

OFFICIAL REPORT

(Hansard)

Volume 20

(12 August 2006 to 22 November 2006)

BELFAST: THE STATIONERY OFFICE LTD

£70.00

Published by TSO (The Stationery Office) and available from:

Online

www.tso.co.uk/bookshop

Mail, Telephone, Fax & E-mail

TSO

PO Box 29, Norwich, NR3 1GN

Telephone orders / General enquiries: 0870 600 5522

Fax orders: 0870 600 5533

Order through the Parliamentary Hotline Lo-Call 0845 7 023474

E-mail book.orders@tso.co.uk

Textphone 0870 240 3701

TSO Shops

123 Kingsway, London, WC2B 6PQ

020 7242 6393 Fax 020 7242 6394

16 Arthur Street, Belfast BT1 4GD

028 9023 8451 Fax 028 9023 5401

71 Lothian Road, Edinburgh EH3 9AZ

0870 606 5566 Fax 0870 606 5588

The Parliamentary Bookshop

12 Bridge Street, Parliament Square

London SW1A 2JX

Telephone orders / General enquiries 020 7219 3890

Fax orders 020 7219 3866

Email bookshop@parliament.uk

Internet bookshop.parliament.uk

TSO@Blackwell and other Accredited Agents

© 2007 Copyright The Assembly Commission

ISBN-13: 978-0-339-80018-2

ISBN-10: 0-339-80018-6

Volume 20

12 August 2006 to 22 November 2006

The Northern Ireland Act 2006 made provision for Members of the Northern Ireland Assembly to meet in an Assembly.

The Act gave the Secretary of State power to refer to the Assembly the election of persons to hold the offices of First Minister and Deputy First Minister on the restoration of devolution; the nomination of persons to hold office as Northern Ireland Ministers on the restoration of devolution; and such other matters as he thought fit.

In addition, under the provisions of the Act, the Secretary of State directed that a Committee on the Preparation for Government and a Subgroup on the Economic Challenges Facing Northern Ireland be established.

This Bound Volume contains the Official Reports of all the plenary meetings of the Assembly and the meetings held by the Committee on the Preparation for Government and the Subgroup on the Economic Challenges Facing Northern Ireland during the period 12 August 2006 to 22 November 2006.

ASSEMBLY MEMBERS

Adams, Gerry (West Belfast)	Kennedy, Danny (Newry and Armagh)
Armstrong, Billy (Mid Ulster)	Kilclooney, The Lord (Strangford)
Attwood, Alex (West Belfast)	Lewsley, Ms Patricia (Lagan Valley)
Beare, Mrs Norah (Lagan Valley)	Long, Mrs Naomi (East Belfast)
Beggs, Roy (East Antrim)	McCann, Fra (West Belfast)
Bell, Billy (Lagan Valley)	McCarthy, Kieran (Strangford)
Bell, Mrs Eileen (Speaker)	McCartney, Raymond (Foyle)
Berry, Paul (Newry and Armagh)	McCartney, Robert (North Down)
Birnie, Dr Esmond (South Belfast)	McCausland, Nelson (North Belfast)
Bradley, Dominic (Newry and Armagh)	McClarty, David (East Londonderry)
Bradley, Mrs Mary (Foyle)	McCrea, Dr William (Mid Ulster)
Bradley, P J (South Down)	McDonnell, Dr Alasdair (South Belfast)
Brolly, Francie (East Londonderry)	McElduff, Barry (West Tyrone)
Buchanan, Thomas (West Tyrone)	McFarland, Alan (North Down)
Burns, Thomas (South Antrim)	McGimpsey, Michael (South Belfast)
Burnside, David (South Antrim)	McGlone, Patsy (Mid Ulster)
Campbell, Gregory (East Londonderry)	McGuigan, Philip (North Antrim)
Clarke, Willie (South Down)	McGuinness, Martin (Mid Ulster)
Close, Seamus (Lagan Valley)	McLaughlin, Mitchel (Foyle)
Clyde, Wilson (South Antrim)	McMenamin, Eugene (West Tyrone)
Cobain, Fred (North Belfast)	McNarry, David (Strangford)
Copeland, Michael (East Belfast)	Maginness, Alban (North Belfast)
Coulter, Rev Dr Robert (North Antrim)	Maskey, Alex (South Belfast)
Cree, Leslie (North Down)	Molloy, Francie (Mid Ulster)
Dallat, John (East Londonderry)	Morrow, The Lord (Fermanagh and South Tyrone)
Dawson, George (East Antrim)	Moutray, Stephen (Upper Bann)
Deeny, Dr Kieran (West Tyrone)	Murphy, Conor (Newry and Armagh)
Dodds, Mrs Diane (West Belfast)	Neeson, Sean (East Antrim)
Dodds, Nigel (North Belfast)	Nesbitt, Dermot (South Down)
Doherty, Pat (West Tyrone)	Newton, Robin (East Belfast)
Donaldson, Jeffrey (Lagan Valley)	O'Dowd, John (Upper Bann)
Dougan, Mrs Geraldine (Mid Ulster)	O'Rawe, Mrs Pat (Newry and Armagh)
Durkan, Mark (Foyle)	O'Reilly, Thomas (Fermanagh and South Tyrone)
Easton, Alex (North Down)	Paisley, Rev Dr Ian (North Antrim)
Elliott, Tom (Fermanagh and South Tyrone)	Paisley, Ian Jnr (North Antrim)
Empey, Sir Reg (East Belfast)	Poots, Edwin (Lagan Valley)
Ennis, George (Strangford)	Ramsey, Pat (Foyle)
Ervine, David (East Belfast)	Ramsey, Ms Sue (West Belfast)
Farren, Dr Seán (North Antrim)	Ritchie, Ms Margaret (South Down)
Ferguson, Michael (West Belfast) (Died 25 September 2006)	Robinson, George (East Londonderry)
Ford, David (South Antrim)	Robinson, Mrs Iris (Strangford)
Foster, Mrs Arlene (Fermanagh and South Tyrone)	Robinson, Ken (East Antrim)
Gallagher, Tommy (Fermanagh and South Tyrone)	Robinson, Mark (South Belfast)
Gardiner, Samuel (Upper Bann)	Robinson, Peter (East Belfast)
Gildernew, Ms Michelle (Fermanagh and South Tyrone)	Ruane, Ms Caitriona (South Down)
Girvan, Paul (South Antrim)	Shannon, Jim (Strangford)
Hanna, Mrs Carmel (South Belfast)	Simpson, David (Upper Bann)
Hay, William (Foyle)	Stanton, Ms Kathy (North Belfast)
Hilditch, David (East Antrim)	Storey, Mervyn (North Antrim)
Hillis, Norman (East Londonderry)	Trimble, The Lord (Upper Bann)
Hussey, Derek (West Tyrone)	Weir, Peter (North Down)
Hyland, Davy (Newry and Armagh)	Wells, Jim (South Down)
Kelly, Mrs Dolores (Upper Bann)	Wilson, Jim (South Antrim)
Kelly, Gerry (North Belfast)	Wilson, Sammy (East Antrim)

PRINCIPAL OFFICERS AND OFFICIALS OF THE ASSEMBLY

Speaker	Mrs Eileen Bell MLA
Deputy Speakers	Mr Francie Molloy MLA Mr Jim Wells MLA
Office of the Speaker
Private Secretary	Ms Georgina Campbell (to 29/08/06)
Special Adviser	Mr Richard Good
Clerk to the Assembly	Mr Arthur Moir
Deputy Clerk to the Assembly	Mr Joe Reynolds
Deputy Chief Executive	Mr Tom Evans
Director of Legal Services	Ms Clare McGivern
Examiner of Statutory Rules	Mr Gordon Nabney
Editor of Debates	Mr Simon Burrowes
Clerk Assistant	Ms Nuala Dunwoody
Keeper of the House	Vacant
Director of Research and Information	Mr Allan Black (to 18/09/06)
Principal Clerks	Mr Alan Patterson Mrs Debbie Pritchard Mr John Torney Mr Martin Wilson
Clerk to the Assembly Commission	Tony Logue

THE ASSEMBLY

Monday 11 September 2006

The Assembly met at 2.00 pm (Madam Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

ASSEMBLY BUSINESS

Madam Speaker: In accordance with the Northern Ireland Act 2006, the Secretary of State has directed that the Assembly should sit on Monday 11 September 2006 at 2.00 pm and again, subject to the continuation of debate, on Tuesday 12 September 2006 at 10.30 am to consider the business as it appears on the Order Paper. Before moving to that business, I wish to advise the House of my rulings in relation to two points of order.

Speaker's ruling on Standing Order 3

Madam Speaker: At the first meeting of the Assembly on 15 May 2006, Mr Peter Robinson asked me for a ruling in respect of the decisions I had made in publishing the list under Standing Order 3. I decided to take the advice of counsel on that matter. I have now received counsel's opinion and have also had the opportunity to consider the representations of all parties and other Members on this issue. I want now to respond to Mr Robinson's query.

Members should be advised again that, in line with custom, I will not enter into debate, either here or elsewhere, about the substance of my ruling. In making his request, Mr Robinson drew attention to the potential political consequences of a ruling. I remind Members generally that I am governed by legislation and Standing Orders, not by political considerations. I believe that my ruling is legally and procedurally correct. Standing Order 2(a) offers me the authority to make such a ruling. Political consequences are for others, not for me.

