will be available to you within 24 hours to allow you to make any corrections or amendments that you might want. Although members have limited privilege in this subgroup, unfortunately, those giving evidence do not have any privilege whatsoever. [Laughter.]

I am sure that will not make any difference to you. Would you like to introduce your team and make your presentation?

Dr Dobbin: Before we start, may I check the timing? As we are starting late, what is our target?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): One hour.

Dr Dobbin: Thank you. Our delegation is slightly depleted due to holidays. The Northern Ireland Business Alliance represents the Confederation of British Industry (CBI); the Institute of Directors (IOD); the Northern Ireland Chamber of Commerce; and the Centre for Competitiveness. I am David Dobbin and I am a past chairman of the CBI.

My colleagues and I plan to speak for 10 or 15 minutes, leaving most of the hour for discussion with, and questions from, the subgroup. I hope that many of you attended our presentation to the Assembly on 16 May. Today's submission builds on that presentation. I understand that you have copies of it.

There is widespread consensus between business, Government and the various economic commentators that the apparently strong performance of the local economy conceals underlying weaknesses and problems that must be addressed. Those issues are: an over-dependence on the public sector and public expenditure; an underdeveloped private sector that is relatively unsophisticated; low levels of business start-up and spending on research and development and innovation; and low levels of labour market participation or economic activity, as it is known.

That is also characterised by relatively high levels of long-term unemployment and, indeed, some areas of the Province where there are low levels of growth and economic activity.

Finally, we believe that, under current UK Exchequer pressure, the subvention that we rely on to maintain our economy at current levels is under threat. Projections carried out by economists working for the Economic Development Forum show that if we maintain current Government policies, we will not be able to close the prosperity gap between Northern Ireland and the rest of the UK or Southern Ireland.

We contend that radical policy changes are required if we are to change the trajectory of the local economy. When we met the Assembly, we talked about creating 140,000 quality private-sector jobs and about trying to grow the economy at a rate of 5%. There has been a great deal of debate between economists since then about whether those figures are correct. We suggest that the Assembly must confirm the challenges ahead with regard to targets for job creation and economic growth and establish how the proposals from various groups would address those. Some form of study or work must be done to ensure that the future policy of a devolved Executive is driven by evidence and fact as opposed to opinion.

The challenge ahead is to close the gap that exists in economic activity, wages and gross value added per person; to reduce long-term unemployment; and to ensure that there are sufficient quality jobs to employ the many young people that have to leave Northern Ireland each year to find work in the rest of the UK and beyond.

We believe that the gap can be best closed only in the context of devolution. That is because we have unique problems that are quite different from those in other regions of the UK. We have a land border with Southern Ireland and the legacy of civil unrest. We need a tailored strategy for this region. We do not believe that Northern Ireland Office and direct rule Ministers applying national policies will do any better than achieve a similar level of growth to that in the rest of the UK. We need to grow faster to close the gap.

Furthermore, to re-balance the economy we must encourage private-sector activity so that we are less dependent on the public sector and public expenditure. Over the next five minutes we will focus on how we can achieve that.

There are no silver bullets; there is no quick fix. Whatever we do to address this problem is part of a long-term process. We believe that that would be best achieved by some form of social partnership between the public and private sectors, business and elected representatives, and trades unions and the voluntary sector.

A business-friendly environment must be created that supports the conditions for growth and is attractive to international investors, who must be persuaded that we have a stable and safe investment location. To do that, we need political stability and an end to paramilitary activity, sectarianism, criminality, disorder and unrest. We must normalise this society so that it is as welcoming as any other part of Europe to businesses, visitors and people coming to live here.

If we are going to move from a public- to a private-sector-led economy in an increasingly competitive world and create the growth and jobs that we have talked about, we must do a number of things. This is the core of what we are saying. We need to promote proactively investment in business formation and growth. We need a flexible and competitive fiscal environment. A skills strategy and action plan that matches the future, rather than the past, needs of the community and the economy, is necessary. We need a sustained investment in infrastructure. We must increase the levels of innovation and technology transfer, and ensure that the changes that take place in the public sector support the transition to a private-sector-led economy.

Finally, we must ensure that we have flexibility and responsiveness in regulation and planning.

We must ensure that we exploit the opportunities that exist on the island for all-island markets and an all-island economy. My colleague Stephen Kingon, who is chairman of the Northern Ireland Centre for Competitiveness, will now deal with the fiscal issues.

Mr Stephen Kingon (Northern Ireland Business Alliance): As David has said, one of the problems that we face is increased global competition in a competitive fiscal environment. Northern Ireland has some financial incentives, but we have a fiscal regime that is not as competitive as any elsewhere. Puerto Rico has a corporate tax rate of 1·5%, and approximately 30 countries have reduced their tax rates in the past 18 months. Even the emerging eastern European states are trying to compete on tax rates.

David said that, although it is fundamental that we are attractive to inward investment, we must encourage investment through our indigenous business. Obviously, a competitive tax rate is one way in which to do that. Issues arise such as EU competitiveness and how the sovereign tax rate can be changed, but there are other ways in which to create an effective tax regime.

As a developed country, we must play up the value chain, so in the key areas of innovation, skills technology and export orientation, tax credits can be used to encourage investment by businesses and to promote Northern Ireland as an attractive centre of excellence for inward investment.

The Chancellor has previously allowed accelerated capital allowances in Northern Ireland. That he has differentiated at a sub-regional level means that a precedent has been set. To encourage business investment, the re-introduction of accelerated capital allowances would assist us. There should be some fiscal flexibility in some of the indirect taxes to allow for, as David mentioned, anomalies that arise on the island because of the land border and the tax regime. We should look at how we effect some of the indirect taxes. Moreover, other areas of flexibility could be covered by looking at, among other things, the old enterprise zone requirements.

Dr Dobbin: Declan will now comment on infrastructure and innovation.

Mr Declan Billington (Northern Ireland Business Alliance): I want to focus on competitive infrastructure — how infrastructure can help us to become globally competitive, how it can help economic growth and possibly even employees' economic participation.

We are an island that is next to an island that is next to Europe, and that puts business at a disadvantage when competing in a global economy. Moreover, versus Asian and eastern European markets, we are not a low-cost economy, so we must concentrate on value. Value is about the supply chain as well as about the product. If we think about the supply chain, Northern Ireland focuses on service. For Northern Ireland to move up the value-added chain — competing in Europe and globally — it must be in a position to enter time-sensitive markets, in which the customer is prepared to pay a premium for the service.

Taking international air routes from Northern Ireland as an example, any business that exports services and consultancy, or even technical support for products, must be able to support those through prompt delivery of skills to the customer anywhere in the world. Where businesses operate off regional hubs, time is added. When time is added, cost is added. The fact that our international air-route structure is not as well developed as others elsewhere disadvantages us in the market, and that must be rectified.

The supply chain is very important to manufacturing locations that export to Europe. Businesses do not want to risk running off an infrastructure that may create problems for them in getting their products to ports for export. Missing a connection out of Belfast could add two days to the time it takes to deliver products to continental Europe — seven days as opposed to five days. Therefore, if we want to grow the economy of Northern Ireland, infrastructure will play a critical part.

10.45 am

If we want to address employment and move industry deeper into the Province, we will have to improve our roads infrastructure to encourage businesses to move further afield — poor infrastructure puts our businesses at a competitive disadvantage. Poor infrastructure also means that our businesses may not be able to locate in rural areas in order to create employment there, because people measure travel to work by time rather than by distance. Building a good infrastructure gives people more opportunities for employment outside their communities. They would also bring greater wages into their communities, which, in turn, would stimulate local service jobs — restaurants and supermarkets — which might involve more local participation in the community. That is why infrastructure plays an important part in competition and in addressing the problems of unemployment black spots.

We have talked about the physical infrastructure, but the knowledge infrastructure — not just the bricks and mortar of the universities — is also important. If they want to compete on the international stage, they need to have critical mass and be adequately resourced. That is not just a question of facilities but also of third- and fourth-level education and of the support available for research and development posts. Multinationals that want to invest in research and development will want to know that there is a critical mass of graduates and postgraduates to support it. My colleagues will pick up on the issues surrounding skills and education.

Dr Dobbin: I stress that we need a world-class infrastructure with electronic connectivity, and we are starting to see that locally in good measure. As Declan said, we need the necessary hardware in our roads, ports and airports. One of the key elements in our presentation is that public-sector behaviour can have a big influence on how we develop the private sector. I would like to ask Frank to comment briefly on public-sector reform and how we can refocus the public sector to help to drive the economy.

Mr Frank Bryan (Northern Ireland Business Alliance): Thanks, David. I will touch briefly on where we are at the moment. There is consensus that, as we move into the twenty-first century, what we have is simply not good enough. There is also consensus that it is not healthy for an economy to be over-dependent on the public sector: at the moment, more than 60% of our gross domestic product depends on the public sector. That has many spin-off effects on how we operate as an economy.

The original narrow remit of the Review of Public Administration did not make sense. The figures show that the review accounts for only 5% of the public spend that currently goes through the councils, although that percentage might rise to 10% through the Review of Public Administration. If we are serious about making changes, we need a complete overview of how the public sector in Northern Ireland is run. From a business perspective, we welcomed recent comments that a debate can start that will go to the heart of the Civil Service here.

There are opportunities for designing public-service delivery around the citizen. In order to manage change — and we take into account the very difficult transition that would be required — it would be necessary to tie into private-sector expertise. We see an opportunity to use the reform agenda to drive an economic agenda. That agenda may take many shapes and forms, but if some service delivery could be outsourced — for example, shared services among the various Departments — we could develop the necessary expertise here in Northern Ireland. As the same process evolves across the water, we might be able to tender for such outsourced service delivery, and that would provide the opportunity to develop our economic growth and employment.

Dr Dobbin: Finally, for the last piece of our oral submission I am going to ask Michael Maguire, the past Chair of the Institute of Directors, to make some comments about skills.

Dr Michael Maguire (Northern Ireland Business Alliance): The Business Alliance has been working with the Economic Development Forum for a number of years on moving forward on several dimensions of the economy. My interest is in skills and education.

Our starting point is the skills strategy document from the Department for Employment and Learning. The strategy aims to ensure that individuals have the skills to enhance their employability; that employers have access to the necessary skills to develop their businesses successfully within the context, as we have already heard, of foreign direct investment, increasing the strong entrepreneurial base, SME growth and literacy and numeracy.

We support the skills strategy. We believe that the four themes are important in trying to push forward the skills and education agenda: first, understanding what skills are required for the development of the economy both in the short and long term; secondly, improving the skill levels of the workforce; thirdly, improving the quality and relevance of education and training provision; and, fourthly, tackling the skills barriers to employment. Anyone who thinks about the skills debate could not challenge that these are the right things to do in relation to the skills agenda.

However, there are issues about implementing the skills strategy, we would like to bring those to the subgroup's attention. First, we need a responsive education and training infrastructure to meet existing employer needs. For example, large employers are currently looking for individuals with software development skills sets. Secondly, we need to think about the longer-term needs of the economy, whether it is in the life sciences, technology or nano-technology. Work is being undertaken to think about the future skills needs of the economy, and we would reinforce the importance of that work. We need to set out our stall and say: "This is the space we are in, and this is what we want to do in relation to training and education."

It was of some concern to the Economic Development Forum, and the subgroup of which I am Chairman, that roughly 97% of the skills strategy expenditure focuses on one theme: improving the quality and relevance of education and training. There are two issues. First, it means that three of the themes are accounted for by 3% of the expenditure, and we need to ensure that in the education and training budget the right moneys are being placed in developing the skills and training infrastructure. Secondly, the 97% expenditure is largely accounted for by universities and further education provision.

The business community believes that there is a need for a responsive education system. There needs to be a direct alignment — and a much stronger link — between the strategic intent of Northern Ireland's economic development needs and what is happening within further education colleges and the university environment. A responsive training and education system is important.

I would also reinforce the importance of literacy and numeracy in supporting the economic growth objectives of the local economy. For us, it is a critical factor in building the generic skills base required to meet business needs both now and in the future. My final point relates to that context and to what I have said already. I would like to emphasize the importance of vocational skills in meeting the immediate and longer-term needs of the economy.

Dr Birnie: Gentlemen, your preference seems to be for tax credits, as Dr Dobbin termed it, as opposed to a corporation tax headline change. If that is so, why is that your preference? What evidence is there as to how elastic the supply of local investment and foreign direct investment (FDI) would be to such changes?

In other words, if we can boost net profits by 1%, what percentage growth would we see in the level of investment in Northern Ireland?

Mr Kingon: If we were able to achieve a very competitive rate of corporation tax — whatever that may be — that would be the option to go for. For several reasons, we have concerns about the current tax rate. The Internal Revenue Service (IRS) in the United States is taking a test case against Apple Computers, basically stating that if the intellectual property of products rests in the States, it does not matter which low-tax regime one goes to. If that case is successful, putting all one's eggs in the rate basket will lead to difficulties.

So far, there has been no allowance at the EU Competitiveness Council for a sub-regional rate; the sovereign tax rate must be changed. As a practicality, given that Northern Ireland's corporate tax take is £500 million versus £49 billion in the UK as a whole, the Treasury is unlikely to reduce the overall rate. We are being pragmatic and practical. If we could get it, a zero tax rate would be fine.

Existing tax credits are not flexible enough, and their definitions are too narrow. We must broaden and enlarge the areas to which tax credits apply. We have said that innovation is very important. There is an R&D tax credit, but most businesses do not claim it. The definition is too narrow, and half of the costs are excluded. We are seeking a redefinition of that credit so that more companies will claim it and so that it will be more beneficial.

We mentioned the need to examine matters such as skills strategies. We need companies to invest in training and development, particularly our smaller SME businesses. To encourage them to do that, we would seek some incentives through tax credits. The benefit of the tax credits is that they encourage people to invest and spend in the areas that are required to move the economy on. If you do not spend, you do not get. If we simply have a go at the tax rate, we will not encourage those expenditures. We are being pragmatic. However, if someone said that there was a 1% or a 0% tax rate —

Mr Billington: I would add that corporation tax is generally associated with FDI (foreign direct investment), and the Chancellor Gordon Brown stated that we did a very good job in creating 85,000 jobs over the last 10 years. While there is some discussion, the Business Alliance reckons that 140,000 new jobs will be needed over the next 10 years. To achieve that, we must basically buy in business, which means FDI, and fiscal incentives could help with that. We should not narrow ourselves to just one tool: corporation tax.

The Assembly noted fuel duty as an option. There are a number of fiscal tools available. We must decide on which one is the best fit for bringing business in; which one is the best fit for taking small businesses and growing them rapidly; and which one is the best fit for helping businesses at a certain critical point to make the next step.

Rather than coming up with a solution without understanding the problem, it is important that work is done to identify the best tool to create growth by sector and by size of business. That is the package of incentives for which we should be arguing. That includes a corporation tax that is deliverable and capital allowances to get the same result in a different way. We should keep this discussion broader than just focusing on corporation tax.

Dr Birnie: What is the evidence that tax credits work?

Dr Dobbin: It is a matter of the whole tax regime. There is the headline rate of tax, but with tax credits the actual rate could be much lower. It is clear that if we wish to achieve revenue-generating businesses, the tax issue and the fiscal issues are very important. We have seen that with all of the FDI. From talking to our international clients, I know that financial control rests with the vice presidents of finance, who are heavily involved in the fiscal and tax regimes. That is a critical factor in decision-making. It is not the only factor; there are others, such as the skills base, university support, infrastructure and other aspects that we mentioned. However, there is no doubt that that fiscal regime is more important than even financial incentives.

11.00 am

Dr Farren: Thank you for the opportunity — at long last — to meet you and the others who will appear before the subgroup over the next few weeks.

Let us assume that we have an attractive and competitive package to attract additional investment from whatever source, be it foreign or indigenous. A target of 140,000 new jobs over 10 years has been set. To clarify, I assume that those jobs will not all be in the private sector?

Mr Kingon: No, that is the total employment target.

Dr Farren: Where can growth in the private sector be expected? In other words, what sectors will you target? Do you aim to make the best possible pitch to the widest possible range of investors, be they, as I said, indigenous or foreign, and hope that the wind will blow in a sufficient number of jobs and the investment to produce those jobs? Or, do you have a reasonably clear idea of the sectors to which investment is most likely to be attracted? With that knowledge, we can speak confidently to skills and education providers to ensure that there is a good supply of the skills and qualifications necessary to fulfil those jobs.

As you know, we are in a globally competitive market, and our package may not bring all that we need. I am anxious to know where you see the balance between indigenous and foreign investment and what sectors are most likely to see the best returns from such investment.

Mr Kingon: We said earlier that, as a developed country, Northern Ireland must move up the value chain. Currently, we need to concentrate on the back-office and financial services sectors. Software is a still a key growth area. That is also linked to innovation, particularly to universities, and including life sciences and medical devices. Those sectors are important. There is also a reasonable cluster of investment in advanced electronics.

Those are the sectors in which we can compete, because we are not playing at the low-cost end of the market; however, technology and knowledge transfers also play a role. There is already a base in some of those sectors, albeit not to the full critical mass that one would like. That is where we see the need, although, as Michael said, that is linked to the skills strategy, as we need to put more resources into some of those key sectors.

There are obviously spin-offs from that, because sectors such as tourism and retail will also provide jobs. The tourist sector needs investment in training and development, in addition to the infrastructure spend that we mentioned. Less than 2% of Northern Ireland's gross domestic product (GDP) comes from tourism vis-à-vis Scotland and the Republic of Ireland, where the figures are 7% and 9% respectively. Northern Ireland has much the same climate and physical infrastructure as those countries, so we should be able to raise that contribution to the GDP. Investment in infrastructure in the tourist sector is necessary, but investment in people is also required.

Dr Dobbin: It is important that we do not get too restrictive. Government economic development agencies did not always get it right in the past whenever they selected the stars for the future, and the market is quite dynamic. When we consider innovation, there is an opinion that even some of our traditional sectors can transform themselves. For example, our very large agrifood industry is the biggest indigenous manufacturing and exporting sector. We need to examine how we can rescue—or maintain—rural and processing activity in that sector.

When we look at that sector, there are specific opportunities to get into functional foods and fresh foods. Products that have a short shelf life cannot be supplied from China or further afield, only from nearby. Functional foods are foods that have health benefits or are perceived to be more natural.

There are also opportunities in engineering and in some traditional industries, including textiles, to get into high-fashion design. Product turnover is fast in those areas, and there is a constant flow of new products and ideas. It is difficult for long supply chains in the Far East to match that.

Stephen Kingon is right that Invest NI's vision has identified five key technology areas, including food and life science. We need to encourage all business to be more outward-looking, more ambitious and more innovative. There is no reason to write off a sector, particularly agrifood, in which we see growth even though all the pundits said that it should have died and given up several years back. We need to be careful that we do not write off an industry only to discover that there was a way of transforming it.

Dr Farren: I stressed the need for indigenous as well as foreign investment. In the light of what Michael Maguire was saying, where are the skill-provision and higher-level-qualification gaps that need to be filled? Without the already existing significant levels of migration and assuming that the investment packages are achieving their goals by attracting investors, can we reasonably expect to have a workforce that will meet the challenges? Investors do not find that the skilled labour force—at whatever level—is here to meet their needs.

Dr Maguire: That is the right question. When we talk about the need for a responsive education and training system, the question arises: "Responsive to what?" We have in some cases a very good, but very elaborate, training infrastructure that is demand-driven: it is driven by the needs of the students and the needs of local employers who are developing what they do in a very small area.

If you are asking where we need to be, this is work in progress. One of the things that we — David, others and myself — have been pushing within the EDF is thinking about the skills that will be required in industry in Northern Ireland. We need to think about where the gaps are and what we need to develop a more responsive structure to.

The answer is probably on two levels, but I am not sure where the balance is exactly. On one level, you need to develop the generic problem-solving, team-based, well-educated, literate and numerate workforce that is a rising tide for everyone, and you have to look to the primary and secondary schools, vocational further education colleges and universities to deliver on that.

At the same time, we need to take a top-down view and consider whether Northern Ireland needs more engineers, for example. We need to be able to push those ideas through a responsive education system that considers its job to be one of helping to develop the economy of Northern Ireland, rather than considering its job in a narrow way — and I am overcharacterising here — as being purely educationalist based. I am unsure of the answer, but I am convinced that we need to ask questions in those two areas to try to get an answer.

Mr Neeson: The challenges that lie ahead are huge and growing by the day, particularly with the development of the global economy. I am aware of one local entrepreneur who has invested in China. A great deal of Northern Ireland money is being invested outside Northern Ireland. Why is that happening?

Dr Maguire did not mention the impact of high-energy prices. Like most members, I welcome the development of the all-island energy market. If the Secretary of State takes us down the line of green energy, that will mean higher energy prices. How do we compete in the global market with issues such as high energy prices? Dr Maguire has dealt with my other question regarding responsive education systems. The development of skills is critical if we are to compete in the growing global market.

Dr Dobbin: In response to Mr Neeson's first question regarding businesses relocating to China, Estonia and Poland, the cost base is lower and they can get access to cheaper raw materials. We operate in a marketplace. When we go shopping at the weekend, we like to get value for money and good deals. If products are price sensitive or cost sensitive, businesses will move to countries with the lowest production costs. In China, where I worked for four years, there is a vast labour market, and labour costs are about one tenth of what they are here. One does not have to go to China; one could go to eastern Europe for low labour costs.

If the economies of the past were built around labour and ports, etc, the commentators say that future economies will be built around skills, innovation and universities. We have two fantastic universities here, but, unfortunately, many students who leave Northern Ireland to study in GB do not come back. It is not that there are insufficient university places; there are not enough good graduate employment opportunities. We must try to encourage the formation of businesses that tap into that talent, as it is earning money for itself, and for the companies that it is working for, elsewhere. Everyone should consider how we could use our universities better to drive the economy. Both universities are aware of that, but there is no formal strategy in place for exploiting the knowledge that we have in our universities, and the talent coming out of them, to better advantage. I have spoken to both vice-chancellors, and they agree that there is a gap. The Department for Employment and Learning should consider that issue. We are putting a great deal of public money into universities; let us ensure that we get a return.

Seán Farren touched on the issue of choosing the products and areas that we should go into. The reality will be a mixture of where we are already and whether we can sustain those industries and encourage some new ones. Dr Maguire touched on the skills issue. Nanotechnology and bioscience are seen as areas of emerging technology, and our universities have expertise in those areas.

Stephen Kingon would say that the British Government target the financial services industry. That is because there is a history of strength in the UK, particularly in London. However, Dublin also has a history of strength, and businesses are running out of affordable office space and people in the South. If we had a centre for financial services, perhaps in an enterprise zone, we could create a seedbed that could await the overflow from the South.

The Southern economy is definitely overheating in areas where it cannot get the skills, and yet we are seeing a brain drain. We need to find some clever way to tap into that overspill, and the overspill from other parts of Europe, in back offices and financial services. We need fiscal flexibility: not just a lower tax regime, but one that targets the people we want — those that can give something back into the economy. It should not apply to everybody.

11.15 am

Mr Billington: In relation to the question of where local businesses outsource, it is either evolve or die. If our cost base in Northern Ireland continues to rise so that local businesses cannot compete, they will outsource the lower-value-added work and retain the design and marketing work. Those businesses evolve to outsource the low-value-added work and concentrate on the high-value-added end of the business. That is evolution. The more our cost base rises, the more that evolution will move across our indigenous businesses. That is the challenge. There is always equilibrium. As the cost base rises, a new equilibrium reaches a new point where more is outsourced.

You are quite right in that the high cost of energy is putting businesses under stress. Combined with that, there is a stranded cost that has still not been addressed, which means that whatever happens in the UK, we will be worse off by that extra slice of cost, and that must be addressed.

However, moving forward, the key issue is that businesses evolve, and that is not necessarily a bad thing: they either die or evolve, but that rate of evolution or change will be determined by the cost base in Northern Ireland. Managing the cost base here could be under the control of the devolved Assembly.

Dr Dobbin: A major problem is the cost of transporting our products. The UK, for its own reasons and because of climate change, has imposed a tax on fuel higher than that in almost any country in the world, while Southern Ireland has a more modest tax rate. That has led to two things. First, the transport industry is moving its base to the South where it can source cheaper fuel, and, secondly, fuel smuggling as a result of the tax difference has led to more criminality. We reckon that last year the British Government lost £300 million in tax revenue because of fuel smuggling. That is one area where a reduction in excise duty would increase the tax take for Government, reduce criminality and make businesses more competitive.

The duty on fuel should be looked at. There are examples where Britain has varied the rate of duty here. A similar problem arose on the aggregates tax, and the Exchequer changed the tax because of the distortion on an island economy, and that should be looked at. It would help small and large businesses, it would stop criminality and it would probably increase the tax take to the Exchequer. Energy could be made more affordable, and at the same time it would benefit the Exchequer, and we would see the benefits for law and order and criminality.

Mr Bryan: The central message that should come through is the speed of response. Fundamentally, the greatest gift that this subgroup can give is a stable, local Government that will allow businesses the freedom to sell and invest in the future. All the messages coming through, whether that be investments overseas or whatever, reflect that times are moving on at a pace that neither you nor I can control. We cannot try to turn back the tide. We must act now, even though it may be long overdue. The central message from the business community is that we must knuckle down and get on with it.

Mr Poots: I want to deal with the practical issue of how the Government can implement changes, particularly in the light of the current planning policies in Northern Ireland. Land values for housing are now around £1 million per acre, and for business development around £400,000 per acre. Most of that money goes into the pockets of the individual selling the land.

What can the Government do, first to make land more affordable, and secondly to draw more money back into the central economy in terms of development gain, thus ensuring that developers provide more roads, sewerage and general infrastructure so that the public sector does not have to pick up that tab and has more money to spend on other areas?

With regard to education and training, Northern Ireland has many people at the higher end of the education bracket and many at the lower end. That has created some problems, because those at the higher end tended to go to the top universities in the UK — which were outside Northern Ireland — and those in the lower end found difficulty getting jobs. There are huge challenges for those in employment who have low numeracy and literacy skills. How do you see the universities rising to that challenge?

There is an issue about the number of available university places and the courses that are being taken at universities in Northern Ireland. Many young people are coming out of university, going to work in Tesco for six months or a year and then taking up a job that is completely unrelated to their degree. What practical university degrees do you see coming forward that can be used in the workforce? Should we be looking at the possibility of creating more polytechnics again? There used to be a polytechnic in Jordanstown, but that transferred to university status. Should some of our further education colleges go down the route of becoming polytechnics, and should we create more training opportunities for the jobs that are coming about?

How do you see the R&D tax breaks tying together with the employment and training opportunities? Northern Ireland universities have many degree courses available in medicine and biosciences. I see that as one of the greatest opportunities for quality employment growth. It is also an area where R&D tax breaks could attract significant foreign direct investment. How would you tie the training of people for the biosciences and nanotechnology with the introduction of the R&D tax breaks?

Dr Dobbin: I will answer the question relating to planning and land, and my colleagues will answer some of the others.

At present, the planning response is a major barrier to development of almost every kind, whether it is private housing — of which there is a shortage in Northern Ireland due to difficulties in obtaining planning permission — retail, commercial development, or business development. That was reviewed recently by the EDF, and there are several reasons why the Planning Service is not keeping up. The biggest one identified is that its sister agency, the Environment and Heritage Service, which is part of the DOE, is not responding on statutory consultation fast enough, and it is woefully behind its targets. That is a major barrier to the granting of a fast and speedy planning decision. Something must be done, and the Government recognise that. However, no one seems to be able to get the Environment and Heritage Service to respond within the deadlines set in planning. That is the biggest obstacle to a speedy planning decision that has been identified.

Any developer will tell you that the price of land is artificially high. Land with planning permission is at a premium here because it has got through the net. If the planning procedure was speeded up and the Planning Service's regional plans were completed we might see, if not a fall in land prices, then a steadying of them. We need to build more houses, and that alone will create economic activity. Property developers are investing in Great Britain and elsewhere because they can get planning decisions faster and they can turn their money over faster. So there is definitely an issue to ponder there.

I have spoken to both vice-chancellors about the skills issue and the cap on university places. There is a cap on university places here that does not exist in other regions. Scotland provides more graduate places than it generates in terms of student demand, and Northern Ireland has fewer graduate places than it needs. Both Northern Ireland universities are cautious about expanding at present because of the slump coming through the education system: the baby boomers are slowing down and there is a rapid fall in enrolments.

There is a fear that if further and higher education provision were expanded, falling enrolment numbers in primary and secondary schools could, in five or ten years' time, hit the further and higher education sector and affect its student numbers. Therefore, there is nervousness about a potential stop-start situation.

Before I hand over to Dr Maguire and the others, I have one final point. The comments about the technical colleges were well made. There is a strong view in business that an option must be created for those young people who are not particularly academically oriented but would make good technicians or show good vocational skills. The further education sector is being restructured, and the new technical colleges or the polytechnics even offer degree subjects. We must ensure that we get it right in those areas.

Some within the business community believe that there should be a return to secondary technical colleges, which worked very well in the 1960s and 1970s. Attending such colleges enabled those who did not get through the then selection system to follow a worthy career path. There is a demand for those skilled workers; there is a shortage of technicians, plumbers and builders in Northern Ireland. The Strategic Investment Board, of which I am a member, cannot get contractors in sufficient quantities to meet some of the infrastructural demands.

Dr Maguire: Dr Dobbin has covered my points. There must be a greater emphasis on the development of vocational technical skills. I am not of the view that we should simply create another dimension to the training and education infrastructure. We have a good network of further education colleges.

We must approach this issue on two levels. First, we must move away from the mindset that believes that the purpose of education is to create lawyers, doctors or accountants. Secondly, we must celebrate the excellence that exists in our vocational and technical skills. A BTEC is the equivalent of three A levels, and gaining that qualification allows a student to take a step further in the education process if he or she wishes to do so. Too often we take the view that there is only one education system, which celebrates academic education. That system is good, and we want to keep it, but, as Dr Dobbin said, we must consider also the importance of vocational technical skills and moving the further and higher education colleges forward.

The Department of Employment and Learning spent £163 million on the further education system. Work needs to be done to provide a business focus to the work of further education colleges, and the "Further Education Means Business" strategy should be encouraged and reinforced. However, we must keep the pressure on. We must ensure that the further education sector provides what young people and businesses need to match candidates to jobs.

To answer the question directly, we should not create another layer in the education hierarchy to meet those needs. We should try to get the maximum results from the structures that are already in place.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I remind members that we are running out of time.

Ms Ritchie: I noted Mr Billington's earlier comment that there is a direct correlation between a good infrastructure and the development of a sound economy, and that we need a good infrastructure for the prompt delivery of skills, goods and services. In particular, he mentioned the lack of development of air routes and the lack of availability of certain routes for the prompt delivery of those good and services.

First, has the Northern Ireland Business Alliance (NIBA) undertaken any analysis of that issue? What discussions has it had with air carriers and airport owners, and has it considered the all-Ireland regime and the possibility of using airports in the South, such as Dublin and Shannon?

Secondly, we are overly dependent on our roads infrastructure. It is our only sound land infrastructure, as the railways are underdeveloped, although, for too long, the improvement of the roads infrastructure has been concentrated in certain areas. Has NIBA assessed the need to improve the roads infrastructure, not solely at the main hubs, but across a wider area, to ensure that the requirements of the Regional Development Strategy are met? Does NIBA consider that the five-year review of the strategy, which is currently subject to consultation, would be a good mechanism for that assessment?

Thirdly, for the prompt delivery of goods and services, we have the east-west route. How could railway infrastructure be used to bring our goods and services to ports on that route? What discussions has NIBA held with Translink and Iarnród Éireann to improve the delivery and transportation of freight on the Belfast-Dublin route?

Mr Billington: NIBA does not do air route analysis. It relies on studies from other bodies. However, having worked for a multinational, I can tell members anecdotally that the number of man-hours spent travelling to and from Europe and America means that businesses carry more people to cover the same amount of work. Any travel time that you save means that you can be more competitive and give your customers a more prompt response. Two or three years ago, Invest Northern Ireland engaged with various air companies. Indeed, Stephen will outline the work that has been done and work that is ongoing on growing air routes.

11.30 am

Mr Kingon: One of the big problems was getting direct flights out of Belfast. Air Route Development (NI) Ltd was set up to negotiate with the airlines, with the result that a few more direct routes have been opened up. There are some issues to be resolved. There is a big uptake of people leaving Northern Ireland, but the number of returning passengers is a problem. Those routes will continue to be marginal until we build a track record.

More needs to be done to develop other direct routes. There is a need for further funding and investment through pump-priming. There have been one or two failures because people went too quickly into a marketing campaign to get some of the stuff off the ground. Generally, accessibility has been an issue. The very fact that we have some direct routes now does help.

Dr Dobbin: The point about Dublin airport was well made. We need to ensure that we complement it. The market will find its own balance, but for certain routes, there is not enough demand in Northern Ireland to justify a flight. In those cases, the rapidly improving road system allows access to Dublin airport should you need it.

There has been a significant study made of railway infrastructure. NIBA was party to it, and I was personally involved through the Strategic Investment Board. With rail, the problem is one of viability, the number of people here and population density. I could almost declare myself to be an anorak. I am a railway fan. When I joined the Strategic Investment Board, I was keen to see, for example, improved railway connections to Derry. The line between Derry and Coleraine is dreadful and needs to be upgraded. However, when the cost of that is considered, it would almost be cheaper to build a main dual carriageway with a bus or tram system. It would cost less to operate and be more flexible at either end.

Either way, however, the point about Dublin airport was well made. We need better east-west connectivity, as well as improved routes between Dublin and Belfast. We need to consider the routes from Belfast to Derry, Belfast to Armagh and out to the west. The average speed on our strategic road network is well below where it should be. It is just in the early forties. We need to get it up to 50 or 60 miles per hour, and we need to make bus routes faster as well.

Mr Billington referred to commuting. It works both ways. If we could create, for example, a carriageway or motorway beyond Dungannon, it is my gut feeling that it would do two things: improve labour mobility and create business in those areas. If it were easier for businesses to connect, it would be easier for customers to reach them.

My gut feeling is that investment in transport would help rural development more than anything else that we could do — more even than allocating grants — because people would not feel as isolated. Businesses would be easier to get to for customers, investors and commuters.

I am not so sure that every region could have its own economic heartland. That is perhaps a planning issue. There is no doubt, however, that we need a strategic road structure. Rail has its place, particularly on the Belfast-Dublin route. I would like to see much-improved Belfast-Derry or Belfast-Coleraine-Derry systems.

However, the feedback and figures that we are getting suggest that it would be cheaper to build roads and have a good bus system than it would be to put huge investment into rail. To build a new high-speed track between Belfast and Derry would cost around £0.5 billion, but only the Belfast to Dublin route would have the traffic to justify that sort of investment.

Mr McNarry: As I listen, things come back to mind. Society has not recognised the debt it owes to those in business — in commercial retailing, financial services or whatever — who stuck with us through the duration of our troubles. Therefore your responses here carry more weight than politicians sometimes give them.

I have three questions. First, what advice would you give to a cross-section of 15-year-olds with regard to their employment aspirations, given the need to create the 140,000 jobs that you talked about?

Secondly, I know that Stephen has a romantic view of these things. I would love to help him create his commercial Utopia — a permanent happy hour for all those incentives, wherever he wants to site it. I listened to what was said about the enterprise zones. It would be interesting to find out how many businesses, having taken advantage of those zones, vacated them once the happy hour was over. We have to factor that into things.

Thirdly, can we escape from a “buy one, get one free” promotion mentality with regard to incentives? How confident are you of delivering stand-alone products and services — “the best in the world”, as the Secretary of State likes to call them? Somewhere along the line we are going to have to make a decision about parity, but which comes first? Our ability to deliver the best, and does it stand alone? Or must we attract by discounting and bringing people here?

Apart from the blip, we have had 30 years of direct rule. During that time, what representations did your sector make to the Government? I have followed your activities, but I have listened intently to you today and to references to the complications facing the EDF. What did you say to the Government? Were there any areas in which you felt that your representations contributed to a success? I share the views that you have expressed today. I wish that we could join you in establishing a coup tomorrow so that we could get rid of these bloody useless direct rulers. I think that that is what you are saying, though perhaps not as nicely as I put it.

What did you feel over 30 years? You said to the Government that it made a difference. In other words, why would you be listened to now by a Committee that is preparing to displace direct rule and, as elected people, to enter into Government and take all the flak that you are somewhat sheltered from? You do have a political voice, however. Was the growth of the public sector — which you are right to say got out of hand — and the dependence that we now have on it reflective of genuine difficulties, a failure to get through to the Government what they were doing, or was it that people chose to invest elsewhere? Stephen talked about stability, and he is right. Was it just that the climate was not good?

I hope that we enter an era of better prospects, a better climate, and the formation of a devolved Government. If we do not form this Government you have the right to kick every politician’s backside up and down the land because we will have failed you.

We want to take this forward positively, but some of what you have said frightens me.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): David, I must ask for a reply, as we are running out of time.

Dr Dobbin: There are some deep issues there, some of which resonate with me. I am a product of that happy hour in the 60s and 70s when Government incentives, mainly in the form of capital grant and accelerated allowances, brought in a huge wave of UK, European and American manufacturing companies. We had a golden time. Companies around Carrick, Larne and Antrim benefited from an influx of massive multinationals. There were textile firms; I was with Rothman’s tobacco business; and all those businesses brought employment, skills and good years to their supply base. There is a risk that they are promiscuous, that when happy hour ends they move to the next bar and feed there. So multinationals move to China or Estonia to get a better deal.

We need to recognise that foreign investment can be mobile and will not stay if better conditions are offered elsewhere. However, it leaves a legacy, and you must hope that it is a good one. Very few multinationals in Northern Ireland are anchored here and do research here. In the South, however, the golden year or happy hour tax has brought in a lot of foreign investors, such that there is a critical mass in the economy that is leading to indigenous start-ups.

I am chief executive of an indigenous company. Realistically, it does not make sense for us to be in Northern Ireland. We are going to be here because our shareholders and head offices are here; I live here and am not going to move. If we can get indigenous companies and boardrooms that have their marketing, their R&D, their financial centres in Northern Ireland, they will be here for the duration. As Declan pointed out, they may outsource to China for some of their subcontracting etc. They must do that to stay alive and to remain committed. We could do with a happy hour; realistically, we could do with bringing in some of these heavy hitters, because they will help to fast-track skills, management training, supplier development etc. We need them, but we must be mindful of the fact that they are promiscuous and will move on to feast somewhere else if they find a better deal.

On your point about NIO and the direct rule period, Michael and I have just finished a tour of duty as chairs of respective business organisations. When the bun-fight is over, we ask ourselves, what have we achieved? We go to endless meetings, meetings like this. What is it all about? Ninety per cent of the time we are stopping the introduction of stupid policies as opposed to working on productive things. Ninety per cent of the time we are pointing out what does not make sense, fine-tuning, changing policies and talking people out of the worst excesses of ideology.

If you get back into an Executive, there will be a lot of levers and buttons in front of you. You will push them and find nothing happens. The creation of a strong economy will be a long-term initiative. You will do a lot of things without knowing immediately whether they will work. There is a lot of luck to it; if the world economy booms, and you get a few inward investors who strike the right note, you could be really lucky. Equally, you could come in at a time when the world economy downturns, and you will reflect that downturn no matter what you do.

We have one salvation. Northern Ireland has only 1.75 million people. We do not have to bring in too many big inward investments to make a difference, nor have we too many mouths to feed. A few big investments would make a huge difference.

As for the Civil Service, there is no doubt that the British Government pursue the policy of creating stability in Northern Ireland by anchoring society with a large public sector. Without that, there probably would have been some very lean years at the height of the troubles. However, that anchor is now a millstone around our necks. We enjoyed that stability, but now in a new era we are faced with “the Department for Sales Prevention”.

The Civil Service is so good at maintaining stability that it cannot be agile; it cannot transform. We must almost break it up with a hammer, so that those who want to get on and do things are not prevented. Generally when you give our civil servants a problem they come up with nine reasons why you should not do it and perhaps one supportive idea. That is how they have been trained; that is how the system works.

The public sector was very valuable in the past. Now it must change, so that it becomes our servant rather than our master — as it is at present. When you come into power, you must change it or it will be your master. It will stop your best ideas coming forward, because it is designed to create stability and even out change.

Mr Billington: In terms of delivering the best expertise in-house versus effectively bringing it in from abroad, no matter what the ability of the people of Northern Ireland, for which I have high regard, there is no substitute for experience. Ability must be married with experience, and the best and quickest way of getting that experience is via exposure to multinationals.

As David said, he and I have been spun out of multinationals; we gained know-how in three to five years that it would take 10 years to gain alone. That is available to local businesses.

That is one of the spin-offs. Multinationals may come and go, but we get the knowledge and the experience that is critical to making local businesses a success.

Dr Maguire: I would like to say to a cross-section of 15-year olds that, although we are locked in a cycle of generational unemployment, that does not mean that it will happen to them, because we have an education system that can tap into their individual skills and strengths. Those skills and strengths do not have to be academic; they can be vocational and technical. I would like to be able to say to 15-year olds that our education system can broaden the range of opportunities available to them to develop those skills that they need. I would also like to say to those who want to broaden their life experience by going to university outside of Northern Ireland to take that opportunity if we can bring them back to work in and contribute to the society that educated them.

However, I am not sure that I can say that to a cross-section of 15-year-olds at present, because our education system lacks the breadth to allow for those opportunities. We must acknowledge that there is not just one route to employment, but a number of routes. We must use what we have in place to help provide some of those opportunities.

Mr McLaughlin: I am conscious that we have run seriously over time, so I will ask one question and make a point on a specific issue.

How would you describe the profile of the economy in 10 years' time? That relates to David's first question.

We have discussed the transition process, and that discussion contained some fascinating detail. From listening to the questions and the responses, I believe that there is probably a significant amount of agreement on what has to be done to create this step-change scenario. We disagree in some instances, particularly on the public sector, but we are solidly behind the concept of growing the private sector.

A passing reference to Europe was made. In many ways, Europe provides a get-out clause for central Government in respect of state support, single-market requirements, or whatever. Do you see the need to develop a specific strategy to create the space in which Europe can support this society in transition in the same way as Europe supports the economies of other member states? Do we need a specific package from Europe that complements what we hope to achieve from the Treasury?

Dr Dobbin: If you were to go to almost any region in Europe, or, indeed, the world, Mitchel, there would probably be consensus on what regions can do to grow their economies. The difference between the successful economies and the ones that fail almost comes down to how well they implement their ideas. They generally share the same views on education, innovation and infrastructure.

Those views will appear in almost every economic strategy around Europe, so how can we get things to happen here? We are small, so we should be easily connected and able to get consensus quickly, yet so often we find that very hard to achieve. There is a fragmentation, not just politically, but in numbers of bodies and Departments. Rather than just get on with it, there is incessant negotiation about getting things done. We have an issue with looking outward.

My ambition for this region in 10 years' time would be for it to look back on something similar to what Southern Ireland has seen in the past 10 to 15 years. We are on the same island, and our education system is just as good. Southern Ireland is stronger on the technical side, so we may have some work to do there, but we have a better infrastructure than it has, so why can we not mirror what it has done?

Its Government can form policies that suit the region; that, however, is missing in Northern Ireland because direct rule tends to impose UK solutions that do not fit our circumstances. It needs you guys and us to sit round a table like this to work out what we do tomorrow. However, we should not get too focused on policies; let us focus on action.

In 10 years' time we need to be where Southern Ireland is now. That is not a political comment. The South has experienced an economic miracle: it used to be a banana republic — with a huge debt — that almost had to be rescued by the International Monetary Fund. Now all its debt has been paid off, it has a surplus, high employment and much better wealth for all its citizens, and economic growth extends to all sectors in its part of the island. We need the same here.

Dr Maguire: I will pick up on the need to manage transition space. We have talked before about the relative merits of the public versus the private sector. Those are the issues that we need to talk about. There is a risk of taking a twin-track approach: growing the private sector while looking at the public sector in isolation. The public sector here spends more than £8 billion, and that will have a huge impact on how the private sector develops. Any management of transition from one to the other will involve difficult decisions, and you, as elected representatives, will need a wide variety of views and opinions to allow you to make difficult decisions. Part of managing transition space is about how we work together with stakeholders to allow such decisions to be taken without being kicked for doing so.

We can figure out what we would like to see in 10 years' time: difficult decisions will have been taken, and the right kind of support will have been galvanised around the taking of them. Taking decisions that will benefit the economy will mean people having to move from the positions that they have adopted.

Mr Kingon: We would have to negotiate with Europe on a wider base on issues such as state aids; and the EU Competitiveness Council would have to tick the box on any suggestions that you make on the fiscal side. In negotiating a package with the Treasury, failure to include the European dimension could be a block.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Time has beaten us, although important questions were asked and answered. Thank you very much, Gentlemen, for taking time out of your busy schedules to speak to us. We hope that our joint efforts will be of benefit.

Dr Dobbin: Thank you, Mr Chairman. May I make a final point. In the next week to 10 days we will let you have a written submission containing what we said today, including our answers, so that the subgroup will have an expanded version of our arguments.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): It might be interesting to know what exactly the package would contain and how it would be used. That might be an issue for the subgroup's terms of reference.

Informal break at 11.53 am.

On resuming —

11.55 am

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Gentlemen, you are very welcome. I am sorry that the previous session overran, but I hope that some of the questions and answers were of benefit to you.

Mr John Friel (Federation of Small Businesses): Thank you, Mr Chairman and members of the subgroup, for allowing us to make a presentation today. My name is John Friel and I am Chairman of the Federation of Small Businesses (FSB) in Northern Ireland. My colleagues are parliamentary officer Glyn Roberts and deputy policy officer George Dorrian. George is with us in a supporting role.

I would like to apologise on behalf of Wilfred Mitchell who cannot be here due to prior engagements. I will be representing him today.

I will make a brief introduction to the presentation and will then hand over to Glyn, who will present the important details of some of our policy priorities. I believe the subgroup has been provided with a written copy of the presentation.

Northern Ireland is a small-business economy. Ninety-eight per cent of businesses are small and more than 89% employ fewer than 10 staff. The Federation of Small Businesses welcomes the establishment of this subgroup to develop all-party consensus on what needs to be done to address the problems and challenges that lie ahead and, hopefully, to form the basis for an the economic element of the Programme for Government for a future devolved Administration.

Much of our presentation gives practical policy suggestions. There is no doubt that having our own devolved Assembly with local and accountable Ministers is vital. Local Ministers can show real leadership and can reach a real understanding of what our economy needs to be sustainable and provide the future prosperity that Northern Ireland needs.

Developing our small-business sector is essential if Assembly Members are serious about growing our private sector. Developing a few indigenous small businesses that can use research and development (R&D) and export to new markets across the globe is the future of our economy.

We need a future Assembly Administration to hit the ground running with a radical economic programme, with ownership not just by the political parties in the Assembly, but by wider social partners in Northern Ireland.

My colleague, Glyn Roberts, will expand on our policy agenda and the subgroup's three terms of reference.

Mr Glyn Roberts (Federation of Small Businesses): Thank you, Mr Chairman, for the opportunity to make a presentation today. The subgroup has received a detailed written presentation and I hope that there will be a number of questions, which we will try our best to answer.

I would like to touch on three or four main areas that we feel should be high on the subgroup's agenda, given its terms of reference.

As you have heard from previous contributors, there is a lack of investment in R&D, particularly in the small-business sector. At one point, we had one of the lowest R&D spends in the European Union.

Many small businesses do not have the resources, financial or otherwise, to invest in R&D. The Federation of Small Businesses has always maintained that we must use the tax system to encourage more small businesses to use R&D. Obviously, we have the credit system but — as was pointed out during the previous session — take-up by small businesses is very small and we must simplify the system whereby small businesses get tax breaks to invest in R&D.

This is not brain surgery; it is very simple. Invest Northern Ireland and the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment could use as champions local, indigenous small businesses, which have successfully used R&D to expand their businesses and which have exported to developing markets across the globe. If we had such champions, small businesses could identify with them and that key connection would be made with the typical, grassroots small-business owners who perhaps do not think that R&D is a matter for them.

That would help change the, perhaps, very parochial nature of some of our business community.

12.00 noon

To underline some of the points that were made earlier, we can grow as a region only if our infrastructure goes through a radical programme of modernisation. There is no doubt that underinvestment has penalised us in the past.

I wish to home in on the work of the Strategic Investment Board, which I believe the subgroup is examining. The board has a huge role. Charged with implementing the Northern Ireland investment strategy, the board has real potential to create opportunities for existing businesses. Our concern is that, for a variety of reasons, existing businesses in Northern Ireland are not able to take advantage of the contracts that the SIB is creating. We must reconsider procurement policies and ensure that local businesses are fit for purpose and can take advantage of those contracts.

We believe that the board of the SIB needs to be looked at again. There is nobody from a small-business background on the board. Our colleagues in the trades unions would also feel that they do not have a role on that board. The SIB must sit back and realise that ours is a small-business economy and that it, along with Government Departments, has a role to ensure that business is able to step up to the mark.

We broadly support the Industrial Task Force's position on corporation tax. I understand that the subgroup will hear from that body fairly soon about the harmonisation of corporation tax with the Republic of Ireland. However, in the field of practical politics, there is obviously strong concern from the Treasury that that would have implications for the fiscal union and would set a precedent for other parts of the UK. However, given that we are the only part of the UK that has a land border with another member state of the European Union and, given the legacy of the troubles, some form of special status is absolutely essential.

If we look at other member states of the European Union, such as Latvia, which has an extremely low corporation tax rate — even lower now than the Republic — we see that we have a huge amount of catching up to do.

On rating, as many members may know, we favour a small-business rates relief scheme, such as is already in operation in Scotland and England. Indeed, the Department of Finance and Personnel has indicated that it is studying the operation of those schemes. We believe that that is the right way to proceed, and that we could come up with a model that would address the concerns that members have heard from the manufacturing sector and many other business that struggle with the problem of high rates.

We are currently consulting our members, principally, at this stage, those in manufacturing. We will then consult our broader membership on a model for Northern Ireland that would work and be appropriate, because it is important that we get the rates issue right. That issue has been kicking around for an immense number of years, and there is real concern about that. No small business should have to struggle with a rates bill, and we must ensure that we get that issue right and that small businesses have the capital to grow and expand.

We, along with colleagues in the Business Alliance, have been involved in various meetings on fiscal incentives with the Prime Minister, the Chancellor and, indeed, many people around this table. We have proposed that there must be an effective scoping study by the UK Government. Obviously, it is essential to hear the views of this subgroup on the options for additional fiscal powers for the Northern Ireland Assembly, looking at best practice in other parts of the UK, and other countries that have similar devolved structures.

Perhaps the big question that the subgroup is trying to tease out is what exactly an economic package and peace dividend should look like. It is important that we develop as much ownership of what that package should be — a consensus across the board, not just in the business community, but across other sectors. Obviously, approaching the Treasury with a single voice on what a package should be is absolutely essential.

We have over 6,000 members throughout every section of the community in Northern Ireland, and we have begun to ask grass-roots business owners what they would like to see in an economic package. It is important to recognise that so much of what politicians do and how the systems of government work goes on behind closed doors. We need to get the grass-roots views.

Clearly, the infrastructure deficit, the high cost of doing business and how we effectively use our taxation and rating systems to kick-start the private sector will all be essential elements in the economic package. The more we develop a consensus on that approach, the better it will be when negotiating with the Treasury.

FSB is clear on the need to look at other regions around the world, not just the Republic of Ireland, to see best practice and where the gaps in the market lie to ensure that local business successfully exploits those opportunities. Our paper suggests establishing a joint Government and business task force, which would obviously include Invest Northern Ireland and various other agencies. Putting business people, along with Government, in the driving seat is essential.

That is a brief overview of some of the points in our presentation. Our report, 'Lifting the Barriers to Growth', is quoted throughout our written presentation. It is a survey conducted every two years of our members not just in Northern Ireland, but in the United Kingdom. We also have the complete list of Northern Ireland figures, which have not yet been released, but which we hope can aid the subgroup. I realise that the subgroup has quite a tight timetable in which to produce its report. If we can do anything to be of any further help, we will be only too happy to do so.

Ms Ritchie: I wish to expand on infrastructure, which I discussed with the Northern Ireland Business Alliance earlier. Mr Roberts said that the infrastructure deficit, the high cost of doing business, and how we effectively use our taxation and rating systems will be essential elements of any economic regeneration package. Everybody says that there is a deficit in our infrastructure; on what basis does your organisation make that judgement?

We are aware of the roads and water infrastructures. How do you see that contributing to the economy overall? What are the essential elements of an infrastructure package that would contribute to an improvement in the economy?

Mr Roberts: First, we must be clear on what an infrastructure deficit is. We have heard many things that it could be, such as a motorway from Belfast to Derry or a train line to Fermanagh. The members here represent different constituencies, and will all have pet projects. We need to effectively scope what an infrastructure deficit is and reach a clear consensus on it. In relation to the price tag, we obviously need to be extremely clear about what we need to do.

How an infrastructure deficit is connected to economic development can be illustrated by Invest Northern Ireland's recent report on how much spend it gives to business start-ups. In places such as Strabane, and throughout many border areas, there is very low investment in business start-ups by Invest Northern Ireland. Much of that is market-led, but because of the infrastructure, with poor roads in some areas, access can be difficult. That is why investment figures for south and east Belfast are very good: the infrastructure is there. There are fairly good roads and a proximity to Belfast City Airport and various Government Departments that act in a supply role.

Mr Friel: For people in Fermanagh or the north-west, roads are essential. I travel to Belfast three days a week, and many other people also travel. The journey can vary from an hour and three-quarters to two and a half hours, depending on the time of day and the volume of traffic.

The roads infrastructure is just not good enough. Back in the 1960s, there was a good road-building programme. The plan was to link the M1 and M2 motorways through to Omagh and Derry and back, with arterial routes to Coleraine and Enniskillen. That all came to a halt when the troubles started. However, the troubles had nothing to do with business people — especially manufacturers like me. We did not support the trouble, but all the money was diverted to security.

The Government should call a moratorium for two reasons: first, to halt all the increases in charges that they are imposing; and secondly, to put into our infrastructure the money that they have spent in any 10 years during those 35 years. They can start where they left off in the 1960s and give us our roads. They could also hold the rates and the water charges for 10 years to give companies a chance to recover and get back to where they should have been 30 years ago.

Ms Ritchie: Did your organisation research the types of infrastructure that need to be improved in order to contribute to our economy and, moreover, contribute to those areas that have been the location for neither foreign direct investment nor indigenous business? How have you seen the improvement of cross-border roads infrastructure contribute to the growth of small businesses?

Mr Roberts: In our consultation, we are trying to find out our members' views, as their views as business owners will be essential. Obviously, when we get the data back, we will share it. I am not sure that we will have it back by 18 August, but we hope that it will be useful.

As Mr Friel said, roads and rail are essential. We also need a viable public transport network. We have always maintained that there will be difficulties unless the basics are right on roads and rail. Your point about the Republic of Ireland is well made. It used to be that we sniggered and looked down our noses at their roads, but now it is the other way around. We need to get real.

We are trying to listen to the grassroots, which are always an essential element of our policy making. We will listen to people from Fermanagh, Strabane, Antrim and Downpatrick — wherever people want to talk to us.

Mr McLaughlin: Public procurement is obviously a huge market in which there are significant opportunities for reform and savings and, perhaps, for more flexibility and innovation in the application of spending. However, you criticise the SIB's method of bundling the contracts into megacontracts. At what specific level should those contracts be pitched — locally or sectorally, with small businesses in a particular sector coming together to form joint venture bids? How exactly would you, as opposed to the SIB, approach that?

Mr Roberts: On one side of the coin, the skills gap here is such a problem that many businesses are unable to tender for a lot of work. However, as a basic rule of thumb, the SIB should always try to create as much local business as possible; that is its purpose. In a recent eight-point plan, we put forward simple ideas such as the SIB putting a small-business representative on its board. The SIB has a rather toothless advisory council, and we must ensure that it maintains investment in local businesses and makes the process as transparent as possible.

At the same time, the Department of Employment and Learning, the Department of Education and other providers must have an opportunity to ensure that businesses and their staff have the right skills to tender for these contracts.

12.15 pm

Mr Friel: The big companies in Northern Ireland are nowhere near as big as those on the continent. The fear is that big companies from the continent will come here, overlook our companies and bring subcontracting companies with them. The bigger companies here, such as Gilbert-Ash and Farrens, should get together to tender for contracts to ensure that the work is spread among the subcontractors here, or they will lose out completely. We have a lot of subcontractors and they are very competent.

Mr Neeson: The Federation of Small Businesses has interacted well with elected representatives over the years.

Mr Friel rightly says that the small business sector is the backbone of the Northern Ireland economy.

However, I wish to deal with the role of Invest Northern Ireland (INI) since the merger of IDB and LEDU. How does INI relate to the small business sector compared to LEDU? There is an urgent need for a review of the role of INI.

Mr Roberts: On a basic level, INI needs to communicate more effectively. There is still a misconception about what INI does. It needs to rationalise the services that it provides to new-start businesses and to indigenous businesses and how it can help them. There is great confusion about what INI does, judging from the volume of calls that our office receives from new-start businesses. So much of what INI must do comes down to simple communication. Many of our members were told that INI would have a honeymoon period, but that is long gone, and now we need results. There were concerns regarding the amount of start-up money that INI was giving to many border areas and other areas outside Belfast. For instance, south and east Belfast had more money than five or six constituencies put together along the border.

INI needs to connect with grassroots small businesses. The federation has put forward a policy proposal to INI for a small business touchstone group; active small business owners could form an advisory group to INI to ensure that its policies are user-friendly to existing and indigenous small businesses. There is no doubt that the “Go for It” campaign is welcome, but we need to see results. We need to find out how many of those businesses that signed up for the “Go For It” campaign are still there in years two, three and four.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I remind members and witnesses that mobile phones must be switched off, as they interfere with the sound system.

Mr Friel: There is not much difference between Invest Northern Ireland and LEDU. I never had any dealings with IDB, but I had a bad experience with LEDU. In 1988, it offered me £2,000 to employ two people, but I had to guarantee to keep them for two years. The amount of paperwork was unbelievable. After three weeks, the girl in the office asked me if it was all going to be worth it. She explained how many times she had to phone LEDU, and how many times the people whom we had employed also wanted to talk to LEDU. We would have had to pay tax on the grant that we would have received, so, after about three weeks, we decided to forget about it.

One of the problems that I have found in the intervening time is the lack of appropriate client executives. Most of them have no experience of business, and they do not know what we are talking about. They cannot relate to small businesses at all. In my experience, that has been the biggest problem. Others I talked to have had the same experience. As Mr Roberts said, the honeymoon period for INI is long over, but no one has told them, and they think they are still on it.

Dr Birnie: The question on SIB procurement has already been asked, but in wider policy terms, can you identify areas where, when there is trade-off between external and indigenous companies, the policy has been to favour external companies? One example hitherto has been planning and out-of-town shopping centres.

Secondly, can you confirm that you support a degree of maintenance of manufacturing derating, but targeted on smaller firms? Thirdly, and this is in your written submission, would you say something about the impact of crime, particularly organised crime, as an impediment or barrier to growth?

Mr Roberts: I will deal with your last point first. We released crime statistics as part of the ‘Lifting the Barriers to Growth’ survey that showed that Northern Ireland has the highest level of business crime in the UK, and that upwards of 40% of business owners are not reporting crime to the police.

There is no doubt that crime is up alongside insurance and energy costs and is a significant barrier. We took a delegation recently to meet the deputy chief constable. A member of the delegation owns a newsagent’s in east Belfast that has been robbed half a dozen times in the past four years, and it has cost his business £12,000. He has reported everything to the police, but he is concerned by the fact that he has only got a crime number: he has not recouped his losses.

We put forward a number of suggestions in our written proposals, for instance, tax relief for businesses that invest in items such as CCTV, and how the police record crime. The police say that crime is dropping, but that refers to recorded crime; it does not include the 40% of businesses that do not report crime. The PSNI and the Policing Board need to look at that. We are meeting a representative from the Policing Board later this week to see how that can be advanced. We have put forward nine points that we hope the NIO, the Policing Board and the PSNI will look at.

We need to get rates sorted out across the board for all businesses. Mr Friel is a manufacturer and he can give a better example of what is happening on the ground. We need a small business rates relief scheme that is appropriate to Northern Ireland. Importing the Scottish and English model will not work because, obviously, big businesses pay more. We want to ensure that manufacturers are protected. Other businesses are struggling with rates and that is an issue. There are other organisations that can best articulate the situation as regards big businesses, but we are primarily concerned with small manufacturers — and always have been. We want to see a strong manufacturing sector. The manufacturing industry has a big role to play in developing our future economy.

Mr Friel: In a recent survey we conducted, I met people and I concentrated on areas outside those in which I work. I visited a few small engineering companies. Most of them are run by men who set them up when their places of work were closed down. I went to one company that employs eight people. The owner told me that by the time he pays the rent, rates, electricity and telephone bills, wages and taxes, he struggles to take home a week's pay. He maintains that he would be much better off working for someone else — if he could get a job within travelling distance of his home.

Our economy will not progress with that sort of company. There must be an incentive for such companies to progress, develop and expand. Providing incentives would increase employment and prevent other companies from closing down.

Dr Farren: My question follows on from two questions that were asked about procurement. If there is what might be described as the displacement of local businesses from the procurement process, I would like to see some hard evidence of that. The subgroup is going to hear from SIB, and it would be useful, therefore, to have any evidence that you can make available. SIB facilitates regular roadshows to ensure that local businesses are able to, either singly or in consortia of the kind that Mitchel McLaughlin referred to, come together to bid for a slice of some of the major contracts that SIB manages. Therefore, if there is evidence that local businesses are not availing of the opportunities that SIB is providing, SIB may have to fine-tune the opportunities for information to be made available.

Labour shortages in some major projects in the private sector — for which SIB has no responsibility — and to some extent in the public sector, have had to be met by recruiting overseas, particularly in eastern Europe. Businesses have to do that to ensure that projects can go ahead. However, if there is clear evidence that local firms are unable to bid for, or are precluded from bidding for, these contracts because of a lack of help, or that they are being sent a negative message, we must hear about that. To what extent are we engaged in hearsay, rather than actual evidence of the failure of local firms to avail of major contracts? The evidence would be critical, and if you could make it available, it would be of assistance to us. It would be important to hear that evidence.

Mr Roberts: One of my colleagues is working on that, and, hopefully, we will be able to share that information with the subgroup. We do not have it to hand today, as we did not have much notice of the meeting.

Dr Farren: I understand that.

Mr Roberts: The federation worked with SIB on a mini roadshow that was targeted particularly at the construction industry, and there was a fairly low turnout. When we analysed the turnout after the event, we discovered that there is little awareness of what SIB is and what it does or does not do. That is something for SIB to consider, but the federation wants to talk to SIB about how it can raise its game and communicate more effectively.

There remains a wide perception that local businesses are not availing of all opportunities, but we will get the research to the subgroup when it is completed — if it is completed by 18 August, so much the better.

Dr Farren: I hear frequently from the federation about the costs that follow from statutory requirements such as rates, etc. Rates obviously contribute to the provision of local services. If the burden is shifted from one sector, then unless the level of service is reduced, that burden must be shifted to another sector. Thus, if the burden is removed from the business sector, there is nowhere else for it to go but the domestic sector.

I am very interested to know whether the burden can be spread as evenly and equitably as possible. Various sectors have pleaded for relief here and there without understanding that, if they get more relief, I, as a homeowner, may have to carry an extra burden.

Have you any advice, based on experience elsewhere, on how we can ensure that the business sector carries a due burden and that the overall tax system — rates are another form of taxation — is equitable? If we achieve that, we will not have to constantly address the pleadings for special relief from whomever, whether they are ratepayers, householders or business owners.

12.30 pm

Mr Roberts: I am not saying that businesses should not pay rates — of course they should; businesses make a contribution, use services and so on. We want a fair rates system. There is real concern not only among manufacturers but across all sectors that the rates system is not fair. We must ensure that the rates and tax systems in Northern Ireland can be used to stimulate new business and expand existing business to ensure that they have the capital to grow.

This issue must be considered in context: Northern Ireland has the highest insurance costs, highest crime figures, highest energy costs and major infrastructure problems. On top of that, we pay rates and, in the future, water charges. One of our concerns about water charges is that small business owners will be hit twice — at home and at their place of work. Considering all those problems together, it is fair to say that the rates and tax systems should be adjusted to stimulate business growth.

We strongly believe that if the rating system is right and businesses have more capital, the revenue from the rating system will increase, which will benefit general service delivery. The Minister for Finance in the Republic, Brian Cowen, made a good point about corporation tax; he said that the Irish Exchequer brings in more money now that corporation tax is 12·5% than it ever did when the percentage was in the mid-twenties. That ensures that public services — education and health services and so on — continue to be funded. Given the problems faced by the business community and the high cost base here, the Government must ensure that the tax and rates systems do not push it over the edge. That is our concern.

Dr Farren: You are effectively saying that central Government should pick up more of the tab. Should we seek a 10-year rates relief package?

Mr Roberts: That is one option. As you know, we are consulting our members on what an economic package should entail, and that option has been outlined. How the system is used to stimulate economic growth is a key issue.

The high cost base here — as a result of the high insurance costs, energy costs and crime — is off-putting to small new-start businesses when they consider the huge amounts of money that they will pay in their first year. As a result of that high cost base, surviving to a second or third year could be a major problem.

I mentioned insurance, and there is no doubt that there is a degree of stability in the insurance market now.

Certainly, premiums are high, but there is stability. We have not seen the record increases of up to 500% that we saw a few years ago. That is still a problem to be resolved. Until we get a stable insurance market in Northern Ireland that provides cost-effective premiums to small business, in four or five years' time we are going to be back to these huge hikes. This is something that we have worked on extensively, both with the insurance industry and with the Treasury, ensuring that our own members can address issues like health and safety so that premiums are cost-effective. We must address this burden of the high cost of doing business. That is one of the elements that a package would do. It would take some of that burden off the business community so that it can grow, expand and provide the jobs and investment that Northern Ireland needs to see.

Ms Gildernew: I, too, welcome you and thank you for your presentation. In rural areas what is done in support of small business is even more important, since we do not have the foreign direct investment, Civil Service or health jobs that cities and towns have. I am also concerned about the lack of investment, not just in roads, railways and technology, but in, for instance, the Ulster Canal. Development of that is the missing link with the rest of the inland waterway structures in Ireland. We can develop the tourist potential there.

I worked with Leslie Morrison of Invest Northern Ireland in a recent case. A company in Enniskillen planned to double its workforce from 30 to 60. It was looking for bigger premises in and around Enniskillen and had an offer from Carrick-on-Shannon, not only for purpose-built premises, but for an economic package to go along with that as well. It was very tempting, considering industrial derating and other matters, for that company to relocate. We worked hard to ensure that it did not and that it got the help that it needed. However, I find that Invest Northern Ireland is often not agile enough, not fluid or quick enough to deal with these things as they come. We deal with an economy in the twenty-six counties that is much more aggressive and has had an impact on my constituency.

I should declare an interest, because my family is involved in the engineering sector and, John, I understand fully what you were talking about. I feel that industrial derating is going to hit us very hard. Double that with the corporation tax rates, and we are going to lose. Companies like Powerscreen International Distribution Ltd have generated lots of small engineering firms around Tyrone that are dependent on them for employment. If we go down the route envisaged by the Treasury, engineering will go the way of textiles and food-processing.

I know what you are doing with the further education sector and of the initiative that you have taken with the ANIC. The skills deficit is important. What do we need to know? What recommendations do we make to ensure that we get people skilled and educated for the jobs that we need to create, particularly for the new growth sectors such as renewable energy and recycling? What can we ask of that sector to create skills to build the new economies for sustainable long-term employment?

Mr Roberts: On your point about education and skills training, 25% of school leavers have poor numeracy and literacy skills. That is a major handicap for any wannabe successful economy. A recent Northern Ireland Audit Report showed that over £40 million has been spent, yet we have seen no real improvement in young people's numeracy and literacy skills. This is one of the main reasons why the Jobskills programme failed. Many of the Jobskills providers had to make up the gap because young people did not acquire those skills at school.

We work hard to build relationships with further education colleges. The scheme that we work on with the Association of Northern Ireland Colleges (ANIC) is a simple one. It is an awards scheme, but one that increases links, not just between further education lecturers and businesses in our five local branches, but also connects students with businesses and our branch members. We put our money where our mouth is with that relationship.

In respect of universities, we must be very clear. Looking at the whole gamut of education, we have a very academic focus in Northern Ireland. That obviously suits some people, but so much more must be done on the vocational side. We have to look at degrees to see whether they have a vocational element, or an opportunity for work placement. Many degrees do not have that. I occasionally lecture on the University of Ulster's communications, advertising and marketing courses, which now, in the first year of study, have an entrepreneurship module, enabling many graduating students to consider self-employment as a consultant. That brings us to the wider notion that careers advice must start selling self-employment as a realistic career option.

Universities and further education colleges must provide those basics. By comparison, further education colleges are in one respect ahead of universities. Most colleges now have some sort of liaison person who can connect with the local business community. I know that the University of Ulster has made such an appointment.

One of the difficulties that small businesses face, if they have a research and development idea connected to the universities, is where to start. Queen's University and the University of Ulster have huge departments. In response to the universities' seven-year review, we asked them to keep things simple. There should be one point of contact for a business approaching with an idea, so that they can be pointed in the right direction, encouraged and supported, rather than just looking at a mass of departments and wondering where to begin.

Perhaps John will say something about cross-border business.

Mr Friel: There is not much to say, but someone has already mentioned cross-border co-operation on education in general, which would be a good thing. Years ago, the South was lacking, and suffered by comparison. It was not so good, whether the subject was education or roads or whatever. Everything has turned around now. The education system is rated as one of the best in Europe.

Mr Roberts: One of the things that our barriers to growth survey discovered was that staff training in small businesses was difficult. When the Employment Bill went through the Assembly, and when we gave evidence to Dr Birnie when he was chair of the Committee for Employment and Learning in this very room, we pointed out that much of European employment law is based on big businesses with human resources departments and perhaps 200 or 300 employees. That does not help small businesses that do not have human resources departments and that are already overburdened with paperwork. It becomes more difficult to facilitate staff training.

It is fine if you have a business with 400 staff — you can be flexible. If you have a staff of four and one of them is out, that cuts your workforce by a quarter. Businesses have to get their staff trained, but we need a training strategy that helps small businesses. One of the statistics about clearing barriers to growth revealed that 65% of our members are willing to undertake staff training if more funding and support were available. The will is there: it is how practically business owners can find the time and discover that training enhances their business rather than hinders it.

Ms Gildernew: I was on that Committee for a short while after the birth of my first son. While I fully appreciate the difficulties that maternity rights cause for small businesses, we must also look at the barriers to women entering the workforce, such as flexibility of maternity leave and family-friendly working hours.

To what extent do you feel that the lack of affordable, quality childcare, particularly in rural areas, prevents women from getting back into the workplace?

12.45 pm

Mr Roberts: It is not only a matter for employees, but for business owners as well. It is a problem across the board.

The key thing is that there is a different relationship between small-business owners and their employees and that of big-business owners and theirs. There is more one-to-one treatment. Often we feel that, rather than legislate for a family-friendly business environment, the small-business owner should sit down with the employee and find the best way to accommodate them, ensure that their job is protected and manage business needs too.

We are concerned that some employment legislation discourages employers from taking women of child-bearing age. No one wants that situation. We were leapt on by a former Member of the Assembly — who is now in a very distinguished position — who could not understand that we were not advocating that. Rather, we were warning that unscrupulous employers would see the legislation as a pretext to discriminate.

Mr McNarry: Thank you for reminding me; when I started up in business as a 26-year old it was with great gusto and entrepreneurial spirit, and it only became difficult when it became bigger. We are in danger of losing entrepreneurial spirit. It used to be big in Northern Ireland, and those who used it well left here but have now come back. Too many are in business in that sense but are self-employed, so they earn a wage like their employees but carry all the responsibility. When I read that 89% of businesses employ fewer than ten employees, I understand the implications of that. What is stopping small businesses from growing? That statistic is very high, but it represents a small number of employees. We might look at how to address obstacles to growth in the workforce.

What percentage of your members own their premises? That figure is crucial to any business analysis. Getting young people into work, and into sustainable employment in particular, is a key issue. It was highlighted by the first deputation. Government must wrestle with this, because it carries all sorts of implications for society.

What specific ideas do your members have which would encourage more apprentices? What field of apprenticeships could your members point to that look like having sustainable employment gains? I mean apprenticeships that do not result in being out of work in three or four years. If you are to encourage schools to promote them, and Government must back this up, you must be able to promise a good chance of sustainable employment. It is not a case of getting on your bike, as Tebbit said. It is too small a place to cycle anywhere to find the work that is needed.

Mr Friel: If people get on their bikes, no matter where they go, they will encounter the same situation. We return to the same old story: it is manageable for people in business on their own to employ six, seven or eight people, but if their business is offered good contracts and they attempt to expand, they must decide whether they can cope with those contracts and whether people are available for employment, and when those contracts have been fulfilled, whether there will still be a job for those people.

The same situation applies to apprentices. There is no point in small businesses taking on apprentices if they cannot guarantee that they will be in business in 12 months. Together with tax, rates and the cost of energy, as Glyn has pointed out, water charges are proposed and regulations are coming from Brussels and London.

In the past two years, I have laid off about five people, because we had to invest more in equipment than in people. That is just the way that it is; we could do nothing about that. It would be nice if I could say that I was going to employ five more people, but that will not happen unless something is done about the raft of regulations and unless proposed water charges are dropped and the rates left as they are. Much can be done. A hold can be put on their implementation for whatever period you as an Assembly can negotiate with the British Government, but we want to give businesses a chance, not only to progress but to stay put. There are many businesses that employ nine or 10 people who will not be here this time next year if they are burdened with all of those costs.

Mr McNarry: There must be a recce on the cost of unemployment as it relates to people employed by small businesses. We must discover many facts and figures. If 100 people are made unemployed, how much does that cost? Conversely, how much does it cost to employ 100 people? It may be helpful, if you have the resources, to come up with those figures, because that is an argument that small businesses must make.

Having sat in your place, I know that there is a sense out there that you are always moaning, bellyaching and crying. You are bit like the farmers about whom people unfairly say: "Look at the four-wheel drives that they have." When that representation is made to people who are potentially preparing to go into government, you must turn things around so that, whatever your lobby is, it will help reach solutions for sustaining what you have. Where is the entrepreneurial spirit? Is it all to be found in Korea and Japan? Must we import everything? When we look back on our history, we see that we made things. We produced and designed them, and the world then took them and sold them. There is bound to be something of that still there, and I hope that you could show us a glimmer of hope for how we recover that.

Mr Roberts: First, we must address our high cost base. If we can address much of the broader policy issues that John mentioned — the regulations and red tape — there is absolutely no doubt that small businesses would take on more staff.

The problem lies in a perception that we hear about all the time. A large section of our membership is made up of people who are self-employed. They have enough resources and they prefer to stay at that point and not expand, because if they expand, they must take on more staff, and they see that as additional paperwork. We desperately need to get away from the situation in which small businesses think that it is better to cap the number of employees or not employ anyone at all.

We proposed a range of suggestions in our evidence to you today, but the only way that we can address the cost base issue is to place entrepreneurship on the education curriculum from whatever stage possible.

We need to move away from a solely academic focus. When the Federation of Small Businesses advertised basic administration jobs, a large number of the applicants for them had Masters degrees of every hue. That is unacceptable. No one who takes the time and trouble to go to university should have to apply for an administrative position. We have to ensure that we have jobs for graduates.

However, when steering graduates into career development we must let them know that self-employment is an option. We need to ensure that entrepreneurship is on the curriculum as early as possible and that all university courses have some vocational training and practical application. Some people come out of university with very little experience of the world of work, which can be a problem for employers as they do not see university graduates having a grounding in workplace needs.

Mr Poots: The entrepreneurial spirit is alive and kicking in Northern Ireland, but perhaps it can be found more in those who go into traditional businesses: welders and joiners are setting up business because they have no other option. Those who go to university tend, perhaps, to take relatively well-paid jobs with a pension. Perhaps they are unwilling to take the risk of going into the market and establishing their own businesses.

You mentioned crime, and I see the article in your submission on fuel duty. Do you believe that now is an opportune time to challenge the Chancellor and the Government on fuel duty? There are three prongs to launching such a challenge. First, the Irish Republic has said that it will increase fuel duty in response to environmental concerns that the European Union raised. That may reduce the variation in the price of fuel between Northern Ireland and the Republic.

Secondly, a decrease in fuel duty would increase the revenue to the Northern Ireland tax budget, and Seán Farren raised that issue earlier. Many of the proposals that we are discussing would reduce tax revenue, but the proposal to reduce fuel tax would increase tax revenue for the Treasury.

Thirdly, there are people at this table who represent an organisation that is up to its eyeballs in fuel smuggling, and we will not achieve devolution in Northern Ireland while that goes on. If the Government are serious about delivering devolution in Northern Ireland, they have to deal with crime. Although the Assets Recovery Agency has gone after some people, many of the big hitters have not been touched.

The Government benefits three ways: environmentally, in increased tax revenue, and in the achieving of devolution.

Mr Roberts: Perhaps John can illustrate my point with a case study, but the federation has twice suggested to the Northern Ireland Select Affairs Committee that fuel duty in Northern Ireland should be equalised with that of the Republic. Prof Goldstock's report, which came by the Northern Ireland Office, came to the same conclusion. Until we deal with the difference in fuel duty, we will not solve the problem. We have to remove fuel smuggling by removing the smugglers' incentive.

Many filling station forecourts on this side of the border no longer exist — they cannot exist. The Northern Ireland Office has ducked and dived on this issue for too long, as has the Treasury. The work of the Organised Crime Task Force and the Assets Recovery Agency will amount to nothing while the difference in fuel duty exists on the island.

Mr Friel: I do not know the solution. I have a business across the border as well as one on this side of it. We had an account with two filling stations, one in Lifford and one in Strabane. The owner of the filling station in Strabane hung on for as long as he could — at one point we were his only customer — before he had to pack it in.

Twenty years ago, there were seven filling stations in Strabane. Three years ago they were down to just that particular one, which shows how many have gone. Twenty years ago petrol would have been much more expensive in the Republic, and people were coming in droves from Donegal, from Gweedore in busloads on Saturdays, and then it became cheap for them to come in cars and fill them up. That has turned around.

1.00 pm

There used to be three filling stations in Lifford, and now there is only one, and it almost closed too. The only people who supported it were the customs officers and guards who bought fuel there. When you go over there now you have to join a queue. It is open 24 hours a day. There is no talk about a filling station in Strabane, and there probably never will be one there again.

Mr Roberts: There is a double benefit. It is not just about the fuel duty, there is also the job creation that would happen as a result. You would be creating legitimate jobs as a result of which people would be paying taxes as opposed to having people behaving illegitimately in the black market.

Mr Friel: The small shops and car washes with filling stations have all gone.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Time is going against us. One thing I spoke to Invest Northern Ireland about was what stops a small family business from getting into the export market. Is there a mechanism whereby the Government guarantee assistance that could help small businesses to expand into the export market? Obviously, the risk factor would be high, and sometimes family businesses are quite content to operate at a certain level and be managed and controlled, as John said, at that level.

Mr Friel: There would have to be Government guarantees. Most people, when businesses reach a manageable level, are inclined to stay there. Although business and turnover might increase rapidly, the bottom line might stay the same at the end of the year. Therefore why take the chance and the hassle? There is not a lot of support from Invest Northern Ireland or the banks. Most banks will not work with the Government guarantee scheme, and that is the way things are. Differences between banks now as regards borrowing large sums of money are practically nil, and you would need a large sum of money, and a lot of help from Invest Northern Ireland, if you were going to go into the export business. That help is not forthcoming.

Mr Roberts: A lot of this is not necessarily about high-level trade delegations; it can be very simple. We have air links with places such as Prague — and the Czech Republic has a very similar economy to ours: small businesses and rural based. However, we have not used that air link effectively; we have not used it as a sort of economic corridor to bring entrepreneurs and small business owners from Prague and put them in a room with small business owners here. A lot of it is as simple as that. All small business owners are compulsive networkers, and much should be done at that basic level. The easier it is to facilitate that, the better.

There is no doubt that we need to find new markets and develop products that we can export. It is a big job, and we are acutely aware of it and have made a suggestion in our report to the subgroup.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Thank you for coming along. You have given us a lot of information. If you have any further information would you provide it to the subgroup within 10 days so that it can be processed by the Clerk? A copy of the Hansard report of this session will be available within 24 hours for you to check, and I would ask you to respond to the subgroup on that. We will break for 20 minutes. Sandwiches are available, and you are welcome to stay for those.

The subgroup was suspended at 1.04 pm.

On resuming —

1.32 pm

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We shall let Mr Nellis begin.

Mr Liam Nellis (InterTradeIreland): First, I wish to thank members for giving me the opportunity to make a presentation. The subgroup is engaged in a very important piece of work, and it is important to everyone to get the Assembly system up and running again.

The subgroup is examining the economic challenges facing Northern Ireland. Owing to our remit, we in InterTradeIreland speak from a certain perspective. Our role and remit clearly come from legislation such as the British-Irish Agreement Act 1999. That role and remit are clearly all-island in nature, and I will talk from that perspective. However, first, we wish to identify the major impediments to the development of the Northern Ireland economy. That is what you have asked InterTradeIreland to do, as well as to consider other matters, including how a possible peace dividend and economic package might be delivered.

I will not go too far into the question of fiscal incentives, because that is really an issue for the UK Government. If members wish me to make personal comments on that, I can, but in an all-island context, it would not be right for me to talk about that.

InterTradeIreland's strategic remit puts us in a reasonable position to talk about issues facing businesses across the island. We have delivered value to more than 9,500 companies in the six years that we have been around.

The impediments that we have identified are not ours but come from examination of various sets of analyses. I am sure that, this morning, members will have heard many of the points that I will make. Members will hear those points again over the next few weeks as they meet other people.

It is quite clear that there is a set of impediments to the development of the Northern Ireland economy. Those impediments have been identified by the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment, by the Economic Development Forum, by the Business Alliance and by the Federation of Small Businesses. I will talk members through InterTradeIreland's analysis of those impediments, and then I hope to talk about how all-island collaboration can contribute to economic regeneration as part of the wider economic package.

To set the context, we believe that the Northern Ireland economy has been performing well in recent years. Wealth has increased — the statistics support that. Gross value added per capita more than doubled in Northern Ireland between 1990 and 2003. Job numbers have increased, mainly due to growth in the services sector. Unemployment has quite clearly decreased. Those are very positive indicators.

However, that apparently strong performance masks long-term and imbedded structural weaknesses in the economy. There are two real core metrics of that, which will come as no surprise to anyone around the table. I could state the first one in two ways: the economy is overly dependent on the public sector; or the economy has a very small private-sector base. Public expenditure as a share of GDP is now 71.3%, compared to only 43% in the UK and 31% in Ireland. Northern Ireland's public sector share of employment is 32%, and the annual subvention from the UK Exchequer is approximately £6 billion.

That public-private imbalance has two main implications: first, an obvious vulnerability to public spending decisions that are largely taken at national Government level; secondly, the private sector lacks the critical mass to generate the step change in economic performance that we have all been discussing.

People seem to think that, by reducing the public sector, all of a sudden green shoots will grow and a very healthy private sector will fill that void. Obviously, I do not believe that, and I am sure that nobody here does either. Serious steps will need to be taken in order to help during that transition.

The second core metric is the persistent wealth gap between Northern Ireland and the rest of the UK. Per capita, the gross value added is 20% lower in Northern Ireland than in the rest of the UK, and very little progress has been made in closing that wealth gap.

A number of key challenges that we must all meet roll from those two main structural weaknesses. The first is to increase productivity — again, that is nothing new. Labour productivity has fallen by eight percentage points against the UK average. Northern Ireland productivity is the lowest in the UK.

Productivity can be boosted by increasing capital investment, growth in the labour force and other factors that affect total productivity, such as technological advances, better organisation of business, better redistribution of resources from low-productivity sectors into high-growth sectors and, importantly, institutional and political stability.

The challenges that I will refer to are all related to the achievement of higher productivity. Most have been identified by the Economic Development Forum and others under the objective of 'Economic Vision for Northern Ireland', with which you will all be familiar. That identifies innovation, entrepreneurship, skills and infrastructure as the key drivers of future economic competitiveness and wealth. We will focus on those areas.

We need to increase economic activity. The figures have already been mentioned: there are 289,000 economically inactive people in Northern Ireland, which equates to 27.4% of the working-age population. That is the highest level of any region in the UK.

Northern Ireland is ranked ninth out of 12 regions in the UK for entrepreneurship. Our rate of entrepreneurship is half that of the United States of America, and there are reasons for that. Another significant factor is that Northern Ireland has an unexpectedly low level of female entrepreneurship, and we must understand why.

We need to increase skills within the labour market through initial skilling, reskilling or upskilling. Some 24% of the working population have no qualifications. That lack of qualifications impacts on wealth creation, because higher-level educational achievement has a bearing on earning capacity.

The map we have provided shows that low-level educational achievement is a particular problem in border areas, especially to the west, which highlights an imbalance. It is also reflected in the next map, which illustrates lower earnings. The further away someone is from Belfast, the less money he is capable of earning.

Another big issue for us is the creation of R&D and science and technology innovation. Northern Ireland R&D expenditure continues to lag way behind that of the UK and Europe. Northern Ireland is sitting at 1.19% of gross value added; in the EU, it is 1.93% and even within the UK as a whole it is 1.86%. Clearly, we need to up our game if we want to be in any way competitive.

Before we move to questions, I will outline how we see all-island cross-border collaboration helping to contribute to economic regeneration. As the pace and intensity of global competitiveness increases, the search for competitive advantage becomes ever more complex and rigorous. In other parts of the world, greater economic co-operation between regions has been found to create gains in trade and investment.

Figures for cross-border trade in 2005 have just been released, and it is encouraging to know that cross-border trade is up by 5.5%, reflecting an almost 9% increase in North-to-South trade, as opposed to 3% South-to-North. At the moment, Northern Ireland is doing considerably better from North/South trade than the Republic. That makes sense, because the Southern market is more important to Northern Ireland than vice versa. Therefore, Northern Ireland gains more.

Greater economies of scale can be gained through the administrative pooling of resources, which delivers more efficient and effective services. Several people talked about infrastructure, and there are already positive signs with the Strategic Investment Board and its sister agency in the Republic, the National Development and Finance Agency (NDFA), which is headed by Anne Counihan. Both agencies are already talking about collaborating on R&D infrastructure.

We recently published a report called 'Spatial Strategies on the Island of Ireland', which has come from the International Centre for Local and Regional Development. That document contains the analysis that was asked about; there is an analysis of spatial planning and the importance of a joined-up approach to it. That approach could address questions such as where domestic houses are built, where waste resources are sited and how roads are developed. It makes so much more sense for neighbours to work together than separately.

We can promote the wider economic benefits of knowledge transfer by using networks and clusters. Some people get hung up on that terminology, asking what is, and what is not, a cluster. The important thing is to get people collaborating to mutual benefit across the island. With that, everybody wins.

Early in InterTradeIreland's life we conducted a detailed analysis, with a roadshow that went to four locations on the island. We talked to 1,500 large, medium and small companies across the island. It was expected that people would talk about impediments such as the old traditional accepted truths about poor infrastructure and volatility of the currency, which, at that time, was the punt.

From that analysis, the biggest issues that emerged were the softer issues. Business relationships were lacking, and people did not know the players. To do business, trust is a prerequisite. If those relationships are not there, you do not do business. Therefore, much of our work goes into improving that area.

Lack of information is the other big issue. Many companies, particularly small ones, have told us that they can find information about gross domestic product (GDP), good manufacturing practice (GMP) and gross value added (GVA), but they have no idea who makes farm gates in County Cork, how many are made, what it costs and where raw materials are from. All that information was not available.

That has led us to direct much of our resources to creating new knowledge about the island economy, disseminating that and getting people to work together and build relationships. Those are every bit as critical as the hard infrastructure. We must get people plugged in together.

Enhanced co-operation can create a larger domestic market. In a global environment, it makes absolute sense for a market of one and a half million people and a market of three and a bit million people to form a market of over five million people. It is a no-brainer. Everybody gains, and we can create new business opportunities. We are not saying that it is an either/or situation; Northern Ireland's major market is clearly still the rest of the UK. Nobody is saying that our attention should be deflected from that.

There is another way to look at it. You can have it both ways, and we should encourage businesses to develop the North/South all-island dimension every bit as energetically as they have east-west relationships. Again, everybody wins. Helping to create a large and more dynamic private sector is a key stage in helping to get that leap forward in economic performance.

During InterTradeIreland's initial years, we conducted tests and pilots to get some ideas and companies working together. However, we are now at the point where our programmes are mature enough and our thinking is evidence-based. We feel that the way to get more international attraction for this island is much closer collaboration between businesses across the island. That comes in so many different forms.

Our corporate plan stated that we wanted to develop all-island businesses and networks. In the first year of that plan, we established 19 such networks.

Some of them are sector-specific, particularly in the area of biotechnology. We brought together Bio Northern Ireland with the Irish Medical Devices Association and the Irish Bioindustry Association. They are all working well in the life science area.

InterTradeIreland is also working with information technology, with Momentum — the Northern trade association — and the Irish Software Association, which is affiliated to the Irish Business Employers' Confederation and ICT Ireland. It is not about getting together for a beer or playing a game of golf; it is about serious engagement. On the software side, InterTradeIreland has supported those organisations in developing a feasibility study to create an all-island wireless test bed. Many new wireless companies across the island have to test their products off the island, because there is insufficient scale on the island, but we have been working with those companies to provide that scale, as it makes more sense to develop the test bed on the island.

InterTradeIreland has supported the North West Science and Technology Partnership. We work in what we call "communities of interest" with microenterprises, which are companies that fall below the radar of Invest Northern Ireland and Enterprise Ireland, as they have 10 employees or fewer. Quite often, those companies are too small to attract the attention of organisations with portfolios, but we have brought together the county enterprise boards and the city enterprise boards in the South with the local enterprise agencies in the North, and we regularly hold all-island events. Every county brings at least five or six companies to those events, so linkages and relationships develop across the island.

Some companies are involved in areas of excellence that InterTradeIreland has created. One area is benchmarking. We have set up the Irish Benchmarking Forum. When InterTradeIreland was set up, LEDU, IDB, Enterprise Ireland, Shannon Development and Foras na Gaeilge were all considering different ways of benchmarking their organisations. Some used the European business model, some used the CAM Benchmarking model, and some used the world-class cluster model. We got them all to agree a set of core metrics, and now they work together on an all-island basis, and everyone knows what each other is talking about.

InterTradeIreland is doing a lot of work on equity finance across the island. We have an all-island seedcorn competition, which encourages potentially high-growth businesses to get involved and to make their pitch for investment. Our approach is to get more active collaboration across a range of sectors and issues and move that forward.

Science, technology and innovation are key areas for InterTradeIreland, as are sales and marketing and business capability improvement. We are delivering a range of initiatives, but I will not go into detail as members have had a long morning. In science, technology and innovation, for example, the fusion technology transfer programme works effectively. The model is that we find a company in one jurisdiction that has a product or process development need, and match it up with a university or knowledge centre in the other jurisdiction that can help it. Then we put a graduate in between the two. We were supposed to do 20 projects in the pilot exercise. At that time, I reported directly to Sir Reg Empey and Mary Harney. They liked it so much that we did 63 projects in the pilot, and we have now rolled out another 120.

InterTradeIreland also has a collaborative programme called Innova, which supports R&D co-operation between companies North and South, and that is working well. We have an all-island research portal where researchers in any university on the island can publish a brief. More than £50 million of direct business development value has been created in the past three years through the various programmes that InterTradeIreland has been involved with.

Finally, all-Ireland collaboration is a potentially lucrative source of competitive advantage for Northern Ireland, and we strive to address the key structural impediments outlined. Such collaboration offers opportunities for the private sector to become more competitive and provides opportunities for the public sector to be more efficient and effective in delivering services. It should be an integral part of any future economic development strategy for Northern Ireland. The areas of science, technology and innovation offer the most scope for mutual beneficial collaboration, and we should invest any windfall coming from the peace dividend in those areas, as they are critical for us all moving forward.

We need to move from being investment-driven to being innovation-led, and that comes from both economies. We need greater concentration on an all-island approach to labour market skills development. We need to be more joined up on infrastructure. The key vehicle for moving forward is all-island collaboration for everybody's benefit and all-island business networks.

Ms Gildernew: If the map on page 9 of InterTradeIreland's submission were superimposed on a map of Ireland that showed motorways and dual carriageways, it would be obvious that the high earners live near the best roads. The west will always be disadvantaged. My constituency, and those of West Tyrone and Foyle, do very badly. The border is an obvious impediment to economic growth and stability.

What more can be done? Mr Nellis has given us a very comprehensive description of the work in which he has been involved over the years, but what else must be done to turn things around? The lack of political stability has had a major impact on the Six Counties. It is mind-boggling. We must turn that around if we are to have any kind of future and if we are to ensure that people stay in areas such as Fermanagh and Tyrone.

Mr Nellis: We are not looking at either jurisdiction; we are looking at the island, and we are the first organisation to take that island view. The European programmes that involved INTERREG and the Peace programmes stopped at the border counties of the Republic and the six counties of Northern Ireland. The International Fund for Ireland did exactly the same. There is an imaginary line drawn across the island and nobody goes beyond that line. As a result, there has been a turning of the backs of the two economies over what some people say is 30 years. It is not; it is 80 years, or since partition.

The de Valera Governments imposed tariffs on trading with the North. The big slogan in Dublin business circles after partition was: "Burn anything British but their coal." The issue is much bigger than the past 30 years. We are trying to redress a structural fracture between the two economies that is much more deep-seated than that.

In answer to Michelle's question, we must move more from involvement and accept that there are advantages to be had by collaborating across the island to mutual benefit. We must engage seriously on issues and start building infrastructure together, rather than just talking about it. That is only one example. There are R&D funds in the North and South. Why not genuinely open up the R&D funds in the South to companies from the North, and vice versa? I could provide many other examples.

The South stands to gain as much as the North over time. While the South is way up there now, it recognises that for it to keep pace and stay in that position it must be much more innovation-led. We would argue for much closer collaboration on innovation, R&D and competitiveness.

Mr Aidan Gough (InterTradeIreland): It is very clear that both Governments would benefit from collaboration on strategies to solve the issues pertaining to border areas. The north-west is a problem for the Irish Government, as it is for the Administration here. Every indicator shows that County Donegal is at the bottom of the table in the Irish Republic. Instead of the two Governments developing separate strategies for border regions, it would make sense for them to develop their strategies with a cohesive approach to spatial planning, economic development, education and health. Both sides of the border would benefit. The border will not be addressed within one context or the other, as there are economic problems in the border areas.

Dr Farren: I cannot help but make the political point that the party that so constantly reminds itself that it is the largest party in Northern Ireland is absent from this session. I find it difficult to believe that it could not provide participants, not least because its spokespersons so frequently throw cold water or scepticism over the issues and the way that they are addressed by bodies such as InterTradeIreland.

I trust that the submission will be read by the DUP's representatives on the Preparation for Government Committee, and that the lessons that we are trying to extract from the submission for the way forward will be obvious.

I do not expect either of our visitors to comment on those remarks.

Dr Birnie: You are being mischievous.

Mr McNarry: You just wanted to make them, Seán. Are you making them for Hansard?

Dr Farren: It is regrettable that the DUP is not able to participate and put its point of view to our colleagues from InterTradeIreland. I have a number of questions to ask, so I will have to restrict myself. Mr Nellis made a point about business being innovation-led. I have been a strong proponent of some kind of all-island research strategic alliance, which would involve the business sector, public sector and the centres where research is undertaken — mainly, of course, in the universities. I would like to see the establishment of new funds targeted at sectors in which economic growth could be expected and better use made of existing funds. The South has moved ahead with the all-island Science Foundation Ireland, and Northern universities have access to UK sources of funding as well as some other specific sources.

We are in what could be described as a back-to-back situation, or one in which some bilateral arrangements — or maybe trilateral — on an ad hoc, project-by-project basis can emerge, but there is not the strategic overview that might drive a common approach. After listening to the remarks of InterTradeIreland's representatives, I would like to think that the establishment of an over-arching strategic alliance — such as that I have suggested — supported by, possibly, an allocation of existing funds or the creation of new funds, would contribute significantly. That does not preclude the involvement of institutions outside of Ireland, North and South. There is a clear imperative to do that, because while Northern universities gain access to UK funds and have their own, they are on the periphery and there is much interchange at other levels among the universities on these islands. There are only nine universities, plus the colleges — or the institutes of technology — where research takes place. Therefore, it is not a huge constituency.

I would have thought that with the prompting of InterTradeIreland, the two Administrations — together with the universities and other institutes where research is taking place — could come together with the private sector in the ways that I am trying to hint at. There would be considerable potential in that, with nobody being exposed politically.

Mr Nellis: I agree with you 100%, Seán. Some very good stuff is already happening in that area. I will give you two or three examples of those, but I am sure that there are more.

2.00 pm

We are involved in providing the secretariat for the United States-Ireland R&D Partnership, which started its journey in October 2002 at the United States-Ireland Business Summit in Washington. The Secretary of Health and Human Services in the United States, Tommy G. Thompson, became interested in a cancer oncology project that was then under way. Prof Paddy Johnston was involved in that, and he used his links in the National Institutes of Health and National Cancer Institute in the United States to bring in colleagues from the South and develop a tripartite approach to cancer research. That research is going strong to this day.

That model encouraged us to look at other areas, including R&D. It was excruciating: trying to get two jurisdictions to agree to something is difficult enough on a day-to-day basis, but getting three to agree was so hard that several times we almost gave up. However, the United States-Ireland R&D Partnership is now up and running. Researchers are working on multiple sclerosis, diabetes, avian flu, sensors and nanotechnology.

That means that there is active collaboration across the pond and on a North/South basis.

The partnership worked out how to release the funding. I was at the residence of the American Ambassador to Ireland for the partnership's recent launch, at which Aileen McGinley announced that additional money would be made available for the northern elements of the project. That is very encouraging.

The British-Irish Intergovernmental Conference is looking carefully at that development. It is meeting today, and it will consider, among other things, providing a new impetus to R&D collaboration. That could be achieved by perhaps getting the two Governments to work together, with an international partner, to access the European Union framework programmes on R&D. Those programmes provide lots of funding, which has been just sitting there. The funding is similar to penalty kicks that have been available for the taking for quite a long time but no one has gone near them. With a bit of imagination we could really get in there and score some big things for the island.

The nine universities in Ireland were mentioned. I sit on a panel of Universities Ireland, which brings together the nine university presidents, provosts and vice-chancellors. Again, that group is not just a talking shop. InterTradeIreland has been working with Universities Ireland on the collaborative commercialisation of university research. We gave the group a report on that, which it will adopt at next month's meeting.

A lot of good stuff is already happening. I am not saying that there is a vacuum, but a much more strategic and co-ordinated approach, with the pace set by the two Governments rather than bilaterally by two Departments, would move this to a level that will benefit everyone.

Mr McNarry: Chairman, I am not quite sure what Sean Neeson and Liam Nellis were having a cosy chat about.

Dr Farren: Seán Farren.

Mr McNarry: Seán Farren; I am sorry. What did I call you?

Dr Farren: Sean Neeson.

Mr Ford: Sean Neeson will not sue.

Mr McNarry: Perhaps they were hatching an economic R&D unitary state under some other guise, but we have been alerted to that and must keep a careful eye on it.

Dr Farren: I do not know what you are on about.

Mr McNarry: That is the problem. It is not for me to defend a certain party's absence from this meeting, but I share its cynicism, which I am not repudiating. Perhaps one should give cognisance to unionists' feelings. However, had certain members participated in this discussion, they, like me, would have learnt from it. I found the meeting beneficial, and I am grateful for what I have heard up to now.

Continuing to be sceptical, I have three questions for Liam and Aidan. Is there a bias in cross-border trade? Do barriers remain to be broken? Do we still live with the nationalist preference for buying Irish and the unionist preference for buying British? Is that still noticeable not just in the marketing but in the purchasing of products?

The discussion on collaboration was very intriguing and interesting. There are bound to be red-tape complications with it, so will you explain a couple of them?

Are many businesses selling to or buying from each separate jurisdiction, whether that is manufacturing, retail or marketing?

Mr Nellis: I will answer your questions in the order in which they were asked. There are still barriers; some actual, some virtual, some psychological. There is still a chill factor that works both North/South and South/North. Fifteen years into the Celtic tiger, there is still a widely held perception among Northern businesses not to do business with those fellows down there, because they cannot get money out of them.

Mr McNarry: Is that not true? [Laughter.]

Mr Nellis: I do not know. My experience over the last five years is that that is not true.

Mr Gough: There is some basis in fact for that. Payment for debts in the North is typically 30 days, whereas it is 60 to 90 days in the South. It is just a difference in culture.

Mr Nellis: InterTradeIreland's Chairman, Martin Naughton, who deals with the business community in the South, says of some of the senior Dublin business community that their knuckles turn white when they pass Balbriggan. There are factors, and we are addressing them.

Any programme stands or falls on the demand for it. All our programmes are seriously oversubscribed, and we are much more selective now than we were at the outset. That is a very strong indicator. That is not to say that there are not inherent biases in some people's buying patterns. I have not done any analysis of that, but I have heard evidence from both sides.

Irish Breeze Limited, a Drogheda company that makes cosmetic products, said that found it difficult to penetrate the Northern market until its name was changed. I am responding to the question; it is an impressionistic response. We have done no detailed analysis, but it is something that we might consider.

I can give you any number of examples of collaboration and red tape. Exchequer money cannot flow from one jurisdiction to the other. We cannot get researchers to collaborate on R&D — there is a barrier there. We are trying to set up an all-island business angels network; people with a few quid, high-wealth individuals to help, support, mentor and invest in other businesses.

Mr McNarry: Would they take on redundant MLAs in November? [Laughter.]

Mr Nellis: If you have the wealth.

Mr McNarry: We would be looking for the money.

Dr Farren: We could invest any pay-off that we get.

Mr Nellis: One of the big issues is that, under financial regulations both North and South, we cannot set up an all-island network of business angels. There must be a Southern network and a Northern network.

Mr McNarry: Quite right too.

Mr Nellis: There are structural, statutory and regulatory impediments all along the way. We have been trying to address some of those issues with telecom providers. We have pressured them in respect of all-island tariffs and roaming charges, and we have made progress on both those fronts.

That is not to say that there is not more to do. When we came on the scene, there was not one flight from Belfast to any other part of this island. We wrote a strong research paper that encouraged Aer Arann to try the Belfast to Cork route. That service now regularly runs at a load factor of 70%. There is now a flight service between Belfast and Galway.

People asked why we supported the Belfast to Cork route, when it was tried in 1972 by Dan-Air Services Ltd and did not work. However, we are now in a completely new dimension. Since peace has come our way over the last ten years, people are much more open to moving across the island. They do not have the same fears, and we need to capitalise on that changed mindset.

Mr McNarry: What about the buying?

Mr Nellis: Again, we have not done any detailed research. We are talking to the Chambers of Commerce, because they are seen as a neutral vehicle. However, we tend to subscribe to the school of thought that says that it is simply about finding the money to set up an all-island business brokerage service.

Many business professionals such as PricewaterhouseCoopers and Deloitte know of companies that want to sell, but they keep their arms around them because they are their own. We want to open up that market on an all-island basis and have genuine opportunities for people to find out what businesses are for sale and the surrounding issues.

Last week, I had a meeting with P Elliott & Co Ltd, property developers from County Cavan. The company is a big player and had a £400 million turnover last year. It has never done business in the North, yet the owner lives less than a mile from the border. He has now made the decision to open a Belfast office. We hear about that sort of thing more and more. A man with whom I play golf is the managing director of a Belfast printing company, which has bought a printing company in Dublin. There is much more going on than what might first appear, but I do not have the detailed figures.

Ms Ritchie: Liam and Aidan, you are very welcome.

I would like to put on record my congratulations to InterTradeIreland for the work that it has done to break down the barriers between North/South trade and between thinking on the island of Ireland. I note that you commissioned the International Centre for Local and Regional Development, which has links with Harvard University, to undertake a joined-up study of spatial planning on the island. It not only examined problems in the border areas, but it examined problems on the entire island and how joined-up thinking could contribute to better economic regeneration and a better wealth economy for all. After all, we want to create a better way of life for everybody.

Does InterTradeIreland think that a collaborative approach on spatial planning, with all the economic opportunities that it presents, points the way to joined-up thinking on infrastructure?

What additional joined-up thinking on infrastructure is required? The Republic has Transport 21, but there is no evidence that we in the North are trying to dovetail with Transport 21 or to provide the required infrastructure to improve our roads and railways. Sectoral work has been done by Translink and Iarnród Éireann on the Belfast-Dublin railway, but I have not seen much further evidence of that.

How long do you think that it will take to implement the recommendations of that spatial planning collaborative approach?

Mr Nellis: The International Centre for Local and Regional Development is a collaboration of several universities on and off this island. It brings together the University of Ulster, the National University of Ireland at Maynooth and Harvard University. However, a key ingredient in developing that combined approach to thinking about spatial planning in an all-island context for the first time was the involvement of the Northern and Southern Environment Departments. That was a major step forward, and the spatial planning professionals recognised that it made sense.

We will do whatever we can to encourage that as it moves forward. Since the findings were published, I have spoken at a couple of major conferences. There was a conference on infrastructure in Dundalk about six months ago at which David Gavaghan, Lord Rooker and Dermot Ahern spoke about the importance of closer co-operation on North/South infrastructure.

Recently, I spoke at a conference in Omagh on infrastructure collaboration in the north-west. The National Roads Authority and the Department for Regional Development were talking the same language of collaboration.

2.15 pm

The principle has been accepted, but the political impetus that people such as you can bring to bear is required to make it happen and progress. Any work that we have been doing on this issue has been positive. The Enterprise rail service between Belfast and Dublin is supposed to be the flagship transport project on the island, but it pales into insignificance when one examines what is happening across the world. I go to Spain occasionally to play golf, and a 200-metre-high motorway has been built since I was last there six months ago; it takes us four and a half years to sort out the Westlink.

The Enterprise train is going downhill, so to speak. I have spoken to both Iarnród Éireann and Translink over the years, and I think they accept that. There was supposed to be significant investment from Brussels to speed up that track and provide new rolling stock; I do not see much evidence of it. I travel on it a lot because of my job, and quite often there is no coffee because no one has turned up to provide it.

Mr McLaughlin: Our trains do not turn up at all, and you are worried about coffee! [Laughter.]

Ms Ritchie: That gives us further food for thought. We could explore at a later stage how to push the transport organisations to plan in an all-island approach and maximise the contribution to the economy.

Mr Gough: To open up infrastructure is to open up new markets and new business opportunities. Liam mentioned air travel. Through our intervention and the research and reports that we wrote, there is now a direct flight between Belfast and Cork. That has a 70% load factor: business people travelling back and forth who would not previously have done so. I know that one company that has units in Belfast and Cork contemplated closing the Belfast unit because of travel difficulties before the flight was put on. Infrastructure opens business opportunities.

Mr McLaughlin: On page 4 you discuss the persistent wealth gap. I am interested in the statement that almost all progress made took place before 1997, a period that coincides with the negotiation of the Good Friday Agreement. What factors changed? Was it the haemorrhaging of manufacturing jobs, the increased profile of service jobs within employment? Are those the key determinants?

Mr Nellis: Can I talk to my economist colleague?

Mr McLaughlin: I will come back to it. It was an intriguing statement, because I would have thought that if we were making progress, it really should have been in the period after the Good Friday Agreement.

InterTradeIreland has been a success story, and one of its successes is that it is much less controversial across the local political spectrum in that it has demonstrated the benefits of collaboration and creating critical mass and maximising potential and opportunity. I want to thank you for that, first of all.

As regards your progress, has InterTradeIreland identified to both Governments additional areas of potential? To what extent do the current care and maintenance arrangements impede progress? That has significance for both the so-called "Plan A" and "Plan B" scenarios.

To what extent are current budgetary and resource levels a limiting factor to the work that InterTradeIreland could do?

Mr Nellis: I will leave the detailed point that came up until the end, as I need to consult.

We have been working closely with both Governments. Over the last few months we have done a major piece of work. There was a joint statement by the Secretary of State and Dermot Ahern after the British-Irish Intergovernmental Conference (BIIGC) to call on officials to be much more imaginative and challenging on how they take forward North/South economic collaboration. They asked for a review of the whole territory: what was, was not, and could be done.

We have been providing the secretariat for that piece of work for a number of months now. The final shape of the paper is beginning to emerge, and it contains some significant ideas. I do not want to go into the detail of those today, because involved in the discussions are OFMDFM, the Taoiseach's office, the Department for Foreign Affairs, DETI etc. All those partners are crafting the paper.

However, they are saying: "Let's not have any more taboos", and they are asking: "What is good for everyone?" Joined-up trade missions make sense, which was proven when, earlier this year, the Taoiseach offered Northern Ireland companies the chance to go to India. Invest Northern Ireland and the Northern Ireland firms thought that that was a tremendous opportunity. The two Governments are now considering further joined-up trade missions.

We also concentrated on R&D. Massive funds are available for that, but it is very difficult to move Exchequer money from one jurisdiction to another. Aidan, is the budget of the Science Foundation Ireland €6 billion?

Mr Gough: No. There is a total investment of €9 billion for research and development to back the new strategy that has been launched in the Republic. That sum is double previous budgets.

Mr Nellis: There is no reason why, with a bit of imagination, that investment should not be open to Northern Ireland companies. All it takes is some political involvement; it is not rocket science.

Mr Gough: Centres of excellence are crucial for science and technology. Will there really be two world-class centres of excellence 60 miles apart? Universities and the Governments have opportunities to collaborate and create one genuine centre of excellence. Again, that requires more imaginative thinking about how funds cross borders.

Mr Nellis: The care and maintenance regime has now lasted for two and a half years, and we have just got on with it. Our remit was clearly set out before direct rule resumed in October 2003, and at that time we agreed a programme with Ministers. The two Governments approve our annual business plan. Since 2003 we have agreed our programme in writing through OFMDFM and the Department for Foreign Affairs in Dublin. That slows the process up a little, but it has not caused us much grief.

We have run into difficulty regarding the reappointment of board members. All organisations want a top-quality board, but they also want the board's membership to revolve sensibly so that everybody does not walk out the door one morning leaving no board the next. Current circumstances mean that no one has addressed the board membership of the cross-border bodies. As a result, all of our board members are likely to walk out in December. That is not a good way to run anything. Therefore some issues on the margins cause us concern.

However, we have remained focused on the business agenda. The remit that we have been given within the annexes of the legislation is quite broad, and all that we have been doing, from supply chain to equity, is included in that remit. Therefore the care and maintenance regime has not really got in the way.

As for budgetary and resource access, comments had been made that InterTradeIreland kept having to give back money because it could not spend it. I worked for the IDB until December 1999. In the middle of 1999 I was approached by Gerry Loughran, who was then head of the Civil Service. He said that there was talk about North/South bodies being set up under the Good Friday Agreement and that, if that happened, it would happen very quickly. He asked me whether I would be prepared to go out as interim chief executive to set up a trade body.

Since the suggestion was from Gerry Loughran, I knew that he was not asking me whether I was interested but rather telling me that I was the man. I went on holiday in December 1999 and came back to find that I had lost my nice office on the fifth floor of IDB House. I had an empty room across the road in Londonderry House. I had no staff and £9 million to spend. Obviously, I gave money back in the first, second and third years while we built the organisation in a very controlled way. We had to move from secondees at the start to recruiting our own employees. Over five years we built the organisation to a point at which our capacity is such that we are more than able to spend our budget in a sensible, coherent way.

We also have inescapable commitments that run through our programme from one year to the next. Of our budget of £9 million, probably £6.5 million to £7 million is programme money, and of that, probably more than half is committed before we start the year in rollovers from one- to two-year programmes. Our room at the margins for getting involved in programmes is narrow; we have to make hard choices. Either we stop doing some programmes or change their shape so that they do not cost so much — or we get more money.

Something has to give along the way. We are at our full staff complement of 42 and new things come at us all the time. There is the question of infrastructure and there has been talk of our getting involved in an approach to waste management. That is another big infrastructure issue that nobody is dealing with. Such issues are constantly coming up, and we must be much more selective about what we take on. In the early days, we had enough money to do everything that we wanted to, but those days have passed.

Mr Ford: Thank you for your presentation, which was positive, at least in some parts. You have good news to tell us. However, I want to return to some of the earlier parts of your submission — the bad news bits.

You highlighted the fact that in the first half of the nineties there was a significant increase in gross value added per capita compared to the UK, yet gross value added per employee — productivity — is in long-term decline. I presume that that was simply because more people were got into what was possibly the wrong kind of employment. You also highlight service industries, retailing and call centres. Should we have learnt lessons from the way that the Republic developed its economy over a similar timescale? It appears that its definition of services was of higher-quality jobs than the services into which we put people.

Mr Nellis: You raise several issues. Much of the employment that was created was service-based, and, as you saw from some of the other analyses, such employment is often not well paid and therefore it creates less wealth in the local economy. However, we are where we are.

I worked in IDB in the 1990s and have been in the Civil Service for 34 years. The story was very different in Northern Ireland as regards going for mobile investment than it was in the South: we could not afford to be so choosy about the jobs that we brought in. The South could, through the Celtic tiger, be much more selective and could even say to companies that they would get nothing for coming to Dublin; that they had to go to the border regions. The Northern Ireland system could not begin to do that. We still need to build a base of top-quality mobile investment in the knowledge-based sectors. The playing field is slightly different.

Northern Ireland has come up significantly, but it still does not enjoy the selectivity that the South enjoys. I still do not think that a company will get money for coming to Dublin.

Mr Ford: If we are to build on the knowledge-based sectors, should we target foreign direct investment (FDI) or should we develop indigenous businesses? We have talked about both at different stages, but we have not worked out where we need to target the major effort.

2.30 pm

Mr Nellis: I am not an economist, but analysis that I have seen shows that both North and South must move away from being investment-driven to being innovation-led. We need to grow our own.

Mr Gough: It is right to highlight the decline in productivity. If the performance of the economy is to change, it will have to be based on improvements in productivity. It is the key economic metric — I would usually defer to Dr Birnie on issues such as this — and has been identified by the Chancellor and by the Government in the South. Turning this decline around will require a host of factors. There is no one answer. To get capital investment right, you must identify the correct industries. It cannot be targeted at either FDI or indigenous; it must be directed at both because, as we have seen in the South, FDI can benefit growth in the indigenous sector.

There are many issues around driving up productivity, and our key message is that because the private sector in the North is so small, it lacks the critical mass to make a step change in performance. That is why we support the creation of networks, and not just with the South. With our remit, networks will be particularly important to the expansion of the resources that are available to the private sector in the North. Networks would help the private sector to grow and to make the necessary step change in economic performance.

Mr Ford: That leads to my other point. In your presentation, you said that the key points in partnerships concern softer issues rather than harder issues, such as fiscal matters, which we discussed for quite a while earlier. You referred to the areas for mutual collaborative action. A few minutes ago, you spoke about InterTradeIreland's budget. Short of recommending that your budget and staff numbers should be tripled, do you have any practical suggestions on how collaboration and networking could be developed? Is there a role for more specific encouragement for universities or the private sector? How do we handle it, or do we have to rely on you?

Mr Nellis: No. I like to believe that InterTradeIreland is at the forefront of this. Our corporate plan is in its second year and is based on all-island collaborative networks. Since then, Enterprise Ireland and Invest Northern Ireland have published major policy papers that say that the answer is networks.

We are developing our range of networks; Invest Northern Ireland is involved in the development of some of its networks; and Enterprise Ireland is developing some of its networks. We are talking to both organisations, but it would make much more sense for all those who think that networks are a good thing to work together. We must move to that point and discuss the possibilities with our colleagues.

I thank Mr McLaughlin for the compliment that InterTradeIreland has, to some extent, proved its worth. From day one, it has been involved and has put its money where its mouth is. Everything it does is based on collaboration and partnership. The steering groups for each of its programmes include representatives from bodies such as Enterprise Ireland; Invest Northern Ireland; Forfás; the Irish Business Employers' Confederation; and the CBI.

InterTradeIreland brings people in and moves them along. It is not going to change the world; it consists of 42 people who are based in Newry and does not have the wherewithal to take on all the issues. However, InterTradeIreland is happy to help and facilitate other people. That is what it does best.

Mr McLaughlin: Would InterTradeIreland welcome the other organisations taking that concept and practicing it?

Mr Nellis: The fusion technology transfer programme is very costly. Why is InterTradeIreland taking the full hit on it? The consensus is that one of the critical elements of the development of an innovation-led economy, North and South, is technology transfer. How can technology be moved from universities to businesses? There is a perfect model, which has been proven to work. However, because of its budget, InterTradeIreland has had to be very selective about the number of projects that it puts on the fusion programme. Those are the sorts of things that must be considered.

Dr Birnie: I have three questions. First, does Northern Ireland continue to have a trade deficit with the Republic? You said that Northern Ireland's exports south of the border are growing more rapidly than its imports. What is the explanation for that?

Secondly, in practice, to what extent are the authorities in Dublin committed to many of those issues? In 2003, the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Employment in the South commissioned an inquiry, and 'Ahead of the Curve: Ireland's Place in the Global Economy' was published in July 2004. That report is a business enterprise strategy for the Republic. It is over 100 pages long, and from memory, only two paragraphs deal with North/South linkages. I wondered why there was so little about that.

Mr Nellis: It deals with collaborative networks and infrastructure.

Dr Birnie: Thirdly, you list the areas for action at the end of your statement. Public procurement is not listed, but it might be important. After all, it generates billions of pounds both here and south of the border. To what extent is public procurement genuinely open to firms in either direction that bid for Government contracts?

Mr Nellis: I will take a lead on that and then let Aidan Gough come in.

These figures, which were compiled in our office, are hot off the press, and you are welcome to a copy of them. Cross-border trade in manufacturing from North to South in 2004 was €933 million; from South to North it was €1,125 million. The total was just over €2 billion. That grew a little in 2005 when it was €1,013 million North to South and €1,158 million South to North. However, the percentage change was 8.55% for North to South and 2.88% for South to North. At the moment, Northern Ireland is benefiting more from the trade relationship.

On the question of commitment, our organisation often has to walk on eggshells in many areas. When we came into this territory five or six years ago, there were many turf issues that were not political but territorial. People were asking who we were, what our job was, and similar questions. We can lobby and push and talk, but we have no sanction. You referred to Eoin O'Driscoll's report, 'Ahead of the Curve', and Aidan Gough and I were blue in the face when we were in consultation. We spent a full afternoon with Eoin O'Driscoll and his senior team. We met him several times, and we talked to the Department that was signing off the final report. Sometimes I think that the Department was not sure that there should not have been a much greater emphasis.

I do not think that that lack of co-ordination is in any way deliberate. Today I have sat through two presentations by senior business organisations in Northern Ireland. Perhaps I missed it, but there was little talk of North/South collaboration, or perhaps it is not their job to consider co-operation. It is certainly my job, and I have to examine it. Therefore, one has to remind people constantly, North and South, that there is a mutual benefit with collaboration. Sometimes the North falls down a bit, sometimes the South falls down a bit, and nobody is a paragon.

Early on, we identified the fact that public procurement was a big issue for us. There is a €13 billion spend on public procurement on this island, North/South and South/North. We have addressed that in a number of ways. We have the 'Go Tender' initiative, which brings in 14 or 15 small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs) from one jurisdiction and trains them on how to pitch into the other jurisdiction. It tells them about all the pitfalls and issues that are involved.

Procurement in the North and South operate quite differently: in the North, the central procurement directorate co-ordinates procurement, whereas in the South most utilities handle their own.

There are some tremendously successful examples. I do not want to break a confidence, but there is a company around south Derry, broadly involved in the Health Service, that had never done business in the South. Within months of learning how to tender in the South, it won a contract for nearly €1 million from the health service there — simply by opening its eyes to the opportunity.

To answer your question, Esmond, there is not as much openness and transparency from North to South as from South to North, but much of that is down to the fact that people do not even bother looking to the South.

InterTradeIreland has now moved away from granting trade and business awards. However, one of the companies that won an award was John Graham (Dromore) Ltd, a construction company that, until 10 years ago, had done little or no business in the South. Colin Graham, who is the third generation of the family, came out of university going to kill dead things. He started tramping the corridors around Dublin, and within a very short time, the company had constructed the Dunleer-Dundalk bypass and rebuilt Connolly station. The company is currently building the Department of Education headquarters in Dublin. The share of its business coming from the South grew from something like 2% to 40% within five years.

No one will hand business to companies, but if they look, it is possible to find it.

Dr Farren: My first question relates to the walking-on-eggshells image that you invoked a moment ago, Liam. Someone looking from without would say that Enterprise Ireland, the Industrial Development Agency, Invest Northern Ireland and InterTradeIreland are all similarly involved in growing business. I join Mitchel in complimenting InterTradeIreland, and I recall the early days when I enjoyed the privilege of holding a ministerial position and attended meetings at which the Fusion scheme, Acumen programme, etc, were being conceived.

In the light of your experience, is InterTradeIreland dovetailing satisfactorily with the other agencies? When it is said that InterTradeIreland must finance or provide other forms of support for any North/South business and that that is not a matter for INI or Enterprise Ireland or whatever, are you working on protocols to address satisfactorily the needs of those in business, so that if a company approaches one agency that cannot help, it will be pointed in the direction of another?

If I picked you up correctly, was there a sense of resentment that your budget was being pointed to as the source of finance when you thought that other budgets should also be contributing in particular circumstances? Looking at this strategically, how do we, as taxpayers, ensure that we get the best bang for our buck from the work of the different agencies?

It has been claimed that operating costs in the North are significantly higher in some respects. However, I get the impression that, leaving aside taxation, a number of operating costs in the South are rocketing, not least labour costs, property taxes and transport — notwithstanding the low fuel prices that Irish commuters pay.

Are you able to make sense of the different operating costs in a way that gives advantage, or would show people that there will be advantages by doing business in the North as opposed to the South, or in the South as opposed to the North?

2.45 pm

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We do not have a quorum and have to close the meeting. Perhaps Mr Nellis will reply to that in writing.

The Committee Clerk: The next meeting will be on Thursday at the same time. I have drafted a press release. It is totally non-controversial: it simply states that we took evidence from various groups.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Thank you for coming along, Mr Nellis. I apologise for the sudden end.

Adjourned at 2.46 pm.

SUBGROUP ON THE ECONOMIC CHALLENGES FACING NORTHERN IRELAND

Thursday 27 July 2006

Members in attendance for all or part of proceedings:

The Chairman, Mr Jim Wells
Mr Roy Beggs
Ms Michelle Gildernew
Dr Alasdair McDonnell
Mr Mitchel McLaughlin
Mr David McNarry
Lord Morrow
Mr Sean Neeson
Ms Margaret Ritchie
Mr David Simpson

Witnesses:

Mr David Gavaghan	} Strategic Investment Board
Mr Martin Spollen
Mr Damian McAuley	} Invest Northern Ireland
Mr Leslie Morrison

The subgroup met at 10.04 am.

(The Chairman (Mr Wells) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Ladies and gentlemen, we shall proceed. Mr Ford will not be here, but he is happy for us to proceed in his absence. Mr Neeson may attend — I am sorry; he is here already. I am so used to the Alliance Party being at the top of the table in the Committee on the Preparation for Government. We have received apologies from Dr Birnie, for whom Mr Roy Beggs is deputising. Ian Paisley Jnr and Peter Weir are not here, but Mr Simpson and Lord Morrow are very able substitutes.

Apart from Mr Ford, who will not be here, are there any other apologies? Is Dr McDonnell expected?

Ms Ritchie: He is probably looking after four babies at the moment.

Mr McLaughlin: He is a busy man.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There are no other apologies.

On a serious note, at the last meeting we recorded the sad death of Cathie White's mother. I must report that, very sadly, within a few days her father died. Cathie is going through an extremely difficult time. We suspect that because of this very sad situation Cathie may not be with us for some time. Members had already signed a condolence card for her mother. I want to tell members of the Committee that the funeral of Cathie's father is at 9.30 am on Saturday at Roselawn, in case any members are available to attend.

I wish to report one issue that arose from the Committee on the Preparation for Government. The Committee decided that the Subgroup on the Economic Challenges facing Northern Ireland would have five Chairmen, including Mr Molloy and me and will inform the Secretary of State that there will also be Chairmen from the Ulster Unionist Party, the SDLP and the Alliance Party. The Secretary of State will contact those parties shortly to seek nominations. Therefore the subgroup's meetings will have a rotating chairmanship and I will be chairing only one meeting in five. The Preparation for Government (PFG) Committee will meet more regularly and Mr Molloy and I will be spending every Monday, Wednesday and Friday chairing the extra meetings.

I hope that members have seen the draft minutes of the meeting of 25 July that were circulated in their packs. Do members wish to make additions or corrections?

Mr Simpson: Is it in order that, under item 4, "Declaration of interests", I declare business interests?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes. You raise an important point, Mr Simpson. This will be a moveable feast, as members deputise for one another on the subgroup. The nature of the subgroup means that members who have business interests should declare them. Can you inform the Committee Clerk of those interests?

Mr Simpson: Yes, of course.

The Committee Clerk: The standard practice is for a member to declare business interests at a Committee meeting.

Mr Simpson: They are general business interests; perhaps I can deal with them afterwards.

The Committee Clerk: That is fine.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do members who were not at the previous meeting have any pecuniary interests to declare?

I must remind members of the vexed issue of mobile phones, although this is a case of the cat calling the kettle black — we are all wedded to our mobile phones. However, mobile phones cause great problems for Hansard; even switching one on causes problems in the recording. I texted the hon Member for East Londonderry in Westminster the other day and he texted me back. Even in higher places, Members are wedded to their mobile phones.

We are no different. Unfortunately, I am going to have to ask members to switch off their mobile phones because we will be taking evidence. At the PFG Committee the compromise is that members can set their phones well back from the microphones so that they do not interfere with recording, but they can still receive messages. However, in this room the Hansard folk are most insistent that the phones be turned off completely.

Mr McNarry: Chairman, I would like to raise a separate issue, which I mentioned at the PFG Committee yesterday. Although I welcome the initiative that the Secretary of State has shown in setting up a group to deal with industrial rating — or, hopefully, derating — the news came as quite a surprise. It would be appropriate if the Secretary of State were to notify us of his intentions in advance; he might well be working on other schemes with other groups. In this instance, we would particularly like to hear from the industrial derating group. Yesterday the PFG Committee generally supported my view that we should know whether issues outside the scope of this subgroup were being explored. Does the subgroup support the view that we should find out from the Secretary of State if he is on any “Lone Ranger” missions with other people, perhaps telling them things that he is not divulging to us?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are members content that we write to the Secretary of State seeking advance notice of any initiative that might cut across what we are doing?

Mr McNarry: I think we should.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There was unanimity on this at the PFG Committee yesterday. Is that agreed?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Clerk will look after that.

Members have received the draft Hansard report of the hearings on 25 July. As you know, the turnaround is now 24 hours. The Clerks did not receive any amendments and corrections, so it is taken that members are content with the proceedings. The report will then be published.

Mr McNarry: I did not receive a report, and I was told to expect it today. Perhaps it is in this pack?

The Committee Clerk: The report is of the meeting on 20 July, not of the last meeting.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Did I say 25 July? I meant 20 July, sorry.

The Committee Clerk: That was handed out to Members at the last meeting.

Mr McNarry: The meeting on 20 July? I have received that.

Lord Morrow: Mr Deputy Speaker, on a similar issue, we seem to have a system in place whereby minutes, marked with members’ names, are being left in parties’ general offices for members to pick up. That is most unsatisfactory. I am not saying that it has happened here, but I hope that it does not start to happen because members are not getting minutes until 10 minutes before they arrive for the meeting.

The Committee Clerk: The subgroup is working to a very quick turnaround, and we only receive evidence papers and submissions the evening before, if at all. We are pressing witnesses to send them quicker than that, but we must appreciate the difficulties that arise when witnesses are contacted at such short notice.

It would be helpful if members could give us an e-mail address that they are certain they can access the night before the meeting, to which we can send the relevant papers. We tried to contact quite a few members last night, by e-mail and mobile phone, in an attempt to send the papers out last night. Could members ensure that they give Paul Stitt their e-mail addresses before leaving today? As soon as we get any papers we will send them out. We will also have a hard copy ready when you arrive at the meeting.

Mr McNarry: Excuse me, Chairman, I am going back to Hansard. Where is the report?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): You should have the report of 20 July; the report of 25 July is in preparation.

The Committee Clerk: I understand that the report of 25 July is virtually done. It was a four-hour session, so I appreciate that it is going to take Hansard a day or two to complete it, and we are waiting on that.

Mr McNarry: I do not want to be hard on anybody, but I am not really satisfied with Hansard’s performance on these matters. It is impossible.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): To be fair to Hansard, you must realise that it is covering the meetings of the PFG Committee as well.

Mr McNarry: Hansard is here to serve this Assembly. If the Assembly were in operation, it would not tolerate such a delay.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I should advise you that the Hansard staff has been run down substantially during the three years that we have not had devolution, so it is not in a position to give a full-time service.

MLAs do not answer their phones 24 hours a day, and various attempts were made to ring members on their mobiles last night, and to e-mail papers to their home email addresses. Margaret was the only member on 24-hour duty.

Ms Ritchie: It is very sad.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We need to have a means of contacting members by mobile telephone or of e-mailing documents to you at home so that you can access them that night. The timetable for this subgroup is so tight that we must give you material at short notice. That is the nature of the beast. My mobile is on 24 hours a day.

Mr McNarry: I understand that, Chairman, but that is a separate issue. I got a telephone call at 7.00 pm or 6.50 pm, which was good, for at least someone was working. However, I am talking about Hansard.

Lord Morrow: Even if you are not, David.
[Laughter.]

Mr McNarry: I could not really watch the football.

The Committee Clerk: Hansard would appreciate it if the subgroup were to lend weight to calls for additional resources for it. Many Hansard staff were redeployed and those who remain are working flat out. We are pressing them, but we appreciate their difficulties. However, Mr McNarry made a useful point.

Mr McNarry: The PFG Committee decided yesterday to have three more meetings that Hansard will record in addition to this. That makes four separate meetings each week to keep up the pace. Minutes are minutes and that is that.

10.15 am

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Burrowes would appreciate additional staff, but he could not have predicted this workload — there will be meetings every day from now on. The PFG Committee meets on Monday, Wednesday and Friday; the economic challenges subgroup meets on Tuesday and Thursday. That has cranked up the work required of Hansard, and I am sure that the Committee Clerk would be happy to write to the Clerk of the Northern Ireland Assembly to ask whether he can deploy more staff to Hansard. Parliamentary reporting is specialist work; you cannot simply drag people off the streets to do it.

Mr McNarry: I understand that. It is because it is specialist that it is so important. I have said all that I need to say.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I welcome Dr McDonnell.

Members will receive the Hansard report of 25 July shortly.

As to matters arising, the subgroup wrote to the Economic Development Forum, asking it to give evidence. Initially the forum indicated that, since it had multiple membership, many of those groups would be giving evidence in their own right, so it wished not to give evidence. We have written to the forum again to prevail upon it, and I understand from the Committee Clerk that we may receive a favourable response this time.

The Committee Clerk: I spoke to officials yesterday and was informed that the Economic Development Forum will now be more inclined to give evidence. However, it is a disparate group and does not necessarily speak with one voice.

The issue is timing. We have filled up all the slots between now and 10 August. An evidence session with the forum would be on the agenda, but the PFG Committee has agreed that the subgroup can make an interim report and, subject to approval from the PFG Committee, could work beyond 18 August. Since the Minister is not available until September anyway, we could, if we agree to work beyond 18 August and produce an interim report, invite the Economic Development Forum and the Minister in early September.

I have drafted a letter for consideration; it is in the members' pack at tab 2. We do not have a slot for the forum, unless the subgroup want to meet on another day. The forum would have to pull together different chairpersons. We are seeing them as individuals anyway; but if the subgroup is of a mind to see the forum, I am sure that it will agree. However, it would be late August at the earliest. As the Minister is also the Chairperson of the forum, it might be sensible to invite her, both as Minister of the three Departments to which you want to speak and as Chairperson of the Economic Development Forum.

Mr McNarry: I would like clarification. Meeting number five is with the Department of Education followed by the Department for Employment and Learning. Will a Minister be attending?

The Committee Clerk: The Minister is Maria Eagle MP. She is on leave until September, so she will not be available at that stage, but she will be available and willing to attend when she returns from leave.

Mr McNarry: She is on leave.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes, for all of August.

Mr McNarry: This is a direct rule Minister.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): All MPs are on leave until the end of August.

Mr McNarry: Brilliant. But we are not on leave.

Ms Gildernew: Not all MPs are on leave.

Dr McDonnell: There is a message there.

Mr McNarry: We are not on leave. We have been charged by the Secretary of State to get this work done, and we want to hear from one of his direct rule Ministers. Does that mean that she is relieved of duty office? Who is the duty Minister?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There will, of course, be a duty Minister throughout that time, but Ms Eagle will be on holiday. She will not be here. She is not available. You will soon realise that only MLAs work in August.

Mr McNarry: Well perhaps the world should know that.

Dr McDonnell: It could be worse, Mr Chairman. Margaret Beckett is monitoring the war in the Middle East from a caravan.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): And John Prescott is in charge of the country. [Laughter.]

Dr McDonnell: Margaret Beckett was interviewed last night in a caravan somewhere in the south of France.

Mr McNarry: It seems too convenient that this is the excuse.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We do not have the power to summon her. If she is not available there is nothing we can do.

Mr McNarry: Where does that leave us? We have a duty to report back to the PFG Committee. The Secretary of State has set a date for the submission of a report, but it will be incomplete because we have been unable to have a Minister here. At the first meeting, it was everybody's view that we would leave the Ministers to the end so that we could hear all the evidence. Ian Paisley Jnr made the point that we could then put to the Ministers what we had gleaned from witnesses, ask the Minister what he or she made of it, and see whether there were any new ideas that we could put to the Minister.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The permanent secretary, who is the spokesman for the Department, will be available. The Department will therefore be present in strength, as it were, in the hearings.

Mr Beggs: Has it been confirmed that it would be the permanent secretary at least who would give initial evidence from the Department, and not a deputy? The permanent secretaries are also on leave.

The Committee Clerk: The letters of invitation for each Department are going to the permanent secretaries. Generally they would send whoever is best placed to answer the subgroup's questions. If the subgroup would like the permanent secretaries specifically to attend, we can make that point.

Lord Morrow: We should include this letter along with the one that we are sending to the Secretary of State. We have been told that the Secretary of State has a service in place for the subgroup while his Ministers are on holiday. Has he made arrangements for deputies? Perhaps he himself would condescend to appear?

Mr Neeson: He is down in Sligo.

Lord Morrow: Well, he can fly back up on his chartered plane.

Mr Neeson: He is rallying somewhere.

Mr McLaughlin: There is a constant dissatisfaction in dealing with direct rule Ministers anyway, because they tend to fly in for limited times, and depend heavily on briefings. If we pressed the point, we might well get a duty Minister, which would not improve the quality of evidence that we would have to consider. We should record our dissatisfaction with the amount of support given at ministerial level to the work of the subgroup. However, we should proceed nevertheless and ensure that we get the best possible advice from the senior civil service.

Ms Ritchie: The Secretary of State charged us with a programme of work over the "summer holiday" period. Like Mr McNarry, I fail to understand how the Secretary of State expects us to work and take evidence on economic challenges if his Ministers cannot be made available.

He has created obstacles, yet he has levelled that accusation at our door. Members must record their dissatisfaction with the process, particularly when we have a deadline of 18 August, and the Minister will not be available until after that date. That is unsatisfactory, and a permanent secretary or someone deputising for a permanent secretary is insufficient, because they simply implement the policy decisions of Government.

Mr McNarry: Cathie White reported to the subgroup that she had diligently made preparations for meetings in advance of our first meeting, and that was useful. She produced a work programme, in which dates were given for the Ministers to attend. Do I assume, therefore, that she had already contacted the Ministers' office and they were available on that date? If so, perhaps we could reconsider that date if it is the only opportunity for a Minister to attend.

Members revised that date, because Ian Paisley Jnr suggested that the subgroup should meet the Minister after we had heard all the evidence from witnesses. It seems as though there is some type of engineering going on, and a Minister will only be available when the subgroup is not meeting.

Ms Gildernew: I do not have the original work programme at hand, but my understanding is that the dates given were for this week, which suggests that the Ministers may have been available this week. However, they may have made plans to go on holiday, and that is why they were only available for Tuesday's meeting. The subgroup had decided that we would wait until the end of all the evidence sessions before meeting the Ministers.

Mr McNarry: Michelle may be right, but it is unfortunate that it was not understood that the Minister was only available this week.

The Committee Clerk: That is my understanding, following conversations with officials in the past couple of days.

Mr Simpson: Is it a case of requesting that a duty Minister attend the meetings to cover for other Ministers? If the duty Minister needs to bring officials from the relevant Departments, that is fine. Surely a duty Minister would cover this meeting if they were covering other duties.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It could be a Minister for security or education who may not know anything about the subject and who may simply say that they will refer it to the relevant Minister or Department.

Mr Simpson: The same will probably apply to the permanent secretary.

Dr McDonnell: We should get on with the business and ask for the Minister to attend as soon as she returns, even if that entails delaying the report by a few days.

Mr Simpson: Does the member wish to delay the report until after 24 August?

Dr McDonnell: If necessary.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do members agree that we write to the Secretary of State indicating our displeasure with the way in which we are being treated in this respect?

Mr Beggs: Members cannot express their displeasure, as they changed the date that had been agreed, and Ministers will have agreed a schedule to take time off. We ought to request an alternative date as soon as they return.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are members happy with that?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Members have received a revised work programme of suggestions for witnesses. The letters for the evidence session on 7 August are ready for signature, and, yesterday, I signed letters to those witnesses whom we previously agreed. Does anyone have any comments?

10.30 am

Dr McDonnell: Who will be attending on 8 August?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We keep updating the work plan.

The Committee Clerk: Sir George Quigley will represent the Industrial Task Force.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I signed a letter to him yesterday.

The Committee Clerk: We got the Chairman to sign the letters for next week to get that secured. The following week's schedule has been secured, but we wanted to give members some flexibility in case it needed to be changed. The list is on the updated work plan. The letters are ready for the Chairman's signature at the end of the meeting. If members are content, we will carry on with that.

We also have letters ready for the Chairman's signature for those who will provide oral evidence, and they will also be sent out today. We will proceed with the programme and the witness sessions if members are content.

We could not involve everyone because there are not enough slots. At the last meeting we agreed on 15 or 16 oral evidence sessions. To get more in we have had four on one or two occasions, and we may restrict that to 45 minutes if members are content — otherwise we would be sitting for hours.

If the subgroup works beyond 18 August it would be able to invite the Minister, the forum and perhaps some additional witnesses.

Mr McLaughlin: Could we adjourn the Tuesday meeting to the Thursday meeting so that we could go straight into the evidence sessions on Thursday? We spend half an hour or three quarters of an hour reviewing the minutes. We could have one set of minutes for that week and simply adjourn the earlier meeting, and that would give us extra time.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do members have a view on that?

Dr McDonnell: I agree with Mitchel McLaughlin. We should concentrate as much as possible on obtaining evidence.

The Committee Clerk: Mr Chairman, the subgroup will still have to go through the minutes of proceedings, but it depends on how quickly that can be done. It could be done in five minutes or it could take half an hour. If it is done in five minutes, the subgroup could go straight into the evidence session. There will be one or two items of business arising from the previous meeting that will have to be dealt with.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is everyone happy?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I take it that we are happy with the programme that has been laid out. We have a good mixture of private and public sector witnesses, and after hearing their evidence we should have a fair idea of the challenges that we face.

We will now move to the evidence session. There will be an opportunity at the end of the meeting to bring together any issues that arise. I must leave the meeting at 1.00 pm. I see that Mr Molloy is not in his usual position, so you will have no Chairman after 1.00 pm. However, I hope that we can get through the two sessions before then.

Lord Morrow: Is that a threat or a promise?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is probably a promise, but I have a delayed tribunal that I cannot get out of.

Dr McDonnell: If we cannot get the business done by 1.00 pm, we should not be here. Through no fault of my own I have missed a couple of meetings, but Chairman, how do I manage to restrain the Lord Morrow? He has lost the run of himself since he was ennobled.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): He is controlled.

Dr McDonnell: It would be useful to have even a brief session on the new technology, as it has a cutting edge for the economy and may be a specific niche or sector. That is a suggestion, not a demand. An opportunity may arise or a slot may be cancelled.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Dr McDonnell raised this at the PFG Committee, and I remember promising him that if I were in the Chair I would allow the matter to be raised. Have we any slots, or is there any way that we can fit that in?

The Committee Clerk: That depends on how long you want to meet for. If the subgroup wants to have longer meetings or to meet for an additional day, Committee staff can fit in anyone. Agreeing to meet beyond 18 August would give you many more opportunities.

Dr McDonnell: It may be useful for people such as Hugh Cormican, Bro McFerran and Brian Keating to give us a short briefing, for half an hour or so, on new technology because that is where the future of our economy lies. I have no difficulty with a good deal of what we are due to hear, but much of it is from a managerial, theoretical or philosophical perspective. I want to hear from someone who has been part of the economic revolution in the last 10 years. I leave that as a suggestion, not a demand.

Ms Gildernew: I am disappointed. I had not realised that the Northern Ireland Council for Voluntary Action (NICVA) had slipped off the work programme. It was on the first and a number of subsequent work programmes, but I wonder why I do not see it now.

The Committee Clerk: It is simply a matter of there being insufficient slots for the amount of witnesses. We have held off writing letters to the witnesses required for the last week so that things can be changed around. I want to leave the subgroup with that flexibility.

Ms Gildernew: Given the work that NICVA does, the extent to which our economy greatly affects the voluntary and community sectors and the amount of employment within those sectors across the North, it is important that NICVA be retained to give evidence to this Committee.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It seems clear that as the evidence proceeds, we may have to create one additional session to bring in one or two more bodies. Is it worth setting aside one day for Alasdair's high-tech representatives, NICVA and anyone else whom we feel is appropriate?

Mr Beggs: We must prioritise whom we bring in under this heading. The enterprise agencies are not represented here. Will someone explain how NICVA is a priority?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): You are talking about the social economy, and NICVA represents thousands of employees.

Mr Beggs: Many different organisations represent thousands of employees. We have to prioritise.

Mr Simpson: We must draw a line somewhere.

The Committee Clerk: There are two options. At the moment most slots are scheduled to last for one hour. By reducing those to 45 minutes, you could hear from four witnesses at every session and certainly fit in a witness from a high-tech company and from NICVA into the meetings that are currently scheduled. Alternatively, you could schedule another meeting or meet for longer. That is entirely your choice.

Lord Morrow: That would not solve the problem, because once you open the door to bring in NICVA, about 25 others must be brought in.

The Committee Clerk: In addition, substitute subgroup members have legitimate reasons for inviting different people, and that presents a difficulty. The subgroup must hear from all witnesses by 18 August. That is why we went ahead and selected some witnesses from your original agreed bunch. However, there is still flexibility and we will certainly accommodate any further witnesses, but that must be decided now.

Ms Gildernew: I reiterate that I strongly desire that the social economy be represented. It is hugely important, given its past and present work. If we are talking about numbers of employees, it employs more people than Wrightbus Ltd, for example. It was agreed that Wrightbus Ltd should appear on the work programme as a representative of entrepreneurship. However, surely NICVA is equally, if not more, relevant to the work of this Committee than one particular company.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I will take that as a formal proposal from Ms Gildernew. Do you second that, Mr Beggs?

Mr Beggs: No, I am simply saying that Enterprise Northern Ireland, which represents all the enterprise agencies and is responsible for delivering support to the social economy, is a more appropriate witness for this Committee. That is my counter-proposal.

Dr McDonnell: Can we allow 45 minutes for each of them and try to work cohesively as best we can? I am happy to meet for an extra hour at some stage to accommodate additional witnesses, because we have different priorities and preferences. I take the point about opening the door, but all these people are players, and we must at least let them through the door and give them an opportunity.

Lord Morrow: The most important words that Alasdair used were “all players”. Are we talking about all the players or just some of them?

Mr McNarry: Perhaps the Ulster Unionists who are here are at fault — Roy and I did not discuss this, but we should have. The subgroup is going back on decisions that it has already made. We agreed that there had to be a cut-off point. We also said that witnesses could make written submissions. I do not know whether we have requested those submissions yet, but that provision was included to cater for the general “all”.

If the consensus — or the majority vote, as it would be — is that we had to invite those groups, I am content.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is worth pointing out that NICVA were on the original list —

Mr McNarry: I have no dispute with that.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is why it has been raised. I take Mr Beggs’s point, but the local agencies were not on the original list for consideration. However, I can see why you would want to have them there.

Mr Neeson: This is not the Assembly Enterprise, Trade and Investment (ETI) Committee. If that Committee were in operation, all players would be taken on board. We must be realistic and recognise our remit and timescale.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I propose that we invite NICVA for a session. This subgroup operates by majority vote, not by consensus. I suggest that we have a wash-up day to bring in those groups that others feel should be here. What is the view on inviting NICVA?

Four members are in favour of inviting NICVA, and two are against. The vote is per party, so that is two parties to one, with the Alliance Party abstaining.

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will invite NICVA.

Ms Ritchie: I am happy to second Mr Beggs’s proposal. Last week when I suggested that we bring some groups to evidence sessions, I was promptly chided for recommending those extra witnesses in light of the time-limited agenda and the need to prioritise work. If I had realised that there would be a change in direction, I would have made the same point as Mr Beggs about the enterprise agencies. I suggest that either we be strict with ourselves, or we examine closely our terms of reference.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The proposal is to invite local enterprise agencies to give evidence.

Three parties are in favour; none are against.

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will invite them and schedule their sessions into the programme.

We have kept our witnesses from the Strategic Investment Board (SIB) waiting. As we gather up our papers, I remind members to ask questions rather than make statements. Although some of what has already appeared will look wonderful in the local press, we are here to elicit information, not to state party policies. I will be quite strict, and you will not get away with saying: “Is it not the case that —?” and then making a statement.

Mr Gavaghan — I have not come across that name before — and Mr Spollen, thank you for coming to represent SIB. We appreciate your attending at short notice and supplying material in advance.

10.45 am

Gentlemen, you are very welcome. The Clerk has indicated that we would like you to make some opening comments, and then the members will ask questions. We have an hour, so feel free.

Mr David Gavaghan (Strategic Investment Board): Thank you very much for giving us the opportunity to make a brief presentation and take questions.

I propose to run briefly through our presentation. We recognise that from the subgroup’s perspective there are three areas of focus. The Strategic Investment Board’s focus, as you are aware, is on infrastructure investment, so our presentation is specifically on that. I do not apologise for that, because that is what I am employed to do, but it is worth emphasising that that is why our presentation is as it is.

In the overall context, the first question that we all pose about infrastructure in Northern Ireland is this: is it fit for the twenty-first century? To some extent the word “fit” can be taken to mean fit for purpose. I see it slightly differently: if, like me, you struggle to keep fit, often the achievement is in getting fit; keeping fit is another matter. We have a huge challenge with this economy in the twenty-first century. Recently, I have been reading ‘The World is Flat’, and that has reminded me of the extent and significance of the challenges across the globe in the context of Northern Ireland.

As you know, our company was established just over three years ago to help address the infrastructure deficit that exists here. We have three specific remits. The first is to draw together a 10-year investment strategy, which was announced by the Secretary of State last December. We drew that together as a first, and we will give evidence during the course of the morning of some of the work that we want to do in the future. There is one point that I would like to emphasise: it is not the SIB’s investment strategy; it is the Minister’s investment strategy, and it is ministerial direction that has determined that strategy.

Our second area of activity is the delivery of projects and programmes of investment, and, if you like, that is the lifeblood of the business activity of our company. I will give you an insight into some of the work that we have undertaken in the past three years in that area.

The third area is reform, which at the moment is very prevalent in the context of Northern Ireland, and some examples of reform projects include e-HR, Workplace 2010, the corporatisation of the Water Service, as well as simple things like standardising contracts and improving professionalism across the Northern Ireland Civil Service as regards delivery capability.

As you all know the investment strategy gives a 10-year view, but what is quite wonderful in the strategy is the extent to which a new step change was visible within the public sector and, more importantly, outside it. The scale of ambition of the 10-year strategy, which has the potential to invest some £16 billion in Northern Ireland's infrastructure, was a step change for us all. One of the things that is worth emphasising is that in the past year, the first year of the investment strategy, more than £1 billion was invested in Northern Ireland's infrastructure. So it is happening right here and now.

The graph in the slide entitled 'Key Investment Programmes', shows the confirmed figures in deep purple and the indicative figures in lighter purple. The key point in showing you this graph is to highlight that the focus of the investment programme is on education, health, transport and the environment. Those are ministerial decisions, and there is a real recognition that those are the same priorities that the devolved Government had set prior to direct-rule Ministers taking over.

The direction of the infrastructure and investment programme remains broadly the same.

The next slide is crucial because it shows the role that infrastructure plays in the sustainable competitiveness of the economy. Physical infrastructure is only part of the equation in the creation of a sustainable economy. Some European countries have the best infrastructures in the world, but the use of those infrastructures is absolutely critical in defining outcomes.

The key issue is the way in which all those elements in the pyramid are synchronised as effectively as possible, the intention being that sustainable enterprise will be the apex, which in Northern Ireland means business and social enterprise.

We are undertaking some work to try to couch the second investment strategy in a slightly more thorough context than the first. We are addressing the infrastructure investment in five investment pillars built around networks such as roads, IT, broadband etc. The skills pillar includes primary, secondary and tertiary education, the social pillar includes health and housing, the environment pillar includes water-related issues and waste and the industry pillar concerns the impact that the Government can make in supporting industry and wealth creation. Members may wish to discuss industry issues after our presentation.

Three priorities are identified on the slide to the left of the investment pillars. Those cross-cutting themes focus on the three key priorities: economic growth and competitiveness; society based on partnership, inclusion, equality, regional balance and mutual respect; and high-quality environment and sustainable development. That framework has a significant cogency in the context of the pyramid to which I have referred. This is only a framework within which Ministers will determine future outcomes for Northern Ireland.

The pie chart shows the current investment strategy for Northern Ireland (ISNI), which was launched in December 2005. It is interesting to see how the networks and the skills are —

The Chairman (Mr Wells): May I just interrupt. I am reminded of a snooker game being broadcast in black and white, and the commentator saying that the pink ball is behind the green ball. Your colour presentation is difficult to follow on our black-and-white copies. The staff are printing bigger colour versions that will be much clearer. When you refer to the pink and the green, we do not actually know what you are talking about.

Mr Gavaghan: My apologies.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The staff will distribute the colour copies as you are speaking.

Mr Gavaghan: Investment in networks represents 18% of total investment under the current ISNI. The current ISNI spend on skills is £3.97 billion. In enterprise terms, network and skills are a key constituency representing 44% of the total current investment programme. We might discuss this issue in more detail when we have the colour versions.

The ninth slide shows a table that details the projects with which we have been directly involved. These projects are now financially closed, and the Invest Northern Ireland headquarters and Lisburn City Library are operational. They represent about £350 million of capital investment.

I will talk about some projects in a little more detail. The importance of the roads package 1 cannot be emphasised enough. We have all had the experience of driving into and out of Belfast.

It is worth noting that that was the first publicly funded bond-financing of an infrastructure project in Northern Ireland. Before my arrival at the SIB, I was involved in the bond-financing of the Moyle interconnector, but that was a private bond-financing for a private purpose, although it later went mutual. Therefore that was the first time that the Northern Ireland public utility sector accessed the capital markets in London. It was also the first time that the European Investment Bank had been involved. That is notable in the context of Northern Ireland embracing the European Union and the European Investment Bank seeing Northern Ireland as a really interesting place to invest in infrastructure, with an important focus on the Trans-European Network structures and systems.

The third point, which is fundamental, is the importance of involving local contractors. In the case of roads package 1, two local contractors took an equity stake in the special-purpose company. One of the great successes of that project was the involvement of local contractors in the equity, as well as in the work on the site, together with a world-class contractor with a presence across the globe.

The final point is critical: the pricing was as fine as anything in the capital markets, meaning that Northern Ireland is in a competitive place in the global procurement of infrastructure investment. There is no premium attached to doing business in Northern Ireland.

The second project was Project Alpha, the clean water project, and it was closed in May. For the Water Service and the Roads Service, the scale of some of the business activity that is now taking place — as Malcolm McKibbin said recently about the launch of roads package 2 — could only have been dreamt of in the past. The significant aspect of that project was the scale of the savings that were achieved, against what had previously been estimated: some 25% and some £50 million of capital savings.

Electronic human resource (e-HR) obviously has a high profile, but we believe that that project offers Northern Ireland a significant step forward in creating a more joined-up public sector. People across the rest of the UK are looking at that project very closely.

We believe that we have made significant further progress on a broad front. We have had a very active engagement with the supplier market, both here and overseas. They now take the opportunities in Northern Ireland extremely seriously. Recently, one contractor told us that it saw Northern Ireland as a critical element in the focus of its resources in a UK context.

As for some of our other activities, we held a very successful infrastructure investment conference in Dundalk, with over 300 people in attendance. That was the first time that the National Development Finance Agency (NDFA) in the South worked together with us to face the outward market. That was a very successful event, and a reception that attracted over 100 key players was held here at Parliament Buildings with the Lord Mayor. That was a good event.

We also held a very good event in Derry last year, which we are repeating this autumn. The scale of the work that we are doing to present Northern Ireland both domestically and internationally is bearing dividends.

We are a relatively small organisation. Although our staff have grown from 17 people to 27 in the last year and a half, one of the key issues for us was increasing the local representation of the senior advisers. In our last recruitment exercise, five locally based senior people joined the SIB. That is very important.

Moving on to what we are doing right now, we are working hard to shape the second ISNI, to which I will return. The invitation to negotiate has been returned by the bidders for the Belfast schools' project. Last month, there was the announcement of 48 new schools across the Province. Roads package 2 will be at the stage of best and final offer in the autumn.

Project Omega is well on schedule for financial close in January 2007, if not before. For Workplace 2010, the invitation to negotiate was issued last month with four very good consortia working alongside local contractors. We also have the launch of the acute hospital programme, with potentially projects totalling £1 billion going to the market in the next year, with the 'Official Journal of the European Union' (OJEU) launch of the Enniskillen hospital project earlier this month.

We are actively involved in the Titanic signature project, and, the week before last, I went to look at a project in Orlando. We are obviously actively involved in the 'Maze/Long Kesh Masterplan and Implementation Strategy'.

11.00 am

The key reason for sharing the Investment Strategy for Northern Ireland 2 (ISNI 2) development time line with the subgroup is its relevance to today's discussion and the engagement of a future devolved Government. The middle box at the bottom of slide 13 refers to the review of revenue impact on capital schemes. That is underway but will involve a huge amount of work.

Members will obviously be aware of the work on the comprehensive spending review, with the intention that Priorities and Budget will be launched in late 2007. We hope to have a draft of ISNI 2 ready by the middle of next year, and that is important in the context of today's discussions.

We thought that members would like us to discuss where PPPs work and do not work. There is a prevalent view that PPPs may not work, but I will highlight where they do. It is a matter of record from the National Audit Office (NAO) that PPPs achieve a better track record in delivery on time and budget for large infrastructure projects. Fundamentally, PPPs allow teachers to teach, by which I mean that teachers do not have focus on failing infrastructure. The risk is transferred, so teachers can focus on teaching. That principle obviously applies in other areas of infrastructure investment.

The fundamental premise behind PPPs, although it does not sometimes happen as well as we would all like, is that there is a much more rigorous approach in respect of project appraisal and consideration of user needs. PPPs allow a real focus on whole-life costs, which allows for the protection of infrastructure that was not hitherto possible, as budgets would be slashed. For instance, the Roads Service is very frustrated that the roads budget is often cut, when it should be protected for long-term, value-for-money propositions.

PPPs also provide a focus on proper apportionment of risk between parties. They provide for poor performance to be penalised and give more transparency to the process, which sometimes needs to be considered. I say that in the context of the Scottish Parliament building, which, as you know, started as a £40 million project and ended as a £400 million project. Those areas of transparency are critical for public procurement.

In our experience, PPPs do not work for small projects. The current guidance is that PPPs or PFIs should not be considered for projects of less than £20 million. PPPs do not work where users do not understand their needs or where a client is not on top as regards the expertise involved in delivering the project.

It was announced last month that development work for 48 schools would be completed under the conventional funding route. That clearly shows that some projects, through the nature of the engagement, are inherently better suited to conventional funding as better value-for-money propositions. SIB was integrally involved in the assessment of those schools and the subsequent decision to choose conventional funding.

PPPs do not work where there is poor risk transfer. A good example of that is refurbishment, which is generally not a good transfer of risk from the public sector to the private sector, because of the premium that the private sector will charge.

I wanted to share the 5C framework on sustainability, depicted on slide 15, with the subgroup. I am attracted to the framework because it provides a holistic approach to considering infrastructure investment in the context of environmental and sustainability issues. The source is Forum for the Future. Jonathon Porritt, founder and director of that organisation, and a leading proponent of sustainability, included the framework in a recent book. For me, it is an extremely powerful diagram showing the agenda on infrastructure investment.

Among the challenges ahead for SIB are capacity and capability to deliver the massive infrastructure investment programme over the next 10 years, in relation to both public-sector capability and capacity — which is obviously our primary focus — and private-sector capability. As members will know, we published a report in February that examined private-sector capacity and capability.

It is vital that there is a real sense of confidence-building and that our successes are banked. Regional disparities and social cohesion remain significant issues and challenges for Northern Ireland. I am absolutely convinced that a new model for urban regeneration is needed in Northern Ireland.

I have left my most significant point to the end: what will the population of this island be by 2050? The Irish Academy of Engineering report, 'A Vision of Transport in Ireland in 2050', estimated that the population of the island of Ireland would be somewhere in the region of eight million people by then. That is a fundamental issue for infrastructure investment.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Thank you, Mr Gavaghan. Your last comments are particularly relevant to the work of the subgroup. We have been given an overview of the work being done by SIB. I remind members of the three main aspects of the subgroup's terms of reference, which are to consider possible impediments to development; incentives to promote foreign and direct investment; and the peace dividend. Therefore, I hope that members will frame their questions to SIB in such a way as to tease out the necessary information to answer those questions.

So far, Mr McNarry and Ms Ritchie have stated that they wish to ask questions. If time allows, Mr Neeson and Mr McLaughlin will ask questions also.

Mr McNarry: Given that we are working from black and white copies of the SIB presentation, I am sure that David and Martin will give members black and white answers.

Do you envisage that SIB will continue under a devolved Government?

Mr Gavaghan: Yes.

Mr McNarry: What makes you say that?

Mr Gavaghan: The inspiration for and purpose behind SIB came from a devolved Government.

Mr McNarry: Page 2 of your presentation refers to schools. I am particularly mindful that it was announced this week that the Department of Education failed to spend £69 million of its allocated budget. To what type of investment does your presentation refer? Is that money separate to the Department's budget?

Mr Gavaghan: No.

Mr McNarry: Therefore, the money listed in your presentation is the same amount as would be claimed by the Department.

Mr Gavaghan: Correct.

Mr McNarry: I concur with your later remarks about helping teachers to teach. How do you feel about the fact that £69 million was not spent and the criticism that schools that require high maintenance have not received it?

Mr Gavaghan: I do not have the details to hand.

Mr McNarry: You made a pitch, which I agree with, saying that the decks should be cleared for teachers to teach. The education boards have responded to the news that £69 million are still sitting there and have not been used. The money could have been used, in a sense, to help teachers to teach by improving the infrastructure of schools. What is SIB's view on that? What would you tell the Minister or the Secretary of State?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is important to realise that SIB is an implementation body — it does not formulate policy. Departmental officials could answer questions on policy issues, but it is unfair to ask Mr Gavaghan to comment on a Government issue. I am entirely in the hands of the subgroup, but I suspect that Mr Gavaghan is constrained by the fact that this is a Government issue.

Mr Gavaghan: Yes.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I do not think that Mr Gavaghan is being unhelpful, but members must understand the constraints that SIB is under when giving evidence. When officials from the Department of Finance and Personnel or the Department for Employment and Learning — or whichever is the relevant Department — come before the subgroup, they will be able to answer that question.

Mr McNarry: Chairman, as we have discussed in the PFG Committee, I am sure that you are stretching your remit. I acknowledge your point, but you must allow members to ask questions relevant to the final outcome of the subgroup's work, which is to produce a report based on the information that it has gathered.

I pursued that topic because page 4 of the presentation states that 48 new schools were launched last month. Mr Gavaghan said that SIB had influence with the Minister on that development. What was SIB's involvement in the launch of the 48 new schools?

Mr Gavaghan: SIB worked with the Department on the appraisal of the 48 schools. I would probably change the emphasis — I hope that I did not say that SIB had major influence. We helped the Department to appraise the best route to sourcing and building those schools, working with Partnerships UK, which is at the forefront of building schools for the future in GB, particularly England. We worked with the Department on an appraisal; that was our role.

Mr McNarry: You have a role with the Department?

Mr Gavaghan: Yes.

Mr McNarry: Finally, Chairman, this is mostly just knowledge that I seek. Who decides the supported projects that are listed on page 3 of your submission?

Mr Gavaghan: We would speak to our Minister, and the Department would speak to its Minister, and the process would be that the two Ministers would agree that we should support those projects.

Mr McNarry: Where is the embryo born? The alpha drinking water project had a value of £111 million.

Mr Gavaghan: When SIB was originally set up, a number of projects had been identified. We have taken on those projects and moved them forward, and we have added more projects.

Mr McNarry: Is there also a think-tank type of role involved?

Mr Gavaghan: No. When SIB was created, we were handed a series of projects with a capital value of £1.2 billion, if memory serves. Alpha and omega were two of those projects, as was roads package 1. Obviously, more projects have been added since then.

Mr McNarry: Finally, can I take it that the money that is detailed in your submission for projects closed and ongoing is not additional money?

Mr Gavaghan: Those projects all come through the departmental budgets. You are correct; it is not additional money.

Mr McNarry: So what do you bring to it?

Mr Gavaghan: Our skill is to accelerate and review the delivery of projects. For instance, from the time that project alpha was originally estimated to when it was completed, we have been able, working with the Water Service and DRD, to bring it in below the original costs, making a significant saving. Through engagement with the international marketplace, there were six bids. We selected a shortlist of five. Through that competitive process, we were able to refine better terms, working alongside the Water Service and DRD. That is what we bring.

Mr McNarry: So, you say —

The Chairman (Mr Wells): This has to be your last question. You have had six.

Mr McNarry: Thank you, Chairman.

You say that SIB is expanding. What is the cost of your operation?

Mr Gavaghan: Our operational cost is £4 million per annum.

Mr McNarry: What will it be when you have expanded?

Mr Gavaghan: We have expanded. That is it.

Ms Ritchie: I have three questions on the implementation process. There were suggestions the other day about the selection of contractors by SIB for procurement purposes, so I would like to ask about that. What action does SIB take to support small- and medium-sized businesses in Northern Ireland for procurement purposes? I am talking about Northern Ireland businesses, and then those on an all-island basis.

Secondly, you said that urban regeneration was one of the challenges facing our economy, and you suggested that a new model was required. What discussion has the appropriate Department had with you, as an implementation body, about the best model of urban regeneration and its contribution to the economy?

Thirdly, with regard to all-island prospects, what further work and planning have been done between you and the Departments responsible for infrastructure — the Department for Regional Development in the North, the National Roads Authority in the South, and the National Finance Agency — to make the Belfast to Dublin road a motorway and not a dual carriageway and to ensure that other areas have strategic routes into such a motorway to increase and develop their economies?

I did not sail too close to the wind.

11.15 am

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It will look well in next week's diary.

Mr McNarry: You Down people stick together.

Mr Gavaghan: We work closely with the Central Procurement Directorate on small- and medium-sized businesses; we have engaged actively with the Central Procurement Directorate and the Construction Employers Federation; and we have engaged with the small- and medium-sized business sector.

The NIO report on the pathfinder projects on education identified the scale of the investment programme necessary in education in Northern Ireland. Of course we are subject to European Union rules, but we could adopt a slower, progressive, incremental approach; or a more significant approach that, SIB believes, would result in better value for money and which would engage larger contractors.

The industry could introduce efficiencies into the supply chain, and that would help all players to move forward. For instance, we have worked with the Housing Executive on social housing and have found that procurement in supply chains can be improved by working through housing associations. That is being done in all industries to create competitiveness.

The other issue, which has been a challenge across the UK and which must be recognised, is that big projects, such as the hospital in Enniskillen, need a significant balance sheet to absorb the risk. Several contractors have taken risks that they could not absorb and have either had to contract severely or have disappeared. There are many challenges, and if there is a feeling among small- and medium-sized businesses that they are not getting a fair share, I am happy to engage in another dialogue with the Central Procurement Directorate and the Construction Employers Federation. However, there are some tensions there, Margaret, that are part of the programme that we face.

We work alongside our sponsoring Department on several urban regeneration projects, including the Maze/ Long Kesh site, and we assist Ilex in Derry/ Londonderry. More significantly, we know that in Omagh both the Lisanelly and Zanussi sites will be vacated next year, as will sites in Enniskillen and in several other significant locations across the Province.

My feeling is that we have not developed a new thought process. In recent years, the English Partnerships model has been used successfully in England. It had a long germination period and has moved into many different guises, but it arose from the closures in the coal industry.

SIB is developing an initial paper to examine the various models. It will talk to its sponsor Department and to the Department for Social Development, the Department for Regional Development and a number of other people to ask the Ministers what they would like to do now. In the context of urban regeneration, a report was undertaken recently to examine the role of English cities, and we should consider commissioning a similar report on this island. The urbanisation of cities across the British Isles and the world is a key issue that has a major impact on urban regeneration.

To answer the final question, the Roads Service has regular dialogue with the National Roads Authority, and SIB is liaising with the National Development Finance Agency to explore some of the options. I know that the Roads Service will review the key strategic routes and other work soon. As regards whether the north of the border section of the Belfast to Dublin road should be upgraded to motorway status, it is my understanding that the Minister has determined that it will be a very high-quality dual carriageway. That decision has been taken. Obviously, a future Minister — whether direct rule or devolved — may make a different decision.

There will be many other opportunities to consider what should be done with regard to the strategic routes, which is one of the reasons why I posed the question of the population on this island. In the report, 'A Vision of Transport in Ireland in 2050', the proposition is that there will be four million cars on this island. The Republic of Ireland anticipates that the number of cars there will grow from two million to three million by 2030, which would have a significant impact on roads north of the border. We must address those important issues.

Mr McLaughlin: Thank you for your interesting presentation, Mr Gavaghan. Through meeting and working with SIB, I have become familiar with the investment delivery framework graph. I congratulate you on the pace of progress to date. The cross-cutting themes shown in the investment pillars are absolutely appropriate. Given our current circumstances and recent history, the middle cross-cutting theme is of particular significance. How do we measure the outcomes and impacts of projects, both current and completed? Have all Departments and agencies signed off on this paradigm?

Mr Gavaghan: I will start with the second question. This is just thinking at the moment; SIB has not approached the Departments and agencies yet. Appendix 3 of the first investment strategy included a paradigm of how the prioritisation worked, and that will have to happen with this, therefore, the answer to your question is no. SIB is trying to find a more rigorous and holistic approach, hence it is going down that route.

You asked about outcomes. Martin Spollen has been very much to the forefront of developing the thinking on that issue. Martin worked for SIB as a consultant on the first investment strategy, and, just like the Remington advert, he liked us so much he joined us. I recognise that consultants are often criticised, but Martin was so enamoured by the strategy that he joined SIB. That is a fantastic achievement for us.

Mr McLaughlin: It does not affect the quality of your judgement or the work that you have done up to now, does it? [Laughter.]

Mr Gavaghan: We have gone into a number of subsets on this. Mr Spollen will describe the background to that. This thought process came from work that Victor Hewitt, Director of the Economic Research Institute of Northern Ireland, helped us with. In Canada they have been looking at national performance for a number of years. They have produced a series of indices in the context of issues that have a strong resonance with Northern Ireland, in terms of the divided nature of the community. We have developed our thought process, picking up on key performance indicators. Each year a report is produced in Canada on outcomes related to the activities of the indicators. We try to identify and track how this might be done in Northern Ireland.

Mr Martin Spollen (Strategic Investment Board): The priorities cut across the investment pillars. The experience last time was that Departments are good at generating ideas for investment within their areas of responsibility. Second time around, as we develop ISNI 2, we may find that that list will get even longer; and that capital values of potential investment may have also inflated over the period as schemes are worked on. We need a way of prioritising the projects within each of the investment pillars up to the affordability limits that are set by Ministers for each of the pillars. We have used these three priority themes to see how that might influence investment choices. To the left hand side of a priority — and it is not shown on this graph but we have copies — is a set of sub-priorities that could effectively act as benchmarks or outcome measures, allowing you to go so far on one and then move to the next priority area and invest there to achieve balanced outcomes.

It provides a comprehensive framework for investment decision-making. Weightings attached to different priorities will drive through and establish the ranking order. That might change over time as different Ministers have different views on what the relative priorities should be across these three main areas.

Mr McLaughlin: It would be useful to have those additional criteria.

Mr Neeson: I welcome your statement on the involvement of the European Investment Bank. To what extent is it involved, and to what extent are local investors involved? At our last meeting we spoke about the number of local investors investing outside Northern Ireland. From a purely personal interest, to what extent are you involved in Titanic Quarter and how advanced is that involvement?

Mr Gavaghan: The European Investment Bank also participated in Northern Ireland Water Service's project alpha. We understand from a recent visit that it would like to be involved in a range of our infrastructure investment projects, including the hospital programme and the education programme. Yesterday we had to appear in front of the Department of the Environment's review of environmental governance committee. One person there asked what role the European Investment Bank plays in assessing environmental issues. It has to look at the environmental impact assessment bar for all European Investment Bank-funded projects. There are a couple of wins there.

The European Investment Bank also helps support our Trans-European Network (TEN) programme. Another report, which I have here, identifies where in Northern Ireland we can exploit future infrastructure investment projects under the TEN programme. That is significant. The European Investment Bank is integrally involved in the TEN programme.

As to your second question on local investors, I emphasised in relation to both the Water Service's project alpha and roads package 1 the role that local investors played. There is huge opportunity for more active investment and local engagement in the market. This morning I saw Stephen Quinn, permanent secretary of the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment. Social enterprise is a vital area in Northern Ireland.

It is a vital UK area, and a vital international phenomenon. Northern Ireland has been one of the leaders in social enterprise, and the investment of that capital is something that we really could take forward. I would be keen to embrace not just business enterprise, but social enterprise and social capital.

11.30 am

Our specific involvement in Titanic Quarter is in helping the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment on the signature project. We have been engaged in a preliminary assessment that will shortly lead to the appointment of consultants to do a piece of work on what the signature project might or might not be.

Titanic Quarter Limited and the Belfast Harbour Commissioners have come up with a second concept, which looks, intuitively, like a world-class attraction. There is a significant cost attached to it, however, and a challenging timescale — we need to have something operational by 2011. We also need to be mindful that, as well as the docks, Titanic Quarter has some magnificent buildings, such as the pump house. We must look at the site in total as well as connecting the Titanic experience with the Olympics. There is much to engage in, and two or three of my colleagues and I are involved in it.

Ms Gildernew: Following on from what Margaret Ritchie said, could more be done to encourage the bundling of contracts in order to bring in the SME sector? Could the Federation of Small Businesses (FSB), for example, not have better representation on the board to ensure that SMEs are included in investment packages?

Is there any form of policy or strategy for investing in renewable energy? It is a potential source of employment and it would have a positive impact on the environment.

Could capital expenditure be made available for projects such as the Ulster Canal? It has not only a cross-border link, but it would connect Coleraine to Limerick through the island's inland waterways, thus developing tourism in its surrounding area.

When you were considering the stadium project, for which the Long Kesh site has been decided, the furthest west you looked was Cookstown. Does the east-west roads infrastructure, particularly the Donegal and Sligo link, create an impediment to the development of the economy in rural areas and west of the Bann?

Mr Gavaghan: In relation to your first question and to Margaret Ritchie's enquiry, we could always do more, and I will go back and engage with the FSB. On the subject of its representation, we are a small board, but certainly one of the people listening will take those views on SMEs to the advisory council, which should have a more active engagement with them. We will definitely follow that up.

There are several small family owned and managed contractors in Northern Ireland. I applauded some of those contractors the other day. One particular firm is still family owned, but it is now a significant player on this island and internationally. With the right ambition, small contractors can become medium-sized and then large contractors. That ambition is so crucial. Some of the small contractors need to think big to become big.

All of us in Northern Ireland should have that ambition. We launched the biggest ships in the world 100 years ago, and we have businesses that have become world-class players. That must be the ambition.

I am absolutely committed to engaging with small contractors, but with this programme, the ambition must be that they build the right structures to become world-class players.

Ms Gildernew: Their involvement in larger projects, either as individual companies or as companies collaborating on a project, will also further their capacity to become world-class players.

Mr Gavaghan: That is correct.

Mr Spollen: We would like to examine how to apply the North West Marketing supplier model more widely across Northern Ireland. SIB is discussing that issue with the Central Procurement Directorate (CPD). We intend to explore it as we develop the ISNI 2 and to consider how, within procurement rules, the package can be more SME-friendly. We must ensure that there is an economic benefit that acts as a multiplier, as well as getting things done for the region.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Three members wish to ask questions, and they will get the opportunity to do that, but, in the interests of balance, I will ask the members to my right to speak first, as they have not had a chance.

Ms Gildernew: I did not get answers to a couple of my questions.

Mr Gavaghan: I have not answered all Ms Gildernew's questions.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): My apologies. I thought that Mr Gavaghan had finished.

Mr Gavaghan: With regard to the third element in the subgroup's terms of reference, renewable energy is a fundamental requirement. The other day, I was listening to John Browne, the Chief Executive of British Petroleum (BP). We should put a great deal of emphasis and focus on that area, as it is a high priority.

In the context of this report by a group of engineers, renewable energy is fundamental.

As for the Ulster Canal, it must go through the appropriate Departments to become a project that would go up the priority list and be embraced. We have been considering UK- and British Isles-wide projects on the bases of opportunities for third party income, how much funding is required and the potential for waterfront developments.

Finally, I do not have a specific answer to Ms Gildernew's question on roads infrastructure. However, we probably need to do more work to consider the impact of roads on local economies, not only on strategic routes, but on regional and local routes, North and South, east and west.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): To move things on, the next three members will have five minutes each to ask questions and conclude this session.

Mr Simpson: Thank you, gentlemen, for your presentation.

Mr Gavaghan, when will the 10-year investment policy start and finish? How much input do local councils have in identifying projects? Are they consulted? If there is little consultation, do you envisage greater consultation when the super councils are created, taking into consideration the extra powers that those new councils will have?

Mr Gavaghan: The current investment strategy runs from 2005 to 2015. The second investment strategy would be slightly different from the national development plan in the South, where the strategy runs for six years, which will be from 2007 to 2013. We have in our mind's eye — and it is a by-product of the three-year firm spending under UK Government policy — that the next investment strategy will run from 2008 to 2018, so it will be a rolling 10 years.

Mr Simpson: Is it a rolling budget, or is a different budget determined for every period?

Mr Gavaghan: The graph for the total investment programme showed the confirmed and the indicative. It will be confirmed for the first three years of the next investment strategy and will be indicative for the period beyond that — the seven years.

The indicative is a relative concept. If an investment is undertaken via PPP then that commitment has been made and, therefore, although it may appear to be indicative, it is a firm commitment. That is an interesting issue when it comes to infrastructure and investment. That is why the Republic of Ireland recently decided on a 10-year capital investment programme of €34 billion for its transport structure. It committed €34 billion over 10 years, and that is a significant difference to the approach taken in the UK. It is a difficult issue for the Department for Transport and the Treasury.

Different councils engage to different extents on identifying projects. I make myself available when councils want to engage, and I will go to any part of the Province. Some councils are keen to engage on their own dynamic, and others feel that the SIB is not accessible. Perhaps we should revisit how we engage with councils.

I have no doubt that having fewer councils will make people look in a much more coherent way at how things come together: for example, requirements for health, education, roads, rail, etc. There will be more coherence in the aggregation of those plans. We will be happy to engage with the councils, but the aggregation goes through the Departments. We are happy to engage at any level — debate and dialogue, looking at how proprieties are set and at what really works at a local level.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Thank you for sticking to the time, Mr Simpson.

Dr McDonnell: I will try to stick even closer and maybe even come in under the time.

Mr Gavaghan, thank you for your presentation. It was fascinating and I am sorry that we do not have a whole day to listen to the various aspects of the matter and probe some of them.

My question falls into two parts and is fairly minor. What do roads package 1 and roads package 2 entail, what is e-HR, what are you investing in agriculture, forestry and fisheries, and where are you looking at waste management? Those are just short, quick questions. Sometimes we get mixed up with the jargon and take a back seat. I presume that the Westlink is roads package 1, but what is in roads package 2?

Secondly, the subgroup is charged with defining, in a few weeks, the obstacles and challenges that face the Northern Ireland economy. What should be our top two or three challenges? We have dealt with the detail and infrastructure.

Mr Gavaghan: Roads package 1 is the Westlink. Roads package 2 is a series of projects, including the improvement of the road network from the border to Belfast, plus a significant element on the road out of Belfast towards the north-west. I will send you the details. There are about six different road improvement packages that fall into roads package 2, with a total capital value of around £250 million.

11.45 am

Electronic human resource enables the provision of human resources to all staff so that they can effectively take control of human resources across the entire NICS. It is a transformational project in that it enables the electronic use of human resources in a way that hitherto has not been achieved in Northern Ireland. The project runs across all 11 Departments. That represents a huge opportunity to consider how efficiencies may also be created in local government.

I was asked about agriculture. SIB has no specific involvement in agricultural projects, although from time to time we have had discussions with the Department on the impact of the Nitrates Directive, but that is not a supported project.

We have been working with the Department of the Environment and the councils on how to ensure that Northern Ireland complies with the EU directives on waste. We have helped the Department, in co-operation with a consortium that was coalesced through the councils, to consider a programme-delivery service unit with the procurement of the appropriate infrastructure for waste technology in Northern Ireland.

Dr McDonnell: What about the bigger question of obstacles?

Mr Gavaghan: The SIB has set out several challenges, and we should not underestimate the challenge of our existing task. I am reminded of my grandmother, who would say that if you are going to do a job, do it well. We must ensure that we perform our current task well. That is a huge challenge. If we perform that task well — and we are beginning to make good progress, working with Departments and the public and private sectors — that will build enormous confidence from which we can do so much more.

If we do not complete our task well and build a sound base, we will face great challenges later. The fundamental task is to put in place the resources to complete the job that we have ahead of us.

One of our great challenges is how to open the economy to the world, and vice versa. There is a huge opportunity, and it is a huge challenge to persuade the world to visit us. I have been here for only two years, and this is a wonderful place. If we can get more people to come here and see how wonderful it is, that will create huge opportunities and we will see enormous change and growth in Northern Ireland.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We have about five minutes left. Lord Morrow is indicating that he wishes to speak on this matter. I think that it is fair enough to give four minutes to Mr Beggs and allow Lord Morrow one question, as we have kept Mr Morrison waiting for quite a long time.

Mr Beggs: We have heard about the money that will have to go back to the Treasury — a point that David McNarry raised earlier. Most of that money has been returned because of delays in capital projects. PPPs normally have penalty clauses. Have PPP budgets contributed to the return of that money to the Treasury because of delays in the PPP process?

Have the completed SIB projects, such as Invest Northern Ireland headquarters and Lisburn City Library, come in on time and on budget, or have there been any significant additions or oversights? Additions are expensive and that is how contractors make their money.

Are you content with the current level of interest from the international marketplace, or is there a need for more competition? In relation to the completed SIB projects that have involved international players, what percentage of the funds do you estimate ends up going to local subcontractors and what percentage of jobs goes to local people?

There is little benefit to Northern Ireland if all the jobs are to go outside the region. You give very significant savings of 25% for the Alpha project. What were your expected savings in the public-private partnership project, and do you have an estimate of the savings that SIB has achieved to date?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): For completion, Lord Morrow, you may finish off with your question.

Lord Morrow: I will accept the crumbs.

I know that you did not attribute blame one way or the other for your lack of engagement with local councils, but could you take a more hands-on approach with them? There are to be seven, although that is today's news; tomorrow's could be different. That is how things work here.

You also said that contractors should be "thinking big". Contracting in this country for the past 20 years was very difficult, as small companies could not think strategically or big because of the lack of road building and improvements. However, several big schemes are running at the minute, such as the Westlink and the dualling of the A4 from Dungannon to Ballygawley, which is a contract of about £130 million. What role can you play in encouraging contractors to think big?

Mr Gavaghan: I do not know the answer to Mr Beggs's first question. I will find out for him.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): You have undertaken to write to us on other issues, so perhaps you could include that.

Mr Gavaghan: The Lisburn City Library project was undertaken before my time. However, the Invest Northern Ireland headquarters project was delivered in 30 months from the first OJEU advertisement to the completion of the building. One cannot underestimate that achievement. The contract was done in 18 months, and a local contractor built the headquarters in 12 months. Significant residual risk on the property was passed to the contractor. One of the benefits of the transactions is that whatever additional costs there might have been — and I do not believe that there were any — were passed to the contractor, because it was a fixed-price contract.

I take your point that sometimes changes can result in the contractor passing costs back, but we have learned from cases across the whole of the UK about how to be much smarter about procurement, whether conventional or otherwise. I must emphasise that the SIB's locus is not just PPPs; it is across the whole programme of infrastructure investment in Northern Ireland, whether conventional or PPP. SIB has brought benefits that will bear dividends in future. They include intangibles, which will take time to identify and measure, such as the standardisation of contracts, the acceleration of the process, and ensuring that strict timetables are adhered to.

At the moment, we feel that we have done much to engage with local contractors vis-à-vis the international market. I take entirely the point that we can always do more, but please remember that we have finite resources. The accusation is often made against me that I would go to the opening of an envelope. There is a limit to how much one can do. At the moment, we are content, but I do not want to be complacent. You are as good as your last project, so we have to ensure that we are resonating and that we are doing what we say we do on the tin.

I am a blow-in, but we have settled here. There are huge opportunities for people to settle in Northern Ireland, and there are also opportunities for local people such as Martin. That is why I emphasised that five of those appointed during our last recruitment drive were local people. It is a win-win situation. A number of international players are setting up offices here, recruiting local people and creating more wealth. They are not taking their money out of Northern Ireland; they are bringing money into Northern Ireland. We need to track that more actively.

Returning to my previous point, we have not confirmed our estimated savings. However, if you are asking whether we believe that our contracts have saved Northern Ireland taxpayers more than they have cost them, the answer is yes. The subgroup will obviously want more detail on that, and we will consider that option with our sponsoring Department as time goes on. It should be remembered that the Strategic Investment Board is only three years old.

Mr Beggs: Even at this late stage, it would be useful if a figure could be provided. You mentioned that 25% had been saved in one project. It is not necessary to have the whole figure; I would be interested even in a provisional figure.

Mr Gavaghan: I take the point on our engagement with local councils.

Forgive me, what was the final question?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It was about contractors thinking big.

Mr Gavaghan: I am happy to engage with local contractors. However, trade bodies and associations need to represent their members, and engagement should be at an aggregated level. I am more than happy for there to be individual players, but more representation is required. There also needs to be recognition of how supplier models can help. As Martin said, we are keen to find ways of bringing those together — not, perhaps, in a standardised way, but to create more aggregation in order to make an impact.

We have been working on the north-west supplier model, which was developed from the Coolkeeragh power plant. We are examining how that model can be developed through engagement with the small and medium-sized sectors, as well as big players.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Thank you, Mr Gavaghan and Mr Spollen. You have answered our questions fully, and we look forward to the additional material that you promised. In fact, you have answered more questions than we predicted, so well done. You are welcome to stay for Mr Morrison's presentation. I am sure that there is good contact between your two organisations.

Owing to time constraints, the presentation will finish at 12.45 pm to allow the subgroup to conduct some private business. Please keep that in mind.

You are very welcome, Mr Morrison. The veterans of the Enterprise, Trade and Investment Committee know you very well. I do not know how many times you have sat in that chair. There were different Chairmen then, but I am sure that you recognise some of the faces from those days.

Mr Leslie Morrison (Invest Northern Ireland): I do not think that I have met Mr McNarry, but I have met the other members.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): You have provided a summary of your views at very short notice. You are aware of the subgroup's remit and the specific issues that it is considering. I appreciate the fact that your presentation is very focused on the subgroup's three terms of reference, which is most welcome. You have clearly read our brief carefully and responded accordingly.

As with the SIB presentation, you will make a few opening remarks. If members wish to speak, they will indicate to either the Clerks or me.

Mr Morrison: Thank you, Mr Chairman. I will introduce Damian McAuley, who is our director of strategic management and planning. Many members already know him.

As you said, Chairman, we tried to focus on the subgroup's terms of reference, and we welcome the opportunity to give our response.

We have not prepared anything on what we do, or what we could or should do. Those issues may be teased out in our discussions later on.

You asked us to focus on three topics: impediments to the development of the economy; fiscal incentives that might promote foreign direct investment and indigenous investment; and an economic package or peace dividend that, if properly allocated, might contribute to economic regeneration.

Some impediments — “impediment” is an interesting word — or weaknesses are inherent to the situation in Northern Ireland. However, all economies have weaknesses, which require large and long-term efforts to turn them around. Some impediments are obstacles that can be removed in the short term, and some weaknesses can become strengths. For instance, the fact that Northern Ireland is a small region can become a strength if we are smart and pull in the same direction.

12.00 noon

I could compile a long list on this topic, Chairman, but you have asked us to focus on important matters.

We must recognise how small our domestic market is. Gross domestic product (GDP) in Northern Ireland is about £23 billion, which is tiny. Consequently, businesses must grow by selling externally. Long-term wealth will reflect net exports and earnings from overseas. The domestic economy — that is, the economy that sells to domestic consumers — is critical. However, in the long term, our wealth will increase only with net exports and earnings from overseas.

Given that that is the challenge, what are our structures? There are many micro-businesses, and we have a microeconomy. Ninety per cent of companies employ fewer than 10 people. Most world economies are dependent on small- and medium-sized (SME) enterprises — however, overseas SMEs would constitute large enterprises in Northern Ireland. Many local companies lack the skills and resources to develop external markets. During the previous evidence session, the word “ambition” was used; local companies often lack ambition. That lack of ambition derives from the fact that the companies are small and there is a deficit of skills and resources.

Consequently, Northern Ireland has low innovation levels, which lies at the core of our problem. Innovation is defined as being not only research and development (R&D) — which is a large component — but the ability to develop new products, services and processes. It is a complex subject.

The ‘UK Innovation Survey 2005: Northern Ireland Results’ contains some interesting statistics. It states that 56% of enterprises in Northern Ireland are innovation active — that is, they are conducting innovative business. That statistic is similar to the UK as a whole, where the figure is 57%. There is not a huge structural difference between the proportion of companies conducting innovative business, in the way that I have described it, and the rest of the UK.

Proportionately, however, slightly fewer companies in Northern Ireland are innovative in product and services development — 21% in Northern Ireland compared to 25% in the rest of the UK. However, process innovation is quite good — 19% in Northern Ireland versus 16% in the rest of the UK. Those statistics are not wildly surprising, given the structure of industry here. Innovation and R & D are carried out by large companies, and most large companies in Northern Ireland are multinationals.

Innovation in R&D tends to be centralised fairly close to head offices. Plants must be efficient, so those companies that are involved carry out process innovation. In that context, the structure of our economy tends to drive the relative distribution of process and new product innovation. However, to become much more innovative we need to develop new products and services.

We can draw on another important study, on which I shall focus to set the scene. The biggest element, and the easiest to measure, is R&D. As we all know, business R&D spending is low in Northern Ireland, at about 0.5% of GDP. In the UK as a whole, that figure is about 1.2%, and the Republic’s figure is 1.4%. The highest figure among developed countries is that of Japan, which is at about 3.7%. To give members a sense of calibration, the EU wants to get to 3%, and the Republic’s target is 2.5%.

It is interesting to note that the last time that it was assessed, roughly 50% of R&D in Northern Ireland came from universities. Our private sector R&D is particularly small, and that accounts for the 0.5% figure. If we were to arrive at a gross total based on both, we would find that the difference between Northern Ireland and the rest of the UK is not that great. The deficit lies in the fact that the private sector does not do nearly enough R&D.

Some members may be familiar with Prof Harris’s study for the Centre for Public Policy for Regions (CPPR), which was published in January. He made several comments that are pertinent to this matter and that we could take on board. The fact that Northern Ireland has so few large companies is a big determinant of the amount of R&D. Tiny companies do not have the necessary skills or resources.

Sector matters a lot — we are very heavily dominated by food and drink, and, to a lesser extent, paper. Those businesses do not carry out much R&D. They are not hugely profitable, and they do not have the scope to do R&D. That tends to depress the potential.

Our absorptive capacity is a big factor. If we were able to get companies to do much more R&D, could they find the researchers? Not necessarily. We are not producing enough scientists, and not nearly enough PhDs, for example. The structural elements must be in place; it is not just a matter of spending money or getting other people to spend money.

Finally, Prof Harris said that companies that are supported by public sector funding in Northern Ireland are about 8% more likely to carry out R&D than other companies. In fact, the number of establishments in Northern Ireland that carry out R&D and receive support for it is proportionally about two and a half times higher than the UK average. Prof Harris concludes that if there were not public sector support for R&D, it is likely that private sector R&D spend would be much lower than it is even now. He therefore felt that the importance of public money support for R&D was great.

Those are good data points from which to illustrate my broad point on the need for innovation. The consequence of that is that this is a low value added economy. That means that we do not have enough highly productive and very profitable companies. We need those companies to be able to counter the fact that this is no longer a low-cost place, and it never will be. The good news is that if you are low-cost, you are poor, and we are no longer poor. Our economy is probably one of high or medium cost, and that is a challenge. We are clearly not as high-cost as north American cities, or London and Dublin, but we have a heck of a lot higher costs than Poland, not to mention China.

At the moment, our economy is one of high-medium cost. Our value added is increasing, but not by enough. That means that our GDP per capita is 80% of the UK average. The largest portion of our value added is composed of salaries. People can pay more if they are making more money. Therefore companies must become more profitable and be able to pay more in order for us to get richer. This is a very big challenge for us that, in my opinion, must be fought over the long-term.

Turning to the impediments and what can be worked on, the man from Mars would say that the thing that hits him between the eyes is the very high level of economic inactivity, which is around 27% here compared to 21% in the rest of the UK. That is obviously a big waste of human resources, particularly at a time when the labour market is tight.

The unemployment rate is less than 4.5%. Many sectors are finding it quite hard to get labour, which is why more and more immigrants are coming to Northern Ireland. We need to think hard about how to tackle the problem of economic inactivity.

Northern Ireland is a small and insular area that is, as I somewhat poetically say in my presentation, "bruised by years of strife". Cultural hurdles are a big factor. Psychological factors are also big in Northern Ireland, which contributes to a lack of optimism, leads us to be more conservative than necessary and more afraid that we will fail. We are often told that we have a fear of failure in Northern Ireland; much of that comes from the past.

Optimism is of paramount importance for economic activity. A study by an academic from Trinity College in Dublin a few years ago suggested that optimism was the single most important element in economic development. I have just returned from north America, where I lived for a long time. The difference in mentality there is tangible; the attitude is: we can do it; we will do it; what is the problem? Northern Ireland must change its entire mentality and develop a can-do mentality. That is easy to say, but hard to do.

Skills shortage is an obvious problem. There are areas in which Northern Ireland is short of skills at the highest levels of academic and vocational training. There is a need for better continuous education and retraining. We recognise that, in the modern world, people do not get degrees and forget about them — people must be constantly retrained. The most important thing is to be able to learn rather than to know something. Better facilities and courses for lifelong learning are required.

There was a discussion about transport infrastructure earlier. I do not consider that to be a major issue, but the infrastructure still falls short. It is a particular problem in the north and west of the Province where there are insufficient dual carriageways. Good transport networks are especially important for sectors such as the fresh foods industry, which is predominant in Ms Gildernew's part of the world. Fresh foods must be delivered to England, and delivered quickly. Inferior transport infrastructures constrain some sectors more than others.

Planning in Northern Ireland is cumbersome and must improve. Invest Northern Ireland uses the Planning Service, as it owns property that it develops for its clients, and we have the same planning issues as people in the private sector. A way to speed up the planning process must be found.

My final point links to the psychological tone of my presentation. The political tone is dispiriting to people in Northern Ireland. Potential overseas investors are fairly neutral; it is important to them that there appears to be no more violence and that there appears to be peace in the streets. However, potential investors are nervous because there does not appear to be particularly holistic cohesive political leadership. That is important for some people but not others; it depends on to whom one talks. You asked me to highlight impediments — I feel that the overall political tone is holding us back, but we can do something about it.