I should explain that Standing Order 3 had practical effect at the first meeting of the Assembly.

Standing Order 3(g) has a similar effect before any meeting of the Assembly where the business is referred by the Secretary of State under section 1(1)(b) of the Northern Ireland Act 2006; that is, the nomination of persons to hold office as Northern Ireland Ministers on the restoration of devolved Government. My ruling today will have few immediate practical consequences for Members. I trust that Members will reflect on the ruling and deal with its consequences as they see fit, or deem necessary, before such practical issues arise.

At the first sitting of this Assembly, my concern was to comply with the requirements of Standing Orders and the relevant statutes. The list of political parties published on 15 May was based on the information available at the time, and I am content that my decision was proper and in order. However, with the benefit of counsel's advice, I have taken other factors into account, in particular the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 and representations made to the Clerk by political parties and other Members.

The Act represents the fullest expression of legislative policy on what constitutes a political party. Although it focuses on the financial regulation of political parties, the Act also details characteristics of a political party. Counsel has advised that the characteristics drawn from the Act assist in defining a political party for the purposes of Standing Order 3 and should be considered when publishing a list of party membership.

The characteristics of a political party under the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 can be summarised as: a short, suitable name; a headquarters, or at least an address for the purpose of communication; officers of the party, including at least a leader, a treasurer and a contact person, called a "nominating officer", for the purpose of liaising with the Electoral Commission and others; a constitution; a scheme for financial support of the party; and an intention to contest elections.

In making a decision about any future list for publication, I shall require a party to have all those characteristics. From the information available, I do not consider that the Ulster Unionist Party Assembly Group (UUPAG) has yet demonstrated all those characteristics. I trust that Members will find this clear and helpful.

Mr P Robinson: I am grateful for the Speaker's ruling, not least because it is in line with the judgement that my right hon Friend and I expressed some months ago.

The Speaker referred to serious implications. I stated those implications to ensure that there was a thorough consideration of the point of order that had been made. My colleagues and I are satisfied that there has been a thorough investigation, involving senior counsel's opinion and consultations with others. The DUP accepts the Speaker's ruling that the two parties may be inextricably linked in a group, but that that link does not constitute a party under the legislation.

As there are ongoing implications, you may be willing to meet parties privately and separately to consider the legal advice that you received. The criteria that you have laid down may well be applied in the future, and perhaps not only by the party that attempted to apply them on this occasion.

Mr McFarland: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: I must respond to Peter Robinson first.

I am content to meet any Member who has a query and listen to observations on this ruling.

However, I am not content to discuss my ruling. Members know that that is not the convention. The convention is that the Speaker makes a ruling based on advice that he or she has been given. In accordance with precedent, I do not intend to waive that convention and share that advice.

Mr McFarland: During the previous Assembly, three independent Members formed the United Unionist Assembly Party. One of those Members, while remaining in the United Unionist Assembly Party, stood for election as a member of the Democratic Unionist Party. Does today's ruling overturn the accepted custom and practice in the previous Assembly in respect of forming a party? The United Unionist Assembly Party would not have met the criteria for parties laid down in today's ruling. Has there been a change in the practices of the Assembly?

Madam Speaker: As I have already pointed out, this Assembly is governed by different legislation from the previous Assembly. That legislation allows me to rule exactly as I have done today. If, having read my ruling in tomorrow's Hansard report, the Member wishes to discuss the matter further, I will be happy to do so. However, I will not change my ruling.

Mr McFarland: The legislation is quite clear; this is a different Assembly. Of course, when the Assembly is re-established, we will return to the old rules. Will your ruling apply then? Will it have any bearing then?

Madam Speaker: I repeat my request for the Member to read the ruling in the tomorrow's Hansard report. Should he have any further concerns, my office and the secretariat will listen to any queries. As I said, the ruling will have more of an effect on future business. When a list of party membership is next published, I will restate this ruling so that it is clear that any party on the list must have those characteristics that I outlined. Any further matters are for Members to decide themselves. My decision was not political; it was in accordance with current legislation.

Mr Ford: Madam Speaker, I wish to ask a further question about your ruling. I do not wish you to add to the political embarrassment of the Ulster Unionist Party.

You made clear that the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 overruled the precedent set in the Assembly elected in 1998, and you referred to the composition of a list of party membership.

However, a question remains about what happens when d'Hondt comes into play. I have correspondence from the Secretary of State that refers to the UUPAG. The UUPAG is currently represented on Assembly Committees. Has the UUPAG now ceased to exist for all purposes or will it exist only when the d'Hondt formula is applied?

Madam Speaker: As a result of my ruling, I now consider that, as regards this House, there is an Ulster Unionist Party and a Progressive Unionist Party. The main immediate consequence concerns speaking rights in the Chamber. The Secretary of State will concur with my decision because I have a right to make such a ruling; I hope that Members will do likewise.

Speaker's ruling on Interventions

Madam Speaker: During the sitting on 7 July, Mr Alban Maginness raised a point of order in relation to the length of interventions; other Members raised related points. I have discussed the matter with the Business Committee. The current trial arrangement of allowing Members up to one additional minute of speaking time, when they have accepted one or more interventions and when speaking times are limited to fewer than 10 minutes, was agreed on the basis that interventions can provide a valuable contribution to a debate. I am, therefore, of the view that it would be preferable not to introduce rigid controls in relation to interventions.

2.15 pm

With regard to the length of an intervention, I ask that all Members exercise the courtesy of limiting their remarks to a brief comment. When that courtesy is not observed, I may in future exercise my discretion and, when I feel that it is necessary, call a halt to lengthy interventions.

In relation to the number of interventions that a Member may make, again I would prefer that Members policed themselves. It is, however, entirely appropriate for me to remind Members that they cannot insist on a Member who has been called giving way. If necessary, I will call a Member to order for persistently interrupting another Member who has the Floor and does not wish to give way.

I remind Members that, when another Member has given way, it is in the interests of good debate that that courtesy should not be abused.

In summary, I propose, if necessary, to interrupt Members who make lengthy interventions and to call to order those who persist in badgering Members who have indicated that they will not give way. I hope that that approach will improve the situation without a need for rigid controls and without stifling debate.

COMMITTEE BUSINESS

Report on the Economic Challenges facing Northern Ireland

Madam Speaker: I ask Members to be silent as I clarify how I propose to conduct the debate.

Members will understand that the relationship between the Committee on the Preparation for Government (PFG) and its Chairpersons is different from that which pertained in Committees of the Northern Ireland Assembly. In the light of that, it was agreed by the Business Committee at its meeting last week that a Chairperson of the Committee on the Preparation for Government will formally move the motion but will make no attempt to represent the views of the Committee; that there will be no winding-up speech on behalf of the Committee; and that I will put the Question on the motion.

The Business Committee also agreed that Members will be called to speak on the motion according to the usual convention with an upper time limit of 15 minutes to be applied to all those called to speak.

I have agreed with my Deputy Speakers that, for this and forthcoming debates on reports from the PFG Committee, although one of the Deputy Speakers, in his role as Committee Chairperson, will formally move the relevant motion, he will not seek to represent the views of the Committee or vote on the motion. In agreeing this approach, I am satisfied that my Deputy Speakers' ability to assist me in presiding in the Chamber will not be compromised. Members will appreciate that such arrangements are unusual but reflective of the circumstances in which we currently operate.

In view of the Secretary of State's direction that the Assembly meet today and again tomorrow, subject to the continuation of debate, I propose to suspend proceedings today at around 6.00 pm and resume at 10.30 am tomorrow, unless it becomes clear later in the debate this afternoon that the number of Members still wishing to speak is such that the debate could be concluded by sitting for a limited period beyond 6.00 pm. However, I do not intend that the House should sit later than 7.00 pm. If that is clear, I shall proceed.

Dr McDonnell: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. You are allowing Members one extra minute. Will you clarify whether that extra minute is to cover all interruptions, or whether it is one extra minute per interruption?

Madam Speaker: I take that point on board and will address it when necessary. That will not be necessary today, because each Member will be allowed 15 minutes. I hope that Members will police that 15 minutes themselves, and if there are interventions, I will look into that and give clearer guidance.

Dr McDonnell: When I speak, I am usually subjected to a torrent of abuse from the Members opposite. I would welcome an extra minute for every interruption. [Laughter.]

Madam Speaker: I am sure that you would, but you will not need it today. Each Member will have 15 minutes, and even for politicians that is enough.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Can you assure us that this debate will go on tomorrow? We have listed Members to speak tomorrow as well as today. There is a full complement. I would like to be assured that people who have come today, and those who will be here tomorrow, will have the opportunity, if there is time, to address the Assembly.

Madam Speaker: As I said, I have agreed with the Secretary of State that the sitting will continue tomorrow. If there are Members who, for good reason, are unable to be here today, and there are sufficient to continue the sitting tomorrow morning, then we will do that. I considered that for the convenience of Members I would stop the debate at 6.00 pm. If 6.00 pm comes and there are only two Members left to speak, we will continue and conclude the debate. If Members do not agree to that, we can extend the debate into tomorrow morning, but no further. Rest assured that each Member will have his or her say in this debate. That is useful for all Members to know.