Chairman, you asked us to move on to the fiscal incentives that might promote foreign and local investment. You specifically asked about headline corporation tax and tax credits. The question about headline corporation tax is easily answered: it would attract increased and more profitable foreign direct investment (FDI). Multinationals manage their tax bills. They transfer revenues to low tax-rate jurisdictions in order to shelter their taxable earnings. To an extent, the Republic is a tax haven for corporate tax.

That would happen necessarily, because all multinationals — all companies, actually — try to minimise their tax burdens, within the law. Therefore, if the headline tax rate were set low enough, there would be a definite advantage that Northern Ireland could garner. I did not mention the likelihood of that happening or its feasibility. Invest Northern Ireland knows that there are real problems with that, but, since members asked: yes, it would make a big impact. Additionally, there is no question that that would encourage local business formation and the growth of the economy by increasing the return on capital. Assuming that Northern Ireland achieved a rate at parity with the Republic, there would be a dramatic increase in the return on capital, after tax. The effective tax rates are closer than the headline tax rates, but they are not close enough to make up the difference.

Northern Ireland business needs to be more innovative. It is important, therefore, for us to recognise that low tax rates would improve the sectoral mix here for the better. By definition, much more profitable businesses, such as pharmaceutical companies, would base themselves here because they could shelter tax, which is good for all kinds of reasons. However, that would not necessarily make Northern Ireland more innovative.

In financial terms, operating expenses, such as R&D, would shelter less income in low-tax jurisdictions. Therefore, having a low tax rate would not tend to encourage companies to base more R&D in Northern Ireland. In fact, it would do the opposite. Quite a lot of the foreign investment in Northern Ireland is R&D orientated. That is because the businesses are cost centres that employ people to do R&D. Low taxes do not help this activity, but, on balance, they would help the Northern Ireland economy.

Members asked about tax credits for R&D. Of course, they would be helpful. Prof Harris's study, which was published in January, and that I suggest that members read, deals with that issue. Northern Ireland offers tax credits for R&D. However, Prof Harris's study addresses higher tax credits. At the minute, tax credits amount to 50% for SMEs and 25% for large companies. Prof Harris has prepared a model that doubles both those amounts to gauge the potential effect. Higher tax credits would not bring transformational change to value added in Northern Ireland, but they would be helpful and would broadly supplement the innovation tool kit. However, they must be allied with grants and expertise, because if many of the small companies in Northern Ireland were given additional money, they would not be able to spend it. They do not have the necessary staff and they do not know the innovation process. They would need help.

It is notable that the majority of money spent by Northern Ireland private companies on R&D goes on in-house projects. The interesting thing is that in the rest of the UK and in other larger economies, the majority of R&D is outsourced. Those companies that outsource most of their R&D to universities and think tanks do far more R&D than the companies that keep it in-house. Obviously, outsourcing brings international expertise. Northern Ireland really lacks that same intensity of international expertise because it does not outsource much R&D. I believe that that is because Northern Ireland companies are too small and do not have the ability to absorb that work. That is the circle that we need to work on.

I was asked how an economic package or peace dividend might contribute to the situation. I cannot speak about infrastructure because that does not fall within my remit and I think that David Gavaghan referred to a number of those issues. However, Invest Northern Ireland could certainly use a lot more money for its programme budget for innovation and entrepreneurship. There is a limit to what INI could spend because of the absorption capacity issue, but in my view, it could spend significantly more.

In my presentation, I referred to sunrise-sector initiatives. By that, I mean a number of sectors, the most obvious of which are healthcare and biotechnology.

That is a very long-term hurdle to jump over. It requires more resources than are available. It might be a 10-year effort. One could do more, for example, on clinical diagnostics. Alasdair and I have spoken about that. It would require a lot of money to hire specialist nurses and so on. You can clearly see areas that could use long-term development.

Nanotechnology is not really an industrial sector; it is a cross-cutting technology that applies to a lot of sectors — electronics, healthcare, biotech, even textiles and food. We have expertise at the two universities. Seagate is the largest nanotech manufacturing company in the UK. We do not have much, but we have something on which to build. There have been attempts, through the universities and through us, to focus more resources on that, but it is faltering because we do not have enough money. That is an area where we could begin to encourage more manufacturing here, which would be helpful.

We would like to see an increase in funding for vocational retraining. This goes back to the point about lifetime learning, mainly through the FE colleges, although the universities are becoming more interested in doing postgraduate degrees that are more adapted to the needs of businesses. There is a sea change in higher education in people's attitudes towards spending their money in alignment with economic development needs. We could use more money there, and so could they.

Although the universities here spend rather more than half of the total R&D expenditure in the Province, they could still profitably spend more — less in the areas of pure research than in knowledge transfer, which is getting better but is still undeveloped at both universities compared to best practice. There are areas of economic potential that we are working on. We have a proof of concept fund, as you know. I wish it were many times bigger — it has been very successful. There are things there that we could spend money on.

In relation to the problem of long-term unemployment and economic inactivity, there is a return-to-work credit that is distributed through the Department for Employment and Learning. Enhanced financial measures such as that could encourage people by incentivising them to work rather than take benefits. It is a potential incentive that requires study. I do not know enough about it to be able to make a recommendation, but it seems to be an intelligent thing to consider spending more money on.

I have tried to link some thoughts to what we see as the deficits, and to keep the presentation fairly tight. I have probably overstayed my welcome as regards my presentation, but I would be happy to answer any questions.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Thank you, Mr Morrison. We will start with the gentleman to my right, Mr Simpson. If a party colleague is asking a question, feel free to make it a team effort, and perhaps we can get through it by 12.45 pm.

Mr Simpson: It is good to see you again, Leslie.

At the outset, we have to acknowledge that there is no quick fix for a lot of these issues. We have to be realistic. Have you any up-to-date budget figures for the entrepreneurship programmes? What is budgeted for this year, considering that there has been a cut in the overall budget?

To return to something that I raised with the Strategic Investment Board (SIB) earlier — the coming change in local councils — we do not know the budget that will be given to their economic development units. Do you have any indication of what the budget will be in relation to handling local enterprise systems and how that will operate locally?

You mentioned the cumbersome detail that Invest Northern Ireland has to go through in relation to planning. If Invest Northern Ireland has a major project of 200,000 sq ft, has it any influence with the Planning Service in order to have it fast-tracked?

The Northern Ireland Business Alliance and the Confederation of British Industry have said that 140,000 jobs need to be created over the next 10 years. If everything that you have presented today were put in place, would that be achievable?

Mr Morrison: Local business starts are sometimes confounded with entrepreneurship, which, as Mr Simpson and I have discussed in the past, is much broader than that. However, they form part of the picture. The 'Start a Business' programme itself had a £4 million budget last year, and it will be held at that as far as the eye can see. That programme is being redesigned and recalibrated and, while it has already become progressively more effective, it will be much more so.

We also raise entrepreneurship awareness at enterprise shows and on television and so on. There is approximately £3 million in that budget.

The accelerating entrepreneurship strategy says that entrepreneurship is about starts and about making existing businesses grow faster and become more effective. Therefore entrepreneurship gets very bound up with what we do with existing companies. I cannot divide that out; it would be impossible to say what is allocated to entrepreneurship rather than, say, innovation. However, the budget referred to is for trying to frame the business starts part of it, and for raising awareness.

Regarding the Review of Public Administration, we have provided a list to our sponsoring Department. Officials there are now talking to the groups sponsored by the Department of the Environment, and we are at a fairly early stage of discussions about what the larger, more empowered councils will do. Damian McAuley has been our liaison officer on that, and we have gone public with the things we believe the council should do on economic development. In broad terms we have said that the regional agency should deal with the companies that are in its remit, namely those that either do, or can, sell externally.

Our definition of a client — and it is not a very high hurdle, honestly — is a company that can sell £100,000 a year and that will make 25% of its sales externally within three years. That does not mean that all companies will become clients, but that is the criterion.

The councils could administer the ‘Start a Business’ programme. Elements of social entrepreneurship and incubators are the guts of it. That has been public for a while, as you know, and we are moving into the phase of discussing it through the local government task force and getting feedback from the councils and from the Department of the Environment. Do we have a timetable for that, Damian?

Mr Damian McAuley (Invest Northern Ireland): The first formal engagement with the task force will be on 1 August, when the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment (DETI) will present broad proposals. There will then be an engagement with the task force and feedback, with a view to making an initial report to the political panel on 15 August. The aspiration is that the final report to the political panel will be presented on 15 October.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): If an additional member leaves the subgroup we will not have a quorum, so it is important that everyone holds out.

Mr Morrison: Correct me if I do not hit the questions that were asked. You asked whether Invest Northern Ireland had any influence with the Planning Service to fast-track large projects. The Planning Service holds us at arm’s length, as though we were a private organisation. As with all human relationships, if you know people and work well with them you can sometimes get problems solved. Of course, the same would be true of the private sector. We have no special position and probably suffer the same frustrations as the private sector.

Mr McLaughlin: Sometimes you do not.

Mr Morrison: Sometimes things work. The Business Alliance has said that 140,000 jobs must be created over 10 years. My personal view on that statement is “maybe”. It is predicated on a lot of assumptions that must be carefully examined. We had an interdepartmental discussion recently in which I said that that claim carried both plausibility and implausibility. The Government should have a concrete position on the issue, and a macro-economist should be tasked to come up with that.

It is very easy to panic about numbers like that. In fact, Invest Northern Ireland’s clients and its ‘Start a Business’ programme have created close to 10,000 jobs, so those figures do not panic me very much.

12.30 pm

We must be careful not to extrapolate using past trends. The recent job creation in the tradable services and manufacturing sector by companies from overseas has been in financial services and software development. Six or seven years ago those companies would not have come here; they felt it was too dangerous. However, companies such as Citibank, the Indian companies Polaris and ICICI OneSource are now here, and Northbrook Technology has expanded in Derry and Strabane. That would not have happened six or seven years ago, and we must realise that we are still very unrepresented in those sectors, so that hurdle may not be as scary as it appears. The only question is whether it is really the right number, and my answer is that I am not sure.

Ms Ritchie: Gentlemen, you are very welcome.

The private sector in Northern Ireland is under-performing. There is a possibility that if resources are put into the private sector some of the public sector could be displaced, and there is a fear that a mobile private sector, with its public sector associations, could leave Northern Ireland and locate elsewhere. What incentives should be given to the private sector to ensure that that does not happen?

Secondly, does Invest Northern Ireland see advantages in adopting an all-island approach to attracting substantial investment, with some investors locating one arm of their enterprise or industry — in manufacturing or whatever sector — in the North and another in the South?

Mr Morrison: As regards the private sector being mobile, it is, so get used to it. That is life; that is the way it is. Nothing can be done in an open economy to prevent that. We must bear in mind that although domestic, locally owned companies are more sticky — they are here because they are from here and they like it here — they are also becoming increasingly mobile. The only way to prevent that is to make Northern Ireland a very good place to do business, by virtue of cost structure, but more so by virtue of the supply of people. Our greatest asset is a good supply of educated people. Is it a good enough supply? No, it is not. Do we have enough people who are sufficiently skilled and educated? No, we do not.

However, we have a relative advantage. Invest Northern Ireland’s contracts with investors include covenants, which are usually tied to commitments to job creation within a certain time period or hitting business targets. If investors do not do the things that they say they will do, we can go after them for the money that we have given them, to the extent that it has not been earned. Thus investors can be contractually tied.

However, all capital is mobile, and we must continue to make Northern Ireland a good place for businesses to locate to. We should remember that, for certain industries, this is already a good place to be. Northern Ireland is a world-class near-shore location for service industries because we speak English and have good people, and because of our time zone. It is for those reasons that three large Indian multinationals in the software development and call-centre sector are coming here. People ask me whether that is not risky, but I tell them that those companies already have huge operations in India and are coming here because they need near-shore capability, just as our companies have to go to India for reasons of cheapness. Northern Ireland has attributes that will attract people, both domestic and foreign, but we must struggle to maintain our edge, and no restrictive covenant can be placed on people.

There are two factors with regard to the all-island approach: the intra-island trade potential is considerably underdeveloped; and both economies are tiny while the world is massive. Jointly promoting all-island trade makes a lot of sense. In certain sectors, such as food, that is already being done, and it works quite well. Certain countries like to see us as being from the island of Ireland while others do not care. If we are intelligent about promotion and focus it right, we can do well.

As to foreign direct investment, a study is underway through the British-Irish Intergovernmental Conference to look at potential benefits. Invest Northern Ireland meets regularly with the Industrial Development Agency and Enterprise Ireland to see what we can do together. We already have a number of initiatives, particularly in the north-west; however, a lot more could be done. The secret of marketing is differentiation. If you say: "Come to Ireland. It does not matter which part of it you come to", we will lose every time because there is a 12.5% tax rate south of the border. What we need to say is: "Come to Ireland, and the reasons why you would come to Northern Ireland are people, infrastructure and broadband for example". We need to be selling the differentiation. There are markets, such as the United States, where people like to think you are just from Ireland. We can wear whatever cloak works in whatever market. We are very pragmatic.

The question of what co-operation there could be on foreign direct investment on an all-island basis needs to be answered. It is hard to figure out. Issues such as joint-infrastructure are easier: it is about electricity, roads, and such like. We should be doing things that make sense and in areas in which there are economies of scale and benefits. In marketing for investment, it is harder. I hope that I have adequately addressed the question.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Beggs got in at the end last time, so I will ask him to come in early; Ms Gildernew and Mr McLaughlin will then act as a team; then Dr McDonnell can ask his question.

Mr McLaughlin: We always act as a team.

Mr Beggs: There is nothing I would disagree with in your presentation. You have hit the nail on the head. You said that there is a need for a university system that spends less on pure research and more on knowledge transfer. What has gone wrong? Why do they not see that rather than concentrate on their own little world? You indicated that there are skills shortages and a need for more industrial retraining in our colleges. Why are the needs of the economy being missed by Departments, universities and colleges and how might we best refocus them? I support the view that lower corporation tax would bring benefit, but the need to encourage R&D is more important. I cannot understand why colleges and universities do not have facilities to provide that. What practical assistance could be provided? Might there be a special fund or an R&D facility? How would you see that mechanism working for tomorrow's companies?

Mr Morrison: I probably misled you a little. Universities should not spend less on pure research. Universities here do less blue-sky research than those in either the UK or in the Republic of Ireland. There needs to be more and better knowledge transfer, but universities are learning how to do it.

QUBIS Ltd, for example, has been fantastically successful over the years, but it runs on fumes; it used to have £20,000 a year to spend, which is a joke. It is often a question of resources, resources, resources.

Dr McDonnell: May I come in on that, Mr Chairman. How do we get money into QUBIS Ltd and UUTech Ltd? If the subgroup does nothing else, at least it could start providing answers to such questions.

Mr Morrison: Alasdair, the question is: how do we get money? If we can get money, we can find ways of getting it into bodies such as QUBIS Ltd and UUTech Ltd.

That raises several points. The nanotech initiative is a cross-cutting technology that could be up and running if we had the money. We made a bid to the UK for nanotech funding, but we failed. We know how to do it, as do Queen's University and the University of Ulster. We can see ways of getting money into nanotech.

Knowledge transfer is complex, and although universities are learning how to do it better, they will admit that they have a long way to go. It is not just a question of money; it is also a question of research and of figuring out what has economic potential. How can academics, whose main incentive is to write papers, consider economic potential? How do I get people involved who can actually run businesses? Academics, with a few notable exceptions, cannot.

We must transfer knowledge from the bowels of the universities to people who are, first of all, venture capitalists who can get businesses started and then move those businesses to people who can run them. It is a complicated process, and nowhere in the world does it work really well — except in Massachusetts and in the Cambridge cluster. We are getting better, but we are well off the pace.

You asked how we get more money into research. I would like to see more proof-of-concept money being available. Our proof-of-concept fund has been very successful, although it is limited by EU rules: we had to apply to the EU to be able to use it. However, it is a very small fund. Simple venture capital will not do it. Venture capitalists are commercial investors; they do not want to take enormous risks. They want to invest in things that are proven.

The deficit is: pure research; knowledge transfer; and proof-of-concept money. That is the golden rule. If we could funnel more resources into them and get EU approval, we could make a difference.

You asked about skills shortages and why there has not been more focus on retraining; however, over the past year or two a great deal of thought has gone into those areas. Certainly in my four years working with the Department for Employment and Learning I have seen a change in focus in that respect. Indeed, the Department had one of its regular liaison meetings yesterday with Invest Northern Ireland. We are working together on several initiatives on training for sectors that are coming here, such as financial services and software development.

The vocational side is beginning to pick up speed, but it needs to go faster. It has the same issue: resources. Everything requires money. You asked what we could spend the peace dividend on, if we got one, and that is one of the things into which we could put more resources. The Department for Employment and Learning knows how to do that.

How do we help small firms to increase their R&D facilities? Queen's University and the University of Ulster do some specific outsourced R&D for small companies. There is probably not enough awareness or ambition in small companies to use their engineering departments to respond to enquiries such as: "I have an idea — can you make my product?" or: "My product doesn't work very well — can you fix it?" They do that, and do it rather well, but they are constrained by resources. If a company of 10 people puts two guys on R&D, it has lost 20% of its workforce. Resources and the use of outside consultants would go quite a long way, as would education.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Thank you. Are you happy enough, Mr Beggs?

Mr Beggs: Yes.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We have two groups to go.

12.45 pm

Mr McLaughlin: Hello again, gentlemen. You discussed the impediments, and I accept that the points that you raised demonstrate that your task is challenging. We accept Invest Northern Ireland's remit. The South's economy is performing strongly, but it is beginning to demonstrate characteristics of overheating, and that has implications for the labour market and for further inward investment. Does that not present both a challenge and an opportunity, when considering impediments? Should we also address the competition between Invest Northern Ireland, Enterprise Ireland and the Industrial Development Agency (IDA)?

With regard to your advice on fiscal policy and corporation tax, the Northern Ireland Business Alliance and Invest Northern Ireland point out that the EC Directorate-General for Competition and the Treasury have demonstrated no willingness to go down the road of sub-regional tax regimes. Should we provide a wider range of options for tax credits and perhaps apply them with more creativity, imagination and flexibility?

At virtually every meeting that I have with Leslie, he makes the point that tax rates offer incentives that often come close to what is being offered by our competitors. We need a step change. The subgroup could offer coherent advice to the Committee on the Preparation for Government that would reflect a common position. The Northern Ireland Business Alliance saying one thing and Invest Northern Ireland saying another would represent an own goal. How could tax credits make your task easier and assist us in regenerating the economy?

Mr Morrison: I will take the last question first. Invest Northern Ireland does not have a different position from the Northern Ireland Business Alliance. Reducing headline tax rates would be of great benefit, but how practical would that be? There are issues in relation to the Treasury. If people put up brass plates here, the UK could lose tax revenues, and that is a major problem.

The second problem appears to be EU law. Unless regions are economically and financially independent of their jurisdictions, which they generally are not, regions cannot reduce rates legally. That is why the Republic went from split rates to a rate of 12.5%.

I am unsure how practical that would be, but it would have an enormous impact. I know that the Northern Ireland Business Alliance feels that it is better to get as much as possible. That is a tactical question, and I would rather not state an opinion on it. However, it would be helpful to have enhanced R&D tax credits, as well as other tax credits. They will not transform the economy in the way that a low headline corporate tax rate would, because they work differently.

To get tax credits, one needs to spend money. When a low tax rate is in place, one does not spend as much money, so one tends to try to optimise taxable earnings by creating profitable companies. However, it does not work that way with tax credits. It is not all bad news, however, because tax credits incentivise innovation. You would probably end up with a more innovative economy, but not necessarily a more profitable one. However, we would hope that profitability would result from that, further down the road. Those measures work differently. The difference lies in how feasible the creation of a profitable economy is, and what tactics should be used to achieve it. Tax credits would not achieve that on their own; they must be allied to a package of grants and expertise. Many small companies find credits hard to understand.

The uptake of existing SME tax credits is very low. Many small companies cannot get their heads round it. It is much easier for them to get a grant. Both those weapons should be in the armoury.

I absolutely agree about overheating in Dublin: it is a great opportunity — not a challenge. Citibank is here for that reason. It has a large operation in Dublin and a redundant building, and one might ask why it did not expand into it. However, we convinced Citibank to come here, as it would be cheaper in the long run.

A medium-sized call centre in the telecom business from the Republic has just opened in Armagh because it was more cost-effective to put it there than in Dublin. We have broadband and all that. We had to fight a battle to get it to come here as opposed to Limerick or somewhere else. Invest Northern Ireland has an office in Dublin, from where it fights for FDI. We have already got some FDI, and we hope to get more. The potential is there because of the overheating.

We do not compete with Enterprise Ireland; we are fairly complementary. Enterprise Ireland has responsibility for Irish-owned companies. It is not like our local office network, which deals with small companies. It deals with Irish-owned companies, be they domestic or overseas. We have co-operated on certain programmes, where sometimes they or we have good ones. We accept that we should mutually pinch or use each other's. Cross-border initiatives can sometimes be fruitful.

The IDA and INI have the north-west technology zone, but it is very hard to find other areas on which to co-operate, other than trying to find ways for each organisation to get better, because we are in direct competition. IDA tried very hard to prevent Citibank coming to Northern Ireland — as it should. The question is whether we can collaborate and be more effective. I tried to answer that from Ms Ritchie's question, but we should be differentiated from IDA or we will lose out.

I do not see the synergies in FDI. I can see synergies in areas such as trade, infrastructure and cross-border co-operation. I am not clear whether the border exists for economic purposes. If the main dynamic is travel-to-work areas — people living on one side and working on the other — the border is completely porous.

The different currency is not significant, but there are different tax and jurisdictional systems, and all that those involve. It is very porous economically, with people moving back and forth. However, the question is what can be done to stimulate more business in and outside the island. They are both important, but stimulating business outside the island is far more important because the world is a much bigger marketplace.

Ms Gildernew: Mr Morrison, you mentioned the external R&D capacity and its likely impact. Could Invest Northern Ireland bring outside R&D companies here to create links and network with the companies, especially in the SME sector? What can Invest Northern Ireland do to ensure that overseas investment will lead to sustainable employment opportunities? We are frustrated with companies coming in, staying for six or seven years and going.

Mr Morrison: Companies will develop R&D if there are good people here. That is the bottom line. SAP, the German software evolution company — which is like the European version of Microsoft — is here, as is Microsoft. SAP came because of Queen's University's grid computing capability, which is the next big thing in computing. Grid computing allows unused space on personal computers (PCs) all over the world to be used. It is quite complicated and mathematical.

We have world-class expertise in such areas, which is why R&D companies come here. They are not interested in second best. We have had quite a lot of interest in the service sector, although it is more limited in other sectors, such as the biotech sector. The biotech sector in Northern Ireland is focused on people such as Allen McClay, Peter Fitzgerald and Paddy Johnston. It would be nice to get a few more. We have expertise, and we want to be able to build on that. Pharma in the Republic depends on tax: it is basically tax-driven.

The answer is to focus on a number of small areas in which Northern Ireland has world-class expertise. The 18 centres of excellence that Invest Northern Ireland has set up in its first four years, nine in the universities and nine elsewhere, help to focus on those areas. Northern Ireland has enough, or even too many, such centres now. A region with a population of 1.7 million should not have 30 centres of excellence. Northern Ireland cannot be world class in that many areas, so we need to put more resources into the best centres and ensure that they deliver.

Michelle, I have missed one of your questions. What was it?

Ms Gildernew: How can overseas investment create sustainable employment?

Mr Morrison: The record of companies coming and going is not that bad. Capital is mobile. Recent investment, certainly in the four years that I have been here, has been far more service-sector oriented. Northern Ireland will not attract large new manufacturing investments. There is a chance of attracting niche manufacturing investments in a few areas, such as electronics, in which Northern Ireland is particularly strong, with companies such as Seagate Technology, Caterpillar, NACCO Materials Handling (NI) Ltd, BE Aerospace, which manufactures seats and composites for the aviation industry.

We must move up the value curve. Northern Ireland will never be a cheap place. For example, the Indian call-centre company, ICICI OneSource, the most recent of the three Indian service companies to come to Northern Ireland, will create 400 jobs in Belfast and 600 jobs in Derry. The quality of those jobs is OK, but I would not have supported its coming here had Invest Northern Ireland not been convinced that it would move up the value chain and do increasingly more complicated value-added work. The company must do that, because India is cheaper. That type of company builds on existing intellectual, cultural and language skills, and takes advantage of being in this time zone. A company's decision to come here is not based purely on cost, although being careful with costs is unavoidable.

Some of the types of businesses that have come here from overseas are also being developed domestically. A number of domestic companies are becoming increasingly involved in providing professional business and financial services. In the long term, Northern Ireland can compete in those areas and in a few niche manufacturing businesses.

Dr McDonnell: Most of the issues that I had intended to raise have been covered, so in the interests of meeting the 1.00 pm deadline, I will ask no further questions.

Mr Neeson: My silence is also to facilitate the Chairman's departure.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): You have both earned brownie points that will be stored and used in the future.

Thank you, Mr Morrison and Mr McAuley. Your presentation has been most helpful.

We have five minutes to deal with three small items. We need to agree the draft press release.

The Committee Clerk: The press releases that we have issued thus far have been extremely concise and have said little more than that the subgroup has taken evidence from witnesses. The media always pick up on press releases that contain a few quotes, so I have taken some quotes from the presentations. I will read out the draft, and if the subgroup is content, I will issue it:

"The sub-group had its third meeting today in Parliament Buildings, Stormont.

The sub-group heard presentations from the Strategic Investment Board and Invest Northern Ireland followed by question and answer sessions.

The sub-group agreed that it was important to invite Ministers to present evidence at the earliest opportunity."

It is important that that last sentence is included. It is not controversial.

I have cleared the next paragraph with David Gavaghan:

"David Gavaghan (SIB) advised the sub-group that Northern Ireland had for the first time used finance from the European Investment Bank to fund the £100m Roads package1. Mr. Gavaghan also advised the sub-group that one of its major projects, the Invest NI HQ had been completed on time in just 30 months using a local contractor.

In evidence to the sub-group Leslie Morrison (Invest NI) made a number of recommendations on actions that would make a significant contribution to an economic package, which would have a positive impact on economic regeneration."

The rest of the press release contains the same background information about the setting up of the subgroup, and so forth, as previous press releases. If the subgroup is content, we will issue it.

Mr Beggs: Could you add a couple of comments about what was suggested?

The Committee Clerk: If you keep in one or two comments, what do you leave out? It might raise certain issues. Those comments will come out in the evidence.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Dr Peter Gilleece, a senior researcher in the Assembly's Research and Information Directorate, is present, and he has been following the proceedings. We must formally ask, or instruct, Peter to carry out some research on behalf of the subgroup. We must also agree a deadline. The 10 August has been suggested, which has created a few waves of concern, as it is a very tight deadline. The 18 August has also been suggested. However, I do not think that an 18 August deadline will give us enough time to compile the report.

1.00 pm

The Committee Clerk: The subgroup has agreed to commission the research on education and skills, but a deadline has not been agreed. Members must decide on a date. It is a practical issue for Peter because he also services the Committee on the Preparation for Government. If members want that research to be included in the report, it will have to be submitted several days in advance.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Can another researcher service the Committee on the Preparation for Government so that Peter can be released? By comparison, the Committee on the Preparation for Government will not require as much research. Are there two researchers?

Dr Peter Gilleece: We have already had a conversation about this issue. It would be excellent if I could be released from the Committee on the Preparation for Government so that I could devote my time to this subgroup.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Will that enable you to meet the 10 August deadline?

Dr Gilleece: I will do my best. It may help if I could have the weekend after 10 August.

The Committee Clerk: Would it help if I wrote to the Head of Research and Library Services, making that request on behalf of the subgroup?

Mr Beggs: Would Monday 14 August be a better submission deadline?

Dr Gilleece: A deadline of Monday 14 August would help.

The Committee Clerk: The subgroup will be taking evidence from many witnesses. If my colleagues and I do not have clarity on the emergent themes, it will be difficult for us to compile a report within the time frame. I strongly recommend that in the next week to 10 days we have a one-hour private session to examine the emergent themes. If you are content, Peter and I can pull those themes together in a paper. We will liaise with you on time frames.

Our next meeting is on Tuesday 1 August 2006 at 10.00 am in Room 135.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I will be in the Chair.

Adjourned at 1.02 pm.

SUBGROUP ON THE ECONOMIC CHALLENGES FACING NORTHERN IRELAND

Tuesday 1 August 2006

Members in attendance for all or part of proceedings:

The Chairmen, Mr Francie Molloy and Mr Jim Wells
Dr Esmond Birnie
Mr John Dallat
Mr David Ford
Ms Michelle Gildernew
Mr Nelson McCausland
Dr Alasdair McDonnell
Mr Barry McElduff
Mr David McNarry
Mr Sean Neeson
Mr Peter Weir

Witnesses:

Mr John Simpson	} Economist
Mr Wilfie Hamilton	} Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment
Dr Graeme Hutchinson
Mr Stephen Quinn
Mrs Ann McGregor	} Enterprise Northern Ireland
Mr Ken Nelson
Dr Nicholas O'Shiel

The subgroup met at 10.07 am.

(The Chairman (Mr Wells) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The meeting is now open.

Mr McElduff: I am replacing Mitchel McLaughlin.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is there a second SDLP representative?

Mr Dallat: Alasdair McDonnell is the second SDLP representative.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are members content with the draft minutes of the meeting held on 27 July 2006?

Mr McNarry: I must make an important phone call around 11.00 am. I am worried that the subgroup will become inquorate. I will be absent for only five minutes, so perhaps we could adjourn or have a comfort break at that time.

Mr Weir: Must you make the phone call at 11.00 am exactly or around 11.00 am?

Mr McNarry: Around 11.00 am.

Mr Weir: It may make sense to take a five-minute break between John Simpson's evidence and the session with the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment.

Mr McNarry: May I have two minutes to make a call to say that I will phone back around 11.15 am?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Could a member of the Committee staff make the phone call on your behalf?

The other Deputy Speaker has arrived, but unfortunately that does not affect the quorum. We are now off the record.

The subgroup was suspended at 10.09 am.

On resuming —

10.10 am

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We are back on the record. Are members happy to agree the minutes?

Members indicated assent.

There are several matters to consider. Among members' papers is a copy of a letter to the Secretary of State, which I signed. We are not awfully pleased with MPs who take all August off and are not available to meet us. I am glad to say that the MPs who are members of this subgroup have a different attitude. However, we have given the Secretary of State a very clear message as to what we feel he should do.

We have also flagged up an issue that Mr McNarry raised, at this subgroup and at the Preparation for Government Committee, about the Secretary of State's making announcements that could cut across, contradict or cause difficulties to the subgroup. That letter has been sent, and members have copies for reference.

I have also received a letter from the Northern Ireland Tourist Board (NITB) that indicates that, unfortunately, because of prior commitments, it will not be able to provide any oral evidence. However, it has agreed to submit a written presentation.

The Committee Clerk: Mr Chairman, we hope that we can slot the NITB into the 10 August meeting. Mivan cannot appear before the subgroup because of international commitments but has agreed to provide written evidence. We hope that the NITB can fit into that slot, and the indications are that it will be able to do that.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Good. That meeting is delayed rather than cancelled.

Mr Weir: Mr Chairman, it is fair enough to use the excuse that there is no one to give evidence, if that relates to an individual. If John Simpson, or whoever, cannot attend a meeting on a particular date, that is fair enough. The Northern Ireland Tourist Board is a large organisation, and it would not have been acceptable if it had said that there was no one at all in the NITB who could come anywhere near the subgroup. That would not have been acceptable.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The NITB wanted a witness at the level of chief executive or chairman to come before the subgroup. The problem is that neither of those individuals were immediately available. We would accept a deputy chief executive, but the NITB took a different view on that.

Papers have been tabled for information. As we receive written evidence, we will table it to members as quickly as possible. I hope that members will read the evidence as we proceed.

The Hansard report of the 27 July meeting has been tabled. Members have already received the draft of that report. As usual, we expect members to let us know within 24 hours whether there are any difficulties. I wish to pay tribute to the Hansard staff, who are listening to this as I speak. They have — for this subgroup and for the Preparation for Government Committee — been turning reports around remarkably quickly, given the extra work that we have imposed on them during the summer holidays. We are extremely grateful for their diligence.

I know that members have read the Hansard report avidly, and we have not received any corrections. Most of the report consisted of evidence from the Strategic Investment Board (SIB) and Invest Northern Ireland, so there is not much scope for controversy.

The Committee Clerk: Mr Chairman, the only comments that we received were from InterTradeIreland, which was fairly innocuous stuff. Hansard has accepted a fair number of amendments. If witnesses said something on the tape, they said it. However, it is entirely non-controversial.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Did you mean Invest Northern Ireland?

The Committee Clerk: No, InterTradeIreland.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I see. From the previous meeting?

The Committee Clerk: Yes.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I have received my copy of the 27 July report. Have members received that?

Ms Gildernew: Just now.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The same principle applies. Members should try to turn the transcript around in 24 hours. Again, it consists of witness sessions.

Mr McElduff: Mr Chairman, is it the practice for attendees only to receive the Hansard reports, as distinct from those who are involved with the Preparation for Government Committee?

The Committee Clerk: Only attendees can comment on the report.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): All Hansard reports will be published on the Assembly website.

The Committee Clerk: Once a report has been cleared, it will appear on the website.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is interesting that when the reports were not published on the website and were leaked, the press devoured them with great interest. Now that the reports are available, the press could not care less. That is definitely a case of stolen apples tasting best. Everything we do will be in the public domain, once it has been passed for Hansard.

We must make arrangements for the meeting on emerging themes. We did not get a chance to discuss that at the last meeting due to time constraints, and it has been scheduled for 3.30 pm on Thursday. I will chair that meeting, although I think that the other Chairman will also attend because we have been alternating the chairmanship. Confirmation of attendance has been received from some of the parties, including Dr Birnie and Mr McNarry from the Ulster Unionist Party Assembly Group. Mr Ford and Mr Neeson are not here, but I assume they are coming.

Mr Ford: Pardon, Mr Chairman?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Oh, sorry. I have a fixed image of the Alliance party always sitting at the top of the table. I just cannot get that out of my head.

Mr Ford: I am delighted that you see it in such a way, Mr Chairman.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I presume that Mr Neeson will be coming to that meeting.

Mr Ford: One of us will attend, but I am not quite sure who it will be.

Ms Gildernew: The meeting is at 3.30 pm?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is at 3.30 pm on 3 August.

The Committee Clerk: At the moment, eight members are on the list to attend the meeting. We need seven members for a quorum. I have David and Sean down to attend, as well as Alasdair McDonnell, John Dallat and Michelle Gildernew. Members cannot afford to drop out as that will mean that the meeting may have to be cancelled.

10.15 am

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Peter Weir is to attend for the DUP. Do Sinn Féin or the DUP have a second nomination?

Mr McElduff: I made it clear to the secretariat yesterday that I was going to attend.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): All we need is the second DUP name.

Is everyone happy enough? We need to meet for a good hour because we have not really had time to think, given the amount of material that we have been dealing with.

The next issue is the revised work programme, which is at tabs 6 and 7 of the papers. It is very much a moving feast; it is constantly changing, with some witnesses being pulled out and others being slotted in. This is meeting number four in week commencing 31 July. The fifth meeting, which Mr Molloy will chair on Thursday 3 August, is with the Industrial Task Force, the Northern Ireland Committee of the Irish Congress of Trade Unions (NIC.ICTU) — a nifty little title — the Department of Education and the Department for Employment and Learning. Are members content to look at that and return to the issue of the time constraints later?

John Simpson was extraordinarily helpful to the Enterprise, Trade and Investment Committee when it was in session, and he was perhaps one of our best expert witnesses. Do feel free to make maximum use of John's hour with the subgroup this morning, particularly as regards the big issues that have been raised to date, such as corporation tax, industrial derating and reduction in fuel duty. Feel free to take the opportunity to quiz him as he is extremely helpful in providing information on those subjects. I do not want to lead the questions, but it would be a pity to get bogged down in general discussion when someone of his ability is at our disposal.

The Committee Clerk: One of the key issues for the subgroup in compiling its report is whether corporation tax should be reduced to a certain level or tax credits increased. It must explore the arguments for and against both approaches and try to find a balance. The subgroup can discover much from witnesses and should take advantage of the presence of people like John Simpson and the officials from the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment. Members should press them for answers to key questions — for example, why we do such and such and what the likely results would be.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): This could be one of the most valuable evidence sessions in the entire process.

Are members content? Unfortunately, we have had to leave this in the hands of the Clerks because there has been so much toing and froing, but I think that we have a reasonably good balance from the various sectors. We will have to leave it to the Committee staff to keep matters moving along.

Mr McElduff: Mr Chairman, I would have liked to hear evidence from the Department of Education and Science in Dublin to find out how it has contributed to the skills strategy. If I could be assured that a research paper was being commissioned towards that end, that might suffice.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will table that schedule. Do not be surprised if it is changed by the next meeting; that is simply the nature of the beast. However, I am content that we are getting a good spread of folk.

The Committee Clerk: They are nearly all confirmed, apart from the Northern Ireland Tourist Board (NITB) on 10 August. The subgroup should be content that it has had in excess of a 95% response rate in a short time frame. Witnesses are keen to come.

Dr Birnie: With NITB not coming, I suggest that we let the three groups that are coming on 10 August expand their presentations. In particular, the Economic Research Institute of Northern Ireland might need more than 45 minutes.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): NITB is coming, just not in the original slot. We have shunted them into that slot.

Mr Dallat: As a mere substitute, I have to relate to what Mr Weir said earlier. I cannot see how we can work these things out adequately without some input from tourism. If NITB is not available, perhaps someone from Tourism Ireland, based in Coleraine, might be a very good substitute.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There is a slight misunderstanding. NITB is not available on the date that we asked for. It is coming, but later than we had hoped. It is important to emphasise that. It looks certain that it is going to be there.

The Committee Clerk: We are not absolutely certain at this stage, but we have been given an indication that it will be available on 10 August, so we hope to slot it in.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The subgroup is gaining momentum as we go on. It will be difficult, in my view and in that of the staff, to get it all done in time. We are considering writing to the Preparation for Government Committee to seek a one-week extension, which will be at its discretion. We need to do that formally. It could turn down the request. It will be practically impossible to get all this done in the time allocated.

Mr McNarry: I propose that we do so. I think it is important.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do we have a consensus?

Members indicated assent.

The Committee Clerk: I will get a request to the Preparation for Government Committee tomorrow, seeking an extension until 25 August.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I am chairing that meeting, so I am writing to myself to ask for that extension.

Dr McDonnell: Tell them that Mr McElduff has joined us and that he is keeping us back.

Mr McElduff: I do not think so.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That completes the preliminaries. Is Mr Simpson here?

The Committee Clerk: I have just been advised that Alan Clarke has confirmed 10 August for NITB.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We are making good progress. Ask Mr Simpson to come in. We have agreed that these meetings are open, and if your parties have whizz-kids on economic development or financial issues they are welcome to come in, listen and pass notes to members. People were killing themselves to get in before we made the meetings open, and now no one is turning up.

Mr McNarry: How many questions are we allowed today?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Three, though last week one member managed to make that into six.

Mr McNarry: That is why I ask. Three questions, and no rhetoric?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Keep it to three if you can. We want to maximise the opportunity of getting information from witnesses.

Mr McNarry: I agree with you.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Simpson, you are most welcome. You appeared before the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment many times, and we found the information you provided invaluable. We are pleased that you could come here this morning at short notice to give evidence on this issue. We have indicated to you the three main issues on which we are trying to gather information. I suggest that you make whatever opening comments you think necessary, and then I will throw it open for questions. We would like to take one hour for this session. You have been down this road many times, so I am sure you are experienced at giving evidence.

Mr John Simpson (Economist): Thank you for the invitation. Were I being facetious, I would say that it was a good excuse for not going on holiday. Members have a copy of my paper, and may wish to read the headings as I review it.

Let me try to set the scene. Inevitably, in a discussion of this kind, there is a tendency to pick on weaknesses or on comments on which one has a different view. We do not spend 50% of our time congratulating ourselves on the acceptable things. We tend to focus on things that we would like to change.

Consequently, the discussion that I am likely to engender might, on reflection, appear more negative than positive. That is a natural bias when producing a set of questions relating to economic challenges. Inevitably, I am drawn to say that we are not tackling them very well. That is not to say that there are not issues on which, if I was to sit in an audience outside Northern Ireland, I would say: "Just a minute, take account of these good things as well as the critical ones."

With that understanding between us I will briefly review the paper that I submitted. I do not need to enhance further the personal introduction. It is only there to let you know that I have had a misspent youth doing several things that occasionally come back to haunt me. Even when I recall the days in this Building when we argued about the Matthew plan, who was to say that 44 years later we would be sitting here discussing whether or not we got it right and asking: “Where are we now?” However, I am not going to dwell on the background.

It was necessary to include a second section on the current state of the regional economy. Members will recognise the various symptoms that are readily picked on. By the standards of employment and, indeed, average lifestyles, we are better off than we have been at any time in our lifetime. Judged by where we normally have been in comparison with regions in Great Britain, we have caught up a bit, but not a lot.

Unemployment is now the lowest it has ever been in our lifetime. If we look around and say: “What features of that should we be careful about?”, the first thing that comes to mind is that we still have a significant amount of underemployment — the inactivity rate, as it is often described. It is partly a consequence of a higher proportion of the population living in rural areas. There will always be a higher inactivity rate where it is not so convenient for the second or third person in a family to get employment. The main occupation will determine where the breadwinning takes place.

Where are we on the issues of employment, unemployment and living standards? The situation has been built and improved for all sorts of market reasons in ways that I now would consider fragile. The unemployment problem has not been solved to the extent that we need not worry about it any more. If unemployment were to re-emerge in western Europe on any significant scale, we could not expect to be the last area to be adversely influenced. It is fragile, and it is dependent on a great deal of employment in low-skill and low value-added occupations.

In concluding my review of where the economy is now, I will talk about two other features, the first being migration. I first came across an estimate of the level of net inward migration in the past year from a reasonably reliable publication. It seems as though we may have had an inflow of about 14,000 people in one year. That is against a background in which, 25 or 30 years ago, we would have expected an annual net outflow of 4,000, 5,000 or 6,000 people a year.

10.30 am

The Government are forecasting that the flow of people into Northern Ireland will be less than a couple of thousand a year, that that will fall further, and that we will then return to a small level of net outward migration. However, I do not agree with that forecast. The Government’s prediction will have an important knock-on effect, as they will have to consider the economy over the next three to five years — for example, where the population will be, what jobs it will seek, what demands it will place on social infrastructure and housing. There are all sorts of knock-on effects, and they could be quite serious. However, we still have a

GDP (gross domestic product), or GVA (gross value added), per head of 80% of the UK average, which is about 74% of the Republic’s average, and the Republic is now ahead of the UK average.

Business profitability in Northern Ireland has improved, in a situation where a fragile economy is attracting inward migration for interesting reasons, but it is still not prospering at the level that we would like. There are examples of firms that are losing money and that are unlikely to survive another winter, but, in general, business profitability in the past four, five and six years has improved. The business community, however, would say that it has not improved enough.

I added a cautionary note regarding the question on major impediments. It states:

“Beware of any dramatic single solution to all impediments”.

There is no dramatically different solution waiting to be pulled off the shelf. Even if the policy made a big difference, and over time we could repay the costs, that could be deceptive. I will move on, but the relevance of that comes later.

We have all grown up with conventional arguments about the impediments in Northern Ireland: it is a peripheral location with poor natural resources; we have extra transport costs; it is a small local marketplace on an island divided into two economies. However, those issues are less of an impediment than they were. Location and poor natural resources were fundamental features, but they are less significant now due to a knowledge-based western European economy and a marketplace that has better access to larger markets.

It has been argued that the manufacturing sector is weak or fading away, but manufacturing output is not down. It continues to edge up, but the level of employment in the manufacturing industry is down. The bad news is that people are losing jobs; the good news is that those who are still employed are producing more per person, so it cannot be all bad. We should not write off manufacturing as if it is going down the proverbial drain.

It has been argued that we have a weak private sector. When people say that, they mean that there is not much inward investment in manufacturing, yet the private sector has been the source of the major expansion in employment in the past 10 years in services, in retailing and in wholesaling. The private sector has done more to expand employment in Northern Ireland in the past decade than the public sector. We have an overlarge public sector. Some 33% of people are employed in the public sector, compared to a GB average of around 23%. Those figures do not compare. Members’ mathematics will allow them to wonder whether it is because 33% is too high, or 67% is too low. If we compare the proportions, the public sector seems large, because the private sector, relative to other areas, seems low.

I shall provide one correction on the usual view of this matter, which surprised me. The number of people employed in the public sector in Northern Ireland as a proportion of the entire population, not just relative to employment, is, within a fraction of a decimal point, the same as that for Wales. That number is a little more than a fraction of a decimal point lower than that for Scotland. We may simply believe that we have too many public sector employees — and we need to think about that — but, sometimes, we get the perspective a little out of focus.

We have a large public sector, which has an impact on the labour market. The public sector pays, on average, rather more than the private sector for the same skills, and that is a problem.

We have, in many senses, a branch plant economy. We use those words almost as though they were derogatory. I do not mind having branch plants if they achieve what we want. In the manufacturing sector, we ask how much expenditure goes to research and development. The answer is that that figure tends to be relatively low, and that is because we have production units, not research headquarters units. That makes it a harder battle. No one would decry the value of more research and development spending, innovation spending, and so on, but it is almost natural that that would be lower in a regional economy like ours.

I turn to less conventional theses, which are often understated. If I had invented the phrase, I would say that the impact of political instability “has not gone away”. However, you may recognise that someone beat me to it. Was that a reference to political instability?

Another eminent figure described Northern Ireland as having an unsustainable economy. There is an argument that we are not seen as a conventional, progressive, modern, western European region, and we cannot get away from that. People tend to discuss how Northern Ireland compares with Cyprus, the Basque region, or even with the way in which Catalonia is changing. Those are sensible comparisons, and they highlight that the framework in which we operate is important.

There are failures of delivery in public-sector administration, on which I shall make two points. The first concerns policy setting and delivery within the public sector. Obviously, but not solely, I wish to refer to town and country planning. I criticise not so much the regional development strategy, although it has vulnerable points, as the absence of a Belfast metropolitan area plan. The real significance of its absence concerns infrastructure plans and their delivery of electricity, water, waste water, roads, transport and ports.

Members will have had different reactions to the announcement this week of the proposed £400 million to be spent on roads. If members liked it, they will have agreed that the right schemes were picked. If members disagreed, they will have thought that the wrong schemes were picked. However, I criticise the announcement on different grounds. I am interested in the way in which the strategic investment programme is evolving. I welcome the fact that it exists, but I have criticisms. If members read yesterday’s press statement, they would have seen the paragraph that stated:

“The Government’s Investment Strategy envisages that this additional roads funding will be available to us towards the end of the 2015 period.”

Are we living in a society in which it takes 10 years to move from conception to delivery? Those who have followed the history of the Westlink upgrade would say that that is nothing new, as that is exactly what has happened to date. The Westlink upgrade that is being built will be inadequate for purpose, and one of the suggestions in my presentation will solve one of the knock-on problems.

The delivery of a better economy requires a better idea of how the public sector should perform. The performance of the public sector has been inadequate on town and country planning, infrastructure planning, scale and standards of education and training, and urban regeneration. If Government Departments are criticised because they are failing to deliver, that means that there is a real debate, because adequate delivery in those areas is important.

A slightly different failure of the public sector relates to public services. People in Northern Ireland accept second-rate standards of delivery. For example, the single energy market on the island will not be ready on time. How often do we hear that the original timetable has slipped in relation to the public sector in Northern Ireland? The business sector would not operate that way; it would say that if the timetable demanded completion by a certain date, it would try to deliver — unless it is rebuilding Wembley Stadium. There is too much emphasis on vision statements and not enough on operational delivery. There is no real debate about options, and sanctions are not applied when the public sector fails to deliver.

Any new fiscal incentives would be welcomed, particularly by businesses that would have to pay less. Those who received their new rates demand in the last few days can join in a vote of sympathy with those of us whose rates will almost double. I do not need to talk about the North/South comparisons on fiscal issues, such as company taxation and excise duties etc, because those are well known. There is a long history of searching for variations in fiscal policy. Few here will remember the 1962 debate on the Hall Report and the alleviation of National Insurance charges in Northern Ireland. I am looking around the table to find the guilty parties who can remember that.

Suggestions have been made that have come to nothing. I shall not dwell on the one exception, but Esmond Birnie will know about it. The current topics for debate relate to whether corporation tax, industrial rating, domestic rates and water charges should be different. Everyone knows that the Treasury's view is that those who expect parity in spending must expect parity in taxation according to their means, so that those with lower incomes pay less.

What are the options? There must be a debate on fiscal incentives and an attempt to persuade the Treasury that that debate is meaningful. Let us take the Treasury as the starting point, so that people pay according to means and receive according to needs. To diverge from parity would result in the same debate as the one that has been taking place in Scotland. Are those who want the right to a lower rate of tax prepared to take a lower transfer through the Barnett formula? As far as I know, the Scots have not decided to exercise that right, and the argument continues.

The third option is to go for a one-off time-limited exception and tell all relevant taxpayers that they will be beneficiaries. However, if it were decided that, from today and for the next two years, corporation tax would be 12·5%, the main beneficiaries in absolute terms would be the four Northern Ireland banks.

The degree to which it would lead to extra investment is uncertain, and I will not put it any higher than that. Corporation tax at a rate of 12·5% would also attract the attention of the European Competition Authorities (ECA), but if we were strong enough about the issue, and the British Government were strong enough about it, it might be persuaded.

10.45 am

We could have a one-off time-limited exception for all new businesses. The problem with that is in defining what is new. If I am told that I can have a tax holiday if I set up a new business, will I be prevented from closing my old business and setting up a new one around the corner? Of course, it is much more subtle than that. The alternative is to change the fiscal impact by saying that we will allow differences in spending. That idea has been floated, so you will all have heard of it. For tax purposes in Northern Ireland, businesses' marketing expenditure, training expenditure, research and development (R&D) expenditure and other development expenditure could be made tax-deductible from their profitability by a factor of three or four. If we make the figure big enough to work, it could be done.

For the benefit of those who want to think laterally, my final point on fiscal incentives is that, in order for there to be the same fiscal treatment throughout this island, agreement would be needed on company and excise taxes being harmonised. If that agreement were reached, however, the Treasury would not stand idly by. It would make the Irish Sea and the North Channel into a fiscal frontier.

I shall now speak about other measures that would contribute to economic regeneration. We can do much for ourselves. The reinvestment and reform initiative (RRI) has given scope for a stronger investment programme. Unfortunately, the Strategic Investment Board (SIB) is not delivering as effectively as I would like it to deliver. You suggest that a peace dividend could add to progress, but I would argue that that should not be used as a substitute for improved local performance.

Therefore, what are the possible foci? Latin scholars will tell me whether there should be a double "i" in "foci" — although looking around the room, I do not think that the skills are in evidence. In your position, have you considered new institutional arrangements for major regeneration plans, led by the right institutions, in the cities of Belfast and Derry? That is high on my list of preferences.

Have you considered extra provision for enhanced levels of skills, vocational training and higher advanced qualifications for up to several thousand more young people each year? Have you thought of the enhanced provision that is necessary for education in the New TSN areas? I have visited some primary schools recently, not 15 miles from here. I will not say to which board a particular school belongs, but it is well funded by the present system, has more applications for enrolment that it can cope with and has more than 600 pupils. The atmosphere and the end result at that school are everything that anyone would wish for. Not 15 miles away, I could take you to primary schools that receive the same funding but will never achieve the same results, because they operate in a milieu that does not allow it. Those schools tell me — and they would tell you — that, by the time that those children are five, six or seven years of age, their behavioural patterns are no longer appropriate for an educational environment. You may say that if schools receive the same funding per pupil, it should be left to the teachers, but I would disagree. Resources must be proportionate to the social need, and we are not doing that.

We can look at extra communications investment, particularly for roads, on which an announcement was made yesterday.

It is fascinating that we have a very poor roads infrastructure. Why? Because we have not given it enough priority. We have to improve our roads structure either by crossing the border, which we did not use to say; or by going to any of the other development areas in Britain. It is not good enough to have a roads system such as ours. Yet there are lobbyists who say that we spend too much on roads. Apart from investment in human beings, no infrastructure investment is more important than roads. Roads infrastructure investment will enhance our reputation elsewhere.

We might have a new approach to the integration of urban and rural needs. I worry that there is something called “rural policy” that stands alone. I know no rural community that stands alone from its urban hinterland or vice versa. We need a much more integrated policy for the many small areas that are more than 15 miles from an urban catchment area.

We need stronger incentives to innovation, research and development and marketing.

My conclusion is that there are challenges that can be met if we harness our local talent. The case for fiscal incentives can be sustained if a wide range of impediments is tackled constructively. Beware the argument that a tax change alone will boost our economy. There is no intrinsic reason that Northern Ireland should lag behind other regions. I am sorry, Mr Chairman, to have taken so long.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Thank you very much, Mr Simpson. I am not remotely surprised that your contribution was entirely on target and extremely interesting and helpful: that has been your track record in Assembly Committees. It seems as though every member of the subgroup wants to question you on your contribution. Can we make our questions sharp and snappy, folks? Time is running against us.

Mr Simpson: Do nothing for a moment, Mr Chairman: my infrastructure has collapsed.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I see that you are referring to your hearing aid.

Mr Simpson: It has come together again.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Can you hear us, Mr Simpson?

Mr Simpson: Mm?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Can you — [Laughter.]

Mr Simpson: When I worked for the Health Service I had a hearing aid, and you all knew that I had a hearing aid, because you could see it. When I began to travel to Brussels, the Germans asked me: “What is that ugly attachment?” They said that I should get one of the hearing aids that I have now. I had to pay for it.

Dr McDonnell: Is Mr Simpson aware that there have perhaps been times when it was official to be slightly deaf?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Perhaps we can get a move on, folks. We will start with Mr McNarry, followed by Mr Weir, Dr Birnie, Ms Gildernew and Mr Neeson. That covers all the parties. We will try to keep it as quick as possible.

Mr McNarry: John, sometimes negativity can be a wake-up call, and I thank you for that, as there was much in what you said that wakened me up. I have three questions. What does the high rise in house prices along with the high increase in the repossession of homes say about our economy?

If a mixed ability group of 15-year-olds asked you what sustainable employment they should consider, how would you answer? Can schools do more than they apparently do at present to help young people with decisions about their future employment?

How important is tourism to our economy? How do you rate its performance? How could a devolved Government help to improve it?

Mr Simpson: House prices are a bête noire of mine. Part of the reason for house prices in Northern Ireland getting out of line with those of neighbouring areas has been explained to me by builders and developers: the cost of new house building on greenfield sites has rocketed because so few are available. It is a beautiful example of the failure of the regional development strategy: it boasted that 60% of houses would be built on brownfield sites, but it is achieving 70%. That is not success; that is failure.

We have a green and pleasant land. I am not inclined to the view that we should allow much more rural housing in isolated units; that would not necessarily be popular. However, I do realise that we are not short of space. We are trying to confine, particularly the Belfast community area, to a population that is lower than that to be housed. Do not be surprised when house prices do what they have done; it is Government policy to push up house prices here. Unfortunately the town planners do not accept that argument. My shorthand response for dealing with this is: “Send for Kate Barker.” Those of you who have read the ‘Barker Review of Housing Supply’ will see that she has brought a fresh mind to the subject.

The second question was about 15-year-olds.

Mr McNarry: John, what about the comparison of house prices and the increase in repossessions?

Mr Simpson: The repossession rate is at its highest for several years. At the rate of 656 per quarter, this means there are 2,500 repossessions per year in a situation where there are around 35,000 housing transactions per year. Repossessions are on the high side, and this is where the planners do have a point. People expect to be able to afford houses from their income, but they bid too high and become overstretched. Therefore, it would not be appropriate to say that this is all the Government’s fault — it is mainly the Government’s fault.

As regards 15-year-olds, you can never tell them what is best for them. However, a large proportion of 15-year-olds, particularly those in inner city areas, are treating the education system as something to be coped with rather than as an advantage.

Every 15-year-old should be told to maximise his talents and go as far as he can. I fall out with those responsible for training arrangements in Northern Ireland when they say to me that there has to be adequate training so that there will be more skilled people to cope with an advancing economy. My question to them is: "Why are you so modest in your ambitions?" The education and training system is not for today's employers, it is for tomorrow's employers, and it is not only for employment that is within a stone's throw of where you go to school. Would you wish to deny anyone who grows up near you or me the right to the full education and training benefits he can absorb even if they take it and use it elsewhere, in places such as France, Bosnia or India?

We have a system that is geared to the needs of today's employers. Let us just look around. I cannot answer the question in respect of individuals.

As regards tourism, we do not deserve to have tourists because of the way our infrastructure has been geared up. How many members of the subgroup have subscribed to and have applauded — as a magnificent development — the Titanic Signature Project for the Titanic Quarter? How many of you think that it will fulfil our ambitions so that tourist liners will tie up to the new berth that is being built and the new facilities that will be provided? The answer is that we have such modesty in our proposals and such slowness in their development that we will be celebrating the Titanic 150 years after it sank rather than 100 years after it sank.

As regards the Giant's Causeway project — how long has it been since the facilities burned down?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It was in 1999.

Mr Simpson: Have you seen the replacement? Is it not wonderful?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is not there.

11.00 am

Mr Simpson: It is not there yet. Did it really take that long? Have you seen the draft plans for the Giant's Causeway in comparison to Glenveagh in Donegal or any other tourist area?

You will smile at this: for my sins, I recently visited the scene of the Battle of Waterloo — no, not on the River Boyne — the Battle of Waterloo. A huge, superb site has been created to attract tourists. Why do we not look for role models for what we should be doing? Yes, we have natural assets, but we are not enhancing them.

Mr McNarry: Hear, hear.

Mr Simpson: If all the questions take as long to answer as that one, you will be here until lunchtime.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes, that is a good point.

Mr McNarry: The questions did not take very long; the answers were the problem. [Laughter.]

Mr Weir: Thank you for your presentation. It was very useful in not only identifying the issues but helping to put them into a degree of perspective.

I wish to ask three questions. You mentioned high levels of economic inactivity as opposed to high levels of unemployment, which is mentioned quite often. All my questions are principally concerned with solutions to problems. First, what actions could the Government take or what changes in regime would lead to a reduction in economic inactivity?

Secondly, I was struck by the slowness of public sector delivery. You mentioned roads as one example. I recently met the Minister of Education, who explained away last year's £69 million underspend by saying that £40 million of that figure was for capital projects. Instead of making some great excuse, the Department of Education — as is symptomatic of many Departments — was not processing its activities or contracts quickly enough to enable schools to be built. What can be done to improve slow public sector delivery?

Thirdly, you mentioned yesterday's roads infrastructure announcement. Leaving aside whether a particular road should have been built, have the right broad structural priorities for roads been identified? If not, where should the focus be? Are stronger economic corridors required? Is the focus on too few single projects or should the overall roads infrastructure be built upon?

I seek your advice on those three points.

Mr Simpson: If we behaved more like other regions, around 6% more of the population would be in the labour market. In households of two or three people, some can choose to be inactive in the labour market. Part of the answer to your question is that the degree of imposed economic inactivity, as opposed to voluntary inactivity, is important.

The short answer is that surveys suggest that a significant proportion, but not a majority, of those who are economically inactive would, given the right circumstances, seek to be in the labour market. By and large, those are people on second incomes. It used to be the case that a high proportion of those people would be single parents, for whom the mixture of benefits and their ability to work was loaded against them.

What should the Government do about that? It is difficult to have a policy to encourage those who are inactive into the labour market unless the system handicaps them. Single parents were handicapped by their situation. There is a problem for rural households that are remote from urban areas, but I cannot go further than that.

Your second question was about infrastructure timing. We must begin to say that, for the last x number of years in Northern Ireland politics, five major political parties have been in Opposition to the Government that is in charge. They have got off remarkably lightly and have not been criticised — or perhaps they have been criticised, but they have not heard it.

The third question was about roads. Various appendices, with information on the roads network, were attached to yesterday's press statement. The strategy for roads infrastructure lacks coherence. The policy seems to be one of build them here, here, here and here. The important thing is that commercial and private users should be able to drive along the transport corridors at a decent speed.

In some places, such as Newry and beyond, what are called "higher quality A1s" are being built; in other places, they are called "expressways", because each significant junction is covered by a flyover. What is wrong? Could it not be that people could commute from Newry to Belfast and from Coleraine to Derry on roads that are of the same standard as those from — dare one say it? — Dublin to the same polar points? I am not saying that the Republic does it better and that Northern Ireland should copy it. However, that is the standard that road users should be able to expect.

Of course, odd bits of development are needed, and those members who travel to Belfast from the north of the Province will have noticed the biggest current development scheme. There is to be a Westlink/York Street flyover to provide a grade-separated junction at the last remaining part of the Westlink that has a traffic signal. That is going to be a complicated project. Those involved need to design the York Street junction so that the traffic can flow in numerous directions. This problem was inevitable since the day on which the Westlink was conceived. Inevitably, a much worse problem will be created when the improvements to the Westlink go as far as Divis Street and stop. The motorway must stop at Divis Street because if it flowed on at those speeds, the York Street junction would not be able to cope. There is no coherence. I hope that I am agreeing with Mr Weir when I say that.

Mr Weir: Yes.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are you happy enough, Mr Weir.

Mr Weir: Very much so.

Dr Birnie: Over the past 50 years, we in Northern Ireland seem to have become good at producing lengthy economic strategies and analyses of problems — indeed, in your background paper, you refer to the part that you played in two such reports in the 1960s.

However, the strategies and analyses do not seem to be fully implemented or adequately evaluated. Why is that? Secondly, the subgroup has taken evidence from a range of witnesses, and, on fiscal incentives, it is being torn in two directions. Some witnesses argued for the lower headline rate of corporation tax, while others argued for the higher tax credits that you mention in your helpful paper. As a professional economist, which do you think would have the greater impact on private sector investment?

Mr Simpson: I shall answer your first question while I think about the answer to your second one. The easy answer to your first question is "Yes". I remember when we were asked to write what became the 'Task Forces for West Belfast and the Greater Shankill' report. One of the councillors at the initial meeting said that his fear was that we would prepare a volume that would either sit heavily on a shelf or would be useful as a doorstop. I am still living with the consequences of that.

The short answer is that there are a lot of people in the public sector who think that, once they have written a strategy paper or a vision paper, whether on general economic progress, innovation, R&D, or training, somebody else will deliver it. We have lost the challenge to senior public servants to deliver policy as well as developing it. There are a lot of examples — I will not use any, in case it gets back to those concerned — of people who, faced with converting policy into operation, make it into a consultancy project. The consultants get called in. If you are going to be one of these high-grade civil servants and cannot convert policy into operational delivery, someone around you should be challenging you, and you should not be left there, if that is your weakness.

Your other point was about fiscal systems. I daresay some of you will agree that the best recent public relations campaign in fiscal events has been the degree to which the Northern Ireland Manufacturing Focus Group has sent out its message. It is horribly flawed, but persuasive.

Mr McNarry: Sounds like DUP policy.

Mr Simpson: They are faced with a choice. Should we have lower company taxes? Would that be more effective than some of these other things? The short answer is that, as long as no one does anything else that is nasty, of the choice that they give I would prefer corporation tax to be lower. However, it is a hypothetical question, because that is not the choice that is open to us.

I know that influence is being exerted on the Chancellor of the Exchequer to try to get him to take a softer view of these things. I was told two years ago to forget about it, as it would never happen. In more recent months I have been told that it might happen.

Would you consider it a success if you got the Assembly up and running, with devolved responsibility for planning the economic future, and for a defined period were allowed, as a concession, to have a corporate tax rate of 10%, 12% or 14% — anything but 12.5%?

A Member: The rate in the Republic.

Mr Simpson: It would be difficult to do, but at the moment it is being held out — and this is what I was referring to when I said not to go for the single solution — as if it were the single solution. It is not. In fact, if it were given to us as a community, and we were not doing any of these other things, we would quickly be asking what had gone wrong.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is very useful. I have been entranced by what you have said.

Mr Neeson: John, you and I share an interest in energy policy, but I am not going to deal with that this morning. You represent Northern Ireland on the European Union's Economic and Social Committee —

Mr Simpson: For another six weeks.

Mr Neeson: What opportunities for, and threats to, the Northern Ireland economy do you see with the enlargement of the European Union? Conversely, with the development of the global economy, is Europe still as important as it has been?

Mr Simpson: To the second question, the answer is “Yes”. The amount of trade in goods, services and people can only increase. If we do not take part in it, that will be to our disadvantage. If we do not develop a more articulate group of people who can speak several European languages, we will lose out. I am guilty myself, but it is a bit late for me to start.

As for your first question, if you raise Northern Ireland issues at the Economic and Social Committee — and, I daresay, at the Committee of the Regions — they will listen politely, then yawn and tell you to go back home and sort it out for yourself. The Peace programme is there; you are not allowed to say “nearly unique”, so let us say it has been “unusual”. We have not exploited it to full advantage, but nonetheless it has been useful.

I do not think that Europe will do any more than open up opportunities to us; it will not come along carrying a bag of goodies that will somehow solve the problems about which I have been trying to convince you. In fact, the problems that I have been talking about are within our own disposition. Therefore, we have got to be there.

11.15 am

I am worried about the expansion of Europe. There are all sorts of signs about eastern Europe and concerns about what expansion is doing to the relocation of certain sectors of industry and to labour migration. Members may have heard the discussion at the weekend about what will happen should Britain become the main immigration point for eastern European migrants who have an entitlement. A very difficult social situation could be created. Who would have thought that Northern Ireland would have been part of the receiving area? If you had told me 10 years ago that Latvians, Poles and Lithuanians would be in either Dungannon or Newry, I would have said that they had a lot more sense. However, they are there.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I will concentrate on those panellists who are sitting on my left, so Ms Gildernew may ask a question.

Ms Gildernew: Mr Simpson, you are very welcome, and thank you for coming.

Given that the Assembly and the institutions that were envisaged in the Good Friday Agreement are not functioning, to what extent is the lack of political stability hampering our economy?

Your points about education were pertinent, given that a quarter of children here live in poverty. Your comment about behavioural patterns making young children no longer suitable for educational requirements was staggering. How much of that comes from the self-fulfilling prophecy of those communities that do not feel that they have the confidence to move away from such attitudes? How much of that is tied into an economy that has been described as dysfunctional?

When I was on the Committee for Social Development, I heard a lot about parity legislation. However, sometimes it is like groundhog day; we have had this conversation with so many British Secretaries of State. Projects such as Sure Start and Home-Start receive mainstream funding in England, Scotland and Wales. We fund projects such as those differently. We need those kinds of projects to lift communities out of the depression in which they find themselves. We lag far behind England, Scotland and Wales on pretty much everything — university places, healthcare provision and roads. We are repeatedly told that we do not pay as much and that there has been a lack of investment in this place over the past 30 years. It would be more realistic to say that that has been the case over the past 80 years. Our circumstances are unique, and we need to catch up.

I would like to tease out how you think that the peace dividend could contribute to that and what you think about security budgets not being spent on infrastructure in areas that were hardest hit by the conflict.

Mr Simpson: You started with the general point about political instability, and then moved on to education. I am talking to this audience, so you do not need me to say it, but people outside Northern Ireland think that we are a very odd group of people and that we have —

Mr Weir: I noticed that you looked at me when you said that. [Laughter.]

Ms Gildernew: I thought that that look was very well placed.

Dr McDonnell: People can understand why Jim Wells is in the DUP, but nobody can understand why Peter and Nelson joined.

Mr Weir: We cannot understand why Jim Wells is in the DUP.

Mr Simpson: Chairman, do they treat you like this all the time?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes. It is because I am on the green wing of the DUP.

Dr McDonnell: These johnny-come-latelys are uppity.

Mr Simpson: We are not regarded as a settled, stable western European community, and that is a handicap. If a company were planning a major manufacturing investment — which is rare nowadays — and contemplating coming to Northern Ireland, it would ask how one could be sure that the country has settled. After all, there have been 30 or 34 years of trouble — more, if you want to take it from the Linenhall Street student sit-down, which I missed by a day. There is no getting away from that, and people sitting with you must encourage you to find answers to the questions that we are not discussing this morning.

We must talk about educational priorities and motivation in areas of need, and I have mouthed that many times in recent years. I spent a morning with a group of school principals from the Shankill area in preparation for the other paper that came out recently. It would be wrong to say that those principals are demotivated, but they no longer expect to be dealing with young people who are motivated to achieve. The teachers in the classroom feel that they cannot remonstrate with wee Johnny — or, for neutrality, wee Seamus — because his da will come up to the school and tell the teacher to leave his son alone. A common complaint from teachers in the classroom is that they can no longer expect back-up with regard to their delivery mechanisms.

One cannot get round that by saying that they have the same money per pupil as the affluent school down the road. That is not an answer. Those of you who have experience of education and library boards — they will be gone soon, will they not? — will know that the issue is there, and has been for a whole generation.

I have every admiration for one or two of those principals. I did not think that those sorts of problems existed in primary schools. I thought that they existed only in secondary schools. However, the primary school principals told me that I did not need to go to secondary schools to see them — the problems set in at an earlier stage. It is unbelievably important that something be done about that. We put it heavily in the West Belfast and Shankill reports, and to the best of my knowledge it has not made a button of difference.

Mr McCausland: I cannot argue with that.

Ms Gildernew: Do you see the peace dividend, then, being spent not just on big capital projects but on investment in people?

Mr Simpson: For the first time, Northern Ireland has sources of capital way beyond the imagination of those who were in Government here in the 1960s. If you had told them that they could borrow capital over 20 to 25 years or that they could opt for PFI, they would not have believed you. Their money had to come out of a conventional budget.

The figures that you are criticising show that capital expenditure by Northern Ireland Departments has broken £1,000 million for the first time ever. I have been watching it for the past two or three years. It was slow to take off, but it has now taken off. We have proven to my satisfaction — and perhaps to yours — that the building industry has the capacity to build up this capital programme. The civil servants' initial answer was that the building industry would not do it; its throughput could not be increased by 50%. The short answer is that it was possible.

The same thing happened in the Republic of Ireland — I was going to say in Dublin — where building output was increased by 50% and is still growing. In the Republic 60,000 houses are built a year; we are building 14,000 a year. Has it four times the population? What do you think? Spending on capital is important; but, ironically, it does not go down well with the Treasury and the Department of Finance and Personnel. I would like some of the peace dividend spent on staffing and professional input, not all on bricks and mortar.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr McElduff is not here, so I will move on to Dr McDonnell.

Dr McDonnell: John, thank you very much. As the Chairman said, your presentation was electric, and it covered most bases.

I am not much good at theoretical concepts, but I am interested in outcomes. I would like to focus briefly on whether there are opportunities in, and how they can be focused on, the areas of R&D, new technology and university pull-out. How do we get that right? It is half working — or quarter working — for us at the moment. My simple view is that unless one or two more flagships like Andor Technology are established, we will not break through. We can work on the economy in general terms, but it is the champions that make the difference.

To go from the sublime to the ridiculous, from the new text of R&D to food, are there opportunities for us in food production?

Mr Simpson: I will start with your point about R&D and flagships. The more companies like Andor Technology that we find the better. Nobody would object to that sort of “university spin-out into industry” structure. It is creating more and more tension, particularly in the main English universities — and perhaps the Scottish ones as well. We must exploit what is there.

However, I would be a little bit modest because we have only two universities — some would say that we have three; forgive me, I am not being rude to the Open University. With such a large range of issues involved, those two universities cannot be the answer, nor can they be the equivalent of the University of Birmingham or the University of Warwick, so do not expect too much from them. On the other hand, do not leave such a development to happen of its own accord. It must be encouraged.

The arrival of Prof Gregson at Queen’s University has been interesting. He developed his expertise in university deployment into industrial development, R&D and science parks at the University of Southampton. He is a force worth having.

Unfortunately, there was a period when the two universities played selfishly, one against the other, in this exercise. I would have thought that as new vice chancellors have been appointed at both the University of Ulster and Queen’s University the time has come to encourage them to do a bit more. They should not be shy if the net result is that they take up alliances with some departments and universities outside Northern Ireland. This is a more complicated set of arrangements than simply finding the man involved in electrical engineering at Queen’s University who can give his technology to a company such as Andor Technology. We must encourage it, and we must demonstrate success stories.

What was your second point?

Dr McDonnell: Do you think that the competition between the two universities is as intense as it was?

Mr Simpson: I do not think that it will be.

Dr McDonnell: Is that not maturing?

Mr Simpson: Some sort of competition between academics — “I am better than you” — is no bad thing, but competition as to what will happen in which facility is a bit of a waste.

Dr McDonnell: The other question was about food.

Mr Simpson: I noted with interest the study on the food industry led by Dan Flinter.

The scope does not seem to exist, or if it does, they have not found it. We are a commodity food producer. We work one step down the processing line. If you ask the dairy industry and the milk processors what more they can do to add value and gain an international market, they have great difficulty in telling you where their ambition lies. The dairy industry is under serious threat. Dairy farmers believe that they are getting very low prices at the moment, and they are right. The reasons for that are that partly due to European policy, which is partly offset by single farm payments, so that it is not entirely a one-way ticket.

11.30 am

We need greater success in dairy farming and in red meat farming. During the hassle of recent years, the red meat industry did not lose money. It was never under the same threat as the dairy processors. It seems to me that there is scope for success in that sector. The old story that we were taught as children says that we are good at growing grass. In the next 10 years, as the climate changes, Scotland and Ireland — the whole of the island — may have the advantage of having some of the best grass-growing areas of Europe. We may become a good grass-growing area with a plentiful supply of rain. Did you ever think that you would hear that that was our advantage?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will allocate another five minutes for this discussion. Mr McElduff is not back in his place, so Mr Dallat is next, then Mr McElduff and Mr Ford. I try to give every party a fair crack of the whip. This is fascinating stuff; I could sit here until midnight and still not be bored. However, the difficulty is that the Department is waiting to come in. Can we try to get through this as quickly as possible?

Mr Dallat: There is an argument that tax breaks and fiscal incentives are really a reward to existing businesses, rather than something that might encourage new initiatives. That applies particularly to small businesses. What advice would you give to a new Assembly to address that issue?

Mr Simpson: The starting proposition is correct. The main benefit of a tax change normally applies to existing businesses, which are certainties. It will apply to people who are not there, provided they come. Will that make a difference so that more of them come? The short answer is that there will not be more of those businesses coming to Northern Ireland if the infrastructure, skills and other problems that are on the table are not solved. We have to solve those problems.

As for small businesses, the tax system is already loaded so as to hit small firms more lightly. If the Assembly existed, you might want to consider how you could make that lighter still. I am not sure how you would do that. In theory, when you get round to reviewing rating policy as it applies to businesses — and I mean rating policy for all businesses, not just manufacturing — it might be within your discretion to take into account variables such as size and location. That is worth thinking about. The basic question that you have to answer is: if you want to abolish corporation tax — which will cost £200 million — on what will you not spend £200 million?

Some people think that efficiency savings are easily made, but it is not so. It may be necessary to change the structure of Government, but that will not be because great efficiency savings have been made.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): To keep within our time, I ask Mr Ford, Mr McElduff and Mr McCausland to restrict themselves to one question, and then Mr Simpson can finish by answering them.

Mr McElduff: I am interested in your views on the education and skills strategy. You said that it was about the needs of tomorrow's employers.

Mr Simpson: As well as today's.

Mr McElduff: In relation to the South, how has the education and skills strategy contributed to the success of the economy?

Mr Simpson: Do you want me to stack that one?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes, and then Mr Ford and Mr McCausland.

Mr Ford: You said that we do not deserve tourists. Is that the fault of the public sector or the private sector? Who should be addressing it?

Mr McCausland: It was said earlier that there were issues around scale and speed of delivery in relation to major signature projects. How do we address that? Where does the problem lie, and how do we put it right?

Mr Simpson: Questions two and three run together.

With regard to Mr McElduff's question about the skills strategy, one of the models many of us have watched with interest has been the development of the regional institutes in the Republic. The young up-and-coming economist Garret Fitzgerald and I share the view that the regional institutes have made a significant impact. I recently heard Garret expound that argument to an audience of Northern businesspeople.

We have been, and are, too slow. We now have a strategy paper for the further education (FE) colleges. I believe it is called 'FE means business'. How are we going to embody this? The number of FE colleges is to be reduced from 16 to six. Is that cause and effect? I do not follow. It may be that the six is desirable. Who is going to give the new momentum to the FE colleges? I am involved in a small way with the skills group, so I have to plead interest.

The short answer is that the FE colleges still, to a large extent, determine for themselves what they offer. That cannot be right. It is almost as bad as the universities doing the same thing.

Mr Dallat: Or the schools.

Mr Simpson: The FE sector has chosen the six key vocational areas that the colleges should concentrate on. I have seen the list; it is impressive, and in roughly the right areas. One would not dispute it much. They told me that the six areas had been successful. I looked at the figures, and five of the six have not gone up. One has gone up quite significantly. That, for me, shows the degree to which there is no adequate challenge to make sure that improvements happen.

Moving on to tourism, and whether to blame the public or the private sector: I listen to every major policy statement made by the Tourist Board. I read their documents carefully, and know to use the phrase "signature project". However, I do not have a feeling of coherence — that there is a group who are giving leadership.

It so happened that we picked on the Giant's Causeway. I would also pick on the Titanic project. The one example that is under-exploited, but moving nonetheless, is the city of Derry, which has the potential to be drowned by tourists. It is a walled city that has developed some of its cultural institutions and buildings, such as the Fifth Province heritage centre. They have shown imagination.

It is not simply a question of public sector versus private. Where the public sector is needed, are we encouraging it and doing it the right way?

With regard to tourism and the Titanic Quarter, members should see the berth at which cruise ships tie up in Belfast harbour. Would you take your aged aunt to visit that berth? Not a chance! When tourists dock there, the first thing that they probably want to do is get on a bus and leave. That is not the way in which a tourism industry should be run. The blame lies with all the institutions, both public and private. We are allowing market forces to increase tourism, which is about right. However, market forces are not integrating public assets and policy with the private sector. I am not trying to make another million-pound capital gain for Billy Hastings or any other hotel owner.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Thank you for a fascinating presentation.

Mr Simpson: Please do not tell the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Industry (DETI) that I was here.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I am sorry; we neglected to tell you that representatives from it slipped in about 40 minutes ago.

Mr Simpson: Did they? Of all the dirty tricks!

The Chairman (Mr Wells): You will receive a Hansard report of your presentation, which you can check. Once again, we appreciate all your help.

We are running over time, but it has been justified. I can chair only the first two sessions, but Mr Molloy has agreed to chair the third, so I will slip out when DETI has finished giving its evidence.

I welcome Wilfie Hamilton, Graeme Hutchinson and Stephen Quinn. Mr Quinn moved to DETI from the Department of the Environment (DOE), via the Department for Regional Development (DRD) — a less complex Department than the DOE, if I may say so. You will have received our terms of reference. As you saw with Mr Simpson, there will be an opening presentation and then there will be an opportunity for members to ask questions. That should last one hour. We are grateful to you for coming at such short notice to provide evidence to the subgroup.

Mr Stephen Quinn (Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment): Thank you for the invitation. Wilfie Hamilton is the deputy secretary on the policy side of the Department; and Graeme Hutchinson is the head of the economics division. We will address the three elements of the terms of reference, as requested. However, first, we thought that we would offer a high-level overview of the Northern Ireland economy, starting with slide 4 of the presentation.

The slide shows some of the positive trends that we have observed. There have been improvements in economic growth, employment and manufacturing output. The growth in employment and output in private services is particularly striking. That has resulted in some welcome convergence towards the UK average gross value added per capita. However, that figure should carry a health warning: it is heavily skewed by the performance of London, the south-east and the east of England, which are areas of high economic growth. If we were to remove that element from the UK average figures, Northern Ireland's performance would be seen in a more positive and realistic light.

Similarly, in the Republic of Ireland, one assumes that levels of economic growth in greater Dublin are more rapid than in counties Leitrim, Roscommon, Donegal, and so forth.

11.45 am

The bottom line is that Northern Ireland no longer sits at the very bottom of the UK regional economic league, although it is towards the bottom. Northern Ireland is now about third from the bottom, just above Wales and the north-east of England.

The subgroup's terms of reference highlight the fact that difficulties and impediments to local economic growth exist. Slide 7 focuses on the relatively low productivity in the private sector. While the Department attaches particular importance to that issue, that is not a criticism of the private sector or an attempt to deflect attention away from the public sector.

The main reason for low productivity is that Northern Ireland is not well represented in the highest-value-added sectors of the economy. I emphasise that point because some public debate on the Northern Ireland economy suggests that, if the politicians were to reach a political settlement and Ministers and Departments were to sort out public policy, everything would simply fall into place. The business sector has a dynamic role to play, which, coincidentally, is reflected in an article in today's 'News Letter' by Frank Bryan, Chairman of the Institute of Directors, where he balanced the three legs of the stool very well. Business also has a job to do.

The problem with our economic structure is illustrated in slide 8; the slide is a little complicated, but the basic message is clear. Northern Ireland is under-represented in business services, in the finance and communications sectors, which, typically, deliver high-value-added and high productivity. Conversely, Northern Ireland is over-represented in construction, agriculture and public services, which is why the rate of economic growth and GDP per capita is not as high as we would like it to be.

Slide 9 demonstrates another problem, which was mentioned by John Simpson. Northern Ireland has a disproportionately high level of economic inactivity in the working-age population. Indeed, we cannot even hide behind the UK average. When the UK is disaggregated into its constituent regions, Northern Ireland has, by some degree, the highest levels of economic inactivity. Not only does that impose significant costs on the economy through the social security system, but it represents a potential loss of productive capacity. Some people could contribute more actively to output, especially at a time when the labour market is tight. During John Simpson's evidence session, the subgroup touched on the fact that Northern Ireland imports foreign labour for tourism and the construction industry.

The subgroup's terms of reference also refer to fiscal incentives being used to encourage foreign direct investment (FDI) and indigenous development. The key points are shown in slide 11. FDI firms in Northern Ireland have higher productivity rates than indigenous firms. That is not a criticism of indigenous firms or their employees: FDI firms are larger, invest more heavily in technology and have management practices that are more advanced by virtue of their size and sophistication.

Also, when FDI firms come to Northern Ireland, they tend to operate in sectors with higher value added and which have the most going for them.

Invest Northern Ireland (INI), which attracts criticism from time to time — and I know that Leslie Morrison has been a witness for this subgroup — has been relatively successful in attracting FDI to Northern Ireland. That success is because INI seeks to do its job professionally and because Northern Ireland has been, and is still, permitted to offer slightly higher rates of support to FDI firms.

As the subgroup will know, Northern Ireland and Invest Northern Ireland inevitably tend to suffer in comparison to the Republic of Ireland. However, the same could be said about virtually every region of the European Union. The Republic of Ireland has been uniquely successful in attracting foreign direct investment. The comparison between Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland is relevant but can be harsh given the differences between the two jurisdictions.

The debate on fiscal incentives has focused largely, but not exclusively, on corporation tax and particularly on the comparison of the headline rate with the Republic of Ireland. It is worth noting that although the UK's headline rate of corporation tax is 30%, SMEs pay the 19% rate, and John Simpson hinted at that earlier. The vast majority, somewhere in excess of 70%, of firms indigenous to Northern Ireland fall into that category and therefore pay corporation tax at 19%. Looking at the headline rate comparison does not tell the full story. When effective rate comparisons and all relevant considerations are taken into account, the gap still advantages the Republic of Ireland. However, the gap is not as wide as when simply looking at the two headline corporation tax rates.

R&D tax credits are already available throughout the United Kingdom. The Economic Development Forum (EDF) commissioned research on whether higher rates of tax credits would have a significantly positive impact on the Northern Ireland economy. It is fair to say that the results were interesting but not overwhelmingly positive. There is some evidence that small firms in particular are simply not attracted to the application process for tax credits, which they find slightly intimidating. There is, therefore, still a preference for grants over tax credits, even for R&D firms. It was, therefore, not obvious that even if higher tax credits were available in Northern Ireland, they would have a major transformational impact on the economy. The Department of Finance and Personnel (DFP) is still in discussion with the Treasury on that matter. The research has been made available to DFP, and it is exploring the potential of tax credits with the Treasury.

Slide 13 of the presentation relates to the third element of the subgroup's terms of reference: a positive economic package and how that might be delivered. I place particular emphasis on the second part of that sentence. This subgroup has already taken evidence from the Northern Ireland Business Alliance, is due to hear from the Industrial Task Force and has probed John Simpson on fiscal incentives etc. DETI has also been talking to those agencies, which are either collectively or individually represented on the Economic Development Forum.

It is worth reflecting on the context in which an economic package would be proposed, if that is what the subgroup is going to do. First, to make an obvious point, Northern Ireland is part of a unified taxation and public expenditure system, with only local taxation subject to variation.

Secondly, Northern Ireland public expenditure remains relatively high compared to the UK average. Our argument has always been, and will continue to be, that that reflects higher levels of social and economic need in Northern Ireland. Therefore, the higher level of per capita expenditure can be objectively justified.

It is worth reminding ourselves, however, that we are no longer at the very bottom of the UK regional economic league; we are third from bottom. Those factors are likely to shape the UK Government's view — from a London perspective — of any proposals that are made.

Finally, at the session at which Leslie Morrison gave evidence, Mitchel McLaughlin may have made the point that, if regional tax variations are being contemplated, there may be an EU state aid hurdle to surmount. I think that there was a similar case in the Azores, but I am not intimate with the detail.

I laboured those points a little, because when you read the third criterion in the subgroup's terms of reference, the issue is not only how a package might be structured but how it might be delivered. There is both a political test and a technical test to be met. You must clear a political hurdle with the UK Government when you argue that Northern Ireland should be in the unique position within the UK of being granted such a package. You might also need to look at technical issues. If variations in corporation-tax rates are granted, how do you stop people from relocating from one part of the UK to this part of the UK, simply to avoid tax?

Assuming that those hurdles can be overcome, we would like to see the package constructed around the four key economic drivers that were identified in 'Economic Vision for Northern Ireland': innovation; enterprise; skills; and infrastructure. Members are obviously familiar with their importance. Therefore, the greatest benefit to the Northern Ireland regional economy would be for any package to be built explicitly around those four drivers.

The final slide is a bit narrow, in that it focuses exclusively on DETI interests. As part of any wider package that might focus on the four drivers, DETI will promote high-quality investment through Invest Northern Ireland, improve telecommunications, develop the energy market and invest in tourism, particularly in product development. They are services that would be of some value.

I just wish to emphasise that that is not the Department's final word on the subject, or even its most important word. If an economic package for Northern Ireland is to be developed, it should be broader than what is outlined in the last slide and should identify, for example, the components that relate to skills and economic infrastructure. The former falls more into DEL's remit and the latter more into DRD's remit.

I have given a very broad and quick response to your terms of reference, Chairman. I hope that it has been of some help. We will do our best to assist the subgroup further by answering its questions.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is also a very well targeted response. The subgroup appreciates that you have homed in on its three criteria. Various members have asked to speak, but I will give priority to the left-hand side of the room, which asked the tail end of the questions to the previous witness.

Ms Gildernew: I am not fixated with FDI. That may be due to the fact that I represent Fermanagh and South Tyrone, where we have not seen an awful lot of it. It is important that we see more support for indigenous companies that provide sustainable employment. Mr Quinn, you glossed over the fact that FDI does not tend to stick around for ever. That fact needs to be acknowledged.

How are you engaging with other Departments in the North, such as the Department of Education and the Department for Employment and Learning, and with Departments in the South to try to turn around economic inactivity? The fact that we have the highest levels of economic inactivity is a damning indictment of us all. Some of that may be down to areas such as Strabane, which was considered an economic black spot, but there are many economically inactive people in areas where there is employment.

The Strategic Investment Board's investment delivery framework states that one of its priorities is a society based on partnership, equality, inclusion, regional balance and mutual respect. To what extent does that factor into your work?

Your tourism slide referred to investment in signature projects. Has the Ulster Canal made it onto your list of signature projects? As a cross-border infrastructure investment that will eventually link Coleraine with Limerick through our inland waterways, it is a huge project. What is your thinking on that?

12.00 noon

Mr Quinn: I will kick off and my colleagues will come in as necessary. I would like to make a point about economic inactivity. One of the reasons that Northern Ireland has a high number of economically inactive people is that many of our people are in full-time education. It is not all bad news. Nonetheless, I agree with you that it is a significant problem for us as a regional economy.

Ms Gildernew: You also heard John Simpson speak about children in primaries 1, 2 and 3 who were already showing signs of being economically inactive. That needs to be addressed. We cannot gloss over the huge problems in our education system and in our communities that lead to such economic inactivity.

Mr Quinn: You asked what we do to connect with other Departments. You probably realise that the Department for Employment and Learning has the policy lead in this issue and that it has its hands on most of the policy levers. The Department for Employment and Learning, Invest Northern Ireland and the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment have standing liaison meetings. At our meeting last week we considered the supply of people with information and communication technology (ICT) skills to the Northern Ireland labour market, although I realise that that may not be germane to your question. I am glad to say that we received a very positive, practical, problem-solving response from the Department for Employment and Learning.

There is at least a mechanism to ensure that policy and service delivery connections exist across the board.

Mr Wilkie Hamilton (Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment): You are absolutely right to say that we need to do much better. So much of our economic inactivity is related to a lack of skills and education — many people do not seem to have the skills to get into the labour market. That is why the economic vision refers to going back to the primary education curriculum and building up from there. We need a coherent approach; if we do not have one, we will fail.

Through measures such as exchanges between the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment, the Department of Education and the Department for Employment and Learning, we have tried to build a sense of economic enterprise into the curriculum. That is our focus. As part of our work on North/South economic co-operation, we have examined the issue with the Department for Employment and Learning and the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Employment in Dublin. There are important lessons to be learnt, because there are serious skills shortages in our economy across the board, North and South.

That is why economic inactivity is highlighted along with low productivity as being the two big curses that hold back the economy and why tackling economic inactivity is central to the economic vision. The economic vision centres on the work of several Departments, because we need a coherent approach.

Mr Quinn: I have two quick points. Some of Invest Northern Ireland's programmes reach directly into schools. Invest Northern Ireland's annual business and corporate plans also set testing targets for locating investment in New TSN areas. At 50%, 60% or 70%, the targets are high. There has been, and continues to be, a significant attempt to ensure that investment is spread in a balanced way. Think back to last December, for instance, when the Secretary of State announced a substantial industrial investment in Derry, of more than £20 million in Seagate Technology (Ireland) Ltd.

There has been an attempt to spread investment, but I take your point — recently a factory closed in Lisnaskea in your constituency. That is obviously a cause for concern.

Ms Gildernew: What are your signature projects in tourism?

Mr Quinn: The direct and candid answer to your question is that the Ulster Canal is not among the six listed signature projects; there would have to be a change of policy in the classification to include it.

The Ulster Canal would involve a significant capital investment, which could be upwards of £60 million, perhaps even into three figures. That would be an extensive capital project, and even if the policy classification were changed, there would still be the issue of budget affordability.

Mr Hamilton: The Ulster Canal has been on the agenda for several years on a cross-departmental basis. The figure that I have seen was much higher than £60 million. It depends on how you approach the project — a start could be made and the project could be tackled on a modular basis. It is being talked about, but it has not been included in the tourism signature project.

In spite of what John Simpson may have suggested earlier, the tourism programme is a genuine attempt to produce a coherent framework. We have said that Northern Ireland has not invested in its tourism product for a very long time, for obvious reasons. In situations where European funding has been available for projects, private promoters have not come forward, have withdrawn after having come forward, or have not met the timescales that they said they would meet because it is still a high-risk business. There is still a high degree of market failure. It is therefore important for us to promote tourism. However, the signature projects were a way of creating a ring of projects around Northern Ireland in order to make it attractive to the visitor, and they were developed as part of a coherent approach.

Dr Graeme Hutchinson (Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment): A point was made initially about competitiveness and foreign direct investment. If FDI is coming to Northern Ireland on the basis of cost, firms will be footloose and will move quickly when costs rise, which will be to our disadvantage.

Evidence points to the fact that if companies are locating in Northern Ireland or in any other region with a good skills base and where they can tap into local supply chains, the embedment in the local regional economy is much stronger. That applies in situations where firms are locating not for costs, but for skills and other wider value-added purposes.

Ms Gildernew: That is the reason for the impact on the textiles industry. Firms can find skills elsewhere if costs reduce on a global scale.

Mr McNarry: You are very welcome, Mr Quinn. I found your overview of particular interest. Conforming to the Chairman's rule about three questions, I wish to raise a point of curiosity. In recent years, has a direct rule Minister ever asked you to prepare a response to similar issues such as those that this subgroup has put to you?

Mr Quinn: As I only arrived at the Department in January, I am ill equipped to answer that question, which is perhaps a crafty way of passing it to Mr Hamilton.

Mr Hamilton: Each time a Minister wishes to talk about a policy initiative or wishes to do something different, we have a situation such as this. Certainly, when it comes to budgetary responses, Ministers ask us for suggestions that we can put forward to the national budgetary debate. This situation is a very concerted form of that. The context is slightly different in that in this situation, there may be arguably a unique window of opportunity for politicians to come together and say, "We think that this would help Northern Ireland to make the transition from where we are now to where we want to be."

Mr McNarry: I am conscious that this may be unique, but I would have thought that a Minister would be doing the obvious in addressing similar points. Therefore, in light of what Mr Hamilton has said, is it possible that the subgroup could see some papers on your responses to the Minister's questions similar to the ones we are asking? The reason that I ask that is that we rely on a Minister to bat for us in the Budget. I do not believe that direct rule Ministers do bat for us, but I am open to seeing the evidence that they have done so.

Moving on from that, if a Minister were to have asked you to address the three issues, would you have given the same presentation that you have given to the Committee? This is a terrible presentation, and you have not backed it up. The arguments that would be valuable to this subgroup seem to be very weak.

This subgroup is charged with reporting to the Preparation for Government Committee, which is likely to encourage an Assembly debate as a result of that report. Is it possible — and I am sure that it is — for you to present some written arguments, particularly on terms of reference 2 and 3, that would helpfully contribute to the subgroup's report to the Committee? That would be valuable for any Assembly debate.

Written arguments would assist the subgroup in making its report, which will be recognised and, it is hoped, adopted in potential negotiations between the parties, individually and perhaps collectively, and the Government. Those negotiations will particularly focus, as I am, on extracting an economic package that will benefit Northern Ireland.

I would have hoped that you could have backed up your arguments. Your presentation addressed terms of reference 1 and 2 in relation to the economic package. I appreciate that you have only been with the Department for a short while, Mr Quinn, but your predecessors would have assisted Ministers in negotiating budget allocations for years. I would have hoped that your presentation would have reflected that and that you would have given the subgroup some idea of the arguments that departmental officials have made to Ministers.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I am having difficulty in identifying your question.

Mr McNarry: The question is whether the Department can present arguments, particularly on terms of reference 2 and 3, that would be useful in extracting an economic package to benefit Northern Ireland.

Mr Quinn: I do not want to duck the question simply because I arrived at the Department in January. Looking back over my longer career in the Northern Ireland Civil Service, when I worked in the Department of Finance and Personnel, I regarded it as part of my job, quite frankly, to extract moneys from the Treasury over and above the product of the Barnett formula. We were successful in that for years, so there was never any lack of willingness.

The Peace programme benefited from 100% additionality from the European Union, including the co-funding element from the UK Government, and the Chancellor's package of 1998 provided capital allowances, et cetera. I am afraid that I must take issue with Mr McNarry about there being a lack of enthusiasm.

Mr McNarry: I did not suggest that there was a lack of enthusiasm; I do not see the arguments — that is what I am seeking.

Mr Quinn: We are in a slightly awkward constitutional position, in that we work for Ministers, and you are asking for arguments that will be put to Ministers.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): To be fair to the Department, it cannot be seen to be a cheerleader for a change in policy, which is what you are asking them to do, Mr McNarry.

Mr McNarry: With due respect, I am asking the Department to present some evidence where a Minister has been the cheerleader for Northern Ireland in extracting finance and making arguments for Northern Ireland. I think that the public will support me when I say that there is no evidence of that, but, if there were, they would like to see it.

Mr Hamilton: We normally deal with public expenditure through spending reviews. In that situation, Northern Ireland Ministers negotiate, as Stephen said, for the best deal possible for Northern Ireland. That is what we are talking about, and that is the context in which the Department works. We continually negotiate financial packages every year. That is part of the normal process and that is how it works everywhere — everybody is doing the same thing.

As far as this case is concerned, when the Northern Ireland Business Alliance and the parties met the Department to talk about a package, it was a different scenario in that the package recognised the circumstances of Northern Ireland and what might be done to help Northern Ireland establish itself and go forward. The difference was that this was not the normal spending review process.

The Secretary of State has said that he wants to hear the views of the political parties, and the Chancellor has offered to engage on the issues. That is where the slight difficulty lies for the Department in constructing an agenda that is taken up with London. The Department is happy to assist the work of the subgroup in whatever way it can, but it would be slightly awkward for the Department to create the agenda.