Mr K Robinson: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. There is a difficulty with the acoustics at this end of the Chamber. There is an echo. It was difficult to hear Dr McDonnell and some of the other Members. May we have that checked before the debate begins?

Madam Speaker: I appreciate that there is a difficulty there. It has occurred before. We will look into that.

Mr Wells: I beg to move

That the Assembly approves the first report from the Committee on the Preparation for Government on the economic challenges facing Northern Ireland; agrees that it should be submitted to the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland and, pending restoration of the Institutions, calls on the Secretary of State, the Committee on the Preparation for Government and others to take action to implement the recommendations in the report.

I am confident that Members will have much to say about our report, and therefore I will not spend any time going into the finer points. Instead I want, on the Committee's behalf, to thank all those who made it possible.

The Preparation for Government Committee has been meeting five days a week for three months; three days for the full Committee and two days for the Subgroup on the Economic Challenges facing Northern Ireland. That has placed an enormous burden on everyone concerned. I am grateful, therefore, to the three Members who agreed to act as Deputy Chairpersons of the subgroup: Mrs Naomi Long, Mr David McClarty and Mr Alban Maginness. Their help was appreciated, given that the other two Chairmen were so heavily involved in the full Committee.

I also thank the many witnesses who gave evidence in July and August, during the holiday period. The subgroup was delighted that so many organisations involved in the economic activities of the Province were able to come forward at short notice, give detailed evidence and appear before the subgroup to answer searching questions. It was much appreciated, and it is reflected both in the volume and the content of the report.

I also thank the Assembly staff, who gave so much to assist the subgroup in its deliberations. I do not want to pick out individuals, but at every level of the Assembly secretariat, staff — including Hansard, catering and security — gave of their time when many others were on holiday. We thank them for that.

It has been a long and, sometimes, a hot summer. However, I found the process to be an enjoyable one. I commend the report to Members and look forward to an interesting debate.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: The Assembly is tight for time. A deadline of 24 November 2006 has been set, which we have been told is set in stone. Nevertheless, a reactivated Assembly now meets after a prolonged summer recess. The Minister for Foreign Affairs of a foreign country, Mr Ahern the second, has threatened that if we do not do what we are told, namely allow IRA/Sinn Féin, as it is now, into Government, we will be forced into what amounts to united Ireland oversight.

There is no doubt that a successful and prosperous economy requires a stable and peaceful environment. Each is dependent on the other. Over the last several days, the Secretary of State has been talking about the great measure of progress that has been made. Witness the empty seats today. No progress is being made, because the British Government, evidently supported by the Government of the Irish Republic in Dublin, are dedicated to having IRA/Sinn Féin, as it is now, in Government. The party that I lead, and others who hold the same convictions, will democratically resist that.

Sinn Féin/IRA is boycotting the proceedings of the Assembly today. Sinn Féin demanded that the PFG Committee meet, decided when it sat on the Committee that the report should be published and yet refuses to come to the Assembly Chamber to discuss that report.

Madam Speaker: Dr Paisley, please keep to the motion.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: I am keeping to the motion. The motion relates to the report, which Sinn Féin has stated should be printed. Sinn Féin stated that during proceedings of a Committee of this House, and that is recorded in volume 4 of the report. I am trying to steer carefully. Madam Speaker, I know that you are so well briefed that you think you may knock me out. However, I do not think that you will do so, because I will stick to what Members are supposed to discuss.

Madam Speaker: I have no intention of knocking you out.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: Thank you. I am greatly relieved. [Laughter.]

The Secretary of State is quick to claim that Sinn Féin/IRA has done all that has been required of it. All right-thinking people in Northern Ireland will reject such a conclusion. An end to the illegality and criminality of the IRA has yet to be seen. Its very existence has robbed the Northern Ireland economy of millions of pounds each year. IRA/Sinn Féin refuses to support the police, the courts and the rule of law. Such behaviour cannot be a basis for admission to Government in any democratic country.

The Secretary of State has done nothing to address those issues. He must remember that unionists are not blocking the way. His time would be better served by ensuring that IRA/Sinn Féin gets off the backs of the people and that the days of crime and gangsterism are over. One need only look at the recent events in Newry, when millions of pounds worth of damage was done to the economy, to see that those days are not over. How, in those circumstances, can the motion that is before the Assembly be implemented? That cannot happen in the current atmosphere.

Threats or any form of pressure from the Northern Ireland Office (NIO) to reach any agreement that falls short of the democratic test will have no effect. If time is required to build a solid, democratic foundation for future generations, let us take that time. For 35 years, the people of Northern Ireland were subject to a sickening sectarian murder campaign. As well as taking the lives of over 3,000 individuals, the terrorists wreaked havoc on our ability to function as a normal society.

Business bore the brunt of terrorism. Shops, offices and factories were frequently blown to smithereens. Businessmen who supplied the security forces were personally targeted. I am sure that other contributors to the debate will elaborate on those points.

2.30 pm

A former chief executive of the Industrial Development Agency (IDA) Ireland once remarked:

“In the battle to attract overseas investment to Ireland, no financial weapon has been more important than tax in convincing new industry to locate here. It remains the IDA’s unique selling point, giving Ireland a critical advantage in winning new investment.”

That illustrates why Northern Ireland's corporation tax rate must be on a competitive footing with that of our Southern neighbour. Let there be a level playing field, and let us not deny the Ulster people what they should receive at this time of difficulty and rebuilding.

Many in the Chamber want to embrace the Irish Republic more closely in an economic sense, among other senses. I am all for Northern Ireland businesses selling their products to the Southern market, as long as that happens organically and is free from political interference. That is how trading happens between any two bordering states. However, the cold, hard fact of business is that the Republic of Ireland is our economic competitor for foreign direct investment (FDI). The Irish will do nobody in Northern Ireland, irrespective of their political leanings, any favours when it comes to securing some multi-million pound investment. Reducing the headline corporation tax rate to a lower figure than that of the Irish Republic would obviously boost our ability to compete and could lead to an increase in corporation tax revenue from Northern Ireland.

The Exchequer must understand that, far from losing it revenue, in the long run, a corporation tax reduction could yield higher tax revenue as new jobs are created, new companies invest and existing companies expand. If reducing the headline rate is too unpalatable, the Treasury should seriously consider other measures that would have the same net effect as lowering corporation tax to less than the Republic's rate of 12.5 %.

There are alternative ways of achieving the same result, such as the proposal that approved and allowable expenditure on research and development and training and marketing that is included in the corporation tax computation be multiplied by a factor of three. That expenditure could be then deducted from taxable profits for businesses based in Northern Ireland.

In addition to enhancing Northern Ireland's attractiveness to investors, the proposal should also address issues such as research and development, increase of exports and the development of new skills. The Democratic Unionist Party strongly supports a wide-ranging financial package for Northern Ireland. The effects of terrorism are still felt today: low investment; undeveloped tourist potential; skills deficit; educational underachievement; and poor community capacity.

Northern Ireland faces unique challenges in the United Kingdom. In particular, no other part of the UK has a land border with another EU member state and has to deal with all the implications that that brings. No other part of the United Kingdom has suffered as Northern Ireland has over the past 30 years or faces such huge obstacles to attracting investment and retaining indigenous firms. We are also on the border of the United Kingdom and Europe, and, consequently, we face additional costs.

We are not asking for special treatment; we are asking for recognition from the Government of the hardship that Northern Ireland's economy endured. If the Province had not been forced to weather the storm of terrorism, our economy would be stronger today. A fully funded and targeted economic package that addresses all Northern Ireland's infrastructural needs, education and skills requirements and that includes financial incentives to encourage the growth of the private sector is essential if Northern Ireland is to advance out of the economic challenges generated by 35 years of terror.

I wholeheartedly endorse the aspects of the report that promise to our people the opportunity to apply their talents, to pull themselves out of the pit that was dug by our enemies and give them the chance to rebuild a Northern Ireland where everyone — regardless of their class or creed — will live in peace and harmony. I trust that the House will send the message that we intend to rebuild our Province on principles that will last not only for our days, but for the coming days for our children and our children's children.

Madam Speaker: Before proceeding, I ask Members — particularly Ken Robinson — whether they can hear clearly. I have been informed that the fault has been rectified.

Mr K Robinson: I heard every word that Dr Paisley said.

Madam Speaker: I am sure that, like myself, you clung to every word.

Mr McNarry: The Ulster Unionist Party offers its sincere gratitude and thanks to those who freely gave their time to contribute to the first report on the economic challenges facing our country.

The report contains a consistency of clarity confirming that the restoration of the devolved Assembly would be good, not only for Northern Ireland but better for the economy. The evidence from the economic coalface indicated a sense of despair with our direct rulers. Those on whom we depend to drive the economy would trust locally elected representatives to talk up Northern Ireland, to boost its opportunities for economic outreach and to go the extra mile in encouraging investment rather than have the NIO invective that implies that Northern Ireland has a failed economy.