Mr Quinn: The subgroup has done the right thing by inviting the Northern Ireland Business Alliance, the Industrial Task Force and people such as John Simpson for their views, because they are in a position to give you advice, whereas we are constitutionally constrained. I am sorry about that, Mr McNarry; it is certainly not a lack of co-operation.

Mr McNarry: I understand your position fully. However, if the subgroup could see some evidence of what the Minister asked when dealing with the same questions, it would be helpful in constructing a process for the future.

Dr McDonnell: I hope that I can be quick. I am returning to the question that I asked John Simpson, which concerned funding for R&D and the development of new technologies. I believe that value-added, high-wage jobs will come from the universities in those areas. Which Department is responsible for funding and promoting R&D? Is it DETI or DEL? Which Department is responsible for working with organisations such as QUBIS Ltd and UUTech Ltd? Does their funding come from DETI or DEL? In other words, where does the rubber hit the road, because I am deeply disappointed that Government are not investing in QUBIS Ltd or, to a lesser extent, in UUTech Ltd? They are starved of funding. Government can pay all the lip service they like to the need for more R&D, but those are the flagship R&D bodies operating at the cutting edge. If they are dying or withering or not working, nothing else will work.

Mr Quinn: I agree absolutely that Northern Ireland could do with more companies such as Andor Technology Ltd. It is a flagship company, and DETI would like to see many more like it. It is worthwhile recording the point that business expenditure on R&D tends to have a more direct and positive impact on the regional economy than university R&D. That is not to decry university R&D, but it tends to be further away from the market.

Dr McDonnell: We quite agree with you.

Mr Quinn: I made those two observations by way of background.

Mr Hamilton: You are absolutely right to say that this is a rich area for change. Northern Ireland needs to do better. Every region in the world feels that it should be doing better, so the question is how can distinctive change be brought about in Northern Ireland. It goes back to what we said earlier about the need to be more coherent. It is all to do with how science and similar subjects are approached in schools and universities, and how university research is taken forward. Are there enough PhD students? Are there enough researchers in universities? How can that research be commercialised? How can things be improved? Is additional funding needed to make it possible to develop more companies such as Andor Technology Ltd?

Funding is split between a number of sources. DETI and DEL have a role in it, but other Departments fund research also. For example, the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety funds research into health technology. I suspect that it would be easy to make a case for additional funding for R&D. Of course, there may be limits — it must be sensible funding. DETI is involved in the US/Ireland concordat for research, which is an important development. It is in its infancy. Where is it going to go?

There is both a qualitative and quantitative dimension. Dr McDonnell is right to highlight the issue, and I suspect that if DETI were to bring forward new suggestions, research and funding would be an area on which we would want us to focus.

Mr Quinn: Invest Northern Ireland's budget for innovation, which includes provision for R&D, is approximately £40 million. That might be an area where more could be done. However, realistic figures are in the tens of millions, not double or treble that. There is always the risk of money chasing projects, which can lead to compromised quality.

Mr Hamilton: Changes such as those would be important to the R&D sector, where DETI has been spending approximately £9 million or £10 million on the Higher Education Innovation Fund (HEIF) and approximately £5 million on the Proof of Concept programme. Even if that were doubled, it would not be a huge amount of money, but it is hugely important in this context. As I say, it is all relative to public expenditure priorities.

Dr Hutchinson: The problem is quite easy to understand. I concur that R&D and innovation are the most important drivers for value-added activity. The problem is that Northern Ireland has so few firms conducting R&D. The Department carries out an R&D survey and receives little more than 300 returns. That is the number of firms that are serious about R&D. We must widen the base and encourage those firms that are already carrying out R&D to do more. We are working with the Economic Development Forum, and collaboration seems to be an issue. Northern Ireland is an SME economy. We need to hook up with further education rather than higher education and try to get commercialisation of R&D to the marketplace.

Dr McDonnell: If all those things were to be done, there is still the eye of the needle — that is, we are not investing in the narrow alleyway from university out to the street. QUBIS and UUTech are not high enough priorities. They are like the tails of the universities.

Mr Hamilton: There is no doubt that funding is an issue. If funding were to be increased, we could probably do more across the board, not only in the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment. Pre-seed funding and such matters that are related to the early stages of a process are particularly tricky.

Dr McDonnell: I am talking about core funding for QUBIS rather than funding per project. Does core funding come from DETI?

Mr Quinn: Core funding for universities comes from the Department for Employment and Learning.

Dr Hutchinson: Higher education R&D is higher in Northern Ireland than in other parts of the UK, and indeed Europe. Business expenditure on R&D is lower in Northern Ireland than anywhere else.

Mr Hamilton: The economic vision wants the business community and the political parties to sit down with Government and tell us what we are doing well with skills or innovation, where the gaps are, and how those matters sit in relation to one another. Northern Ireland is a small region, and that is a key issue. If you had representatives from the two universities, from two or three Departments and two or three key individuals from the private sector, you could identify your policy gaps and take action. The fact that the region is small should be decisive in relation to our responsiveness.

Mr Ford: I want to follow the R&D point slightly further. You have highlighted the low uptake of tax credits on R&D, which is a function of our SME economy. Whose duty is it to build networks that will promote collaboration and encourage small businesses? If we assume that there is not much footloose FDI floating around that is available to us — other witnesses have told us that we must grow our existing firms — one option must be to grow at the micro level.

Mr Quinn: Invest Northern Ireland is the leading agent on that issue. R&D programmes such as Compete are designed to encourage the quantity and quality of R&D in Northern Ireland. It is an uphill struggle because of our SME structure. SMEs see R&D as a cost rather than an investment, and they are reluctant to become involved. Smaller firms are reluctant to engage in the bureaucracy and red tape of applying for a tax credit. Northern Ireland firms are more grant-oriented than tax-credit-oriented.

Mr Hamilton: That consideration is not unique to Northern Ireland. It is a complex process. We tend to talk about R&D or innovation on that side of the spectrum. Michelle spoke about our indigenous businesses, and process innovation is hugely important. It may well be that we need to make small companies work better, help them to change their processes and see market opportunities.

Therefore it is important that we do both in the spectrum of innovation. Research and development and process innovation are necessary to make them better companies.

Mr Ford: May I ask a further question, since I did so badly last time.

You said that the employment structure, specifically in agriculture, is a low value added, but significant, section of Northern Ireland's economy. The advantages that we have in certain aspects of agriculture may be crucial in Europe in future — John Simpson highlighted our ability to turn rain into grass. Obviously there is the question of adding value through microfarm diversification, but significant work is also necessary to add value to agricultural produce at the macrolevel. Whose function is it to carry that through, and what ideas does the Department have?

Mr Quinn: The interest in and locus of that subject cross departmental boundaries. Invest Northern Ireland and DETI have an interest in the food sector, as does the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development (DARD). Some time ago DETI and DARD set up the Food Strategy Implementation Partnership (FSIP), which has produced ideas about how best to develop the food sector. The Departments are thinking about those at the moment. However, improvements have been made in the meantime. There is a flow of support from Invest Northern Ireland to food sector companies in Northern Ireland.

Mr Ford: Can we expect the strategy to be implemented soon?

Mr Quinn: Yes. That was the bit of John's presentation that raised my blood pressure a wee bit.

Mr Hamilton: A great deal of work has been done on the strategy. There is, of course, an organisational element to it, but many individual recommendations have been or are being implemented.

Mr Weir: Mr McNarry mentioned the patchy performance of some direct rule Ministers. Does the lack of priority given to economic activity and development in Northern Ireland go deeper than those performances? I do not mean to criticise our devolved Ministers, but when direct rule Ministers or Northern Ireland Executive Ministers get additional money through a block grant or some other means, it is inevitable that healthcare, education and infrastructure proportionately become top priorities. I suspect that the same might happen under a new Executive. In the previous devolved Administration, DETI received a decreased percentage share of the Northern Ireland budget, principally because more money went elsewhere. In that case, will we have to give greater priority in our own minds to economic activity?

In answering my questions, perhaps you could produce figures or graphs for us later rather than give on-the-spot answers now. You gave us the regional inactivity rates; however, if we wanted to compare Northern Ireland with other regions, it would be useful to have regional comparative statistics between working-age populations — who are an essential pool of people — as a percentage of the population as a whole. Do we have a larger ageing population than other areas to support or do we have a larger school-age population? Such statistics would be helpful, because they would give us a snapshot of the overall pressures.

You gave figures on economic inactivity. The previous speaker mentioned a gap of about 6%. Sixty per cent of that gap comprises the high percentage of people who are on incapacity benefit.

You have identified one of the other factors — proportionately higher numbers in full-time education — but have not given statistics for it. I do not expect it today, but can you provide an estimate of what the gap is? If 20% of the lack of skills base is because of full-time education, we will not be particularly worried, but I would appreciate the statistics.

12.30 pm

You mentioned liaison with DEL. Partly provoked by John Simpson, I wonder to what extent there is joined-up thinking and joined-up activity within the Government on economic matters. There is a tendency — or at least this is the impression that is given to the outside — for Government Departments to operate with a silo mentality, wary of too much contact with other Departments, because they do not want to appear to be empire building. However, there is a range of issues that have strong economic development impacts on other Departments. You mentioned that with regard to the skills base.

John Simpson mentioned one other implication of that. He was critical of the roads announcement, on a broad level, because he did not see a co-ordinated economic approach in it. What level of input did DETI have into decisions, for instance, on the economic impact of regional infrastructure? Perhaps you could outline the levels of structured liaison and joined-up thinking on economic matters between Government Departments, outside ministerial level.

Mr Quinn: I agree with your first and most general point. Many of you will have experience of budget management from the time of the Assembly. Health and education are massive numbers and massive weights, and if they are given priority it is very difficult to look after everything else. You are right.

One consequence of that — whether it is attributable to direct rule or devolution — is that the proportion of the Northern Ireland total budget allocated to DETI was reduced. There was a particular impact on the Invest Northern Ireland budget, which was reduced by £40 million or £50 million. Alongside that was the concordat arrangement, which allows Invest Northern Ireland to come to DETI — and we then go to DFP, and they go to Ministers — to see if we can rectify or adjust the budget reallocation on an in-year basis.

You are absolutely right; there may well need to be a positive strategic decision taken about the priority to be given to economic development. In service of this particular set of direct rule Ministers, DETI was one of the Departments that did not have to offer options for reductions in the last budget round. DETI did not have to put its allocations at risk to the extent that some other Departments did.

Dr Hutchinson: The point on inactivity is well made in terms of giving a breakdown to see what is causing the high levels of economic inactivity. We can give data on people receiving sickness benefits, disabled people, students, the proportion that are retired, and the proportion that are raising families and staying at home rather than going into the workforce. We can provide data for Northern Ireland vis-à-vis the UK as well.

Northern Ireland's working-age population as a proportion of the total is higher than elsewhere in the UK, and that partly reflects the fact that we have got plenty of students flowing into the labour market. Therefore, the message about economic inactivity is not all bad: 25% of the economic inactivity is due to the fact that we have a higher proportion of students.

Mr Quinn: With regard to economic co-ordination, John Simpson had something to say about the roads announcement. However, I look back three or four years to when the regional transportation strategy was being devised — that was during the time of the devolved Assembly. That was a heavily consulted strategy, and the political parties, Departments and the business stakeholders all had an opportunity to influence that.

That set up the essential anatomy of Northern Ireland's roads programme. The investment strategy for Northern Ireland pushed the resources envelope out a bit for that, and some things got added in such as the dual carriageway between Derry and Dungiven. Yesterday the envelope may well have opened a little bit further. I noticed the mention of a bypass for Enniskillen, my home town.

Mr McNarry: And Strangford was taken out.

Mr Quinn: It is quite important to remember that these things are being dealt with within a pre-determined strategic framework. It is not a matter of making free-standing decisions.

Mr Hamilton: In my view co-ordination has been better since the Assembly because it has been on genuine issues. Co-ordination for the sake of it does not work, but if it is genuine and with common cause it does work. Engagement between the Economic Development Forum (EDF), political parties, business leaders, various stakeholders and the Government, saying what works and what does not is hugely important. I do not think that stakeholders understand the nature of that. In a sense they have complete access to everything that the Government do just as we have access to what the private sector does.

I understand what John Simpson was saying about strategies, people talking about what the strategies are to be, and all the focus being on creation. The focus around the vision is about moving away from creation and taking it on to actions. Through the EDF subgroups, groups led by external stakeholders will be working out the three or four things that they need to do on innovation in the next six months to make things better.

Once those are done the groups can bank them and move on to the next lot. This is very much a rolling process around actions. Political parties attend every other meeting to keep them involved in the process. There is a fair degree of transparency and partnership in that, and that is because we want to make Northern Ireland responsive. The focus is not on some strategy that is sitting on a shelf. We are long past that; we need action.

Mr Dallat: Leading on from the talk about co-ordination and so on, the disjointed way in which Committees worked was very obvious in the last Assembly. It was difficult to reference crosscutting issues. Only if you were on every Committee would you have discovered that everything was bogged down in the subject of literacy and numeracy. The Public Accounts Committee was bogged down in it as were the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment and others. There did not seem to be any clear mechanism to deal with it.

Then there were more basic problems: the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development was heavily involved in promoting business in rural areas while the Planning Service was killing it off. A local Assembly should have some mechanism to enable it to pick up on such issues and get to work on them quickly. Otherwise there will be no obvious advantage in having a regional Assembly.

What help, materials or research we could have from officials on that point? Strategies and masterplans are fine, but until local politicians sit around a table and hammer them out —

Mr Hamilton: That is the point. Strategies could have had a blunderbuss approach with forty or fifty things in them, all with the same priority level. We need to break through that. Taking the EDF innovation subgroup as an example; it is chaired by David Dobbin, and he is in the business community. David is looking across everything that is happening in innovation and wants to identify six things that must happen soon. We then have to put a named person against each of those things with responsibility for delivering them.

Alongside that we have gone very public on research. As a result of the change and since the Assembly and Invest Northern Ireland, DETI is trying to be much more representative of the whole economy rather than just, for example, the sectors in which LEDU or the IDB operated. We did not obviously support all sectors. We are trying to commission research that is of genuine importance across the board. We are trawling on the research that we should do and terms of reference for it through the EDF. For example, we need to understand what is happening in manufacturing, and we need to understand how to move through private services.

We are therefore trying to focus on an agenda. As you say, Mr Dallat, we must create the right agenda, one that will include all the items that stakeholders believe are important. For example, the Skills Strategy, which covers a very big and diverse area, is just one of the strategies that must be examined most closely in the next six months to see if progress is being made. We must do that across the board.

Mr Dallat: Chairman, I am sorry for frustrating you, but I will be brief. The problem has been compounded by the number of workers who have come to the Province and whose skills are totally mismatched to their jobs. Some of them have extremely good academic qualifications but are doing jobs that do not require such qualifications. That is certainly not benefiting the economy, so the problem has become a little bit more international.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Two qualified doctors from Slovenia are gutting fish in Kilkeel, so that gives some indication of the situation.

Three members would like to ask questions. Mr McElduff was brought in at end of the last question-and-answer session, so I will allow him his two questions. However, I will ask Mr Neeson and Dr Birnie to do a double act — each of them can ask the Permanent Secretary one question. This is all good stuff and it is relevant, but we are running very tight against our deadline.

Mr McElduff: Thank you, Chairman.

First, I would like the departmental officials to comment on the extent and character of current North/South activity in economic development.

Secondly, is there any real commitment to balanced regional development in economic development? Slide 11 of the presentation lists the number of inward investment projects secured in 2005-06, and the number of contestable FDI projects that came here in 2004-05. Of those projects, how many have been located in Counties Tyrone and Fermanagh?

Mr Quinn: I will answer your question on North/South co-operation first, and then ask Mr Hamilton to elaborate. My experience is that North/South economic co-operation is already very extensive. One example is physical economic infrastructure; in particular, roads. The Roads Service and Louth County Council have a joint contract to build the Newry-Dundalk element of the Belfast-to-Dublin road. Thus a project will be undertaken if there is a clear business reason for it and if it will mutually benefit the two areas. A second example, of course, is the development of the City of Derry airport, which has been co-funded by the Northern Ireland budget and the Republic of Ireland Government. Both projects are direct, concrete examples of active economic co-operation.

A third example is the trade delegation to India, which was led by the Taoiseach and on which Northern Ireland firms were represented. The Secretary of State travelled to India subsequent to that visit and he repeated the offer, but it was just a little bit too soon after the Taoiseach's visit, so he was not able to get a positive response. Such activity, which enables people to extract direct positive business benefits from co-operation, is being carried out.

I will ask Wilfie Hamilton to speak next; he deals with his counterparts in Dublin on the elaboration of North/South economic co-operation, under the auspices of the British-Irish Intergovernmental Council.

Mr Hamilton: A huge amount of work is under way, even in new areas. The key, of course, is mutual benefit. There is absolutely no point in co-operation if it is not for mutual benefit. Irish colleagues would certainly agree with that and it lies at the heart of everything that we are doing. The British-Irish Intergovernmental Conference communiqué identified a number of areas in which Ministers have already agreed to take forward further co-operation. Stephen mentioned trade missions. It is sometimes hard for countries to undertake such missions on their own, so a joint visit is often more economically credible and viable. We have discussed sharing offices in countries overseas where Northern Ireland has no representation: Northern Ireland business people could go to such countries and use the Irish facilities. Other marketing aspects have also been considered. The proposals identified in the communiqué are really only the first fruits of that work. The idea is to work towards the publication of a full report in October.

In addition to an overseeing group comprising officials from both jurisdictions, there are seven businesspeople, including the two joint chairpersons of the North/South Round Table, the two joint chairpersons of the Confederation of British Industry/Irish Business and Employers' Confederation Joint Business Council, and the chairperson and deputy chairperson of InterTradeIreland. Sir George Quigley is also on that committee.

In this respect, we encounter some of the difficulties that we discussed with Mr McNarry. Whereas officials and agencies can look at all the things we do, there may be issues that the business community wants to look at but which lie outside our remit, because they are reserved matters or whatever. Consultants have been appointed to help with the final report in October. The areas outlined are in the communiqué from the last BIIC. We are working towards a fuller report in October, but it is extensive.

Mr Quinn: May I pick up on Mr McElduff's regional development point? I do not know the answer to his question about Fermanagh and Tyrone, but we will ask Invest Northern Ireland whether they can advise us on that. To generalise, and it is a point that I made earlier, the Invest Northern Ireland business plan targets include a commitment to put a high proportion of industrial investments in New TSN areas. Those targets are routinely hit. I do not want to anticipate the answer on Fermanagh and Tyrone, but I doubt if it will be as impressive as the answer might have been had you asked about Derry or somewhere else.

Mr Hamilton: By and large, businessmen have to want to invest. You cannot deal with them if they do not want to invest there.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Finally, a question each from Dr Birnie and Mr Neeson.

Dr Birnie: On the issue of tax credits versus corporation tax, you mentioned some research on low uptake among small firms. What ongoing or additional research are you doing on this? It is a crucial question. Are you confident that private sector investment will be responsive to these incentives? There has long been a debate as to whether businesses here are out to maximise profits, or whether they stop growing when they reach a target profit. If the latter, they will not respond readily to a change in their net profitability.

Mr Neeson: It is apparent this morning that there are too many Government Departments in Northern Ireland. That is not a criticism of co-operation between you and the other Departments.

I want to deal with fiscal incentives. For a long time we have been trying to deal with the grant culture; is that still an issue, and to what extent have other major incentives replaced that?

Dr Hutchinson: The research found that the prospect of tax credits was having limited impact on increasing levels of R&D. That is only one element of the research; we are completing other research directly on FDI. We are looking at modelling the impact on the economy of creating 3,000 high-quality jobs per annum until 2015. We are forecasting where those jobs should be located and the impact on wages and on wider productivity. A wider FDI research project looks at the changing nature of FDI. It is not just manufacturing, it is becoming more orientated towards the service sector, which is not capital intensive. So there are issues for the Government support package for non-capital-intensive FDI.

Dr Birnie's other question on enterprise is critically important. Northern Ireland has low rates of business start-up, and low rates of business growth. There seems to be a ceiling for business growth. They service the local economy, but do not look for foreign markets to export and penetrate. We are looking at the reasons for that and what can be done by Government to make businesses grow more.

Mr Quinn: A PricewaterhouseCoopers (PWC) report, which was reported in one of the local papers today, made exactly that point. Northern Ireland firms tend to regard themselves as mature when others would say that there was still potential room for growth, so they may well settle for certain levels of productivity and profitability.

Mr Neeson's point about too many Departments echoes the words of the Secretary of State in the middle of July; to paraphrase him, there is unfinished business after the review of public administration (RPA), and the effects of the RPA will have implications for the departmental structure. Ministers will start to work their way through that as we go forward.

Mr Hamilton: The grant situation has changed dramatically, if we look at the average interventions and the range available. I suspect, however, that some would say that there is unfinished business; that there is still too much of that in Northern Ireland — people wanting to do something only if they get a grant for it.

Grants may well be necessary, and that is why we fought to have continued access to regional aid, which we were successful in securing until 2013. The key is that they must be the right grants in the right sectors for the right businesses. There is no point in getting just any investment. It must address what we need, add value in the right sectors, build clusters, or whatever.

We have also been pressing Invest Northern Ireland to diversify the range of products that it offers, to take more loans, and to take more equity. INI has told us that it would rather take a portfolio approach, and be able to look at investments across a range of activities. There are obvious difficulties with that because the public sector quite properly expects every single investment to work. Invest Northern Ireland would like to have dialogue about that to see if there was an approach that was more in line with our needs.

There is no easy answer to Sean Neeson's query. A great deal more needs to be done to help companies to help themselves and to internationalise, including export trade. We are making efforts to do more in that direction, again with our colleagues in the South, who face the same sorts of problems in many areas.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Ladies and gentlemen, thank you. Having listened to the complexities of Mr Quinn's comprehensive list, I should withdraw my comment that this matter is less complex than for DoE or DRD. It is clearly a complex and difficult Department to run.

Mr Dallat has to be away for 1.30 pm. Is everyone else available to complete the third session? Does anyone have any pressing engagements?

Mr McNarry: I have a problem.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I wanted to make sure that we had at least seven members left.

Mr Weir: Could we finish at 1.30 pm?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It will more likely be 1.45 pm.

Mr McElduff: The Sinn Féin commitment is to the end.

Mr McNarry: To the end of what, Barry?

Dr McDonnell: You are just new, and you are a troublemaker. [Laughter.]

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It looks as though we will be OK.

Mr Weir: Is David Ford coming back?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): No, he is not.

Mr Quinn: Before we conclude, I would like to leave you with a brief postscript. I have known John Simpson for many years, and I love him like a brother. [Laughter.]

The Chairman (Mr Wells): But —

Mr Quinn: He made a point about implementing strategies, and I agree with that. I have worked in several Northern Ireland Departments, and I am aware of the physical development that has taken place in this region in places such as Strabane, Limavady, the Comber and the Toome by-passes, on the Belfast to Dublin road and on the Westlink. There has been an explosion of investment in water and sewerage over the past two or three years, most if it, of course, resource-driven.

Coming back to DETI's remit, the fact that Northern Ireland led the UK and perhaps even Europe in achieving 100% broadband access is an implementation achievement.

I take John's point that it has taken too long to get the visitor's centre at the Giant's Causeway moving, but what got it moving was the personal commitment and endeavour of a senior civil servant. That person is not represented in this room this morning, so I am not claiming credit for it myself, but the Civil Service and Departments have some implementation achievements to point to.

Mr Hamilton: Those of you around the table who are former members of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment will know how difficult that was.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We remember it well.

The Committee Clerk: You have undertaken to provide information on businesses in Fermanagh and Tyrone and on the demographics of inactivity rates and verification rates. You are also conducting research on the economic impact of FDI in different regions and on tax credits versus corporation tax. The subgroup would welcome an insight into that, within the time frame, if possible.

Mr Hamilton: We should have a chat about that, but we could drown you with paper.

Mr Quinn: We will take that request away and meet again to discuss it.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Thank you, gentlemen. We are grateful for that useful presentation.

(The Chairman (Mr Molloy) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Good afternoon. I welcome Enterprise Northern Ireland (ENI) and thank you for attending at such short notice. After your short presentation, members will ask questions.

Mrs Ann McGregor (Enterprise Northern Ireland): I am the chief executive of ENI, and I have been with the organisation since its formation in 2000. Ken Nelson is the chairman, and he is also chief executive of LEDCOM, which is our local enterprise agency in Larne. Dr Nicholas O'Shiel is the vice-chairman, and he heads our policy group. He is also chief executive of Omagh Enterprise Co Ltd. I will provide a brief background to ENI and then talk about the important issues for the Northern Ireland economy.

ENI is an economic development agency. We focus on entrepreneurship, business start and business development across all sectors, and act as an umbrella organisation for 32 members. We lobby on their behalf and act as a policy voice for those agencies and for small businesses. There are over 5,000 tenants in enterprise agencies. Our objectives are to develop a cohesive organisation across Northern Ireland, delivering high-quality consistent services to small businesses. We also want to ensure that we can sustain that service at a local level.

ENI's role is to increase the business birth rate. Northern Ireland has the second-lowest business birth rate in Europe, and that is a high priority. We want to sustain and develop those locally focused businesses that are developed through the sector.

We welcome the opportunity to contribute to the work of the subgroup. We will comment on all elements of your terms of reference, but the Northern Ireland economy is our key area of expertise and development, so we will probably focus most on it, if that is OK.

As I said earlier, our network consists of 32 independent enterprise agencies, and we are led by 330 voluntary directors, along with key influencers from local communities. Many representatives around this table have had interactions with enterprise agencies in the past as well.

1.00 pm

Enterprise Northern Ireland has a network of 200 staff, and all of its business advisers are independently professionally accredited, and have expertise in small business development. We have 2 million sq ft of property, including training and IT suites so that we can deliver a service at the front door. Local enterprise agencies are not core funded. Enterprise Northern Ireland pays for its own activities, and it also tenders for public service contracts and is paid on an output basis. Its funding does not come from the public purse as such, although much of its funding comes from Government Departments such as Invest Northern Ireland.

Enterprise Northern Ireland is the main mechanism for support at a local level. We work closely with Invest Northern Ireland, but we have an independent view and a specific focus on micro businesses. As well as representing that sector, we deliver programmes such as the Start a Business programme, which involves Northern Ireland-wide access to start-up support.

Enterprise Northern Ireland runs the Tradelinks and MicroTrade programmes, which we run on a cross-border and all-island basis. The MicroTrade programme runs in partnership with InterTradeIreland and the city and county enterprise boards, where we try to encourage cross-border linkages and trade.

The Tradelinks programme is more significant, supporting 600 small businesses to trade on an all-island basis, to increase their capacity and to grow as micro businesses. There is no Northern Ireland-wide programme to support existing micro businesses, so we are doing it on an ad hoc basis through those other programmes.

Enterprise Northern Ireland also has a loan fund and a social entrepreneurship programme. I will not go into the details of each of those programmes. We are also working to help micro businesses trade on an international basis through a trade bridge programme supported by OFMDFM.

Enterprise Northern Ireland's key area of success over the past few years has been the Start a Business programme, which has supported, through funding from Invest Northern Ireland and local councils, the delivery of 8,520 businesses in a four-year period, compared to its original target of 6,270. That is due to the centralised cohesiveness of the network, good systems and processes and good management information systems.

More than 36,000 people have participated in that programme, so if they did not go on to start a business, they did at least increase their capacity through training and networking with other individuals.

The programme has been reviewed independently and has come across as highly valued by participants. We believe that there should be an ongoing commitment to volume start-up, because, even taking dead weight into account — where people say that they would have started anyway — 2,000 new businesses have started with the creation of about 2,000 additional jobs. The impact on the community has been a turnover of between £70 million and £113 million. Each of those micro businesses created in the local community has an annual turnover of at least £60,000, and they are important.

Enterprise Northern Ireland is not saying that the Start a Business programme is perfect. It could be changed and developed to make it more flexible. At the minute, it is a standard programme with the same product offered to everyone. It could be redesigned to include more on exploring enterprise and developing businesses. Help such as grants could be skewed towards those who live in areas of neighbourhood renewal or in targeting social need areas. However, all in all, it is an important programme.

Enterprise Northern Ireland's concern about the Northern Ireland economy is the fact that Invest Northern Ireland has a major focus on inward investment and support for technology-based business. That is laudable and important, but we do not believe that that provides a total solution to the Northern Ireland economy in terms of employability, peripheral areas or disadvantaged communities.

ENI is concerned that neither DETI nor Invest Northern Ireland have statutory responsibility for locally focused businesses. In an environment of budget cuts, it seems natural that this area may be given reduced priority and value.

In the Republic of Ireland, for example, the city and county enterprise boards have statutory responsibility for such businesses and a core delivery budget to support them. That situation simply does not exist in Northern Ireland. ENI strongly disagrees with the view that locally focused businesses will happen anyway and do not need support.

Mr Ken Nelson (Enterprise Northern Ireland): Thank you, Chairman and members, for the opportunity to be here today. ENI strongly emphasises that local business is an important part of the economy and is concerned that the priority given to support for local business may reduce. There is a fair amount of change in the offing, as all members know. There is the review of public administration and the implications of the change to seven, 11, or however many super councils.

Invest Northern Ireland is also changing its policies and has indicated that it may move away from supporting local businesses. The social entrepreneurship programme that Invest Northern Ireland has just announced will run for only two years. Although the social economy receives much attention and many column inches, tangible support given to the social enterprise programme and to social entrepreneurs is limited — and it is time limited. ENI is worried about where the policy vacuum will leave local businesses and social enterprises.

I noted and acknowledge Wilfie Hamilton's comments about trying to encourage micro-enterprises to engage more in international trade. However, there is a big job to be done in building the capacity of local businesses before they can do that, and this is where local solutions and local support are needed. The networks and programmes in which ENI is involved can provide that support. We want such support to remain at the heart of the policy agenda on the local economy.

Dr Nicholas O'Shiel (Enterprise Northern Ireland): Thank you for inviting us here today. Following on from what Ken said, ENI wants to get across what it would like to achieve in Northern Ireland over the next 10 years and to stress the contribution that small businesses can make to developing the economy over the longer period of 10 or 20 years.

We were interested in some of DETI's comments. Undoubtedly, Northern Ireland has the necessary Departments, organisations and strategies, but ENI can pick up on their implementation. We see ourselves as being on the ground and able to implement policies and strategies locally. The challenge over the next 10 years will be to get the Northern Ireland economy to where we all presumably want it to be.

Mrs McGregor: There is a strategy for accelerating entrepreneurship in Northern Ireland. However, our concern is that the strategy is not cross-departmental either in budget or in focus — and it should be. All Departments approved the strategy in principle but, from an ENI perspective, it feels as though they are still operating in silos and that Invest Northern Ireland is taking the lead in that area. DEL and DARD have a role to play, and the challenge is to integrate budgets and people to ensure that the approach is co-ordinated and that people are not cutting across one other.

ENI simply cannot figure out why no one has statutory responsibility for this sector and would encourage the Assembly to ensure that a Department is given such responsibility. ENI welcomes the transfer of power to local councils. However, we fear that because of the lack of transitional arrangements there will appear to be seven, or 13, or however many, approaches to entrepreneurship unless one Department has the overarching responsibility that will ensure a common approach to enterprise across Northern Ireland. ENI is also concerned that although power may transfer, the budget may not. How will local councils fund and support locally focused businesses as they go forward?

ENI is asking DETI to put a framework in place for entrepreneurship, which will be implemented by councils working in partnership with ENI and other providers.

We should be accountable to the Assembly for any agreed targets, and there should be common corporate provision. As I said earlier, 10 years ago there was an inconsistent approach to small-business support. A person who lived in Limavady might have received a grant of £500 but no training, a person who lived in Larne might have received £5,000 and training, and a person who lived in another area might have received only training. At some point, that scenario resulted in Northern Ireland having the lowest business start-up rate in Europe. We now have the second lowest, so we have made some progress. We are at least moving in the right direction. Our concern with the RPA agenda is that that momentum will be lost.

Mr Nelson: The DETI officials commented on the low business start-up rate. Although that has been a challenge for us all, it is important to note that businesses that do start up in Northern Ireland stay in business longer. The survival rate of business start-ups in Northern Ireland is much higher than in the rest of the UK. That is important to note, because it says something about the support that is in place for those starting a business. The challenge is to introduce more people to the enterprise culture, to help them to set up a business and to help that business to grow.

Mr Neeson: I wish to declare an interest. I am a member of the board of Carrickfergus Enterprise Agency Ltd.

Mrs McGregor: That ties in with my earlier comment. John, did you not have some connection to Coleraine Enterprise Agency at some point. No?
[Laughter.]

Mr Dallat: Chairman, I want to ask a question.

Mr Neeson: First, I wish to congratulate Enterprise Northern Ireland on the success of its business programme. I am just concerned about the programme's future. What will happen to it?

Secondly, you raised concerns about the loss of continuity of support in the run-up to the RPA. How can those concerns be dealt with?

Mrs McGregor: Somebody must have statutory responsibility for it, as I keep saying. We need to recognise the value of our locally focused businesses and to ring-fence some form of budget that will provide support. At present, support is of a stop-start, ad hoc nature. Consistent support and a consistent budget are needed. DETI, or someone else, must be responsible for an overarching policy framework and for ensuring that we produce good annual research through the Global Entrepreneurship Monitor (GEM) and that we go up the scale rather than down it.

Mr Nelson: Greater engagement is also required. Enterprise Northern Ireland has seen no evidence to date that the local economy is high up the agenda in either the work that is being done in the RPA process or in the preparation work for the launch of the RPA in 2008-09. Those who are preparing for the RPA should engage with ENI or others to ensure that local businesses get that support. I make that point to ensure that it is on the agenda at this stage, because surely a great deal of planning work and engagement are under way at some level. The economy should be part of that engagement.

Mrs McGregor: In our engagement with organisations such as the Society of Local Authority Chief Executives (SOLACE) and the Northern Ireland Local Government Association (NILGA), we noticed that there appears to be a great deal of focus on legislation and on its implementation in areas for which councils do not have power, even though they already have local economic-development powers. Therefore it appears that the issue is on the back burner. Suddenly 2009 will arrive, and we will be saying: "What are we doing about small-business support?"

Mr Neeson: It is important for you to know, Chairman, that there will be a shadow period. It is more likely that elections to the new councils will take place in 2008.

Dr O'Shiel: On the same point, we are concerned that, without statutory responsibility and without a commitment to and a profile of small businesses, budgets and resources for small businesses might get squeezed.

Moreover, if there is a transition of responsibility from Invest Northern Ireland to local councils, will adequate resources also be transferred? Will there be a time lag between the handover and the assuming of responsibility so that resources can be allocated and put in place? Small and local businesses would suffer if that happened.

1.15 pm

Mr McCausland: This is a very important sector. You mentioned the 32 local enterprise agencies across Northern Ireland and their engagement with local communities. There seems to be quite a variation across the local enterprise agencies in their engagement with local communities, their transparency and openness, and their contact with local politicians. Could more be done to encourage those aspects? Some local enterprise agencies are very good at engaging with their communities; in other areas, engagement does not happen at any significant level.

If we are to maximise the benefit of the local enterprise agencies for communities, we need engagement with the stakeholders in a community.

Mr Nelson: That is an interesting observation. I have just taken on the chairmanship of the organisation, and Nick has been vice-chairman for a couple of years. We have been working on quality development, which includes corporate governance and raising the quality capacity in each member. We have a programme of continuing professional development for all staff. We have a strategic process that engages all the directors. Part of that is recognising that there is a wide group of stakeholders with whom it is important to work closely. Our members are taking that message on board and are responding to the new circumstances.

The fact that we are here today shows that stakeholders recognise the value of Enterprise Northern Ireland and its members. That feeds back to our members, who respond accordingly. That is a challenge for us, but we are engaged in it.

Dr McDonnell: You said that you have about 5,000 tenants across 32 agencies.

Mrs McGregor: That was at the most recent count; it could be higher now.

Dr McDonnell: How long does a tenant stay with you?

Dr O'Shiel: It varies. Our initial remit is to attract tenants into a centre and then give them the support that they need. There is no fixed number of years — three years or five years, for example — after which a tenant must move out. We have about 40 businesses in the centre of Omagh, and in any given year of the past three to four years about eight of them would move out and eight would move in. There is a turnover, or a "churn" as we call it, although I cannot tell you specifically how long each tenant might stay.

There are several reasons for tenants leaving; they might outgrow us, for example. Although some of the centres are quite large, we do not supply 10,000 sq ft or 20,000 sq ft to people. Therefore somebody who has been with us for two or three years may outgrow us and want to buy or develop their own premises. There is no hard and fast rule. The enterprise centres provide a start-up, incubation role: when a company expands or develops it will have to go somewhere else to find space. Of the 40 businesses that we have, the average employment level is about four or five persons.

Dr McDonnell: In the past, the accusation was made, perhaps wrongly, that it was hardly worth starting up a business in some local enterprise agencies. All that happened was that existing small businesses treated the local enterprise centre as a source of low rent. Is there any credibility in such claims?

Dr O'Shiel: We do not say that all our tenants stay for three years and then move on; some tenants stay longer than others. To my knowledge, at least in Omagh, our rents are commercial. A potential tenant will ask about rents, and we will tell them where other spaces are available in the area. The tenant will make his or her own decision. If a tenant comes to us it is for business reasons, not because we are perceived as being cheaper. We are not necessarily cheaper.

In fact, in some cases, someone across the road who has premises that have been lying vacant for a while might offer it at a reduced rent. We do not see ourselves as discount renters; we rent space at the market or commercial rate. Other factors such as space and the support we provide will determine whether firms come.

Dr McDonnell: What is your overall budget and how do you derive it?

Mrs McGregor: Our budget has grown annually. In the first year, our budget was £1 million. It is currently £6 million, which includes a loan fund pot of approximately £2 million. Each of our 32 members contributes to the core to enable it to run. We also tender to organisations such as Invest Northern Ireland and councils for programmes such as Start a Business. The annual budget for that is £4.5 million but as regards fees to Enterprise Northern Ireland it would be worth about £1.5 million. We manage larger budgets than we actually gain fees for.

Dr McDonnell: How much would each member contribute?

Mrs McGregor: Each of our 32 members contributes £1,500 a year. When Enterprise Northern Ireland was formed, Invest Northern Ireland supported it and provided three years' funding. We raised £30,000, Invest Northern Ireland gave us £30,000 and the International Fund for Ireland gave us £30,000. That was the situation for the first three years. That funding has now ceased so we are effectively self-sustaining.

Mr Nelson: It is important to recognise that although Mrs McGregor has described funding in terms of the core organisation; we are a member-led organisation. In each individual local enterprise area (LEA) one third to one half of the income comes from the rental of property, and the remainder comes from services delivered — payment on outputs. I would re-emphasise that no LEA receives core funding. This is a different situation from that which prevails in the Republic of Ireland where there are county enterprise boards that provide core funding for staff costs.

Each board must ensure that an LEA is self-financing, can pay its bills, and is paid only on outputs.

Mrs McGregor: I administer the Start a Business programme on behalf of Invest Northern Ireland. An LEA would deliver a lead-in assessment, which would comprise a training session perhaps, and their fees would go on to a management information system and would be paid to them every year. That is why the figure for the centre seems high. The LEAs would be paid £55 for a lead-in assessment and £175 for eight training programmes. The subgroup will realise that we were talking earlier about dealing with 36,000 clients and 8,500 businesses over four years. It is a case of money in, money out.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I draw members' attention to the submission and the response to the terms of reference so that we can relate those two issues together.

Ms Gildernew: Further to Dr McDonnell's question, I am very familiar with the areas within my constituency, and to me it is not a bit strange that once companies get through the incubation period there is a reluctance to move out. There are a number of reasons for this. It is not that rent is cheaper, but there is an infrastructure in and around them that they rely on and in which they support one another. If companies staying within enterprise centres is not a problem then we need to increase capacity in order to encourage new firms to take up occupancy alongside those established firms. We need to ensure that they have the support that they are relying on each other for as much as they are relying on Enterprise Northern Ireland. In Dungannon, rent is not cheap. Companies are there because the resources they rely on are around them.

As regards business starts — and forgive me for being parochial — Fermanagh may have a good level of business starts but it has a very poor level post-start up. There is a lack of sustainability within that sector.

Our neighbour is County Monaghan where there is a wonderful entrepreneurial spirit. When you travel around that county you see signs for shoe factories, or furniture or kitchen stores along every road. There seems to be far more of that indigenous entrepreneurial spirit there, and it is only a stone's throw away from us.

Is it a lack of core funding and statutory responsibility that gives companies a few miles down the road a head start? What do we need to do to encourage more business start-ups and sustainability?

I am a firm believer in supporting indigenous investment. Foreign direct investment is not the answer in a rural constituency. ENI supports indigenous investment, and it is one of the few successes that has not been hampered by the lack of infrastructure to the same extent as other sectors.

In relation to the subgroup's terms of reference, what does your sector need to grow and to give more support to small businesses to maintain them as an alternative to bigger foreign direct investment enterprises?

Dr O'Shiel: I have a couple of points. Long-term structure is the big answer. The last 10 years of enterprise support have been like a tap that has been turned on and off. Any enterprise agency of the 32 that comprise ENI could simplistically say that, as Ken said, 40% to 45% of their income comes from property and 55% to 60% comes from programmes.

Since European money has come to Northern Ireland over the last number of years, the subgroup will be aware that there have been many programmes to support and develop businesses. Our programmes run from between three and 18 months, but any programme, by definition, will come to an end. The longest running is probably the Start A Business programme, but, in itself, that is run in three-year cycles, and there have been times when, two and a half years through a cycle, there have been intensive discussions on whether there will be another.

Once the hurdle of whether there will be another programme cycle has been cleared, our big challenge in recent years has been to secure resources. On each occasion — and this is not a complaint; simply a fact — the resources have been squeezed and squeezed.

One of the major arguments that ENI wants to communicate to the subgroup is that if small businesses were given policy priority, it would not be bidding for programme resources in an ad hoc manner every six months or three years. It would not be in a situation where its resources are the easiest to cut. A balance must be struck between local small businesses and foreign direct investment. Without going into too much detail, ENI knows that that is not the answer for the more rural areas.

A couple of years ago, Invest NI commissioned a good report at great expense, which said that foreign direct investment would largely be concentrated in Belfast, although some may go to the west and to Derry. That is not a criticism of Invest NI or its report.

Foreign direct investment has moved from the manufacturing sector to more service-based sectors. What do foreign investors want? They want young people. What do young people want? They want a centre of population, somewhere to live, culture, nightlife, and so on.

Considering global foreign direct investment over the next 10 years, competition is one reason that many foreign investors will look elsewhere. Any foreign investors that come to Northern Ireland will be small but perfectly formed and will probably locate in population centres. It is very unlikely that they will locate in rural areas, which highlights the importance of small businesses.

That is probably a long-winded answer to your question, but structure is the key factor. It is important that someone has long-term responsibility to ensure that local business support is a priority. We all say that it is important; it should be made important and the resources should be attached to it.

Mrs McGregor: There should also be some continuum of support. Through the standardised Start a Business programme, ENI has proved that an impact can be made. However, to stimulate entrepreneurship and encourage people to become self-employed rather than staying unemployed or working in the public sector, serious resources must be applied at education level and to the long-term unemployed.

With the new neighbourhood renewal targets especially, ENI is trying to reach those people who are still economically inactive. There is no Northern Ireland-wide programme or resource applied to that — it is stop-start and ad hoc, with different agencies involved.

Effectively, when people complete the Start a Business programme, they are abandoned. Unless they are directed to other programmes, such as Tradelinks, there are no resources to continue supporting them. Two years ago, ENI piloted the successful Develop a Business programme, and Invest Northern Ireland acknowledged that it generated good added value to review a business one or two years after its creation to see whether it had the potential to grow and to encourage it to develop.

Sometimes, even after two years, businesses are afraid to take risks and to go outside their local communities to develop cross-border trade or to employ more people. The micro-business sector is effectively abandoned. Therefore, a continuum of support is critical.

1.30 pm

Mr Nelson: Another factor to bear in mind is that small business owners and owner-managers often face a lot of confusion. There are so many things out there that they can find the whole picture of economic intervention confusing, and help is needed to get them through that maze.

Nick and I have worked in this field for about 15 years. In my experience, the best results have often come when we have acted as account managers, being seen as the point of contact for a business and guiding it through the range of options that are available. The businesses see us as local people to whom they can turn, and they expect us to be able to inform them of opportunities for funding or training and to direct them through those processes. Often, the businesses are busy doing what they should be doing, and their staff do not have the time to attend all the seminars and gather all the relevant information. They want someone to present it to them. That local focus and account management role is important. Confusion is widespread among small business owners.

Mr Dallat: My congratulations to ENI. Perhaps, in the interests of honesty and fair play, I should state that I am a former member of a local enterprise agency. [Laughter.]

We have spoken at length about the culture of enterprise. Would it be useful for a new Assembly to encourage the education sector, from primary school up, to develop the basic skills that young people need? I am thinking about money management, budgeting, marketing and research. My experience is that many people with good skills in making products lack the basic skills that they need to get started. I recognise the work of Young Enterprise Northern Ireland (YENI) and people like that, but my impression is that such support is erratic and that the priority given to enterprise depends on the ethos of individual schools. What are ENI's views on that? Is involving the education sector critical? Should the Assembly consider lobbying the examination boards and the Departments?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): It could be part of the curriculum.

Mr Nelson: Yes, in an ideal world, enterprise activities would take place at education level, start-up level, and business-development level. ENI works in those areas and with YENI, but the thing that would make the most difference in the next few years would be the introduction of funding other than ad hoc project funding. ENI could do useful work in schools. It interacts with schools, but that is limited and is always as part of a programme. In ENI's ideal world, enterprise would be introduced in schools, furthered in the start-up sector, and developed, as our colleagues said earlier, through training on export markets, innovation and R&D.

Mr McElduff: Earlier, John Simpson acknowledged the key role of regional institutes in the developing success of the Celtic tiger economy in the Twenty-six Counties. Does ENI have any comments on a future further education strategy and how it might feed into the economy?

Mrs McGregor: Through the Association of Northern Ireland Colleges (ANIC), ENI works closely with the further education colleges and believes that there is a role for both organisations in the development of the Northern Ireland economy. To show members how that might operate in practice, I shall ask Nick to outline how he works with Omagh College of Further Education.

Dr O'Shiel: For the past four years, ENI, Omagh College of Further Education and Omagh District Council have had a formal arrangement with the University of Ulster, which is called the Omagh University Partnership.

We found it difficult to get the university to interact with local businesses, partly because of their size and needs. Local small businesses do not see innovation and research and development as being for them. Omagh College, the university and the enterprise agency have links with the companies and can deal with them, and we introduce them, through Omagh College, to lecturers, depending on their skills. We also reach outside the college to the university, and that cycle continues. That is one example of how it can work.

Mr Weir: I apologise for being outside for part of your presentation. From what I heard, there were two points that resonated strongly with me. I was struck by what you said about the lack of co-ordination between Departments and agencies. Clearly a wide range of Government activities impacts on economic development and on the organisations that you have been working with. Do you have input into, or are you consulted in any way on, Government policies and strategies in skills issues in the Department for Employment and Learning or infrastructure priorities in the Department for Regional Development (DRD)? Earlier, John Simpson criticised DRD for not co-ordinating the roads infrastructure to cater for the needs of the economy. You also mentioned the rate of duty on fuel. Is there any co-ordination or consultation with you on that?

You raised concerns about the Review of Public Administration. You said, and I think that it is true, that the focus is on legislation. I declare an interest through my involvement with the Northern Ireland Local Government Association (NILGA). You mentioned both NILGA and the Society of Local Authority Chief Executives (SOLACE). To be fair, the pressure to focus on legislation is not coming from any of the local government organisations; it is coming from the Department of the Environment, whose attitude is “Let’s get the legislation in place and then we will try to forget about everything”. Legislation is only 10% of the review, at most. What is important is what happens to implementation and delivery after that. At times, we felt as if we were trying to push the Government through treacle. If any of the political parties can be of any help to you in getting those issues focused, we would be keen to hear from you, particularly on resourcing.

What contact has there been between your organisation and the DOE on transferred services? Several of us are concerned that there has not been enough focus on transferred services, of which you are part. Finally, on resourcing again, some of us are concerned that some of the functions that are being transferred to local government are not bringing with them the necessary resources. The budgets for the Planning Service and the Roads Service have been reduced.

One of the criticisms of yesterday’s announcement was that it concentrated on big projects, but that there was very little investment in roads that will be handled by local government. It would raise concerns, both from local government and economic development points of view, if you thought that your budget would not be adequately resourced in local government. Apart from the lack of reassurances, is there anything specific that you can draw to our attention that you feel indicates that your budget will be squeezed before going into local government?

Mrs McGregor: We are pushing for consultation with the DOE and other Departments; coincidentally, I meet DOE representatives tomorrow. I was to meet them a few months ago, but the meeting was postponed because they were busy talking to councils. We are driving that initiative; no one is coming for us.

Mr Weir: Most councils have not noticed that the DOE has been talking to them. That may be the excuse with which the DOE fobbed you off.

Mrs McGregor: We want to talk to the DOE tomorrow about how it is handling transition.

I know that we keep harping on, but what will Invest Northern Ireland transfer if no one there officially has statutory responsibility for locally focused businesses and it has pressures on its own budget for inward investment? Will it transfer its current £6 million entrepreneurship budget? That is being reduced year on year — it used to be £10 million. I do not know what will be left to transfer by 2009.

Mr Nelson: Consultation has been ad hoc. We have pursued consultation opportunities, so we would welcome anything that you can do to ensure that we are more widely consulted. We have a valuable input to make. All the points that you mentioned, such as the skills issue, are critical to business. We would like to have more input into that.

We have costed solutions, and, if it helped, we could give you further information and return to it. We do not have that today, but we can show you the interventions that we feel could be made at pre, post, and start-up level and the budget figures that are needed. You could then assess whether the economic development budget allows for it.

Mrs McGregor: It would be important to understand how councils plan to deliver local economic development. Do they plan to be responsible for the local economic development strategy and build on the existing resources and infrastructures through local education authorities, further education colleges and other organisations? There may be concerns that councils would set themselves up as delivery arms and that the infrastructure that has been built up would be ignored. For the sake of all local providers, we would be keen to ensure that that did not happen.

Dr Birnie: Thank you, Chairman. I thank the witnesses from Enterprise Northern Ireland for coming. Compared to the inward investment route, do the number of jobs that your agencies create and the cost of each job that is created provide good value?

Secondly, repeating the question that I asked at the end of the DETI evidence session, to what extent do small business start-ups or small business owners and managers pursue growth? Do most of them reach a certain level of income and then stop growing? Years ago, commentators used to say, pejoratively, “Once you get your BMW in the garage, you stop investing.” Or do they try to maximise their profits and aim at, say, 50 employees?

Mrs McGregor: The total cost per participant through the start-up business programme is £1,055.

That includes a grant of about £450, which used to be £750. Enterprise Northern Ireland's input is about £600 per client. That includes a lead-in assessment, six training sessions in marketing, IT and management, plus some post-start up mentoring and a web package.

Taking the "dead wood" argument, even if you aggregate that sum up, the cost is about £8,000 per job. The dead wood in a programme is no more or less than in any standard Government intervention, so we are not performing better or worse than any Government-supported organisation.

Mr Nelson: The picture is probably patchy, and it is hard to get a clear answer across the board. I suspect that the red tape against which many businesses come up is a factor. Therefore profit maximisation is not the only issue. Businesses must consider whether they want the hassle that is involved in expanding, because an adequate return is perhaps all that they need for their families. Therefore reducing the red tape and making it easier for such businesses to expand is a factor.

1.45 pm

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We asked this question of Invest Northern Ireland: how does a successful family business become an export business? Are grants and Government guarantees in particular available to help them move out of their comfort zones?

Mr Nelson: Are you asking whether there are incentives that will encourage them to do more trading outside?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Yes.

Mr Nelson: Yes, a lot could be done. If there was an inbuilt incentive, perhaps capital allowances could be applied to exporting or international trade. I do not have a solution for you today, but we could come back to you on that.

Dr O'Shiel: That is a valid point, and there is no doubt that a comfort factor exists. However, globalisation will probably challenge that comfort factor over the next number of years, even though some people will be happy making a comfortable living locally. We are in a changing world, and that must be considered.

About two years ago, Enterprise Northern Ireland proposed an add-on to the sort of problem that you raised when you discussed business development. We suggested targets and said that we would address every 10 businesses that were in this comfort zone, and perhaps three to four of those would go on to export. Without harping on about it too much, that project was a victim of a budget cut. Eighteen months ago, Enterprise Northern Ireland tendered for the Start a Business programme, and we had to develop a business section for it. We won that contract as a collective organisation, but in the period between winning it and signing up to agree it, the £1.5 million for it went.

Mrs McGregor: Chairman, I will send you some written comments on encouraging family businesses to export. We could also give you examples of what has worked in other programmes.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Thank you for your presentation, which was useful. With regard to the transfer of councils' powers, it is important to continue to work with councils so that we do not get into a quango/council situation.

Mrs McGregor: I agree. Thank you for the opportunity to give evidence; it was much appreciated.

The Committee Clerk: Chairman, a substantive draft press release is being circulated. I have included some quotations from the various submissions. Members may make amendments, and I will issue it when you are content.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Have members read it?

Mr McElduff: I suggest that, because of the subgroup's ongoing work, the phrase "continues to" take evidence be included in the heading. It would also be helpful if the press release stated that John Simpson is an economist.

I also concede to Alasdair McDonnell that he is a recently elected MP, which should be shown in the list of attendees.

Dr Birnie: My first name has been misspelt.

Ms Gildernew: Enterprise Northern Ireland made the important point about how the lack of statutory responsibility impedes its work. That should be included in the press release.

Could the paragraph on John Simpson's presentation be expanded to include some of his comments? It was very informative, and the press release does not reflect the volume of his contribution.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I remind members that the minutes have to be corrected and that those who make presentations have the opportunity to make amendments.

The Committee Clerk: We will consider any suggestions that you may have, Michelle.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Stephen Quinn should also be given his title.

Do members have any other points?

Mr Weir: John Simpson's contribution was particularly helpful. Could he provide a short follow-up document?

The Committee Clerk: We could try to ring him.

Mr Weir: In the interests of having a balanced picture, it would be useful to have even a short paragraph on what he said. It would be better to contact John Simpson because I am always very reluctant to précis somebody else's work. Given that the contributions of DETI and Enterprise Northern Ireland were highlighted to a reasonable degree, it would be useful to highlight John Simpson's work, which I found useful.

The Committee Clerk: I will also add a sentence about the statutory responsibility that Enterprise Northern Ireland mentioned. I will enquire whether John Simpson wants to provide a few additional lines.

The next item is the date of the next meeting. The subgroup will have two meetings on Thursday. One or two members have yet to confirm their attendance. We ought to have a quorum. The meeting will last about an hour. I will try to compile summary document of emerging issues, and have them ready by close of play tomorrow.

Mr Weir: We are endeavouring to find a second party member to attend the later meeting.

The Committee Clerk: There has not been time to discuss what has happened at previous meetings, so that will be an hour well spent. If the subgroup is given an extra week to finalise its report, members who also sit on the Preparation for Government Committee should bear that in mind.

Dr McDonnell: When is the extra meeting?

The Committee Clerk: The extra meeting is at 3.30 pm on Thursday. There will be a meeting at 10.00 am as normal, and a one-hour session on emerging issues in the afternoon. We will need to have a quorum. Hansard will provide an official report, but proceedings will not be in public.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): It would be useful if members arrived early to get business under way.

Adjourned at 1.52 pm.

SUBGROUP ON THE ECONOMIC CHALLENGES FACING NORTHERN IRELAND

(EVIDENCE SESSION)

Thursday 3 August 2006

Members in attendance for all or part of proceedings:

The Chairman, Mr Francie Molloy
Mr Roy Beggs
Dr Esmond Birnie
Mr John Dallat
Mr Alex Easton
Mr David Ford
Ms Michelle Gildernew
Dr Alasdair McDonnell
Mr Barry McElduff
Mr David McNarry
Mr Sean Neeson
Mr Peter Weir

Witnesses:

Mr Tony Hopkins	}	Industrial Task Force
Sir George Quigley
Mr Michael Ryan
Mr Peter Bunting	}	Northern Ireland Committee, Irish Congress of Trade Unions
Mr John Corey
Mr Michael Kiddle
Dr Robson Davison	}	Department of Education
Mr Will Haire
Mrs Catherine Bell	}	Department for Learning and Employment
Mr Chris McConkey
Dr Aideen McGinley

The subgroup met at 10.05 am.

(The Chairman (Mr Molloy) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I have apologies from Mr Paisley Jnr. Mr Easton is attending in his place. Mr Dallat is here in place of Ms Ritchie, and Mr McElduff is in place of Mr McLaughlin.

Mr Easton: Mr Chairman, I will have to leave at about 12.00 noon as I have another engagement to attend.

Dr Birnie: I have to leave at 11.15 am, but I hope that a substitute will replace me.

The Committee Clerk: Members should try to avoid leaving in the middle of an evidence session.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are members content with the draft minutes of the meeting of 1 August?

Members indicated assent.

In matters arising, the Committee on the Preparation for Government (PFG) has moved back the deadline for the preparation of the subgroup's report by one week until 25 August. Additional Chairpersons have also been appointed. The Alliance party has nominated Naomi Long, and the Ulster Unionist Party has nominated Jim Wilson. With the agreement of the PFG, they have been added to the list of Chairpersons. The SDLP was to nominate by close of play on 2 August.

Mr Dallat: Alban Maginness is the SDLP nominee.

Ms Gildernew: Mr Chairman, who are the other Chairpersons?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Naomi Long, Jim Wilson and Alban Maginness.

The Committee Clerk will explain the format for the evidence sessions.

The Committee Clerk: There will be four evidence sessions today, so I recommend that you allow 45 minutes for each. The witnesses have all been advised of that. I am aware that, in the past, some witnesses have taken rather longer than 15 minutes to make their presentations, so you might need to speed them along from time to time.

With regard to future business, the extra week to complete the report will make all the difference, certainly for the Committee staff. With the original deadlines, the plan was to spend the final week drafting the emerging recommendations and writing the draft report until the very last day. That would have been very tight.

I suggest that the subgroup slots in a written evidence session on 15 August, because there will be quite a few written presentations, and the subgroup will not have an opportunity to read and consider them otherwise. That means that the members can look at and discuss emerging recommendations on 17 August. The following week, the subgroup can consider the draft report, which will be the week ending 25 August. If members agree, we can arrange the work plan on that basis.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are Members content with that? We should not try to have any more evidence sessions, as we will become overloaded otherwise. We should use the time available to benefit the subgroup in drawing up the draft report.

The Quinn Group is not available for the evidence session on 10 August. It has offered to give a written submission instead.

The Committee Clerk: Next Thursday the evidence sessions will be with Moy Park, the Ulster Farmers' Union, Wrightbus and the Department of Finance and Personnel.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Is the Northern Ireland Council for Voluntary Action (NICVA) the new name or the old name?

Mr McElduff: I think that the Northern Ireland Voluntary Trust changed its name to the Community Foundation for Northern Ireland; NICVA remained the same.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): OK. The closed session this afternoon will start at 3.30 pm and last about an hour. We must have a quorum, and we will consider the emerging issues. To date, we have just been taking evidence and we need an opportunity to discuss the issues that have emerged from the evidence sessions.

The Committee Clerk: A few members have indicated that they may not be able to make it. Can members confirm their attendance, to make sure that there will be a quorum?

Mr Weir: From the DUP, Wilson Clyde and I will be attending.

Ms Gildernew: We are good to attend.

Mr McElduff: We are absolutely committed.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Mr Dallat, are you able to attend this afternoon's session on emerging issues?

Mr Dallat: I am.

Mr Neeson: I am not able to attend this afternoon, but David Ford will be attending.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Last time, Mr McNarry made a boast.

Mr McNarry: I am not sure.

Dr Birnie: I am OK to attend.

The Committee Clerk: The afternoon session will begin at 3.30 pm and last about an hour. It is a key opportunity for the subgroup to consider and think about the emerging issues.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Members will have received the paper on emerging issues this morning.

The Committee Clerk: Two papers have been issued this morning: one is a summary of the various evidence sessions; the other is a research paper. I have also asked Paul Moore, who is assisting the subgroup, to prepare a paper. Members will have their own views, but the papers are there to assist them. Dr Gilleece has also prepared a paper, which will be distributed at this afternoon's session.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are we ready for the presentation from Sir George Quigley?

Mr Neeson: Sir Gorgeous George.

Mr McNarry: Galloway is not coming in here.
[Laughter.]

Ms Gildernew: Sean, if this relationship develops, will you need to avail yourself of the Cherry Room?
[Laughter.]

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Hansard is recording the proceedings!

Questions should be related as much as possible to the subgroup's terms of reference. Short questions will perhaps receive short answers.

I welcome Sir George Quigley, Tony Hopkins and Michael Ryan from the Industrial Task Force. If you would like to make a short opening presentation, members will ask questions. Thank you for attending at such short notice. The subgroup considers it important to seek views before it completes its report, which will be debated in the Assembly.

Sir George Quigley (Industrial Task Force): Thank you very much. I shall be as brief as I can. There is some ground that I wish to cover.

We were absolutely delighted to be invited to give evidence to this important subgroup, because getting the economic dimension right is essential for the future welfare and enduring stability of Northern Ireland.

We all hope that the position is swiftly reached whereby local Ministers take the critical decisions on that economic dimension. However, it is vital for the crucial issue of corporation tax, about which I shall speak later, to be decided as an indispensable component of the devolution settlement itself. The credibility of an Executive assuming responsibility, but without the tools to do the job, would quickly be put at risk.

I hope that it will be apparent from our presentation that the invitation to give evidence on the subgroup's three terms of reference has been taken very seriously. I may curtail the oral presentation in the interests of brevity, but I hope that members will all read the complete text. We will be pleased to engage in discussion later to elaborate those points to which I merely allude in the presentation.

10.15 am

To address first the major impediments to the development of the economy, the key point is that our economic structure is simply not fit for purpose. The wealth gap with the rest of the United Kingdom persists, with gross value added per head at about 80% of the UK average; in Scotland it is close to the average. At double the UK rate in the past 10 years, job growth has been good. However, our ability to catch up with the rest of the UK is hampered by the worrying negative trend in labour productivity: between 1998 and 2004 there was a drop of 7%, from just over 88% of the UK average to just under 82%.

Productivity in the production industries, including manufacturing, improved to slightly above the UK average; however, productivity in the service sector declined from 88% to a very poor 78%. It was in the service sector that the job growth occurred — almost 17%. Manufacturing, however, dropped by 13%. The gross value added of the service-sector jobs is only 72% of jobs in manufacturing.

It is clear that the structure of the Northern Ireland economy has been changing, but in precisely the opposite direction to the creation of the high-value-added economy that is the declared aim of Government policy. Restructuring has been taking place through an employment boom in low-productivity jobs. On that basis, the possibility of closing the wealth gap with the rest of the UK — still less of drawing level with the Republic, which has overtaken the UK — is remote.

The imbalance between the public and private sectors is not conducive to closing the wealth gap. The proportion of regional output spent by the Government on transfer payments, such as social security, or providing health and education services, is as much as 71% of gross domestic product (GDP). The public sector accounts for 35% of all employment but only 27% of gross value added. It therefore lags behind the wider economy in productivity levels. Public money directly or indirectly supports very strong consumer spending.

Simply cutting the public sector, as some suggest, would achieve nothing. It will have to find its appropriate level in a rebalanced economy that has a greatly enhanced market sector. Such enhancement is urgent, since the Government has announced that public-sector growth in the UK is set to drop, first to 3%, and then to 1.9% per annum, from the unprecedentedly high level of 4.9% in recent years.

Economies that have to stand on their own feet cannot grow sustainably unless they have sectors that generate growth in net exports. However, the relative dynamism of a region's export base is also critical. Regions with an above average output of tradable goods or services will also tend to have an above average per capita income, which we do not. Northern Ireland's manufacturing sales outside the Republic and the rest of the UK amount to only £3.5 billion per annum. Sales of services are unlikely to be more than a small fraction of that. To achieve catch-up with the rest of the UK and to close the wealth gap — and catching up with the average is no great ambition — Northern Ireland needs to achieve a massive increase in the size of its export base.

The conclusion is inescapable: Northern Ireland needs a far larger, export-driven private sector with higher value added, higher productivity and higher earning power. We need to be far more deeply integrated into the global economy. However, the existing private sector base lacks critical mass. However much its performance may be enhanced — and it can be enhanced — it cannot on its own get Northern Ireland onto a new economic trajectory, any more than the Republic's private sector base could have done.

We need to attract a much stronger flow of inward investment of the right kind — and I underline the importance of “the right kind” — to achieve the private sector base that I have just described. That will not happen without a competitive corporation tax rate. Failure to succeed on that front will constitute, in your terminology, an insuperable impediment to the development of the economy.

Underperformance by the existing base will also impede development. The growth task will fall largely to the companies in the technology and market sectors that have, or can develop, a competitive position. The Industrial Task Force has a great deal to say about the need for companies to understand technological change, develop their international trade capabilities and devote adequate resources to research and development. We recommended that a centre be established to help companies to brief themselves more effectively on relevant developments in technology worldwide.

The Government can assist the existing base; Invest Northern Ireland can encourage, stimulate and support. However, in the final analysis, the responsibility for growth must be vigorously and effectively discharged by business itself.

I will move on to the second area of the subgroup's remit, which is to consider the fiscal incentives that might promote foreign direct investment (FDI) and indigenous investment.

My first point is that the analysis that I have just given argues for a greatly increased flow of inward investment. As well as embarking on the long, slow task of growing your own timber, you must buy in the capabilities — innovation, skills and marketing outreach — of established, high value-added, technologically driven, profitable companies worldwide. That cannot be done without the ability to compete on corporation tax.

Given Northern Ireland's location on an island, of which the other half is able to offer a headline rate of 12.5% compared to our 30%, anything greater than 12.5% would not be competitive. A report by Goodbody Stockbrokers a year ago was unequivocal on that point:

“The 12.5% rate ... has been integral in sustaining Ireland's position as one of the leading recipients of foreign direct investment (FDI) in the world ... As an example ... in 2003 Ireland received 4.6% of all FDI flows globally. We put this success down to the favourable corporation tax rates offered by the Irish Government.”

That is 4.6% for a country with a population of around 3.5 million people.

Between 1995 and 2004, the FDI flows to the Republic of Ireland, translated into sterling, came to around £70 billion. That was 25 times the figure for Northern Ireland, which was around £2.8 billion. Some 90% of the Republic of Ireland's manufactured exports and 70% of its services exports are by foreign-owned companies. Its sales of manufactured goods outside the British Isles amount to almost 14 times the figure for Northern Ireland. FDI flows act on the economy qualitatively as well as quantitatively. Northern Ireland has simply not had that kind of impact or influence on its economy.

Unsurprisingly, the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) economic survey report on the Republic of Ireland in 1999 said that the:

"massive inflow of direct investment [had] been the major formative shock influencing the economy in the 1990s."

The International Financial Services Centre is a showcase for the policy. A tax partner in the Dublin office of PricewaterhouseCoopers said recently:

"The last big differentiator is low taxation. We would be extremely foolish to throw away that advantage."

I do not hear anybody in the South saying that that advantage should be thrown away.

A significant figure in the United States, who is very well versed in Irish affairs, recently wrote me a letter that was very supportive of the corporation tax proposal. He said:

"With all of the corporate and financial clients that I advise, the corporate tax rate is at the top of the list when we discuss potential foreign investments."

That gives a low-tax location a real head start in negotiations. A multitude of studies now demonstrate the importance of tax in the decisions of companies, as the decision to locate can often be a fine one, easily affected by differences in taxation.

Of course, global FDI ebbs and flows. However, it is crucial that we position ourselves to get a bigger share of what is available. When tax is so important, being competitive on everything except tax will not achieve that.

I have seen it argued that our headline, or standard, tax rate of 30% does not really matter because, when tax allowances are taken into account, the effective rate of tax is much lower, and the gap between the rate here and that in the Republic becomes insignificant. However, the published studies do not indicate that. They measure the effective tax rate in the same way as does a company doing its appraisal of various potential investment locations.

A 2005 study by one of the prime European research institutions, covering all 25 EU countries, found that the effective average tax rate for the Republic was 14.7%, while that for the UK was 28.9%, which is nearly double. The UK's was the seventh highest, and the Republic's was bettered only by Cyprus at 9.7%, Lithuania at 12.8% and Latvia at 14.4%. In fact, the Republic's headline rate was better than those in either Latvia or Lithuania.

That is not to say that a low headline rate is not important, because it is. It is important for successful and profitable companies, which we want in Northern Ireland. Of course, the sheer market arousal effect of a low headline rate is very potent, as the Republic has discovered.

There is also a concept that is known as the effective marginal tax rate, and confusion is often caused when that is cited in discussions of taxation as a location factor. It is important to be very clear that, according to the research, the effective marginal tax rate has no statistically significant impact on location decisions. The important fact is the effective average tax rate. I would be happy to discuss those somewhat technical points, because they are important.

So far as inward investment goes, being cheek by jowl on the island with a state that is able to attract most of the significant growth and follow-on growth that comes to the island has been, frankly, a serious disadvantage. However, if the tax disadvantage were removed, Northern Ireland would derive immense benefit from sharing the island with a state that is already so globalised. It would not be a huge step for the host of foreign companies who already have the Republic in their viewfinders to widen the lens a little and take in the whole island. It is a delusion to talk of an island economy when there is such a serious impediment to the free flow of investment into and within the island.

A strong economic cluster that extends over the whole island and derives strength from the capacity that is available in both parts enhances the ability of both to participate fully in the global trade and investment flows. That could be very relevant, given that some surveys draw attention to the high cost base and skills shortages of the Republic. In other words, this need no longer be a zero-sum game as regards the two halves of the island.

It is interesting that neither the Prime Minister, nor the Chancellor nor the Secretary of State, has ruled out changes to corporation tax; that has created the opportunity for the issue to be considered on its merits. To fail to press it to a conclusion would, in the judgement of the Industrial Task Force, be to lose an opportunity to set Northern Ireland on the path to a new economic future. That opportunity is unprecedented and unlikely to recur. Benefits would not only accrue to Northern Ireland; the benefits to the UK national interest of a stable, prosperous Northern Ireland are self-evident.

Moreover, stimulating an increase in the tax base by lowering the tax rate, as happened so effectively in the Republic, is the only means of reducing public-sector dependency and curtailing the £6 billion-a-year drain on Exchequer funds. Eleven out of the 14 OECD countries that lowered their company tax rates between 2000 and 2004 increased their corporate tax receipts. For that reason, it is wholly unreasonable to suggest that the Northern Ireland public-expenditure block should be cut by the amount that the Treasury would lose in the short term in corporation tax receipts.

The reduction in corporation tax would be a major strategic initiative designed to enable Northern Ireland, for the first time, to stand more on its own feet to the mutual benefit of the Treasury and the region. To take away some of the existing economic props while a more robust structure is in gestation would be counterproductive as well as — particularly in the context of a new Executive — politically unrealistic. If, as we are told, the goal is a more sustainable economy rather than one stuck indefinitely in the rut of public-sector dependency and unable to catch up with either Great Britain or the Republic, a major catalyst, rather than mere incremental tinkering, is required. The Industrial Task Force is not aware of any alternative means that have been suggested for achieving sustainability.

10.30 am

I have focused on the relevance of a corporation tax change for inward investment, but it could also be expected to administer a beneficial shock to the existing base. The business bodies at UK national level have been arguing strongly that a reduction in corporation tax is a key factor in enabling business to compete. It would be odd if local businesses were uniquely immune from the positive effects of tax change.

The Industrial Task Force has commissioned further work on the corporation tax proposition. This will seek, inter alia, to assess more precisely the economic gain, as well as the likely effect in the short and longer term on the tax yield and on the annual Treasury subvention. Importantly, it will also identify other elements of the company tax regime — in addition to the low headline rate — which have made the Republic highly attractive to FDI. Since the Industrial Task Force sees its role as being primarily to support the thrust of the political parties on this issue — in other words, you — the results of that further work will, of course, be placed at the subgroup's disposal.

The case for achieving economic growth by significantly enhancing fiscal incentives to encourage expenditure on R&D has been examined in a recent report by Prof Richard Harris, commissioned by the Economic Research Institute of Northern Ireland (ERINI). The report suggests that there are more fundamental reasons than cost for firms not investing in R&D. The basic problem is not a resource gap or the cost of R&D, but a capabilities gap, and changing capabilities takes a long time. The report concluded that, on its own, an R&D tax credit — which, of course, would be expensive — is unlikely to remedy the lack of an R&D culture in the Province.

That accords with a report on the UK generally by PricewaterhouseCoopers's London office, which looked at the take-up by SMEs of a range of tax breaks. The report found that most small firms do not change their plans or behaviours because of potential tax rewards. Instead, they see them as a reward for work they would do anyway.

Even if it could be demonstrated that such tax breaks are effective, they would be primarily relevant to the existing industrial base. There is no evidence that they would be relevant in the context of the location decisions of FDI. They would not exert significant leverage on the fundamental issue, which is radical economic restructuring. They would, therefore, be no substitute for the corporation tax proposal and would not be directed to, or achieve, its purposes.

In the context of fiscal incentives, there has been some discussion on the reduction of fuel duty. I will not go into that as it is covered in my paper, but the argument for it on business cost grounds alone is not on a par with the strategic arguments to be adduced for a reduction in corporation tax. We can deal with that issue later, if the subgroup wishes to do so.

Finally, I turn to the construction of an economic package, or a peace dividend, to contribute to economic regeneration. The fundamental requirement is that an incoming Executive should be able to demonstrate that it has the means to make a successful assault on the critical problem — the unsustainability of a grossly unbalanced economy which, despite massive annual transfers from the Exchequer, cannot achieve the average wealth level for the UK. Without a competitive tax rate, the necessary radical restructuring will simply not be achieved.

It would be counter-productive to trade such an initiative for other measures, which when viewed in a historical perspective, simply represent more of the same.

That is not to say that there is no need for other compatible initiatives that contribute to the restructuring objective. Such initiatives do not necessarily require more money. In some cases, it may be a matter of directing existing resources more effectively. That is why without a detailed examination of the relevant budgets, which would only be possible from within Government, it is difficult to quantify the resource implications of such initiatives.

I shall do no more than offer five brief guidelines. First, if the key to a sustainable economic future lies in a major expansion of the market sector, it is vital that Invest Northern Ireland be adequately resourced to match the competition in state aids. To boost the performance of companies in such critical areas as R&D, technology licensing and export marketing, it is important that INI be as well equipped and effective as Enterprise Ireland in the Republic.

Secondly, the important untapped source of labour supply, which is represented by our disproportionately large economically inactive population, must be equipped to enter the labour market. There is also a need to upgrade the skill levels of the population.

Thirdly, setting firm targets for eliminating the long tail of underachievement in the education system and closely tracking and tackling obstacles to that is long overdue. Making the profile of the education system match our economic ambitions should be part of the ongoing agenda.

Fourthly, tourism should be contributing three times as much to GDP as it currently does. Again, firm targets should be in place to make that happen.

Finally, with regard to infrastructure, it is important to recognise the big increase in the projected amounts available for capital spending and, therefore, to assess the validity of the balance within those numbers. Indeed, I have heard people argue that one should devise a scoring system for individual projects, because if growing the market sector is to be the centrepiece of economic policy, infrastructure deficits that could frustrate that policy should clearly have priority.

I have not dealt with the issue of business rates, because I understand that that is going to be the subject of a separate study.

An economic package constructed on these lines could usefully supplement the reduction in the rate of corporation tax and improve the supply-side conditions that enhance the attractiveness of a host location. It is essentially and inevitably more of the same — although its elements could hopefully be more effectively targeted and better delivered than hitherto. It cannot achieve the necessary step change. It is, therefore, no substitute for the reduction in corporation tax, which is needed to attract the global investor without whose help Northern Ireland simply cannot get on to a new economic trajectory.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Thank you, George.

Mr McNarry: Good morning, Sir George. It is good to see you looking as well as ever. That is one secret that you must pass on, never mind anything else.

Presentations by business and commerce-related groups have so far laced the flavour of the cocktail that may result in a reduction in corporate tax. Without wishing to be abrupt — I have to ask this, because the question will be asked outside — can the business sector be justifiably accused of using the current political climate of talks to restore devolution to promote selfishly alternative incentives? Is it badgering the political parties, while they prepare for a devolved Government, to extract a special package from the Treasury or Gordon Blair?

Mr Weir: Surely you mean Tony Blair or Gordon Brown?

Mr McNarry: Whatever I said, I will reverse it.
[Laughter.]

It is important for those who have chosen to go down the political route to know whether they can pull off a reduction in the corporation tax rate. The same applies to the introduction of water rates, as the public are up in arms about that. There is an expectancy that MLAs would do something about that if the Assembly were restored tomorrow. The UUP would do something about it, but I cannot speak for the other parties.

Finally, how consistent with the direct rulers is the Industrial Task Force in its request, or demand, for a reduction in the corporation tax rate? Is it getting anywhere with them, and are they listening? Are they making any promises, saying that it is a good idea and that they will think about it?

Sir George Quigley: That is a fair question, and I will answer it in two parts. First, I will deal with your question on whether this is a selfishly driven agenda by the business sector. I can only speak for the Industrial Task Force — but I would be surprised if what I say does not apply more generally. I have been amazed by the extent to which the debate in the business sector has focused on macroeconomic issues. In other words, the Industrial Task Force was driven to this conclusion. It is not the kind of natural conclusion that one would reach, because it is a difficult one, but the Industrial Task Force was driven to it following its analysis. If one simply has to seek more outside investment to make anything of the Northern Ireland economy, and if that requires us to be competitive on the corporation tax rate, as well as on everything else, there is no option but to go for the only weapon capable of delivering the outcome.

Business colleagues have said that they are concerned about the economy; therefore, they would be happy if the lower corporation tax rate were limited for inward investment purposes. Northern Ireland businesses would be happy to take the pain of foregoing a lower corporation tax rate for indigenous businesses, provided that we get a weapon that will make this place go forward. Ultimately, more outside investment will benefit everyone, and I have heard people make that point. However, it would be difficult to implement, because one does not want indigenous businesses to be disadvantaged, especially if businesses from outside wish to invest in the same field. I have also heard people make that point. Lowering corporation tax is difficult. However, if it is the only way in which Northern Ireland will get up to the right level of economic performance, and it is the right thing to do, we must go for it.

With regard to your question about progress with direct rulers, the Industrial Task Force's objective was to prevent direct rule wiping the issue off the table before anyone could debate it. We have been successful in that, inasmuch as the Secretary of State, having read our report, said that the issues that it raised were important and merited serious consideration. In other words, he did not tell us that a debate on the issue was out of the question.

When we met the Prime Minister — the Taoiseach was also there — he said that it was interesting that the Republic had benefited from it and that we must seriously consider the matter. When we met Gordon Brown — and I met him privately for discussion — he did not say that a lower corporation tax rate was simply not on, but he could have done so. Direct rule ministers are taking the view, and the Prime Minister said this, that if we want the UK Government to radically reform the economy, a lower corporation tax rate is more likely to be introduced if local politicians support the idea.

The Prime Minister was not saying that the lower rate was bound to be granted if it were put forward by local politicians; he was saying that if there was a route towards a lower rate, it was that route, not the route of business going to direct rule Ministers and expecting a definitive decision from them.

In common parlance, it is all to play for: the door has been left open, and it would be a great pity if the once-and-for-all opportunity to do it were passed over.

10.45 am

Mr McNarry: I am grateful to Sir George for his explanation.

I take the point of what direct rule Ministers, the Prime Minister and the Chancellor have said to you in not dismissing this. Was there a sense that they would not dismiss it if the proposals were to come from local politicians, but that they would dismiss it if local politicians were not able to put themselves in a position to make those proposals?

Sir George Quigley: They were not going as far as that, as that point did not arise in that form. However — and we all hope that this will not happen — if one were in a situation where devolved Government did not prove possible, one would still be left with the big issue: will Northern Ireland simply go into decline because the public sector is not growing and the productivity gap is widening. Where will it end up? The baton would have to be passed on.

Mr Michael Ryan (Industrial Task Force): I am one of the businessmen on the task force — and some of you have been to those forums. I have made it clear, with respect to the potential reduction in corporation tax affecting already indigenous businesses, that from a Northern Ireland plc point of view, I would be prepared to accept the fact that it did not apply to my company.

My company does not have anything to prove regarding its investment in Northern Ireland over the past 15 years. If the lower rate were to apply to new FDI only, I would accept that. On the other hand, to reinforce this from a business point of view, and with the global economy as it is, we must do something different, even businesses such as ours. As businessmen in the community, we have to deal with the global pressures that force us to reassess our businesses and look for more radical solutions than we would have considered previously.

From discussions amongst ourselves, we decided that it was time to try to do something different. If that meant that established businesses would not avail of it, then, from a Northern Ireland plc viewpoint, there are bound to be spin offs, as Sir George mentioned. Even if my company and some of the larger companies in Northern Ireland were to expand, and even if we were to double, it would not make enough difference. We cannot expand with the people who are already here — even if we doubled our business, which would be unbelievable for us, and for companies such as Seagate Technology and Caterpillar. New people must come in — how can we achieve that?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Time is running out, so please keep questions short and answers brief.

Mr Neeson: Of all the organisations that have come before the subgroup, the Industrial Task Force is the first to focus on the single issue. Are the other fiscal incentives that are in place working? We have talked about the impact of industrial derating before, but has it had an impact on attracting inward investment? Secondly Sir George, you talk about the rebalanced economy. Who will drive it? Will it be the business sector, the Government or what?

Sir George Quigley: In answer to the last question about who will drive a rebalanced economy, I look forward to an economic future when market activity will, hopefully, drive the economy much more effectively. In other words, as I said during my presentation, companies must get up and go and make things happen. They must be ambitious for their futures. In doing so, business contributes not only to Northern Ireland's economic future, but, because economics, politics and stability are tied up together, it contributes to its political future as well.

The Government can do certain things, such as creating a business-friendly environment, which has been a big factor in the South. Other important factors include consistency in policy and infrastructure or, for example, where the Government intervene in training arrangements. However, without a catalyst to bring companies through the door, there is nothing for anyone to work with.

The South has had much success in attracting a huge mass of investment. In turn, that success gives everyone in the education system the goal to address how to meet the needs of that inward flow of investment and to get the infrastructure and telecommunications right. There is a strong stimulus to do things right simply because people are battering at the door saying that they have come to invest and that that is what they want. By introducing a driver, the positive forces for the development of the economy are internalised.

In considering fiscal incentives for R&D, members may wish to read Prof Richard Harris's report, if they have not already done so. He makes the point that tax credits alone do not develop a culture attuned to R&D, etc. The impediments have nothing to do with the expense of R&D: it is about getting into the minds of companies that R&D is part of the company breathing process in the same way as training or reaching new markets.

There is no evidence yet that tax credits produce the kind of change that we all want. Critically, tax credits would be relevant only to the industrial base that is already here: they would not do anything for bringing in companies.

Mr Weir: Thank you, Sir George and colleagues, for your presentation. You have made a persuasive case for the reduction of corporation tax. Let me play devil's advocate on a couple of points to see your reaction.

You stated that the responses from the Secretary of State through to the Prime Minister — or perhaps more appropriately through to the Chancellor — have been along the lines that the serious issues that have been raised deserve serious consideration. Such responses often smack to me of the answer really being no and Ministers not wanting a public row. Or Ministers may feel that although they know that they will not agree to something, there is some merit in holding out a carrot suggesting that it could happen, because that applies additional pressure to restore devolution, which is clearly the Government's principal objective. If the Government have not closed the door, and clear benefits could flow from a reduction in corporation tax, I wonder why they have not introduced it by now.

Secondly, it has been suggested that a reduced rate of corporation tax in one region of a country may breach EU guidelines, as it may constitute state aid. How do you answer that point, and can you provide us with any worked examples within the EU of a country where one region has been given a different tax regime to another? That would be useful if we are to make the case for a reduction in corporation tax.

Finally, I see the benefits of a reduced corporation tax for foreign direct investment. However, on page 13 or 14 of your presentation, you say that you believe that a reduced corporation tax would give:

“a considerable boost to the hospitality industry.”

Will you explain why that would be, as I am not clear on how that would be of particular benefit to the hospitality industry?

Sir George Quigley: As far as the attitude of the Government is concerned, only time will tell.

All that business can do is to place the ball properly on the field and give all the support that it can. In this case, the strikers are the local politicians, and I believe passionately that it is they who can get the ball into the net. That will have to be as indispensable a part of a settlement for devolution as the political aspect.

It would be totally unfair for an Executive that does not have the tools to do the job properly to be forced to make many unpopular decisions and fail to deliver. Once that happens, the British Government will be over the hills and far away, and the Executive will be left holding the baby. If the Executive were to ask Government for this radical change, Government would simply say that the Executive has its public expenditure block, and it can do whatever it likes with it. We now have the opportunity of a lifetime.

Surmounting EU obstacles will be a challenge. However, if Europe wants to do something, it will be done. A compelling case would have to be made. Spain and Portugal have been able to make some changes to their tax regimes.

Mr Weir: I appreciate that you cannot expand too much on that issue, but if there were examples of areas where different tax regimes have not been challenged or overturned, it would be useful for the subgroup to know about them. For instance, the Azores has been mentioned. You could perhaps put any examples in writing to the subgroup.

Sir George Quigley: There are a few successful examples. We are in a unique position on this island because Northern Ireland is cheek by jowl with a strong player that will always be able to outbid it for really attractive investment opportunities. That type of relationship does not exist in any other part of Europe. Where else has a North/South Ministerial Council? Where else are there interstate bodies, and so forth?

We are in a unique position to mount a sustainable argument. We need to get the best possible argument, and we must ensure that it sticks.

Mr Tony Hopkins (Industrial Task Force): The timing of this initiative is the key point. I approach this issue from a different perspective; I was at the sharp end during the 1980s and the early 1990s, competing with the Republic for inward investment through the Industrial Development Board (IDB). Almost everything was similar, North and South, although in some ways the North had a better infrastructure, a better economic background and our people were just as talented. However, we always failed on the corporation tax issue. It was a block on every discussion that we had with a major company, and many companies would not even speak to us.

At the end of the 1980s, we had a bash at changing the situation. We made valiant attempts with the Treasury, with the backing of the Northern Ireland Civil Service. Although the case was sound, we were seen off because although many aspects were exactly the same as they are now, we had no leverage. Given the precarious nature of our economy — productivity is going down, we are gaining jobs but they are not the right types of jobs to build an economy that can become self-sustaining — the timing of this initiative presents us with an opportunity to do something major and radical.

Sir George Quigley: In the hospitality industry, our hoteliers — the people providing facilities and so forth — are competing in an island market. Visitors come to the island, and we want them to spend time in Northern Ireland. However, the service providers are paying UK rates of corporation tax. People in the industry have told me that that disadvantages Northern Ireland. Therefore, it would be very odd indeed if people could not benefit from that type of tax change. If you told people elsewhere in the UK that they could have their tax rate reduced to that level, they would jump at it.

11.00 am

Mr McNarry: Did you know that members are now contributing to the economy? This morning, our mileage allowance was reduced.

Ms Gildernew: Gentlemen, you are very welcome. It is interesting that you say that any rate above 12.5% would not be competitive. You are basically arguing for the harmonisation of tax rates across the island.

I approach this matter from a slightly different perspective. Other contributors have recognised that FDI will not go to rural areas. That investment goes to Belfast and perhaps Derry, but other than that, it will have no impact. Other contributors have said that the Barnett formula may be looked at again and that less money may go to our overall budget. I am concerned about the impact of that on rural areas. How do you see the situation developing if jobs are all located in and around Belfast?

Another interesting area was mentioned in the final stage of your report, which addressed education and skills. We all know that numeracy and literacy levels are not what they should be. At the moment, we have smaller classes, and that presents opportunities for more time to be given to individuals in the classroom. That is a huge opportunity for us, but the education budgets are being cut, and we will lose that opportunity to raise the level of educational attainment. The budget for adult learning has also been cut. What impact do you think that that will have?

I noticed that you mentioned the lack of skills. You are clearly saying that we must invest more in education, in schools and in adult learning to increase the skills level and get those who are, at the moment, economically inactive into the workplace. We need those people, and we need them to be sufficiently skilled to take up that challenge.

Sir George Quigley: Absolutely. That is very important. There are two matters that one is always keeping in tension and, hopefully, in harmony. One is the collective good, for which we must revivify the economy and raise its performance to a high level. We are climbing Everest; we are not just climbing a few thousand feet. At the same time, we must ensure that individuals have maximum opportunities, and that means equipping them with the wherewithal to participate in the labour market.

If people do not have numeracy and literacy skills, they are not able to get on the first rung of the ladder. That is very important, but unless we are equally effectively developing labour-market opportunities, there is no point in producing many skilled people and many people who go on to higher education. We must do that in individual terms, but we also want to give those people opportunities. At the moment, far too many people are having to find their opportunities outside Northern Ireland, or they are taking jobs in Northern Ireland that are far below the level at which they could usefully be employed. I agree with you totally about the importance of an emphasis on education.

Could I also respond to the point about the location of investment? One very interesting thing about the experience in the South is the extent to which business and inward investment has been prepared to invest all over the state. For example, from memory, something like 50% of projects last year were located away from the Dublin area.

One of the most interesting inward investment projects I have seen for a long time was announced ten days ago in the South. A company in the huge Johnson and Johnson group will make stents for people who are challenged in a cardiac fashion, so to speak. That company will undertake development work and production, employing 460 people. Where is that investment going? Cashel. That investment will affect the whole area. Why should investment not go to Enniskillen? Why should it not go to Strabane, Ballymena, Coleraine, or wherever?

Ms Gildernew: The difference is that there is a motorway to Cashel, which I pass frequently on the road to Cork.

The existing roads infrastructure allows investment in Cork, Limerick and Galway.

Liam Nellis presented an interesting slide on high performers and high earners, and another on educational attainment. They were damning. Border areas experienced the lowest levels of educational attainment. Overall, there were very few high earners in the North in contrast to the Twenty-six Counties. From that point of view, Cashel may be a more attractive prospect than Enniskillen will ever be. We do not have the roads infrastructure to get people that far west; that represents a disadvantage. How can rural areas compete and benefit from this increase? I fear that we will be left far behind and that a new economic wasteland will be created: Fermanagh and Tyrone.

Sir George Quigley: Let us stuff Northern Ireland with inward investment proposals, and there will be no wastelands. Infrastructure ought to be very carefully proofed, to see where failure to do it would impair economic objectives. If the road system to Enniskillen is going to impair the ability to create opportunities in Fermanagh, it ought to be addressed. We cannot be content with simply saying that in 2020 or 2050, some parts of Northern Ireland are not going to attract investment because people are not adequately educated and the infrastructure is inadequate. That would be an unacceptable proposition.

Inward investment will become a driver; without it there would never have been such investment in infrastructure and in second- and third-level education in the South. It is a tremendous driver for change in all areas.

Mr Dallat: I taught for several years in the Republic, where there was no selection. Are we still living with prejudice against vocational education? Is that a factor? Are we still exporting our brightest people to the best academic institutions in Britain? How much is that affecting the needs of employers? What can a new Assembly do to break down that prejudice and address the huge problems it has created?

Sir George Quigley: Your point about very bright people leaving is well made. I was a member of the Dearing Committee on higher education seven or eight years ago, and I argued passionately in the Northern Ireland chapter — which I got all my colleagues throughout the UK to support — that we needed far more higher education places in Northern Ireland.

Absolutely nothing was done about it. It is so obvious a point that it scarcely bears consideration. However, far from doing that, for a long time the universities in Northern Ireland were the only ones in which numbers were capped.

Mr Dallat: That is still the case.

Sir George Quigley: So here we are. Whereas Scotland has the equivalent of two universities underpinned by a mass of students coming in from outside Scotland, we are exporting people. How can we credibly say that we want to build up a knowledge economy and a region that shines in world terms, when we have not been able to provide the higher education facilities that we need?

Also, you are right that the primary level is critical. I do not advocate great schemes, but institution by institution, we must be able to measure progress on a five-year basis until we have no one emerging at age 11 with a reading age of seven and a numeracy age of seven or eight. It is appalling that that is happening; it means that whatever might happen at secondary level, those people are deprived of a future.

Mr Dallat: In the short term I get the impression that industry has been saved to some extent by migrant labourers from eastern Europe.

It has also come to my attention time and time again that the skills of those people are not matched to the needs of the employers. We heard some examples in previous evidence sessions. The most recent example was of a highly qualified engineer, with additional qualifications in transportation, working in a car breaker's yard. How damaging is it when the mechanisms in place to assess people create that kind of situation?

Sir George Quigley: We are all at the early stages of this. So far, immigration has been relatively low compared to the South, where 8% of the workforce is now from overseas — which is incredible for a country that had net outward migration for years. We are only starting to find out how to use people properly. It has taken 2,000 years to find out how to use the indigenous population properly, so it may take a few more years to find out how to deal with those coming from outside.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Gentlemen, we are running out of time, so I propose to take three short questions together from Alasdair McDonnell, Barry McElduff and Esmond Birnie.

Dr McDonnell: Thank you very much, Sir George. I apologise for missing the first part of your presentation, but I certainly got the gist of what you said.

You have already covered some of my points during the extensive questions that you have already answered. For me, the economy ties back to creating employment and to education. How do we tackle underachievement in education in inner-city areas, particularly in Belfast?

That is a major drag on the economy. How can we get a bigger slice of the island economy? Should the tax regime be fixed? Are there other options if that is not possible?

Mr McElduff: My question concerns political stability and how it might impact on the economy. I invite the Industrial Task Force to offer an opinion on how the continuation of direct rule would be bad for the economy in the North.

Dr Birnie: First, to what extent might the corporation tax proposal be vulnerable to the phenomenon of transfer pricing, which has happened in the Irish Republic? Further to that, might the corporation tax advantage be nullified in the future — or even the near future — through moves made with regard to the United States Internal Revenue Service?

Secondly, does the Republic of Ireland experience of having a low corporation tax rate genuinely prove the point that it leads to higher R&D? The Southern Irish R&D rate is not notably high.

Sir George Quigley: With regard to getting a larger share of the island economy: if we do not get corporation tax, we can nibble at the edges of it. We can try to do more to get companies North and South interacting with one another. InterTradeIreland is doing a very good job, not just in promoting trade relationships. After all, 27% of Northern Ireland's exports now go to the Republic. That is the same percentage as goes to the whole of the rest of Europe.

Much has been done to get the trade interactions going. Again, people in the pharmaceutical cluster in the South and those in the very minute cluster in the North, for example, can be encouraged to interact more with one another. Frankly, the big mover will be the freeing-up of investment flows. That would really open the door 90 degrees, whereas anything else would open it 5% or 10%. It would mean pegging away at more of the same, and that will include more of what InterTradeIreland is there to do.

11.15 am

In order to tackle educational underachievement, the situation must be micromanaged. What made the eastern Pacific education system so good was that individual schools related to their communities. They understood that three partners were involved: the parents; the school; and the pupils. Northern Ireland must adopt that same mindset, which is that the school must add value to every single person who comes through its doors. Everybody here would agree that one factor that holds back performance is parents' and teachers' low expectations. Our mindset must be transformed.

Schools in Northern Ireland that have done very well have adopted some interesting practices. There are schools in Belfast and in Derry that are among the top performers despite being situated in difficult social areas. Those schools do not have — or, according to one's expectations, should not have — much external support, yet they are doing extremely well. They have adopted many innovative measures, including involving parents through having them take classes in the school and setting up after-school initiatives where kids can do their homework free from neighbourhood distractions. Therefore, we must micromanage rather than settle for the broad-brush approach that leaves it to the system to make things happen.

I was asked whether direct rule is good or bad for the economy. Looking back over the past 30 years, which is beyond the memory of some of you, I can think of a number of people who were fully committed to Northern Ireland. Stan Orme was a radical political figure in many ways, but he was absolutely solid on the economy, as was Roy Mason. Both were prepared to do significant things for Northern Ireland, and both fought their corner with the Treasury in order to get special things done here. Those days are largely gone. Direct rule Ministers may be well intentioned and may be doing their best, but decisions will always be taken in line with priorities that are not necessarily Northern Ireland's priorities.

You people are steeped in the local situation; you can say what is right for this place's future, and then single-mindedly go for it. That is my general answer to the question, so I hope that you will be sitting in the seats of power very soon.

As Dr Birnie knows, transfer pricing is pretty strictly regulated internationally. If there were any question, for example, of wanting to adapt corporation tax to transactions between Great Britain and Northern Ireland or between companies, that can be readily done, and the accountants that one talks to say that there is not really an issue there. Moreover, people in the International Financial Services Centre in Dublin worried about companies putting up their brass plate, but doing nothing more than that. I think that means were found to counter that. Good, practical answers exist to all those questions.