It is unfair to single out one contributor to the subgroup, because all contributions were thought provoking. They must be heeded, and, for justice to be done, they should be advanced by a restored Assembly or by those who are in charge of direct rule. However, I ask the House to take note of the contribution from the Northern Ireland Youth Forum. Regrettably, the absence of Sinn Féin today is another insult to those young people, and others, who feel that the Assembly remains the best opportunity to provide effective leadership for facing up to and addressing current and future economic challenges.

If Sinn Féin cannot share space in this place today and participate in a debate on a report that it signed up to, why should it expect the House to embrace it in sharing in our work on any other occasion? Does Sinn Féin think that, by insulting guests of the House, by disrespecting its MLA colleagues, and by displaying disdain for a report on the economic challenges facing our country, it will advance its inclusion and automatic entry into any future accountable role of responsibility that deals with the economy or with any other devolved matter?

To be frank, Madam Speaker, those Laurel-and-Hardy antics are not the type of behaviour with which my party wishes to be associated.

During the debate, my party leader, Sir Reg Empey, and my colleagues Esmond Birnie, Roy Beggs and Leslie Cree, who attended meetings of the economic subgroup, will — along with Ken Robinson and other Ulster Unionist experts in particular fields — expand on much of the detail and recommendations contained in the subgroup's first report.

We can all agree that the report is very comprehensive. Given the tight schedule, it is all the more remarkable that the completed work is before us today. Meetings of the PFG Committee and the economic challenges subgroup elicited some very interesting thoughts from the most unlikely quarters. There were moments during the consideration of the small matter of putting together an economic-package-cum-peace-dividend when the debate took place with such competitive enthusiasm that there was a danger of it turning into an auction. Having agreed that the Irish Republic should make a significant contribution of euros, Sinn Féin kicked off with a bid that the Irish and British Governments should make £10 billion available over the next 10 years. However, not to be outshone by their Irish-unity-aspirational soulmates, the SDLP weighed in with its own bid of £20 million over the next 10 years.

Dr Farren: It was £20 billion.

Mr McNarry: It was £20 billion.

Dr Farren: Why not?

Mr McNarry: Needless to say, while all the bids have been banked, the report presented today falls short of giving a conclusion on a recommended sum. Perhaps a figure will be identified in the second report of the subgroup, which is due for endorsement by the PFG Committee on 4 October. I hope that we will have an opportunity to debate that report.

Considering the key elements of proper negotiations that are being talked up for next month in some Ulster-Scots bolthole, it is encouraging to note that skills of negotiation are to be tested in direct talks with the Government on securing an appropriate sum that is to be used in delivering an equitable form of economic regeneration. My party's position is that the auction concept is superfluous to the positive identification of the problems and real needs and to ensuring that the distribution of any package is used for specific purposes, not wish lists. While people can talk, speculate and prepare wish lists, there remains unresolved the underlying factor of a requirement to see the books, to peruse the balance sheets and to find out why Northern Ireland stands accused by direct-rule Ministers of not paying its way.

The bid frenzy did not stop at those seeking a package for economic regeneration. A fairy godfather emerged who, within days, was out-fairied by one of his party colleagues. That is important when considering how corporation tax reductions are to be paid for. The question of who may suffer as a consequence of those corporation tax reductions must be thoroughly thought through, as must the questions of who may gain and how those gains can bring overall benefits to the economy.

On two separate occasions, different members of the DUP sprinkled fairy dust on the corporation-tax-magical-reduction formula. The first DUP proposal that was alluded to was that our headline corporation tax should be reduced to a rate lower than 12·5%. If that proved unacceptable to the Treasury, the DUP would consider a cocktail of incentives to achieve the same reduction. Perhaps the mixture of fairy dust and cocktails proved to be intoxicating for the DUP because, a few days later, it told the subgroup that 10% was the lower-than-12·5% figure that it wanted for corporation tax.

Madam Speaker, what brilliant tactical negotiators we have in our midst. We have the anti-British Members who cannot set foot in this House today but who want £10 billion of peace money to repair the carnage that they caused to all aspects of life here, including the economy. We also have the great self-anointed best negotiators who announce in advance what they are seeking when going to the table. Of course we require and deserve an economic package, and of course we should help the business sector compete with the Irish Republic. We will assist in driving forward competitiveness, but this economic report, thankfully, is more important to our people than an eye-catching sound bite or a fleeting Hansard reference.

2.45 pm

Ulster Unionists share with employers and employees the seriousness of facing up to the economic challenges that are detailed in the subgroup's report. We take employment seriously, realising the importance of providing better services in schools and hospitals, training young people, helping people back to work, and not taxing people out of their homes. We take every element of Government seriously. We also take seriously the ugly and nefarious use by our direct rulers of the stresses and strains of the economy and of personal and company taxation as a means of black-mailing and spinning against the integrity of every Member in the House today.

There are grubby hands wielding dirty sticks to beat out of us an endorsement of foul-smelling concessions made to those who are not here. However, Members will have noted that the extensive report, covering over 1,000 pages, does not contain a recommendation compelling us, or anyone, to rush forward demanding the keys to the devolved economic vaults.

I mentioned that seeing the books is essential; so too is knowing how the impediments highlighted in the report can be overcome. Those impediments are: excessive bureaucracy and regulations; departmental paperchase bottlenecks; highs on strategic tittle-tattle, but lows on implementation and decision-taking; poor spatial planning; a poor planning process; poor literacy and numeracy levels among school leavers; a skills deficit; lamentable urban regeneration; the infrastructure deficit; transport problems; an uncompetitive fiscal environment; and low incentive for business expansions. Those are the crucial issues facing us, and the Government, here and now.

It took a well-organised and highly publicised public protest to shake the Government on their stance on manufacturing rates relief, to the extent that the Secretary of State has formed a working group to consider the issue further. Is protest the only process open to civic society?

At the top of the list of impediments is the issue that only local politicians can resolve: support for the institutions and the police. Political stability and its staying power are bound to be high on any investor's enquiries about Northern Ireland. That is why, after consultation with Sir Reg Empey, the Ulster Unionist Party insisted that the report recorded references to two recent statements by people who should be aware of unionist sensitivities. Our views on comments by Peter Hain MP and Sir Tony O'Reilly are expressed on pages 30 and 31 of volume 1 of the report.

I draw Members' attention to the performance of Maria Eagle MP when she appeared before the subgroup. Having been away from her desk for a month, it would have been unfair to expect the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, with ministerial responsibility for the Departments of Enterprise, Trade and Investment, Employment and Learning, and Education, to have read the report, which her Departments had not received. However, it was disappointing that she had not been briefed on the subgroup's work.

That is where so-called joined-up government becomes jumbled-up government. I say that because the most senior personnel from each of the three Departments for which the Minister is responsible gave evidence in person to the subgroup. Information about the subgroup's activities was also regularly published on the Assembly website. Unfortunately, the Minister was not best prepared for her meeting with the subgroup. That is why I am pleased that she has agreed to be better prepared for the next meeting that she has promised to attend. I am also pleased because I expect a response from the Minister on two Ulster Unionist proposals: one to initiate a knowledge bank, which is recommendation 6; and another to establish a dedicated post in the Department of Education to drive improvement in science education, which is recommendation 7.

Working on the Committee on the Preparation for Government, and its subgroup, has so far been a privilege and a useful exercise. It has not been pistols at dawn. All in all, the scoping work is steady as she goes, with many aspects remaining works in progress.

On behalf of the Ulster Unionist Party, I offer sincere thanks to all the staff. I thank, in particular, the two Deputy Speakers who chaired our meetings. Mr Wells, who has already spoken today, has been most gracious in the manner in which he has conducted both himself and our meetings. I regret that I cannot refer personally to the other Deputy Speaker. Perhaps, Madam Speaker, you may consider making a ruling. If the Assembly is called again to debate the reports that are due to be completed shortly, will we have a Sinn Féin Deputy Speaker doing the job that Mr Wells has done today? Perhaps the House should know that in advance.

I thank the staff. Without their work, their integrity and the manner in which they kept us together, I very much doubt that the report could have been completed in time for us to be here today. I commend the report to the House.

Ms Ritchie: On behalf of the SDLP, I thank all those who were involved in the preparation of this report: the various Chairpersons of the Committee; the members from the different parties; and the Clerk and all his staff, who helped us through the last few weeks.

The economic challenges report contains an in-depth assessment of the current state of our economy, many of the ingredients necessary to pump-prime our economy, and the fiscal challenges that might promote foreign direct and indigenous investment. The report considers whether an economic package or peace dividend could contribute to economic regeneration and how that might be delivered. Much further work remains to be done in that area.

Approval has been given for that further work, with a focus on the economic dividend, the appropriate fiscal environment in which business can grow and what has to be done to promote an education and skills strategy that best reflects the needs of the local economy. Nobody — not even those who provided evidence to the subgroup — suggests that that is an easy task. However, it should no longer be left on the political back-burner. Political stability and economic growth are inextricably linked and bound together. If we are to do this, we need the immediate restoration of the political institutions. None of us can shirk from that responsibility.

The Assembly first discussed this issue on 16 May. On that occasion the SDLP said:

“There are major economic challenges facing all of us ... the people who sent us here expect us to do something about those challenges and to act very soon to correct the punitive policies of the direct rule Administration.” — [Official Report, Bound Volume 19, col 1, p 16].