I was asked whether the situation between the Republic of Ireland and the United States Internal Revenue Service could change. What is great about the inward-investment process is that it is good for both the US and the Republic of Ireland. Shareholders in the United States are getting a very good deal. They make good profits by locating companies in the Republic of Ireland. If any attempt was made to change that, pretty powerful lobbies in the US would say: "No, of course the countries that we go to get benefit, but we get a lot of benefit as well." One should not underestimate the power of the Irish lobby either in the US.

People in Ireland will be very reluctant to see any change. I quoted a personal, confidential letter that I received on the US stance. I cannot reveal the identity of the writer, except to say that it was someone who would have been pretty sensitive to the considerations that Dr Birnie mentioned.

As for research and development, it is very difficult to develop a regional system of innovation of the sort to which Dr Birnie alluded. All the experts say that developing such a system is a long, slow process. That is where we must almost jump a stage and latch on to what the big global companies can do on a massive scale. It is interesting that Prof Richard Harris's report mentioned the importance of an inward investment policy that brought in the big players who, because of their economies of scale and scope, can do research and development on a massive scale.

I hope that some of the research and development activity going on and the links being made to local academic institutions would rub off on the indigenous base. However, that could take years of effort. There are few examples worldwide of where it has been done successfully.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Thank you, Gentlemen. I am sorry that we had to rush at the end of a very important contribution. Thank you for attending. We have your documentation. Perhaps you could send the subgroup any information that you have on examples of the co-operation about which Peter Weir asked.

Sir George Quigley: Thank you very much, Mr Chairman, for the reception that you gave us. We will do our best on Mr Weir's question, although I suspect that there may be little information on the issue. We will be breaking new ground to some extent, but why should we be afraid of that?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): You are very welcome, Gentlemen. I apologise for the overrun in the last session. I hope that we can keep the questions and the submissions in this session short.

Mr Michael Kiddle (Northern Ireland Committee, Irish Congress of Trade Unions): The panel is John Corey from the Northern Ireland Public Service Alliance (NIPSA), who is also a member of the Northern Ireland Committee, Irish Congress of Trade Unions (NICITU); Peter Bunting, who is the assistant general secretary of NICITU, based in Northern Ireland; and I am Michael Kiddle, chairman of NICITU for the next two years.

Mr Peter Bunting (Northern Ireland Committee, Irish Congress of Trade Unions): I thank the subgroup for giving us this opportunity. It is important that trade unions have an input into the drafting of economic and social policy in Northern Ireland, specifically in an economic context. We are aware of the dysfunctional nature of Northern Ireland's economy and its almost weekly exacerbation by the loss of jobs.

Over the next year, about 1,500 jobs will haemorrhage from the Ministry of Defence, 500 from the Prudential Assurance Company Limited, from Visteon in west Belfast and from other companies — Teletech Europe in Duncairn Gardens looks to be under threat. That will lead to a huge loss of disposable income in Northern Ireland. That loss, allied to the increase in domestic rates, the high energy charges and the imposition of water charges, will have an adverse domino effect on the services sector.

The economic outlook in Northern Ireland is gloomy. With that in mind, we set out to have a debate on the economy and have drafted a statement on the economy, 'Not Old Wine in New Bottles'. In recent years, the same old theories and propositions have been advanced on how to cure the ills of the Northern Ireland economy. We have set out our position in this document. It is all predicated on our belief that it is imperative — and, I must emphasise, on an economic and social basis only — that the Assembly and the devolutionary process be instituted. That will become clear during the presentation.

The trade union movement believes that the ills of our economy cannot be solved by direct rule. Direct rule is currently the Treasury's main vehicle for recouping as much money as it gives to Northern Ireland in the subvention — for example, through the proposed water charges. Our propositions will not be implemented by direct rule; the best way forward is to engage in a devolutionary process, which offers democratic accountability on the economic and social aspirations and objectives.

The document addresses a number of issues. The first is the argument that the public sector is too big. Our view on that is simple: the private sector is too small and the public sector is not too big. We primarily believe that the crucial missing link in Northern Ireland is the absence of a wealth- and job-creating sector, an enterprise sector and an innovation sector. There is also a lack of enterprise, and, importantly, the only way to overcome that is by mobilising the human, social, economic and political will. That can only occur with devolution, the absence of which will not create any momentum or dynamic in the economy.

Mr John Corey (Northern Ireland Committee, Irish Congress of Trade Unions): To return to the Committee's terms of reference: the first task is to identify major impediments to the development of the economy. We very often hear that the size of the public sector is an impediment to the development of the economy. At best, it is presented as too large; at worst, it is presented as a drain on the private sector and damaging to the private sector's interests. One argument is that the availability of jobs in the public sector acts as a disincentive to people seeking jobs in the private sector. The trade unions do not share that analysis. Our submission tackles some of the arguments, and I would like to address four points that I think the subgroup should particularly consider when producing its report. The argument about the size of the public sector in Northern Ireland is such a populist one that it must be addressed and tackled head on.

My first point is that GDP comparisons are often made between Northern Ireland and the UK as a whole, and that Northern Ireland compares very unfavourably with the rest of the UK. However, we strongly argue that making such a comparison is not comparing like with like. Compare Northern Ireland to a similar region in the UK — if there is a region that exactly matches Northern Ireland — and one will find that the GDP figures are more comparable. However, other factors are difficult to measure in that, in comparison to the rest of the UK, the size of Northern Ireland's public sector is also dictated by economies of scale. Northern Ireland must set up an infrastructure of public services, whereas a single region of the UK may not have to set up the same infrastructure — it may have access to services that are on the same land mass. Those comparisons are not valid and should not be used to attack the public sector in Northern Ireland.

11.30 am

The second point concerns the number of public-sector jobs in Northern Ireland. Wildly varying statistics are given about those jobs compared to the private sector. The data that we have indicate that the Northern Ireland public sector accounts for 27·1% of employee jobs, compared to 21% in the UK. It could be said that the Northern Ireland figure is higher, but again, that would lead to regional comparisons and comparing like with like. The figure of 27·1% rises to 31·4% if you include reserved functions, such as security and UK central Government Departments.

A figure of 60% is sometimes quoted for public-sector jobs in Northern Ireland. That is not a true figure. If every conceivable public-sector job is included, that figure is around 30%. However, the health and education sectors account for 70% of that 30% — those are frontline staff. No matter what argument is made about the size of the public sector, the number of staff in the health and education sectors will not fundamentally change, because the trend is to employ more staff to provide more priority services. It is therefore important that the data and their relevance are understood. We argue that public services should be staffed to meet the public needs, no more and no less.

The third point, which is relevant to the Northern Ireland economy, is the trend advocated and pursued by direct rule Ministers and the Strategic Investment Board to shift jobs from public services to the private sector through private finance initiatives (PFI). Of the many instances of that, two current examples come to mind. First, Civil Service personnel work is being shifted to the private sector, with the loss of around 600 jobs. Secondly, the Civil Service accommodation estate is being shifted. Around 76 Government buildings are being shifted to the private sector, with the potential loss of 500 Civil Service jobs.

Some have argued that that is part of the so-called rebalancing of the economy; others have argued that it is designed to incentivise the private sector in Northern Ireland. We fundamentally disagree with that: it is our considered view that PFI mechanisms do not ultimately mean better value for money for the taxpayer.

However, in the context of the Northern Ireland economy, the use of PFI for public service infrastructure and delivery of the type that I have indicated is not in the interests of Northern Ireland business. The key bidders for those contracts are not indigenous companies. For example, the bidders for the Civil Service buildings include a company called Mapeley. That is a Bermuda-based company that has been criticised by the House of Commons Public Accounts Committee for having a similar contract with the Inland Revenue but obviously not paying tax in the UK on that contract.

We are concerned about the process and programme of private finance initiatives in Northern Ireland. Not only do we disagree with PFI from the point of view of how public services should be delivered, it could be damaging to the Northern Ireland economy. It is important that that point is understood and dealt with.

The fourth and last point I wish to make in relation to the economy concerns the Review of Public Administration (RPA). The Committee may not have considered that RPA is highly relevant to its considerations on the impediments to the economy or on how matters might progress. However, the relevance of RPA is that it will mean massive change in public service delivery and, potentially, the location of public service jobs across Northern Ireland.

Our concern is that the trend will be to centralise jobs in the greater Belfast area as part of the out-working of RPA, and there is already evidence of that. For example, Departments — whatever number may exist, and Peter Hain expressed his views on that recently — are planning to locate in the central Belfast area or in the Stormont Estate. There is a clear statement of policy that two Departments, now based in Bangor, should be moved back to Belfast or to the Stormont Estate. There are major questions about where the policy on the dispersal of public service jobs across Northern Ireland now stands and where jobs will be located as RPA works its way through.

Public service jobs have a big impact on local economies. For example, locating 500 public-service jobs in Omagh will impact on the local economy there. Removing them will also have a big impact. There is a major issue in relation to the economy of Northern Ireland flowing from the RPA, reinforcing the need, which we have already expressed, for a proper examination of the RPA process from the point of view of policies on dispersal and equality and its impact on the rural economy as regards the location of jobs.

Those are the points that I want to emphasise on the relevance of public-sector issues and the importance of a debate on public sector versus private sector in relation to the economy.

Mr Bunting: Following on from that, there is a lack of a manufacturing base in Northern Ireland. Traditional manufacturing industries have been haemorrhaging and in many cases have disappeared. Much play has been made, particularly by the Northern Ireland Business Alliance and many other commentators, on the issue of corporation tax and how we can best drive the Northern Ireland economy.

Our view is based primarily on the fact that analysis, which shows that corporation tax has been the primary factor driving the Republic of Ireland's economy, does not stand up to examination. When the Celtic tiger was born — in the embryonic sense — the corporation tax rate in the Republic of Ireland was 47%. Other than corporation tax, a range of contributing factors have been involved; and, by the way, corporation tax was only reduced over the past seven years when the economy in the Republic of Ireland was well-rooted and was driving forward.

The pragmatic view is that such a reduction will not happen in the United Kingdom and Northern Ireland. The Treasury will not allow it to happen because of competition from Wales and the north-east of England, etc. It is a no-no.

We advocate having particular criteria under which companies would be rewarded amounts that they would gain from reduced corporation tax in a grant-aided manner. When Northern Ireland advocates a devolutionary process once again, the Treasury will still control fiscal matters. However, the allocation of grants can be within the domain of the Northern Ireland Assembly.

Our view is that grant aid should be equivalent to the difference between the corporation tax rates in the Republic of Ireland and Northern Ireland. It should be used as a reward to help companies with R&D or, where possible and where there is a concentration of SMEs, be targeted at the dynamic clustering and networking of suppliers, sub-suppliers, sales outlets, public agencies and cross-border networks. Eighty percent of economic activity in Northern Ireland is accounted for by SMEs. We are saying that that is where such rewards should be placed. They should be based on performance indicators.

We believe also in the creation of a range of trade-association run business networks. Businesses would pay a fee to join a trade association in which it could share market intelligence and technology transfer and diffusion. Where possible, the Government would fund technology acquisition grants for SMEs. Only network-registered companies could avail of those Government grants, equivalent to taxes liable in excess of the 12.5% profits.

One other criterion would be productivity. If a productivity indicator showed that a company was increasing its exports by a certain percentage, it would also be entitled to receive those grants.

This is not just a scattergun approach. Not every company would receive a reduction in its corporation tax. There is no guarantee of results or that jobs and wealth could be created and reinvested. The argument for a blanket reduction in corporation tax is ill thought out and, for some of the reasons that I have given, has many flaws.

Esmond Birnie mentioned transfer pricing and the EU approach to harmonisation of taxation. It is better that those decisions come from our democratically accountable Assembly and that grants are based on proper criteria.

In public procurement, £16 billion is going to be invested in Northern Ireland. We are of the opinion that within the terms of the relevant EU legislation, tackling social disadvantage and addressing the problem of economic inactivity could be built into that procurement programme. For example, in the Titanic Quarter, if “Bunting Construction Company” wanted to tender for a job requiring 200 craft workers, I would be obliged to take on 50 apprentices from economically disadvantaged communities.

The European Union's Recital 33, which regulates public procurement, outlines a range of measures to tackle disadvantage and long-term unemployment through, for example, training young people. We advocate that within that public procurement policy — which spends public money, after all — the tendering system should have measures built in to tackle disadvantage and to help those who have fallen through the net of the education system.

Currently, construction is the only identifiable growth industry in Northern Ireland. In our public procurement subcommittee, we work under the aegis of the Secretary of State and the Central Procurement Directorate. We are also working with the Secretary of State to regulate the construction industry, which is riddled with the “bogus self-employed”. We hope that new revenue regulations to be introduced next year will eliminate some of that.

It is also imperative that the apprenticeship system is regulated and will no longer be associated with Jobskills, through which people were paid £40 a week and had no employment rights because they had no employers. In reality, their employer was the Department for Employment and Learning. Michael may comment on that later, but the construction sector must be regulated in such way creates opportunities to improve skills and to learn in the workplace.

Learning in the workplace and lifelong learning are crucial to the improvement of skills in the population, particularly among the 47% who left the education system without any qualifications. Lifelong learning, as you aware, is a European phenomenon and was part of the Lisbon Agreement. The British Government are pumping millions of pounds into it.

Our difficulty in Northern Ireland is that many employers are reluctant to engage with us on this scheme, whereby their training costs are paid for by the British Government and through the aegis of the trade unions and workplace learning.

We have had huge difficulty, and I will give you the example of the Victoria Square site. We could not get agreement to run a workplace-learning project there, even though the contractor employs over 200 or 300 people in construction jobs, particularly as general operatives. We must improve the skills of a huge range of people in Northern Ireland, and we must concentrate resources on sciences and technology in higher education. We should have enough accountants and solicitors by now, and I mean no disrespect to those professions. Sorry, Peter, I am not talking about you. [Laughter.]

Mr Ford: He is a barrister.

Mr Bunting: Worse again.

I do not want to compare Northern Ireland too much with the Republic of Ireland, but we have a land border and we must deal with that. A pharmaceutical company in Clonmel in County Tipperary announced recently that it was creating 460 jobs. For any of you who know Clonmel, it is quite a small town far out and decentralised from many areas. The crucial factor about those 460 jobs is that the company hired 80 people with PhDs to conduct research and development. If, out of a workforce of 460, that company is hiring 80 people with PhDs, there is no danger of it moving to east Asia any time soon. We need that type of inward investment in Northern Ireland.

11.45 am

Northern Ireland has had a brain drain, particularly from one side of the community, and that has caused loads of problems. We need to build all-island economic synergies or cross-border economic synergies — whichever description you choose. Transport 21 in the Republic of Ireland is building up the infrastructure on the west coast. We believe that that initiative should be driven forward and that Northern Ireland should avail of it up through Enniskillen, Strabane and Omagh, and as far as Derry/Londonderry. In that context, we would also decentralise our economy towards the western part of Northern Ireland, which, with good infrastructure, would, hopefully, create some degree of inward investment in that area. We should avail of that cross-border dynamic.

Northern Ireland must have cross-border economic activity, and we must remove the blockages that inhibit a lot of cross-border activity. I must emphasise that that is an economic and social view and not a constitutional position. We can say that InterTradeIreland is wonderful, etc, but the barriers to that cross-border activity are centred on the lack of labour mobility, transport infrastructure and mutual recognition of skills and accreditations between the Republic and Northern Ireland. As well as that, the system of banking and bank charges is prohibitive. A transaction from the Republic to a Northern Ireland bank incurs quite extensive charges. Those issues must be addressed.

Last, but not least, I return to our argument that devolution is imperative. To drive a situation similar to that in the Republic of Ireland, we need to build — I hesitate to use the word partnership, because it is much devalued — a social compact between employers, politicians, trade unions and the community and voluntary sector. The compact does not have to take all from the Republic of Ireland, but should take lessons on the social and economic way forward. Northern Ireland needs to take that approach rather than maintain the adversarial conditions in which a lot of its dealings have taken place, particularly on the industrial front and between the businesses, trade unions and employees.

Northern Ireland must get away from the low-pay, low-skilled industry that it has attracted, which really is another failure. Through the Freedom of Information Act 2000, we requested documentation from the four revenue compliance officers in Northern Ireland whose job it is to ensure that employers conform to the minimum wage. On 65% of visits, they discovered that employers were not paying the minimum wage. In Northern Ireland, there is huge exploitation of workers. If that were rolled out to all the industries and areas that the revenue compliance officers could have visited, it would show a shocking picture of horrendous exploitation.

NICICTU has huge anecdotal evidence of migrant workers being exploited. Migrant workers are very welcome wherever they work in Northern Ireland. However, there is further anecdotal evidence of the displacement of indigenous workers by migrant workers, with one case involving 50 workers in a factory in Monkstown that makes either radiators or windows. In that sense, the influx of migrant workers also creates a recipe for unrest, social upheaval and racism, so we must be careful.

Both the previous Stormont Government and the Assembly had the autonomy to introduce and implement specific employment rights. That is another reason why NICICTU advocates the democratic accountability that is part of devolution.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Will you take a couple of questions, Peter, because we are running out of time?

Mr Bunting: My last point is the lack of emphasis on the social economy; I have already dealt with vocational training.

Mr Ford: Peter, you said that you did not believe that the lower rate of corporation tax in the Republic was the primary factor in its economic success. You emphasised support for research and development rather than a blanket reduction in corporation tax. If the Treasury agreed to reduce the rate of corporation tax in Northern Ireland to 12.5%, would NICICTU oppose that in principle or is its opposition based on its pragmatic consideration that it would be easier to attain support for research and development?

Mr Bunting: I would oppose it in principle, because, in one sense, it is public money and because of transfer pricing. Money allocated to companies and employers must be results-based: it must be given on the premise that companies will be up skilled, results will improve and wealth and job creation will emanate from the award of such grants.

However, David, if the Treasury succumbs to that argument, give me smelling salts and pick me up off the floor.

Mr Ford: My second point relates to part of John Corey's presentation. I accept the argument that in Northern Ireland, the public sector is not too big; rather, the private sector is too small. However, we must consider our history — and I speak as a former employee of the public sector. As a former NIPSA member, I now find myself sitting beside a doctor, looking across at a teacher, while a barrister has just left the room. How do we deal with the perception that, for many people, entering an established profession is the height of attainment? In trying to increase innovation and enterprise in Northern Ireland, how do we avoid people thinking that the best employment routes are into established professions rather than going into business to build the economy? Your general point seemed to be that there should be less dependence on FDI and more on indigenous growth.

Mr Corey: I am not sure how to persuade people that the best careers lie outside the professions. Naturally, parents look towards the traditional professions, so they may need more persuasion than young people.

I am not convinced that those who enter the professions necessarily enter public services. Many professions span both the public and private sectors.

Peter Bunting's more relevant point is that it seems reasonable to promote particular sectors in education, such as science, engineering and technology. In the past, that would have been done in a more structured way when Government would say that to encourage people to enter the professions, they wished to target resources at university education. Therefore, the economy is tied back into education. I am not sure whether that fully answers your question. It is a difficult issue.

I want to return to the question on corporation tax. From a trade union point of view, our primary interest is to secure sustainable, highly skilled, well-paid employment, which would lead to a good economy. We are not convinced that reducing corporation tax in Northern Ireland to the levels of the Irish Republic would automatically improve the economy. In fact, the evidence points to the contrary.

If the grant route, rather than the corporation tax route, is used to incentivise investment in companies, that will be in the control of a local devolved administration. If the corporation tax route is chosen, that will be in the control of the Treasury. Northern Ireland would have no control because the Treasury could change its mind. The corporation tax issue requires further examination. The social partnership element of the Irish Republic's economy, which dates back to 1987, plays a significant role that country's economic growth.

Dr McDonnell: Thank you for your stimulating presentation.

How can we tie the economy to the creation of high-paid jobs? How will we tie that into educational underachievement? Although 50% of our young people go to university and are successful, I am worried about the 20% to 25% who fall off the ledge. That is a waste to the economy and to everything that we want to achieve.

Mr Bunting: You are quite right. Recently, NICICTU placed an advertisement for a basic administrative position; of the 10 to 12 people who applied for the job, five had degrees. We have an educated population, but how do we attract investment? Grants can be given to research and development. The difference between 12.5% corporation tax and whatever profits are made might well be above that.

There must be fiscal incentives to attract inward investment and drive the Northern Ireland economy. That must include job creation and wealth creation. We must change the curricula in many of our further and higher education colleges to meet the needs of particular industries, such as biomedical sciences. For example, the Republic of Ireland had "regional colleges", most of which are now "institutes of technology". In the Waterford and east Cork area, there is a cluster of pharmaceutical and biomedical companies. Waterford Institute of Technology changed its curricula, particularly in the sciences and technology, to meet the needs and demands of those companies. We may have many highly educated people in Northern Ireland, but are they educated in the right disciplines?

There must be synergy between what we want, what type of industries can locate here and whether we have the educated labour market that will feed into that and produce results, particularly in R&D, for the companies that we must attract to Northern Ireland.

12.00 noon

Mr Dallat: I was interested in your revelation that you are in discussions about Government procurement policies. I wonder how damaging the effect of software is, particularly when contracts worth very large amounts have displaced SMEs, particularly in rural areas. I understand a personal identification number (PIN) is required to access a website to see when those contracts start. How damaging is that to employees' rights? When employees lose jobs, they are forced to come back as subcontractors, working for less money under less favourable conditions. What should a new Assembly do to change that? Those measures were sold on the premise of economies of scale. The public were told that they would get a better service at a lower price. I have received evidence that that has been a complete shambles.

Mr Kiddle: I take it that you are talking about the construction industry?

Mr Dallat: Yes, and the Roads Service.

Mr Kiddle: The construction industry in Northern Ireland is fragmented, in that 60% to 70% of people employed in that industry are what we term "bogus self-employed". Although apprenticeships are being taken up, they are administered through the Department for Employment and Learning's Jobskills scheme.

Apprentices have absolutely no connection with the company for which they are work. Basically, they go to a technical college, which places them with a company that receives grant aid until the apprentice reaches National Vocational Qualification stage 2 (NVQ2), which takes roughly 18 months. During that time, apprentices are used to make tea and are not taught the necessary skills. When they go to the technical college for the day or two on which they are supposed to, often the teacher — whether of joinery, bricklaying, plastering etc — is not there, so a teacher from another department, such as English or history comes and says: "Right, boys and girls, just do what you normally do. I am going to do some marking." They are not being trained.

Once apprentices reach NVQ2, they are thrown on to the scrap heap because the employer, under that scheme, from NVQ2 to NVQ3, is supposed to employ them under proper terms and conditions until they finish. If members want evidence of that, I can provide as much as they want: we get about eight or nine calls a week from irate parents, saying exactly that. The employer then goes to the technical college and picks up another couple of lads. It is mainly boys who take apprenticeships in construction. We have not yet managed to bring young ladies into the industry because of its nature.

There is a raft of things that are wrong with the construction industry. We have proposed a new apprenticeship scheme, which would revert to the old four-year apprenticeship. The first year would be spent at a technical college, where apprentices would learn all about health and safety and the essential skills that are lacking in many young people who leave schools today. They also undertake job sampling, involving jobs such as plastering, bricklaying and all the traditional trades. That enables them to pick a trade. After that initial year, a company takes them on from day one for a three-years apprenticeship under a proper contract of employment, which is important because it gives them a sense of belonging and employment rights. That means that they cannot be exploited by an employer and thrown on to the scrap heap halfway through a course. That is very important.

Another area that we are considering is whether the year that apprentices currently complete in technical colleges could be done during a young person's final year at school. Coming up to pupils' final years, teachers know who will stay to do GCSEs or A levels and move on to the next academic year and who will not. Creating the scheme that I have mentioned would give those people who lack academic skills a vocational area to enter.

We are also discussing social inclusion and, particularly, migrant workers. We have already given evidence to the Secretary of State about the exploitation of migrant workers by construction companies in Northern Ireland, and we will continue to do so.

Mr Bunting: To come back to what the Assembly could do, the wording of the conditions for awarding contracts is now more subjective. Article 53 of European Council Directive 2004/18/EC provides that public contracts should be awarded "to the tender most economically advantageous from the point of view of the contracting authority" as the determining factor, as opposed to the lowest price offer. If it were in charge of its own future, the Assembly could insist, lobby or decide to put small subcontractors in there as being economically advantageous to Northern Ireland.

Mr Dallat: Thank you. That is very useful.

Mr Corey: It is reasonable for public procurement policy in Northern Ireland to be tailored to the structure of the local economy and its enterprises. If there is a high preponderance of small businesses, the policy should enable those businesses to compete.

I recall having that argument 10 years ago with the Northern Ireland Housing Executive (NIHE) over contracting out work, when NIHE was seeking to privatise its direct labour organisation. We argued that a mixed system must be maintained to allow small local businesses to compete for work. One thing that has changed with public procurement is that it has tended to go with what is perceived to be the lowest price and, therefore, the most economical option.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We are again running out of time. Members should be concise.

Ms Gildernew: As mentioned in your report, cleaning contracts in hospitals were subcontracted and then there was an outbreak of MRSA. It does not necessarily add value to do that; corners can be cut, and it failed in that scenario.

Your presentation was very good. We have heard from many economists and capitalists, and it was important to hear your views on the social economy and our responsibility to ensure that there is employment near to where people live. Someone who has a four-hour daily commute from Belfast to Enniskillen has no time or quality of life. They cannot be at home to help their children with homework. We have a social responsibility to ensure that people can have jobs near their homes, including the west.

I want to tease out your ideas about the economic corridor along the west coast of Ireland, which feeds into Enniskillen, Strabane and Derry. How much does the infrastructure discriminate against us? If you travel from Limerick through to Galway and on to Sligo, the roads infrastructure starts to fall below standard. Will we miss out on that economic corridor?

Mr Bunting: You will certainly miss out on the economic corridor if the infrastructure in the west of Northern Ireland is not drastically improved. I noticed yesterday a few views about improving the road links between Derry, Strabane, and Omagh. Ten years ago, I often travelled from Dublin to Sligo to Donegal or Enniskillen, and I knew when I was in Northern Ireland because of the quality of the roads. That is no longer the case; quite the opposite.

I am interested in building the transport infrastructure to attract investment into western — and the rest of — Northern Ireland. It is worth noting that locating everything in the centre of Dublin, for example, has had adverse implications for young people trying to get onto the property ladder and driven up prices in restaurant, bars and retail for everyone.

I am also interested in other aspects of decentralisation. A feature of Northern Ireland policy is targeting social need (TSN). As well as the more obvious needs in Belfast, there are many small rural communities across Northern Ireland that are suffering huge disadvantage, such as lack of transport and lack of access to education, night schools and childcare — a whole range of services. Both targeting social need and building the infrastructure of the west of Northern Ireland are vital to attract foreign direct investment and to encourage growth of indigenous employment. We would also like to see Lisahally port developed. That is crucial to the development of the whole north-west area.

Mr Beggs: You said earlier that you oppose a reduction in corporation tax, yet it has been pointed out to us that that is a very important measure for attracting new foreign direct investment. We accept that a reduction will be difficult to achieve, but do you accept that it could be the key tool in attracting new foreign direct investment, which would mean new jobs? If it were limited to that, would you still oppose it?

With regard to R&D tax credit, it has been widely accepted that it would be a sensible policy. However, it is difficult to change the behavior of small firms, which predominate in Northern Ireland and which may be slow to take up that. You advocate R&D grants. That is a good idea, but how is it to be funded? From our limited block grant, more is now spent on health, education and infrastructure, so from which Departments would you take the moneys required for R&D grants? The Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment's budget has been cut.

Mr Bunting: That is your responsibility, Roy, not mine.

Mr Beggs: At present it is the responsibility of the direct rule Ministers.

Mr Bunting: I accept that.

Mr Beggs: So which Department would you take money from to provide these grants?

Mr Bunting: Northern Ireland is a post-conflict society, and it has not really benefited in a sustainable manner from European funding. It is crucial that there be a peace dividend, and that has to come from the British Government to build up Northern Ireland. That is an economic argument. Either we can remain a drain on the Treasury, or we can become a net contributor to it. It is in Britain's long-term interest to invest in the development of a sustainable economy. The economic argument is that you have to speculate to accumulate. I am not interested in where the money for the grants comes from, but it must not be taken from Joe Bloggs out there, who is suffering enough. I commented earlier on the lack of disposable income and on the haemorrhaging of the disposable income that is available, which will have an adverse effect on jobs in Northern Ireland, and particularly in the west.

So I cannot answer your question, but I shall reflect on it and come back to you.

In relation to corporation tax, we believe that businesses here need another source of funding that would encourage R&D, the clustering of SMEs, and the development of business networks, and it must be productivity- and performance-related. Many workers get paid by their results. We are saying to companies that it is not a case of throwing good money after bad, that it has to be performance-related. The proposal on corporation tax would apply to all companies.

We are saying that the benefits of the equivalent of corporation tax should be grant aid for companies that develop R&D and engage in business networks, particularly SMEs, in which market intelligence is shared. There should be benefits for technology transfers, for an increase in productivity or exports, or for job creation. Those should be rewarded with the equivalent of what we are all talking about — the difference between the corporation taxation levels here and in the Republic of Ireland.

It is not simply a matter of throwing money away, because there is no guarantee that it will make a difference. If every company avails itself of corporation tax reductions, who can guarantee that it will make a difference to anyone but the individual who owns the company? How does it tackle social disadvantage, create employment or employ those who have gone through the education system for which we have all paid? It does not, unless we get results.

Mr Beggs: My question was based on new foreign direct investment.

Do you agree that a cocktail of policies may need to be developed to help a diverse range of companies?

Mr Bunting: I want to make two quotations; I do not wish to keep reading. A tax wedge is significant, but there is no guarantee that a lower rate of corporation tax will lead to more jobs or to better quality jobs. There was a period in the Irish Republic when there was virtually jobless growth. In the period when employment grew substantially, tax reductions contributed to significant increases in real take-home pay. The tax wedge is the difference between what it costs an employer to employ someone and what that person takes home. The reduction in the tax wedge contributed to employment growth in the Republic of Ireland, especially for the lower-paid. According to the Republic's National Competitiveness Council:

"the low labour 'tax wedge' ... now represents a competitive advantage for Ireland" through the PAYE system, the tax wedge and what that costs. The Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development stated:

"It is clear from the literature review that the effects of taxes on economic performance are ambiguous in some areas, and unsettled and controversial in others."

Clearly there is a whole debate about whether corporation tax is really the panacea for all our ills. I doubt very much that it is. What do we need? We need a workforce educated in science and technology. Invest Northern Ireland's strategy for 2006-08 says that it is about investment in wealth — it is about investment in wealth and investment in jobs. From our perspective, that wealth should create jobs. We are not alone in thinking that.

There are two issues: one concerns where an investment goes — R&D creating sustainable employment is one example; and the other is that Northern Ireland's infrastructure must ensure easy access and egress to and from the country, but particularly for exports.

We have had a conversation with Mr Beggs about this before. Trying to avail ourselves of the Republic of Ireland's success in cross-border economic activity — I use that term because I know that people are offended by "all-island" — is crucial to Northern Ireland. In the very capitalist world in which we all live, I have never known a situation in which capital is not chasing capital. Capitalism's very nature is for capital to chase capital.

Sir George Quigley said earlier that only 7% of our exports are to the Republic of Ireland. That is absolute madness. We must remove the blockages to cross-border activity, such as labour mobility, banking charges and mutual recognition of accreditations, in order to achieve a flow back and forward.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We could keep going.

Mr Bunting: Yes, we could talk all day.

Mr McElduff: Most witnesses have told us that it is in our best economic interests for the political institutions to be restored. I ask ICTU to comment on that view.

Mr Bunting: I wish to emphasise that NICICTU makes autonomous decisions in Northern Ireland on matters that affect its policy, and is not impacted on by those decisions made in the Republic of Ireland.

Trade union policy is to support the Good Friday Agreement. We believe that the Assembly is crucial to the welfare of the people of Northern Ireland, irrespective of their political or religious affiliation.

The fact that the disadvantaged face a domestic increase in rates, the haemorrhaging of jobs, the imposition of water charges, the privatisation of public services and the loss of our manufacturing industry is not all your fault; it is the fault of the global economy. The only way to rectify it — and I come back to the fiscal versus grant-aided argument as well — is by getting our Assembly back up and working on behalf of the people of Northern Ireland. We say that purely from an economic and social standpoint.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): That brings NICICTU's evidence to a successful conclusion. Thank you very much for your presentation and for answering questions. I am sorry that time has beaten us.

Mr Bunting: Thank you, Mr Chairman, for the invitation. 'Not Old Wine in New Bottles' is quite a broad canvas, but we are working on several streams that contribute to it. We hope that as it goes forward, as the new phraseology has it, we will send you copies of the more developed strategies in it.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We keep returning to the subgroup's terms of reference. Sometimes, we drift into all sorts of variations on its themes.

Mr McNarry: Barry McElduff does that. He keeps drifting into discussions on the institutions. There is another Committee for that, Mr Chairman.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I know, but he is not on it.

Dr McDonnell: Barry is only learning; he is only new here.

Ms Gildernew: Please do not patronise Barry McElduff when he is not here to defend himself.
[Laughter.]

Dr McDonnell: One of the reasons that there are economic problems in Fermanagh and Tyrone is that — [Laughter.]

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): You may not want this recorded.

Mr Weir: It is like one of those "Complete the following in not more than 10 words" sentences.

The Committee Clerk: You are still being recorded for Hansard purposes.

Mr McNarry: Somebody made a comment about your hairstyle, and that is in the Hansard report.

Mr Weir: I cannot see Hansard actually recording this.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Gentlemen, you are very welcome. Thank you for coming along today. The subgroup is trying to condense as much as possible into the time available. There will be another presentation after yours, and I ask members to be concise with their questions. Would you like to open with a short presentation?

Mr Will Haire (Department of Education): Thank you very much. I hope that the subgroup has received our paper. We welcome this opportunity because we believe that the education sector can make a very important contribution to the subgroup's agenda and to economic development. Former US President Bill Clinton recently emphasised that in a knowledge-based economy, what you earn is based on what you learn. I suppose that that is where the key aspect of our thinking comes from.

There are many challenges for education. We must make sure that we make the maximum contribution, providing a base for skills, including numeracy and literacy, and interpersonal skills in schools by how we play our role.

Our paper sets out the four main questions that challenge us. First, is the overall performance of the school system sufficiently strong for the needs of the economy? Secondly, are our standards of literacy and numeracy, in particular, improving at the appropriate pace? Thirdly, does the curriculum give sufficient emphasis to the needs of the economy? Finally, and related to that obviously, is the provision for careers, employability and enterprise sufficiently effective?

Those are the four areas in which we are trying to provide a lead at the moment. I would like to quickly run through some of the themes.

Truly, there are great strengths in many aspects of the Northern Ireland education system. We have a higher percentage of young people achieving two As at GCSE level than England. We have had a drop in the number of pupils leaving school without any qualifications. However, we cannot be complacent about our position. We are seeing England improving faster in some ways and moving closer to us. If you take the whole gamut of GCSEs, England is ahead of us because of our long tail.

Another major issue for us is that there are 20 secondary schools in which 20% of pupils, or fewer, get five As at GCSE level. Hence, a lot of the provisions in the Education (Northern Ireland) Order 2006 are trying to address those issues and include a revised curriculum and entitlement framework, and new arrangements for admission to the post-primary sector. A major issue that the Department is pushing ahead on is school improvement.

Northern Ireland stands up well internationally on numeracy and literacy skills. We are in the upper part of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development studies, which is encouraging. However, once again, we are not improving as fast as we would like, and there are many schools in which we have major problems in numeracy and literacy and where we are not seeing that improvement. Numeracy and literacy are the bases for all skills. We are not getting that done, and it is key. Adult literacy and numeracy problems come from that, and it is a major challenge.

12.30 pm

I have a strong feeling that the curriculum that was introduced in 1989-90 pushed us towards focusing on an academic style of education. That fits in with the fact that 50% of young people go on to universities, as our Department for Employment and Learning (DEL) colleagues will tell you. That statistic is very powerful in some ways, but we are perhaps pushing people too far into an academic route.

We are concerned that the more professional and technical areas have perhaps lost out, and that some of the skill shortages in areas such as information and communication technology (ICT), construction and engineering may have resulted from the curriculum's academic focus.

We are seeing some radical shifts. The 2006 Order is obviously shifting the curriculum, but we have already lightened the curriculum for 14- to 16-year-olds. DEL and the Department of Education have been working on the vocational enhancement programme, which will create better connections between further education (FE), training and schools. We will use that and other recent packages to establish more effective connections between schools' pre-apprenticeship work and training and FE. There are encouraging signs from that.

There are also encouraging signs that grammar schools are teaching more vocational subjects. The "Learning for Life and Work" strand of the new curriculum is being promoted. The new curriculum entitlement framework means that everyone has access to more vocational courses. It also means that there has obviously been a big investment in ICT.

Education for employability is an element of the "Learning for Life and Work" strand, and we are focusing on secondary-level pupils to help them prepare and gain the skills and qualities that they need for their careers. Therefore, a stronger emphasis on career planning has been developed in the curriculum. The Departments are working together to radically review careers education, which has not been good enough.

We are also working on establishing better links between enterprise and business. There are already schemes on youth enterprise and connecting with business. The Departments are also working on the certificate in business enterprise so that young people are prepared for work in the business world.

I hope that I have given you a quick overview. Those four areas are key to the process.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I ask members to keep strictly to asking questions.

Mr McNarry: To paraphrase the third paragraph of the Department's submission, you say that, given the extent of the economic problems and changes that were alluded to, the education system must be aware of the importance of its contribution, and so on. The submission then lists the key areas in the future of the economy where schools have a major role to play.

For Mr Haire's benefit, the evidence given so far, particularly from the business and industrial sectors, has clearly shown that they attach importance to education. However, marked in that evidence is decreasing vocational attainment. That remains at a hardy level, which poses the question of tackling underachievement.

As permanent secretary, will you assure the subgroup that the reforms being introduced by your Department will satisfactorily address the concerns of today's captains of industry about the need for vocational skills? Will those reforms address the terms of reference of this subgroup, one of which is to discuss impediments to the development of the economy? I ask because I would not like this subgroup, in light of events that are taking place in education, to suggest that educational reforms could cause a potential impediment to the development of our economy.

Mr Haire: It is important to see our reforms as a basket of reforms. Much of the debate has focused on particular aspects of those reforms. The key elements are to have a wider curriculum, to ensure that everyone has access to that curriculum and to ensure maximum quality throughout the system.

The 2006 Order is designed to produce a new curriculum across the education process and to create greater flexibility so that people can access a wider range of the courses that business wants. However, it is also about helping young people and their parents choose the appropriate courses at a later stage.

All the international evidence indicates that, by the time children reach the age of about 14, business wants them to start focusing on those areas. Up to that stage, the curriculum should be kept broad. That is what the 2006 Order is about. The key element in the process, which has not been debated in Northern Ireland, is that we must empower our schools and focus on quality educational outcomes. We must examine those outcomes and focus our debate more directly, whatever our structural issues.

People can access a wider range of the courses that businesses ask for. However, it is also a matter of helping young people — and their parents — to choose the appropriate courses at a later age. All the international evidence indicates that students should start to focus on those areas from the age of 14, and that the curriculum should be kept broad until then. That is what the Education (Northern Ireland) Order 2006 is about.

The key element in the whole process, which has not been debated in Northern Ireland, is to empower our schools and to focus on quality educational outcomes. Those outcomes and outputs must be the focus of our debate, much more so than they have been to date. That is the key, regardless of the structural issues. I assure members that these policies are key, and pushing this forward is key to meeting the needs of business. In discussions with the Department, the business world has always welcomed the process being broadened in that way.

Mr McNarry: I will not ask the permanent secretary for a response to my question now — unless he can give it — but it would be most helpful if he could respond in writing as quickly as possible. He mentioned contact with business. What education and skills has the business world asked for? It would be most helpful to find out what the business world has asked of the Department and what the Department's response has been.

Mr Haire: I am happy to do that. Often the business world looks for literacy, numeracy and interpersonal skills. Perhaps the question would be better answered by a joint response from my Department and DEL.

Mr Weir: Many of us have grave concerns about the headline issues involving educational changes, which some feel will have detrimental educational and economic impacts.

Mr Haire, I welcome you to the Committee. I am sure that you are glad that the subgroup's remit does not include cuts to special needs education, school closures or the future of the South Eastern Education and Library Board. I will focus on a couple of detailed points.

As regards performance indicators, much evidence has been gathered on low levels of qualifications. Mr Haire, I would like you to come back with more information. You quoted a few performance indicator statistics. For the subgroup to make a judgement, particularly on trends in performance indicators, it would be useful if you could provide figures on high-level qualifications and on the percentages of people who leave school without any qualifications. The subgroup could consider the annual headline figures for the past 20 years, and the comparative figures for the rest of the UK. If the subgroup is to make recommendations, its research must be academically sound. It must not leave itself open to criticism.

Secondly, although universities fall in DEL's remit, DE works closely with DEL. School-leavers in Northern Ireland still have relatively high achievement levels. Are you concerned that limited places in higher and further education here mean that Northern Ireland simply exports a large percentage of its best people, which weakens opportunities and employment capability?

Mr Haire: I would be delighted to give the subgroup a range of statistics. We kept our paper short and did not include too many figures, but I can give you a raft of them.

I am familiar with DEL, as I left it only six months ago. That Department produced a detailed paper about a year ago that considered the implications of the flow of students leaving Northern Ireland. Dr Aideen McGinley will be able to give the subgroup a copy of that paper. It is a complex issue. If more places are made available, will more students stay? Why do students leave? The paper attempts to flesh out those questions, and subsequent research will set out the pros and cons of the issue.

It is an interesting question. There is no doubt that the loss of talented people from the region is a major issue. The question is: are we losing those talented people because the jobs are not here, or because the right skills are not being encouraged? How do we turn that back? Consider the north-east of England. How many parts of England have lost jobs? The Republic lost many people for a long time. Working out how best to use higher education is very difficult.

Pro rata, Northern Ireland produces twice as many doctors than any other region of the UK. That is a wonderful thing to do, but —

Ms Gildernew: Is it a case of quantity over quality? [Laughter.]

Dr McDonnell: Doctors are very good people.

Mr McNarry: It is a pity you stayed. [Laughter.]

Mr Haire: Our economy has focused on the public sector and the professions, so our education system has been somewhat skewed. Parents assume that those are safe jobs. If Northern Ireland is to generate wealth, how can that message be got across? That is why I emphasised the need to do a lot of work with industry and business — and parents — on the economic choices that will be available when the public sector gets smaller. Those are important issues.

Mr Weir: There are two issues in relation to further and higher education. First, are those sectors sufficiently focused on wealth generation? Secondly, George Quigley referred to an issue that has been rumbling around for years. About ten years ago, when he was a member of the Dearing committee, it was estimated that around 40% of those students who went on to third-level education left Northern Ireland, and, of that percentage, 40% indicated that they would have stayed had there been places available. The fact that there is a cap on numbers in Northern Ireland highlights not only the skills mix that is required to move from university into employment, but the sheer lack of availability of places.

Do you have any views on that?

Dr Robson Davison (Department of Education): Again, this is outside the Department of Education's remit, but drawing on my DEL work, the issue boils down to how many of those who leave Northern Ireland are reluctant leavers at the age of 18, and how many choose to leave. The work that Will refers to in DEL would suggest that it is a much smaller proportion than has been advanced in some of the arguments over the years.

The percentage of leavers has been going down reasonably steadily. It is still between 25% and 28% of the annual cohort of higher education students. That amounts to there being about 3,500 or 4,000 students a year who leave for higher education in the Republic or in England, Scotland or Wales. It is a question of how many go through choice, and how many go because they cannot get their first-choice place at a local university. That is the core of the issue, and there are different views on the exact proportions.

Mr Haire: Remember also that we are coming into the stage in tertiary education of dealing with the problems that we face in primary schools. In the near future, fewer 17 and 18 year olds will enter the system. Before more investment is targeted at universities, that decline must be considered.

Ms Gildernew: There are two areas that I would like to cover. I will not refer to the science and technology curriculum, as we have already dealt with it. However, we must focus on primary schools and generating interest at a young age.

The subgroup has received some very interesting presentations. John Simpson was here on Tuesday morning and talked about a situation in primary schools, specifically children of five, six or seven years of age whose:

“behavioural patterns are no longer appropriate for an educational environment.”

He was referring to the youngest children in the education system who are not able to learn and grow there. That is a product of dysfunctional communities.

Are measures being taken to support parents and, in order to empower schools, to create more co-operation between parents and schools? Morale in schools is very low.

12.45 pm

I am 36. If I was punished at primary school and told my parents, I was punished again. If children are punished in schools now, their parents want to know why they have been chastised. There has been a cultural shift. What is being done to ensure that children are receptive to learning?

Last week, InterTradeIreland made a presentation to the subgroup, and it would be worthwhile for you to read it. The presentation said that skills in border areas are the lowest and that educational attainment is lower than elsewhere in Northern Ireland. It said also that, on an island-wide basis, there are far fewer professionals and high earners in the North. The lack of skills in border areas — North and South — must be addressed. The border has been an impediment to attaining skills and being able to make a difference in the value-added economy.

Dr Davison: I am surprised at that data. The Noble indicators for educational attainment suggest that the problem is much more urban than rural. There are major difficulties in rural areas, but it appears to be more of an urban problem.

Mr Haire: We will consider that issue. Economic activity was mentioned also, where people with skills move away because they are looking for jobs that are not available here.

To go back to Ms Gildernew's first issue, there are big challenges in early years education. Evidence shows that investment in early years is a key aspect. From November, the Department will take over responsibility for early years learning. Previously, it was split between the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety and the Department of Education. We invested heavily in nursery and pre-school provision, and indications are that we have met all parental requests for that. About 90% of parents want to take up pre-school places for three year olds onwards. To ensure the best support for pre-school children, the Department's job is to consider the whole process and the organisations that are involved.

The second issue is the enriched curriculum process, the foundation stage, or the stage for P1 and P2 children. Children in Northern Ireland start school at a much younger age than anywhere else in Europe. All the evidence shows that children — especially boys — need a lot of work and training in social skills before they can move on to learning skills. The Department is freeing up that stage and putting in more classroom assistant support to try to help.

With regard to formal reading, in the past, four year olds were sat down and given a book, but many children are not ready to do that now. However, there are others who are ready, and there could be more flexibility.

The third aspect is extended schooling, which is very much about trying to give schools the ability to have breakfast clubs, after-school clubs and parent clubs to try to help with the school/parent/family breakdown. It is vital that parents are seen as educators and part of the education process.

I have visited schools and talked to some parents groups. The parents said that their groups were great, as they had been terrified about coming into the schools, and the parent clubs had helped to break down that fear. It is absolutely vital, and the Department is moving on those areas. It is a challenge. Social issues are affecting schools now, and the schools must address that. New teachers especially must be made aware of the social work skills involved and understand that those skills are much more relevant now than in the more formally structured society of the past.

Mr Neeson: Given that there are about 50,000 spare school places in Northern Ireland, how will the Department encourage a more integrated system of education? I am not talking about building new schools, but about sharing resources. Dr Davison was in Carrickfergus recently, where an A-level pilot scheme is due to start. Such a scheme has been successful in Ballycastle.

Dr Michael Maguire from the Northern Ireland Business Alliance put forward the scenario of developing responsive education to meet the needs of the developing economy. What is the Department doing about that?

Mr Haire: Sir George Bain is conducting a strategic review of education, one aspect of which is to assist the Department. There has not been an effective planning process for schools; the process has been demand-led. The Department has not considered that issue with particular regard to shifting demographics: the impact of a nine-year decline in pupil numbers has not been thought through. Tough and complex decisions must be taken. It is also difficult to decide what is the best level or size of school to produce good quality education, taking into account that the needs of rural and urban areas will differ.

Sir George Bain is helping the Department to examine the entire planning process. He is offering various views on that and is considering the best use of sharing. The figure of 50,000 spare school places sounds high, but there must always be some excess capacity in the system because people move around. However, the Department recognises that not only will that figure increase unless the issue is tackled, but that Northern Ireland does not have the right form of school estate to deal with the curriculum and the needs of young people. Various models must be considered to deal with that process.

In the past couple of years, both DE and DEL have consciously gone out of their way to build a dialogue with business on the question of responsive education. DEL is setting up sector skills councils that relate to different business areas. Arising from that, we are considering pre-apprenticeships for young people from the age of 14 who might be interested in an apprenticeship or in business. Apprenticeships could be offered in a much wider range of jobs — for example, in financial services — and not only in the classic, more traditional skills.

A benefit of that is that it helps people to decide where they want to focus their careers. A big problem with many of the DEL schemes was that they were attended by 16 year-olds who did not know what they wanted. They bounced around trying out various options and were unsettled. You really want them to try to focus earlier, and the Department of Education is working with DEL on that.

Dr Davison: Two dimensions of the revised curriculum provide the answer to Mr Neeson's question. It allows significant flexibility, unlike the 1988-89 curriculum, which was very constraining. For pupils over the age of 14, schools, teachers and principals now have much more freedom, within the revised curriculum framework, to respond to what is happening in their locality and to the needs of their particular district or county.

Mr Neeson is correct to say that I was in Carrick, and I found what those in Ballycastle had to say most illuminating. The new curriculum will promote a much higher degree of collaboration in a system that previously strongly encouraged competition. The opportunity for collaboration is being opened up, and, interestingly, in some areas, people are grabbing that opportunity ahead of the actual legislative requirements to do so. The head teachers in Carrick have gone a long way towards setting up a structure that will enable them to look much more creatively at what should be done for 14 to 19 year olds. That model is emerging in other places and it will gather pace over time.

Mr Beggs: Your submission contains an interesting statistic: in Northern Ireland, 1% fewer pupils leave school with no qualifications than in England. How can you be sure that the introduction of the comprehensive system will not remove that advantage and create more underachievement? How will you prevent that?

My second question concerns the slow pace of change in education to reflect the needs of the economy — and I dare say that that question applies to the Department for Employment and Learning also. I remember being consulted on Curriculum 2000, and I highlighted the importance of vocational education meeting the needs of industry. Why has it taken six years to progress that issue? The pace is ridiculously slow.

Your submission refers to a review of careers guidance, with a view to publishing a strategy for an all-age independent careers guidance service. Mr Dallat and I were members of the Committee for Employment and Learning, which identified this issue in 2001-02. Four years later, the Department is still only creating policies. Do you not accept that an independent careers guidance service is more likely to reflect the needs of the local economy? When academics give careers guidance advice, there is a danger that they could promote their academic preferences.

Mr Haire: You will want to raise some of those issues with the Department for Employment and Learning as well.

Five per cent of young people leave school with no qualifications and that is 5% too many. You asked about the "comprehensive system", as you described it. The Department of Education's focus must be on more than structural issues. We must ensure that our education system gives everyone basic, useful and relevant qualifications. We must ensure also that we have a wider curriculum. The narrowness of our education structure has not met the needs of the 5% of young people who leave school with no qualifications. We need a wider range of courses and processes, and we are determined to achieve that.

In relation to Curriculum 2000, my understanding is that there was a delay on Key Stage 3 because teachers were unhappy and had concerns about certain aspects. It went back for further consultation — it was very important that it was consulted on fully. That is where the delay came from. The good news is that, for some time, we have used our powers to disapply Key Stage 4 to free that up. We had already started to move.

The Department for Employment and Learning undertook a review of careers guidance, which progressed many issues. Last year, Dr Davison, Catherine Bell and I examined those issues, and we believe that much more work needs to be done.

Understandably, schools and colleges give careers advice, but they give that within an institution. Somebody has to stand outside the institutional structure and tell young people that there are other options. It is all very interesting. The Education and Training Inspectorate (ETI) examined all the educational institutions in Newry and concluded that there is not enough width.

Mr Beggs: Why is the pace of change so slow?

Dr Davison: It is an interesting perspective. If half a dozen teachers were brought in here, they might have a different view, which would be that the Department is forcing change far too quickly. However, there is a serious point to be made, and I had better be careful about how I make it. In 1988-89, the Government decided the detail of the curriculum. However, there has been a growing realisation that the imposition of a curriculum might not be sensible, and the Department, therefore, engaged in a long period of consultation on the understanding that, if you want real change, the principals, teachers and boards of governors will deliver it. There was a serious and long period of consultation on the curriculum proposals.

1.00 pm

A very significant shift is under way. Mr Beggs and I debated the importance of vocational education in the days of the Committee for Employment and Learning. This is really a response to that long debate about the place of vocational education. The new revised curriculum means that vocational education will have a significant place in all schools for all children over the age of 14. Imposing those changes quickly is attractive on the one hand, but, on the other, it will introduce subject areas into schools with which some of the teaching staff are not familiar. Those schools may need different teachers from those that they have currently; they will need materials, courses and programmes. There are many practical considerations about the ongoing significant shift from where we are now to where we intend to go.

Those are not justifications for slowness, but explanations of why, perhaps, matters are different this time.

Dr McDonnell: Thank you very much for your presentation, which was short, succinct and to the point. I keep coming back to a point that has been bounced around by several of my colleagues. Sean Neeson mentioned the 50,000 empty school places. How, in practice, do we sort out the tail end of both primary and secondary education? We can sort that out in theory in this or in many other rooms.

I believe that we have all failed if 5%, never mind 20%, of our children leave school unable to function properly. I cannot put it any clearer than that. Their reading, writing and counting abilities are limited, and they are almost unemployable or only semi-employable. If we sort that situation out, it will lift the whole system and the top end will, by and large, take care of itself.

This question comes down to two things. First, the Department and its agents create leadership and management in the system. Leadership and management are very scarce in some places. I have seen some heart-sick schools, which I do not wish to name, be turned around suddenly by the injection of a bit of leadership. The Council for Catholic Maintained Schools (CCMS), which has been quite ruthless in some of things that it has done to help struggling schools, has impressed me.

Where are we with that rationalisation? You mentioned 20 schools that are poor performers. I presume that those are secondary schools. Surely to God we can find a mechanism to rationalise those schools. I feel some personal guilt that while I am involved in politics and public administration, there are children who are not getting the education that they deserve. I believe that that situation pulls our whole economy down. If we solve that problem, we will reverse the trend.

The bright kids are great, and they will succeed one way or another, even if they need a bit of help here and there. Dare I say it, how do we help the poor child from the Shankill or the lower Falls? Michelle touched on that matter earlier. How do we support children from unstable family backgrounds or those single parents who do not get enough domestic support?

Mr Haire: That is an absolutely central issue for us. The boards and CCMS have been asked to support plans for rationalisation, to produce those proposals and to work out how to remove some of those spare places.

We have received responses from some boards, and we have asked the boards to continue that work. The Sir George Bain review is also ongoing. The aim of that review is to look at the process and the wider, long-term structures to help support that. That work is key to this issue. Some boards have been worried that some of that work has come out in the press.

Dr McDonnell is right to raise the question of how to connect schools to the community. I have spoken to Ms Gildernew about early years provision, the connectedness of extended schools and trying to make those connections between schools and communities in all areas of need, but particularly inner cities. Communities and schools must tackle the issue together. School leadership is essential.

We have a very strong investment in the professional qualification for headship to develop leadership in schools. Five hundred school leaders have qualified already; another 500 are in the process. It is often not only the head, but the senior teaching team that can change a school. There are schools in very tough environments where one senior management team is getting excellent results, while others are not. Leadership is a key differentiator, and we must help schools choose, support and develop it. We have not focused enough on that to date, and it is central to school improvement. We must be willing to make those decisions.

Dr Davison: That is one of the biggest issues that we face. Mr Haire has tasked me with reconsidering school improvement policy. We must look at it quite radically and consider earlier interventions in cases where, through inspection or data monitoring, we see that standards are falling. We need to give serious thought to the nature of those interventions. Currently, interventions tend to be broadly supportive; we do not adopt an approach involving sanctions. We must think hard about a balance of interventions for school improvement.

Certain structural and cultural elements in Northern Ireland make headship difficult. It is difficult to move principals around schools. The CCMS has had a degree of success in doing that, but that ease of movement has not been matched in the controlled sector. All the research suggests that leadership is the key factor in school improvement.

The closure of schools is another element. We all know that if the Department agrees a development proposal to close a school, there is a great deal of opposition, even if the standards are not appropriate. Those are significant factors in the crucial question of how we raise standards in schools that are currently poorly performing.

Mr McElduff: The skills strategy of the Department of Education and Science is credited with making a major contribution to the Celtic Tiger economy. Are there any particularly strong elements — or perhaps an underpinning philosophy — to that strategy that might guide us in the North to develop a similar, suitable strategy?

Mr Haire: Changes since the 1950s and a broadening of Irish education have been key to that contribution. That agenda has been seen across Europe, with broadening the educational process common to all developed economies. The curricular and structural changes that we have described are very much in line with broadening the process. There are very important areas in which we can learn from that agenda. It is about the basics of a broader curriculum and skills; maintaining quality of educational input and content; keeping choices open and varied; and having a range of options for learning.

For example, a key element is the introduction of work experience for 14-year-olds. That engages young people who are not attracted by the classic academic education, but who learn by seeing and doing. We are very conscious of the need to be flexible as regards styles of learning. We work with further education colleges and training organisations in conjunction with the schools; hence the vocational enhancement programme. From talking to young people, we see early signs that it is a success. They find it easier to study subjects such as mathematics when they have seen their function in the workplace.

Dr Davison: When I talk to colleagues in the Department of Education and Science or to professionals anywhere in the education service in the Republic, I find that they understand that there is an economic purpose to education. I am not sure that that is deeply embedded in the way we look at education in our part of the world. There is still a view — which is not wrong — that education is good for you and that a civilised person must be educated. I am not sure that we adopt the idea that there is an economic purpose to education to the same extent as in that strategy. The curricular changes in particular are designed to open up that breadth of purpose.

Mr McElduff: Your presentation dealt very well with that issue.

Mr Dallat: In education, millions, if not billions, of pounds are tied up in state-of-the-art science laboratories, music suites and assembly halls. Direct rule Ministers talk about the empty spaces. Surely there is an underuse of that resource that could be directed, not just to the 250,000 people who have been failed by the system, but to local people who constantly need to upgrade their skills to meet the new challenges of industry. Why was the community-school concept, which was started years ago in Monkstown, Ballymena and other places, dropped? Has anyone taken an overview of the huge resources we have and the very limited way in which we apply them? The rising costs of further education are going to leave people in rural areas even more isolated than they are at present. Would it not be more intelligent to talk less about the empty spaces and more about what use could be made of those spaces?

Mr Haire: First of all, the Bain review will look not only at school provision but at further education (FE) provision. You are right: they are connected. The FE system uses schools quite extensively in some of its work, and we encourage that.

I mentioned the “extended school” concept. Because of their work patterns, parents often want children looked after, but there are other benefits such as homework clubs and other resources that help young people.

The Bain review will work to ensure that the best use is made of facilities. That includes sports facilities; AstroTurf pitches are very expensive to run. We have to plan how councils and schools can work together on this. We have also talked to the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure about it. The advantage for us is that the “extended school” concept answers the need to make sure that schools are viewed as part of the community.

I cannot answer your question about the community schools; I do not know enough about the history to say why that was not developed. However, we are trying to examine these issues. The schools are expensive public assets, and we need to use them well.

1.15 pm

Dr Davison: I have a couple of points to add. The collaboration that will develop through work on the curriculum provides an opportunity to make more effective use of the existing schools estate. That will involve both schools and further education colleges, and that is a hopeful sign. We also received some funding as a result of the ‘Renewing Communities’ package to test the notion of the full-service school, which is a school that will deliver childcare and health services as well as education. We must make an effort to work with colleagues in other Departments to see whether we can shape that.

I was away from schools for a long time, but since my return I have visited a fair number. Although the concept of the community school may have disappeared, many schools that I have visited are aware of the fact that they should use their facilities for the benefits of the wider community. I guess that some are much better than others at doing that, but I see signs from my previous work in schools that they are alive to the possibility.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We will have to bring this evidence session to a close. You certainly provided the subgroup with much information. Thank you very much for attending, for your presentation and for taking questions. The subgroup will take a brief break before hearing from the next delegation.

Mr Haire: Thank you very much.

Adjourned at 1.16 pm.

On resuming —

1.29 pm

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We begin again. I thank the witnesses from the Department for Employment and Learning (DEL) for coming at such short notice. Perhaps you would make a short presentation, and members could then ask questions. We would like to finish within the half-hour.

Dr Aileen McGinley (Department for Employment and Learning): Thank you, Mr Chairman. I thank you for hearing us over your lunch break; we were worried that we would come between you and your lunch.

The Department welcomes the subgroup's invitation. With me is our deputy secretary, Catherine Bell; she is our expert on the skills agenda, further education and higher education, among other things. Chris McConkey is the head of our central management unit; he will keep track of any information that you would like us to provide. I will hand out a one-page summary of the Department's corporate plan and a one-page summary of the skills strategy.

1.30 pm

All the documents referred to in the summaries are available if the subgroup wants them, but we did not want to overload members. Also, we have copies of the addresses and web contacts. The key point that we wish to emphasise is that DEL — and this is down to my predecessors, one of whom is Will Haire — has looked long and hard at the importance of skills in the economy.

The Department works in two ways: first, to promote learning and skills and to prepare people for work; secondly, to help people into the workplace by addressing barriers to employment. Therefore, the Department must deal with both ends of the spectrum, trying to promote a well-educated and skilled workforce, while helping those people who find it difficult to get into that workforce to do so.

Members should have a copy of our presentation. We will use it as the means to run through the issues.

The Success Through Skills strategy, which was launched in February, should be of particular interest to the subgroup. The original inquiry that was conducted by the Committee for Employment and Learning in September 2001 led to the review of further education — FE Means Business — which will be known to many of you. A lot of work in this area emanated from the previous Assembly, and we are delighted to say that, four years on, we have made considerable inroads. The Success Through Skills strategy is a framework on which hangs the work of the Department and the interfaces between DEL and other Departments. I will come back to that later.

There are four key themes. The first concerns understanding the demand for skills. We need to be sensitive to what employers and the business sector need so that we can provide the skilled labour workforce that is required. The second theme is about improving the skills levels in the workforce. We do that in a number of ways, such as looking at essential skills, including literacy and numeracy — which the Committee touched on during the evidence session with the Department of Education officials — careers, management and leadership and investors in people. The third theme addresses improving the quality and relevance of what DEL does. It is not enough to provide training; it must be relevant and of high quality. Finally, the fourth theme targets barriers to employment — what we need to do to up-skill people and bring them back into employment through programmes such as Welfare to Work.

There are major links between DEL's work and the 'Economic Vision for Northern Ireland', which the Economic Development Forum produced last year. The work of DEL is at the heart of that vision. There are four strands to the economic vision: enterprise; skills and employability; innovation; and infrastructure. The work of DEL touches on all of them — probably not so much with physical infrastructure — so DEL is key to delivering the economic vision.

I turn now to the questions posed by the subgroup in its terms of reference. I will not go over the major impediments to the development of the economy at length because I am sure that they have been reiterated in the evidence that has already been given. Northern Ireland has achieved a lot. It has the lowest level of unemployment on record, and record levels of economic growth. However, productivity, competitiveness and levels of innovation remain very low and poor.

Northern Ireland is competing in a global market. Not only does that bring focus to the new skills that its workforce needs due to competition from low-cost economies that outsource to countries such as China, it highlights the influx of people to Northern Ireland and the fact that there is a new international labour market. Northern Ireland is losing some of its best people; at the same time, conversely, new people are coming in and providing skills. I am quite sure that, even five years ago, none of us would have thought of the migration issue.

There is also the issue of raising skills levels in the workforce. Again, this points to the issues of literacy and numeracy. One in four adults does not reach basic literacy and numeracy levels; that is not a good record. Due to the holistic nature of the problem, DEL works very closely with colleagues in DE. The point was made that if we could deal with this at the earliest possible stage, it would not be an issue.

I know that the Committee is particularly interested in the high levels of economic inactivity. At 27%, Northern Ireland's rate is the highest in the UK. Ironically, the Republic of Ireland has the same level of economic inactivity. That figure never comes out when people talk about the Celtic tiger. Admittedly, the numbers of students mask that statistic and create positive economic inactivity. We recognise that we need to take that seriously.

There are other issues to consider, such as skills and deficiencies in the workforce and the fact that one third of the workforce is not qualified to level 2, which is the equivalent of five GCSEs at grades A to C. Twenty-two per cent of the workforce has no qualifications, compared to 13% in the rest of the UK. Just over 40% is qualified to level 3, which is the equivalent of craft level. The facts and figures show us that there are serious issues.

Universities conduct over 50% of all R&D and innovation research. Some would say that that is healthy, but we argue that business needs to come up to the mark and that we need to promote private sector investment. We cannot rely solely on universities.

The skills strategy provides a framework within which those deficiencies can be addressed. Under that umbrella, we have strategies such as FE Means Business, the social skills strategy, the welfare to work reform, the new management and leadership programme — for which consultation has just finished — and the review of careers education, on which we are working with the Department of Education. Mrs Bell will elaborate on those programmes shortly. Therefore we must look genuinely at what we need to do. The current Training For Success strategy, which is the review of our apprenticeship programme, is also significant.

I know that when you look at all the documents, you will be tempted to say that we are good at creating strategies, documents and frameworks. You are quite right about that, but we are now at the point of implementation. We have listened and heard and will continue to do so, but we need to act. One small example of that implementation can be seen in the FE sector, where we are getting to the point at which the colleges are merging and principals and boards of governors are being appointed.

However, we are working on all fronts. Indeed, there are four themes across 16 programmes, and because they are all integral to one another, they are being managed using projects in controlled environments methodology. This is a holistic approach: what happens in one strand influences another. Therefore, it is important that we get them to run in parallel. If one does not work, it has an adverse impact on others.

We have looked at models for fiscal incentives elsewhere in the world, particularly the North Carolina

Community College System. We have found that extremely useful, because it creates a ladder of progression through education. That ladder is embedded in local economic development. In looking at other successful economies, including that of the Republic of Ireland, we found that a skilled workforce increasingly attracts foreign direct investment. Often, the skilled workforce is the tipping point that brings in the investment. It is more attractive than financial incentives, although I am not saying that those are not attractive. We have worked very closely and successfully with Invest Northern Ireland in the past few months on some of the recent investments in financial services and the information and communication technology sector. Companies are interested in a skilled workforce and a good, responsive education skills system. We would argue for fiscal incentives, but in fact, the turning point is investment in things such as skills and workforce development.

We can also consider the example of the tax credits for R&D, the business take-up for which is very low. The bureaucracy that is sometimes associated with things such as fiscal incentives and tax credits runs counter to that as an attraction.

If the Department could make it easier for companies and businesses by providing them with support that is “free of charge” or heavily subsidised, that would remove an entire layer of bureaucracy. It is worth making the point that, although fiscal incentives are extremely important, general support is sometimes of more value to businesses, with as little bureaucracy as possible.

Catherine will pick up on the subgroup's third term of reference, which focuses on how economic regeneration can be delivered. I will then make a few concluding remarks.

Mrs Catherine Bell (Department for Employment and Learning): To allow discussion, I will be as brief as possible. As Aideen said, the Department developed a number of strategies in 2001 that are being implemented now. We know that skills underpin economic success. We have defined skills into three types: first, the essential skills of literacy and numeracy, and, increasingly, ICT; secondly, the employability skills of flexibility, problem-solving and team-working that businesses seek; and, thirdly, specific occupational skills. The Department's work centres round all three types.

If Northern Ireland is to compete successfully, we must raise the skills of the people already in the workforce. Three factors are involved in raising skills. First, — and the figures are horrific — only one person in three has reached the Department for Education and Skills (DfES) level 2, which is the equivalent of five GCSEs. Secondly, we must increase the knowledge base of those people entering employment. Thirdly, it is equally important to reach the people furthest from the labour market — those who are unable to even access it. Also, we want to promote innovation through research.

When the Department was developing the skills strategy, employers told us that they wanted us to be responsive to their demands. Government have made significant financial investments in the further education, higher education and training systems. Our infrastructure is good, but poor performance and a skills deficit in our workforce remains.

Consequently, we have been refocusing further education under the FE Means Business implementation plan to specifically support economic and workforce development. The overarching strategy sets a much clearer set of goals, with an action plan specifically designed to meet employers' needs. The budget for the implementation plan is very much focused on workforce and economic development.

The first strand of the implementation plan deals with the creation of demand and establishing what employers want, which is very difficult. A Northern Ireland Skills Expert Group has been established, with international membership, including representation from Forfäs, which supports the skills expert group in the South, and representation from the USA. The group also includes a director of research from the Sector Skills Development Agency who represents the 25 sector skills councils, representatives from the Confederation of British Industry, the Northern Ireland Institute of Directors and so on.

The group helps to identify not only the needs at a regional Northern Ireland level, but opportunities down the line. We are setting up six workforce development forums, which will be employer-led, with colleges providing the secretariat function, for the six new area-based further education colleges. Their role is to identify local and sub-regional demands, so that the supply and education and training sides can respond much more effectively.

The second issue is to consider the quality and relevance of education. The Department has divided that into three areas. The first is the FE Means Business programme, and the Department is well on its way to establishing six area-based colleges, giving them the prime aim of supporting workforce and economic development.

The second area is to change the curriculum, which involves working very hard with the Department of Education on a vocational enhancement programme, so that young people who do not go on to higher education can leave school or college at 19, not only with a broad education, but with strong professional and technical skills.

We are not going to use the word “vocational”, because people think that that route is for the less able and for people who cause problems. In our economy, we need technician training at levels 3 and 4, and employability skills training.

1.45 pm

We have charged the colleges to work hard with our universities on product innovation, prototyping and business creation. By September 2007, we will have created six area-based colleges and be well on the way to implementing the FE Means Business programme.

Any sophisticated economy has at its heart a strong higher education system. We are looking at the quality and the relevance of our universities' output in foundation, undergraduate and postgraduate degrees, and trying, as much as we can, to ensure that young people leaving university have had employability and entrepreneurial skills embedded into their programmes of study. The work of the Northern Ireland Centre for Entrepreneurship at the University of Ulster and at Queen's University was focused initially on science and engineering, and is now being spread across all areas.

We have asked the Northern Ireland Higher Education Council to join us in developing a strategy to take account of the economic vision, the regional innovation strategy and our skills strategy. Equally, when it comes to innovation and research, 50% of the money goes into the universities, and we are trying to ensure that what the Department puts in for infrastructure helps universities to ensure that some of the research turns out to be of economic and social benefit, and results in spin-out companies.

The last area is the new professional and technical programme, Training For Success, which is currently out for consultation. It focuses on apprenticeship, with the Department of Education introducing a pre-apprenticeship programme for 14-year-olds. We believe passionately that young people should be offered an alternative route; full-time higher education is not the only way to success. However, they have to be able to earn and learn at the same time. The progression will be from an apprenticeship programme to a foundation degree, and then to an honours degree, if they wish, and professional training.

We need to enhance the skills of the current workforce. In the professional and technical programme that we have put out for consultation, we have suggested, resources permitting, an all-age apprenticeship programme, so that we can re-skill the workforce. However, we are really attracted to some of what we have seen in England under the heading of 'Train To Gain', in which free training at level two is available to the workforce. In areas that are important to the local economy, 19 to 30-year-olds can avail of free level 3 training.

For those who are furthest from the labour market, we have been piloting the Pathways to Work programme for incapacity benefit claimants, which is menu-driven and focused on barriers such as health, abuse, or skills problems, so that we can respond more effectively, rather than having a one-size-fits-all approach.

We would like to see an expansion of the return-to-work credit so that people who earn less than £15,000 a year can have up to £40 a week to ease the worry of coming off benefits.

We want to understand demand, improve quality and relevance, and enhance the skills of the workforce in order to bring in the economically inactive. Those are the strands that the Department is implementing.

Dr McGinley: We hope that that shows that DEL has been addressing many of the deficits. As a Department, we bridge education, enterprise and social development. As you have heard, we are working closely with the Department of Education on 14 to 19-year-olds, careers and the Vocational Enhancement Programme (VEP).

DEL is working with DETI and Invest Northern Ireland on foreign direct investment, R&D and on establishing the delivery of employer-led skills needs. Finally, DEL is working with DSD on the Welfare to Work programme.

We are doing some of the joining up necessary to ensure that this is a holistic approach. The ad hoc and fragmentary nature in the past has been the single most important impediment, although that has been through no lack of will. We hope that the cohesion of the skills strategy will drive the engine of economic growth that we all want to see happen.

Dr McDonnell: Thank you very much. I welcome the change that has taken place; it is long overdue. You are relatively new to your position, and I congratulate you and those that have been there longer and have been more involved. It is music to my ears, and to those of most of my colleagues round the table. However, I am more interested in product than promise, and I will have to wait a little while to see what the product is.

We talk about creating a skilled workforce, which, as you said, is needed to gain foreign direct investment. We all want a high-wage, high value-added economy, but much of that can happen only through serious, practical R&D that is extracted from the brainpower in universities and used in combination with companies to create product and wealth.

There is a difficulty here, but there must be some mechanism to get companies to engage in more R&D. In the meantime, we have to stick with the universities. How can we push forward and achieve more R&D?

Secondly, and in parallel with that, is getting proper funding to follow on from the R&D. I am taking about the university spin-off companies, such as QUBIS and UUTech Ltd, which are suffering from gross under-funding and a lack of sympathy. I do not know how much of that is DEL's responsibility, as it seems to be a twilight zone where everybody and nobody is involved. The sense is that we are wonderful, with brilliant people in universities, and that the fruit should fall from the trees without anyone having to grow it, spray it or cultivate it. There is a gap here, and sufficient product is not getting out because of the lack of capitalisation.

How do we get more R&D, and how do we fund and work the university spin-outs, the high intellectual property and the high value-added that flows from R&D?

Dr McGinley: You are right. The budget falls between DEL, DETI, Invest Northern Ireland and DHSSPS, which funds a lot of our current research. Recently, we launched the United States-Ireland Research and Development Partnership. It reflects exactly your point about looking outwards and bringing in thinking on medical issues, such as, for example, avian flu, diabetes and cancer. We all work well together, but it makes the task more complex.

DEL tends to fund the infrastructure and the universities, to create the physical and other tangible parts of the information and equipment needed. Programme funding tends to come from Invest Northern Ireland and DHSSPS. The two universities are aware that more could be done. There are lot of patents pending, and we must find a way to turn those into something tangible. Recently, Mrs Bell and I spoke to the two vice-chancellors about making things more focused. I welcome the more defined niches for Queen's University, which is heading down a strong science/academic route, and the University of Ulster, which is heading down the entrepreneurial science route. Also, the two universities are working together — the Northern Ireland Centre for Entrepreneurship (NICENT) project is a case in point — along with QUBIS and UUTech Ltd, which you mentioned.

The Government are committed to R&D. We recognise that we need also to stimulate business to recognise that and to get it to product stage.

Mrs Bell will tell the Committee about a number of programmes, such as the Higher Education Innovation Fund (HEIF). R&D must have a firm place in the next comprehensive spending review.

Mrs Bell: As Dr McGinley said, DEL is responsible for funding the infrastructure. However, DEL is also working with the two universities to examine their contribution to the economy. There is no doubt that universities talk about the generalities of R&D. DEL wants to see R&D leading not only to the creation of spin-off companies, but to investment in our own companies. We want more of our top brains to work in SMEs and to take some of the work to them.

Sometimes one could get depressed about the situation. However, considering what UUTech Ltd and QUBIS have produced, and some of the high value companies that have emerged, part of our problem is that we do not celebrate success enough. Success breeds success. In recent months, the University of Ulster has been particularly successful in selling the intellectual property rights to its work on diabetes to a large American company, and it is reckoned that that will generate about £41 million. Not enough has been heard about that. DEL and the universities have a responsibility to build on success.

DEL recognises that SMEs are sometimes reluctant to work with a university: it is like going to a GP and being referred to a consultant. The Department is encouraging the colleges and universities to work in partnership, so that product development and innovation will be done in the colleges and the universities will do the blue-skies research. DEL has created a fund to encourage collaboration between higher and further education, so that the skills from the universities can be transferred to the further education colleges.

The Department agrees that there must be investment, because we are losing the low-value work. Everyone must put their heads together to tackle that.

Dr McGinley: Two examples of such investment are that £94 million has gone into the Support Programme for University Research (SPUR) project, which will run from 2001 to 2008, and over £50 million will go into UK-wide Scientific Research Infrastructure Funding (SRIF) from 2002 to 2008. The money is being invested, but the trick is to ensure knowledge transfer in the third stream.

Mr McNarry: In the conclusion to your submission, you seem to be saying, understandably, that although you want to do much more, the Department might not have the money. My reading is that that is a cop out. Everyone could make the point that there is not enough money. I want to hear your reason for including that paragraph.

Dr McGinley: Skills are fundamentally important to the delivery of the economic vision, and that has an impact on most Departments. Money allocated to DEL for programmes such as Welfare to Work is ring-fenced, and we cannot interfere, because it is Treasury-oriented. DEL spends almost 85% of its budget on further and higher education and on student support, so there is not much leeway.

DEL would like to do much more and has recognised that, internally, it must do more to prioritise in preparation for the comprehensive spending review, and that process has begun. However, we will not be able to do some things. We have dropped programmes that, all things being equal, would have continued to run. For example, Enterprise Ulster and its associated programmes, which were good in their time, have been wound down. DEL had to weigh up the priorities as they related to that type of programme.

Mr McNarry: I would love to get into a discussion, but I am here to ask questions. I am concerned about your reasons for going to the trouble of including this in your presentation.

What percentage of people who are fit for work are stuck in low-income jobs or part-time work, either not able or not interested — perhaps the most important issue is the latter category — in moving up the promotion ladder? What difficulties do they have?

Does the welfare state have a major or minor impact on attracting people to improve their learning and skills?

2.00 pm

Dr McGinley: We do not have those figures with us, but we can certainly provide the subgroup with them.

Mrs Bell: The fact that people have either low skills or no skills and qualifications — as a proxy, we equate skills with qualifications — is a strong indicator of the problem. We have worked hard to tackle the issue of essential skills. By March 2007, we are charged with putting 18,500 people through the essential skills qualification, which means improving their literacy and numeracy skills. Recent research shows the positive benefit that that has had on esteem, health, and so forth. We will then move those people on to level 2 qualifications. Once someone gains that level of confidence, in many instances, they are willing to invest in their own skills development. It is a question of engagement, which is why it needs to be done through employers and the workplace.

Many people have a fear of entering an educational establishment, whether a school or a further education college, so we are trying to work more effectively with community groups. The FE Means Business programme allows colleges to work with quality community groups. Initially, the community groups provide support, mentoring and encouragement to help people to overcome barriers about benefits, childcare, and so forth. Eventually, they can progress to college.

Mr McNarry: Problems with underachievement have been identified. Are schools picking up on the situation that you described, where school leavers, rather than employers are aware of what is on offer? Those people are not going to find employment.

Mrs Bell: Absolutely. There is a new professional and technical programme. I referred to the apprenticeship programme, but another strand works with young disenfranchised people who either feel that they do not have the academic ability or who perceive other barriers to employment. There is a similar programme for adults. Work so far has been singularly successful; it specifically targets their needs, whether self-esteem, literacy or numeracy, or abuse problems. The programme is also hard-edged in that we will not allow people to be recycled in that environment. We want them to take whatever time is necessary to get onto the learning ladder. However, once they are on the learning ladder, we want them to be employed and studying part-time so that they are earning and learning. We want to see more lifelong learning, where people invest in their own skills.

You asked also whether welfare and benefits act as a disincentive. If someone has children, he or she needs to ensure that there is a certain income; people are afraid to lose those benefits. We must ensure that benefits, or any other moneys, are protected, so that people can gain the skills to enable them to work. We want everyone to start on the appropriate step on the skills ladder and progress upwards. It would have been lovely to start the skills strategy at level 3, but we could not do that.

Mr McNarry: Is there still a perception that benefits compete with the search for employment?

Dr McGinley: Welfare reforms, such as the Welfare to Work programme, are addressing that important issue. We are driven partly by national policy, but it is intended that, in 2008, a new form of income support, which tests the very nature of that question, will be established. We are proceeding also with the Pathways to Work programme in 10 areas of Northern Ireland. We have already rolled it out in six areas. That programme takes an individual look at people's needs — whether they are lone parents, or over 50 or are on incapacity benefit. It will address people's needs genuinely, perhaps sending them to counselling or placing them into skills programmes.

Last week, I visited a Jobs and Benefits office where the disability adviser and the Pathways to Work adviser were absolutely delighted because one of their disability applicants — a man who had been a scaffolder all his life, but had smashed his knees and was, therefore, incapacitated — had got on to a sign language training programme and was going to become an interpreter. It was great to see the joy and pride that the staff took in getting someone who really wanted to work but needed help with the “how” and the “what”. I should mention also that the review of careers guidance will help to provide a signpost.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We are running out of time.

Mr Weir: I shall be brief. Thank you for your presentation. I join with Dr McDonnell in thanking you for the various programmes that you are operating, despite the constraints under which you are operating.

I wish to pick up on two points. I was interested in the remarks that you made about DEL being the bridge to other Departments. One of my concerns is that, because of the departmental structure, economic development touches on — or is central to — a number of Departments. First, I wonder whether you could expand on any structures that exist for liaison and consultation with Departments or agencies to ensure that, in whatever skills programmes you are running, there are appropriate levels of input from those who are affected directly.

Secondly, you provided information on the idea of helping to focus universities and graduates on a more business-oriented scenario. The other side of that coin may be less of a problem than it was 10 years ago. It was identified in the Dearing Report and is the extent to which there is still a section of school-leavers at the higher end who cannot find places in universities in Northern Ireland. In particular, there are concerns that, although it may not be as big a problem as it was, the caps that are placed on university places in Northern Ireland mean that we continue to export a reasonable percentage of our best talent. In some, but clearly not the majority of cases, that is because people cannot find a place here, rather than because many students want to leave Northern Ireland. What actions could be taken to counter that problem?

Dr McGinley: I will take your first question, and Catherine will take your second. Recently, we have been working increasingly closely with others, including the Economic Development Forum, on which we are represented with the other Departments. We have quarterly meetings with DE and DETI, and regular meetings with DSD, right down to officer level. DEL is represented on all the major strategy groups, such as the regional innovation strategy, and so forth. We work very closely together, and since I have been with the Department, I have seen the blurring of the lines. I have been with the Department for only four months, but since I arrived, a real ethos is emerging about the importance of interdependency. I am not saying that that was because of my arrival, but I assure members that it is getting much better.

Mrs Bell: We are working with others on projects concerning 14 to 19-year-olds, particularly with the Department of Education. Robson Davison came from DEL, so there is great co-operation in the programme that we are running together. Similarly, we work with Invest Northern Ireland. The fact that employers are now saying that skills are at the heart of the matter means that INI and DETI are bringing us to the table.

I turn to the second part of your question on higher education. Yes, Northern Ireland does lose some young people, but not all the brightest and the best at 18 years of age. However, we undertook research and found that the vast majority of the really able who go away, go to their university of first choice. Our trick must be to attract them back. Those who are reluctant to go away are at the lower level of educational attainment.

We would like them to stay in Northern Ireland and work through the further education sector towards foundation degrees.

Mr Weir: Despite the Dearing Report, one would suspect that the figures are even higher. No one is questioning the fact that the vast majority of 18-year-olds who leave want to go. I do not think that the situation is very different from that in other regions, because many people want to go to university away from their home towns. Although I appreciate your explanation, I still do not see a strategy to reduce the number of people who leave Northern Ireland because they cannot find a university place.

Dr McGinley: Opening up the further education sector through the new area-based colleges has helped that situation substantially, as have foundation degrees.

The subgroup became inquorate at 2.11 pm and adjourned at 2.17 pm.

SUBGROUP ON THE ECONOMIC CHALLENGES FACING NORTHERN IRELAND

(EMERGING ISSUES SESSION)

Thursday 3 August 2006

Members in attendance for all or part of proceedings:

The Chairman, Mr Jim Wells
Dr Esmond Birnie
Mr Wilson Clyde
Mr John Dallat
Mr David Ford
Ms Michelle Gildernew
Dr Alasdair McDonnell
Mr Barry McElduff
Mr David McNarry
Mr Sean Neeson
Mr Peter Weir

The subgroup met at 3.34 pm.

(The Chairman (Mr Wells) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I call the meeting to order. I remind members that seven is the number required in order for there to be a quorum, so we have a quorum and no more. We are expecting one more member to attend, so I ask members to bear in mind that we need to keep seven around the table at all times.

Dr McDonnell: Mr Chairman, I will be under considerable pressure to leave once it creeps towards 4.25 pm.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I hope that Mr McElduff will be here by then so that there will still be seven members.

Once again, I remind members to keep their mobile phones switched off. Apparently, some of this morning's proceedings could not be recorded because somebody's mobile phone was on. It happened while the subgroup was inquorate, so it may not be crucial. Every now and then I hear the slightest hint of a text message — perhaps the results of the Galway races are being broadcast to members' mobile phones.

Mr Ford: That will be the DUP members.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I have received apologies from Margaret Ritchie. John Dallat is attending in her place.

Mr Ford: Sean Neeson also sends his apologies.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I am very glad to see Mr Dallat here. Mr Mitchel McLaughlin is not here, but Mr McElduff is in his place. I understand that Ian Paisley Jnr is not here. Wilson, are you substituting for him?

Mr Clyde: I am junior. [Laughter.]

Dr McDonnell: No better man.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): You have improved enormously, junior. [Laughter.]

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Who are the Ulster Unionist representatives?

Dr Birnie: My understanding was that David McNarry would be here.

The Committee Clerk: He put a question mark over his attendance when I asked him earlier. However, we knew that if Dr Birnie were present that the subgroup would be quorate.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It looks as if this is it, folks. We must make absolutely certain that we keep our quorum.

The Committee Clerk: I had a discussion with the Editor of Debates and the Deputy Clerk about the meeting being inquorate for six minutes earlier today. The decision was that we cannot have an Official Record once the subgroup becomes inquorate. An unedited transcript of the six minutes — minus the portion lost due to the interference of the mobile phone, whosever it was — will be produced so that we will have a verbatim record of what was said.

Mr Weir: Is the quorum rule completely strict? If we start quorate but become inquorate in the course of the meeting, we cannot continue —

The Committee Clerk: It is absolutely strict. Statutory Committees have become inquorate in the past. I had been advised informally that, if the subgroup became inquorate for only a couple of minutes, we could ignore it, which was what we did this morning. Clearly, that was not the case.

Dr McDonnell: Some of us argued earlier that six members might be a better quorum, but some of your colleagues felt that they wanted seven.

Mr Weir: It is a wee bit academic, since we have presumably been given the law engraved on tablets of stone from on high.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The draft minutes of today's sessions will be tabled at next Tuesday's meeting. There are no minutes as such. The draft transcripts of Tuesday's session, including the evidence of John Simpson and Enterprise Northern Ireland, should have been issued to members. Everyone has seen them. Any corrections should be returned by the close of play on 7 August. Please look at the transcripts to make sure that they are OK.

I want to get a couple of housekeeping issues out of the way. First, and I do not know whether this was reported this morning, I wrote to myself, and the Committee on the Preparation for Government agreed yesterday to the subgroup's request to extend the deadline for our report by one week, to 25 August. Of course, that is predicated on the Secretary of State's decision on moving the dates for plenary business to 11 and 12 September. We have not yet heard from the Secretary of State on that. However, the Preparation for Government Committee was more than happy to agree.

The Committee Clerk: We discussed that this morning, and it was agreed that there would be two sessions on the draft report and a written evidence session the week before that.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That will be a busy period for us. The Ulster Unionist Party nominated Mr Jim Wilson for chairmanship, so the subgroup will have five Chairmen. I understand that the Alliance Party has nominated Naomi Long and that the SDLP has nominated Alban Maginness, who, as a former Chairman of the Regional Development Committee, is a very experienced hand. We now have a full complement, which will lessen the burden on Mr Molloy and me and enable us to concentrate on the meetings on the institutional and policing and justice issues. That is good news all round.

The Committee Clerk: If the subgroup is content, we propose to put the three new Chairmen first on the rota and come back to Mr Molloy and you when you are available. That means that the two more experienced Chairmen who have been involved in more meetings will take the last few meetings. That seems a sensible approach.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Therefore, Mr Wilson will be the first.

The Committee Clerk: Not necessarily. It could be any of the three.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is everyone happy with the arrangements? We seem to have a fine mixture of youth, good looks and experience.

Dr McDonnell: Is it reasonable to make proposals or suggestions, or do we just go on a roulette-wheel basis?

The Committee Clerk: It will be on the basis of what is practical and who is available for each meeting. I will check with the three people and construct a rota that suits them.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mrs Long has the youth, and the good looks I might add.

Mr Ford: And a fair bit of experience, Mr Chairman.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will now move on to the substantive part of the meeting, which concerns the emerging issues. I have found the evidence sessions that I have chaired and witnessed to be extremely helpful. The standard of questions and material presented to the subgroup have been extremely high. Perhaps I am biased, but I sat on the Enterprise, Trade and Investment Committee with Dr McDonnell for many years and we had much more difficult sessions than we have experienced here recently, and some very interesting and thought-provoking points have emerged.

This morning, members were given a copy of a paper on emerging issues. Did everyone receive it and have a chance to read it? Of course, the paper does not include issues arising from this morning's session. Our Clerks are good, but even they are not that quick off the mark. The subgroup needs to decide whether the paper captures the essence of the issues that have emerged, whether anything needs to be added, or if there is anything in the paper that members disagree with. The subgroup will then need to identify and agree the salient points that have come out clearly in the evidence and in the discussions.

The Committee Clerk: Mr Chairman, a couple of papers need to be presented now. I have prepared a summary of the initial research paper, which was presented by Dr Gilleece. It also lists a lot of the main points of the evidence sessions. I have also asked the Clerk of Business, who has been working for the subgroup for the past few days, to prepare a paper which provides a summary but also goes into some of the potential solutions. A third paper has just been presented to the subgroup by Dr Gilleece, and he will talk to the subgroup about it shortly.

The papers are really aides-memoires — thoughts that we have pulled together. The key issue for staff is to put all of the evidence into a report that the subgroup can sign up to. We must be absolutely clear about the subgroup's direction, and this session will be a hour's worth of thinking about that.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is everybody content with that structure? We have until 4.30 pm to come up with the bones.

Mr Weir: I would like to clarify one issue. Are we simply identifying the issues emerging from the evidence at this stage? I assume we are not agreeing any wording on particular issues at this point.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is correct. Could we bring in Dr Gilleece now?

The Committee Clerk: That would be useful.

Dr Gilleece: Thank you. As regards innovation, several themes come through in the paper, which help demonstrate a lot of the issues that have been raised. The consistent message that we are getting from the presentations is the necessity for change and for transforming accepted working practice.

3.45 pm

From an economic perspective there are several strategies that are accepted drivers for innovation, and these should be fully exploited. However, the presentations have also emphasised the importance of innovative practices in the public sector and of changing the way we work and the approaches employed to address social and economic challenges. Adopting a new approach is fundamentally the most important reason for the success of the economy in the Republic of Ireland.

Also, from the economic perspective, a factor common to successful regional economies in Europe is the key priority given to innovation, in which R&D is key. Regions such as Emilia-Romagna in Italy; Baden-Württemberg in Germany, and Silicon Valley in California are acknowledged as having highly successful innovation systems. They fully exploit their innovative capability and consequently enjoy the benefits of rapid growth. A more R&D-intensive, innovative and knowledge-driven economy tends to result in better, more sustainable jobs and higher wages.

Innovation does not refer just to economic strategies; it is also concerned with reviewing and changing all aspects of our working practices. The Northern Ireland Business Alliance made that point. Innovation's importance is elevated as a result of the globalisation of competition conditions, which is a point that Liam Nellis of InterTradeIreland touched on.

The 1995 European Green Paper on innovation stresses that innovation is not just an economic mechanism or a technical process; it is above all a social phenomenon. With regard to economic development, that often means the commercial exploitation of R&D. Innovation also refers to the adoption of methods of working that, while not necessarily new, are radical changes to a particular organisation or sector. That applies equally to the private sector and the public sector.

The Northern Ireland Business Alliance (NIBA) made the point that radical policy change is required if we are to change the trajectory of the local economy. They believe that this requires a social partnership between the public and private sectors, business and elected representatives, trade unions and the voluntary sector. NIBA highlighted changes in approach in several areas that are required if we are to move from being a public-sector-led to a private sector-led economy.

One of the key points in NIBA's presentation was that public sector behaviour can have a major influence on how the private sector develops. It said:

"If we are serious about making changes, we need a complete review of how the public sector in Northern Ireland is run". — [Official Report, Bound Volume 19, page SG 23].

"The Civil Service is so good at maintaining stability it cannot be agile; it cannot transform. We must break it up with a hammer, so that those who want to get on and do things are not prevented". — [Official Report, Bound Volume 19, page SG 31].

"It will stop your best ideas coming forward, because it is designed to create stability and even out change." — [Official Report, Bound Volume 19, page SG 31].

Change in the Civil Service and the public sector goes beyond structural and organisational change. At crucial points in the development of the Irish economy, civil servants have thought creatively and have taken innovative approaches, and that was instrumental. Dr T K Whitaker, secretary to the Department of Finance, and originally from Rostrevor, prepared a report called 'Economic Development' in 1958 that was a watershed in the transformation of the economy in the Republic of Ireland from being a mainly agricultural society into a modern, industrial-based economy.

By contrast, it has been argued that the civil servants in Northern Ireland appear to be motivated by a fear of appearing before the Public Accounts Committee. The recent controversy about token entertainment that public servants received only serves to make them less likely to act autonomously and, more importantly, to think autonomously.

In the early 1960s the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) held a conference in Washington on economic growth and investment in education. They asked for two countries to volunteer to do a national survey of their entire educational system. The Irish and the Austrian delegates were the only countries that were prepared to risk exposing their countries' shortcomings to the world's gaze. The existence of the team and the OECD report that was produced are regarded as landmarks. In 2003 the Department of Education and Science in the Republic of Ireland invited the EU Directorate for Education to undertake a similar review. That indicates a willingness to invite scrutiny and receive criticism in order to achieve an overriding objective of performance.

Moving on to policy development and delivery, John Simpson questioned the delivery of strategies for innovation, R&D and training. From recently presented facts, it would appear that strategies on innovation and entrepreneurship, for example, did not have the impact that they should. That might indicate a need to change how policy is delivered, but also perhaps how it is developed. According to the economist Mike Smyth, an ever-widening experiential gulf exists between policy-makers and private economic agents. How can that lead to good policy-making?

Perhaps it may be appropriate to harness the potential of the public sector to stimulate entrepreneurship. For public-sector employees, entrepreneurship training and basic business skills may help to improve policy development and encourage entrepreneurship.

Regarding the education sector, there are three principal features in the education system of the Republic of Ireland that have led to its success: first, the breadth of the secondary-school curriculum; secondly, the high standards of university degrees; and thirdly, the availability of post-school training.

Government has stated that there is a need to embed business training in the curriculum at secondary level in Northern Ireland. The Northern Ireland Council for Voluntary Action would like to see greater emphasis on life skills, personal development and citizenship. However, the overall key issue may concern the breadth of our educational system and the efficacy of any new initiatives that we introduce. The rapid progress in educational development in the Republic of Ireland has been achieved without lowering educational standards, as appears to be the case in Great Britain, at secondary school level and in universities.

I now turn to third-level interaction with industry. John Simpson said:

“FE colleges still, to a large extent, determine for themselves what they offer. That cannot be right.” — [Official Report, Bound Volume 19, page SG 96].

Dr Michael Maguire of NIBA said that:

“We need to be able to push those ideas through a responsive education system that considers its jobs to be one way of helping to develop the economy in Northern Ireland.” — [Official Report, Bound Volume 19, page SG 26].

As far back as 1978, the Manpower Consultative Committee was set up in the Republic of Ireland to allow for dialogue between the Industrial Development Authority and the education system. The education system in the Republic of Ireland is now tightly integrated with the country's foreign direct investment (FDI)-oriented development strategy. The resulting programme from the Manpower Consultative Committee produced a sharp increase in the output of graduates in electronic and mechanical engineering and in computer science. Output of engineering graduates increased by 40% between 1978 and 1983, while the number of computer science graduates increased tenfold in the same period.

The view of the Industrial Development Agency and Forfás, the policy advisory and co-ordination board for industrial development, in the crucial areas of the labour and skills markets, have been more likely to lead to new course initiatives, or pump-priming by the Department of Education and Science or the Higher Education Authority, than any other source.

In conclusion, individual recommendations taken forward in isolation will not meet the challenges facing the economy. The economist Mike Smyth has said that if the economy of Northern Ireland is to return to a more normal growth trajectory, a unique or abnormal set of policies will be required. This will require creative thinking and the willingness to consider radically new approaches. Innovation is about ambition and taking risks. It is about foresight and vision.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Thank you, Dr Gilleece. Hopefully, your presentation has helped to set the scene. We will now look at the list that the Clerk has prepared. Again, I emphasise Peter Weir's point that we are not asking the subgroup to put the issues in order of priority or attach any weight to them; we are simply deciding whether the issues are relevant and important. We can return later to the fundamental decisions on how to tackle them. I suspect that that will involve quite a lively debate, but it is best to simply go through them for now. If members have additional points, feel free to catch my eye and I will give you an opportunity to speak.

Mr McElduff: One point that may need to be factored in is the desirability of political stability, or whatever term members want to use to describe it. The business sector is telling us that it wants the institutions restored to bolster economic development. That can be translated as a need for political stability, but an overall political context must be considered, which will not breach anybody's party politics. Business people are basically telling us that they would be a lot happier if local Ministers were making decisions about economic development.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That issue is referred to at point 15 of the Clerk's list. However, Mr McElduff has approached it from a slightly different angle; we might want to beef that up. Again, the fact that it is numbered 15 does not mean that we think that it is the fifteenth most important issue. Some members might place that among the top three issues.

The Committee Clerk: The second page of my paper notes themes from the evidence sessions. I have simply listed, from memory and from looking through the Hansard reports, issues that have arisen. I emphasise that the order is immaterial and does not reflect importance. That point has been covered. Perhaps, as the Chairman suggests, the subgroup would like to go through the list, adding to it as it sees fit. I can then compile a reasonably comprehensive list of issues.

Mr McNarry: First, I would like to say that Dr Gilleece's presentation was excellent and very helpful. Perhaps my question will sound naive. The Secretary of State has spoken of £16 billion of investment over the next 10 years. It would be helpful if the subgroup could see how that £16 billion has been broken down; that way we could know where the money is going and how it will be used. The subgroup might want to look at the Secretary of State's ideas for using that money and compare it to our thinking for differences of emphasis as we prepare for devolved government.

The Committee Clerk: We have added the Department of Finance and Personnel to our list. Officials will be coming here next week and may well have those figures. I hope they do. I will see if I can get them.

Mr McNarry: Yes, they may well. This Secretary of State has been burning my ears with this £16 billion.

The Committee Clerk: I am just wondering whether it will be them or the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment. I will contact both and get that.

Mr McNarry: What I am really asking is this: he said there is £16 billion to spend, and I want to see how he intends to spend it.

The Committee Clerk: We can get that.

Dr Birnie: Having two papers is confusing, but I will start with the one that the Committee Clerk has drafted. I agree entirely with the point of the first item. Maybe this is getting into more substantive issues, but I am not sure that we should congratulate ourselves too much by saying that we are not much different from Wales and Scotland. We can perhaps have that debate in due course, because they also have relatively large public sectors, and their economies are arguably structurally poor as well.

Item 12 covers much the same area as Dr Gilleece's excellent paper. We should elaborate on item 12 in two ways. As John Simpson pointed out, there seems to be a chronic slowness in implementing policies. Dr Gilleece notes that our Civil Service structure does not seem to be fit for the purpose of putting policy into practice. He also refers to people being scared of appearing in front of the Public Accounts Committee. However, there is inevitably a trade-off: we all want to see absolute probity in the use of public money, and as political representatives and the public's stewards we must ensure that; but on the other hand we encourage public servants to take occasional risks. Invest NI, for example, has to take risks with investing public money to promote higher return in job creation in the long run. We need to highlight that dilemma.

Point 16 in the Clerk of Business's paper refers to the brain drain. We should add to that: it is often assumed that the problem is simply that people are choosing to leave Northern Ireland or are forced to leave due to economic and other conditions. There is another aspect to it: could it be that local businesses and, indeed, perhaps even the public sector, either because it is relatively small, or because of a culture of management, simply do not want to employ certain highly-qualified people here? There may be a problem on the demand side in the labour market here.

The Committee Clerk: It is an interesting point to make, Esmond, because the Department for Employment and Learning has prepared a paper on why people are leaving. Is it because there are not enough university places, or because there is not enough work?

Dr Birnie: No doubt it is a mix of those, but we need to capture that.

4.00 pm

Mr Weir: I want to make a procedural point. We have three papers in front of us. It might be helpful to pick one paper and go through it. Many issues are identified in the papers, and there will be a fair amount of overlap. We should concentrate on one paper and then move on to the next; otherwise, it will be very confusing.

The Committee Clerk: I recommend that course of action, not as a preference, but because a simple list would be easier to deal with.

Mr Weir: Mr McNarry's point is similar.

Mr McNarry: It is similar. It deals with the point raised by Esmond Birnie about item 12 of the Clerk's paper. Would that allow the subgroup, with your guidance, to examine the reduction in the number of Departments referred to by the Secretary of State?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Only if we could establish that that is an impediment to economic progress.

Mr McNarry: I agree with the Secretary of State that the Civil Service is an impediment to political progress. However, departmentalising it along economic delivery lines would present another problem. A theme in the presentations was that one bit is doing this and another bit is doing that — Barry McElduff referred to that. The concept of joined-up delivery seems to be all over the place.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We must be careful not to stray into the work of the PFG Committee.

Mr Weir: The number of Departments is a separate issue, and I share Mr McNarry's view on that. Problems have been identified, but I suspect that Departments have tried to pretend that they do not exist. There is a lack of joined-up delivery on economic development. The number of Departments is less important than the fact that some the responsibilities seem to lie in various areas across half a dozen Departments, and there appears to be a lack of co-ordination and integration. Some Departments deny that there are problems and say that there is full liaison.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It was clear from the evidence that there was a dichotomy between the Planning Service's aims and aspirations and those of DETI.

Mr Weir: Whatever people might think about individual projects, when DRD or Roads Service make announcements, how are they joined up to show the benefits to the economy? Those announcements may be of benefit to the economy. However, it is important to realise that, prior to reaching those decisions, there does not appear to have been a great deal of consultation with people in the economic sector.

Dr McDonnell: I agree with Peter Weir and I apologise to Mr McNarry. It is not the subgroup's business to get involved in the number of Departments. It is about communication and connectivity. We had connectivity problems in the old Department of the Environment, where one corner of it did not know what the other was doing. The number of Departments must be dealt with, but it should not be dragged into the economic argument.

Mr McNarry: I do not want to get into the deep political aspect of this matter, but it has been said that there will be a reduction in the number of Departments, and we should at least factor that in and consider how the Departments would work, and how many there might be — be that seven or nine or 11. I did not mean that the subgroup should decide how many there should be.

Dr McDonnell: I accept that. However, from my perspective, the problem is a lack of communication and energy within the Departments, and not how many there are.

Mr McNarry: There is a lack of management as well.

Dr McDonnell: Yes, there is a lack of leadership and management. We could reach the stage where one Department would run everything, and it would resemble a madhouse.

I refer to the paper by Paul Moore. Point one relates to the imbalance between the public and private sectors. The subgroup must consider and agree on the clear requirement for substantial private-sector growth. The problem is not that the public sector is too large, although some trimming, streamlining, refocusing and reinventing of various Departments is required. As in any business, as circumstances change, something that worked 10 years ago may be redundant today.

The big challenge lies in the fact that, in general, the private sector is minuscule, and we need massive growth in it. The subgroup needs broad agreement on some of the parameters around that challenge. The subgroup must be efficient in its efforts to focus on one, two or three projects or ideas to unlock the economy. There is no point in our coming up with 20 ideas.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Any potential savings and efficiencies could be teased out when the DFP witnesses come before the subgroup.

Mr Ford: During my 17-year career, I experienced three reorganisations of health and social services, and I am not convinced of the Trotskyite concept of continuing revolution in institutional structures. David McNarry put his finger on it a few minutes ago when he talked about the ways in which Departments work. That ties into what Peter and Alasdair said about the announcement of a £400 million roads package this week, for example.

Witnesses from DE and DEL mentioned that they have co-operated on various matters. If Departments recognise the need for co-operation, and actually co-operate as opposed to merely saying that they are doing so, that would cover some of the issues of concern. However, the problem arises when other Departments make announcements, such as that about the roads package, with no reference to economic drivers.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): As it is 4.05pm, and I am conscious that Alasdair is pushed for time, let us consider the part of the Clerk's paper headed, "Evidence sessions" and go down the list of themes. We may be able to cover some quickly; others will require discussion. Point 1 refers to perceived over-dependence on the public sector.

Mr Weir: I want to pick up on Alistair's point, and, again, this is perhaps more about phraseology. The point is that the problem lies in the weakness of the private sector rather than over-dependence on the public sector. To some extent, those are two sides of the same coin. I realise that we are not trying to agree a form of wording, but it is a slightly different point.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is everyone happy with a change of emphasis to tidy that up?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do members wish to comment further on point 1? It is obvious that it must be included, and there is no argument on that.

Dr Birnie: It may be statistically correct that the size of the public sector in Northern Ireland compares to those in Wales and Scotland. However, the fact that productivity in Wales and Scotland, as in Northern Ireland, is falling in relation to the UK average arguably results in a comparison with a poor standard.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Shall we delete that reference to Wales and Scotland?

Mr Weir: I was going to suggest that on this issue, the paper prepared by the Clerk of Business referred to an:

"Unbalanced economy between public and private sectors — a clear requirement for private sector growth."

That emphasis is closer to what we are aiming at than the wording of point 1 of the paper prepared by the Committee Clerk.

Dr McDonnell: There is no harm in keeping the reference to Wales and Scotland. The point is that our public sector can be compared with those in Wales and Scotland. Perhaps the public sectors in Wales and Scotland are not as robust as they should be, but we must try to ground ourselves in some comparative reality, and the real issue is private sector growth.

I am slightly worried that the general view seems to be that the only problem is that the public sector is too large. At least 95% of the public sector is required to sustain the community and services, etc. Allowing the public service to be put at risk, or putting about the notion that slashing public services would somehow achieve anything, would only serve to erode existing services. The clear challenge is to create jobs in the private sector in high-wage, high-value-added areas.

The Committee Clerk: So far, all the witnesses have been consistent about there being no need to cut the public sector. They have all said that there is a need to continue to invest. Public expenditure growth should continue, but the private sector should be strengthened.

Ms Gildernew: A strong point has emerged about the public sector's inability to be agile and, if you like, to turn on a 50-pence piece. I am not keen on comparisons with Wales and Scotland, and previous witnesses have told the subgroup that those regions are not good comparators. Peter Gilleece mentioned the unbalanced economy between the public and private sectors. The main point is that we need to grow the private sector rather than slash the public sector. Peter Hain has pushed the point that we need to slash the public sector because of the imbalance, but that imbalance exists because the private sector needs to grow.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There seems to be general consensus on that theme. The next point is the low levels of business start-up, the high-cost business environment and over-regulation.

Ms Gildernew: In relation to business start-ups, it depends on which part of the North is being referred to. However, I am more concerned about nurturing those business start-ups through their next phase of development. The important issue is the success rates of business start-ups.

Are high-energy costs and barriers to SMEs included on the list?

The Committee Clerk: They are included.

Ms Gildernew: Can challenges to the SME sector in areas such as energy, transportation and manufacturing rates be included on the list?

The Committee Clerk: This is not a definitive list. The Clerks compiled it to stimulate debate, so it has been a useful exercise.

Mr McNarry: The list sends out a negative message, which is not the type of message that we want to send. We need to include some positive elements in our report that send the right signals to the Preparation for Government Committee. I hope that the report will generate a debate in the House. I would not go as far as the Secretary of State does about being world class, and so forth, but it is a goal worth aiming for. The report could be full of doom and gloom. Early on in our discussions, we said that we wanted to hear what witnesses had to say so that we could raise issues with the relevant Ministers. Quite honestly, I have heard nothing positive about innovation or any sound arguments about what needs to be done. Can we scope those issues? If we were to that, some ideas might emerge on how to deal with them?

Mr Weir: The positive and negative aspects can be married in. The report will have an introduction, which will highlight the positives. These two lists cover the impediments. The impediments have been identified, and we need to discuss positive solutions. By their very nature, impediments are negative.

Mr McNarry: Witnesses have said that the solution is to throw money at the impediments, but my capitalist nature cannot agree with that argument.

It is not the solution in a small country such as ours.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The next stage of the subgroup's work will be a major philosophical debate on whether money should be thrown at problem areas.

Mr McNarry: I appreciate that.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): This is simply a matter of whether we accept that issues have been raised and are important. We are not dealing with solutions.

Dr Birnie: I agree with Michelle's point. Item 2 on Alan Patterson's paper is very good as it stands, but we must add that it is not just a matter of getting firms started, it is a matter of getting them to grow. All the evidence suggests that if 100 firms were started tomorrow, each employing one or two people, a quarter or half of them would collapse within a couple of years, and only one or two would ever grow to a position in which they employed 50 or 100 people. The question is how the policy makers identify firms with the potential for high growth for business incubation.

A supplementary point that I tried to raise during a number of the evidence sessions concerns whether Northern Ireland entrepreneurs are, on average, inclined to growth, or whether they are inclined to grow to a certain size and then stop because they have achieved a reasonable standard of living and have begun to question the need to endure the hassle or to risk losing control.

Mr McNarry: Point 14 of Alan's paper might deal with that matter.

Dr Birnie: OK. I missed that.

Dr McDonnell: This point may be contentious, but it must be raised. Grants have not been mentioned at the sittings at which I have been present. My thinking on them changed as a result of my involvement in the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment, in which you and others were involved, Mr Chairman. My thinking changed because grants are doled out in Northern Ireland on an ad hoc basis. One can be lucky and get a grant, or one can be unlucky and not get one. Sometimes, it is very difficult pinpoint the differentiator.

I believe strongly that we must consider a small firms loan guarantee scheme, such as that operated in the States. I hope to raise that matter with the Department of Finance and Personnel when its representatives appear before us. In the States, instead of handing out grants here and there, the authorities use £5 million or £6 million as a pump-primer key. That money is used as insurance and, in turn, the banks are asked to put £100 million on the table, with that £6 million used as the underwriting factor. The banks then loan money at base rate to businesses under a special business scheme to which everyone has access.

Recipients must pay back that money — that is the only difficulty. However, instead of a lucky 20% of people getting access to a grant, 100% of people have access to the scheme. It does not matter whether someone is starting a grocery shop or a restaurant. That scheme is particularly important in the States because large numbers of migrant ethnic minorities want to start up in business. Another important point is that that loans scheme has created a culture in which women start two thirds of new businesses. I would be the first to admit that our business culture appears to be male-dominated. The reality is that, by creating a level playing field, one opens everything up.

It may be that some people agree with me and some disagree. However, if we can do one thing only, it should be to discover how much money DETI and others give out in grants for small business start-ups. Take that money and go to the four banks and ask for a banking consortium to set up a loan fund. That scheme would be equally open to someone who is setting up as an agricultural contractor in Newtownards or to a Chinese guy who is setting up a Chinese grocery store in the Markets or at Donegall Pass in the heart of Belfast. Under that system, the banks would provide the assessors, etc, rather than Invest NI and the banks running three or four duplicated systems.

Mr Chairman, it is important that, before we complete our work, we consider that.

4.15 pm

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is 4.15 pm, and we are still debating the second discussion point. Let us move to the third.

Mr McElduff: I am not sure that we will get through this business today. That is a matter for your judgement, Mr Chairman.

Point 2 of the Clerk's paper concerns factors inhibiting small businesses. I stress that we must assert the importance of supporting the SME sector and local businesses. That ties in with David's point about being positive. We always talk about the need to attract FDI, but we should make a strong statement about the general need to support local business and to recognise its contribution to the economy. I hear about that recognition consistently in the subgroup and in meetings of the Strabane employment task force.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is a helpful point to add.

Are there any comments on point 3 of the Clerk's paper, namely the theme of skills deficit and lack of entrepreneurial culture?

Dr McDonnell: I broadly agree with that.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Point 4 of the Clerk's paper refers to the high rate of economic inactivity in Northern Ireland and flags up the impact that the Province's high percentage of students have on those figures.

We should stress that our public sector is not necessarily big, but that the huge inactivity sector skews the figures. That includes people in receipt of disability living allowance (DLA) or incapacity benefit, students, the retired, etc. Does anyone disagree with the contention that a large section of our community is inactive?

Mr Weir: There is positive and negative inactivity. The fact that the figure for people in receipt of benefits is a lot higher than elsewhere is a problem for the economy. The fact that we have a higher percentage of students should be beneficial to the economy in the long run. We can contrast those.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Despite the number of students, one in ten adults is in receipt of DLA.

Mr Weir: I am not disputing that, but a degree of differentiation must be made. The figures for incapacity benefit suggest that the gap between Northern Ireland and the rest of the UK is 6%.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): No, that is six percentage points. It is an important distinction.

Mr Weir: Of that, 60% was due to incapacity benefit. We are due to receive more figures to explain the student element.

The Committee Clerk: Officials from DEL said that the same figures applied in the South, and student proportions had an impact there also.

Dr Birnie: It is even more complicated than Peter points out, given that we export so many of our students.

Mr Weir: I assumed that they were counting students resident in Northern Ireland.

Dr Birnie: I think that that is measured by a “normally resident” criterion.

Ms Gildernew: I wonder whether there is a correlation between those adults without adequate numeracy and literacy skills, and those in generational and long-term unemployment? If people cannot read and write well enough to hold down a job, the chances are that they are on those benefits to enable them to exist.

Mr Weir: Areas that traditionally had high levels of unemployment 20 years ago now have high levels of incapacity benefit. That is because, down the years, Governments of various political hues wanted to keep unemployment out of the headlines. People have been pushed towards other benefits. They are economically inactive, but they do not count towards the unemployment figures. Areas such as Merthyr Tydfil in the Welsh valleys have some of the highest figures for incapacity benefit. I suspect that in parts of the UK and Northern Ireland, and perhaps the Republic of Ireland as well, there has been a desire to keep unemployment figures down. That is a large element of the figures for the economically inactive.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do not mind if I shout your name; it is just to let Hansard know who is speaking.

Mr Dallat: To pick up on Michelle’s point, it is important to look for correlations between different factors. For example, a very large percentage of the several hundred people in prison have no basic skills, and even though prisoners are out of circulation, they are still included in the economically inactive figures.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is everyone happy that, regardless of how we look at the make-up of inactivity, it is a problem that we must address?

Dr McDonnell: We could dissect the virtual bits — the university students, and so on. We were beginning to move the discussion towards reality, but, even excluding students, the inactivity rate is still high. Students will be relatively economically inactive, but there is not much that we can do about that. Let us deal with the areas that we can do something about.

We grossly underestimate how difficult it is for people to return to work, particularly those women who have been out of work for five or 10 years rearing a family. That must be recognised. I know of female teachers who, after a few years out of work, have returned to work as classroom assistants rather than face the stress and trauma of going back and having to almost retrain. Equally, from time to time, I talk to people who had been making a valid and useful contribution to the economy only to find that returning to work after four or five years was a challenge. Those situations are not recognised.

Ms Gildernew: I want to pick up on Alasdair’s point that there is definitely a barrier to women who want to get back into the labour market. It is the prohibitive cost of high-quality childcare, particularly in rural areas. I know teachers and nurses — well-trained and skilled women — who, once they have three children, have to drop out of the labour market because they cannot afford childcare. That is an impediment that they cannot overcome.

I am not sure what the figures are, but there are hundreds, if not thousands, of people who care for either elderly relatives or for people with disabilities. The carers become economically inactive as well. They are caring for people who perhaps should be in nursing homes or who need professional care but who are not entitled to it or who cannot afford it. As a result, a member of their family is out of the labour market as well.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The carers’ allowance figures might give us some indication of the scale of that. I hope that when we get the statistics we do not find that 108 of the economically inactive are MLAs. [Laughter.]

Mr Weir: They would have difficulty reintegrating into the real world.

Mr McNarry: There would be nobody to look after us, that is for sure.

Ms Gildernew: There would be a whole lot of classroom assistants.

Mr McNarry: We need an MLA union.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Bear in mind that we are merely agreeing what should be included; we are not arguing about what policy to adopt.

Point 6 is “Inappropriate fiscal environment —

Mr McNarry: Chairman, perhaps we could consider that with point 17. That is the hot potato.

Dr Birnie: Yes, it is.

Mr McNarry: There is enough here for us to discuss, which is what we need to do. That would nearly take up a session on its own.

The Committee Clerk: In writing the report, I find that new issues arise all the time. Many of the witnesses said that a cocktail of measures would be required, and that it is not a quick fix.

Sir George Quigley today argued comprehensively in favour of lower corporation tax for FDI purposes, particularly as a beneficial shock for business start-ups. NICICTU then said that it preferred the equivalent amount in grant aid over a reduction in corporation tax. Clear issues, therefore, were raised. I shall meet with some DETI officials next Friday to learn how those issues might mix so that I can give the subgroup some advice on that. We must be clear, however, on the cocktail when it comes to the report.

I thank David for his point. Yes, everything is included at this stage, but we shall discuss at the next few sittings what the subgroup will recommend.

4.30 pm

Mr McNarry: We may have to have a vote on that when it comes to it.

Dr Birnie: Mr Chairman, it comes down to a reduction in corporation tax versus tax credits. My preliminary judgement is that our recommendation seems to be pointing towards the former.

Mr McNarry: We must be able to stand over our decision. There is no way that I want to state my political placement now before any election. I do not want to be a big guy and plump for changes to corporation tax, only to be unable to deliver them.

The Committee Clerk: DETI has promised to send me some research. It has not been completed yet, but DETI has enough at its disposal to provide a model of the impact that a reduction in corporation tax would have on jobs and on the economy.

Mr McNarry: Sir George Quigley was very frank when he told us how Gordon Brown said this, the Prime Minister said that and the Secretary of State said the other.

Ms Gildernew: And what they did not say.

Mr McNarry: However, they did not go the whole hog on it.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are we agreed on point 6 on the Committee Clerk's list of themes?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We shall move on to point 7. I think that we all agree that there is an infrastructure deficit, including issues such as water, of course, but I think that we can easily agree on that point.

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Strong opinions were voiced in the evidence sessions on point 8, which concerns the underperformance of our tourism industry. That underperformance is quite easily measured as a percentage of GDP compared to, say, that of Scotland or the Irish Republic. We are miles behind. Our revenues are half those of the Republic by that measure.

Alasdair, I know that you are very keen on the new growth areas such as biotechnology.

Dr McDonnell: I cannot add any more on that, because I have harped on about it throughout the evidence sessions. I keep returning to the point that, although a great deal of pure research is done in universities, it is academic research and is not being put into practical application.

One way to extract wealth from universities is through QUBIS Ltd and UUTech Ltd. UUTech seems to be better funded and better structured than QUBIS. QUBIS receives perhaps £50,000 or £80,000 of core funding from Queen's a year, and it is in the market to get a few bob from whatever contributor to make up the rest of its funding. That is my understanding of the situation. It is not nearly enough, however, because some of our biggest hitters of today emerged from QUBIS's assembly line. It is a bit like an hourglass. The universities are at the top, with the industries at the bottom, and in between is the bottleneck where the funding should be but is not. Trying to apply the technology is like attempting to get through the biblical eye of the needle at times.

Mr Chairman, that is my argument on that. Then it is a question of mining the available opportunities, but my experience in that field is limited to knowledge that I acquired years ago, when Israel was struggling economically and had to subcontract. It formed partnerships with companies in the US — the bilateral industrial research and development (BIRD) initiative. Our Radius programme — subsequently the Radian programme — was modelled on that, but it never quite took off. Israel, however, effectively became a subcontractor for American companies that were overloaded with R&D that they could not handle. It built the high-tech side of its economy through the BIRD initiative, and it is doing very well.

Another issue that we go round and round without tackling is that our tourism industry gives people what it thinks they should want, not what they want. That is the simple flaw. People have told me time and time again that we keep shoving product at people, but that we do not ask tourists often enough what they want.

Our tourism is very primitive. Canadian friends of mine stayed in a bed and breakfast somewhere and they told me that they had to drive for half a mile to a shop to get change because the woman who ran the bed and breakfast had no change for them when they went to pay. Those are basic but off-putting failings. They said that when they were in Fermanagh they wanted to go to the Mourne, but the people in the guesthouse in which they were staying had no clue about how to go about finding a guesthouse in the Mourne. There is no network of links, although some work has been done.

Some aspects of our tourism are very good and very homely but relatively primitive. Improving our tourism product is not rocket science. If tourists want to go hillwalking, let us invest in hillwalking; let us invest in what tourists want.

Ms Gildernew: I am mindful of time: we are losing people.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Dr McDonnell is saying that underperformance in tourism should be one of the themes on which there has been a degree of consensus. Our debate on policy will be very interesting.

Mr McNarry: All the themes should be included.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Let us try to get through them as rapidly as possible. I am sure that the next theme will get votes from the members on my left.

Mr McElduff: North/South collaboration needs to be strengthened considerably, Chairman.

The Committee Clerk: The Chairman talks about collaboration for mutual benefit. It is a balancing act.

Mr Weir: The words are very well chosen.

Mr McElduff: "To avoid unnecessary duplication of spending"; that is another way of putting it.

The Committee Clerk: All the witnesses thus far have said exactly the same thing. They have been specific that they were not making a political comment, but that improved North/South collaboration would improve the whole economy. I hope that we can include that without any political overtones.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Clerk has been very skilled in wording this item.

Dr McDonnell: I was talking to someone last night — and this will warm Michelle's heart — who told me that the promise of the M3 running through Aughnacloy to Derry is already having an impact on north Monaghan and the border areas of Armagh. People will be able to commute to Dublin in an hour — although they may not commute very far when the road is jammed. However, it is happening. Ironically, the political challenge for us is to take the politics out of greater North/South collaboration. We must depoliticise it and allow the economy the freedom to do what it does best: fill the gaps.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That strikes me as your agreeing to that theme being included.

Mr McNarry: I take it that that comment is directed at the private sector.

Dr McDonnell: Why?

Mr McNarry: Because they are two jurisdictions.

Ms Gildernew: Have you read the Good Friday Agreement? We are talking about mutual benefit and collaboration, which is not restricted to the private sector; it is very much overlapping.

Mr Ford: I would have thought that we could have involved an element of university collaboration on research.

Mr McNarry: There are political connotations to such collaboration that we must recognise. However, I do not disagree to discussing it and it is right to include it as a theme in the paper.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do we believe that there is a high level of business crime? Is that an issue that needs to be dealt with?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): An issue that came up time and time again, and the statistics back it up, is the low level of R&D. Our percentages, compared to the Republic or the rest of the UK or Europe, were quite frightening.

Mr McNarry: Perhaps somebody could research that with the witness from DETI who said that businesses were reluctant to get involved in R&D and that there was a very low take-up of the tax credit. Should incentives be provided to get businesses involved in purposeful R&D?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Apparently there is very low take-up among small and medium-sized businesses.

Mr Weir: I think that the Department for Employment and Learning spoke about the amount of red tape and hurdles around R&D and tax credits that was putting businesses off taking them up.

The Committee Clerk: The Federation of Small Businesses said that. In fact, a lot of the witnesses have been saying the same thing: that there are a lot of tax credits available, but the bureaucracy around getting them is difficult. John Friel said that he had been eligible for R&D allowances and tax credits that he did not go for in the end because of all the form-filling. He just wanted a grant.

Mr McNarry: The subgroup needs to accept that reality and find out what is being done about it.

Mr Ford: That is the reality as regards small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs) generally. Since Northern Ireland depends so much on SMEs, we need to find some way of addressing the issue more than other regions do.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): All we need to agree today is that lack of R&D investment is a big issue. We do not need to try and solve the issue today.

Mr Weir: Is there an additional point that too much bureaucracy is an impediment because it is a disincentive for people to take up grants? That is slightly different from just saying that there is low R&D uptake. It is the bureaucracy and red tape that form a barrier.

Ms Gildernew: Absolutely. It is a disincentive. In the construction industry, filling in the paperwork for items such as Construction Industry Training Board training allowances is so time-consuming that half of the time, people do not bother with it. We must make it simpler for them.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We can add it to the list as point 18.

Mr McNarry: Could we possibly add renewable energy here? A lot of research and development is going into renewable energy, and it is being driven by the private sector. The Government are also taking it up. The construction industry is going to have to adapt to it in 2008.

Ms Gildernew: Could it be put into point 8 under new growth areas?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes, that is quite a neat solution.

What about point 12 on the negative impact on implementation of too much Government?

The Committee Clerk: I think we agreed that earlier on.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): OK. Everyone agrees with point 13 to the effect that delays in planning inhibit investment. I cannot foresee any difficulty with that. The recent judicial review demonstrates the point. It states that all planning applications must be done in chronological order, should they be for harbours or dormer-window extensions. That is a big problem in my area. Everyone agrees that we must have a quick planning system for new investment opportunities.

Do we have consensus on point 14, namely that a high proportion of small businesses are unable to expand or resistant to expansion?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Point 15 is:

“political instability with resultant poor match between problem and solution and discourages confidence in the economy”.

It is not number 15 in order of importance, mind you.

Mr McNarry: If Barry McElduff does not come to the meeting we could get through that one quite well.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Regardless of the politics with a capital P, is everyone happy enough that political instability be included?

Ms Gildernew: It needs to be in there.

Mr Weir: I am not sure what is meant by: “with resultant poor match between problem and solution”. I do not disagree with the general point that it be included, I am just wondering what that actually means.

The Committee Clerk: Some witnesses were saying that, for example, in terms of direct rule, Ministers are not in tune any longer. In fact, Sir George Quigley was saying earlier that previous Ministers, such as Roy Mason, pushed the Northern Ireland economy but perhaps that is less strong now. Therefore, the solutions that were applied tend not to be fit for purpose.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Number 16 is on the inability of small businesses to take advantage of procurement opportunities. I did not spot this one.

Mr Weir: It came up today. Because of economies of scale, small firms are not in a position to bid for large procurement schemes or PPPs.

Ms Gildernew: I would reword it. It sounds as though we are saying that small businesses are not able to take advantage of procurement opportunities, but these are usually policy-driven, and small businesses are excluded. In one of the first sessions, the Federation of Small Businesses talked about unbundling contracts in order to allow small contractors to be able to compete.

Mr McNarry: I agree. It is unfair.

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Finally, we have point 17:

“No quick fix! Need for a radical solution that includes a range of targeted fiscal tools based on long-term needs, social partnership, stimulating the private sector through a business friendly environment”.

Mr McNarry: That is a lovely sound bite: “no quick fix”. I find it difficult to buy into that unless it is fully expanded. There is no quick fix at all.

Mr Weir: I do not disagree with point 17: the only complication is that all of the other points are looking at the impediments. Maybe that is not the intention of point 17, but it does not sit right with the others.

4.45 pm

The Committee Clerk: A lot of the witnesses have been saying that there is not a single solution, and as a subgroup we need to recognise that we are offering a combination of solutions that meet particular needs.

Mr McNarry: Could we add an eighteenth point?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We already have a point 18.

Mr McNarry: What is it?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Bureaucracy is listed as the eighteenth.

Mr McNarry: Can we add a nineteenth point?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The “quick fix” referred to the option of a reduction in corporation tax. John Simpson pointed out that the biggest beneficiaries of that would be the four big banks. That would do nothing to increase employment or assist the economy.

Would you like to suggest a nineteenth point, Mr McNarry?

Mr McNarry: I want to elaborate on the educational stuff that is coming through from every presentation. We heard it not only from the Department for Employment and Learning and from the Department of Education, but also from industry. There seems to be a focus going back to education, and it seems to be prevalent in nearly every point that we discuss. I wanted to see if we could add a nineteenth point so that we do not forget it.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is a very valid point. Do members agree to add a point 19 on educational underpinning?

Members indicated assent.

Ms Gildernew: Are we removing “no quick fix” from point 17? I do not think we should. Dr Gilleece’s paper and Dr Whitaker’s 1958 paper show that there is no quick fix.

Mr Weir: It depends on how you list it. I would not remove it from the report; but we are creating a list on the basis of the impediments, and saying “no quick fix” is not an impediment. That belongs among the solutions rather than the impediments. It is a question of where you put it rather than whether it goes in.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): David, how different is your suggested point 19 from point 3, which dealt with “skills deficit and poor correlation between business needs and education provision”? Do you want to add something or is yours so radically different that you feel that it requires something additional?

Mr McNarry: Can we leave in a point 19 so that it can be elaborated on? It may come out in the third point, but I am happy enough with that. A major education policy initiative is going on that I know we cannot get involved in, but we must keep a watch on it.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The quorum is in danger. We need to rattle through the Clerk of Business’s paper very quickly, because I can see that nearly everything has been discussed already. Can anyone spot anything on that list that we have not already included in our discussion of the Committee Clerk’s paper?

The Committee Clerk: Chairman, apologies for giving you two papers, but we were working to tight deadlines.

Dr Birnie: Chairman, we might transfer the theme of “brain drain” from the Clerk of Business’s paper; it is supplementary.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes. Also, what about the point dealing with the negative impact of high insurance costs?

Dr Birnie: Yes, that is additional. We should transfer both onto the main list.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Lots of them have come up in a slightly different wording.

Dr Birnie: Have energy costs been covered somewhere?

The Committee Clerk: They are covered in point 6, alongside insurance.

Mr Weir: We might incorporate into point 12 of the Committee Clerk’s list the observation that:

“public sector (departmental) concentration on creation of visions and strategies [is] allied to a failure or delay in implementation”.

Ms Gildernew: Yes, combining it with the need for greater operational agility.

Mr Weir: It is perhaps the same point but might need rewording.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is an important point because, for instance, we have been told that the new transport infrastructure will not start until 2015. That seems very slow.

Mr Weir: Also, if you look at the scoring for the building of schools, a lot of schools are annoyed that announcements were made five years ago but nothing has happened. If the construction industry is not physically building the stuff that should have been built, there are implications on both sides. John Simpson highlighted that. Point 12 could be elaborated to set out those implications.

Mr Dallat: Perhaps the subgroup could be given a broader remit as regards infrastructure. I know that this is an economic subgroup, but 50 people are killed on the roads here each year, and that has a huge economic fallout. The economists will calculate so many thousand pounds per person and try to put a value on them. However, given our horrendously bad record, the paper should reflect the fact that loss of business is not the only concern; there is a wider aspect to the economic loss in terms of hospitals being tied up and insurance claims — not to mention the emotional aspect, which is obviously the most important.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That takes us up to number 20, depending where number 19, Mr McNarry’s proposed point on education, is placed. Are insurance costs covered?

The Committee Clerk: Yes, they are included in the paper.

Mr Ford: Number 6 on the Committee Clerk’s list includes insurance.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): So we have reached number 19.

The Committee Clerk: I am very conscious of the time. I have got a lot out of this meeting. It was only scheduled to give me a feel of where the subgroup stands, because the report has to be completed in the next couple of weeks.

Mr McNarry: My only disappointment — and I expressed it earlier on — is that it does not look as if the subgroup will be able to hear a young person’s perspective on the future.

The Committee Clerk: I will ring the Youth Council.

Mr Weir: There are at least a couple of us on the subgroup under 40.

Mr Ford: We could get Naomi Long to chair that session.

Mr Weir: I suppose it depends on how one defines young.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Forty-nine.

Mr McNarry: I certainly do not consider anybody in here to be young.

The Committee Clerk: I consider myself to be young at heart.

Three witnesses are scheduled to appear on 10 August; the Quinn Group has now withdrawn. The best that I can do is to ring the Youth Council to see if it could send a couple of young people. It is most unlikely, but I will make a request nonetheless.

Mr McNarry: I am disappointed. I appreciate that there has been some misunderstanding. However, the subgroup discussed this matter at the very first meeting, and it was decided that the Youth Council should be invited as witnesses. Having read the Youth Council's response, I do not think that it has understood what we are looking for.

The Committee Clerk: It was unclear.

Mr McNarry: A contribution from the Youth Council would add value.

The Committee Clerk: I will do my best, but it may be too late. I think that there was an issue with the handover between Cathie White and me —

Mr McNarry: I am not getting into that.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are we content that the Committee Clerk's paper covers the sustainability of the Northern Ireland economy, given its small domestic market and proximity to a competing system, and the loss of incentive and threat to jobs posed by phasing out industrial derating and introducing water charges?

There are only 1·7 million people in our domestic market, but I did not hear mention of the small domestic market of Northern Ireland in the first round of discussions. The storm clouds are gathering over industrial derating, water charges and so on.

Mr Ford: These issues would fit in with point 6, which covers excessive business costs such as an inappropriate fiscal environment, duty, rates, insurance and bureaucracy.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That deals with current problems. Should we include future problems?

Mr Ford: The words "present and future" could be added.

The Committee Clerk: Point 6 very much covers the current position and the traditional arguments. One of the recent witnesses — John Simpson, I think — talked of the conventional arguments, including the peripheral nature of the economy. The report will cover those points. A number of witnesses have contrasted the current position with that in which we want to be. The report should include the positives and negatives of the traditional arguments and also consider more novel approaches.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The subgroup still has a quorum, despite David McNarry's departure. Are members happy enough that we have hit all the right buttons? We have 19 points here.

Mr McElduff: Is the subgroup satisfied that balanced economic development east and west of the Bann is included?

Ms Gildernew: It is not really in there.

The Committee Clerk: It is covered to a degree only. It is mentioned under infrastructure and east-west roads.

Mr McElduff: The matter is evidence-based as well. I have heard witnesses mention it a number of times.

Mr Weir: My point is slightly more generic, but the list has to be economically balanced. There is a range of issues: there are east-west and urban/rural dimensions, and issues around Greater Belfast and the rest of the country. As mentioned earlier today, there are even issues regarding jobs in Belfast and its hinterlands — for example, a couple of the Government Departments are shifting from Rathgael House to Belfast. There is a range of issues concerning equity and balance that must be represented in the economy.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Have we captured the key issues that have emerged to date? This is members' last chance to raise any burning question that they feel have not been covered. I cannot see anything that is not covered by those headings. I am sure that the other Chairmen will not exclude any emerging issue that suddenly arises.

Any other issues?

Mr McNarry: If members are agreed, Mr Chairman, I shall take only five minutes. I appreciate and understand the work that has been done in putting together timetables. However, I have a difficulty with the meetings running over time. I can reschedule my diary to accommodate an extra 10 or 15 minutes, but, on several occasions, meetings have run more than an hour beyond the time allotted. I acknowledge my contribution to that. However, some of the people who have given evidence — is Hansard recording this?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes, it is.

Mr McNarry: Can we turn off the recording?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Can we?

The Committee Clerk: Not while the subgroup is sitting. The subgroup has already taken the decision that Hansard will report everything.

Mr McNarry: Witnesses could perhaps be asked to shorten their presentations. Without mentioning any particular groups, some presentations went on too long. It is eating into our time, and we are flowing from one subject to another.

The Committee Clerk: Witnesses have all been advised to make 10- to 15-minute presentations. One presentation today lasted the guts of 25 minutes.

Mr Weir: To be fair, work becomes difficult as well. We are depending on people who, when questioned, want to answer fully, but they can go on too long. It is very difficult.

Mr McNarry: I am only saying that, because I had to go due to another commitment and it left only six members present. I would not want to offend my colleagues in that situation, but it would irritate me that I had let people down by having to go. Perhaps we should do something about it.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The other option would be to have a deputy from your party on standby, ready to replace you at the appropriate time.

Mr McNarry: We cannot do that. If you really want to get stropky about it, it is not acceptable for the sitting to overrun by an hour. We were given a schedule that said that today's sitting would end at 1.15 pm, and at 2.15 pm we were still here gassing.

The Committee Clerk: The length of the meeting is a matter for members. The Chairmen have been encouraging concise questions and presentations. This is a huge and interesting area of debate, and one would expect sittings to overrun. From listening to the questions and from reading Hansard, I think that the standard of the questions has been excellent; they will elucidate all sorts of arguments and responses. All that I can ask you to do is to be as concise as you can in your questions. With due deference, political representatives do tend to prologue their questions. If we can avoid that and encourage concise presentations —

Mr Weir: We have also probably pushed our report back another week. To be fair, in normal circumstances, there is no way that we would have so many sets of witnesses.

The Committee Clerk: The subgroup is squeezing to its maximum. You are squeezing a normal inquiry that would take nine months into —

Mr McNarry: I am conscious that many colleagues have travelled longer distances than I have. It has only happened once, but, nevertheless, I have been the cause of stopping a sitting because of a prior commitment.

My commitments are based on the information that I have in my diary. I try to ensure that my attendance at the subgroup does not clash with other commitments, and I apologise to anybody who was affected.

Mr Dallat: Mr Chairman, as a mere substitute who has travelled a distance, I do not think there is an awful lot wrong. The workmanlike atmosphere here, the friendship among the different members and our good relationship with those who give evidence cannot be exchanged for the odd wee hiccup. Sometimes it has been members' fault for asking elongated questions, and sometimes it has been the fault of over-anxious witnesses. However, it would be wrong to give the impression that our deliberations have been anything but very good.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I am very happy with the standard of the evidence and the questions. Obviously, I am biased, being the Chair, but I have certainly seen an awful lot worse.

Mr McElduff: I propose that this meeting end.
[Laughter.]

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I must inform you that the date of the next meeting is Tuesday 8 September at 10.00 am, and the witnesses are Moy Park Ltd, the Ulster Farmers' Union, Wrightbus Ltd and the Department of Finance and Personnel.

Adjourned at 5.01 pm.

SUBGROUP ON THE ECONOMIC CHALLENGES FACING NORTHERN IRELAND

Tuesday 8 August 2006

Members in attendance for all or part of proceedings:

The Chairman, Mr Alban Maginness
Dr Esmond Birnie
Ms Michelle Gildernew
Mrs Naomi Long
Dr Alasdair McDonnell
Mr Barry McElduff
Mr David McNarry
Lord Morrow
Mr Sean Neeson
Ms Margaret Ritchie
Mr Peter Weir

Witnesses:

Mr Eric Reid	}	Moy Park
Mr Clarke Black	}	Ulster Farmers' Union
Mr Kenneth Sharkey
Mr William Wright	}	Wrightbus Ltd
Mr Mike Brennan	}	Department of Finance and Personnel
Mr Bruce Robinson

The subgroup met at 10.11 am.

(The Chairman (Mr A Maginness) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): I welcome everyone to this meeting of the subgroup. I emphasise to members that it is a necessity that they turn off their mobile phones completely. That is very important for the recording of proceedings, because mobile phone interference has caused Hansard serious difficulties.

I have received apologies from David Ford. Naomi Long is attending in his place. I have also received apologies from Mitchel McLaughlin, for whom Barry McElduff will be deputising, although he is not present at the moment. Are there any other apologies?

Mr Weir: Lord Morrow is here in place of Ian Paisley Jnr.

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): Let us move on to the draft minutes of the two meetings on Thursday 3 August.

Mr Neeson: I attended on 3 August, but that has not been recorded in the minutes.

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): It is recorded that you were in attendance at the first meeting but that you did not attend the afternoon meeting. Is that correct?

Mr Neeson: Yes. I beg your pardon.

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): Are members content that the draft minutes are an accurate record of proceedings?

Mr McNarry: I have not had time to read the draft minutes carefully. I know that they are just minutes, which take us through what we discussed, but an issue was raised about writing to the Secretary of State, or to whomever, to ascertain a breakdown of the £16 billion package about which he had been talking. I do not see that recorded, although I am sure that it appears in Hansard. I do not see a letter from anyone about that either.

The Committee Clerk: I have mentioned that matter to Northern Ireland Office officials, so they are aware of it, but we have not formally put it to them yet. That would not appear in the minutes of proceedings because it was not put as a question, even though agreement was registered.

Mr McNarry: Can we get a letter or some information that would be useful to the proceedings?

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): Yes. A letter will be sent, and I presume that we shall receive a formal reply.

The Committee Clerk: The Department of Finance and Personnel (DFP) or the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment (DETI) might be best placed to answer that question. There will be an opportunity today to question DFP. The Strategic Investment Board (SIB), to which the £16 billion is going, falls under the authority of DFP.

Mr McNarry: I understand that, Chairman. I would have thought, however, that if the Committee had difficulties with an issue, it would ask the Secretary of State where he got his information or to what he was referring.

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): Are you content for the moment, Mr McNarry?

Mr McNarry: Yes.

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): Thank you.

Can we take it that members are content with the minutes?

Members indicated assent.

10.15 am

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): OK. We can move on, and the minutes will be published on the Assembly website.

I note that the last few minutes of the 3 August meeting of the subgroup were inquorate and cannot, therefore, be officially recorded. An informal recording has been obtained and is included in members' papers, although part was lost because of mobile phone interference. I therefore re-emphasise the importance of keeping our mobiles switched off.

I would like to move on to the matter of the subgroup's Chairpersons. In your papers you will see a letter from the Secretary of State that details nominations from the Ulster Unionists, the SDLP and the Alliance Party to chair the subgroup. Naomi Long will chair Thursday's meeting. Unfortunately, Mr Jim Wilson will be unavailable throughout August. The Ulster Unionists have advised that they wish to nominate an alternative Chairman through the Preparation for Government Committee. Chairpersons will be allocated on a rotational basis, subject, of course, to availability. Members have a revised work plan showing the new chairing arrangements.

Mr McNarry: I hope that my colleague David McClarty will be acceptable as a replacement for Jim Wilson; I wish to advise the subgroup that we intend to proceed with that nominee.

May I draw attention to a procedural issue — and I intend no mischief. I see that my colleague Naomi Long is sitting beside me. It is perhaps a matter of poacher turning gamekeeper that a member can attend the subgroup as a delegate and then return to chair it. I have no problems with that. However, since I am bound to be asked about it, I would like some assurance that such a procedure is perfectly in order. It is unique.

Mr Neeson: It would be very unlike David to be malicious.

Mr McNarry: It is valuable, for the sake of continuity, that the other Chairmen have sat in on these meetings. When Jim Wells was in your position, Mr Chairman, and — what do you call the other fellow?

Mr Weir: Francie Molloy.

Mr McNarry: They would be sitting there taking notes. She is sitting here at this table and not down there. That does seem a bit different.

Mr Neeson: It is good experience, David; Naomi will know what is going on.

Mr McNarry: It is a serious question.

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): Does the Committee Clerk have advice for the subgroup on that matter?

The Committee Clerk: There is no procedural reason why a member cannot attend one meeting as a substitute and another meeting as Chairman. It would be inappropriate, however, to be Chairman while being a nominated, full-time member, as they are entirely different roles. However, there is no procedural impediment to Naomi's attending today's meeting as a substitute and chairing another meeting.

Mrs Long: I am sorry that my presence has caused anyone such consternation. However, when in the Chair, I intend to be impartial. I understand the difference between attending as a representative of David Ford today, and taking the Chair at another meeting.

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): The important thing is that the Chairperson acts independently and impartially, as Mrs Long said.

Mr McNarry: The background, unless I am incorrect, is that this subgroup must be attended by members of the Preparation for Government Committee and their nominees.

The Committee Clerk: I took advice on that at the outset. There is no specific requirement that the formal nominees must attend subgroup meetings. The nominees can be substituted, so it is a bit of a procedural nonsense.

Mr Neeson: The Deputy Speakers also sit in the Assembly as Members. What is the difference?

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): When they chair sittings, they act independently; they are not partisan.

Mr McNarry: As I said, I do not have a problem with this matter. I am identifying the issues now and soliciting responses so that, if I am asked, they are on the record. I am intrigued by the Committee Clerk's answer; I am a member of the Preparation for Government Committee, and my interpretation of that was pretty clear. It does not add up to the Committee Clerk's. From whom did he take this advice?

The Committee Clerk: I took advice from the Preparation for Government Committee staff. I can certainly formalise that advice, if members wish.

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): It would be helpful if it were formalised so that the position is clear.

Let us move to the work programme. A letter from Stephen Quinn, permanent secretary of the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment, has been tabled, along with the latest reports from the four subgroups of the Economic Development Forum (EDF). Those reports will be treated as written evidence. If this subgroup decides to meet after 25 August, it may be possible to take evidence from the chairpersons of the EDF's subgroups on innovation, enterprise, skills and infrastructure.

As for Mr McNarry's suggestion, the Northern Ireland Youth Council was contacted to invite oral evidence from young people on 10 August. David Guilfoyle, the chief executive of that body, has referred the subgroup to the Northern Ireland Youth Forum. We are awaiting a response from that body.

Ms Ritchie: At the last meeting of the subgroup that I attended, there was a suggestion that we should obtain evidence from the enterprise agencies. Is there any further information on that? I apologise for my absence last week — Mr Dallat deputised for me. I note that Enterprise Northern Ireland gave evidence then. Does it represent the enterprise agencies?

The Committee Clerk: Yes. Enterprise Northern Ireland is the representative body.

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): Are you satisfied with that, Ms Ritchie?

Ms Ritchie: Yes.

Dr Birnie: Mr Chairman, you will love me for suggesting another witness. We could take either oral or written evidence — I know time is short. Dr Graham Gudgin of Regional Forecasts has written an article on corporation tax in the current issue of 'Fortnight'. He has some interesting perspectives on the subject. He is rather more sceptical than some of the witnesses we have heard from so far.

Mr McNarry: He was proposed at an earlier meeting.

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): I think it might be best to consider that position. It may well be, given the time available, that we may not be able to facilitate Mr Gudgin, but it may be possible to get a written submission from him or, indeed, get a copy of the article in 'Fortnight' and append it to the record of the proceedings. That might be a useful way of dealing with that. Are you content with that?

Dr Birnie: I suggest that the Committee Clerk write to Mr Gudgin to see whether he could provide a written submission. I do not know if we have time for oral evidence but we do have time for written evidence. He could probably expand on the 'Fortnight' article.

The Committee Clerk: We do have time, Mr Chairman. There is no difficulty with that. The time frame may be an issue for Mr Gudgin, but there is no difficulty for us. The subgroup's last evidence session is this Thursday, but we have slotted in a written evidence session for next Tuesday, and if we get something slightly later than that from him, it would not be a problem.

Mr Weir: Indications were given that representatives from the Youth Council would be coming.

The Committee Clerk: They have not responded at all. I have left messages for them.

Mr Weir: Perhaps if they do respond, they could be slotted in next Tuesday.

The Committee Clerk: We can give them a slot at the moment on Thursday. We had scheduled three evidence sessions on Thursday, but one group has dropped out. I cannot remember which one.

Ms Gildernew: The Quinn Group.

The Committee Clerk: The Quinn Group dropped out, and we were going to slot the Youth Council in, if we could get a couple of young people to come along.

Mr Weir: If they do come on Thursday, we can adjust the timings of the evidence sessions, which are due to run until 1.15 pm. We could reduce each session from 60 minutes to 45 minutes.

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): That could be accommodated.

The draft transcripts of last Thursday's evidence session and the later meeting on the emerging issues have been issued to members with a deadline of close of play tomorrow, Wednesday 9 August, for proposed amendments.

We will now move to the open session. As agreed, we have four sets of witnesses. Each has been allocated a 45-minute slot. We will have three hours of evidence, and if we keep to that, the meeting should be over by 1.30 pm or thereabouts. I encourage colleagues to keep their questions to witnesses brief and focused on the terms of reference, which are in members' packs.

I call the first witness, Mr Eric Reid, who is the production director of Moy Park. Mr Reid, you are very welcome to the subgroup. A 45-minute slot has been allocated to you. Perhaps you will take 10 or 15 minutes to make your presentation, and then there will be questions from colleagues around the table. You have provided a written submission, and we are grateful for that.

Mr Eric Reid (Moy Park): Good morning, everyone. Thank you for allowing me to outline some of the challenges that we see. I do not know if members want me to read through my submission, but I will highlight some of the major issues.

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): That would be best.

Mr Reid: I have been in business in Moy Park for more than 40 years. We started with a handful of people, and today we employ about 9,000, about half of whom are in Northern Ireland. Our core business was built up in Northern Ireland. We were originally part of the Moygashel textile group, and we go back to the Second World War, when we produced linen for parachutes. We built up the idea of working with farmers to grow the flax that was used to produce the parachutes etc.

10.30 am

In the early 1960s, the company decided to move into poultry farming, on the principle of working with people in an integrated chain, from farm base to processing, trying to build relationships with retail customers. Since then, and all through the troubles, we have grown the business. Today, Moy Park is the largest poultry processor in the United Kingdom.

The United Kingdom has the largest poultry population in of any European member state. The EU poultry industry uses around 20% of all cereals in Europe and directly employs more than 500,000 people. The European market presents a major challenge for us. In the final part of my presentation, I will speak about the implications of the European market on fresh product.

I am not here to talk about the survival of the Northern Ireland industry, which is where our interest really lies, but of the intensive industry in Europe. That also rolls over into the red meat and milk producing industries. Other member states are already undertaking major rationalisation programmes, spending money to make and support winners — the better companies — to try to ensure that they can survive in the global economy. We can bring that back to Northern Ireland.

Moy Park has invested more than £100 million over the last 10 years, which has been supported by £17 million of Government funding, for which we are very grateful. You may say that that is very good, but it should be compared to what is happening across the border. In one sector alone, the Irish Government have contributed £100 million to a £300 million rationalisation programme. The funding that we received was very good, and we are very grateful for it, but current Government proposals would scrap some of that assistance. That will move companies away from Northern Ireland and closer to the marketplace.

For example, we are currently investing approximately £60 million in England to enlarge a factory and invest in the agribase to support that. We have done something similar in Northern Ireland. Michelle Gildernew and Lord Morrow have visited our plant in Dungannon and have seen that it is a global, profitable plant. We can meet the challenge, despite the extra transport costs of bringing in raw material and transporting around 170 containers of finished goods to England every week. When that is rationalised, and such a scale of production is reached, we can take on anyone in Europe.

We cannot take on the rest of the world, and people must understand that. European politicians must understand that we cannot take on Third-World countries, or countries such as Brazil and Thailand, where labour rates are 20% and capital costs are a fraction of those in Europe. Those countries do not have the same social services provision that we have, and Europe is a magnet for those Third-World countries. Those countries want to export their products to Europe because of the high prices. Europe is the gold-plated economy for the Third World.

There is a Third World situation in Europe, although people may not realise it, in the 10 new member states.

Moy Park is now part of an international group with companies in Hungary and Brazil, for example. Through visiting those countries, and having been involved in purchasing companies in Brazil, I know what is happening. We cannot compete with such countries.

The UK, and especially Northern Ireland, must have a clear strategy for agriculture. If I ask anyone in Government what is that strategy for the next 10 years, I do not get a clear definitive answer. What is that strategy? I am not interested in short-term environmental measures; they are all very good, and we support them, but we must know where we are aiming to go.

The UK poultry industry produces 15 million chickens a week, with overall consumption of 25 million chickens a week. Around 60% of the market is self-sufficient. However, poultry is still being imported into Europe, whereas the United States, Brazil and Thailand no longer import any poultry.

Where is the level playing field? Those are the types of challenges that we face. That is the position on the marketing side.

Moy Park is trying — and I have spoken to one or two members of this subgroup about this — to promote its strong belief that fresh means fresh. If people want to buy frozen products, they have had the opportunity to do so for many, many years. Somehow or other, the retail industry has been able to go direct to overseas countries to identify companies prepared to export to Northern Ireland. Moy Park processes slightly more than three million chickens a week, but it must compete with companies such as Tyson Foods, which processes more than 45 million chickens a week, and Sadia SA of Brazil, which processes in excess of 15 million chickens a week. They are big players in the so-called Third-World economies, especially in Brazil.

In the consumer era, if we allow frozen products — whether cooked or in ready meals — to be brought into Northern Ireland, defrosted and placed in chilled cabinets, consumers will believe that they are fresh. Although the products are not labelled as fresh, their being sold in chilled cabinets encourages the understanding that they are fresh. In very small print, consumers might see the words “do not refreeze”, but the busy consumer does not have time to look at the very small print. If they see something in a chilled cabinet, they believe it to be fresh.

For many years, consumers have had the choice to buy lower cost frozen products, but in the UK and in many other member states, they have decided to opt for fresh products. The UK market is driven dramatically by fresh products: 85% to 90% of all food purchased is fresh. Consumers may take that food home to freeze it, but at least it was fresh when they bought it.

I represent the UK industry in Brussels. I have been to meetings of DG VI and DG SANCO, and I have met Commissioner for Agriculture and Rural Development Mariann Fischer Boel and Commissioner for Health and Consumer Protection Markos Kyprianou. Although they understand and accept the issues, I can never get a decision from them. There are 25 member states fighting on this issue together. Agriculture is the number one industry in the Province. If we cannot win this battle, what is the alternative? The textile industry has gone; the shipbuilding industry has gone. I want the members in this room to tell me: what is the alternative?

The agro-industry supports the whole rural economy. It supports the little villages — Carrickmore, Caledon, Dungannon, Ederney, those down by Enniskillen. It is the main industry in the Northern Ireland economy. If we kill those little rural villages, where will our people go? Which industries will they go to for work? What is the alternative? The service industry is moving to India, where wages are a fraction even of those paid in Brazil. What is the alternative? What new industry will replace the agro-industry?

Members could say that in the past five years, Moy Park has employed a large number of foreign workers. They could be referred to as foreign workers, but they are members of our community from the 25 member states of the European Union. As Europeans, we must support our own house first, and the vast majority of Moy Park's foreign workforce comes from the new member states. Some are from Portugal, but quite a few are from central Europe.

In Northern Ireland, education is a bit like going to church. Once a person gets his or her first communion, it is a bit like a passing-out parade. When people go to school in this country and they reach 15 or 16 years of age, unless they are very bright, they leave school. Where do the young people of 15, 16 or 17 years of age go? Northern Ireland must have continual education. There should be an academy from which education can roll straight into industry. We must find a mechanism to do that.

This will shock members: for the past number of years, Moy Park has received a little support from the Government for a pilot adult education programme. Up to 20% of our workforce — I am not talking about the Portuguese or those from central Europe, but those who were educated in Northern Ireland — cannot read or write.

It is disgraceful that we have such a situation in what is perceived to be one of the world's leading economies. We have to address that issue. We can do something to bring people into the factory environment so that they can enjoy life and learn new skills.

Every operation in our factories has to be auditable. Retailers and consumers expect everything to be fully traceable. Everyone must be able to read, write and understand computers. We need to do much more, and Moy Park is prepared to do that. The company has spent money on education and has put over 2,000 people through the NVQ programme up to level 4; level 3 is fairly standard today. It costs money, and we should receive more support to help us to drive up the standard of our young people. Education is very important.

Moy Park has worked well with the veterinary division of the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development on research and development. Agriculture is the main employer in the economy, and we need to have a strong veterinary division; that must be maintained at all costs. We should be leading the world. John Thompson and Sons Ltd in Belfast is the largest feed mill in the United Kingdom, and it has the highest standard of biosecure feed. In partnership with that company, Moy Park has been able to establish a situation where 18% of all breeding stock in Europe comes from farms in Northern Ireland; Moy Park does the marketing.

The Northern Ireland Manufacturing Focus Group has worked hard on the rates issue, and we support it. We cannot allow Northern Ireland to become a desert. Moy Park is part of an international group. Why should we tell our shareholders to invest in Northern Ireland? We need to have some advantage. Raw materials cost us money; outward shipping costs us money. Why should anyone invest here?

Across the border we can see what the Government there do for industry. There are much lower rates, and there are also tax advantages. The subgroup has reports from the Confederation of British Industry that highlight that. These are real issues. We are not against the payment of taxes, but if we do not have a workforce, the Government will not receive those taxes. Moy Park employs 9,000 people who pay taxes.

We must ensure that we have a competitive base on a global scale. We need that strong base, so let us cap tax rates or find some way in which the most profitable companies pay a higher percentage. Companies cannot pay rates if they are not profitable; they will close down an operation and move to another part of the world. We are closing a small plant in Fermanagh. I have discussed this issue with a deputation from political parties. It is the start of rationalisation: Farm Fed in Coleraine closed down recently; the Grampian Food Group has closed down two Scottish operations and is now closing down an operation in the north of England.

This is happening in our own sector. It is not happening only in Northern Ireland but in fringe areas of Europe, where transport costs in and out are a major burden. That trend will continue with the rising cost of fuel. The issue of fuel duty in Northern Ireland should be addressed. The Government are losing money because people drive a few miles over the border and fill up their tanks. That is not an advantage for us: we have to run our factories, and I cannot bring fuel across the border. The cost of energy must be competitive, and it is not; it is 20% more expensive in Northern Ireland compared with our English operations. That is why we must cap rates at 25% or 30%.

The other area of concern is red tape. In Europe we should aim to be an inch in front of the rest of the world, not a mile, but there is too much red tape. We want to have the best environmental and welfare standards, and the best audit systems, to ensure that standards are maintained. A new integrated pollution prevention and control (IPPC) regulation has been introduced, and the Government are proposing that their employees will audit farms that have to comply with that regulation at a cost of over £2,000 per farm, per annum. Once farmers have complied with the regulation — and they require capital to do that — it is simply a matter of professional audit companies coming to farms and ticking the box. That can be done by independent audit companies for a few pounds a year. The Government are gold-plating regulations. We must find out how we can put Northern Ireland plc ahead, but we should not be gold-plating. Controls for safe food, a safe environment and the welfare of our people and stock should be met at the lowest possible cost.

10.45 am

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): Have you covered all your points of substance?

Mr Reid: Yes.

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): We will move on to questions, if you are happy with that. Several members would like to ask questions, and I will take them in order.

Ms Ritchie: Mr Reid, you are welcome to the Committee. In your submission you referred to the lack of a clear strategy on food production sustainability in the UK and the European Union. What are the clear components of that strategy, and what was the outcome of your discussions with the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development and with the various directorates in the European Union?

Your submission mentioned the need for a skilled workforce. You referred to the need for an academy to roll out post-GCSE students to the factory floor for ongoing training. What discussions and outcomes have you had with the Department for Employment and Learning and with the Department of Education?

Mr Reid: With regard to the clear strategy, the Government must work with the industry to back winners. There has been much rationalisation in Northern Ireland, and Moy Park completed the exercise with its Dungannon plant. Moy Park had contracted with five feed companies, but they have been reduced to one large company, which supplies us with our chicken feed. Therefore, we must bring scale into our business. That will also have to be done in other sectors such as the dairy and beef industries, and we must have an integrated chain. The industry and the Government can no longer be allowed to work together to — pardon the crude term — rape one sector and allow other sectors to have a bonanza. There must be an integrated system that allows a livelihood for all the links in the chain.

Therefore, Government should oversee what is going on. They do not have to do anything, but they should ensure that companies are encouraged to scale up and encourage integration across the total sector. Assistance should be given to companies that perform in that way and not given to those that do not.

Moy Park chicken farmers have spent a raft of money — probably as much as Moy Park itself — to build new sheds and revamp old sheds. Why are they not receiving some assistance, as farmers are in the Twenty-six Counties, where the industry is being supported in order to restructure?

Support should also be given to the agri-industry, but only to those people who are investing for the future. I am not a great believer in throwing money at farms for things that have happened in the past. We are going forward, but how can we encourage young people to stay on the land? Unless they see a future in which money will come to them to look after the land, they will not stay on the farms. Northern Ireland must look forward rather than backwards. Today's Government are looking backwards with the payment of single farm payments. I would prefer to see the money being given to people who are investing in the future rather than giving it to people for something that happened in the past. That is history; it is over.

Mr McNarry: Your presentation was refreshing and informative. At its core are the elements about which we need to hear. How do the literacy and numeracy skills of your local workers compare with foreign workers?

Does Moy Park own any of the farms that produce its chickens?

You mentioned fuel costs. Have you talked to the Government about competitive incentives or attractions that would assist you in getting your goods to market at a competitive rate? Seven million pounds a year is an extraordinary amount of money to spend on transport costs. If you talked to the Government, did you get any change out of them? I suspect not.

Mr Reid: I was part of the UK delegation that spoke to Lord Rooker recently on IPPC. The Government are not interested and believe that industry must stand on its own two feet. The Government want cheap food, they want to keep inflation down and they want to maintain a certain position. That is my interpretation, not only of the UK Government but of the European Union. They saw what happened when Russia turned off the gas tap — the price of gas soared, and it has not come down.

If terrorism ever infiltrated the food chain, and something was thought to be hidden in a 40,000-tonne load of products from South America or the United States, there would be no food in the shops within three or four days. If Russia turned off central Europe's oil supply, we would have no fuel, and civil riots would break out in the UK and Europe within a week. When there is a fuel scare, you see people queuing up, and they do not like that.

We are not self-sufficient in food production. The situation is becoming serious, and the trend will continue. The Government have no interest in supporting us. Many years ago, Northern Ireland had the feed price allowance, which worked well. Approximately half our shipping costs were reimbursed, but now costs have soared, and there is no help, nor hint of it, available. In fact, the Government are abolishing the latest processing marketing grant.

With regard to your point on education, there is no difference. Some foreign workers are better educated, because they are the more ambitious people who have got off their backsides. They are similar to the Irish people who went across the world to establish themselves and make money, and then returned to Ireland. These people have got off their back ends and gone out into the world. Moy Park has foreign graduates working on the production line. The foreign workers will always be first to put up their hands if we want staff to work overtime. I should not call them "foreign workers" — workers from other EU member states.

Moy Park has been running private education programmes. We have in-house teachers who work on a one-to-one or two-to-one ratio. We have two full-time teachers to help the Portuguese workers to integrate with the local community, whether it is with policing, housing or trying to find a bank that will take them on. Those teachers do nothing else but that. We do it for local workers as well, and it is a major challenge. Over 20% of foreign workers that we employ have become full-time residents, and they are on our books full time rather than being employed through agencies. That will be a growing trend, and it has helped the local economy around Dungannon, as Ms Gildernew and Lord Morrow will know.

Mr Weir: First, with regard to fiscal incentives, you mentioned concerns about grants being cut, but you made no reference to the rate of corporation tax. What is your view on that?

Secondly, you gave an example of the effect of red tape. Are there any further examples of where you feel that Government red tape ensures that Northern Ireland does not have a competitive advantage?

Mr Reid: Welfare is another example. People do not like talking about the subject, but new proposals in Europe would bring stocking densities down to as low as 30 kilograms per square metre. Who will inspect breast fillet meat from Thailand, Brazil or the United States at the point of entry? Who will ensure that that meat has been produced under the same environmental standards as in Northern Ireland? We have to collect the dust from the roofs of chicken sheds, because it might kill — and I have seen no evidence of this — a little flower in a bog a mile away.

Do members believe that those standards exist in Brazil? I can tell you that they do not, because I spend about four weeks a year in Brazil. It will cost £40 million in the UK to bring that one standard up to a new dream of bureaucrats to be better and holier than anyone else. Yet at the same time they allow the import of a product that will not be labelled, because a fillet is a fillet and a ready meal is a ready meal. They will not have been produced to x, y, or z environmental standards in Brazil or Thailand.

If we were making enough money, corporation tax would be a major issue. Currently we are not, but we need to be competitive. When considering a reduction in the rate of corporation tax, we have to think of the outside investor and remember the American shareholder. The four of us still run the company, with no American management yet. However, I will be 64 years of age on my next birthday, so I assume that that may soon change.

We must show our shareholders an advantage to investing in Northern Ireland. What is the advantage? We have been able to sell the good old Irish charm, green fields, and this, that and the other, but sooner or later our time will run out. I am thinking of the young people about whom Ms Ritchie was speaking, who will come into the industry in 10 years' time. Will shareholders be happy to invest in Northern Ireland then? Unless the structures are in place today to prove to them that Northern Ireland is the place to invest, they will not do it. A reduction in the rate of corporation tax is one tool, but we must also be profitable.

Ms Gildernew: I welcome the Chairman to his first meeting. My apologies for being late.

It is good to see you again, Eric. I am acutely aware of the impact that Moy Park has had in Dungannon. I have been concerned about jobs further west. In meetings of this subgroup, I have consciously tried to tease out the implications for employment and the standard of living west of the Bann, particularly in Fermanagh, which is not as well serviced with jobs as Dungannon and other parts.

Eric, you and I first met when we spoke about manufacturing rates. Do you consider the capping of rates to be a fiscal incentive? Should this subgroup recommend to the British Exchequer that that would make us more competitive, taking into account the high cost of fuel and all the other disadvantages?

11.00 am

Mr Reid: There is no alternative but to support that. Almost £1 million comes straight off Moy Park's bottom line, and last year our net profit was zero. So you can see what a difference £1 million makes.

Our turnover is more than £700 million. We must get a return, and that is only one element of success. If industry does not secure returns, it will walk out of this Province, and that has already started to happen. We are considering a 10-year programme. Anyone who invests must consider the long term. Capital programmes are not written for 12 months or two or three years. There must be a long-term commitment to invest in Northern Ireland, either by a family, a shareholder or the public. Would a car industry invest in Fermanagh? Why would a big industrial food factory invest in Fermanagh when the raw material has to be brought in and the finished product has to be sent out? It is the same story.

Small plants may survive in Northern Ireland to supply the butchers and the smaller shops and outlets if they are nimble, fit, have good education and good R&D, and do not have excess costs. However, small plants will still have higher energy and raw material costs. They need support, and a capping in rates would be a good help. Sometimes factories need a lot of space to cope with all the regulations, and it is unfair to judge companies on the size of a factory. Rates should be levied on those who can afford to pay, and it should be the same for industry. A company may not be making much money, but what is the alternative if it moves out of Fermanagh?

We must find some other mechanism. A company that is not making much money would be completely blown out if it were presented with a rates bill for £100,000 or £200,000. It is essential for rates to be capped at today's level — either 25% or 40% — and they should be competitive with industry across the border. I hope that that also answers Mr Weir's question.

Dr Birnie: Thank you for coming. You are very strong on the need to retain grants and selective financial assistance (SFA). Can I put to you the often-made objection that SFA rates in Northern Ireland are much higher than in most other areas in western Europe, which has led to a high degree of cushioning? I have a related question, which is similar to one that Peter Weir asked earlier. If you had the choice between keeping SFA — and there is some debate about whether we can keep it under European rules — or getting the headline corporation tax rate down, which would you go for?

Mr Reid: We have to invest for the future. We need capital support, and any assistance we can get to invest in new capital to get ourselves into the global market, become more competitive and drive out inefficiency.

Tyson Foods located in Dungannon, and it, along with the John Thompson and Sons Ltd feed mill, are supported by the Government. However, we had to come up with the ideas to bring in the technology. John Thompson and Sons Ltd is ahead of the field — its programme was started six or seven years ago. Companies from China, Australia, South America and from all round the world have come to see the efficiencies of the Thompson feed mill plant, including Tyson Foods.

Dr McDonnell: I have a few scattered questions, which are more supplementary than mainstream. Mr Reid, you mentioned that you have a USA shareholding. How much of your company is US owned?

Mr Reid: One hundred per cent.

Dr McDonnell: You referred to the transporting of chicken. It may be difficult to answer this question in the light of your global perspective, but how many of your chickens are sourced locally?

Mr Reid: For our Dungannon plant, which is the only primary plant we have in Northern Ireland, 100% of our chickens are grown by 350 Northern Ireland farmers, and that is from grandparents, parents and broilers. No other company in Europe has a primary processing operation and three generations of stock. In answer to Dr Birnie's point, it is that which makes us different.

Dr McDonnell: When you referred to transport costs, what are you bringing in?

Mr Reid: I was referring to raw materials. We use 7,000 tonnes of feed every week to feed those chickens, which is brought into and manufactured by the John Thompson and Sons Ltd feed mill. One company distributes that feed to all the farms.

Dr McDonnell: Are you connected with Thompsons?

Mr Reid: No. We have a partnership with Thompsons, although it is not a financial partnership. We take over 60% of its volume. There used to be five feed companies, but now there is one. James Clow and Co Ltd of Belfast no longer exists because of what we have done; Dalgety Feed Ltd of Belfast and Scott's Feeds Ltd of Omagh no longer exist. Wilson's Feeds Ltd of Belfast no longer exists, although it still has a plant outside Dungannon. That is the effect of rationalisation.

The Thompson feed mill now processes more feed than all those firms put together. It has been a major success. It has lower costs as well as the added advantage of having biosecure food or — in simple language — salmonella-free food. That firm leads the world. In the past week or two, the EU has brought in legislation to drive down salmonella levels across Europe. In Portugal, salmonella levels are as high as 60%, but Northern Ireland leads the world in low levels of salmonella. That was achieved by a partnership between Thompsons and Moy Park. We do not buy feed at arm's length; we have an open-book system, where we buy the raw materials and Thompsons are paid a margin for processing in the largest mill in the UK. Moy Park gets the advantage of scale; Thompsons gets the advantage of 52 weeks' volume from us.

Dr McDonnell: Where does your company buy feed?

Mr Reid: From Thompsons.

Dr McDonnell: From where does it originate?

Mr Reid: Brazil produces the soya bean. The wheat comes mainly from England, although it can come from eastern or southern Europe. It depends on where it is most economical to buy.

Dr McDonnell: Do you then distribute the feed to farmers?

Mr Reid: Yes. In the Moy Park operation, farmers' incomes are not generated by the marketplace, unlike what happens with beef, sheep, pigs or any other commodity. Moy Park carries the marketplace, and farmers are paid on the efficiency with which they convert feed into eggs or saleable meat; that goes back to Dr Birnie's question. The more eggs that are produced with chicks in them, or the more meat that is produced using the least amount of feed, the more income that farmers will generate.

Dr McDonnell: You say that energy is 20% more expensive in Northern Ireland than in Great Britain. What energy are you referring to?

Mr Reid: I am referring to electricity, but propane gas is much worse. Our operations in England use natural gas, which is only reaching Northern Ireland now. The gap in price is much wider with electricity. This year in England — just so that we know that there are some good things about Northern Ireland — prices have moved up by about 40% to 60%. In Northern Ireland, we are not too badly off with a price rise of approximately 20%. However, there is still a 20% gap between energy prices in Northern Ireland and England, so I expect prices to continue to rise in Northern Ireland.

Dr McDonnell: I admire you, and I am enthused by your passion — that is the only word that I can use to describe this morning's presentation.

How do we pull all this together? How do we bring industry and farming together in a workable way? From where does the initiative come? From what you say, Government are not capable of bringing these elements together. Government are simply capable of sitting in the background. We have found this situation in many industries. From sitting around the table, I know that many members would be glad to put in their tuppence worth and support you, albeit it would not be front-end support. I understand that the Ulster Farmers' Union is able to support you, but between that union, the industry and whatever, how do we pull this together?

Despite the fact that there are not many farmers in my constituency of South Belfast, I agree with all that you have said, Mr Reid. The agriculture industry must be the bedrock of the economy in Northern Ireland. That sector may not be high-flying or high-tech, but it must be the bedrock of the economy. Where do we start? Answer in 30 seconds, please.

Mr Reid: You mentioned small industries in Belfast, and the agricultural sectors are no different. In order to survive, they must either be extremely nimble or be able to service the retail trade or whoever their customers are. Those customers will go anywhere in the world to source their products; that is the strategy of today's leading retailers.

There is no way that I would say to the subgroup today: "Here is the blueprint." It is not as simple as that. I am a great believer in "small boxes", which is what we call the profit centres in each of the agricultural industry sectors. We in the poultry sector can put forward proposals to the subgroup. Similarly, the beef industry, working together as an integrated business, can put forward proposals, as is the case across the border. The milk sector can do likewise. There will be pain and sorrow, but there will also be success for the winners. This subgroup is part of Northern Ireland plc; it can grease the wheels for us, and it must be part of any decision-making. Small boxes must work together to support those who members, and the sector, believe will be the winners. Some people in the industry will not want to face the heat of the fire and will gladly get out if they can join an out-goers' scheme. Such schemes may be partly funded by the industry, as will be the case in the South. The key is to have small boxes working together.

I am not sure whether that was 32 seconds or longer.

Mr Neeson: I am astounded by the impact that poultry markets in countries such as Brazil have on the UK and European poultry market. I was well aware of the problem with the red meat sector, but not with poultry.

First, should imports from countries such as Thailand and Brazil be subject to Government controls? Secondly, to what extent is the so-called supermarket revolution in the UK — which has now reached Northern Ireland — driving the poultry market?

Mr Reid: The first matter is quite simply down to the World Trade Organization (WTO). None of us can change that; the WTO wants to encourage Third World development, and we will have to play our part in that. However, I want honest labelling. I do not want the consumer to be fooled, which is what is happening at the moment. People from outside our industry are becoming involved and are making big bucks out of fooling the consumer. That is wrong, so we must have honest labelling.

Mr Neeson: Should the supermarkets tackle that issue?

Mr Reid: No, because supermarkets are out to compete with other supermarkets, so they will sell products that will make them competitive. Supermarkets will not tackle that issue. Many people in the industry — including our friends from the Ulster Farmers' Union, who are sitting behind me — have tried to raise this issue with the Government, and at a European level, but it has been pooh-poohed on every occasion. The Governments of Europe want cheap food, so they will support the import of goods from China or Brazil or wherever to keep the voters happy. The industry must find tools or mechanisms to ensure that we can compete globally, but with honest labelling. All investment should be for the future in order to ensure that we can face that forthcoming challenge.

Lord Morrow: Mr Reid, you are very welcome. I have heard some of your remarks before, when my colleague Arlene Foster and I met you on a previous occasion. I know that other political parties have also met you to discuss these issues.

I would like you to clarify a few points. I know that the debate on the freshness of poultry has exercised you greatly, not just today, but for some considerable time. You may already have answered some of my questions, but I may have missed the answer, so I apologise if you have to repeat yourself.

First, what is your definition of “freshness”? Does it mean poultry that has been produced today to be on the shelf tomorrow and consumed on that day or the next?

Secondly, Moy Park is the backbone of the local economy in south Tyrone. There is no dispute about that; it is a valued and valuable asset in south Tyrone. You said that Moy Park employs around 4,500 people in Northern Ireland, and 9,000 people globally. How many of those 4,500 employees come from the indigenous population?

Thirdly, I would like you to confirm or deny a rumour that I heard some time ago. The rumour was that Moy Park had said that it could produce chickens much more cheaply in France than it could in Northern Ireland. I would like you to address that important issue.

11.15 am

You said that John Thompson & Sons Ltd's feed mill is state of the art and that, because of efficiency and effectiveness at its plant, other plants have ceased to exist. Is the fact that Thompson & Sons Ltd is now the main — and probably the only — player a good thing, given that we wish to build a thriving economy?

You also spoke about young people coming to work for Moy Park in 10 years' time. That was encouraging to hear, because it tells me that you see a future here and that you will be around for at least 10 or 15 years.

Mr Reid: The company might be.

Lord Morrow: You said that you were 64, but you do not look it.

It is fair to say that your company is profitable. It is not in financial difficulty, so that is good news for Northern Ireland.

I wish to return to the argument about freshness. You said that all 25 EU member states are fighting on that issue. Are they fighting the same corner, however, because if, as I think you said, Brazil and Portugal do not allow imports —

Mr Reid: Brazil, Thailand and the United States do not allow imports. Portugal is in the same boat as the rest of us.

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): Lord Morrow, could we leave it there?

Lord Morrow: I wish to ask a final question, Mr Chairman. If the whole of Europe takes the same standpoint, why are we not achieving a different result?

Mr Reid: At present, we think that the definition of “freshness” should be up to 15 days from the date of slaughter. A European delegation from the poultry sector went to Europe to fight for that, but our case was thrown out. As a result, the European Commission assumed responsibility for the product being safe for up to 14 days from date of slaughter. The Commission beat us by being very clever.

Member states' Governments' veterinary divisions' interpretation of what constitutes “fresh” is as follows: if, when an animal is brought to slaughter, it is fit for slaughter, it is considered to be fresh. After that, it is irrelevant whether the processor freezes it, seals it in atmospheric packaging or sells it as chilled. Europe's definition — that includes the UK — of “freshness” is “fit for slaughter”. What the processor and the consumer do with the poultry afterwards is irrelevant.

That issue is still being fought in every member state. The Commission has invited us back, so we shall meet with it in the next couple of months. That meeting is further to those we are holding with the Food Standards Agency (FSA) and the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (DEFRA). We want “date of slaughter” put on packaging now. We know that it will be a challenge to convince the consumer to buy products marked “date of slaughter”. If the poultry is 10 days old, will the consumer go to the chill cabinet, look at the dates and — a bit like when buying milk in a supermarket — opt for the fresh poultry, leaving the older poultry on the shelf? Therefore a major education programme must be launched if we are to use “date of slaughter” on packaging.

I hope that that answers your question. That is the thinking of the poultry industry across Europe at present. However, each member state must ratify any change, and then together we shall go to Brussels to fight our case.

Ten days or 14 days is no longer acceptable, because that puts responsibility on to the Commission. That could create a serious financial position because a processor could, through being shoddy, put dangerous products on the shelf. That is a clever move.

Some 1,450 people work in our Dungannon plant, of whom 700, or about 50%, are foreign workers. Of our Craigavon workforce of 1,300, some 50% are foreign workers. Remember that seven or eight years ago Dungannon’s unemployment was running at about 15%. I do not know what the figure is today, but I imagine that it is less than 4% or 5%.

Lord Morrow: It is about 2%.

Mr Reid: We could not survive without the foreign workers; they have been a major success and have helped the economies of both those towns.

Lord Morrow: Can Eric comment on chicken production in France?

Mr Reid: We have no primary agriproduction in France. The French operations concern imported products, mainly of meat from here in Ireland or Brazil. We make no money from that, because Brussels removed the salted meat subsidy; however, Brussels lost a subsequent legal case, so the subsidy will be restored and we will, we hope, start to make to money from that again.

However, our operations in France depend totally on tariffs. We fought Brazil and lost the battle. Therefore, its meat will be coming back into Europe again with a 10% tariff instead of a 90% tariff, which is unbelievable. However, that is the real world and there is nothing that we can do to stop it. We in Europe are fighting to make sure that there is a limit on the amount of meat that is imported. In other words, we want a quota to be imposed on the amount of meat that is imported into Europe.

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): How much does your company invest in research and development?

Mr Reid: I do not have the figure in my head, but I imagine that we invest about £2 million to £3 million a year at least. Our centre of excellence in Craigavon does nothing but research and development. More than 70 people work there, all of whom are graduates, not people who leave school at 15 or 16. We have a similar centre in England. We employ people with every level of education. I talked about the academy earlier.

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): Thank you, Mr Reid, for a very interesting, stimulating and — if I may borrow Dr McDonnell’s word — passionate presentation. You have provoked a great deal of interest around the table.

Mr Reid: Thank you for listening to me. If I can be of help to any party, please let me know.

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): I welcome Mr Clarke Black, chief executive of the Ulster Farmers’ Union; and Mr Kenneth Sharkey, president of the Ulster Farmers’ Union. Thank you for your attendance, gentlemen, and for your written submission. We have 45 minutes. We ask you to make a short presentation of about 10 minutes; then members will ask you questions.

Mr Clarke Black (Ulster Farmers’ Union): Thank you, Mr Chairman, for the opportunity to present evidence from an agricultural perspective to the subgroup. I wish to introduce Kenneth Sharkey, who is president of the Ulster Farmers’ Union (UFU). I am its chief executive.

I understand that members have copies of our presentation. I shall make some comments by way of introduction and to set the UFU’s thoughts in context before I deal with the three specific issues in the subgroup’s terms of reference.

The importance of the agriculture and agrifood sector to the Northern Ireland economy has been seriously underestimated for many years, yet, by most of the key measures, this is an industry that, in spite of all the difficulties that it has faced, has survived in remarkable shape. The output from direct agriculture is more than £1 billion, and from the agrifood sector it is £2.3 billion. Although those are significant figures in their own right, the value-added element is more important. Agriculture and agrifood is one of the primary industries. Starting from the basics of life, there is a product. That product has a value, which, in turn, creates wealth.

I know that many farmers would say that farming is one of the quickest and surest ways to destroy wealth. That may be true for some individuals, but the industry’s contribution to the overall economy should not be devalued.

Employment is another way by which to measure the importance of the agriculture sector. It is the largest private-sector employer and the largest manufacturing employer. It employs 80,000 people. Some jobs are part-time, but when the figures are examined, there are between 57,000 and 60,000 full-time equivalents. Direct farming accounts for 4.1% of the workforce, the processing sector for 2.53%, the supply sector for 0.53%, and the service sector for between 0.25% and 0.5%. Therefore, more than 7.5% of total employment in Northern Ireland is directly or indirectly related to the agriculture and agri-food sector. A useful comparator is the unemployed total, which is 36,000. That gives an idea of the size of the industry.

I shall attempt to debunk the myth that the agriculture and the agri-food sector is a sunset industry — members may have already heard something similar from the Moy Park delegation. It is difficult to identify from where that label came. I suspect that it came from a comparison that was made between the industry and the sunrise industries, which were the high-tech industries of the late 1980s, the 1990s and the early part of this century. That label has stuck, and there is absolutely no doubt that Governments of developed and — as they see it — sophisticated economies continue to ignore the contribution that the agriculture sector makes to the overall economy. The UK Government in particular continues to ignore the agriculture sector's contribution. Agriculture is the one industry in which Northern Ireland has a natural competitive advantage. We do not have that advantage when it comes to, for example, producing television sets or some of the other goods that inward investment companies manufacture.

The security of our food supply has been brought sharply into focus since we were reminded last autumn of the extent of the potential difficulties of relying on an energy supply from parts of the world over which we had little influence and certainly no control.

The industry has had to be flexible and innovative, not only to survive, but to expand in difficult trading conditions. There are sectors in the industry — including Moy Park Ltd, from which members heard earlier — that have dealt with the challenges and have flourished in spite of the difficulties. It is all about being flexible and innovative.

Farmers own and manage more than 76% of the total land area in Northern Ireland, and the management of the natural environment would not be possible without an industry that is alive and vital.

We believe that the proactive use of land offers the most potential for the future. Whether it will be growing oil seeds for biofuel, growing wood for heat, or using land as a filter for, say, the bioremediation of society's waste, we think that those proactive uses of land can be developed for the future.

Then there is the industry's role as a core element in the sustainability of rural communities. The industry is not only the key to the economic sustainability of those communities; it also provides the social cohesion that we believe has been a vital, sustaining and stabilising factor in Northern Ireland society over the past 30 or more years.

Far from being a sunset industry, the agriculture and food industry has the ability to contribute to Northern Ireland's economy in a variety of integrated ways that, we believe, no other single industry can.

11.30 am

I have tried to show you how important we feel the agriculture and food industry is to the economy. We believe that the overarching impediment to the development of the sector flows directly from the erroneous viewpoint that farming and food are a sunset industry. To be more specific, we have looked at the major impediments in three main areas. The first one is the lack of profitability across the sector. Profits have not been sufficient to enable the industry to invest and restructure. As a result, we have a primary sector in which the average age of farmers is 56 or 57 years. We have a processing sector that is fragmented in many cases and suffering from acute underinvestment.

I accept that some of those problems have been of our own making. Nevertheless, the stark imbalances in the food supply chain have been and continue to be one of the main contributors to the lack of profitability and, therefore, the lack of investment across the sector. For example, I was struck by two headlines that appeared side by side in my local newspaper in Coleraine a couple of months ago. One concerned a story about one of the four big retailers expanding, opening a new store and creating 150 jobs. The other concerned a story about the local chicken-processing factory closing down with the loss of 320 jobs. Those are the type of stark imbalances that we have in the supply chain.

The sunset mentality has been more evident within Government. The lack of vision across Government Departments has resulted in very limited and ineffective support for the industry. Furthermore, for an industry which is so influenced by politics in Europe — it is largely controlled by Europe — the additional layer of representational bureaucracy that we have through London and DEFRA has meant that the distinctive needs of the Northern Ireland industry are often represented less effectively. There are broader UK agendas, and the outcome of the recent negotiations on the level of EU rural development funding is just one example of that.

Finally, food production is one of the most heavily regulated industries, and I am thinking of impediments. For example, farmers are faced with having to register for an exemption for a licence to permit them to collect and burn hedge trimmings. When we have got to that level of overzealous interpretation and imposition of regulations by more than one Department, innovation is severely stifled, and the potential for developing any form of competitive advantage is lost.

The subgroup asked us to comment on fiscal incentives aimed at promoting investment. Our focus is naturally on indigenous investment. There is no reason why properly targeted, strategic, inward investment in processing facilities, which would utilise primary farm production, could not make a significant contribution to the wider Northern Ireland economy.

One good example is Diageo in Glengormley, where local cream is used in the production of Baileys liqueur, which is sold worldwide. Using local ingredients in industrial production is something that could be done to promote indigenous investment.

It is perhaps a little early in the morning to speak about alcohol.

Ms Gildernew: Not for David, by the looks of things.

Mr McNarry: Are potatoes not used to make poteen? [Laughter.]

Mr Black: The subgroup should certainly consider the impact that targeted investment support for the agribusiness sector could deliver for the wider Northern Ireland economy.

Restructuring the processing sector would deliver undoubted benefits in cost savings, marketing and increased competitiveness. Indeed, our nearest neighbours have been convinced of the benefits of such an approach, with the recent announcement of significant funding support for that purpose.

Investment in restructuring in the primary sector, particularly targeted at enabling farmers at the top end of the age scale to exit the industry, would also provide opportunities for the creation of economies of scale, along with much higher levels of innovation and flexibility and a much-improved ability to compete globally.

Previous consideration of that approach has always fallen at the hurdles of finding money and equitable distribution issues. However, there are parallels in other parts of society where a peace dividend, for want of a better term, has been used to restructure and adapt to changed circumstances. That should be considered for the agriculture industry. Again, our neighbours in the Republic of Ireland have been reasonably successful in adopting that approach.

Focusing support on the agriculture and agrifood sector would undoubtedly significantly contribute to economic regeneration, for all the reasons that we have outlined. However, the subgroup also correctly asked us to visualise how that would be delivered. First, there needs to be a real sea change in the strategic vision for the food production sector, backed by targeted support of the type that I have already mentioned for the food processing and primary production sectors. That is vital to produce a sea change in attitude.

What else do we actually mean by “strategic” and “targeted”? The Food Strategy Implementation Partnership (FSIP) was tasked with looking into the future to envisage what type of industry we could expect to have in 2020, for example. In doing that, we considered the difficulties of dealing in commodity markets. The disadvantage of being a small market is never really being able to compete in real terms on a global scale. However, that disadvantage is very well offset by the real advantage of being very nimble and responsive to, and capable of, change. Our future will depend on our capacity to change.

The FSIP’s foresight work identified several areas where the Northern Ireland agrifood sector could realistically hope to achieve excellence in global terms. It has also concluded that, in order to achieve global excellence, more resources need to be committed towards research and development.

To illustrate our examples, we have compared Northern Ireland to Finland. Finland was chosen as a comparator primarily because of its size and scale, and because, despite its geographic peripherality, it is the second-best performing economy in the EU. The most obvious differentiator between Finland and Northern Ireland is the level of R&D spend from both Government and industry. Northern Ireland’s R&D spend is approximately one third of that of Finland.

Being located on an island — albeit an island with two different political regimes — has significant potential benefits for animal and plant health, as well as the related areas of animal and plant breeding and genetics.

The Ulster Farmers’ Union believes that there is a great deal of potential for Northern Ireland to become a world-class centre of excellence for animal and plant breeding and genetics.

The Ulster Farmers’ Union believes that, as a small region, Northern Ireland is uniquely positioned to develop solutions for big issues such as renewable energy and the management of waste. Some work is being done on that, but the key to exploiting that potential would be to take a much bolder approach to testing and developing alternative technologies, marketing them aggressively and dealing with the associated risks.

Given the subgroup’s time constraints, it is difficult to cover all the relevant issues in detail. However, the Ulster Farmers’ Union believes passionately that it has presented the subgroup with the basis of a blueprint on which agriculture and the agrifood industry could build their already significant contributions to the Northern Ireland economy in a way that would be sustainable and advantageous to those in the industry and to the wider Northern Ireland economy.

We are happy to elaborate on the issues that are raised either during questions or at a later date. It is up to the subgroup.

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): Thank you very much, Mr Black. I assume that Mr Sharkey will want to take part in the question-and-answer session.

Mr Kenneth Sharkey (Ulster Farmers' Union): Yes.

Mr McNarry: For some years now, I have noticed changes in my constituency, which is the beautiful area of Strangford. Those changes include reduced circulation of money because farmers are not spending as much, and there have been job losses because of that. I have also noticed an increase in the number of people who, when I first got to know them, worked as farmers and who now need to take second jobs. Of course, they still have to work on their farms, and the hours that they put in seem to be horrendous.

Much has been made of farmers diversifying their businesses. In my constituency, diversification means keeping a family afloat and bringing in a wage to supplement the money made by the farm. That is not diversification in the true sense, and it could be argued that diversification is talked up a great deal. Have enough studies been done on diversification? Is it a good thing or a bad thing? Would true diversification make farmers redundant by taking them out of farming?

Are we winning or losing the battle to sustain the interest of young people in farming? Are young people from non-farming families coming into farming?

Finally, we are seeing — I will not be political about this; I will forget the adjectives — rural school closures, particularly primary schools. How does that affect the farming community? Do those closures present the farming community with difficulties?

Mr Sharkey: I will answer the questions on young people and rural schools; Clarke will take the questions on diversification.

I feel strongly that young people need to be attracted to the farming industry to lead it and drive it forward. Those young people will work in our industry when they receive rewards that are equal to those of the other jobs or types of work that they can do. That attraction has to exist. Young people will expect an average week's wage if they are to stay and work on the farm. As Mr Black says, the lack of profitability has had a crippling effect on our industry.

11.45 am

When young people are not building houses and living in the countryside, pupil numbers at rural schools go down, and that causes problems. The key point is to ask how we can get back to a profitable farming industry. If we did that, diversification would be less important. You are right to ask whether diversification is good or bad. In some cases it is a lifeline to have someone in the farming family bringing in some income from another project to try to sustain the family business. Profitability — and I think that Moy Park Ltd would tell you the same thing — comes down to the distribution of the food chain. I do not know how we can deal with that difficulty, but the lack of profitability is the real problem that prevents our industry from growing and moving forward.

Mr Black: I have nothing much to add, other than to say that Mr McNarry's observations about money not being recycled through the community are true. I referred earlier to how the agriculture sector is completely integrated into the economy, and the money circulates round the economy. That happens across Northern Ireland.

Diversification comes down to the lack of profitability. It is about people trying to remain in rural communities in order to keep them alive and working. Those people see a way to do that other than their traditional route.

Mr Neeson: Over the years, Europe has had a major impact on the agriculture industry. The foot-and-mouth-disease crisis happened during our short period of devolution, so, bearing that in mind, were there more benefits to the industry then?

The Enterprise, Trade and Investment Committee carried out a major inquiry on energy. The Secretary of State recently announced that £60 million will be set aside for the development of renewables. What will the Ulster Farmers' Union do to encourage the farming community to become involved in the area of renewables? Will it encourage the farming community along the lines of John Gilliland's work on the promotion of renewable energy?

Mr Sharkey: I will deal with the first question. There is no doubt that the agriculture sector benefited from a local Administration. Look at our counterparts in Wales and Scotland: the Administrations there have been hugely beneficial to the local agriculture sectors. Look at our friends in the South of Ireland: they have a direct input into local government. That is very meaningful. We thoroughly appreciated the work that the previous Executive did on agriculture; all the political parties can support agriculture because it is an industry that is found across the Six Counties. In every townland, someone works in the agriculture industry. We do not doubt that a local Administration would be of significant value to us, and we would appreciate that.

Mr Black: We have already highlighted the raft of issues that are connected to renewable energy as a potential solution to many of our problems. Agriculture can deliver that solution. You mentioned John Gilliland, our former president, and the work that he is doing in a particular area. He works on the production of wood for heat, but he also works on dealing with waste. He has done some remarkable work on how to use sewage sludge on crops for harvesting. Instead of using fossil fuels as an energy source and having to landfill our waste, you suddenly start looking for the potential for an integrated approach that will deal with energy. That sort of thing should be happening.

You also mentioned the Secretary of State's announcement on money being set aside for the development of renewables. We welcome it, but it was largely conceptual and is now stuck between various Departments. The money has not yet been delivered. That goes back to what I said about the need for us to be bolder about taking risks, developing them and then going out and servicing them.

An Ulster Farmers' Union member was in the United States in the past couple of months, and he talked to representatives from large municipal authorities about how they were dealing with their waste. They said that it seemed that Northern Ireland was 10 years ahead of the United States. It is a sin that Northern Ireland is in such a positive situation but is not able to benefit because we are struggling with bureaucracy and everything that goes with it. It certainly does not help our economy.

Mr Sharkey: The Ulster Farmers' Union is passionate about renewable energy, and farmers are looking forward to the opportunity to grow energy crops, and so forth. However, we do not want to be in the same position in which we have found ourselves with food production over the years. If farmers grow energy crops, we must ensure that we add value at farm level and are not merely producing a commodity on which multinationals will get rich quick. We would like to see some mechanism whereby we add value at farm level, and farmers get a bigger share of the energy market.