That position has not changed and is now more compelling than ever. Pending restoration, the political imperative to enable us to respond to those challenges lies with the British and Irish Governments. The community imperative demands that we all get our acts together and get all the institutions up and running as per the Good Friday Agreement to set the economic and infrastructure agenda for the next 25 years. What have we been doing? How have we been acting on that community imperative? Are we going to wring our hands like Pontius Pilate and claim that others should do it for us? Are we going to remain in the political vacuum or grasp the baton of political power and make change to improve the lives of all the people who live here? The choice is clear: restore the political institutions.

Why are we waiting? Why are we taking so long to implement the mandate that we were given? Why are some of us afraid and dilatory about implementing the wishes of the people? Do we want our economy to stagnate further, our infrastructure to crumble further and our young people to be either part of the brain drain or not given the education and skills training opportunities that they require?

Each of us, and I say this again, must seize the political opportunity facing us now — we must not leave it to someone else. Do we want the people that we represent, and the coming generations, to face an ignominious future? We should examine our consciences and take the issue seriously.

It was not surprising that, following an in-depth investigation of our economy, many challenges and impediments to its growth were identified by those who gave oral and written evidence. Chief among those challenges is the need to provide political stability, which I referred to earlier, and that is within our hands. We must not wait for the publication of another report and a debate. Let us get on with the job of restoring the institutions and providing that political bedrock upon which our economy could grow and develop and deliver for all of us.

Other structural weaknesses in the Northern Ireland economy were identified in the oral and written submissions. The Minister underscored them when she gave oral evidence to the subgroup last week. The specific areas were: the need to increase investment in research and development and promote innovation and creativity; the need to promote and encourage enterprise; the need to ensure that our people have the right skills for future employment opportunities; the need to ensure that we have a modern infrastructure in place to support business; the need to address working-age inactivity levels, which are 28% higher than the average in Great Britain; and a weak private sector compared to a dominant public sector subsidised by the Treasury in London.

Twenty-one recommendations have been proposed to enable the dilution of the challenges and to ensure that our economy grows into a vibrant force. Some of the principal recommendations are: that the current level of public expenditure should be protected during a transitional period that is agreed with the Treasury to allow competitive fiscal challenges and targeted investment to rebalance the economy towards high value-added foreign direct investment and our own indigenous companies; that investment in vocational training skills and R&D activities in universities should be increased and an effective strategy developed to enhance knowledge transfer from applied R&D activity in commercially viable products; that FE college curricula should be best integrated with the needs of business and focused on areas where skills shortages are hampering future economic growth; that any savings that may be made from Government efficiencies should be retained and used in Northern Ireland; and that detailed analysis is undertaken to identify economic opportunities through establishing effective clustering and collaboration with the rest of this island on infrastructure development.

I am pleased that the SDLP was able to secure the last point, because we have to work our North/South agenda to be able to tap into all of the economic opportunities that exist and to deal with the impediments that were laid down when partition occurred. Many people felt cut off from their economic hinterland. We must ensure that those deficiencies are corrected and that people never suffer the great disadvantages that many of our neighbours suffered for over 70 years.

We must look at skills training along designated economic corridors with the express purpose of addressing regional disparities, whether it be in the west of Ireland — and I mean the west of Northern Ireland as well as the South, for those who do not catch my drift — or elsewhere. We must look at the North/South agenda.

We must also recognise that Northern Ireland has suffered from years of underinvestment in infrastructure and that the planning process should be reviewed immediately, adequately resourced and properly and effectively managed. Quite often, the Planning Service, due to delays in processing applications, has acted as an impediment to business and economic development and growth.

Mr Donaldson: I thank the Member for giving way.

To residents of north or east Antrim, Glasgow is as likely to be a part of the economic hinterland as is Dublin. Therefore, is it not just as important to build and sustain the economic east-west links to an island that has almost 60 million inhabitants, and is the fifth largest economy in the world, as it is to develop North/South links?

3.00 pm

Ms Ritchie: I thank the Member for Lagan Valley for that point. I agree that we must consider every possible opportunity. The SDLP does not wish to deny anybody his or her opportunities, and it hopes that its colleagues on the opposite Benches will consider the pragmatic opportunities that lie within the North/South agenda.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Ms Ritchie: I see from Members' assent that they concur with that view.

The SDLP believes that an urgent review of the most appropriate and effective structures for developing urban and rural regeneration plans should be undertaken. Some work has been done in many of Northern Ireland's towns and villages, but much more needs to be done, and it needs to be concentrated on the rural economy.

The economic package should focus on the following areas: community regeneration; infrastructure; education and skills; and a range of fiscal incentives capable of attracting FDI and encouraging the growth of high-value-added indigenous companies.

Since the subgroup completed its report, some interesting facts have emerged, which I hope are not intended to be a barrier or a distraction to the Assembly's addressing the need to rejuvenate and incentivise the economy. First, in her submission last week, the Minister with responsibility for Enterprise, Trade and Investment said that economic development is a top priority for the British Government and that the desire is to change the direction of the Northern Ireland economy for the better — I hope that that is not to be achieved by hectoring Members. However, the Minister deftly refused to answer some key questions about the structure of the economic package and whether the funding for it would be additional to the block grant or come from the sale of land at Belfast harbour. We need to push the Minister, the Department of Finance and Personnel and the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment to specify the areas that they have undertaken research on and what they suggest the economic package should contain.

In parallel — and this is being done as part of the subgroup's future work — we urgently need to undertake independent party and external research into what is required to upgrade Northern Ireland's infrastructure. That does not mean that the people of Northern Ireland should be further taxed to pay for something that is not their problem. We did not cause the problem; we did not have responsibility for it at the time. Members must consider what is required to grow the economy and determine the appropriate financial costings. That work is required urgently.

There were two worrying articles in Friday's 'Belfast Telegraph'. One suggested that a confidential document pressing the NIO on its preparations for a major Government spending review had been leaked from the Treasury. Apparently, it contained a raft of controversial proposals for cutting expenditure in Northern Ireland, including examining the scope to introduce road tolls. Quite clearly, the leaked document ignored one of the recommendations in the subgroup's report: that the current level of public expenditure should be protected and that the business investment programme budget needs to be reviewed and upgraded.

Where does the debate on the economic dividend fit into that leaked memo? Are the Government giving any serious consideration to a financial package that would upgrade the deficits in Northern Ireland's infrastructure, which they have failed to address over many years and that they want the local population to pay for through the additional tax burdens of increased and unequal rates and water charges — charges, of course, that many consider to be major impediments to economic growth?

The other article referred to the fact that organised crime costs the economy about £600 million a year. The British Government estimated that figure last Thursday, and the figures were included in a report on criminality in another place. Those who are absent today have a duty and a responsibility to ensure that our streets are rid of criminality so that our economy can grow.

Suffice it to say that urgent political action is now needed to restore the political institutions to ensure that the infrastructural, educational, training and economic challenges are met and addressed and that a plan is put in place to consign disadvantage, deprivation and criminality to the history books.

We need a restoration of the political order that was ushered in by the Good Friday Agreement. That agreement provided the prescription for a sound political bedrock upon which the local economy could grow and develop; act as an incentive to foreign direct investment; pump-prime indigenous industries; encourage the private sector to blossom; ensure that all economic opportunities are availed of; and ensure that we eventually eradicate the economic disadvantages caused by the partition of this island.

Members on the opposite Benches may smile and grimace, but either we are serious about this or we are not. We must ensure the provision of a better way of life for all the people who live here, whether they are unionist, nationalist, loyalist or republican. Let us subscribe to do that, to work together from this day onwards and ensure the restoration of the political institutions to safeguard an economy that can grow and develop for us, for our children and for future generations.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Ford: It seems to be a cliché of the debate that each contributor must express thanks to a large number of people. In proposing the motion, the Deputy Speaker started that trend. On this occasion, it is not a cliché; a significant amount of work was done during what would normally pass for the summer recess. We should record our thanks to the Chairpersons and staff who looked after the business of the Committee and to the wider secretariat who provided support. I thank the Deputy Speaker Mr Wells for ensuring that there was some nice vegetarian food at lunchtime. I thank the members of all five parties who took part: the DUP; Sinn Féin, which, unfortunately, is not here, despite its contribution to, and unanimous agreement for, the report; members of the former UUPAG; the SDLP; and Alliance.

Despite formally being a member of the subgroup, I delegated much of that work to colleagues, so I can praise them without blowing my own trumpet too much. A significant number of people provided oral and written evidence. We should be grateful to them for that, especially as they were also largely working through their own summer holidays. It is invidious to single people out but, if it is not too embarrassing to David McNarry, I certainly agree with him that the Youth Forum made one of the most positive contributions. I also welcome the fact that the Minister appeared before the subgroup with three senior officials. Perhaps it is the nature of ministerial presentations and Civil Service responses that they were not nearly as interesting as the Youth Forum. However, they were of substance, and we should be grateful for the Minister's willingness to come, and to agree to come back as the Committee continues its work.

However, although the report contains some significant work, in many senses it only scratched the surface. Much remains to be done, and I welcome the fact that the full PFG Committee has now given its authorisation for the subgroup to continue its work. The three terms of reference for the subgroup were: to identify the major impediments to the development of the economy in Northern Ireland; to consider fiscal initiatives that might promote foreign direct investment; and to consider how a local economic package might contribute to economic regeneration in the event of restoration of the institutions.

It is absolutely clear that the third of those matters was barely touched on, except in the Dutch auction that was mentioned earlier. Much further detailed work needs to be done in the coming weeks, and there will be a real challenge for the PFG Committee and the Assembly to move away from the begging-bowl mentality of statements such as: "I want £10 billion"; "I want £15 billion"; "I want £20 billion." Instead, we must look at realistic prospects for costed proposals that will make a significant impact on the welfare of all the people of Northern Ireland.

We must not continue the 30-year begging-bowl mentality but ensure that the resources that we may get from the Treasury can finally be targeted to meet particular needs. I therefore welcome the fact that we will continue to discuss that issue in the coming weeks, because there is still a huge amount of work to be done in engaging with Ministers, Departments, economic partners and social partners in general. We owe an enormous debt of gratitude to the Northern Ireland Business Alliance, the Irish Congress of Trade Unions (ICTU) and the Northern Ireland Council for Voluntary Action (NICVA) for what they have done already, but I suspect that we will be speaking to them again.

The issue of fiscal incentives preoccupied the Committee to a considerable extent. Clearly, that work is not finished because, as Members who were not involved will see in recommendations 16 and 17, there is still much to be done. It is very difficult to see how we can gain the practical benefits of changes in fiscal arrangements. At the beginning of the debate, Dr Paisley highlighted the obvious issue of the headline corporation tax figure. Moreover, we have evidence that targeting the potential benefits in such areas as research and development may have a much better long-term effect.

In the past we have brought in, by particular measures, foreign direct investment that has lasted only a relatively short time. We have all seen what happens when basic metal-bashing industries are brought in. They move on a generation later, because international capital is footloose and goes wherever the benefits are. Low wage rates will beat anything that we can offer in the United Kingdom or in any part of the western section of the European Union.

The European Court of Justice (ECJ) made an interesting decision last week when it ruled against the Portuguese Government on the issue of variable corporation tax in the Azores. I am not a lawyer, but there are plenty of lawyers in this place who immediately read ECJ decisions. As I understand it, the decision of the court stated that one principal requirement to have variation in tax rates across a single nation was the right to have a separate local jurisdiction. The message is clear: only if we can transform this Assembly into the Northern Ireland Assembly that it should be, with all of the institutions working properly, will we be able to seek and get European approval for variations in corporation tax, whatever way we target that matter. If that is to be a crucial part of the package that Northern Ireland has to offer, it places a huge responsibility on everyone in this Chamber and, indeed, on those who are not in the Chamber this afternoon.

In the past, we have seen what went wrong when we depended on traditional heavy industries, and then on man-made fibres. In my constituency of South Antrim, over the last couple of weeks, we have seen the almost total closure of Daewoo, which was a third-generation electronic assembly business. At one stage, it was one of the most successful video recorder makers in Europe, but it is now defeated by the wage rates paid in the Mediterranean, the Far East and central Europe.

We must start to build on a skills economy and use the type of work that is being done in our universities on a range of new technologies to build on the skills that exist in various technology parks and firms at the cutting edge of development and transform those into numerous jobs for highly skilled people. Unless we do that, our corporation tax rate will hardly matter, because we will not get anywhere, given the wage rates that exist in this part of the world. We will simply see any prospect of manufacturing jobs, including R&D elements of manufacturing, moving to places such as India or China. It is a huge challenge for us to ensure that we can move those matters forward, and the Committee will continue to work to see how that can be done. Others can reflect on recommendations 16 and 17 over the coming weeks.

It seems that, in one very real sense, the history of this society is an impediment because we believed that traditional industries — whether heavy engineering or agriculture — could provide employment for our people and, over the last 30 years, we have realised that they cannot.

There is another major impediment that has not been highlighted as much as it might have been in the report, and that is the simple failure to move forward on the issues of the institutions and policing to ensure that we build a new society that will enable a new, successful economy to develop.

3.15 pm

It is easy to examine other issues in which responsibility lies elsewhere, but, in this case, responsibility lies with us. I do not know of any successful world economy that is built on segregation and an apartheid mentality. Northern Ireland has to move forward and build a shared future in order to have a prosperous and successful economy.

The divisions of the past 30 years have had economic consequences. If 0.5% of the gross domestic product (GDP) growth is shaved off for every year of the troubles, the cumulative effect is a huge measure of how far Northern Ireland has fallen behind the UK as a whole and the Republic of Ireland. There are many instances of lost investment, and some people might cite the level of investment lost because of a single weekend on the Whiterock Road this time last year. The black economy, organised crime and paramilitary intimidation and extortion have all driven away employment.

There have also been economic losses in the tourism industry. It might serve us well to compare the statistics for friends and family visiting with footloose tourism. Visitors might go to one or two establishments in Northern Ireland, but they are paying for accommodation in Dublin or Donegal. We are not reaping the benefits that we should.

There is a lack of labour mobility because people feel that they cannot apply for jobs in certain areas. There are financial costs attached to segregation because sometimes two sets of bodies, which often have inferior accommodation, have to be set up to deal with the legacy of the troubles. Our children are educated in several different types of school, which adds 30% to the cost of education provision. Those issues may seem to affect only the public sector, but they do affect the private sector also.

In relation to the growth of the private sector, some of Northern Ireland's brightest and best young people seek jobs outside Northern Ireland or seek safe jobs in the professions or in public service. If we want to build an enterprise culture, we must find some way to move that forward.

As we start to move society forward, some benefits are emerging. Had European enlargement happened 10 years ago, not so many people from Poland, the Czech Republic and Estonia would have wanted to live and work in Northern Ireland. There are some inklings of movement in that area. However, it is up to us to build the kind of society in which such people will come and contribute to our economy alongside those who have been born and bred here.

It is easy for us to agree on other people's responsibilities. It is easy for us to criticise the Government — and we can be critical about what the Government have and have not done in recent years. It is easy to agree on the economic measures that we seek, and it would be easy to pass around the begging bowl and ask for many billions of pounds. However, we bear the primary responsibility for changing this society into a society in which we can work together and deal with the outstanding issues. The economic challenges subgroup showed how partnership can work, and it is only by the five parties in the Assembly, the two Governments, the business community and other social partners working together that we can build a shared, peaceful, prosperous future.

Mr Dawson: I support the comments of other Members in thanking the secretariat staff who have worked through the summer to put the report together. I also thank the Chairpersons from the various parties. It was a difficult task for the officials to pull together all the strands of evidence, be cognisant of political sensitivities and formulate recommendations to the satisfaction of all the parties around the table.

For the most part, the parties behaved in a business-like way in subgroup meetings. In the early days, that, perhaps, gave us a false sense of encouragement. It is very disappointing, therefore, that the Benches opposite are yet again empty and that Sinn Féin agreed the report in the economic challenges subgroup but subsequently rejected it in the Preparation for Government Committee. It must have been the dissident influence.

I understand that Sinn Féin has gone through a number of somersaults and U-turns since its original crisis about whether to accept or reject the report. Today, the party's position is that it has accepted the report but is not prepared to talk about it or to debate it in the Chamber. It is rather strange that those who lecture the rest of us about engaging in dialogue and debate are afraid to debate the report that was agreed unanimously in the economic challenges subgroup. Yet again, that betrays the fact that Sinn Féin has nothing to offer Northern Ireland in respect of the economy. Having bombed and blasted the economy for 35 years, it now has infantile economic policies, which it is not prepared to debate in the Assembly.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Jim Wells] in the Chair)

Many Members who were involved in the economic challenges subgroup also attended an event on Wednesday 6 September at Queen's University, at which many business leaders were present. At that event, business leaders and economists again discussed the needs of the Northern Ireland economy. It was good that business leaders confirmed that the issues raised in the economic challenges subgroup's report go a long way to meeting the expectations of the business community. However, I must point out that the report is more holistic than the views expressed on that occasion. The report clearly points the way to developing an enterprise culture throughout the education system, which was hardly mentioned during the discussion at Queen's University. My colleague David Simpson will elaborate on that point later.

Corporation tax is consistently at the top of the issues raised by the business community as being most important in encouraging economic advance. However, there are disagreements within the business community about the method of corporation tax reform. Perhaps the business community will be able to reach consensus on that before 24 November, but I seriously doubt that it will. Therefore, the Assembly, or a Committee, will have to consider the issue further.

There are four clear points underlying the business community's thinking that I want to reiterate. First, Northern Ireland's regional economy will not have the step change required without a measure as radical as significant variation in corporation tax. All other measures included in the report and referred to in other places are simply variations on what has gone before. They will produce more of the same, but they will not produce the step change required to drive forward Northern Ireland's economy.

Secondly, a varied corporation tax must be competitive against that offered by the Republic of Ireland. There is absolute agreement across the business community that, with regard to FDI, Northern Ireland is in direct competition with its nearest neighbour. On that basis, parity of tax rates would not fit the bill for this jurisdiction.