Ms Gildernew: That is one of the points that I wanted to make. We have seen how heavily regulated the agriculture industry has been and how the influence of Europe is not always good. When that is combined with the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs's lack of common sense and the different level of importance of the agriculture economy, in GDP terms, in the Twenty-six Counties as compared to England, it hugely disadvantages our farmers. I agree with David McNarry: when farmers are doing well, everyone is doing well. The farming community is important to the rural economy, which is why I suggested that we needed witnesses at the subgroup to give us the farming or rural perspective. Foreign direct investment does not impinge particularly on what we do in the rural communities or on the sustainability of the rural economy.

I see R&D and alternative energy as ways in which we could enable farming to move up a gear in the value that is added. Those areas might benefit from a peace dividend: helping farmers to produce the right crop or the right product at the right price. Farming needs to be profitable, and whatever we come up with on this subgroup needs to be worthwhile.

How does the price of milk at the farm gate and the price that we pay in the supermarket impact on rural wealth and on the sustainability of the economy? What are your views on modulation, and how will further modulation affect the rural community?

If Fermanagh, Tyrone, south Derry and rural parts of the island do not have an agri-economy, they will have no economy.

In his presentation last week, John Simpson mentioned the work of the Ulster Farmers' Union when the beef ban was lifted and the fact that its representatives were in Brussels promoting red meat on the day that the ban was lifted. Is the quality of Irish beef our last major market advantage?

You both used the word "passionate". We have no doubt that you are equally as passionate as Eric Reid; you do not have to convince us.

Mr Sharkey: Our members are totally opposed to modulation. We see it as a mechanism for taking money from one sector and giving it to another, or for reducing a single farm payment to put it into a pot of money and creating a great deal of administration to think of ways of getting that money back to rural areas. Rural development is important, but, unfortunately, the UK has received a poor share of rural development money from Europe. It is not the Northern Ireland farmers' fault.

It is wrong to take some of our single farm payments to create more rural development money, because that is not what was meant to happen. Other member states can have a good pool of rural development money as well as a single farm payment. That is our standpoint. The Ulster Farmers' Union is opposed to additional modulation to fund rural development, not because we are opposed to rural development, but because we believe that extra money should go into the pot.

We were pleased to be in Europe when the beef ban was lifted. The ban had been a millstone around our necks. We are glad to have freedom, but we knew that things would not change overnight. Some product goes to Europe, and we are glad of that. There is a good relationship between the processing sector and UK supermarkets. At times, we question whether there is a real desire to bypass UK supermarkets and sell meat to Europe. Unfortunately, we are considering the export of live animals from Northern Ireland to member states, because UK supermarkets are not getting the message that either the price of meat must rise or we must receive a greater share. The current situation is unsustainable: we cannot continue to produce red meat and receive such meagre returns from UK multiples. Either we increase prices or we rear the raw material in Ireland and export it to Italy or Spain where the meat will fetch a higher price.

Ms Gildernew: That does not add value to the product here.

Mr Sharkey: We are opposed to it; it is the last resort.

Mr Black: It all comes back to profitability.

Michelle asked about milk prices. At our last auction, which sells milk for three-month periods, the price was down by between 11% and 12% from this time last year, which leads to a drop in dairy farmers' income. They face increased energy costs from contracting for silage, and they are also faced with a bill to comply with the Nitrates Directive and the Water Framework Directive. That will cost the industry between £150 million and £200 million. You cannot squeeze both ends without consequences.

The total amount of single farm support from Brussels is approximately £225 million, compared to a total Government spend in Northern Ireland of just under £9 billion, so about 3% of support goes to agriculture, and that helps 7% to 8% of the population. Northern Ireland figures are similar to those across Europe. It is money well spent. The Ulster Farmers' Union is passionately opposed to modulation, because it is proposed that part of the £225 million be siphoned off into other schemes.

12.00 noon

However, the total income from farming last year in Northern Ireland was £175 million. That indicates the level of profitability in the industry. That is why the investment and innovation is not coming through. That is the crucial impediment that must be addressed.

Did I cover everything?

Ms Gildernew: I wanted to ask about the possibility of a peace dividend for research and development on renewable energy.

Mr Black: That is vital. The Ulster Farmers' Union thought that the money announced by the Secretary of State would kick-start that. We are concerned that the money has not yet filtered out onto the ground, because there is a pent-up desire to get on and do things, but the system seems to stifle that.

Ms Ritchie: Gentlemen, you are most welcome.

You talked about the continuum that is required in the farming industry. Until the last couple of years, there had been considerable discussion about a farm retirement scheme, and you probably referred to that as part of restructuring. What recent discussions have taken place with the Government about such a scheme, and what was the outcome? Perhaps I can assume that the Government are not too keen on the idea. What is impeding the Government's introduction of such a scheme?

What work on animal and plant health must both Governments do on a North/South basis in order to facilitate further study on animal and plant health in the research and development institutes? What resources must be invested to address that on an all-island basis?

Mr Black: There have been no recent discussions on any form of retirement scheme or exit strategy for people in the farming industry. The industry has always needed some form of restructuring, and if there were sufficient profitability in the industry, it would happen naturally. Given the lack of profitability, it is much more acceptable for those people to stay in the industry and survive for another 10 or 15 years, or for whatever period of time they have left on this fair land. That stifles the change process.

There are parallels in the peace dividend; we have seen how other parts of society have been restructured, and perhaps similar principles could be used in farming. Should that be the case, and if we take the view that restructuring is a core and integral part of progressing the farming industry, it would be beneficial.

Ms Ritchie: I have a short supplementary question. Should that not be part of the whole farming industry rather than part of a peace dividend?

Mr Black: I would like to see that happen. However, when restructuring has been mentioned, we have always run up against the problem of having no means of achieving it, and the Department's response has always been that it will happen anyway. People will retire at some stage, so why should taxpayers' money be used to restructure an industry that will be restructured over time. It is almost as though a constant weight is bearing down on an industry that is not ready to take up some of the new things that are happening.

I am not really prepared to discuss the political difficulties that surround animal and plant health. However, to be pragmatic, this island has one of the best protection systems — it is surrounded by x miles of water. That allows tighter control over disease, which means that much better animal and plant health regimes could be established. As a result, quality food and quality livestock and plants could be sold throughout the world. Many countries would be keen to do that, but we really need to make it better than it is now.

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): We are running behind time. I would like the questions to be briefer and more to the point, and I remind members of our terms of reference: the major impediments to the development of the economy, fiscal incentives and the economic package or peace dividend.

Dr McDonnell: Instead of one heavy question, I have a couple of small supplementaries or probing questions. The first question is similar to the one that I asked Eric Reid. Where does the responsibility lie? We have mentioned retirement schemes and energy from crops. The bio-diesel issue is a runner, but I need to be convinced about the effectiveness of a retirement scheme. Where does the initiative lie? Who starts these schemes, and who decides to make them work? What are the obstacles to either of those two schemes working?

Is the milk industry dead or dying? I have seen dozens of people getting out of the dairy industry in the past few years, and some of them had big businesses. If prices have dropped 12% against costs rising by 10% or 12%, is that not the death knell?

Research and development may fall in with the energy issue, but what are your views on the R&D spend? How is it that Finland has three times the R&D spend that Northern Ireland has? What do we need to do, and who is holding it up or blocking it?

Mr Black: I will deal with the question about who takes the initiative. The figures for R&D spend are difficult to come by because they are spread over different Departments and different pots; I suspect that there may be a reason for that, but we should not go there. The industry spends a fair amount. Mr Reid has already told the subgroup that he spent £2 million to £3 million.

The Ulster Farmers' Union believes that the total spend in R&D in the agriculture sector is somewhere between £15 million and £18 million, and some of that is from Government, some comes from industry and some comes from farmers. The spend in Finland is around £45 million, and that is where the comparators come from. Finland has been going down that route for eight or 10 years and has really moved it on.

If the Government do not take some form of initiative, there will be many small initiatives, as is already happening with renewable energy and biofuel plants. John Gilliland is researching wood chips — all sorts of different things are happening. However, there is no integrated approach. Some integration has been introduced into food strategy, but it is limited because of resources. It is good that the practitioners — the people on the ground — are doing it, rather than using the machinery that is already there. When that happens, there is more initiative, pragmatism and reality.

Mr Sharkey: I can assure the subgroup that milk producers are not a dying group: they are very vibrant. Recently, a milk producer in Dungannon won an award for the best breeding and production herd in the UK.

Over the years, the number of farmers milking cows has fallen, but the pool of milk has been maintained and, indeed, has increased. By and large the farmers are restructuring and taking costs out of the system. Herds are larger, which makes them more efficient.

The farming sector has done almost as much as it can — some 4,500 farmers produce about 2 billion litres of milk, which is phenomenal. The main difference between Northern Ireland and the mainland is that we have a small population. The percentage of our total milk pool that goes to liquid milk is 15%, whereas across the UK it is 50% to 60%. Many more people there drink milk every day. Therefore we have to turn our milk into many different products — we must sell milk products rather than liquid milk. The processing sector will have to be restructured to manufacture more innovative products that use large amounts of milk. We have been moving towards that, although not as quickly as we might have. On the farmers' side, there is a stable number of vibrant producers; on the processing side, there is a need to find more innovative products that use more milk and find markets for them, rather than concentrate on the liquid market. We simply do not have the population for the production of liquid milk.

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): Three members wish to ask questions: Mrs Long, Dr Birnie and Lord Morrow. I ask them to keep their questions short so that witnesses can reply.

Mrs Long: I found your presentation useful. Mr McNarry asked about the negative side of diversification, which merely takes people away from food production. From a previous career, I am interested in the waste treatment and biodiesel side of diversification. Given what you said about environmental and social impacts when people give up farming to do something completely different, could waste management and biodiesel be a more positive form of diversification? Could that complement food production rather than simply take people away from the land?

My second question is on research and development, which has already been mentioned. Northern Ireland businesses suffer from a lack of investment because the local economy has many small and medium-sized enterprises. Can research and development in farming and agribusiness in Northern Ireland be increased only by restructuring the industry, or is it simply a matter of investment?

Dr Birnie: This point is perhaps provocative, but allow me to play devil's advocate. The New Zealand model allegedly allows for much freer trade, the ending of subsidies and specialising in comparative advantage. Why should we not do that?

Lord Morrow: What is your position on rural planning as laid out in Draft Planning Policy Statement 14? Do you support its measures? Is that the way forward and does it benefit agriculture? How long will it take for the benefits of the lifting of the ban on beef exports to other EU countries to filter through to Northern Ireland farmers?

Mr Sharkey: I will work backwards, taking the beef ban and rural planning first. We thought that the advantages of the lifting of the beef ban would have filtered through the system more quickly than they have done. The UK retail market is at a low level, which presents us with a dilemma. Farmers in Italy get 50% more for carcass meat than we get, even though the retail price in the store is the same as here. That tells us that farmers' share of the food chain could be better. Unless there is a dramatic change soon, production will fall and prices will be forced up.

As for rural planning, the Ulster Farmers' Union responded to the consultation on Draft Planning Policy Statement 14, although I am not sure whether the subgroup has seen a copy of that response. Reflecting our membership, there were quite diverse opinions on that, but our conclusion was basically that in recent years planning has needed better structure and regulation. Bearing that in mind, however, we realise that to have a vibrant rural society there must be development and building in the countryside, and people must live and work there.

The countryside would look much better if the many disused houses there were replaced with new buildings. That would also give people an opportunity to build houses in country areas without using up any green land.

Another concern is that VAT can be reclaimed on a new build, but not on a renovation. That forces people to build new houses rather than simply renovating an existing one. Planning needs to be better planned and controlled than it has been, but there should not be a blanket ban on new buildings. Development and planning are necessary for the creation of a vibrant rural society, which will encourage new people, particularly young people, to settle in the countryside.

Mr Black: My apologies to Mrs Long, but I will not answer her question first — I am working up to it, though.

Dr Birnie asked about the New Zealand model; I will make two brief comments on that. First, farmers would be quite happy to do without support if they could find profitability within the industry. Ultimately, the market has to move upwards before support can be stopped. We know what it takes to produce something, and farmers would prefer to get some form of support from a European system rather than depend on a food chain that is currently dominated by four or five big retailers. That is a much safer bet; we just do not feel that we would get that support the other way around.

The second point is wider. The European model of agriculture has been based on a three-stranded approach: economic, environmental and social. We have touched on the need for sustainable rural communities, and there have been questions about skills. Rural areas are sustained by an industry that recycles funds and energy back into them. New Zealand found to its cost that much of that had disappeared for a period, although some of it is now coming back again. That is one way to preserve a European model of farming that involves a longer-term strategy rather than a short-term, market-driven strategy.

To return to the first question, we agree entirely with the point about the complementarity between alternative production and food production. Farmers are not necessarily wedded to the idea of producing beef and milk if nobody wants it. We know that there is a need for it. For some of those commodities, there is as little as just a few days' or a few weeks' supply at world level. You can afford to go down to that level because there is a production cycle that keeps producing it. We think that we can afford to drop to that level; it has never been proved otherwise.

Oilseed rape is an example of a good crop that fits very easily with wheat production in arable areas. Many of us would be uncomfortable with some of the thinking in parts of the south of England, where they are considering producing wheat to burn for energy. Our natural reaction is to feel very uncomfortable about that because of the starvation in many parts of the world. However, a complementary way of dealing with that would be to grow wheat in years one and two, then oilseed rape in year three, and then back to growing wheat for food.

I was asked about restructuring and investment. We believe that that is the way forward for research and development, but that will not happen unless it is driven forward. Plenty of people in our industry are happy to do that if they receive support rather than be told: "You can't do that, because of this". They must be encouraged, not restricted.

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): Thank you very much, Mr Black and Mr Sharkey, for your very interesting and stimulating presentation. I am grateful for your coming here today.

I propose a short comfort break, and we shall recommence in about five minutes, at which point we shall hear from Mr Wright.

The subgroup was suspended at 12.21 pm.

On resuming —

12.27 pm

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): I invite Mr William Wright, the chairman of Wrightbus Ltd, to make his presentation. Before I do, however, I propose that we have sandwiches at the end of the session rather than during it. I hope that colleagues find that satisfactory.

Mr Weir: Mr Chairman, by that do you mean at the end of Mr Wright's presentation or after the Department of Finance and Personnel has made its presentation?

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): The latter.

Thank you for your patience, Mr Wright. We have heard two very interesting and worthwhile presentations, and we look forward to hearing yours. Perhaps you would make a 10-minute presentation, at the end of which members will ask questions.

Mr William Wright (Wrightbus Ltd): I appreciate this opportunity, because sometimes we in industry feel a bit like a patient: the consultants go round the bed while the patient hopes that they will find a cure for his disease. So many people pronounce on industry that we wonder whether they know about it all.

I will start with education because I have been involved in the administration of technical education for about 25 years. I spent six years with the North-Eastern Education and Library Board. I have another qualification: we use the product of the education system. In my presentation, I ask whether the education system has failed industry and commerce. I say categorically that that has had a major impact.

We have a training school into which we bring between 30 and 50 apprentices, depending on the marketplace and the quality of the apprentices. We are a skilled enterprise with very few semi-skilled employees; they are all skilled coachbuilders, engineers and fitters. Therefore, we depend on skills, and it is on their skills and ability to absorb what we teach them that we select our apprentices. However, when we test our incoming students, we find that one third could not measure the number of square metres in this room. They could, when shown how.

We have a pretty high profile in the Ballymena area; we visit all the local schools and encourage them to visit us. We try to encourage the kids, but, unfortunately, the education system is not working. I wanted to start my presentation with education, because if we do not get the right quality of students and apprentices, we will not build the industrial base that we need. I was at two board meetings yesterday, so I am not as well prepared as well as I wanted to be.

12.30 pm

I read an article in one of the broadsheets last week. It quoted some observations from the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD), which is probably one of the most respected think tanks on economic matters. The headline read:

"Poorly educated workforce is drag on UK productivity".

The article states that productivity is the most reliable indicator of the country's economic health and reports the OECD's views on UK productivity. The OECD said that the UK is relatively weak in the field of innovation. It continues:

"30 pc of 25 to 34-year-olds are low-skilled, a considerably larger share than in most other OECD countries."

The OECD also said:

"There is therefore a clear need to expand education and training at the intermediate level."

I wish to make a point about that. A new education system has been proposed for Northern Ireland. I do not see how that will work. In Ballymena, there are three grammar schools — St Louis Grammar School and Ballymena Academy, which are first-class schools, and Cambridge House Grammar School, which is a newcomer and therefore probably not as well developed as the other two. They are all located in the affluent town of Ballymena. How in the name of goodness are we to divide pupils among those schools? My solution is quite simple: our secondary schools should become junior technical schools.

I have a great admiration for the education that I received. I received two scholarships: one to Ballymena Academy and one to Ballymena Technical College. I picked the tech because that was what I wanted. If we were to have junior technical schools, we would raise the awareness of the secondary-school system. At present, parents see it as a second-class system. We could dispel that view by changing the emphasis and by introducing a curriculum that is orientated towards industry and commerce. Pupils would probably attend those schools from 14 years of age — that was the age at which I moved from the primary-school sector to the technical college. That change would make a tremendous difference to our education system. It would produce people with the knowledge to be able to appreciate the world of industry. I have only a junior technical certificate, but it has helped me immensely throughout my life in industry.

Wrightbus Ltd has a turnover of £100 million and employs almost 1,000 people. We depend on the people coming through. At the moment, we are getting very poor-quality entrants coming in at the bottom end. If we bring in 30 people, we will probably lose about 10 in the first year. Do not ask me why. They probably find our system too intense. It is intense; it has to be. We are an industrial operation that sells across the world. We must also be very competent technically. When we send a vehicle to Hong Kong, it had better be good — it is a long distance away.

If we can get our education system right, we can make great strides forward. However, I cannot see that happening at present. We are starting to amalgamate our institutes of further education. I was involved in the 1994 amalgamation of Antrim Technical College, Ballymena College and Magherafelt College of Further Education. Its problems have just about been solved, after losses of £2 million. The new amalgamation will take in Coleraine and Larne, and all stations in between. I cannot see the logic in that.

I will move on to fiscal incentives, rating, energy costs and planning. Fiscal incentives help. We get quite good help from Invest Northern Ireland. We cannot complain, even though that contribution is only 25% of the total cost. We spent £2.5 million on developing the StreetCar, for which we received a Government grant of only a couple of hundred thousand pounds for research and development. One must be prepared to be innovative all the time. Fiscal incentives are OK, but they are only a small part of what is required. If people do not want to innovate, all the grants in the world will not persuade them.

I will provide some figures: our electricity bill is £250,000; our oil bill is about £300,000; and our total rates bill is £312,000. That has a two-fold effect. We had planned two new expansions for a new R&D centre and a new composites centre. We scrubbed both those because of the rating system. Rating is a major issue.

The difficulty is that we are in an industry that requires a lot of square footage. A bus measures 12 metres by 2.5 metres, and a great deal of space is required to build a bus. We produce 1,000 buses. We have roughly 5,000 40-foot trailers, in addition to equipment and buses. We import 1,000 chassis from the likes of Volvo, Scania and other companies, and we export 1,000 buses. Approximately 10 articulated lorries arrive at our plant every day. The total value of the material at our plant is around £50 million. We import material from as far away Poland, Romania and Italy. For example, our seats come from Italy. We must import material, which is a cost that our competition on the mainland does not have to bear.

Rating is just one issue; there are higher energy costs on top of that. Our economy costs are not a terrible burden, but they are an additional burden. The rating system recently killed two of our projects. Our rates bill was increasing, and the projects would have taken money away from research and development, which is our lifeblood.

We started our company at the back of the family home. We would probably have been strangled at birth by the planning authorities of today and we would never have survived. Planning is a major difficulty. The applications for planning permission for the extensions that I mentioned have been in the system for three months now. The extensions will be built on an industrial site; the applications should be rubber-stamped.

I wonder about the value of foreign investment. Look at the headlines: General Motors paid off 20,000 people in the USA. We have a licensee in America, and we have quite close contacts there. The help that American industry gets is quite phenomenal because a lot of industry has been lost. The Japanese have taken over quite a bit of the car industry. New factories that were set up to build trucks are all closing. Local authorities are producing incentives to get people to move into a brand new factory with a workforce.

Foreign investment is a bit of a damp squib. If the indigenous population has the right mentality and the right outlook, companies will do far better. If, for every pound spent on foreign investment, 50p were spent locally, there would be a better output. That is my view, after 60 years in industry.

We have been helped at different times by the Industrial Development Board and Invest Northern Ireland, but only in part. If we had not had the inclination and the ability to go ahead, we would not be where we are.

Indigenous investment can play a big part, because it is very difficult to attract foreign investment at present.

I want to speak about licensing, which is a far more effective way to attract investment. My design director used to work for Ford. In fact, he drew the first sketches of the Ford Fiesta. His wife is from Lurgan, and their parents were getting old, so they decided to come back to Northern Ireland, even though things were quite hot at the time.

We looked for potential markets around the world. At the time, we employed about 130 people. We realised that the Northern Ireland market was too small. The large tariff barrier in the Republic of Ireland meant that we could not export to there, so we had to look elsewhere — to America, for example.

At a trade fair in Frankfurt, my design director and I spotted a system of putting aluminium framing together. We use that system in all our buses, and it has been the secret of our success. It is a simple system that was patented for 10 years, although the patent has now expired. When we discovered the framing system, the patent was held in Switzerland when the system was exported from there.

Licensing is the way forward. With its worldwide contacts, INI should be looking for licences that will appeal to people in Northern Ireland, but our people must have a hunger and a knowledge in order to use that licence. A door manufacturer in Ballymena is doing quite successfully from an American licence. Licensing is a far better way in which to obtain overseas money than foreign direct investment.

Reducing the rate of corporation tax would certainly be an advantage to business. We pay around £1·3 million in corporation tax a year; under the Republic's tax system, that figure would be about £450,000. Electricity costs are high, and, although we use quite a bit of power, we do not use that much for electricity costs to be an issue. As I said, there is nothing that we can do about oil prices.

Our bank has been quite good to us. We use one particular bank, but I do not want to name it. [Laughter.] We have been through tight times and good times, and, generally speaking, I cannot complain about the bank. The early years were certainly difficult. When we started the business, we had an overdraft of £100, and it is difficult to run a business on that. Now, however, we lend the bank some money, and it lends us some money. That is how we deal with bigish amounts of money. Our bank has worked with us and helped us to expand at certain times. In my experience, if a person is truthful and open with the bank, it will be there for him during tight times.

On one occasion, I was working with a man on a big contract in Strathclyde. When he went bankrupt, it caused tremendous difficulty. In three days, my overdraft was increased four times. It took us two years to rid ourselves of that problem, but the bank stayed with us. The man who went bankrupt was not really bankrupt — the bank lost faith in him.

Banks have been a good source of finance. Other sources of finance can be difficult, because they are mostly provided by venture capitalists. We have steered clear of venture capitalists because they usually want quite a big slice of the cake. We have many opportunities now — in America, for example — but we do not like to expand beyond our capability to finance it. We have financed the company partly through bank loans, but mostly through ploughing back the profits into the company.

We are a family company of miserable Ballymena men and women. As Willie John McBride said, copper wire was invented when two Ballymena men got the hold of a penny. [Laughter.]

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): Thank you very much, Mr Wright.

Mr Weir: Thank you for your informative presentation, Mr Wright. You mentioned that R&D is your company's lifeblood, and that the 100% rates that are being phased in are a disincentive to opening new or additional premises for R&D. It would be helpful if you could tell the subgroup how much R&D your company undertakes and by how much you hope to expand that. Moreover, what potential threat do the 100% rates pose to your future R&D?

You specifically referred to difficulties with planning issues. Obviously, that is one example of where Government inefficiency or over-regulation is a barrier to business. What are your views on Government regulation? Is it a barrier to expansion or efficient business use?

Mr Wright: This year, Wrightbus Ltd is likely to make a profit of between £4 million and £5 million. The taxman will take 30% of those profits. As a family, we do not take much of the profits. As I said, we are relatively simple, miserable Ballymena people. We do not have a BMW in the family, although we do have a Lexus.

In developing the StreetCar, we spent £1·5 million last year and £1 million this year. We had to develop three new models — two for Volvo and one for a new customer. We have also produced a hybrid-electric vehicle, six of which are running in London, which save 40% on fuel. We built the first low-floor buses in Britain. We got the first contract for low-floor buses in London, mainly because we saw a gap in the market. We had been building vehicles for the welfare market, and we saw that those buses had to transport people with disabilities. We realised that disabled people felt nervous when they had to be lifted high off the ground, so when we saw the designs for low-floor buses in Germany, we decided to build them. As I said, we got the first contract for low-floor buses in London, and we have retained roughly 70% of that market.

Increased outgoings such as higher fuel costs, higher electricity costs and higher rates mean that there is less money to spend on R&D. I know that Government could give us 25% of the cost of R&D, but we would still have to find the remaining 75%. Another thing to remember about R&D is that, because the people who are involved in R&D do not produce gross value added (GVA), they are an expense. To make R&D worthwhile, we need to reinvest 50% of our profits.

We developed the low-floor bus. We also built a double-decker bus for the First Group. The market difficulties that the Hatfield rail disaster caused meant that bus companies stopped buying buses, because they were not receiving cash from the rail companies. Therefore we looked for alternatives, and the only market that was still buying was London, which remained nationalised and had money to spend. We developed a new double-decker bus, and it has been one of our most successful products. Wrightbus Ltd has 700 double-decker buses in London.

We have spent approximately £500,000 to £750,000 on R&D for the hybrid-electric bus. The hybrid was my idea. As a kid, I was asthmatic, so I was always very conscious of fumes, especially motor fumes. I realised that hybrid buses would be the next big thing in city centres, and, therefore, we developed the hybrid bus. We had it tested by Transport for London. The tests show that it saves about 40% on fuel, which in turn saves 40% on carbon dioxide; nitrous oxide emissions are down to 0.2%; so particulates are reduced dramatically. We really feel that the hybrid bus has a bright future.

Last weekend, we held talks with the boss of the First Group, which runs 10,000 buses. It is looking for 100 buses for a project in Glasgow and is interested in the StreetCar. As the market for engines for hybrid-electric buses is difficult and our knowledge is limited, I did not trust us to build an engine here to supply to America. Therefore, we have linked up with an American company. It is building the engine, and we are building the body and shipping it over from Ballymena.

Unfortunately, we are over-regulated. One company in Ballymena was expanding; I was on Ballymena Borough Council, and our health and safety people recommended that the workers be allowed to work only until 6.00 pm, or 1.30 pm on a Saturday. It was unbelievable that that should be imposed on what was quite a big employer in Ballymena. I do not want to name him, but he is in the agriculture sector. He had spent quite a bit of money on expansion and was working to a timescale, and somebody comes along and says that he could work only until those times. The reason was that the factory was cheek by jowl with a housing complex. The planners allowed that to happen, and it happens all over the place. We suffered from that on our site. Regulation is an increasing burden, and much of it is nonsensical.

Mr McNarry: I recall the day when the banks backed the man; now they seem to back the payback. That style of man and his ideas are hard to encourage today, and I suspect that you have sympathy for young entrepreneurs. They might not go through the brick walls that you have gone through; sometimes they need some help.

Do you think that the problems that you have identified in education are indicative of parents, pupils and schools thinking that manufacturing industries are not likely to offer sustainable employment? I agree with what you said about vocational skills. The curriculum is not being directed in that way, perhaps because of the mistaken perception that there is no future in local manufacturing because it is in decline.

I was speaking to some medium-sized manufacturers from the South at the weekend. They recognise the benefits of the corporation tax rate in the South. Interestingly, they said that capital gains tax is a major issue for them. They have probably banked the corporation tax moneys and are now examining capital gains tax. What benefits do you think capital gains tax on a par with the Republic could have for local manufacturers and businesses?

Mr Wright: Tax is one of those things. The Government keeps inventing taxes, and we keep paying them.

I am going to say something that I did not intend to say: the size of our public sector and the Civil Service have reached intolerable levels. There are 90,000 people in manufacturing industry, and we cannot sustain it. I do not believe that we can cure the problems, because they are so well entrenched. I served 16 years as a councillor and six years on an education board, and there is no way that the Secretary of State will ever reduce it by any sizeable proportion.

Lord Morrow: He says that he is starting on 24 November.

Mr Wright: He will do you guys first. [Laughter.]

You talk about the education sector. We had a growth challenge, which is industry trying to get the whole thing going again. Coming from my background in education administration, I suggested that trainee teachers visit factories in order to counter the “dark Satanic mills” image.

I thought that it was a good idea, but they did not, because within nine months, it floundered. It started off with about 20 trainee teachers, then there were 15. I think that Wrightbus Ltd was the last company they visited, and by that stage there were six teachers. Wrightbus Ltd probably has about 150 computers, and there are quite good offices, although there is no air conditioning. We are also doing well on the working environment.

However, there is a particular notion in the education sector about factory work and much of it is to do with administration. I was on the North Eastern Education and Library Board, and most of the people on the board were ex-teachers and ex-lecturers — two thirds had been nominated by the officials. They had never seen the inside of a factory. Somehow we must break this cycle, and I do not know how to do it. I tried and I floundered. I thought that it would be beneficial to allow trainee teachers to visit the factories in order to let them see the workings of the industry and to see if there might be jobs for the children of the future.

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): Perhaps a few civil servants could visit factories as well.

Mr McElduff: I welcome Mr Wright’s practical, common-sense approach. We saw it earlier when Mr Reid from Moy Park Ltd gave evidence to the subgroup; he also brought us the benefit of his practical experience. Mr Wright, if you could prioritise one element of Government intervention or support that would benefit indigenous local businesses, what would that be?

Mr Wright: I would recommend that we use the Invest Northern Ireland network to look for licences; that would be the best thing. I said that at an Invest Northern Ireland conference one day, but they were not of the mindset to understand.

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): What do you mean by licences?

Mr Wright: I mean obtaining a licence to manufacture. For example, a Swiss aluminium company developed a system for bolting a bus together. The advantages are simple. If a bus has a damaged pillar, I can screw it out. If a bus has a damaged front end, it can be lifted off and replaced by another. That is what we do; we send complete front ends to England to replace those that have been damaged in bad smashes.

Dr McDonnell: That is like the old Morris Minor.

Mr Wright: The person must look for the licence he or she needs at any particular time. When we had a particular product need, I went to America and found the solution there. The advantage was that I had 10 years of learning how to use the product before the licence expired, so I knew more about it than the licensee; I had practical experience.

I got a licence for a hybrid-electric bus from a company in Los Angeles, and I also licensed a turbine from another company in Los Angeles, but it was not a success. However, that is how it is done; you have to look for the product. I could have had English drive units, but I did not have the correct software. The software for driving hybrids is complicated.

Therefore instead of trying to encourage a manufacturer in Taiwan to come to Ballymena — or somewhere else in Northern Ireland, because there is only 2.5% unemployment in Ballymena — the Government should help Northern Ireland companies to obtain licences.

Mr McNarry: They should come to Newtownards; nobody ever comes there.

Dr McDonnell: You have scared them all away.

Mr Wright: That would be a great advantage for the industry, and it would be beneficial for those who are looking for products. There will be always be a downturn at some point, and people will need to look for products. I believe that the solutions are out there, if you look for them.

The person who licences something will have an indigenous manufacturing operation; he will have paid for all the product development work. If he can add value by licensing the component, or whatever it is — especially in a market where he has no existing input — that is a plus for him. It is also a plus for the person who licenses the product, because he gets the technology. He may have a learning phase, but he has the chance to build further on that knowledge. Therefore it is a plus for everybody. That is my basic reasoning.

I know that Invest Northern Ireland has offices all over the world. I believe that they should search for product licences instead of trying to encourage some American or Chinese company to come here. I do not think that completely works. Invest Northern Ireland has done some good, but it has done more bad.

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): Sean Neeson, Margaret Ritchie, Alasdair McDonnell and Esmond Birnie wish to ask questions. They will ask their questions in that order and Mr Wright will answer.

1.00 pm

Mr Neeson: I always feel chuffed when I go to London and see Wright buses travelling the streets. Does your company depend greatly on the export market?

Mr Wright: We sell to Translink, and we have sold to the Republic of Ireland, but not since 2002. Our main market is the UK. We sell to Hong Kong, and we have sold to Holland, but the European market is difficult. We have a licensee in America who builds under licence for us.

Markets have peaks and troughs, and exports help to fill in the troughs. Markets may be strong in one place but weak in another. Consequently, export markets are valuable, but they will not keep a company going. England is our real market. There are five big bus companies there, and we sell to four of them. That has been a successful operation.

Ms Ritchie: With regard to financial incentives, what contribution would a peace dividend make to the local economy?

Mr Wright: You were involved in the Peace I programme with me, unfortunately, just after it became apparent that a great deal of money had gone to the wrong place — Belfast — but that was just one of those things. I am unsure about Peace money. I was on the Peace I programme board, and I examined the need for investment in Ballymena. I was also head of economic development in Ballymena Borough Council. The most difficult thing was to allocate the money, especially in the farming sector. Through an INTERREG programme, we tried to encourage farmers to be inventive and to consider how they could diversify. We did our utmost, but we were unsuccessful.

You cannot take a horse to water if it does not want to drink. There is a lot of that about. A friend of mine talks about the “BMW syndrome”. People do quite well until they get a BMW in the driveway, and then that is it. We never had a BMW — we kept looking for one, but we never got one.

Dr McDonnell: I congratulate Mr Wright. He has done a tremendous job, starting from humble simple origins at the back of his home to employing 1,000 people with a turnover of £100 million a year. If we had one or two more people like him, we would not have as many economic problems.

I welcome Mr Wright's comments on licensing in both directions, because, not only do you license in but you license out and manufacture buses in the United States. Perhaps we should pursue that concept more aggressively.

As an aside, you mentioned importing seats from Italy. Are you unable to source more components locally, or is there something wrong with the local market? A company in Kilkeel makes aircraft seats, but perhaps aircraft seats and bus seats are different.

Ms Ritchie: That company is BE Aerospace.

Dr McDonnell: Yes, and it struggled at times.

Mr Wright: The problem is the cost of seats. It makes sense for Wrightbus Ltd to buy whatever it can in Northern Ireland.

We buy fibreglass units, and so forth, from Poland. We need a week's supply of stock to be able to handle any delays in supply that may have been caused by a bad storm on the continent or at sea. Therefore we must carry more stock so that we can remain part of that supply chain. However, it is in the balance as to whether Poland can supply us at the right price.

We find it difficult to educate local industry about delivering on time. The priorities at Wrightbus Ltd are, in order, delivery on time, quality and price. We run a production line. Every bus moves along that line every night, and if the materials are not there, we are in trouble. Consequently, it makes sense that our logistical supply lines are as short as possible. Anyone who visits Nissan will see satellite companies located all around the factory. We have great difficulty in finding local suppliers who are clued-up enough to understand our demands.

However, we use one or two good local suppliers, such as a sheet-metal firm in Magherafelt. We buy as much as possible locally, but the Italians seem to have a flair for designing seats, and so forth, and are likely to produce good-quality seats on time. We have used English seat manufacturers who have not reached that standard. Big bus companies usually influence and select the style of seats. Bus interiors have changed and are now completely colour-coded.

When the bus industry was denationalised and the money that was received from selling off all the nice bus depots that town centres had disposed of, it was decided that the only way to make money was to get people onto the buses. When market research discovered that 70% of ridership was made up of women, Wrightbus Ltd started to colour-code the interiors of its vehicles according to women's preferences, which are pink and that sort of colour. I am sorry, Margaret. [Laughter.] Do not worry, Margaret, some of our bus interiors are red.

We brought in a new strategic buyer recently — a returning ex-pat — whose express job is to develop our use of local suppliers.

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): Dr Birnie, as we are running out of time, will you forgo your question?

David, are you coming back?

Mr McNarry: No.

The subgroup became inquorate at 1.09 pm.

On resuming —

1.10 pm

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): I welcome officials from the Department of Finance and Personnel (DFP) — Mr Bruce Robinson, permanent secretary, and Mike Brennan from supply branch.

Gentlemen, we have read your written submission. Mr Robinson, after you have touched on the salient points that you wish to highlight, the subgroup will move to questions.

Dr McDonnell: Could the presenters brace themselves to answer some of the questions raised by the previous presentation? We will have to go to town on them.

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): I think that that is a health warning.

Mr Bruce Robinson (Department of Finance and Personnel): I heard it as a promise.

We are delighted to be here. Mike Brennan is involved in the supply side, but he is also our chief economist, and that will inform his contribution this afternoon.

I will tie the key messages to the subgroup's terms of reference, and talk briefly about the performance of the local economy. The local economy is doing well, and that is significantly due to employment growth. The challenge for us as a regional economy in the developed western European world is to greatly increase our value-added figures.

I have listed five absolute key points that illustrate the need to improve. Gross value added (GVA) per hour is around 15% lower than the UK average. Our performance in the four productivity drivers — enterprise, innovation, skills and infrastructure — all leave something to be desired. Everyone recognises that Northern Ireland has a heavy dependence on public expenditure.

One of the points that I wish to put forward, which has come forward in evidence from other groups, is that — given the range of issues — it is exceptionally difficult to see a single action or intervention that could change everything. That might well be a contentious point for the subgroup.

I do not need to deal with the four drivers of productivity, as they probably featured heavily in the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment's presentation. However, there are some indications of improvement on the enterprise side with the trend on VAT registrations increasing.

I am also conscious that the subgroup is interested in economic inactivity, and I have produced a slide that shows that the gap in economic inactivity rates between Northern Ireland and other regions in the UK, when education is stripped out, is not as great.

In relation to public sector dependence, both the levels of employment and the percentage of public expenditure are very high. There are reasons for the identifiable public spend per head, which has evolved over time in response to the particular needs in Northern Ireland.

1.15 pm

Current thinking on the economic development policy is largely based on the work that has emerged from the Economic Development Forum, centring on the interaction among the four drivers of productivity and the need to rebalance the local economy. Although some of the economic incentives package is open for us to deal with locally, the key interest for the subgroup concerns fiscal incentives, and we note the fact that those are, at present, determined nationally. A consequence of that is that engagement with the Treasury is crucial. The current policy — and I am stating the obvious — is for a unified regime across the UK.

One issue that features in suggestions for a different fiscal regime is the likely impact of differential treatment in Northern Ireland on the other parts of the UK. That is something that would have to be considered by the subgroup. I will reiterate some points about corporation tax: although the headline rates are 30% and 12.5%, the effective rates are 21.7% and 13.7%. Many smaller firms in Northern Ireland enjoy a rate around 19%. References have been provided on the sources of those figures.

An economic package or peace dividend is obviously a key part of the subgroup's work. Given existing policy and the emphasis on the four drivers of productivity, it seems to the Department that that is the way to address the long-term endemic problems of the Northern Ireland economy. That is why we have referenced addressing those as part of the package. To do otherwise might achieve an improvement in some areas of activity but, overall, it would not achieve the desired level of impact.

Putting the economic package into context, there is no doubt that a significant change in public expenditure is under way. The Department is committed this year to participating in the comprehensive spending review. That work is well under way. The next stage involves the detailed work to be done in the autumn. The Treasury has acknowledged in discussions that the extent of public sector reform under way in Northern Ireland is exceptionally high. I have highlighted the main aspects of that: the Review of Public Administration, water reform, rating reform, fit for purpose reforms in education and further education, and curriculum reform in education. There is recognition that Northern Ireland is committed to ambitious changes, designed to redress the balance in the local economy between the private and public sectors. That is helpful in creating the context and the climate for your work.

That is a quick summary. I am happy to take your questions.

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): Thank you, Mr Robinson.

Dr Birnie: How much revenue is currently collected in Northern Ireland from corporation tax? Were the rate to be reduced to 12.5%, what would be the estimated revenue? Have the Department of Finance and Personnel or others in the Civil Service attempted to model the effect of a lower rate on revenues over time? I ask that with regard to an argument with which you will be familiar — that a lower rate will encourage inward investment and therefore higher revenue. That is important because it has been suggested to us in previous evidence.

Mr Mike Brennan (Department of Finance and Personnel): Corporation tax estimates lag quite considerably. The latest figure that we have was given to us by the Treasury when we were compiling our fiscal deficit work — around £640 million of the corporation tax collected in 2003-04 was attributed to Northern Ireland. As Mr Robinson said, the vast majority of companies in Northern Ireland are classified as small and medium-sized enterprises, so if they pay any corporation tax at all, it is at 19%. We estimate that if the corporation tax rate were reduced from 19% to 9%, the difference would be only between £70 million and £90 million — but, to be honest, that is a back-of-the-envelope calculation.

In answer to your third question, we have not considered in any great detail what the effects of a lower rate of corporation tax would be.

Dr Birnie: I suggest that that crucial issue should be examined. Other witnesses have argued for a lowering of the rate.

Mr Brennan: We are tied into work that the Department of Trade and Industry and the Treasury are carrying out as part of the comprehensive spending review. The outcome of that work will be the starting point.

Mr B Robinson: It is important to remember that, in the context of attracting FDI, the relevance of the corporation tax rate differs among businesses and among sectors. If it were a simple black-and-white issue of corporation tax being the determinant, the conclusion would be that Northern Ireland could not attract any FDI at this time — nor could it have during the past 20 years — because of the lower rate in the Republic of Ireland. If corporation tax were the all-consuming difference, Northern Ireland would not have been able to attract any FDI. Therefore, attributing a weighting to corporation tax in the corporate decision is hard work.

Mr Brennan: It is worth pointing out that when Forfás carried out work to establish the factors that are critical to attracting inward investment, issues such as skills levels and English language skills ranked higher than corporation tax.

Dr Birnie: Surely our skills levels and language skills are comparable to those in the Republic of Ireland? There must be something else differentiating the two economies.

Mr Brennan: One of the issues that have emerged in the drafting of the economic strategy on the skills side is the possibility of a mismatch between the skills that employers are looking for, and the skills that are currently provided. The vocational and technical colleges in the South have been very successful in forging links with industry.

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): Sir George Quigley has argued very publicly and forcefully that a lower corporation tax in Northern Ireland would be of great assistance. He says that investors from outside the UK have told him that they preferred to invest in the Republic of Ireland because of the lower rate of corporation tax. That is his experience; it is really an empirical approach, rather than theorising. What do you say in answer to Sir George's argument? That position is supported by other people too; it is a very forceful argument that has gained a lot of traction among politicians here.

Mr B Robinson: I am not disputing that; I am making a somewhat different point. Some businesses have undoubtedly gone to the Republic of Ireland because of its rate of corporation tax. However, if the corporation tax rate were the all-powerful, single determinant — Sir George does not say that, but some of what he has said has taken on that aura — Northern Ireland would not have attracted Seagate, Montupet and Citibank.

The challenge for all of us, and the really difficult challenge for the subgroup, is to shape not a twentieth-century view but a twenty-first-century view of the relative importance of high skills versus the best interactive electronic network infrastructure versus corporation tax.

We are looking to the future and to a developed Western World that will be competing against a significant economic challenge from China and India that was not around even as recently as 10 years ago. Moreover, taxation is one of the key issues that any corporation looks at, but, as Mr Brennan said, the work that Forfás has done points to several other issues. Companies that decide to invest in the Republic of Ireland have either been satisfied on all of the issues, or the corporation-tax issue outweighs some of their other concerns. It has undoubtedly been very successful.

Dr McDonnell: Our biggest problem is that, at times, everybody is in control of our economy, but, at other times, nobody is in control of it. All sorts of components have a veto, but — with all due respect to you, Mr Robinson, particularly because of your previous experience in the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment — nobody is prepared to lead or drive our economy, even though we have DETI, the Department for Employment and Learning and the Department of Finance and Personnel.

The question of R&D has arisen time and again. Even the Ulster Farmers' Union referred to R&D, and that surprised me. They brought up the level of R&D in Finland. We are all very fond of Finnish R&D. We all carry examples of it in our pocket — my mobile phone was at the edge of R&D about five years ago when I bought it.

Ms Ritchie: It is very old.

Dr McDonnell: It may be old, but it still works.

Ms Gildernew: Do you mean you or the mobile phone?

Dr McDonnell: Both. I work very well, as does my phone.

We need to find a mechanism to encourage R&D, because it is not coming through in Northern Ireland. I do not apportion blame, but in the event of market failure or private-sector failure, the responsibility falls to the public service, aided and abetted by whatever political influence and support that we can give.

I shall now get on my hobby horse. Queen's and the University of Ulster must create new businesses. We are not doing enough of that, although a remodelled and reworked UUTech seems to be working better.

Despite its brainpower, Queens is not coming up with innovation and practical, applied product. It may be doing wonderful economic research and development, but it has mystified me for years why we cannot get some of that to the point where the rubber is hitting the road and where we establish start-ups.

1.30 pm

The start-ups that we have established — Andor Technology, for example — have been tremendous. Failures are not coming out of Queens, but that is because we do not have enough start-ups. What does come out of Queens is successful, but we do not take risks.

How do we learn to take risks when encouraging start-ups? Willie Wright applied his experience to a very localised, specific industry, and there was much wisdom in what he said. We have enough indigenous brainpower to do better than use foreign direct investment, yet we depend on it because we are not unblocking the universities' output.

Mr B Robinson: All of the evidence supports your point about the importance of innovation and R&D. Therefore, I agree with you 100%. In future, successful businesses in this part of the world will have significant intellectual property and significant R&D.

I gathered from the last witness that risk-taking is intertwined with our attitude towards the importance of the economy and its priority in education. I agree that we have become exceptionally risk-adverse. One way of addressing that is to look at business start-ups as a portfolio in which the question is not about what has failed, but about whether the success percentage outcome is reasonable in response to the resources employed. Rather than microanalyse why two or three — or more — out of 10 businesses failed, we should say that three successes out of 10 is a perfectly reasonable return.

Mr Neeson: There seems to be a contradiction in the figures. Why, when unemployment in Northern Ireland is lower than in the rest of the UK, do we have the highest level of economic inactivity in the UK?

I am worried about the amount of investment from Northern Ireland that goes to India, China and eastern Europe. What can we do to stem that flow and encourage investment to remain here?

Mr B Robinson: Mike will talk to you about the categorisation of economic activity and inactivity.

Mr Brennan: We have considered that contradiction: we have the fastest decline in unemployment in the UK in the past decade, and we are now below the UK average. That is unheard of for Northern Ireland.

Mr Neeson: It was 20% when I was in the 1982 Assembly.

Mr Brennan: It is now 4.5%, which is phenomenal. However, the figures show a shocking increase in inactivity, as many more people register for welfare and inactivity benefits. There is a close correlation between the drop in the unemployment figures and the increase in those claiming benefits.

That is not unique to Northern Ireland, and the Government are considering the problem nationally. How do we motivate people to get back into the workforce? Several pilot schemes, such as Pathways to Work, are trying to address that issue. There is an issue about labour market signals trying to encourage people to re-enter the active workforce — and I stress the words “active workforce”.

On one level, it is encouraging that the official unemployment rate is low, but if we look beneath the surface, we may be discouraged.

Mr B Robinson: I might engage in a philosophical debate on your point about the flow of investment out of Northern Ireland being bad. Certain activities are no longer viable in Northern Ireland. Business in Northern Ireland has a choice about whether it stays astride the market that it has won, and the only way that it can do so is by finding lower-cost production. I know that that is difficult, and it raises questions in everybody's mind.

However, it is an indication of the progress of much of Northern Ireland business. It chose to keep its markets and to develop the management capability either to run significant operations remotely, or to source crucial parts of their products. When Moy Park Ltd first went to France and Brett Martin Ltd bought operations in Holland — that was about 15 years ago — I would have described that as a hallmark of the success of Northern Ireland business. The dynamic of globalisation is such that that must continue. I accept that it runs counter to what one would feel instinctively.

We may have moved beyond the point where unemployment should occupy a lot of our thinking on economic development and progress in the Northern Ireland economy. It is a very long time since unemployment here was worse than the UK average. One of my concerns is that, not intentionally but unwittingly, we all carried the burden of unemployment for too long in our economic policy development and policy-making. If you look at the convergence of performance, the Northern Ireland economy has been significantly driven by a growth in employment; however, it has not grown in terms of value added. We solved what we saw as the biggest single problem, but there is a danger that we are continuing to solve it to our detriment in the next stage, which is to climb up the value-added chain.

Ms Ritchie: Welcome, gentlemen. I have two questions. How would DFP support and move forward the four drivers of productivity when Northern Ireland is a peripheral region?

In his announcement about the Review of Public Administration last November, the Secretary of State referred to — and you referred to the same issue in your presentation — the overemphasis on the public sector and the need for the private sector to develop. Is there not a problem in that the private sector is mobile and could move out of Northern Ireland and locate elsewhere, particularly in low-cost economies, thereby undermining what we are trying to do in the first place?

Mr B Robinson: With regard to the second point, that is the reality that we face anyway.

These are open economies, and quite apart from business, labour is totally mobile. Therefore, that is one significant change that the subgroup will have to wrestle with. A recent phenomenon in Northern Ireland is that increased numbers of people from other parts of the EU have come into its employment market. The die has been cast for the mobility of business and people.

Why do people want to live here? Evidence shows that many people want to live and work in Northern Ireland, and Government must create a society that provides them with the opportunity to do that. The service industry is important, and the last thing that I want is for this to become a manufacturing industry versus service industry argument. I will use an analogy: a well-known former chairman of the IDB — members can guess who he was — said that once the railways were expanded, there would be no future in building stagecoaches. That is the difficulty for Northern Ireland. Its people are having to learn how to live in a post-textile-industry world. I did not think that I would ever say this, but the textile industry is not particularly important to Northern Ireland now. I do not say that with any delight: I am merely recognising reality.

If Northern Ireland did not have manufacturers such as Wrightbus Ltd, which have invested significantly in intellectual property and conduct high levels of R&D, I do not think that there would be a manufacturing industry. However, that is not to suggest that that would be the end of the world as we know it. Northern Ireland is operating in a different world and environment. Nowhere else in the world has 100% broadband access: Northern Ireland does. The future is about maximising the available economic benefits.

Ms Gildernew: Gentlemen, you are very welcome. Forgive my cynicism, but you mentioned unemployment figures from 20 years ago. Those figures might be more relevant had Maggie Thatcher and the current Administration not massaged them to ensure that rather than being termed “unemployment” figures, they are known as “inactivity” figures.

Although fewer people are recorded as unemployed in Northern Ireland, there is much hidden unemployment. It is known as “inactivity”. Some of the people listed on those records are inactive because of barriers to work, which include a lack of affordable childcare, lack of support and care for disabled and elderly people from the Health Service, and unrealistic travel-to-work times. Constituents of mine have been made redundant three and four times and have very little hope of getting the same type of employment.

You mentioned the four drivers of productivity, which include skills and infrastructure. It must be accepted that the lack of infrastructure — roads infrastructure, in particular — has had a huge impact west of the Bann. On skills, the technical colleges and further education colleges in the Twenty-six Counties are successfully contributing to the economy. Projects such as the Young Scientist of the Year have interested young people in their third and fourth years at school in science, and that may encourage them to study science and mathematics on a vocational level, as opposed to furthering their academic studies. Perhaps, in the past, academic study, rather than vocational training, has been overly promoted.

Would DFP agree that more resources should be diverted from the academic sector to vocational training? Does more need to be done to remove the barriers to the work? What should be done to improve the infrastructure west of the Bann in order that employment and an investment windfall can be generated?

Mr B Robinson: Our submission contains information on road density, which underscores precisely Ms Gildernew's point.

Neither the Department nor I is responsible for developing economic policy; that is for DETI and DEL to formulate. In deploying resources to those ends, as opposed to extra resources, it is accepted that the emphasis on further education needs to be in the direction that Ms Gildernew has outlined. The Economic Development Forum has achieved a great deal in producing a pretty solid consensus on the importance of that and of infrastructure.

1.45 pm

The emphasis is more on creating the conditions in which businesses can thrive rather than on supporting individual businesses. We are seeing a switch from supporting individual firms to creating a wider environment of support. That is consistent with Dr McDonnell's point about risk. Infrastructure is certainly important, both for how Northern Ireland is perceived globally and within Northern Ireland, if economic benefits are to be spread across the community.

Ms Gildernew: What about barriers to work?

Mr B Robinson: That presents a really difficult set of issues. When the regional development strategy was published five years ago, it recognised the challenges of providing employment in rural areas. The strategy tackled that issue pretty well by referring to the creation of significant hubs for employment throughout Northern Ireland, which seemed to be a good way to address this challenge. Broadband availability greatly reduces the handicap of distance and makes employment in rural areas of Northern Ireland much more viable. I completely agree that rural employment is very important.

Mr McElduff: Does the Department of Finance and Personnel agree that the economic interests of the North would be better served by a different tax regime than that applied in England, Scotland and Wales? If so, is the Department arguing for a different tax regime?

Does the Department see the merit or benefit of a harmonised, single-island approach to corporation tax? I realise that we have covered some of this territory, but these are more specific questions. What stands in the way of establishing an incentive for attracting FDI?

Mr B Robinson: This issue has come up in a variety of guises. The Department's job is not to argue for a particular tax regime or tax rate. Essentially, those are ministerial and political decisions. I understand why the subgroup approaches the matter in that way, but I hope that it equally understands why the Department cannot approach it in that way. Those are significant political decisions that are very much in the remit of Ministers.

Mr Weir: Thank you for your presentation. I will refer to two issues that have already been mentioned. I would appreciate it if you could provide more detail to the subgroup.

My first point concerns economic inactivity rates. If the percentage of people in Northern Ireland on incapacity benefit is compared to the UK average, I agree that much of that is due to attempts by successive Governments to remove people from the pure unemployment figures towards other benefit figures so that the headline unemployment rate will not seem as bad.

Inactivity rates have previously been highlighted to the subgroup, and I found your graph quite useful in that regard. There was a general reference from either DEL or DETI — whichever Department issued the figures — to the higher number of students featuring in the economic inactivity figures.

Leaving aside the issue of mismatched skills and considering the broader economic value, a higher number of economically inactive students could be described as good working age inactivity, in that students represent a longer-term investment, whereas higher economic inactivity among other sectors of the working age population is obviously damaging to the economy.

I want to take on board what was said about potential barriers to work. You have produced a differentiation for the student element of inactivity, but it would be useful to have some analysis and more detailed figures for the remainder of the inactivity rates. We know the figures for the unemployment element, but how much of the recorded inactivity is due to increased numbers of people receiving incapacity benefit, people on carer's allowance, or people who have to remain at home because they cannot afford to pay for childcare? If we could see a more detailed set of figures, showing where the comparisons lie, our eventual recommendations could, I hope, ensure that people get back into employment.

I appreciate that rather than your giving the subgroup an answer now, it would be better for you to supply us with figures in writing.

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): Some of those figures are listed in the "Economic Inactivity" section of the DETI paper.

Mr Weir: I do not have that paper with me, but I think that some of those figures are listed in it. It would be helpful to see the full set of figures.

Mr B Robinson: If we can add to that analysis, we will do so.

Mr Weir: I agree strongly with Alasdair McDonnell's comment that it seems that many Departments, at various levels, are involved in matters concerning the economy, but no one Department seems to be — for want of a better expression — in overall control. There is a concern that public expenditure decisions, particularly those that affect the economy, and which have implications for other Departments, can be made by DFP, DEL, DETI and, to some extent, DSD.

I am concerned because when the subgroup quizzed officials from DETI, we found — and correct me if I am wrong — that that Department does not seem to have input into DRD's decisions on roads announcements. Irrespective of whether announcements are right or wrong, if a major infrastructure project is announced, which will affect the economy, it is natural to be concerned if the lead Department has not sought input from any of the other Departments.

Can you reassure members on what changes have been made to guarantee greater financial co-ordination between Departments to ensure that when public expenditure is being agreed, it is either driven by, or takes cognisance of, the effect that its allocation will have on the economy? Have Government made any changes to provide a greater degree of co-ordination?

Mr B Robinson: The work of the Economic Development Forum (EDF) is bringing about greater financial co-ordination. The drivers that have emerged from the EDF's work point clearly to infrastructure. DRD representatives attend the EDF, as do DEL officials on the skills side. Initial steps have been taken, but I quite happily concede that they are the first steps to draw this together. The points made by members are important, and more work needs to be done.

There is interaction between DARD and the EDF, and DETI, Invest Northern Ireland and the tourism agenda also come together strongly. Mr Weir is quite right: inevitably, when several Departments are involved, issues can be disaggregated, and there is the danger of their not getting sufficient strategic input.

Mr Weir: Briefly, the roads issue is one example. It is clear that, in economic terms, Government realise that infrastructure is a problem and that there is a need to invest in roads. However, how much input is there in the individual decisions on which roads get the money? At the very least, there needs to be some input into deciding how best the money could be spent to benefit the economy and Northern Ireland directly.

Mr B Robinson: Economic benefits are factored in when the cost-benefit analysis and the detail of the projects are being worked on. However, I took your question to be referring to strategic inputs. For example, a significant input would be the Westlink's impact on the port.

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): Thank you for your contribution; it has been very helpful. Many questions remain, but that is part and parcel of politics. I look forward to dealing with you in a different format in the near future.

Mr B Robinson: Thank you.

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): Before everybody departs, we must deal with a written submission from the Freight Transport Association. We are waiting for further information from DETI.

The Committee Clerk: The Department has sent that information. It will be of particular interest to Mr Weir because it breaks down rates of inactivity into "Student", "Family/home", "Sick/disabled", "Retired" and "Other", which is very useful. We did not ask for all that.

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): Dr Birnie mentioned Mr Graham Gudgin. His office has been contacted. A written submission will be forwarded, and I hope that we will be in a position to receive that. The article that appeared in 'Fortnight' has been tabled.

There is a draft press release, to which there are some minor amendments. I hope that we can agree to that being published.

The Committee Clerk: I have added in some of the key points that witnesses made that were not clear in their submissions. For Eric Reid I have added: "Mr Reid highlighted the challenge posed by the global market and the need to develop a strategy for agriculture that equips it to compete effectively in the global market."

For Clarke Black and the Ulster Farmers' Union, I have added "and renewable energy", but I have also said that they "support the provision of ongoing financial support from Europe rather than an entirely free-market approach" and that they noted that a focus on research and development was the way forward for the industry.

For Mr Bruce Robinson I have added: "Mr Robinson noted that the Northern Ireland economy currently operates within a unified UK tax regime and that the subgroup would need to examine the relative merits of the options that might be available to improve fiscal incentives."

If you are content, I will add that to what is already there.

Mr Weir: Obviously, there are also two changes to the list of members attending.

The Committee Clerk: Yes: Margaret Ritchie and Lord Morrow instead of Alex Easton and John Dallat.

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): OK. That is agreed. The next meeting will be on Thursday 10 August.

Ms Ritchie: Will we be able to consider the written submission from the Freight Transport Association on 15 August?

The Committee Clerk: As we have an extra week, we have slotted in a written evidence session. Paul Moore has been asked to write a paper summarising all the written evidence that has been gathered up to that point. I have asked him to pay particular attention to where it agrees — or not — with some of the oral evidence that we have heard.

Ms Ritchie: The submission from the Freight Transport Association is a thought-provoking one. It points to the peripherality of our region. Mr Robinson did not answer my question about how we address that, despite the four drivers for productivity. Better transport links is one of the main issues, but he did not answer that.

2.00 pm

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): That is a matter for critical comment at an appropriate point.

Mr McElduff: I welcome the additional information from DETI on inward investment in Fermanagh and Tyrone.

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): The next meeting will be on 10 August and will include the final oral evidence sessions, with the Northern Ireland Tourist Board, the Economic Research Institute of Northern Ireland and the Northern Ireland Council for Voluntary Action.

The Committee Clerk: If we get a positive response from the Northern Ireland Youth Forum, it will also be here.

Mr Weir: I will not be at that meeting, but somebody will represent me.

The Chairman (Mr A Maginness): There is no further business. The subgroup will now adjourn.

Adjourned at 2.01 pm.

SUBGROUP ON THE ECONOMIC CHALLENGES FACING NORTHERN IRELAND

Thursday 10 August 2006

Members in attendance for all or part of proceedings:

The Chairperson, Mrs Naomi Long

Dr Esmond Birnie

Ms Michelle Gildernew

Mr Kieran McCarthy

Dr Alasdair McDonnell

Mr Barry McElduff

Mr David McNarry

Lord Morrow

Mr Sean Neeson

Mr Robin Newton

Ms Margaret Ritchie

Witnesses:

Mr Alan Clarke

Mr Tom McGrath

Ms Sue Ward

} Northern Ireland
Tourist Board

Mr Victor Hewitt

} Economic Research Institute of Northern Ireland

Mr Seamus McAleavey

Ms Frances McCandless

} Northern Ireland
Council for Voluntary Action

Dr Peter Gilleece

} Senior Research Officer,
Northern Ireland
Assembly

The subgroup met at 10.06 am.

(The Chairperson (Mrs Long) in the Chair.)

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): I remind members to turn off their mobile telephones, as, even in silent mode, they interfere with the recording system.

Apologies have been received from Peter Weir; Lord Morrow attends as his substitute; Barry McElduff is the substitute for Mitchel McLaughlin; Robin Newton is the substitute for Ian Paisley Jnr and Kieran McCarthy is the substitute for David Ford. Sean Neeson has indicated that he will be late.

Are members content with the draft minutes of the meeting of 8 August?

Members indicated assent.

The next item on the agenda is matters arising. The first issue relates to the infrastructure package. The Strategic Investment Board (SIB) has provided a breakdown of the £16 billion infrastructure package

The Committee Clerk: Members received that yesterday.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): The next matter arising concerns procedural advice. Formal procedural advice has been sought from the Preparation for Government (PFG) Committee on substitute members, chairing future meetings of the subgroup and whether members of the PFG Committee, who also sit on the subgroup, may nominate a substitute for the subgroup in order that they may attend the PFG Committee.

The response is in line with advice given by the Principal Clerk at the last meeting. The PFG Committee has no difficulty with substitutes attending the subgroup in place of members of the PFG Committee or with substitutes chairing subsequent subgroup meetings. That takes into consideration the need for substitute members to cover holiday arrangements. Are members content?

Members indicated assent.

The third matter is evidence. As agreed at the last meeting, Dr Graham Gudgin has agreed to produce a written submission to the subgroup by the middle of next week. As previously discussed, the Clerk contacted the Youth Council for Northern Ireland with a view to its giving evidence. He was referred to the Northern Ireland Youth Forum. Several attempts have been made to follow this up, but no response has been received, as all the major players on the forum are currently on leave. I suspect that we cannot progress this matter.

Mr McNarry: That is disappointing. I understand, and accept, that holidays will have an effect. It is unfortunate that we cannot hear the voice of young people whose futures we are discussing.

We would get into trouble if we approached some schools but left out others. Could the subgroup do some further head-scratching to find a way to hear a legitimate voice that represents young people? The consensus is that that would be useful. However, I fully understand the difficulties.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): I would welcome any alternative suggestions that members may have at this stage so that we can proceed

Lord Morrow: Will Graham Gudgin be submitting a paper instead of making a presentation in person? Why is he submitting a paper rather than appearing in front of the subgroup?

The Committee Clerk: His contribution was a late addition to the agenda, and a written submission was the only viable option. He is on leave at the moment, but he was able to take an hour to prepare the paper. I have asked for it by Wednesday of next week, if that is possible.

Lord Morrow: He was not to come here to make a presentation?

The Committee Clerk: No, that was never formally required of him.

I tried to contact the Youth Forum several times, and I received a written response from its chief executive, David Guilfoyle, but, to be frank, it did not cover the issues.

Ms Gildernew: Chairperson, there is a Fermanagh Shadow Youth Council, based in Enniskillen. I know it is short notice, but contacting it may be an option.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): There is also a shadow youth council in Belfast, but the difficulty is that many of the members of those groups are on leave from school and difficult to contact. It is more the timing that is the issue, rather than their interest in the subject matter.

The Committee Clerk: I was advised by David Guilfoyle that some young people had been involved in holding a mock Assembly plenary as part of the education process. They would certainly have been interested if time had permitted, but, regrettably, it did not.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): The third issue in relation to evidence is —

Mr McNarry: Sorry, but I have just had a thought. As regards the timing, the subgroup has been granted a week's extension, so the schools may be back by then. There would be no gap.

The Committee Clerk: The extension gives us only until 25 August to prepare our report. Today's session will be the last oral evidence session. On Tuesday there will be a great deal of written evidence.

Mr McNarry: May I make a suggestion rather than a proposal? This matter could be referred to the PFG Committee, which will consider the subgroup's report. As it has some extra time available to it, it may think it worthwhile to hear a young person's perspective.

The Committee Clerk: Although a vote was not taken, members have said that they would be interested in extending the work of the subgroup, subject to the PFG Committee being content and a work programme being agreed. The subgroup could well consider this after 25 August, if it so wished. It is for the subgroup to determine whether it wants to work beyond the dates on the current agenda and to ask the PFG Committee to agree that. There is certainly scope to do that.

Mr McNarry: If the subgroup's report is to be debated in the Assembly, it would only be correct for young people's views to be represented in some way. I would be grateful if some room could be created, by any means — even through the PFG Committee — to hear their voice.

Mr McElduff: I just want to clarify that it will be the PFG Committee, rather than the subgroup, that will deliberate on whether an Assembly debate will be held.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): Mr McNarry, are you making a formal proposal that the matter of youth representation should be referred to the PFG Committee?

The Committee Clerk: Chairperson, the difficulty is that the Secretary of State has set the PFG Committee a deadline for the debate. The subgroup was granted an extension because the PFG Committee was granted a one-week extension for that debate. There is no further scope, unless the Secretary of State is prepared to delay the debate, which is intended to take place in the week beginning 11 September.

Mr McNarry: Barry McElduff is technically right in that all the reports have to be endorsed and agreed, submitted to the Business Committee and then referred to the Secretary of State to let him know the matters on which we would like a debate.

The Committee has been granted an extension — the first plenary sitting will now be on 11 September — so I am trying to factor that in. Our report will, in effect, come under the ownership of the PFG Committee. If there is an opportunity to hear the voice of young people, we should strive to do that, through the PFG Committee if necessary.

10.15 am

The Committee Clerk: We are content to speak to anyone in that area, if we can get contact details, and to obtain written submissions from them. The difficulty is producing the report in the time frame. We are open to suggestions, and we will facilitate that, wherever possible.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): Perhaps members should give that some thought. Formal proposals could be made at the next meeting on how to take that forward

Mr McNarry: I propose that we seek advice from the PFG Committee on how to deal with that, with a view to hearing the voice of the young people, which would enhance the completion of the report.

Mr McCarthy: I second that; it is important.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): Is there agreement on that?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): We have three sets of witnesses today, and we have allocated approximately 45 minutes for each set, rather than one hour. That will allow Dr Gilleece to present his research paper, which has been tabled for the end of today's evidence sessions.

We have received additional information, requested by the subgroup, from witnesses who have recently given evidence. That includes: the Industrial Task Force's submission on regional tax variations in EU countries; further papers from the SIB on investment delivery framework, roads package 2, slippage in capital projects, and estimated savings in SIB-supported projects — copies of SIB's recently published annual reports and accounts are also included for reference; an outline of the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment's (DETI) foreign direct investment (FDI) research project; a summary of research findings from the project assessing the case for enhanced research and development (R&D) tax credits in Northern Ireland; and an assessment of the economic impact of changes in the levels of inward investment.

Mr McNarry: Ivan McCabrey's submission from Mivan has not been included under the heading of "Written Submissions".

The Committee Clerk: I received it late last night.

Mr McNarry: Are members being asked to accept it?

The Committee Clerk: The subgroup requested the submission.

Mr McNarry: Yes, but are members being asked to accept Mivan's submission on this agenda?

The Committee Clerk: Yes.

Mr McNarry: I read the submission quickly. Mr McCabrey makes a point about what the Chancellor said during his visit to Belfast on 19 June. He says that he invited the Northern Ireland Business Alliance and elected politicians to produce a submission in respect of the challenges facing the economy. He went on to say that he has concerns about what we are doing. Perhaps the subgroup should tease that out, as Ivan McCabrey is nobody's fool. He has identified a couple of weaknesses in what we are doing, and we should address those. At our next meeting, we should examine his concerns in detail, because he has gone to the trouble of stating them in his letter.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): The meeting of the economic subgroup on Tuesday 15 August has been set aside for the consideration of written evidence. All written evidence, including that letter, will be probed in more detail at that meeting.

If we can move on, item 5 of the agenda is written evidence, so it follows on from the discussion we are having.

Additional written evidence has been submitted by the International Centre for Local and Regional Development, the office for innovation and enterprise at the University of Ulster, UUTech LTD, the Planning Service, Northbrook Technologies and Action Renewables. Mivan's submission has been tabled today, and the University of Ulster has referred to a report named 'The economic impact of UK higher education institutions', which has also been tabled for members' information. Both QUBIS and the Association of Northern Ireland Colleges have indicated that they cannot meet the initial deadline but may submit written views later in the month. A response from Tourism Ireland is expected later today.

Analysis of these submissions will be undertaken at next Tuesday's meeting, and in that respect it is important that members reread all the written evidence that has been submitted to date so that they are au fait with the issues and can enter into detailed discussion.

Do members wish Tuesday's meeting to be held in open or in closed session? The subgroup has already agreed to have an open session where possible. Perhaps members can indicate whether they are content for that to be the case on Tuesday.

Mr McElduff: I propose that we have an open session.

Ms Ritchie: I second that.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): Is that agreed?

Members indicated assent.

The Committee Clerk: If members are sending substitutes to the written evidence session, please make sure that they are provided with all the necessary papers. I have asked Paul Moore to present a paper on the written submissions which will summarise them and draw out the links with oral evidence. As Mr McNarry points out, written evidence is equally important, and it would be easy for us to ignore it because it is a paper hidden in a file.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): Item 6 on the agenda is press cuttings. Recent press articles relevant to the subgroup's terms of reference are included for members' consideration.

Item 7 is this morning's evidence session. Before I call the witnesses in, I remind members that we are now going into open session. There are three sets of witnesses, and each set is allocated 45 minutes. It would be helpful if members could keep their questions to witnesses brief and focused on the terms of reference.

On behalf of the subgroup, I welcome the witnesses from the Northern Ireland Tourist Board (NITB). Thank you for agreeing to attend at rather short notice.

Please ensure that your mobile phones are turned off — even in silent mode they can interfere with the recording equipment. We have 45 minutes for this session. Please keep your initial presentation to the subgroup as brief as possible, at around 10 minutes, without taking anything away from your evidence. That will allow for questions and answers at the end.

Alan Clarke, Tom McGrath and Sue Ward, I invite you to begin your presentation.

Mr Tom McGrath (Northern Ireland Tourist Board): I am Tom McGrath, chairman of NITB. I am very pleased to have this opportunity to present and discuss, and we hope to be able to answer your questions. In the interests of the economy of time, I will pass you over to Alan Clarke.

Mr Alan Clarke (Northern Ireland Tourist Board): Thank you very much for this opportunity to address the subgroup. Members have copies of our presentation, which is in PowerPoint format. I shall go through that presentation within our allotted 10 minutes.

We have divided our presentation into three areas. First, I shall give an overview of the tourism sector's performance — how that sector is currently doing. Secondly, I shall turn to key issues, which I hope will address the first two points of the subgroup's terms of reference. Thirdly, I shall make some concluding remarks, which I hope will address the third point of the subgroup's terms of reference.

Turning first to performance, slide 2 of the presentation shows the numbers of visitors to Northern Ireland. The overall trend is pretty healthy; there has been a rise from 1.5 million visitors in 1995 — which was a peak period because of the peace dividend in that year — to just short of 2 million visitors in 2005.

The third slide shows tourism revenue from visitors between 1994 and 2005. That spending creates wealth in the economy. Again, the picture is very healthy. There has been a rise from about £180 million in 1994 to £357 million in 2005. Those figures reflect out-of-state spend. We have doubled our revenue within that 12-year period. The NITB's emphasis is now on revenue.

Slide 4 shows some of the tourism performance highlights in 2005. Out-of-state spend was £357 million. Domestic spend by Northern Ireland people holidaying within the Province was £146 million, making a total spend from tourism of more than £500 million. The estimated number of jobs in the Northern Ireland tourism and leisure sector is 51,000, which is just short of 8% of all employment.

Slide 5 shows some of the key trends during 2004-05. I shall highlight some of those trends as I go through the presentation. The Great Britain market fell by 7%, and the Republic of Ireland market rose by 6%. There was very high growth in both the European and North American market, reflecting improved direct-air access. However, those markets rose from an obviously much lower base.

The bottom of slide 5 shows passenger-carrying figures. I should alert the subgroup that the passenger-carrying figures are for traffic both in and out of Northern Ireland. As part of an overall trend, that area is doing well, although sea traffic is doing less well than air traffic. That has been a trend over the last five years.

The sixth slide shows the key trends for 2004-05 in the accommodation sectors. The hotel sector is particularly buoyant at the moment. In 2005, we sold 1.4 million non-resident bed spaces, representing a rise of 13%, year on year. Six months during 2005 attained record hotel occupancies since we began keeping records in 1973. Members should bear in mind that the capacity of that sector has doubled during that time.

Slide 7 continues the commentary on the hotel sector. Hotel occupancy numbers are not the only important factor; profitability must also be considered. Results from ASM Horwath show that profit before tax and funding in the hotel sector is now bettered only by Dublin hotels. Increasing the yield, as well as the occupancy numbers, is vital. Confidence in the hotel sector is very high at the moment.

Conversely, slide 8 shows that the guesthouse and bed and breakfast (B&B) sector overall has declined over the last several years. That trend is not specific to Northern Ireland; it is also evident in the Republic and in Great Britain. That is a long-term trend. The self-catering sector is doing reasonably well, but it is less buoyant than the hotel sector.

Our indications for the current year are that the accommodation sector is doing well. There is much optimism in the industry. We carried out a tourism barometer survey in June, and confidence in the industry is very high at the moment.

I shall address some of the key issues facing the tourism sector. Slide 9 identifies seven issues, which I will address quickly, in view of the subgroup's time. I shall address one or two points on each key issue.

Slide 10 concerns strategic leadership in the tourism sector. That sector is very fragmented. Seven Government Departments have a prime interest in tourism, as do the 26 local councils. Getting everyone to focus on tourism priorities is not always easy. Our acid test is whether we can get people to focus on the signature projects that I will address in a few moments.

Resourcing is important. The subgroup is no doubt aware that the tourism sector has lost Peace II funding. The last round of European funding ended on 31 March. Less money is likely to be made available during the new round of European funding. The International Fund for Ireland (IFI), which has been very supportive of the tourism sector, has now switched its priorities towards the social economy. Tourism is on the rise, and now is the time for long-term investment. It is much better to invest when on a growth curve than beginning to invest when the industry may be on a decreasing curve.

Slide 10 mentions planning and sustainability. I will talk in more depth later about sustainability, but we must see the emergence of a new issue on how planning copes with the growth of tourism. I understand the constraints on the Planning Service, but we want it to proceed with the development of Planning Policy Statement 16 on tourism.

As tourism grows, it is important for that work to be done in order to react to where growth is coming from.

10.30 am

Private sector engagement is also important. Compared to the Republic, Northern Ireland tourism is a fairly immature industry. However, as the industry matures, it is important that the private sector has more ownership so that tourism can be driven forward.

Slide 11 deals with global competitiveness and innovation. Over the past three years, there has been a growth in low-cost air access, which brings people into Northern Ireland and also takes people out. Since the accession states joined the European Union, we are trading in a much more competitive environment. There are immense choices in our major markets, whether that be Great Britain or the Republic of Ireland, where consumers can go for short breaks, longer holidays or to conferences. The industry must start to think about that competitive world and global trading, especially where standards are concerned and in sales and marketing activities. The NITB advocates that the sector needs tourism-specific capability support. For example, our competitors in the Republic and in Scotland have specific programmes that support the tourism sector. That is a priority for Northern Ireland.

Slide 12 deals with signature projects. The subgroup is aware that the NITB has five such projects. Those capital projects are important in driving long-term tourism growth. Air access to Northern Ireland has improved dramatically over the past two years. However, that must be backed up with improved public transport because people flying in on low-cost airlines will want to use public transport.

Cities in Northern need to examine their conference facilities for the long term. Over the past five to 10 years, conference business in Belfast has been especially good. It is a high-spend business that usually happens out of season. However, in four to five years' time, new venues will come on-stream in Dublin, and Belfast will no longer be as competitive. Increasingly, conference organisers want exhibition facilities to be close to conference venues.

With regard to the rural economy, golf could achieve international standout for Northern Ireland. There is a strong private-sector interest in developing golf resorts. NITB research findings state that we should have an aspirational approach to golf tourism. Some of those projects must be realised over the next three to four years.

Slide 13 deals with skills. Although skills are not directly part of NITB's remit, we need to drive that element forward. Skills provision is hugely fragmented. Organisations and agencies such as the NITB, Invest Northern Ireland and the Department for Employment and Learning (DEL) are the prime drivers of skills development. The new UK-wide sector skills council, People 1st, is working on a human resource development strategy for the industry. It is important that those soft elements of tourism growth are given due attention and resources.

Immense progress has been made with Northern Ireland's international image. That requires more work to move Northern Ireland from its current status as a discovery destination; that status can exist only for so long. Signature projects are vital to achieving a long-term brand position.

Slide 14 deals with our closer-to-home markets, which are important to Northern Ireland tourism. The Great Britain market is important, but it is very fragile at the moment because people there have the option of low-cost air access. The market in the Republic is also important, and it is probably our sleeping giant. If the NITB had the resources, much more could be done with the Republic of Ireland market.

Sustainability is a key issue. The NITB has developed the signature projects on the basis of authenticity. Northern Ireland went through a period of plastic heritage, and the NITB is now concentrating on real heritage, which future customers will want. The Titanic/Maritime Heritage project, the Giant's Causeway, the walled city of Derry and our Christian heritage/St Patrick are centred on authenticity. Northern Ireland can achieve international standout with those projects.

The environment is a key asset in driving tourism forward. Tourism can give the economy more organic, long-term growth; it will not be here today and gone tomorrow. The growth will be slower, but long-term investment will give a long-term return.

Slide 15 deals with point 3 of the subgroup's terms of reference — an economic package/peace dividend. We have had five years of strong growth, and now is the time for long-term investment. Tourism requires investment to allow that growth curve to continue in an upward spiral. For tourism, the peace dividend has already kicked in, but there is further potential and more opportunities to be realised. In the short term, tourism projects will not always give the same direct return as other sectors of the economy.

Tourism projects must be looked at in the long term. Their wider economic benefits must be considered. The criteria by which economic projects are assessed need to have a long-term perspective.

Tourism's role in economic growth is gradually being realised, but we probably still lack the focus on tourism's contribution to the economy that they have in the Republic of Ireland, or Scotland. For example, Scotland has identified six industry groups, of which tourism is one, that will drive the future of the Scottish economy. In Northern Ireland, we do not yet have that degree of focus to identify the key industrial sectors, including tourism, that will grow the economy.

We have put most of our effort into developing infrastructure and skills. There will still be a need for direct financial intervention in the event of market failure, but if we can get the infrastructure right through our signature projects and get the skills base right, we can drive tourism growth here.

One of the signature projects that has been a success has been the walled city of Derry project. That was partly because we had dedicated funding; we were able to bid for funding from the integrated development fund to get that project up and running. We have had to put together a cocktail of funding for most of the other projects, and that takes time. I would advocate programme funding — not necessarily tourism programme funding, but economic programme funding — so that good-quality tourism projects can bid for it and get their projects moving to a much higher degree.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): I ask members to be as concise as possible, in order to allow for the maximum exchange of information.

Dr Birnie: I have three quick questions.

First, you said that profitability was improving, but still lower than in Dublin. Given our interest in corporation-tax rates, can you amplify those comments?

Secondly, it is an oft-made comparison that our tourism industry contributes perhaps 2% to our gross domestic product (GDP), compared with 6% or 7% in Scotland and the Republic of Ireland. Can you confirm the accuracy of those figures?

Finally, how is responsibility for promoting the Province as a tourist destination divided between NITB and Tourism Ireland Ltd? How does the relationship between the two organisations work? Is there duplication?

Mr A Clarke: Hotel profitability has improved in the last three years. The figures that I have given you are from the ASM Horwath annual report on the hotel sector in Northern Ireland and the Republic. Three years ago, hotel profitability was about 16%; it has since risen to 19%.

We have improved our position on the island of Ireland. Three or four years ago, hotels were only interested in getting bums on beds. They are still interested in that, but now they are interested in getting the right rate as well. They have been able to lever their rates for a mix of leisure and business tourism. In Belfast especially, conference and business tourism have been secured at a higher rate. Therefore, hotels have improved their profitability in that time. It is a sign of the industry's maturing that it focuses more on yield than on numbers.

We no longer use GDP. We went through a stage of using gross value added (GVA), and we are now doing some work on tourism satellite accounts. That work will be completed in the next couple of months. When we did use GDP, tourism's contribution to the economy was about 1.82% in Northern Ireland, about 4.4% in the Republic, about 5% in Scotland and about 7% in Wales.

Tourism Ireland's role, as set out in the Good Friday Agreement, is to market the island of Ireland, including Northern Ireland, in Great Britain and overseas. It has become the international marketing organisation for the island, so where NITB previously had overseas offices in, for example, Frankfurt and New York, Tourism Ireland now runs those offices. We have tried to switch our role much more towards complementing Tourism Ireland by getting the product right. In simple terms, NITB's role is twofold: it markets Northern Ireland on the island of Ireland, and it is geared more towards visitor experience and getting the product right.

Dr Birnie: Who markets Northern Ireland in Great Britain?

Mr A Clarke: Tourism Ireland markets Northern Ireland in Great Britain and overseas.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): I know I have been stressing brevity and conciseness, but would you mind speaking slightly more slowly, in order for Hansard to ensure that everything is included in the evidence that is collected?

Ms Ritchie: My constituency of South Down is home to two of the five signature projects in NITB's strategic framework for action: Christian Heritage/St Patrick and the Mourne National Park. I realise the importance of tourism as a principal industry in the area and the need to drive further growth in tourism, and I note Mr Clarke's reference to the need for economic programme funds. What discussions have taken place with central Government, and what further discussions are planned? What was the outcome of any discussions that have taken place on the possibility of further economic development and a regeneration package?

Mr A Clarke: In a way, no direct discussions have taken place. The five signature projects are vital to driving the long-term growth of tourism. As they are priorities, the signature projects require capital investment.

To go back to the last question: when our product is marketed internationally in an all-Ireland context, it is vital that visitors to Ireland be given reasons to travel to Northern Ireland. The five projects are designed very much to make Northern Ireland stand out internationally.

An advantage that Northern Ireland has is that the five signature projects, which could be world-class, are situated within a reasonably small geographical area. Therefore, for people who come to Northern Ireland on short holidays or to attend conferences, there are five major draws, and, on top of that, there are real reasons for visitors to spend more time and money.

Funding for the Mourne National Park and Christian Heritage/St Patrick was mentioned. NITB is seeking funding in two ways: the comprehensive spending review and European programme funds. Our initial case to the comprehensive spending review was that the tourism sector requires more investment. It has long-term growth potential, and the five signature projects are vital to achieving that. NITB believes that more money from the comprehensive spending review needs to be directed at tourism. NITB has had a first cut at identifying the resource requirements for each of the five signature projects. Our submission to Government outlined what, at this stage, we believe to be the resource requirements for each of the five signature projects.

The next round of European programme funds for 2007-13 probably links more to the Mourne National Park than to Christian Heritage/St Patrick. Obviously, through its links with the Cooley peninsula, the Mourne National Park has cross-border potential. Therefore, in its capacity to drive sustainable tourism and to develop cross-border links, NITB would like the Mourne National Park to be one of the priorities in the 2007-13 round.

Mr McNarry: These questions are on a need-to-know basis. People are concerned that the all-Ireland approach to tourism has led to Northern Ireland's losing its marketing importance. Is that approach an impediment to developing our economy? What constitutes a visitor to Northern Ireland's attractions? I was taken by the interest that you expressed in golf tourism in rural communities. Do you mean specific courses for tourists, developed by public authorities?

Mr McGrath: As regards the marketing of tourism in Northern Ireland, NITB has some concerns about Great Britain, which is a different type of market in that it tends to be segmented. Tourists from Great Britain are very aware that there are two pieces to Ireland. Sometimes NITB feels that generic marketing of the island of Ireland may not help the Northern Ireland tourism market. Mr Clarke and I sit on the board of Tourism Ireland, and we have made those comments at its meetings.

The Great Britain market is vital to Northern Ireland. Tourism Ireland's marketing strategies seem to have more success the further they are targeted from these islands. We worry, as do our colleagues in Fáilte Ireland, that only people from distinct areas of Great Britain tend to visit either Northern Ireland or the Republic. Northern Ireland successfully attracts visitors from Scotland and the north of England, while people from Birmingham, Manchester and the London area tend to visit the Republic.

Mr McNarry: There is evidence that offices in the United States do not employ people from Northern Ireland and that potential tourists who are looking for a holiday in Northern Ireland are only told about the Republic of Ireland. There is a bias, and I wonder if it has been addressed.

10.45 am

Mr McGrath: We cannot address that point, Mr McNarry. If what you are saying is true then only Tourism Ireland Ltd can address it, because it has representatives in the United States. We have no representatives there.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): Mr Clarke, would you pick up on what constitutes a visitor, and then on golf tourism?

Mr A Clarke: There are a couple of definitions. First, a "visitor" is someone who comes to Northern Ireland for any purpose. Secondly, we have three categories of "tourists" — and they must include an overnight stay. The first comprises people who are engaged in leisure — largely holiday and recreation visitors. The second comprises people who are engaged in business — and the bulk of our interest, as I said earlier, is in the conference and meetings market. The third comprises the "visiting friends and relatives" market. The last group is very important to Northern Ireland tourism; it makes up over 40% of our visitors.

Ten years ago, people whom we would term "visiting friends and relatives" did not use accommodation. Increasingly, they are now doing so, and they are spending money in restaurants and in retail outlets. They are an important sector in our economy, and they are being driven by low-cost air access. The sector is quite buoyant.

We did some work a year or so ago looking at the future of golf tourism in Northern Ireland. The top-line conclusion was that if we wanted to pursue an aspirational golf tourism strategy, we would have to realise two or three golf resorts. They would be very much geared to the visitor, and we would be likely to increase our numbers much more substantially than by trying to negotiate with golf clubs, which have to service their members as well as visitors. Experience in Scotland, Wales and the Republic of Ireland shows that Northern Ireland has a much lower proportion of golf resort developments with good-quality golf courses. Our thrust has been to try to achieve three or four of those. We have got one across the line this year, which is Castle Hume in County Fermanagh, a new hotel with a new adjoining golf course. We would like to get another one across the line — certainly through the planning and financial commitment stages — this year.

Mr McNarry: Could I recommend somewhere in Strangford?

Mr A Clarke: I am sure you could, especially if you have an investor tied to it.

Mr McNarry: We will have to work on that, Kieran.

Mr McCarthy: Ballygowan, or the Ards Peninsula.

Mr McElduff: Go raibh maith agat, a Chathaoirleach. Are there any positives accruing from Tourism Ireland's marketing of the island as one entity? There has been a lot of emphasis on competition and on things not working out. I would like to hear whether there are any positives.

If there were to be a special economic package, or peace dividend, how would it contribute to a growth in tourism and how could it be delivered?

Mr A Clarke: It has not been our intention to be negative about Tourism Ireland. It has given Northern Ireland a greater presence overseas, with regard to the number of offices. One of the biggest successes has been what we call "destination public relations", which involves getting travel writers to come here.

Ms Sue Ward (Northern Ireland Tourist Board): We work very closely with Tourism Ireland to identify travel writers and tour operators. One of the most important aspects of delivering a positive reputation for Northern Ireland is getting it into print in the travel magazines. Last year, that delivered a PR equivalent value of £10 million to Northern Ireland. It is very much a combined effort between Tourism Ireland, which gets travel writers and journalists into Northern Ireland and covers their travel costs, and NITB, which picks up the cost of looking after them on the ground and making arrangements for them while they are here. We work really closely together on that, and it is delivering very positively for us.

Mr A Clarke: Our answer on the economic package goes back to my comments on infrastructure and skills, which I feel are the two key areas. On infrastructure, it would be useful to have an economic programme to which tourism could bid for capital projects. Scottish Enterprise already operates such a programme. That would be very beneficial.

The second area on which to focus is that of skills, which, as I said, are quite fragmented. If we are to develop tourism, it is vital that we improve the skills and capabilities of our industry. We feel that we need more emphasis on tourism-specific skills and capability development. Offering a marketing programme to both tourism and people who produce widgets does not always bring the best benefits, in my view. The experiences of the Council for Education, Recruitment and Training and of Fáilte Ireland in the Republic, and of Scottish Enterprise, show that if tailored support is made available for the sector, much more growth is likely to be generated.

Mr McGrath: Another important point is that we must watch for the positive and keep the negative at bay. For example, there is a suggestion that a bed tax might be introduced in the United Kingdom. That is a worrying prospect, and it would certainly make us uncompetitive.

Ms Gildernew: I shall try to avoid being parochial, but —

Mr McNarry: That will make a change; I think that that will be a first.

Mr McElduff: You are guilty of that already.
[Laughter.]

Ms Gildernew: To what extent does the lack of political stability and the fact that the institutions are not up and running impede your attempts to boost tourism? To what extent do the lack of roads and bed spaces impede attempts to encourage tourists into the west?

Mr McGrath: In many cases, tourists do not know about the lack of political structures. Providing that there is peace, instability does not seem to affect them. If the more sophisticated hoteliers are thinking of opening new premises, they might be influenced by a particular event or headline. However, events such as the Assembly closing — and it was not open for very long — do not make much difference, particularly if there is no violence and the peace continues.

Mr Clarke mentioned the importance of transport, and we can cite many examples of tourists who have had difficulties getting around. They might have wanted to see a number of sites in different towns, but public transport is poor and the infrastructure needs to be improved. We concur with that idea.

Mr A Clarke: We conduct visitor attitude studies every couple of years, and the main negatives that come out of those — and they are small negatives in the overall satisfaction levels — are public transport, the evening and Sunday economies, and food. As I have already said, public transport will become more important because people taking low-cost flights require good public transport links.

The evening and Sunday economies are negative issues for visitors, who mention the lack of things to do in the evenings and on Sundays. Food is also listed as a negative — not so much its quality, but information about where to get local food.

Those are the three main negatives. I am talking about the visitors who come here, but the other side of the coin is people who are thinking about coming. Sue will tell you a little about the brand work that is done in the marketplace.

Ms Ward: Northern Ireland's international reputation still faces a challenge when it comes to political stability. As much as we feel that we have come a long way, our international reputation is only as good as our last newspaper headline. Every two years we carry out brand tracking in the key markets with Tourism Ireland, looking at elements such as what inspires people to go on holiday and how important those factors are to those visitors. We compare Northern Ireland to the Republic, France, Germany, the US and Canada.

Northern Ireland does very well on elements such as visitors being made to feel welcome, having plenty to see and do, and the quality of attractions and scenery. The one area where we are really left-field in comparison with everybody else is visitors' confidence in their safety and security when they get here. The destination public relations that I talked about earlier is helping to change that, but we still have a much bigger barrier than we thought we would have by this point.

In Washington DC this summer, when I mentioned to taxi drivers that I live in Northern Ireland, they said: "I do not know how you can live there with those bombs going off all the time". They still have the image of Northern Ireland as it was perhaps 10 years ago. Therefore, we have a lot of work to do. Every peaceful summer, and every year that we go through that is more stable, helps Northern Ireland to catch up with its competitors.

Dr McDonnell: Have we got the product right? What are we selling? How dependent is Northern Ireland on low-cost airlines? Have they made any difference? What happens if low-cost airlines disappear? With fuel prices through the roof, I do not envisage airlines remaining low-cost for much longer.

One of NITB's major projects is the Giant's Causeway/Antrim and Causeway Coast. I wonder about the inclusion of Antrim in that project. My impression is that the Giant's Causeway gets about 65% of the focus and the Causeway Coast about 40%, leaving 5% for Larne to Ballycastle.

Ms Gildernew: That is 105%, Alasdair. Your numbers do not add up.

Dr McDonnell: Sorry. [Laughter.]

Those figures should have been 65%, 30% and 5% respectively. There does not seem to be any significant focus on the coastal stretch from Larne to Ballycastle. Is that because it has no potential, or is there another factor?

Mr McGrath: I am glad that you raised that. I am a ratepayer in Newtownabbey, and Newtownabbey Borough Council contributes to the Causeway Coast and the Glens of Antrim. I wonder when they will come south of Larne.

Mr A Clarke: The Causeway signature project has three elements: the new visitors' centre at the Causeway; a world heritage site management plan for the UNESCO-designated site, including the stones; and the master plan.

A key thrust of the master plan is the Causeway coastal route, which runs from Belfast to Derry/Londonderry. The intention is to reinvent the Antrim coast road to run the whole way between the two cities, making the Giant's Causeway the focal point. Brown-and-white tourist information signs are being erected, but that is not enough. Facilities must be improved, including everything from more tea shops in main centres such as Carnlough or Cushendall to better lay-bys, picnic areas and accommodation across the entire route.

It was encouraging when, about four months ago, 'The Guardian' identified that coastal route as one of the five best drives in the world. It could be right up with the best in the world, if we get the product right. We are seeking funding for benchmarking with the Garden Route in South Africa to learn best practice and bring that back to the Causeway.

The intention is not to focus solely on the Causeway. We have been discussing the interpretative thrust of the new visitors' centre. It is NITB's view that, rather than simply promoting the immediate area, the centre should promote the wider area, to encourage people to go to Whitepark Bay, Carrick-a-Rede and the Glens of Antrim. By doing that, we will encourage people to stay longer and spend more.

Ms Ward: We recognise that low-cost airlines can be a double-edged sword, because they bring people out of, as well as into, Northern Ireland. However, they are working, and working well. Of the five new European routes launched by Continental Airlines last year, the Belfast route has been performing best. Earlier this summer, Continental celebrated the fact that 100,000 people had flown that route. Continental expects that, by mid-September, 50,000 Americans will have flown into Belfast. The percentage of inbound passengers from the United States is 42%, which we are pleased with.

Airlines generally consider Belfast to be the weak link in comparison with Paris, Geneva or Rome. EasyJet, which has a European perspective, wants to build the percentage of inbound passengers to 30% over three years. That target has already been achieved for some routes: Geneva, Berlin and Paris have an inbound passenger percentage of 31%; Nice and Rome are not as high, but we are working to improve those figures.

As regards long-term sustainability, Continental Airlines is pleased with its route so far. Belfast International Airport is now EasyJet's biggest airport outside London. Average employment figures have risen. The retail sector in Belfast International Airport has greatly increased in the past two years, mainly as a result of improved international access. Airlines and airports are positive about that.

Low-cost airlines do deliver. They may bring more people out of Northern Ireland, but they open up Northern Ireland to so many more destinations. In the past, people would not consider Northern Ireland as a possible short-break destination because it took half a day, and two flights, to get here.

We are really pleased to have that excellent opening. Remember that last year our European visitor numbers increased by 32%, and our US numbers by 20%. That is a positive factor.

Mr A Clarke: You asked about what NITB is selling and whether the product is right. Under our framework, we have five winning themes. The first is short breaks — short-stay visits now make up much more of our market; the second is business tourism, which involves business conferences and meetings; the third is activities; the fourth is culture and heritage; and, finally, events. Culture and heritage is one of our most distinctive attractors, and all five signature projects are culture and heritage projects. NITB's involvement in the Smithsonian Folklife Festival 2007 in Washington DC is a big opportunity for us.

The five themes are not separate; they are inter-linked in many ways. For example, people on a short break often want to explore the culture and heritage of the area that they are visiting, or they may be visiting to attend a particular event. Therefore, the interlinking and integration of those five themes work to create the product that we sell.

Has NITB got the product right? Our visitor attitude surveys show that there are high levels of visitor satisfaction. I have already outlined the negative areas, so obviously the product is not right. However, it is important to be aware that the international marketplace is fast changing, and we must keep ahead of customer demands. Work must be undertaken to develop the evening economy, to create better-quality accommodation, and to ensure that it is easy and convenient to book trips to Northern Ireland. We must get those things right in order to move forward.

11.00 am

Mr Newton: The skills issue was skipped over very quickly this morning, although you later commented that it was a vital area. If the industry does not have the right skills, it may attract first-time visitors, but they will not come back again. The comment was made that NITB does not necessarily have responsibility for that area, and I accept that. However, someone must grab this issue and adopt a holistic approach that includes both educational and vocational skills. Some kind of strategy must be devised. I would welcome your comments on that.

Mr A Clarke: That is a very perceptive question, if I may say so. Skills is a vital issue. In many ways, the skills issue has the potential to become tourism's Achilles heel. It is pointless putting hard investment into the signature projects unless we have the necessary customer service and skills to support them.

NITB does not have lead responsibility for skills; it is the responsibility of the Department for Employment and Learning (DEL). That responsibility was initially exercised through Tourism Training Trust Northern Ireland. Its funding ran out at the end of July 2006, and People 1st has now taken it on. People 1st is a new UK-wide sector skills council for tourism, travel and hospitality. However, there must be a merging of the future plans of People 1st, the Tourist Board, Invest NI and the private sector.