Thirdly, whatever economic offering is constructed for the benefit of our economy must be clearly understood and communicable to the target audience. With all due respect to the economists and accountants who have advised us at different times, we must not create a complicated structure that needs an army of experts to explain it to any potential investor seeking to come to Northern Ireland.

Fourthly, the measures that will be put in place must encourage indigenous companies to grow, expand and export alongside foreign direct investors, bringing a scale and quality of R&D-focused jobs that will be sufficient to deliver the 140,000 jobs required over the next 10 years, thereby adding value, as well as job numbers, to the economy.

Given those headline factors that the business community focused on, I commend to the House the Democratic Unionist Party's position of a single headline corporation tax rate of 10%. However, as Members mentioned, we are quite happy to consider a cocktail of measures targeting R&D, marketing and training, which would create an effective rate of around 10%.

I note the offer of negotiating assistance from the Member for Strangford Mr McNarry, but, given the record of his party in negotiations, I must respectfully decline. I trust that the work outlined in recommendation 17 of the report will be carried out and that a competitive corporation tax rate can be achieved for Northern Ireland.

Leaving corporation tax aside as the key issue, it is the role of the Government to facilitate economic and employment growth. Having come to this House from the industry sector, and having listened to businessmen and women on a daily basis, it seems to me that somewhere along the way the Government have lost sight of the key message that their purpose is to facilitate growth and not to hinder it.

Government Departments have taken on a life of their own, divorced from the economy and the primary need to promote local economic growth. It seems that delay and indecision are the hallmarks of all Government Departments, and, all the while, businesses across Northern Ireland are losing contracts and jobs at home and abroad. For example, a small firm in my constituency, which is highly innovative, research led and export driven, has been dealing with the Planning Service and the Environment and Heritage Service for more than two years on a project that has immense potential for Northern Ireland's economy. Frustrated by the lack of progress here, the firm took the same project to another part of the United Kingdom and, within five weeks, all of the relevant documentation and licensing were made ready for implementation. Northern Ireland is the loser. That business is now thinking seriously about relocating its entire operation to Scotland and away from Northern Ireland.

Under those circumstances, why would a company prioritise research and development? Why would it, under those circumstances, seek to grow? Why would a foreign investor, regardless of what part of the world he came from, consider locating in Northern Ireland, where he would be frustrated by the bureaucracy of Government? Our Government structures are simply too hard to deal with, too obstructive and too focused on self-protection and self-preservation.

The report before us today refers to the need to refocus Departments on the needs of business and industry. Departments must be agile and responsive to business needs. Time, in business terms, is money. Delays lead to job losses and to a lack of investment by the business community. No business should be delayed or hindered in delivering growth while waiting for a Government Department.

I am convinced that many local businesses and businessmen are being held back because of the activities of Government Departments. They have been taught by experience that it is better and easier to maintain the status quo in their business than to go for growth. I note that some Members referred to the ongoing rates review. I trust that the Government, in putting in place the review of the industrial rating proposals, will not seek to delay or stymie debate in the subgroup but will ensure that a proper conclusion is reached.

If our economy is to develop, Government Departments must be transformed into champions for industry. They must become cheerleaders for business, and they must stop acting as a brake on business development. That will require leadership and the re-engineering of Government Departments, the outsourcing of activities and the cutting away of every layer of bureaucracy that is not focused on creating economic growth. Failure to do that will mean that today's report, like so many other reports on the economy, will simply add to our paper-recycling rate, and nothing will change.

In conclusion, I wish to focus briefly on the economically inactive population in Northern Ireland, which is becoming increasingly essential to the development of our economy. With unemployment currently at an all-time low, this group is one of the few available labour resources of which any business or commercial operation can avail.

We are all aware of the huge numbers that are involved, and behind every statistic there is an individual who has been alienated, for whatever reason, from the world of work.

3.30 pm

In an effort to deal with industrial absenteeism, employers are encouraged to get to know individuals, their motivational issues and the problems that may lead to absences. That same process will be necessary to reduce economic inactivity. It is best done locally, in partnership with local employers, ensuring that the needs of individuals are met and that they are planned back into the world of work at a level that matches their abilities and expectations.

Inactivity in the economy will be reduced if well-paid jobs are available; however, that alone will not be enough. Experience in other places has shown that some people need incentives, as well as encouragement, to contribute to the economy. We simply cannot afford to have as many economically inactive people in Northern Ireland as there are in employment. Unemployment levels fell because they were prioritised and managed. Economic inactivity will fall only if it, too, is actively managed by Departments. I am glad that that matter has been prioritised in the report.

I am pleased to have been part of the subgroup that was responsible for producing the report. Like the economy, it is a work in progress, but it covers many of the essential areas and deserves wide acceptance in the House, in Departments, and in the business community that we seek to serve.

Sir Reg Empey: The UUP has always taken the view that a Committee and subgroups of this nature would be good for the Assembly, and we made those representations to the Secretary of State. What has happened over the summer has shown that parties in the Assembly have a willingness and capacity to work together. It may be useful to cast our minds back to the beginning of the summer. There were rows for weeks over who would chair the Committee. We had many ideas, but eventually the problem was solved. The Deputy Speaker and his colleague filled the gap — and did so, from all reports that I have heard, with dedication and impartiality. They are to be congratulated for that.

In spite of all the rhetoric that accompanied the formation of the Committee, and all the rows over who should chair it, its work proved conclusively that people from every perspective could engage and focus on the issue at hand. That is not a new experience, as people of differing perspectives were given the opportunity to pursue economic development, and were encouraged to work together and achieve things, through local authorities in the mid-1990s. The hon Member for South Belfast Dr McDonnell will know that that achieved a healing process in Belfast and in other places.

Some Members have spoken about the empty Benches opposite and how terrible that is. I am not looking at any Member in particular, but I remember the days when we would have been glad to see empty Sinn Féin benches in local government. I also remember the arguments that went on. Certain people, who shall remain nameless, would have made efforts to keep them out of the room by physically blocking the door. It shows that times and attitudes have changed, as people no longer do that sort of thing.

On a more serious note, this morning we had a presentation from the First Minister for Wales, and recently we had a presentation from the First Minister of Scotland. I listened to both Ministers' presentations, and I was struck by their enthusiasm for their jobs, for devolution and for what they could achieve. I have studied the work that they have carried out in the past few years, and there is no doubt that their achievements have been significant. They have been clearly focused on delivering for their people. The Scottish Parliament and the National Assembly for Wales may have different powers, but the common denominator is their willingness to work closely with their own people, and with us, through the British-Irish Council (BIC), for example. Rhodri Morgan's enthusiasm came across today, and I hope that that will encourage us as we move into a very difficult couple of months during which we will be confronted with some very difficult decisions.

Dr Paisley, a Member for North Antrim, mentioned the Minister for Foreign Affairs in the Irish Republic, Mr Dermot Ahern, who made a speech at Oxford at the weekend. That speech clearly implied a significant level of threat. The member for East Londonderry is not present at the moment, but he commented in the press this weekend that the speech was "disastrous".

I am as strong a supporter of devolution as anybody in the Chamber, but will the lesson never be learned that people cannot be threatened into devolution? It is a partnership, and people can enter into it only if it is their desire to do so. That is their decision to make, and they must base it on the issues and the facts. A political cudgel will not achieve the positive outcome that we seek.

Many Members have commented on North/South co-operation, of which I have always been in favour. When I was Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment, I did my best to promote and benefit from North/South co-operation. However, in a communiqué emanating from the British-Irish Intergovernmental Conference (BIIGC) on 25 July, the Secretary of State announced a series of far-reaching decisions, which received relatively little publicity. Reference has been made today to our being in competition with the Irish Republic. In many sectors, we are indeed in competition. How is it then that, according to that communiqué, were Invest Northern Ireland to run a trade mission to, for example, America, it would be open to any company on this island? There can no longer be a Northern-Ireland-only promotion in another jurisdiction. How can that be, given that we are in competition with each other? That is one of many far-reaching decisions in that communiqué, which seems to have been swept under the carpet.

I see that it has been decided that the overseas facilities and offices of the Industrial Development Agency and of Invest Northern Ireland should be open to any company on the island. I have no difficulty in co-operating where we can. However, we must understand that we are in competition with the Irish Republic, and we cannot be transformed from a regional economy in the United Kingdom to a regional economy on this island. That is what I read into the Secretary of State's decisions and much of the rhetoric that has flowed from the communiqué. The remarks of Mr Ahern at the weekend merely add currency to something that has the potential to significantly damage the improved North/South relationships.

Dr Farren: I thank the Member for giving way.

Does the Member agree that there are benefits to collaboration, notwithstanding the inevitable competition that exists everywhere, whether within Northern Ireland, between Derry and Belfast, or between Cork and Dublin in the Republic? Does he not note the favourable comments of those who participated in the Irish-Government-led delegation to India some months ago, in which several agencies, institutions and businesses from Northern Ireland participated? Some investors might be attracted by the mutuality of facilities between North and South, in that the existence of R&D in one part of the country might support a case for investment in the other part. Therefore we are not being invited to sacrifice ourselves to anyone else, but to take mutual advantage of what is on offer in both parts of the country.