To answer the question, People 1st is an opportunity that must be made to work, and that requires proper resourcing from DEL and proper delivery mechanisms. The first stage is to get the strategy under way, to get people to agree on it, and, most importantly, to get the industry to buy into it so that it actually meets its needs and requirements. However, further resources will also be needed for the delivery of the final strategy.

Mr Newton: People 1st is a very undermanned organisation, and it receives project funding, as opposed to core funding, from Government. A strategy needs to be driven by an organisation that is properly funded and resourced, otherwise it will not be effective.

Mr A Clarke: That is absolutely right. A strategy must be driven by a properly resourced lead organisation — it does not really matter whether that organisation is People 1st or NITB, as long as the organisation that takes ownership of the issue is properly resourced to deliver on it. That is a crucial point.

Lord Morrow: I would like to ask about a few issues that I am slightly concerned that I did not hear mentioned, although I may have just missed any reference to them.

Fermanagh is perceived to be the tourism county of Northern Ireland, but I am unaware of any long- or short-term venture there. Is there potential for further exploitation and development in Fermanagh? That county is the gateway from the Irish Republic to Northern Ireland, and tourism from the Irish Republic has increased by 6%. Ms Ward said that when she goes to New York, the first question that people ask is how she can live in such an awful place with bombs exploding every day. However, tourism from America has increased by 20%, while the number of tourists from the Irish Republic, where people know that bombs are no longer going off, has increased by only 6%. That is a contradiction.

Fermanagh has the best fishing potential in Europe. Fishing is the largest participation sport in the United Kingdom. There are two fishermen for every football fan who attends a match on a Saturday, and that has not been exploited to its full potential.

Tom, I think that you said that no one noticed whether the Assembly was up and running, but I may have accidentally misquoted you. Will you comment on that? I am sure that you will agree that the scenes in Newry this week will not make your job much easier. In fact, they will make it infinitely more difficult. We can well do without those sorts of problems.

Do you have any figures for tourists visiting Northern Ireland from destinations such as Malaga and Nice?

Mr McGrath: Tourists from outside Ireland are unaware of the political situation in Northern Ireland, unless reports of violence appear in the national and international press. That is when people have a reaction to Northern Ireland. Tourists may not understand our institutions, but they understand the reports of violence when the international press picks up on them.

I attended the prize distribution at an international angling competition in Fermanagh this year, so I can confirm that there is a wealth of interest in fishing. There was great attendance, and folk from many parts of Europe participated, particularly from Great Britain.

Mr Clarke: Tourism in Fermanagh has gone through a difficult period in the past five years. Fermanagh remained fairly static while tourism in Northern Ireland increased by 44%. Angling has not increased in recent years because there is now more competition.

Cruising was heavily reliant on the German and Swiss markets, but they have gone through a difficult period economically. However, in recent months, the Tourist Board has worked with the local council and the private sector to create a new strategy entitled 'Destination Fermanagh — A new vision for tourism in Fermanagh' to try to take Fermanagh's tourism forward. It is a wide-ranging document, which examines not only the promotion of Fermanagh and product development, but the infrastructure required to succeed. The Tourist Board submitted resource bids during the comprehensive spending review and during the new round of European funding for 'Destination Fermanagh', because it needs that new approach to which you referred.

Ms Ward: We do not pay much attention to the figures for Malaga and Alicante, because they are mainly outbound holiday routes. However, I will read our estimated figures from graphs for the routes that we support through air-route development. Forgive me if they are not 100% accurate. An average of 4,000 people a month fly into Northern Ireland from Paris. They have booked their flights in Paris, so that figure does not include outbound passengers. About 1,700 people per month fly into Northern Ireland from Berlin; 1,800 from Nice; 2,000 from Rome; and 2,000 from Geneva.

The Berlin route delivers good inbound percentages, but there are only four flights per week. NITB is pushing Easyjet on that, and the airline is considering increasing the number of flights to seven per week. The figures that I have just given are the numbers of inbound tourists per month from those destinations.

Lord Morrow: If New Yorkers are asking how you can live in such a dreadful place, why is the number of Americans visiting Northern Ireland up by 20%, while the number of visitors from the Republic of Ireland is only up by 6%?

Ms Ward: That 20% increase demonstrates the potential of the United States. Tourism Ireland is doing good work for us in New York, and the introduction of direct flights has made a big difference.

NITB recognises that the Republic of Ireland market provides a challenge. One of the things that we are doing this year — and terms of reference will be with us in two weeks' time — is a review of our marketing in the Republic of Ireland, where there is huge potential.

There is huge competition for visitors from the Republic of Ireland, as they have a huge number of flights available to them. There are 16,000 seats on flights to Northern Ireland on sale in Europe, whereas the Republic of Ireland has 20,000 seats on the Poland-Dublin route alone — more than to Northern Ireland from the whole of Europe. There is huge competition for the Republic of Ireland euro, but we are investigating and reviewing what we need to do to change that. We realise that we are only hitting the tip of the iceberg in relation to visitors from the Republic of Ireland.

Mr McCarthy: We have been all around Northern Ireland, so it would be remiss of me not to draw attention to one of the best assets in Northern Ireland, Strangford Lough, which is in my constituency. NITB does not seem to have much planned for Strangford Lough. Fishing was mentioned earlier, but can you suggest anything to the subgroup to rectify or improve the situation in the wider area of Strangford Lough and the Irish Sea coast and to bring some prosperity to it?

Dr McDonnell: I thought that Mr McCarthy was one of the assets.

Lord Morrow: I thought that he was the asset.

Mr Clarke: The Christian Heritage/St Patrick signature project spills into the Ards Peninsula, and it will be included in that overall initiative.

We are trying to develop the Causeway coastal route, which was mentioned earlier, to link with the St Patrick route and, in due course, into the Mourne. We are looking at a programme of strategic routes throughout Northern Ireland to integrate the signature projects and link them all together.

There is a working group around Strangford, which we feed into, but our main vehicle in the area is the Armagh Down Tourism Partnership, which has developed a business plan for tourism. Again, the key issue in taking that forward is to ensure that the resources are available to implement the plan.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): Do you have any views on fiscal incentives that might help to develop tourism within Northern Ireland?

Mr Clarke: Accommodation grants are currently administered through Invest Northern Ireland. NITB has an annual budget of about £1.5 million for visitor amenities. We have tried to use that money to create momentum for the signature projects. For example, this year a sizeable chunk of the tourism development scheme budget will go into the Thompson Dock development to create some momentum on the Titanic project.

In relation to market failure, NITB is beginning to examine what public-sector intervention is required to take tourism forward. Direct intervention in certain locations will still be needed. Those locations may differ from the current priorities, but the largest fiscal incentives must relate to programme budgeting for the major capital projects such as Titanic, the Giant's Causeway and the coastal route.

Also, picking up on Mr Newton's point, there must be more investment in the skills side, and that requires proper resourcing. The key infrastructure and skills must be right in order to give the private sector a much better playing field on which to compete.

Mr McGrath: Fiscal incentives might help the indigenous population to be a bit more entrepreneurial and the folk who are already in the tourist industry to expand their businesses. I have often felt that if some advantage were given, some folk might advance. The feeling is that people come in from abroad and get the grants; that point has been made to us by a number of people in the hospitality trade. They would like some special incentive to help them increase their facilities.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): Thank you for your very detailed and useful presentation.

Mr Clarke: Thank you.

11.15 am

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): The next submission will be from Mr Victor Hewitt of the Economic Research Institute of Northern Ireland (ERINI). Thank you, Mr Hewitt, for attending at short notice. I must remind everyone to completely turn off mobile phones, as they interfere with the recording equipment. We have about 45 minutes; normally we allow 10 minutes for the presentation and the remainder for questions from members. We would appreciate it if you could be brief, without detracting from the evidence you present.

Mr Victor Hewitt (Economic Research Institute of Northern Ireland): Thank you. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to the subgroup. I preface my remarks by saying that the ERINI board has not met to discuss this, so my remarks should not be taken to reflect the views of every board member.

You have posed three questions: what are the obstacles to economic growth; what are the opportunities for, and effects of, fiscal incentives; and what might a financial package involve? I will try to structure my submission around those questions.

I am sure that you have heard a lot of information about the economy, so I will not labour the basics. On the surface, the economy has been doing quite well since the 1990s. We have had fairly steady growth, as measured by gross value added per head. Employment has reached an all-time high with the creation of well over 100,000 jobs. Unemployment on the official measure has dropped below the radar compared to that of previous decades.

On the downside, economic inactivity remains a significant issue. It is ahead of any other region of the UK by at least seven percentage points; that, due to ill health, is 50% higher than in the rest of the UK and 300% higher than in the Republic of Ireland.

That is the surface picture. I have tried to probe beneath that to explore how the economy works in Northern Ireland. The obvious starting point is to think of the economy as a miniature national economy. That is not an appropriate vehicle, however. Instead I have focused on a balance-of-payments approach to the regional economy. That is not normally brought out, but if you consider the economy in those terms, it is fairly clear that Northern Ireland has a standard of living considerably in advance of what the market economy can sustain. In other words, we import a great deal more than we generate in exports to pay for those imports.

If this were an independent country, a number of things would follow from that. First would be rapid depreciation of the exchange rate to bring the trade balance into line. That cannot happen, because Northern Ireland is part of the monetary union of the UK — and potentially that of the European Union — so the exchange rate is more or less fixed.

Secondly, if prices could not be adjusted, unemployment would rise very rapidly in order to reduce the amount of consumption in the economy. That is not happening because a mechanism is available to finance the balance-of-payments deficit — to pay for the excess of imports over exports. That mechanism is, of course, fiscal transfers, which support wages and jobs in the public sector and sometimes support direct transfers to individuals through the benefits system. Those transfers are then used to support the purchases of goods and services, including imports. As long as that fiscal-transfer mechanism is available, the balance of payments will be financed and we can continue as normal.

A question arises about the effect of fiscal transfer on economic activity. There is also an interesting question about the relative size of the public sector, which is very large in Northern Ireland. I have tried to raise a matter that is not often addressed, namely that it is not only the amount of public expenditure that is important, but where that expenditure goes.

Public expenditure can be thought of as supporting a spectrum of spending. At one end is consumption. For example, benefits are paid to recipients that support their standard of living. Likewise, the payment of wages to public servants supports their standard of living. Investment lies at the other end of the spectrum. Obvious areas for investment include roads, etc, but some expenditure has a dual character. For example, the payment of teachers supports their level of consumption and standard of living. However, the product of teachers is education, which is an investment in the future.

Given the existence of that spectrum in public expenditure, what is the balance within that spectrum that is best for the future development of the economy? The evidence on that is quite interesting, and it does not come from Northern Ireland, but from Italy, where the south of that country has remained very poor for generations in comparison with the north. That situation also applies to Sicily, to take an island situation. Until the 1970s, the investment from the north of Italy to the south went into investment, supporting the building of infrastructure, etc. That investment then began to shift towards supporting incomes. Until that happened, evidence appears to show that the south was closing the gap with the north. Since income support took over from investment, that gap has more or less remained unchanged.

A similar phenomenon occurred when East and West Germany reunified. After the Berlin Wall came down, the German Government made a conscious decision to support incomes in the east, rather than investment. The east has lagged considerably behind the west ever since. That shows an important issue concerning the use of the funds obtained by the Government.

Productivity is at the centre of the performance of the economy. The evidence on that is a bit discouraging. I said that we had created more than 100,000 jobs, which is a much bigger rise, proportionately, than anywhere else in the UK. Did the creation of those jobs close the gross-value-added-per-head gap with the rest of the UK? The answer is no.

While we have increased the level of employment, the jobs that we have created have, on average, probably had a lower gross-value-added level than jobs that were created elsewhere in the UK. Therefore, the gap has not been closing. That gap was closing between 1990 and 1996, but, thereafter, it has remained static. That raises concern because the stated policy of the Government was:

“To encourage the development of a high value added, innovative, enterprising and competitive economy leading to greater wealth creation and job opportunities for all.”

Job opportunities have been created, and some of those policy objectives have been met, but we have actually been creating relatively low-value-added, low-productivity and relatively low-skilled jobs. That is what an examination of overall productivity appears to indicate.

Why is productivity different? There are a number of matters to consider, the first of which is industrial structure. If there are many industries that are traditionally relatively low in productivity, that will pull the productivity average down. That appears to be the case in Northern Ireland, where productivity is pulled down by about 3·5%. Another important question is whether the national economy — the one to which the local economy is most closely attached — is growing. That is a very important factor. If we had had the same economic structure as the UK average, we would have grown by 14% from 1995 to 2002.

There are other catch-all factors, which can be attributed to local characteristics, such as location, transport costs etc. There is also what the Department of Finance and Personnel (DFP) describes as the “four drivers”, factors such as skills and R&D innovation. Also, the size of the public sector in Northern Ireland is unique. Once those factors are taken into consideration, it is only the growth of the UK and world economies that can push up productivity. Structural factors and other issues pull back productivity. When these other factors are taken into account, the 14% national growth factor comes down to a productivity increase of about 6%.

Over the years, Northern Ireland has made enormous efforts to push up indigenous productivity by spending billions of pounds. From a historical perspective, that is a long, slow process. I shall use an analogy: an orchard can be grown from planting a handful of seeds, but there will not be a harvest for a very long time. Are there any short cuts? The obvious answer is yes. Instead of growing the trees from seeds, the trees are brought in and planted so that the harvest comes sooner. In my analogy, the trees being brought in equals FDI. Northern Ireland has been trying to do that since the early 1960s. We were relatively successful in the early years, but then FDI tailed off; our local difficulties did not make that situation any easier.

The reason that FDI should be brought in is neatly encapsulated by a simple figure: productivity rates in foreign-owned firms are about twice the productivity rates of indigenously owned firms. In the Republic the figure is 4:1, but that is inflated somewhat by an accounting methodology in which profits are moved around to take advantage of the Republic's incentive structure, which is corporation tax. A-list companies that have high productivity rates are tremendous catches. They usually embed themselves in the local economy, establish supply chains and have R&D departments. Those A-list companies drive up productivity simply by pushing up the average, and they also drive up the productivity of firms working with them.

Even if C-list companies come in, they at least capture the gross value added, which represents the wage payments to the employees, even if they have no R&D facilities or do not make connections with the rest of the economy. When consideration is being given to bringing these firms in, this ratio is useful: how much will be paid in grants relative to what might be returned? With regard to C-list firms, if the grants amount to a high proportion of the wages bill, it is a less attractive proposition.

As far as fiscal incentives are concerned, Northern Ireland has traditionally used grants and, sometimes, loans and shares. Grants have been awarded through selective financial assistance schemes and other schemes such as the company development scheme, which supplements selective financial assistance. Elsewhere, tax breaks are used, but there is a fundamental difference between those two instruments. Grants can change companies' input behaviours. Grants are given for capital so that companies invest more. Grants are given for training so that companies do more training. Grants are awarded because there is a belief that the firms are not investing and training enough and that if they did more, they would increase their output. Tax breaks can be used for that purpose; the R&D tax credit is used in that way.

However, the main instrument is corporation tax, which is a different animal because it dangles a carrot in front of firms. The companies are not being told what to do and how to do it; instead they are told that if they succeed and are profitable, they will keep more of their profit than they would elsewhere. That is the game that the Republic has played for a very long time. Low corporation tax did not start in the 1990s; it goes back to the 1950s. At that time, corporation tax of 10% was levied on the profits of exporting firms. The European Commission ruled that that was illegal and that tax was extended to all firms eventually, but the Republic has been at that business for a long time.

11.30 am

The Republic of Ireland is probably embedded with companies to a greater degree than we are, and, as a result, it has focused on what really is important to companies — the bottom line. Companies tell us all sorts of stories, but what they are really interested in is making profit. If one has the mindset to understand how they make profit, one has a head start when it comes to trying to encourage them.

Corporation tax is an important instrument. To try to reduce it in Northern Ireland throws up many practical difficulties. None of those difficulties is insuperable, but, equally, none of them is without cost. An ideal situation for Northern Ireland would be for the Chancellor to agree to Northern Ireland having a different corporation-tax regime, with everything else remaining the same. That is probably overly optimistic. The Chancellor is unlikely to allow Northern Ireland to have a grant regime alongside a tax-break regime, which, at the same time, is disruptive for the rest of the UK.

A more likely scenario is that corporation tax will become a localised tax in Northern Ireland, as is the case with rates. We would keep the proceeds from the corporation tax, but the price that we might have to pay for that up front would be that the initial proceeds from the corporation tax would be taken off the block grant. If £500 million were paid in corporation tax in Northern Ireland, we would lose £500 million from the block grant straight away, and year after year. In return, we would keep whatever was raised from corporation tax. The gamble is that, by reducing corporation tax, we would encourage companies to pay more in the longer term than we are losing from the block grant up front. That is one scenario, and a likely one. One would like to think that other options are possible, but, based on our experience of the Treasury while working in the DFP, it is never that simple.

I have mentioned, among other things, effective marginal tax rates and effective average tax rates, and I am happy to talk about those.

What puzzles me most was the financial package. The size of the financial package is non-specified, but I am sure that members want a lump sum to be divided among various activities. We have received a number of financial packages. In 1998, the Chancellor unveiled a package, the Chancellor's initiative, which was worth £315 million. That put money into, for example, first-year capital allowances and the science park, and it paid for training programmes. Unfortunately, however, I can find no overall analysis of the Chancellor's initiative. Those projects were all carried out individually, but no one appears to have looked at the overall impact of how that money was spent. If one does not know what happened with the money that one received previously, one's case for asking for more is rather weakened.

There are two elements to the reinvestment and reform initiative (RRI) that was launched in 2002. First, I do not count that as a financial package, because the Northern Ireland ratepayers must pay back what was borrowed, with interest. In fact, the borrowing mechanism is a method of trying to close the gap between what is paid by council-tax payers in the rest of the UK and ratepayers in Northern Ireland. Borrowing can only be accessed if that gap is closed. That is possibly not well known.

Secondly, the control of security sites was transferred. Some of those sites were made available to be sold off for housing. Some of them have been taken on as investment opportunities. Ilex, the urban regeneration company in Derry, is attempting to develop the various barracks there. There are developments at the former sites of the Maze Prison and Crumlin Road Prison. Projects, however, have been quite slow to get off the ground from what I can see, and, in some instances, there have been serious internal difficulties. Therefore, the jury is still out on the RRI.

If a financial package were allocated, on what could it be spent? My suggestion is that some of it could, in effect, be used to oil the wheels of change in the public expenditure system. If funding is taken from one programme and given to another, there are howls of protest. However, if that process could be smoothed to make the transition more orderly, it could potentially multiply the power of any additional funding.

The second issue is to focus more on investment than consumption. If the consumption route is chosen, it creates a constituency for resource, and when the resource runs out, the constituency remains, which generates a lot of pressure. The European peace programme is a classic example of that. Its funding allocations were quite large to begin with; they are becoming quite small. However, in the meantime, infrastructures have been created, which are being inherited.

I have probably talked for long enough, so I am happy to take questions.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): Thank you. Members have submitted a long list of questions, so I remind them to be as concise as possible to allow all members to ask their questions.

Mr Newton: There are three issues on which I would like you to comment, the first of which is the impediments to the economy. On page 8 of your submission you refer to Prof Harris's research on R&D, saying that:

"The basic problem is traced to the low R&D base among firms in the region and hence a fundamental lack of capacity to undertake such work."

The Northern Ireland economy has a strong SME base and, as I understand it, the manufacturing sector has declined to approximately 90,000 people. Without proper R&D and the development of higher-value-added products, it is likely to decline even further. How can we encourage more indigenous companies to invest in R&D?

Secondly, the failure of DEL's Jobskills strategy was mentioned. If my reading is right, its potential replacement will be delivered heavily through what are being referred to as sector skills councils, none of which have core funding. They are dependent on project funding and are fairly low-level resourced bodies.

The third issue is the disparate nature of the Northern Ireland Departments. For example, Invest Northern Ireland has its responsibilities, DEL has its responsibilities and so on. There is a lack of synergy and joined-up thinking between the Departments.

I welcome your comments on those three areas.

Mr Hewitt: I will try to be brief. I have a copy of Prof Harris's report, which I will leave for members to peruse at their leisure. It is a technical report, but the essential message is that R&D activity would be increased if the relevant tax credits were doubled or tripled. However, R&D takes a long time to feed its way through and can be relatively modest in its overall effect. The reason for that is that very few companies commission R&D. In Northern Ireland, there are only five, or even fewer, major players in the R&D market. I will not mention names, but it is not difficult to identify them. In smaller companies, R&D often means redesigning a milk bottle every five years. That is not a serious assault on R&D.

I am sceptical about heavy grant regimes for R&D. Probably the most effective way to involve companies in R&D is to get them to engage with people who can show them its benefits, be that other companies or, more specifically, local universities. One reason why I suggested that a financial package could be used to boost the university sector is that, although higher education R&D is relatively healthy in Northern Ireland, it is not expanding as much as it could.

Carrots such as grants and tax credits can certainly be offered. Interestingly, the survey shows that local companies are much more interested in grants than tax credits, because they are paid up front and remove some of the risk. Tax credits are only available if profit is made or expenditure is incurred.

I am not particularly specialised in the Jobskills programme. However, ERINI is heavily engaged with DEL in supporting research on the skills base for the economy. Those structures have yet to bed down. We reflect the situation in England, which is not always necessarily a good thing. It would sometimes be better to strike out on our own and tailor things to our requirements. I do not have much to say on that, although I can provide the subgroup with a supplementary note.

Politics plays a large role. The number of Departments was increased from six to eleven, not for efficiency reasons but for political reasons, which led to some very difficult co-ordination issues. For example, the Department of Finance and Personnel (DFP) was undisputedly the primary finance Department under direct rule. After devolution, DFP was effectively shadowed by the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister (OFMDFM), with a joint approach to budgeting and so on during those years. That was not a particularly efficient use of resources, but it was politically necessary.

I am most worried about the lack of a co-ordinating mechanism within Government for economic issues. The Economic Development Forum (EDF) does good work but, to be frank, policy cannot be discussed and developed in a quasi-public forum. Some matters must be discussed within Government, and there is no mechanism for that at the moment.

The economic steering group was a co-ordinating mechanism for under-secretaries and permanent secretaries of Departments with an economic interest. That was quite a useful vehicle, because new initiatives could be discussed without the immediate assumption that they would happen, which tends to be the case when things are placed in the public domain. That group became moribund. A corresponding social steering group was also very active and helpful, but, again, that group became moribund. It might not be a bad idea to re-establish some of those co-ordinating vehicles within Government.

Dr McDonnell: Could I just tease that out?

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): You will have to be brief, because we have a long list of questions.

Dr McDonnell: Surely the role of OFMDFM was to do exactly what you were talking about.

Mr Hewitt: The economic policy unit within OFMDFM was established at the outset of devolution. Its remit was to stand back from the day-to-day business of Government to concentrate on longer-term thinking and co-ordination, especially in relation to the economy. However, the unit tended to pick up work on which other sections did not have a particular handle.

11.45 am

Much business was transacted through the economic policy unit, which involved, in the short term, answering questions from your good selves in the Assembly, rather than concentrating on the long-term development of the economy. The economic policy unit was also the principal vehicle shadowing DFP on finance.

Mr Newton: I would welcome the supplementary paper to which Mr Hewitt referred.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): I have added it to the list of matters to be addressed in the summing up.

Lord Morrow: Mr Hewitt, in your submission you said that:

“DETI has the objective ‘to encourage the development of a high value added, innovative, enterprising and competitive economy leading to greater wealth creation and job opportunities for all’.”

That is a noble and commendable mission statement. However, you paint a very gloomy picture of economic inactivity:

“Part of the explanation for this is the higher proportion of students in Northern Ireland ... Very much more worrying, however, is the proportion of the inactive due to sickness or disability ... The Northern Ireland figure is 50 per cent higher than for the UK as a whole and an astonishing 300 per cent higher than in the Republic of Ireland.”

Those are some frightening figures. That obviously must be tackled if we are to have a thriving and competitive economy. Do you have any ideas about how to do that? Do you have any ideas as to why there are more sick people in Northern Ireland than in the Irish Republic or in the rest of the United Kingdom? Is that sickness confined to one area of Northern Ireland — are more people sick in the east than in the west, or vice versa? If so, something must be going on in those regions that we do not know about.

Dr McDonnell: It is you they are sick of. [Laughter.]

Ms Gildernew: Hear, hear.

Lord Morrow: I will ignore Alasdair McDonnell's remarks.

You also said that:

“The first thing to note is that the standard of living in Northern Ireland far exceeds what the market sector of the economy could alone sustain.”

You are obviously telling us that we are living far above our means. That must be frightening because, if I read the situation correctly, the bubble will burst one day, and our dilemma will be worse than ever. Furthermore, you tell us that:

“Since 1996 over 110,000 new jobs have been created, an increase of almost 20 per cent compared to 12 per cent for the UK. Employment at approximately 700,000 is at an all time high.”

Yet, our sickness rate is the highest in the UK and is 300% higher than in the Republic of Ireland. Is there a contradiction in that?

Mr Hewitt: Economic inactivity is a concern. I mentioned that unemployment rates have dropped. Long-term unemployment, which means being unemployed for longer than one year, is a dimension of joblessness that has always been higher here. To some extent, the long-term unemployed have migrated to receiving disability payments of one sort or another. Indeed, there was a policy, although I would not call it deliberate, that, at least for presentational purposes, during some phases people were encouraged to move off certain registers and on to receiving other benefits.

I am not particularly concerned about the student element of economic inactivity, because I hope that students are an investment in the future and will get a job at some stage in their lives — I certainly hope that for my own.

However, the sickness element is a considerable concern. If the overall general health of the population is increasing, why are we experiencing an outbreak of disability? At some stages, 1,000 people a week were becoming disabled. That is partly due to migration from one benefit to another. Jobseeker's allowance is a difficult benefit to get and sustain, because there are a lot of things for recipients to do and applications for them to fill in. They are seen regularly, and there is every incentive for them to get off that benefit and get on to one that is a bit more stable, where they are seen once a month or every three months rather than once a fortnight. Therefore, there is a combination of incentives.

Immigration into Northern Ireland, especially from eastern Europe, is an interesting phenomenon that has not been commented on much. Anecdotal evidence that can be gathered by simply going round stores and restaurants and so on shows that a lot of people from eastern Europe are coming in and taking jobs that are at the bottom end of the market — filling supermarket shelves, working as waiters, working in the food factories in mid-Ulster.

Why are those people coming here and taking those jobs? Why are local people who are coming off disability living allowance or jobseeker's allowance not filling those posts? The answer is that the difference between what people can claim in benefits and what they can earn in employment is a considerable disincentive to employment. Those benefits are not available to people who come from eastern Europe, at least for their first year here. Therefore, a labour-market experiment is going on, which we should study carefully and learn lessons from.

Lord Morrow: Do you think that the medical profession has a role to play?

Mr Hewitt: That may be so. I do not wish to cast aspersions on that profession. [Laughter.]

Dr McDonnell: Good man.

Mr Hewitt: However, I am sure that others who are better qualified will speak on that matter. Many GPs come under pressure from their patients.

Dr McDonnell: The medical profession will have a role in extracting some of the poison and vitriol out of the political system.

Lord Morrow: They have not been very successful to date. [Laughter.]

Mr Neeson: I am interested in your remarks about the jobs that have been created in recent years, and the fact that they are not creating more gross value added. Is that a criticism of the development of jobs in the service sector, which seems to be growing at present? Why do you think productivity is greater in foreign firms than in indigenous firms?

Mr Hewitt: Overall figures show that jobs that have been created are creating added gross value. However, they do not create as much as jobs in the rest of the UK. The productivity gap between Northern Ireland and the rest of the UK is now static. It rose from about 75% per capita to about 81% or 82%, but thereafter it has been static. I do not denigrate those jobs in any way, but they are not the type of jobs that are capable of closing that gap, if that is an objective. Many of those jobs are in the retail sector. The companies that have come into the retailing sector are big, and they are adept in their labour practices.

When supermarkets hire employees, they tend not to provide full-time jobs. They provide part-time jobs, up to a certain number of hours in a period. The reason for that is that if they employ a person for more than a set number of hours, they incur National Insurance costs. They are clever about balancing their books. Jobs are being created, but not necessarily full-time jobs. We are talking about headcounts. One would like to see new jobs that generate above-average gross-value-added levels and close the gap between Northern Ireland and the rest of the UK. Those jobs do, at least, provide employment for people, but they are not the way forward, and do not promote dramatic growth in the Northern Ireland economy.

Mr Neeson: Why is productivity greater for foreign companies rather than for indigenous firms?

Mr Hewitt: That is not surprising. Foreign-owned companies tend to be engaged in exports. They operate in a competitive environment and there are competitive pressures on them all the time. They survive in those competitive export markets only by becoming efficient. Local firms are often not export-orientated, and their markets are local. Local firms are not subjected to the same competitive pressures.

Mr Neeson: Large indigenous companies, such as Wrightbus Ltd, depend on exports. William Wright appeared before the subgroup on Tuesday 8 August.

Mr Hewitt: Not all indigenous companies are of below average competitiveness. It is a numbers game. There will be some, but there are not enough of them. It is the tail that falls below the average that tends to pull the average down. Those are the smaller companies that are probably not engaging in as much competition with their peers as would be desirable.

Dr Birnie: I have two questions.

First, we are faced with a choice between tax credits and corporation tax. At least, we can choose what to ask for; the decision on whether to grant either lies with others. Can you expand on the arguments for and against those two fiscal instruments?

My second question is about the negative effects of the subvention. If we allow that they do exist, do you agree that there is a transition problem? If it is true that those sort of soft budget constraints lead to efficiency problems arising as a result of the bias towards spending for consumption rather than for investment, then the policy recommendation is not necessarily clear. Cutting consumption will create a negative demand effect in the short run, which will reduce income and employment. So we are on the horns of a dilemma. How do you make the transition?

Mr Hewitt: I will deal first with the question about corporation tax and the tax credits for various activities. I try to make a distinction between incentives that target inputs into firms' production processes — such as R&D, skills, marketing strategies, capital investment, and so on — and other incentives.

The so-called market failure argument is that a firm, left to its own devices, will not engage in as much of those sorts of activities as is socially optimal. From the firm's perspective, it might be doing exactly what it thinks it should be doing. It often thinks that it is taking the right approach and making sufficient investments, so it is difficult to persuade it that, from society's point of view, it is not doing enough. It is not isolated, so its actions cause a spillover.

Putting that argument across to firms can be quite difficult. It asks them to do things that, from their perspective, are suboptimal, but which, from society's point of view, are optimal — in other words, they are being asked to spend more than they normally would.

I will use the analogy of pushing on a piece of string. Pressure is being placed on the end of the string in the hope that the front will advance. More emphasis is being placed on the inputs. Firms are employing more people and carrying out more R&D. They are not doing that for its own sake; they are doing that so that additional output will flow at the other end.

The corporation tax is, in a sense, the reverse of that. It is pulling the string from the other end. It dangles a carrot in front of businesses and says: "You make the profit; you keep it." It does not tell businesses how to make a profit, simply that if they do make it, instead of paying 30% tax, they will pay just 12.5%. That is a big incentive for companies to increase their output.

However, I need to introduce a caveat. The corporation tax is not just about encouraging companies to produce more. As I said, companies are clever entities. They will obviously attempt to move as much of their profit as possible from wherever it is in the world to the area with the lowest tax rate. That is, of course, what is happening in the Republic. Some colleagues would call that economic development by tax scam. Companies will attempt, through various transfer-pricing mechanisms, to make it appear that they are making most of their profits in the Republic. They pay 12.5% corporation tax there, whereas if they paid tax in the countries in which they were really making profits, they might be paying 30% or more.

12.00 noon

The other factor is that this is not just a matter of the tax system in the country that is giving the incentives; it is also a matter of the tax system in the company's country of origin. The United States tax system allows companies not to pay corporation tax until they repatriate monies to the United States from earnings made around the world. However, companies do not repatriate those monies — they attempt to use them for further investment outside the United States.

There was an amnesty on that, and so much money, which had been held outside the United States, flowed back that it has probably held up the dollar for the past few years. Tax is a difficult issue. You are hunting big game, and you need the correct instruments to hunt big game, because they have sharp teeth.

We can have almost ideological discussions about the public sector: public sector good, private sector bad, or vice versa. However, that takes our eyes off the ball. The private sector is not growing fast enough, but, if it did, it would generate income and wealth, and taxes would be paid on that. As a result, the fiscal deficit would automatically reduce.

Dr Birnie asked whether the large public sector is a drag on the private sector and how resources can be transferred from the public sector to the private sector. That is a difficult question, because public expenditure and resources tend to have a ratchet effect — once you move up, it is difficult to move back down. An obvious solution is to limit the growth of, rather than cut, the public sector. That will happen in the next spending review. Public expenditure has been outstripping the growth in the economy, and it cannot continue at that pace.

Some things will happen automatically, and others will require a rethink about public expenditure priorities and what we really want for Northern Ireland. Currently, a confused morass of priorities is packaged together, with a spin put on it that it is a coherent package. The investment strategy is an example of that. The Republic wants its current success to continue and will do things to reinforce that success. Here, an amalgamation of Departments' wish lists is packaged together as a strategy.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): Thank you. We have kept to time thus far, with the exception of the closed session at the beginning. However, we are now running into the time allotted for the Northern Ireland Council for Voluntary Action (NICVA). Are members willing to extend this evidence session to allow the last four questions to be taken, if they are brief? Will members be available after this session, so that we do not lose our quorum for the NICVA presentation?

Members indicated assent.

Mr McNarry: I welcome what you have said and written. You have brought an important perspective to our deliberations, and I thank you for that. I have nine questions, but I will only ask two.

On page 11 of your submission you say that the low achievement of school-leavers borders on a scandal, and I agree with that. You suggest that a limited financial package would assist low achievers. Can you elaborate on that limited financial package? If your reply is extensive, perhaps you could provide it in writing.

Secondly, what role will renewables play in our economy?

Mr Hewitt: Low achievement among school-leavers has been a problem for some time and must be seriously addressed. I do not wish to get into a debate about the 11-plus, but, at the top end, there are some high-quality students. However, at the bottom end, the record is dismal. It is improving, but it is still not good enough.

It is not satisfactory that people spend 12 years at school and leave with no qualifications — they attempt to get a job and are found to have no basic reading or numeracy skills. Money must be spent on remedial action in this area before such people can hope to gain employment.

Mr McNarry: Does a lack of skills contribute to the sickness levels that you mentioned?

Mr Hewitt: It may, but I am not aware of any detailed research on that. One can easily understand that if people find it difficult to get jobs because they have no skills or qualifications, they may become dispirited. They may feel that the easy way out is to be classified as disabled in some way and go on to long-term benefits. That is fatal, particularly for younger people.

A lot of money goes into education. The structure of the education system has been inherited. Five systems of education run simultaneously, which is not efficient. When I served on the board of governors of a good grammar school, I was struck by how many incentives for teachers are based on nothing to do with teaching. The incentives are to accumulate management allowances for doing almost anything other than teach. As a result of those incentives, the best teachers tend to spend relatively few hours teaching. Incentive mechanisms within schools ought to be examined.

More analysis is required on a financial package to assist low achievers. We need answers to basic questions. Who is failing? Where are they failing? Why are they failing? We must then assemble a mechanism to address those matters. To some extent, that would probably have to be done by skewing some of the existing baselines and moving resources either from other parts of the education system or from other parts of the public sector to the education sector in order to finance that specific package. A financial package could ease such transitions.

The analogy that most comes to mind is the Making Belfast Work initiative of many years ago, which members may recall. An investigation in various areas of Belfast produced quite shocking results. However, at least a positive mechanism was put in place. That was criticised but nonetheless did a reasonable job of focusing on achieving a particular goal. Similarly, achieving the goal of raising the educational attainment of low achievers would be worthwhile for both society and the economy.

Renewables present quite a challenge. There is not time to examine the energy issues here, but the world has got itself into a bit of a mess over the years. I do not blame anyone in particular for that: it is a difficult area. Renewables are a means of addressing some energy issues, but nothing comes free. There are relatively high upfront costs that it is hoped can be recouped over long periods of time. Renewables make a useful contribution, but I do not consider them as playing a central role in the economy. However, if expertise in renewables and associated technology could be developed, that could be used to create a niche in the economy, which would be very useful.

Ms Gildernew: You are most welcome, Victor.

Evidently, there are many problems. Several contributors have talked about one such problem being a small private sector, as opposed as to an overly large public sector and, given the percentages, that could be the case. There is also the difficulty of duplication right across this island: 5 million people need healthcare, education, etc, and there is duplication everywhere.

As for foreign direct investment versus indigenous industry, it is true that an American company can set up here and move its profits, on paper, to where it pays low corporation tax, and that has been the case in the South. I want to see a package or some type of financial incentives to help the small- and- medium-sized-enterprise (SME) sector, because there is a high level of dependence on SMEs, particularly outside Belfast. What is the best way to sustain indigenous companies to enable them to compete?

Mr Hewitt: We have not really talked about the SMEs. Economists use the rather ugly term “lack of churn” to characterise that sector. Firms here have a relatively low birth rate but an equally low death rate — in other words, some firms tend to last quite a long time. That may be considered to be good, but firms in dynamic economies tend to have a high birth rate, yet also a high death rate. In other words, that high turnover drives the SME sector.

We have done quite a lot of research utilising the global entrepreneurship monitor, which is a large-scale survey. People go into business for different reasons; some for opportunity, others for necessity. Interestingly, in the west of the Province, necessity drives people to set up businesses, whereas opportunity is a driver in the east.

The ERINI went through a phase of providing grants, but that has died off. A universal small package is now available for those who want to start a business. The real secret is that people here do not have the skills to run businesses — they certainly do not have the skills to engage with the global economy. The best thing that we can do for small businesses is to increase our support for building managerial skills and equipping SMEs for the realities of dealing with the wider world.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): Members should be conscious that Hansard is recording, and other conversations at the table may interfere with that.

Ms Ritchie: In Northern Ireland, there is a problem with fiscal deficits, and subsidies have focused on maintaining income. What do you perceive to be the solution? The final paragraphs of your submission state that there is an urgent need to embrace an economic strategy. What does the ERINI perceive to be the essential components of that strategy? Your answer will assist us in formulating our interim report.

Mr Hewitt: In relation to the fiscal deficit, the distribution of public expenditure is heavily weighted towards what might be termed “social programmes”, such as education; social housing, to an extent; and health, which alone consumes well over £3 billion of the available departmental expenditure limit.

Investment in public expenditure has fallen away in relative terms; roads and bridges are not being built, and ports and access routes are not being developed as much as they should. The cutting-edge budget for economic development now looks extremely miserly.

It is asking much of a Department such as DETI, which has a limited range of responsibilities, to carry the full burden of economic development on an upfront budget of £150 million, if that. Most of the remainder of the budget pays staff salaries. Serious consideration must be given to refocusing our efforts in relation to investment.

A strategy is being prepared, of which many members will have seen a draft. As the principal Department for economic strategy, DFP is developing that with contributions from DETI. The strategy reflected typical DFP concerns; it is a finance-driven document rather than an economic document. Strategies need central vision — something that drives the activity. To engage with the global economy, one must connect and communicate within it.

Connectivity is important and can be translated into a range of actions. It can mean physical connections — ports, airports and factors such as the development grant system, which was a good, effective scheme. Connectivity can mean networks and telecoms. It can also mean people, because people need skills in order to engage with the world economy. Connectivity can mean foreign direct investment, with Northern Ireland being seen as an attractive location to bring in and engage with international companies.

We need a theme that threads through all Departments so that Departments can ask themselves whether their work improves their ability to connect with the global economy. Some Departments will respond that they are working to improve standards of public service for the indigenous population. However, many Departments identify with issues such as that.

Dr McDonnell: Thank you very much, Victor, for your presentation. It was stimulating and far-reaching. I have a couple of points that I want to probe.

Michelle spoke about small companies. Does anyone in the economic world think that small-company loans are more beneficial than packages or grants? Such loans are successful in the United States.

I feel strongly about R&D and pull-out technology companies, but I think that we are strong on the “R” and not so strong on the “D”. What can be done to encourage company spin-out from universities? I may be wrong and unfair about this, but much university research appears to be semi-academic or academic-oriented. Research seems to be undertaken for the sake of intellectual fulfilment rather than for the development of a viable company or a commercial product. Perhaps you could comment on those two points?

Mr Hewitt: Loans are an alternative to grants. Companies must think carefully before taking a loan, so they may engage more fully. They must ask themselves whether a company's activities will enable the loan to be repaid. Companies do not have that concern about grants, because they are not directly repayable. The issue of loans could be further explored.

You asked about research and development and the universities. We have come some distance from a time when Alfred, Lord Whitehead said:

"Here's to mathematics. May we never find a use for it."

That sums up the academic approach to life. An incentive mechanism is imposed on universities — research assessment exercises — that rewards academic research. That is certainly the case in my subject area, where theoretical research is rewarded over applied research. Articles in journals about game theory, and so forth, will score better in the research exercise than a tedious piece of work on something practical on the applied side. However, we have subscribed to those national schemes. We should consider whether we need to follow UK national schemes slavishly.

I mentioned that it might be sensible to make a serious effort to upgrade our universities beyond the level that they are likely to reach in the future, given the existing funding. The universities here have established companies of one sort or another to roll out the products of their research. Queen's has spun off a number of rather successful companies. However, academic entrepreneurs tends to look at whether they can get a company up and running and established to a point at which somebody will take it over and buy them out, so that they can make a few bob from it. There is nothing wrong with that, but we do not really incentivise our academics to pursue that path.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): Thank you. I wish to put two other brief questions to you. First, you refer to the potential for the financial package to be used to oil the wheels of transition within general funding. Can you provide examples of where that has been the case in other economies or where it may be the case in our economy?

Secondly, would you recommend harmonisation with the Republic of Ireland's rate of corporation tax?

Mr Hewitt: I shall take the second question first. The subgroup is probably aware that ERINI was approached to undertake a study of the effect of harmonising the two corporation-tax regimes. That study is under way. We work on the basis that we go where the evidence takes us. I do not want to pre-empt the results of that study, which we hope to have in the autumn. We have involved teams of academics from Northern Ireland, the Republic and the rest of the UK to work together on that. Many of the issues are quite complex. I wish to make clear that the project is not about the practicalities; it is not about how we harmonise the two systems. It is about the size of the prize. If we are to do this, what is the potential prize for Northern Ireland?

Other recommendations will flow from the answer to that question. If the prize were relatively small, the effort to try to introduce harmonisation would be less urgent. If the prize were large, the effort would be greater. At present, I hesitate to endorse absolutely the corporation-tax route as the way in which to go, but it is the only big idea in town that I have seen. If something that dramatically changes the trajectory is not introduced, it will be a case of more of the same, and we have had much of the same over the years.

Off the top of my head, I cannot give you any local examples of where cash injections have been used to smooth a path. From my experience of working with public expenditure in DFP, the injection of relatively small amounts of money in Budget rounds produced results. Members will recall the Budget rounds. Those cash injections enabled disputes to be resolved and progress to be made. In a sense, that money was high-powered money, because it produced results way out of proportion with the actual amount provided.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): Thank you for those answers. On behalf of the subgroup, I thank you for your presentation and for subjecting yourself to what was a lengthy and detailed question-and-answer session. It has been of great benefit to the subgroup's deliberations. Finally, a supplementary note on the Jobskills programme would be useful, if possible.

Mr Hewitt: I shall leave this copy of the R&D report with the subgroup.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): The next submission is from Seamus McAleavey and Frances McCandless of the Northern Ireland Council for Voluntary Action (NICVA). NICVA has provided a written submission, which is included in the loose papers that members received at the start.

You are both welcome. I must apologise because the previous presentation overran. I appreciate your patience. If you have mobile phones, I ask you to switch them off, rather than simply put them on silent mode, as they interfere with the recording equipment. There are 45 minutes available for the presentation. If you keep your initial comments as brief as possible, to 10 minutes, it will allow for the maximum number of questions and answers.

Mr Seamus McAleavey (Northern Ireland Council for Voluntary Action): Thank you for inviting NICVA to make a submission to the subgroup. We will be as concise as possible.

NICVA is the representative body for voluntary and community organisations, much like the Confederation of British Industry is for businesses. There are approximately 4,500 voluntary and community groups in Northern Ireland. As with the private sector, they cover a broad range of areas, stretching from small groups to multinational organisations such as Save the Children. The voluntary and community sector here employs about 30,000 people and accounts for approximately 4.5% of the GDP. Its income comes from a broad range of sources. It receives public money for the delivery of public services, and members of the public and charitable trusts raise money for it.

As some members know, NICVA is involved in the Economic Development Forum (EDF). In general, social partnership, through the engagement of the Government, the private sector, unions, farmers and organisations such as NICVA, is a good idea. EDF is the closest thing to that, even though it is an advisory body to the Minister, rather than one that makes decisions. NICVA would like that engagement to be properly developed in future.

The subgroup's terms of reference include impediments to economic growth in Northern Ireland. An obvious impediment is political instability, and if a sustained and stable Executive were in place, that would send out a strong message to investors around the world.

A vision for Northern Ireland, which tells people what it is trying to achieve, must be developed. NICVA supports, and is involved in, DETI's 'Economic Vision for Northern Ireland'. However, one of NICVA's big fears is that it may be seen as DETI's vision: although DETI's strategy mirrors the priorities and budgets, it is important that a much more encompassing vision be developed.

The Executive's work on the Programme for Government was good. It began to set out an all-encompassing vision for Northern Ireland that took account of political, social and economic development. NICVA believes that investors around the world would really want to see that.

NICVA thinks that it is obvious — and I am sure that members will be focusing on this — that Northern Ireland is stuck between a rock and a hard place with the economy of the Republic of Ireland and that of the United Kingdom, which is dominated by the south-east of England. That has a huge impact on business development in Northern Ireland.

NICVA has often said that merely talking about creating more entrepreneurs, or exhorting them, does not make increased entrepreneurship more likely. Subvention here amounts to around £5.5 billion. Approximately 66% of GDP goes through the public sector. That is unlikely to change. I am a member of EDF's enterprise subgroup. At its meetings, major business people have said that the smart career move is to go into the public sector, so to encourage entrepreneurs, wider options than fiscal incentives must be considered.

The Republic casts a huge economic shadow over Northern Ireland, and Northern Ireland could more easily prosper if a common economic area were developed. For example, in future, the only way that petrol retailers who own petrol stations in border towns will be able to safeguard their risk will be to buy a station on both sides of the border. As tax rates change, they will get hammered on one side and then the other. We have seen that shift take place.

12.30 pm

Much mention has been made of the reliance on the public sector. That is unlikely to change. Therefore, the private sector is not seen as a smart career option — there is a feeling of prosperity at the moment and private-sector jobs have increased. I agree with Victor Hewitt's earlier comment that, as public expenditure tightens, Northern Ireland will take the rap.

There is general consensus that the private sector is too small. There is little doubt about that. NICVA recognises that manufacturing industries have gone to other places in the world and that we cannot compete with them as regards unit costs and so on. We must look to the new knowledge-based industries, which some economic commentators refer to as the "creative economy". In our submission, we highlight the views of Prof Richard Florida. Regions will attract investment based on the entire range of benefits that they can offer. Simply providing grant support, for example, is unlikely to attract investors who want talent and skills. Providing grant support will not compensate for investing in the wrong place. There is a fair deal of merit in the views that have been expounded by Richard Florida.

NICVA agrees with promoting enterprise and taking risks. Like many members, we think that Northern Ireland has become very risk-averse and that there is a culture of risk-aversion. The Government can do something about that. If there is to be a new Executive, members might want to think about how bodies such as the Public Accounts Committee (PAC) are used. The reason there is a lot of risk-aversion is that people get punished for failure, which is often tantamount to public humiliation.

Something must be done about that because it will thwart Ministers who want to deliver programmes and make changes. Many people will tell someone that they cannot do something and give 49 reasons. Our culture of risk-aversion goes across the public, private and voluntary sectors. Everyone blames each another. The Government can take the lead in trying to change that culture, and the PAC would play an important role in that.

Unless Northern Ireland has the skills required by new industries, talent will not be attracted here. We must be able to attract talent from other places, as the United States has done in the past and the Republic is doing now.

There are people much better placed than we to comment on fiscal incentives. However, reducing corporation tax on its own is unlikely to be a magic bullet. If corporation tax were changed tomorrow, investment would not flow in. It would have an impact, but a whole raft of other things needs to happen as well.

Everyone, including the EDF, knows that incremental change will not make a difference. From the research that has been put before the EDF, we know that, if current policy interventions continue, not much will change in the next five or 10 years. There will be a flat-line development and, from some indicators, things will actually get worse. A radical change is necessary.

The subgroup will probably have heard from DETI about the EDF's work on draft scenarios in which it can see whether specific actions will have greater impact in the future. That work has yet to come to fruition.

Returning to Prof Florida's views, tolerance is important. One thing that modern investors will look for is a tolerant society that can cope with a range of people — Prof Florida refers to people working in the new software and hardware industries as being fairly Bohemian. The cities that he sees as doing well are quite tolerant. The policy document 'A Shared Future' might address that.

Developing cities and regions is important, but we must achieve a balance by developing Northern Ireland as a whole. As a result of conversations that we have had with others about many different issues, our sector is keen that regional development should be balanced. It should not be Belfast-based, with the west being left behind.

Women are likely to be a big driver in the employment market. However, we need to think about that because we are very far behind with childcare provision and so forth.

NICVA believes that the education system has failed Northern Ireland and that there are real problems; I am sure that members know the statistics. Obviously, there are different arguments about how we should go forward, but radical change is needed. If 25% of people in a modern knowledge-based economy have major literacy problems, they are simply written off. That is a waste to the economy.

We worry about the figures on economic inactivity, and we cannot get our heads around those. Unemployment is decreasing, and there is a real feeling in areas that have experienced high unemployment that there are job opportunities — there is no doubt about that. However, something strange is happening in regard to people who are hidden in those figures. We are not quite sure what is going on with the 20,000 migrant workers who have come into Northern Ireland; that point will need further explanation.

We have had our 10 minutes, so we are happy to take any questions.

Ms Ritchie: What does NICVA perceive to be the financial instruments that would provide for a sustainable economy and for new growth in that economy?

Mr McAleavey: There is a real problem with the amount of public expenditure that comes into Northern Ireland. Therefore, rebalancing the economy will be difficult. Focusing on one aspect of the economy, such as corporation tax, is unlikely to do the trick. Earlier today you heard Victor Hewitt say that tax is a difficult issue because it is like hunting the big beast. The Treasury is not keen on Northern Ireland looking for what it considers to be handouts. You will have to negotiate a package that begins to set out how you would reduce the £5.5 billion subvention. You need to show how, if certain things were done here, that could make a return for the UK as a whole. A broad range of financial instruments would probably be included in that package.

Ms Frances McCandless (Northern Ireland Council for Voluntary Action): We would also like to see any public investment that is part of the package being used to lever in massively increased private investment. We want to see attempts at serious regeneration. We want someone to stand up and say that north Belfast needs an overall facelift. Now that the Crumlin Road site is opening up, there are opportunities to develop major arterial routes, businesses, shops and leisure facilities — housing is being tackled already. However, if such work is done in dribs and drabs, the projects cannot always be connected.

We want to see a massive project of the type that public funding alone could probably not deliver. We have seen models in the United States in which public and private funding streams are used together. Those projects return market rates to investors and provide sustainable income streams for communities. The communities have a say in how the regeneration of their areas should look. We would like to see some kind of investment being used to channel that sort of change into some of our most deprived areas.

Dr McDonnell: The high levels of underemployment and disability have jumped out at us. Someone said this morning that disability levels here were 50% higher than the UK average and 300% higher than the figure for the Irish Republic. Do you have any idea why we are stuck there? What are the components of those statistics? How should we unlock the potential that is buried there?

Mr McAleavey: Some people think that the population is entrepreneurial when it comes to claiming benefits. It is said that difficulties placed upon the unemployed by jobseeker's allowance caused a flight to other benefits, and that that was the smart option for claimants. It is noticeable that the numbers are much higher here than in the Republic, and that is why there is a need for a closer look at the economically inactive. It is wrong to leave people stuck in a mould and left behind in terms of economic development. We are unsure of what is happening, but we think that it is related to opportunity and perception of wage levels. People north of the border are not seeing the opportunities that people see down south. That must explain the huge variation in numbers.

Ms McCandless: It is also important to look at the structures of worklessness. We have many workless households in which there are two potential earners, neither of whom are working, and both possibly on sickness or disability benefits. As soon as one of them steps into the labour market, the benefits disappear. Unless both of them can find jobs concurrently, it is not worth either of them working. We need to look at the income structures of individual families. Those are the hard cases. New Deal has dealt with the easy cases and we are down now to the cases that are very difficult.

Mr McAleavey: Some years ago in the Republic, transition periods were created, during which people could hold onto benefits as they moved into employment. That let people make the leap into employment.

Ms McCandless: Mentoring schemes were also used very successfully south of the border. For someone who has been long-term sick or disabled, getting up every morning and going in to work is extremely difficult. They might be able to do it for a month, and then they stop and they are back at the start of the road again.

Lord Morrow: I have read a substantial part of your paper and I would like you to clarify some things. You said that we were between a rock and a hard place. I think you said that, economically, we are stuck. Mr Hewitt said earlier that there had been a 20% increase in jobs in Northern Ireland, as compared to 12% in the UK. That, on the face of it, is good news, but perhaps when we delve deeper we learn more. I agree that the private sector is too small and has to expand. We keep knocking our education system. All we hear is that it has failed. Tell us what needs to be done to turn it from failure to success, so that it will better serve the people, the community, our children and generations to come.

I am glad that you touched on migrant workers. I believe that the issue must be explored. I come from Dungannon, where we see this phenomenon at first hand. There must be reasons why thousands of migrant workers are coming in, and we must learn what those reasons are. I believe that no in-depth study has been made to try to find out the reasons for that.

I am concerned by what you say in your submission about the Celtic tiger:

"A host of other factors in the Republic have played their part like: reform of the education system and creation of regional colleges; creation of a Social Partnership in 1988; targeting of investment in pharmaceuticals, computer software and hardware; attracting corporate European headquarters to Ireland; clustering effect".

Please help me to understand that.

Your submission also says that:

"NICVA believes that fairer, more equal societies are more desirable [and] more economically stable".

What is your definition of a fair and equal society?

You mentioned the petrol filling stations along the border. You are correct to say that many of them have closed, but it was not for tax purposes alone. Although that was a factor, there is another issue: racketeering and smuggling. We are trying to get on to a level playing field. How can that happen and how can it be encouraged?

12.45 pm

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): There are a lot of issues to cover: schools and how the education system can be adapted; migrant workers; how a fair and equitable society can contribute to economic growth; the European headquarters and clustering effect; and the impact of racketeering on the economy.

Ms McCandless: First, as we have said in many places, NICVA would like to see the removal of selection. Two years of "teaching to the test" could be removed and two years of education could be put back into the education system. Selection does not advantage any of the kids in the system.

NICVA would like smaller class sizes and the link to be broken between where a child starts out and what their educational attainment is likely to be. In Denmark, there is absolutely no statistical likelihood that a child who comes from a disadvantaged background will have a poor educational attainment. In the UK, there is quite a strong link between those two factors. We would like that link to be broken because, for the economy, it means wasted potential.

We would like to see some other changes in the education field, and we have put many of those proposals in writing in recent months. Of course, we would also like to see less waste and duplication in the system; we do not really want there to be five education systems. Investment should be much more strategically targeted at giving kids a better outcome.

NICVA welcomes the new curriculum because it allows young people the flexibility to make choices at different stages in their educational career. Thus, if they find they are not on the right path at age 11 or 15, they still have time to make new choices and to adjust.

Lord Morrow: I hear what you are saying, but it is at variance with every survey that has been carried out.

Ms McCandless: It is not, actually; I have various analyses that I could send you of all the different surveys. Surveys often ask two similar questions. We will not go into this in detail now, but, for example, if you are referring to the 'Belfast Telegraph' surveys, people may say one aspirational thing in one answer — they may perhaps say that they want an end to selection — and on another question, if they are asked whether they think selection is fair, they will say that it is not. The survey evidence has been used quite selectively, shall we say, in some of these debates, but I do not think that we need to go into that here.

Turning to what we mean by a fair and equal society, in Northern Ireland income differentials between the richest and the poorest are still slightly increasing. In the UK as a whole they increased hugely during the 1980s and then stabilised a bit, but they are still massive.

NICVA looks at regions such as Scandinavia, as do many others — including the UK Government — and notes that where the gaps between the rich and the poor are smaller, the economies are much more vibrant and stable. They have stable political systems and civic institutions, strong trade unions, and extremely open and competitive economies. Sweden's economy is more open, in global terms, than the Republic of Ireland's economy. Sweden is now number one, and the Republic of Ireland number two, in terms of inward and outward investment flows. Therefore, we do not believe that equality and economic success are mutually exclusive.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): The other three issues were: migrant workers and how they affect economic inactivity; the clustering effect of European headquarters; and racketeering.

Mr McAleavey: NICVA has highlighted the issue of migrant workers. I am very conscious of Lord Morrow's remarks about his area, where 10% of the workforce are migrants, yet there are still a large number of economically inactive people. Are people here missing out for a particular reason? The meat plants in places such as Dungannon try to attract migrant workers because they do not appear to be able to find workers locally. That is a huge issue. Lord Morrow is right that we do not know enough about the exact reasons for that. Migrants are very attractive to the economy as they bring in new skills, and better skills as regards the knowledge economy, and so forth.

They have been very important to other places. NICVA is not in the least anti-migrant.

As regards European headquarters, the South has a policy of trying to attract companies that will establish headquarters there. About four years ago I attended a talk by Ketan Patel, who was then head of strategy at Goldman Sachs. He highlighted economic hotspots and noted that Ireland was the base for the European headquarters of big companies such as Intel. A peripheral island is increasingly placing itself at the centre of some of the current economic development. We must consider how we can benefit from that.

Racketeering has a desperate effect along the border. The political parties made representations to the Chancellor to cut fuel duties, recognising that we are losing — or he is losing — £500 million in duty, and that it was fuelling illegal activity along the border. Racketeering is the downstream activity that comes about as a result of the differences along the border. Petrol stations in Newry used to be extremely busy, but now it is those on the other side of the border. A legitimate business on the border can be wiped out on one side or the other, and we must find ways to deal with that. The Chancellor would not cut tax in Northern Ireland, because that would upset constituents in England. One way to cure racketeering is to cut tax: if there were no incentive, there would be no racketeering.

Mr Neeson: I recognise the important role that NICVA plays in the EDF; one of its recent meetings was held at NICVA headquarters. I am pleased that you highlighted the importance of the development of a shared future. Do you think that enough is being done, through Government policy, to develop that? Secondly, what could social partnership contribute to developing the economy of Northern Ireland?

Mr McAleavey: A shared future takes a long time, like many things, but it is a prerequisite to economic development. On the day after 9/11, the EDF met in the Ramada Hotel and discussed the impact of the Holy Cross dispute in north Belfast. That had a massive negative impact on attempts to attract investment to Northern Ireland. Investors are attracted to stable, tolerant places, and the reverse of that is unappealing, because there are easier places in which to invest. That is NICVA's basic premise on the economy.

The social partnership model is important, because there is benefit in getting the Government, the private sector, unions, the voluntary sector and others to try to agree a shared position on the future of the economy, but we do not really have that. Take renewables, for example: I raised the issue of wind farms at the EDF and asked if it would be possible to get a joint position on it, but many people backed off and said that it could cause trouble. They asked me to square it with my members, but our members have differences of opinion. Some voluntary organisations totally oppose it, and others think that it is great.

Unless we sit down, try to thrash these things out and get a body of opinion which is shared by the Government and the other sectors, we will be unable to make step changes. The issues that we have to deal with will be difficult and painful, so it would be a good idea to try to get agreement on them.

Ms Gildernew: Your submission showed common sense and was succinct, which is always good for a subgroup that is buried in paperwork.

Last week, the economist John Simpson said that school representatives had told him that children's behavioural patterns were no longer appropriate for an educational environment by the time that children had reached the ages of five, six or seven. That is an indictment of us, of the education system, and of the communities that have that level of difficulty in them. What does NICVA — and the groups affiliated to it in the voluntary and community sector — think we could recommend or do to try to tackle that? If four- and five-year-olds cannot benefit in an educational environment, they cannot benefit in an economic environment.

Your submission mentions women in the workforce. I know many women who have great skills and qualities, for whom it is not economically viable to work after they have had three or four children, because they would be working to pay the childminder. What possible incentives or measures could be put in place to encourage women into the workforce?

The third part of my question is about regional growth: what can be done to ensure that any economic growth is not solely centred around Belfast and that the west does not get left behind?

Ms McCandless: Part of what I said in answer to Lord Morrow's question is relevant here too. Investing in children is part of the key to turning the economy around, and it is too late when they are four or five years old. A great deal of statistical evidence from child psychologists and child development experts shows that children learn to learn from the ages of 0 to 3 years: that is when they learn to socialise and interact with others and develop all the skills that they will use for the rest of their lives.

There are kids at that age who, if they are looked after at all, are being looked after by 16-year-olds with an NVQ. In other parts of the world, you need a university degree before you can go anywhere near young children in a developmental setting. Much more investment should be going into those early years, so that before young children even get to school, they have had the kind of investment in their learning and developmental capacity to enable them to take advantage of what the education system can then offer.

Programmes such as Sure Start have been running for a while. Head Start has been running in the United States for about 20 years. There was a great fuss about the evaluation of the UK's Sure Start programme, because it was not entirely positive. However, it is early days to evaluate a programme that is intended to be as long term as Sure Start. Only now, some 20 years on, are meaningful evaluations being done in the States: did those kids get decent jobs, did they achieve decent levels of educational attainment?

NICVA's response would be to beef up the investment in early years. There is no better place to spend money than on the first three years of a child's life: it is better than spending money on a university education, because by that stage it is far too late and middle-class kids are most likely to benefit.

That answer is also relevant to the question about women moving into the workforce — and to lone parents who are not women — who are the sole carers for their families and have no other options. Universal, accessible, high-quality childcare, as is available in other countries, would potentially release a huge pool of labour into the workforce, much of which is already skilled and equipped, but not currently being utilised.

Mr McAleavey: Regional growth is a big issue. In discussions with the Advisory Council on Infrastructure Investment and the Strategic Investment Board (SIB), NICVA has said that good communication and transport systems in Northern Ireland are critical to achieving balanced regional development. Having good communication and transport systems means that the workforce can move around relatively freely, or does not have to move, and provides the opportunity for companies to locate in different areas, particularly in the west. Without them, Northern Ireland will experience the same problems that develop everywhere, such as in Dublin, where everything gets increasingly sucked into the one area in which incoming investment wants to cluster. It must be made attractive for investors to locate in different parts of Northern Ireland.

Mr McElduff: There is plenty of evidence that the border impacts negatively on our economic opportunities, and there was a reference to pressure on petrol retailers along the border. I know that Maurice Morrow understands that well, because DUP members are often in the queue in front of me in Emyvale and Lifford. [Laughter.]

I will not name them, because I do not want them to be investigated by their party.

Will you elaborate on the suggestion in your submission of a joint economic area?

Mr McAleavey: NICVA recognises that there are social and economic difficulties in border areas everywhere. The European Union has been running the INTERREG programme for donkey's years, so we all know that many border areas have problems, some of which relate to peripherality itself. It is not specifically a Northern Ireland/Republic of Ireland problem, but where the disparities are greater, the difficulties increase.

The view of NICVA and the EDF is that the economy in the South casts a big shadow, and has done so for the past 15 years. Much of the discussion at the EDF concerns the Southern economy and its impact on the North.

1.00 pm

We must find a way to harmonise with the South, or its economy will obliterate ours. That is not a political view; from an economic viewpoint, the North would not be an attractive place in which to invest. In the UK, businesses cluster in the south-east of England. There are problems in Great Britain in connecting with the north of England and north of the border. However, motorway development has allowed some business to move north. It is critical that we find a way to give us a fair opportunity to compete with the economy in the South.

Mr Newton: I want to concentrate on skills. At paragraph 1.7 of your submission, you say that:

“The [skills] strategy would be far more effective and powerful if it had greater focus on the ‘customers’ — the people who need training — rather than on those who may wish to employ them.”

I want you to explain that sentence to me. As I understand it, the Jobskills initiative, which received extremely bad publicity and was regarded as a £500 million fiasco, dealt with the perceived needs of customers and in many cases ignored the needs of future employers. Training was being done for the sake of training. At the end of the training period, trainees were hugely frustrated when they discovered that there were no jobs for them. Many trainees felt that they had been used as cheap labour and that they did not even get a worthwhile qualification that would enable them to get another job.

NICVA seems to be advocating a return to that situation and a move away from a philosophy of supply and demand. I tend to favour the latter option. Training that aims at meeting the needs of employers results in high placement levels and securing of jobs at the end of the training period — around 80% in that context, as I understand it, against 12% where training is being done for the sake of training.

Ms McCandless: NICVA does not dispute what you are saying; we agree with you. Paragraph 1.7 of our submission is linked to paragraphs 3.2 and 3.7. NICVA is not saying that customers’ perceived needs have not been dealt with, but that customers’ real needs have not been dealt with. People are given inappropriate training, or training that they never fully access because they may need additional help or support. Paragraph 3.7 of our submission lists the factors that prevent people from taking up, or fully benefiting from, training that has been offered to them.

The balance must be addressed between what employers think they need today, what people think they can access and benefit from, and — the third leg of the stool — what the economy needs tomorrow. Paragraph 3.2 of our submission deals with that issue.

The supply side must be dealt with. Perhaps there is an element of: “If you build it, they will come”. If Northern Ireland were stuffed full of skilled engineers and graduates in bioscience, biotechnology and nanotechnology, would employers come here? Possibly they would. Supply and demand must be catered for. NICVA does not advocate swinging the balance entirely towards the customer. The balance must be redressed slightly, and the needs of the future economy, rather than the needs of employers today, must be factored in.

Mr Newton: Also in paragraph 1.7, you say that NICVA advocates moving away from employers because they have no idea how to motivate low-skilled people.

Ms McCandless: We say that we should move away from employers leading the training process. Employers should participate, but an undue emphasis has been placed on employers leading the strategy based on current needs.

There are two elements missing from that: what skills people can absorb and use; and what employers or the economy will strategically need tomorrow. What employers will need tomorrow is not the same as what they need today.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): I take this opportunity to thank you both on behalf of the subgroup for providing us with your presentation at relatively short notice and for the question-and-answer session. Your contributions have given us an important perspective on the community and voluntary sector’s point of view. Your input has been very valuable.

Mr McAleavey: Thank you, Chairperson, and thank you to the subgroup.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): Members, we are now in closed session, and the next item on the subgroup’s agenda is “Any other business”. We have the research presentation from Dr Peter Gilleece to discuss, but, before we deal with that, we shall consider the draft of the subgroup’s press release.

The Committee Clerk: We had not received the presentations before today’s meeting, so we could not write the press release before the meeting. I have had to write down notes as we have gone along. The question-and-answer sessions were so good that I have had to leave out a great deal. I shall now read my notes — minus the topping and tailing, which is standard — on the evidence sessions, to see whether members are content.

In his presentation, the chief executive of the Northern Ireland Tourist Board, Alan Clarke, described the trends in tourism performance. Those trends indicated a generally positive and improving position on visitor numbers and spend. Mr Clarke emphasised the importance of developing effective planning strategies to support sustainability and the importance of promoting better joined-up government to provide the strategic leadership that is needed to grow the industry and to move it from a discovery destination to a long-term-brand position. NITB has identified to the Government the funding requirements for five key signature projects and recognises the importance of securing adequate public and private investment for capital projects.

Mr McGrath noted the importance of avoiding an increase in tax initiatives, such as a bed tax, which could make the Northern Ireland tourist industry uncompetitive. He stressed the strategic importance of having an effective roads infrastructure so that Northern Ireland can take full advantage of increased visitor figures, which have come about as a result of people's benefiting from cheaper air travel. Mr Clarke noted the need to merge the efforts of NITB, People First and Invest Northern Ireland to ensure that the tourist industry has an adequate supply of appropriately skilled staff.

On earnings, Victor Hewitt noted that the economy has been performing quite well: unemployment has been reduced and gross value-added has improved. He added, however, that, when considered from a different perspective, Northern Ireland had not performed so well. It has higher rates of economic inactivity, and there is a large trade deficit between its exports and imports. That deficit is financed by the fiscal transfer from the United Kingdom Exchequer of some £6 billion per annum.

Mr Hewitt said that Northern Ireland's lower productivity rate reflects the traditional industrial structure and its bias towards low productivity industries, the rate of growth in the United Kingdom economy and a range of supply-side factors that can influence productivity performance. Key among those are the so-called drivers of productivity: innovation, especially R&D; enterprise; and skills in the workforce. Improvements in those areas will give long-term economic benefits.

Mr Hewitt noted the low R&D base in Northern Ireland companies and emphasised the importance of linking business to universities to identify R&D opportunities. He noted also the advantage of developing networks and collaboration between businesses to maximise R&D activity. He noted the importance that FDI attached to a low rate of corporation tax, both in Northern Ireland and in the source economy. He added that some care should be taken to ensure that tax incentives such as corporation tax were structured to maximise future investment in the economy. He emphasised the importance of developing a coherent public-expenditure strategy that focuses on a central theme and encourages economic growth and genuine productivity gain.

I know that this summary is proving to be a bit long, but they are key points, and I will pare them down in the final version.

When speaking about impediments to economic growth, Seamus McAleavey from NICVA noted the importance of political stability and a devolved Assembly. Although NICVA supports DETI's 'Economic Vision for Northern Ireland', Mr McAleavey recognised the need to develop a wider vision that would create a politically, socially and economically attractive society.

NICVA would like to see action to encourage entrepreneurship to address the risk-averse culture that pervades the public and private sectors.

NICVA is not convinced that, on its own, a reduction in corporation tax would be sufficient to create the fiscal environment needed to stimulate business and investment.

Mr McAleavey said that regional imbalances in Northern Ireland must be addressed to encourage a wider spread of economic opportunities across rural and urban areas.

NICVA recognises that, on its own, public expenditure would not be sufficient to address adequately the structural problems facing, for example, north Belfast, and that a joint public and private sector investment package, similar to approaches taken in the USA, is required to regenerate such areas.

I have tried to capture issues that have been raised by the witnesses from, if you like, both sides of the house. If members are content with those —

Mr McCarthy: Should we publicise the comments that the representatives of NITB made about the possible introduction of a bed tax? Doing so might plant a seed in somebody's mind to introduce it.

The Committee Clerk: The seed has been planted. The bed tax might grab media attention, so perhaps we should not publicise it.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): Are members content with the press release?

Lord Morrow: There is one thing that I think should be included. No mention is made of the fact that members contributed to the meetings by asking questions. The press release refers only to the witnesses' presentations, and I am not sure that that will give members of the public the right impression.

The Committee Clerk: Lord Morrow, the beginning of the press release states that the initial presentations were followed by extensive question-and-answer sessions.

Ms Gildernew: The members who attended the meetings are named at the end of the press release.

Lord Morrow: Victor Hewitt and NICVA said that they are concerned about the number of people who are economically inactive. I too am concerned about that, as, I am sure, are other members. It must be addressed.

The Committee Clerk: I will add a line on that.

Lord Morrow: Yes. It should be included.

Ms Ritchie: That issue must be addressed.

Ms Gildernew: Another theme that arose frequently was investment in education. The reference need not be elaborate, but we should include it as the issue was referred to in most of the presentations.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): Members would like references to economic inactivity and investment in education to be included. On that basis, are members content with the press release?

Dr McDonnell: The investment needs to be targeted at the correct education sector. A fair amount is invested in education, but some of it needs to be better focused.

The Committee Clerk: Do you mean tailored investment?

Dr McDonnell: Yes, because the places that need the investment most are sometimes skimmed over and ignored.

Mr McNarry: I am happy enough with the press release. However, the subgroup has received few facts on the level of economic inactivity. Could the subgroup get some more detailed facts on how major a problem it is?

The Committee Clerk: If the subgroup has identified any specific areas on which it would like more facts, I will ask the relevant organisations for them. The DETI submission listed some of the reasons for economic inactivity. They included sickness and other areas that I cannot remember off the top of my head. There are four or five reasons, and the DETI publication gives the percentage split for them.

Are there any other areas on which members would like further information?

Ms Ritchie: Perhaps the Social Security Agency (SSA) could be asked to provide information on the number of applicants and approvals that there have been for the various disability benefits over the past 10 years? Such information would show whether there have been increases and whether there are regional variations. Perhaps, also, we could ask for an assessment of why those increases have taken place.

1.15 pm

Mr McNarry: There are many genuine and deserving cases, and we must not be seen to be intruding on them. There is also the scam element, which is difficult to prove.

The Committee Clerk: Perhaps we should have someone to talk about fraud figures.

Mr McNarry: There is a lot of fraud, but is it an impediment to economic growth in Northern Ireland?

Lord Morrow: I think it has an impact, David.

Mr McNarry: It has an impact on people's mentality. Many people ask: "Why am I working my butt off when there is a malingerer or waster sitting in the pub, playing cards and doing nothing when he is meant to be sick or receiving disability living allowance?" It would help to find out how large the problem is.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): Three questions have arisen. We need to clarify how we want to deal with them. The first one is what constitutes economic inactivity, and how the figures are broken down. It seems that this has been dealt with in the report from DETI. If members are satisfied that —

Mr McNarry: It has not been dealt with in the DETI report. As usual, anything coming from these Departments is all waffle and piffle and does not give a direct answer.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): So you want additional information. Is there a seconder for that proposal?

Ms Ritchie: Yes.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): Do we have agreement?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): The second issue is Ms Ritchie's proposal that we seek information from the Department for Social Development on the profile of people receiving the various benefits within the area of economic inactivity over the last 10 years, and any changes that have occurred.

Lord Morrow: And the regions?

Ms Ritchie: And the regional variations, including age profiles.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): Is there a seconder for that proposal?

Mr McNarry: Yes.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): Is that also agreed?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): The third issue is in relation to fraud levels. Could we clarify that? It came from Mr McNarry. Are we talking about statistics for fraud over the same ten-year period?

Mr McNarry: I think so. We need to address the impediments to the economy. We could get into paramilitary activity, but we need to know it.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): Do we have a seconder?

Lord Morrow: Yes.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): Is that agreed?

Ms Gildernew: I am a bit concerned that you are talking about benefit fraud, David. When I was on the Social Development Committee, it was made clear to us that the amount of money lost to the Department for Social Development through fraud was less than the amount of benefits not taken up by those who were entitled to them. That is a higher figure.

Mr McNarry: We could link the two. We could look at the balance between fraud and the absence of people taking up entitlements. That is a valid point.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): Are proposer and seconder content with that addition to the proposal?

Mr McNarry: Yes.

Lord Morrow: Yes.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): Dr McDonnell has been waiting to speak.

Dr McDonnell: I want to make the point that Michelle has made. It would be very wrong for the subgroup to suggest that a handful of people fraudulently claiming benefits was having a major impact. There may be fraud, but it is a very small factor. The subgroup needs to understand the various benefits that are available. As a result of our economic circumstances and of attempts to massage unemployment figures, people who had anything wrong with them were moved sideways on to benefits. Once people are on benefits, they presume that they will have them for life.

There is a presumption that once you are disabled, you are disabled for life. We should look at the problem creatively and positively and ask the Department for Social Development and others to devise a programme to get people back to work. That could copy the model in the Irish Republic and allow the disabled to receive benefits for six months or a year, or it could create transitional programmes. From experience, I know that once people get into a benefit trap, it can be extremely difficult for them to get out of it. Frances McCandless described a situation in which two people in a house are long-term unemployed; if one goes for a job, they both lose their benefits.

If we are concerned about fraud, I will get down to brass tacks so that colleagues understand. Sometimes Joe Bloggs cannot judge very well whether someone is mentally ill. Even if someone can do a, b or c, he may still be incapacitated mentally. Indeed, he may have a severe mental illness that is not physically obvious. A spectrum of factors needs to be considered.

Although I have no statistical evidence to back it up, I suggest that a lot of the increase in benefit claims hinges on mental illness. The numbers of mentally ill people have seriously increased here as a result of 30 years of madness. They have not had that experience in England or the Irish Republic, so —

Mr McNarry: I do not disagree with a word of what Alasdair has just said.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): Mr McNarry, I am sorry; Lord Morrow indicated that he wanted to come in on this point. I will come back to you after that. At that point we will have to decide whether to go for this research, because Dr Gilleece has still to present his report.

Lord Morrow: Again, David has taken the words right out of my mouth. I do not disagree with anything that Alasdair has said. However, if we are to have a fit economy, we must look at all the issues, and this is one of them. I want to know why the figure for Northern Ireland is 50% higher than in the rest of the UK and 300% higher than in the Irish Republic.

I regularly represent people at tribunals, because they are genuinely entitled to that service. I defend those people and appeal their cases. I already know about the genuine people, so I am not talking about them when I ask what is behind those figures. I support the people whom Alasdair has mentioned, and I have a social conscience. However, I want to know how we get our economy fit for purpose. That is important, and those figures are startling.

Mr McNarry: I share the views of Lord Morrow and Dr McDonnell. It is not a question of our sitting here trying to damage anyone. However, there are few facts and figures to back up some of the things that people say. We need to find those facts and figures to see how big the problem is.

We have a substantial black economy in Northern Ireland, and nobody ever talks about it. Part of it involves people who are on benefits “doing the double”, as it is called. People fraudulently hold down jobs with employers who fraudulently engage them. I do not know how widespread that is, but if it is an impediment to our economy it is within our remit. This is the sort of thing that people talk about in the pub. People talk about the guy down the road. I would not like to think that anyone would talk derogatively about someone who has a mental incapacity.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): The proposal is that we ask for additional information on the levels of fraudulent claims in the past 10 years and on the lack of take-up of benefits in the same period. Is that agreed?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): We will move on to Dr Gilleece's presentation.

Dr Peter Gilleece (Senior Research Officer, Northern Ireland Assembly): I will run through a summary of the paper and then move on to some of the concluding remarks.

Mr McNarry: This is the report about the Republic of Ireland?

Dr Gilleece: It is. The contribution of formal education to economic growth in the Republic of Ireland is of enormous significance. Ireland was one of the first European countries to grasp the economic importance of education. Economists suggest that this up-skilling of the labour force accounts for almost 1% per annum of additional national output over the last decade. Key components of this development are outlined in the paper.

Institutes of technology, for which there is no UK model, arose during the 1970s. Regional technical colleges evolved from innovative policy developments recommended by the OECD in the 1960s.

A link was forged between higher education and the market. The Manpower Consultative Committee, established in 1978, was a forum for dialogue between the Industrial Development Authority and the education system. It recommended an urgent programme of expansion to alleviate shortages and to increase output to meet projected demand. Irish education now has an explicitly vocational component that did not exist 30 years ago.

The view of Government agencies is more likely to lead to new course initiatives or pump-priming by the Department of Education and Science or the Higher Education Authority than any other force.

Participation in upper secondary and tertiary education has risen phenomenally over the last four decades. In 1995 the Republic of Ireland had an above-average ratio of graduates to population and a higher number of persons with science-related qualifications, relative to the size of the young labour force, than all other OECD countries including Japan. In addition, between 1990 and 1995 public spending in tertiary education institutions and on financial aid for students rose by 33%.

More significantly, in view of comments heard today on future development, it has been argued that the most important factor determining the contribution of the education system to economic progress within developed countries is the emphasis it places on sustaining a high level of performance on the part of the bottom half of the ability range. The Republic of Ireland lags behind OECD countries in this respect.

The Irish economy has strategically placed itself as a knowledge-based economy. Successive surveys of foreign-owned firms reveal that two of the important determinants of the decision to locate in Ireland are the availability of skilled labour and the specific skills of the workforce. However, the growth in wealth has not been spread evenly, and overcoming economic and social disadvantage remains a significant issue.

In 2003 the Department of Education and Science invited the OECD Secretariat to undertake a review of higher education to evaluate performance of the sector and recommend how it might better meet Ireland's strategic objectives. The report identifies new challenges that will have to be overcome if the Government's ambitions are to be realised. The report makes a series of recommendations that call for significant structural change.

To move from being a technology-importing, low-cost economy to an innovation-based technology-generating society requires that Irish tertiary education and research, and innovative indigenous enterprises, have to become the new drivers of economic development and of the country's international competitiveness.

There is a growing phenomenon of technology sourcing FDI, which sees firms seeking access to resources that are only available in the overseas locations targeted. Increasingly, multinational firms are setting up overseas R&D facilities where local conditions are such as to increase the likelihood of innovations emerging. The likelihood of that happening depends upon the local innovations system; the process by which public and private sector institutions, firms and national policies interact and coalesce to generate innovation.

In information and communication technology alone over the last few years, a number of significant developments have been registered under this new strategy. For example, and it is one of many given in the paper, IBM has announced further significant investment in its Irish R&D software facility in Dublin. A director of the company explains that its decision was influenced by the availability of the necessary skills, the strong support of the Industrial Development Agency and the growing emphasis on scientific research by the Science Foundation of Ireland.

The key issues emerging are: building a strong education system; maximising investment in R&D; and developing a local innovation system. All are key to developing the capacity necessary to add value for indigenous interest, and in the longer term to be attractive to technology sourcing FDI.

1.30 pm

I will move to the concluding remarks on page 14.

Investment in education is fundamental to the growth of economies whether the approach is to provide the skills and intellectual capital base to attract foreign direct investment as in the Republic of Ireland, or a model of building the educational base to support indigenous interests.

In the case of the Republic of Ireland a very strong enabling environment, with skilled labour and specific skills of the workforce, was in place to complement the low level of corporation tax.

A number of key milestones have been identified over a period of forty years, which, under the right conditions, conspired to produce a highly successful economy. Some key lessons may be learnt from that.

I now turn to the education system.

A consistent feature of this evolution has been the objective assessment of government policy. For example, at key junctures the Republic of Ireland have invited analysis of their education policy by the OECD. The OECD reports of 1964 and 1965 have been described as landmarks. In 2003, at a key crossroads in the development of the education system, the OECD were again invited to review higher education policy. This strategic approach has in the past ensured that there was a sound basis for the growth of economy.

The subgroup has heard criticism of the divide between policy development and implementation in Northern Ireland. There has also been criticism of our system of educational provision.

Victor Hewitt spoke earlier about the amalgamation of Departments' policy wish lists versus the greater focus in the Republic of Ireland.

I shall turn to participation in education. It has been argued that the most important factor determining the contribution of the education system to economic success within developed countries is the strength of the emphasis on encouraging those in the lower ability range.

The subgroup has also heard evidence of the failings of education in economically disadvantaged areas.

On the knowledge-based economy, my paper says:

"It may be the case that the foundations upon which we hope to build the knowledge economy in Northern Ireland are appropriate, however there is no certainty and evidence would suggest that, based on delivery to date, there are failings in the system. Perhaps consideration should be given to an ambitious, targeted and comprehensive review of educational policy with specific reference to its impact on economic development, at all levels in Northern Ireland, similar to the objective scrutiny that the Republic of Ireland has invited."

I move on to the section on higher education and the market. In the Republic of Ireland the interchange between higher education and the market is to a considerable extent mediated through government agencies. Irish education has now an explicitly vocational component.

Robin Newton mentioned apprenticeships and training schemes. The UK is unique from the rest of Europe in that training is not matched to real jobs. Appendix 1 of the paper contains a critique of apprenticeship schemes. The paper also highlights that, in the Republic of Ireland, the change centred around the non-university sector, and the universities themselves ultimately adapted to the vocational imperatives which had become part of the climate.

My paper goes on to state:

"Consideration may be given to the adoption of a model similar to the Manpower Consultative Committee, as a forum for dialogue between Invest Northern Ireland and the education system."

And, looking ahead to the challenges:

"The next stage of development for the economy in the Republic of Ireland will place greater emphasis on research and innovative indigenous enterprises as the new drivers of economic development. In Northern Ireland there is a need therefore to address the barriers to business investment in universities, improve the current financial and fiscal mechanisms of support for R&D activity"

— primarily within universities —

"and reconsider our attitude to risk in the support of R&D activity."

Technology-sourcing foreign direct investment represents a significant change in strategy, dependent on a strong local innovation system. My paper states:

"Moving towards foreign direct investment with a reduction in corporation tax may be considered a longer term goal, perhaps over 5 to 10 years. There may be a need to ensure that there is sufficient capacity to take full advantage of any new corporate tax regime."

The change in emphasis to technology-sourcing FDI may be particularly irrelevant in the light of the gamble scenario described by Victor Hewitt.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): Thank you, Dr Gilleece, for your presentation.

Ms Gildernew: That was an excellent paper, Peter. The reports that the Twenty-six Counties invited the OECD to write in 1964 and 1965 predated its corporation tax regime and many of the factors identified as drivers of economic growth.

As a result of that, the subgroup must strongly recommend that we invest in education from birth right through, as Ms McCandless said. Rolls are declining, and schools are being closed down left, right and centre. There may need to be some rationalisation, but here is a unique opportunity to turn those smaller classes around, to improve the pupil-teacher ratio by getting more one-on-one teaching, and to support schools, rather than close them down willy-nilly across the Six Counties without taking that into consideration.

We may also have to consider seriously the amount of money spent on arts degree courses in universities, as opposed to vocational training in further and higher education. This is thought-provoking and proves that incentives are one thing, but the education and skills of our young people are paramount — that is probably the most fundamental factor in ensuring the future growth of the economy. Fair play to you, Dr Gilleece, it is an excellent paper.

Mr Newton: There is a great deal in this paper, and it is worth a detailed read. I have only two comments. I am concerned that the word “education” is only seen in the academic sense: it should also be seen in the vocational sense.

Dr Gilleece: Education and skills; training.

Mr Newton: Yes. I would have thought that the development of an entrepreneurial ethos would have been mentioned in the Lisbon strategy. Entrepreneurship should be delivered as a core subject from primary education, so that it feeds into the higher echelons of education.

Ms Ritchie: I thank Dr Gilleece for his in-depth paper and for the analysis that he has carried out into the system that pertains in the South of Ireland.

There is a need for a re-examination of educational attainment in Northern Ireland. When we think of education — and perhaps I am thinking similarly to Robin Newton — people focus on academic education. Twenty-five years ago, people did concentrate on vocational education, but in the pursuit of academic qualifications they forgot about the vocational side; they were anxious to obtain O levels, A levels and a university education. They forgot about vocational skills, and they forgot about those children who did not have the capacity to pursue an academic line and who would have been better suited to apprenticeships or working in the likes of the mechanical and construction fields.

We must consider the recommendations made by the Construction Employers Federation about the nature of apprenticeships: they should be pursued by 15- and 16-year-olds in secondary education, and there should be a transition to the factory floor or to the construction industry.

We must examine why there has been a dearth of entrepreneurial spirit in the North of Ireland and why there is a regional variation in that. In an area such as Kilkeel there is considerable entrepreneurial spirit, not solely in the fishing industry, but also in response to the downturn in that industry, and people have used their skills in other industries. We should consider case studies to determine how certain areas have built on that entrepreneurial spirit.

The subgroup should recommend that the OECD examine what has been done in the area of educational attainment, both generally and more specifically in relation to vocational skills, and assess why there has been a downturn in the number of people who have felt inclined to go into vocational training. Parents who force children into academic education rather than ensuring that children’s education is geared specifically to their abilities play a large part in that. A great deal of research needs to be carried out on that.

Dr Gilleece’s report shows how the Republic of Ireland has been able to move from an agrarian economy in the 1960s to one able to attract FDI and concentrate on technological industries. However, I know from friends who have worked in the technology industry in the Republic that some have had to relocate to lower-cost economies, and we must be mindful of that need and be aware of the difficulties.

We must also examine what our universities are doing in the technological field and whether they are training people to apply their knowledge to the appropriate skills. As Michelle said earlier, those of us who left university equipped with degrees in the arts that were of little value to employers need to encourage people to challenge themselves to train vocationally.

Dr Birnie: I thank Dr Gilleece for his excellent summary. I have two questions, or perhaps observations.

First, ideally the subgroup would like some sort of tabulation, to include both Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland, showing European continental comparisons of the percentage of the labour force that is qualified to each of the five educational levels. I know that that is a difficult task, because I tried to do it about 15 years ago, and statistics are never set out on a comparable basis.

My second observation is designed to inject a little scepticism, or perhaps realism, with regard to the contribution of education to economic growth. Some of it is a product of timing, as I sense was implied in Dr Gilleece’s paper. The big burst in public spending investment in post-11 education in Northern Ireland occurred after the Education Act 1944, and the benefits to economic growth came about 16 or 18 years later, after people had moved through the education system.

In the Irish Republic, as has been pointed out, a similar wave of investment in secondary — and later tertiary — education began much later than elsewhere in north-west Europe, from the mid-1960s onwards. Sixteen years on brings us to the mid-1980s, and the Celtic tiger economy began in the late 1980s. Therefore, economic growth is a product that comes some years after the investment starts.

Educationalists and economists still debate whether investing in education has a permanent effect on an economic growth rate. Those who believe that it does can be optimistic and say that the South's investment in education will lead to economic growth remaining high for the foreseeable future. There is an alternative view that diminishing returns will set in, and that you cannot keep increasing the percentage of graduates in your labour force. Once it gets above 50% — as is the case in Northern Ireland — arguably the benefits to the economy decrease.

I am just introducing some necessary scepticism or realism. Simply putting money into the education system does not necessarily produce extra percentages of economic growth at the other end of the pipe.

Ms Gildernew: Esmond, are you talking about types of education? A person may be very well-educated person, perhaps an expert on ancient Greece, but no good for the economy.

Dr Birnie: We need to reflect on that debate. I heard Margaret almost apologising for doing an arts subject. We need to be very careful. If a degree helps you to think, it will have produced a benefit generally for whatever career you end up in.

Ms Ritchie: Flattery will get you nowhere. [Laughter.]
1.45 pm

Dr Birnie: I think we need to be very careful about sticking everyone into technology courses. We might teach people in the technologies of today, which may not be the ones that are around in 10 years' time. We must try to strike a balance.

The Committee Clerk: Could I ask Dr Gilleece —

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): Dr Gilleece will sum up at the end. He is taking on board the questions that are being asked.

Mr Neeson: To me, in drawing direct links between the economy and the educational system the main issue is that the system in Northern Ireland is wrong. Departments do not work together, and there is no joined-up government. That has become evident in several evidence sessions. Looking at Ivan McCabrey's letter to us today, and coming from a teaching background as I do, I recognise the weaknesses in the system. It is important that our report reflect Michael Maguire's comments on responsive education from primary level up.

Education in Northern Ireland is about to be reformed, and it is important that we get it right and address it as an Assembly. I do not agree with the 11-plus, but I certainly do not agree with the proposed replacements. The relationship between the needs of the economy and society as a whole is vital if we are to achieve the 140,000 jobs that the Northern Ireland Business Alliance has targeted.

Lord Morrow: It is a pity that we did not have Dr Gilleece's paper before the meeting. That is no one's fault; it is just the way things are.

A key issue is building a strong educational system, which no one can gainsay. The technical colleges argued that they should be afforded university status. Are we trying to find the highest common denominator, or the lowest? An economy should always reach for the highest.

"Most findings from studies of the relationship between labour market earnings and initial education conclude that an additional year of schooling is likely to yield an annual 'rate of return' for individuals of 8-10%."

That is very significant and very telling. That issue must be "got out there", as the saying goes, and really demonstrated.

"Similarly positive results emerge from macro-economic growth studies on the impact of additional schooling on long-term growth in GDP."

That is of great relevance. I would like to hear Dr Gilleece elaborate on that a wee bit. I have other points to make, but I will stop now. I can see that everyone is getting hungry.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): We can ask Dr Gilleece to deal with that during his summing-up.

Dr McDonnell: Chairperson, I do not want to come between colleagues and their lunch. Most of the points that I wanted to make have been covered already. I am delighted that colleagues have recognised Dr Gilleece for the gem that Sean Neeson and I encountered some years back on the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment.

Lord Morrow: Did you find him?

Dr McDonnell: Sean and I invented him.

Mr Neeson: We groomed him.

Dr McDonnell: Yes, we groomed him. Dr Gilleece was an excellent resource and an excellent support to us back then. Rather than compliment him on yet another gem of a paper, I will leave it at that, Chairperson, because there is no point in my repeating what others have already said.

Mr McElduff: I want to express my appreciation to Dr Gilleece for his presentation. There would have been real value in having a formal submission after which we could have asked questions, but, given the time constraints, that was not to be.

I agree with Robin Newton, who said that the briefing paper requires detailed reading. We could perhaps revisit the paper when we come to consider the written evidence.

The Committee Clerk: We will be doing that.

Mr McElduff: The convergence of some of Victor Hewitt's points about the historical context for Ireland's success and Dr Gilleece's reference to T K Whittaker's 'Economic Development' paper of the late 1950s is interesting.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): Esmond Birnie has proposed that further research is required into the percentage of the population that is qualified to each of the five levels, compared with the Republic of Ireland, Great Britain and other European countries. That may be something on which members need to agree first. Before we do that, I invite Dr Gilleece to sum up.

The Committee Clerk: I can ask the Department for Employment and Learning for that information, but what do you mean by "the five levels"? Are you talking about Key Stages 1, 2, 3, and so forth?

Dr Birnie: Dr Gilleece can elaborate on this. Level 5, I think, refers to a PhD, level 4 to a degree, level 3 to a HND or technical qualification, level 2 to an apprenticeship and level 1 to GCSEs. It is something like that. We are not talking about Key Stage qualifications. It is the level of so-called paper qualification that a person has attained.

Dr Gilleece: I think that I managed to catch all the comments. I would like to quickly respond to some of them.

Dr Birnie mentioned that he is sceptical of education's contribution to economic growth and of the benefits of producing graduates. Robin Newton mentioned the former point as well. It is about education as a whole — the skills, the vocational training, and all the rest. I refer in my briefing paper to the successful economies in the Nordic countries, which have superb educational systems. As Frances McCandless said, people in those countries from socially deprived backgrounds are experiencing no educational disadvantages whatsoever. The opposite happens to be true in Northern Ireland. Equally, there is the same problem in the Republic of Ireland. Education seems to be the means of helping people become more economically active.

The Scandinavian countries have a superb educational system. The whole philosophy there is not about the process of education, but about education as a fundamental right. Pupils there are encouraged to progress right through the educational system. There is an ethos of high tax and strong social welfare in Scandinavia. Also, among the EU countries, they account for the highest R&D spend as a percentage of GDP and, as a result, their economies are very successful. That success seems to be due to their investment in education, R&D and innovation.

I agree with Sean Neeson. We are on a treadmill of producing strategies and policies with no real opportunity to evaluate their success objectively. In researching this subject, one of the things that struck me — I mentioned it in the paper that I presented on 3 August — is the ability of civil servants and politicians to sit back, open the doors and ask people to tell them what they think of what they are doing and whether they are doing it wrong. When the Republic of Ireland took that approach, particularly in the 1960s, it opened itself up to ridicule. The 2004 OECD examiner's report, 'Review of National Policies for Education: Review of Higher Education in Ireland', is significant because it proposed a change in direction.

Barry McElduff mentioned T K Whittaker. An interesting point, which touches on the paper that I presented last week, is that T K Whittaker was a civil servant who, at the age of 39, was promoted to the position of permanent secretary. Seán Lemass sponsored him and gave him the opportunity. He was innovative and creative, and he was given the opportunity to record his thoughts and work outside the rigid Civil Service system. T K Whittaker was an important catalyst for the changes to the system in the Republic of Ireland. He was originally from Rostrevor.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): I thank Dr Gilleece for the contribution that he has made to the subgroup with the paper and the answers to members' questions. There will be an opportunity to explore the paper in more detail during the sessions set aside to consider written evidence.

Dr Birnie has proposed further research. Does anyone wish to second that proposal?

Ms Ritchie: I second it.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): Do members agree?

Members indicated assent.

The Committee Clerk: Peter is on holiday next week. Therefore, he will not be available on 15 August to answer any questions that arise from his paper. I can ask the Department for Employment and Learning to provide the additional statistics. Dr Gilleece, do you have access to those?

Dr Gilleece: Not in the time available, but I can gather them when I come back from leave. I will probably be on leave for most of the following week as well, but when I come back, I will address that issue if it is still relevant. As Dr Birnie said, without the statistics, it is difficult to compare like with like.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): OK. That will be noted.

Do members have any other items of business that they wish to raise?

Some Members: No.

The Chairperson (Mrs Long): Good.

The next meeting will be held at 10.00 am on 15 August, when the subgroup will consider written submissions. Members have been provided with a draft agenda. To repeat what I said earlier, it would be helpful if those members who are going to attend that session are given advance access to the written evidence to give them the opportunity to study it.

Adjourned at 1.59 pm.