Sir Reg Empey: The Member knows that I support that idea, and he knows that I carried out such work. I worked with the Irish authorities on a number of projects. We agreed in the north-west to form joint activities with the then Industrial Development Board (IDB) and similar authorities in the Republic. I am not against such work, but that is not what the BIIGC statement said. It definitively said that all future missions would be open to every company on the island, irrespective of whether there would be mutual benefit — although frequently there may be.

I am against being put into a rigid position. If, for example, we wished to have a joint mission with people from Scotland, would that mean that everyone could join in? When that matter is taken in conjunction with what the Secretary of State described as our economic failure, it appears to show a total lack of confidence in our ability to do anything here without being propped up by someone else. That sends out the wrong message. I am not against co-operation; I am entirely in favour of it, but it must be kept in context. The statement verges on an attack on sovereignty, and that is not where we want economic co-operation to be.

There was a proposal in the report concerning the financial services sector. The Permanent Secretary of the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment is not here, although his worthy deputy is. He will know that before I was involved in that Department, while I was involved in it, and since, it has always had an ambition to see a meaningful financial services sector developed in Northern Ireland. I strongly support that element of the report. We have very good potential right now. We know that the cost base in Dublin — where the financial services sector almost began its economic revival — has become very high. The same is happening in Glasgow, and Members know about the cost base in the City of London. A wonderful opportunity exists.

There are signs that some essential key companies are showing interest, and there has been some success. I strongly support that aspect of the report. As a community, we should be aiming for a successful financial services sector. If we could point to a sophisticated financial services sector that covers the whole range of services from banking and insurance to brokerage and reinsurance, it would provide good quality employment, give us opportunities to get involved with all sorts of investment and improve our status as an investment location. There are huge opportunities, and they should be pursued with vigour.

Immigration was mentioned in the report. The Member for East Antrim Mr Dawson said that a section of the community is not sufficiently skilled to fill many of our jobs. People who probably have better qualifications are coming in from other countries and filling those posts. As the labour market has been able to fill those posts with people from other parts of the European Union, there is a great temptation to forget about the pool of people who do not have the sufficient level of skills to take those jobs. Since they are filled by people from elsewhere — whether from Poland or Lithuania — we are inclined to forget about the people who are left on the scrap heap. That would be a tragedy for this country, and it could be the basis of social unrest in the future. I hope that we can develop a strategy with employers to deal with that pool of people and ensure that their skills are sufficiently improved. I believe that that strategy should be developed here.

3.45 pm

The First Minister for Wales made the point this morning that Wales has a policy of encouraging the retention of graduates, which we know is also true of Scotland and England. We are the only part of these islands that has no such policy. While in the Executive, I, together with Dr Farren, who was then Minister for Employment and Learning, attempted to track graduates and to keep in touch with them, to ensure that, on leaving university, they could be involved in economic activities here. All that is gone. There is no policy at all. It is just laissez-faire; we let them go. That is grossly irresponsible.

I hope that we will be spared in the coming months to resolve our difficulties, serious though they are, so that we can come to the House with confidence to deal with those problems. Believe me, no one is going to solve them for us.

Dr McDonnell: I am delighted to participate in the debate this afternoon and to throw a little light on the economy, if not as much as I would like. I want to pay tribute to all my colleagues — the core group of 10 who attended throughout, and also the 10 or so others from the various parties — who did so much to ensure that our report was produced rapidly. I also compliment you, Mr Deputy Speaker, for your part; the other Deputy Speaker; and also the alternate Chairpersons: my colleague Mr Maginness, Mrs Long and Mr McClarty.

It would be remiss of me not to mention the Assembly staff and the effort that they put in. They sometimes burnt the midnight oil to keep us going. I was impressed by the commitment of the many dedicated witnesses who made presentations to us. I am even more impressed to look up into the Gallery and see that some are here for today's debate. I see members of the Federation of Small Businesses there now; John Simpson was there earlier, as were others. That represents a level of commitment and interest that the Assembly should not ignore.

In the past hour, we have debated whether Northern Ireland is a regional economy within the UK or within the island of Ireland. It does not matter much. Northern Ireland is both. As I said in the subgroup, I am prepared to take my chances with whatever benefits or opportunities are available in the UK, in the island of Ireland, in Europe or in any other network that we can plug into. We must underpin the hopes and dreams of our constituents, particularly those who are underemployed or outside the employment network. As public representatives and as individuals, we all have dreams and hopes and would like to see a prosperous community.

If Northern Ireland does not have an economy that works efficiently and delivers high levels of value and, as a consequence, high wage levels, many of the constituents who elect us will be forced to emigrate and find opportunities in England, the Irish Republic, Europe, the USA or even as far away as Australia or New Zealand. Members have a solemn duty to do what they can to produce economic opportunities for the graduates to whom my colleague Sir Reg Empey referred a few minutes ago. We must produce economic opportunity and hope for those who need them.

The report is a useful piece of work. Criticisms of it have been muttered, and they are justified. The report was prepared in five short weeks. It has to be viewed as a work in progress. No one should view it as the be-all and end-all. In those five weeks the subgroup gleaned as much information as it could from a wide range of witnesses. We did not see half of the people that we would have liked to have seen, but we probably distilled five months' work into those five weeks.

There is still a lot to do. Members need to continue to gather information, to debate, to become better informed, to fine-tune and to introduce any necessary changes. We cannot leave economic issues aside for 10 years. Our competitors, wherever they are, are not sleeping, and neither should we. I echo the words of George Dawson — who has now left the Chamber — who said that the Government must enable, empower and facilitate economic growth, not inhibit it.

During the previous Assembly, some Members were involved in the inquiry into 'Strategy 2010'. We learned a lot, but much of our effort was lost due to suspension.

The economy can be looked at from many angles, and many approaches can be taken. However, we should not take a philosophical or light-hearted approach, nor should the economy be used as an excuse for an academic discussion. Although those approaches can be useful, Members must be realistic and hard-nosed. We must focus on creating a competitive advantage by targeting two, three or four key niches in the economy that offer an opportunity for a high-tech new economy and in which it may be possible to build the competitive edge that is necessary in a global economy. Opportunities must be aggressively pursued until every last one has been exploited.

I do not wish to dismiss successful existing businesses that deserve to be part of an open and honest economic development agenda. However, we must recognise what will work and what will not work. I feel aggrieved that the textile industry, once a big part of the economy, has now been almost wiped out. However, there is still an opportunity for a well-managed niche market in the textile industry to add high value and to deliver high-quality goods at a high price, resulting in high wages.

That applies equally to agriculture. It is a crime that practically the entire agriculture and food industry in our society is hanging on and does not know what its situation will be from week to week or from month to month. That industry requires stability.

However, the economy will not be reinvented through textiles or agriculture. Reinvention must happen primarily, but not exclusively, through a knowledge-based high-tech economy. Radical new ways of financing small business start-ups must be conceived. An environment wherein a much larger percentage of start-up companies survive and prosper must be created. Much can be learned from north American cities that have reinvented themselves, such as Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, and Halifax, Nova Scotia in Canada. North Carolina's technology triangle and the technology operations that are centred on Georgia Tech in Atlanta also come to mind. Although there is much to learn from US cities, a great deal can also be learned from the Irish Republic, Scotland and, as we heard this morning, from Wales.

Time is scarce. If I had more time, I would talk about modern apprenticeships, which deserve more attention. I would talk more about North/South trade — and some of the anxieties about that that I have heard in the past hour are, if I may so, exaggerated. It is not a matter of forcing North/South trade; however, it has been inhibited for a couple of generations. Organic growth must be allowed to happen without inhibition or obstruction.

Members could talk about industrial derating, rates in general or corporation tax. I would also like an opportunity to talk about financial relationships in the context of corporation tax and about the financial relationships between the Isle of Man and the UK Exchequer, and between the Channel Islands and the UK Exchequer. We could also talk about generating downstream businesses.

However, in the limited amount of time that is available, I want to talk about three subjects. The first is the dire lack of education and skills about which we repeatedly discovered as we compiled the report. Twenty-five per cent of pupils leave school with limited numeracy and literacy skills.

Secondly, I want to talk about research and development. Finally, if I have time, I will talk about the vital role that universities can, and must, play in economic success.

Any future growth in employment can be achieved only as long as there is a workforce that is sufficiently trained and capable of meeting the requirements of the jobs that arise.

(Madam Speaker in the Chair)

At times, people appear to dream that investors in New York or California, for example, will be persuaded to give us a big lump of foreign direct investment. However, our people must be trained in advance of such investment. No foreign direct investment operation will come here if the necessary skills base is not in place. That skills base must be created in whatever niche markets exist.

A recent 'Lifting the Barriers to Growth' survey singled out a lack of basic skills as a major concern of employers. When employers want to provide training, they must be supported and given back-up in order to do so. Some 65% of employers are willing to provide staff training if funding for it is available. Surprisingly, we have weaker communications skills, customer service skills, basic IT skills, and foreign language skills than other UK regions. Those issues must be dealt with quickly.

It is, however, positive and helpful that we are stronger in most other areas, such as advanced IT skills. We have many people who are well trained in technology, but few who possess basic skills in that field. We have strong sales and marketing skills and general technical skills. However, a substantial programme of restructuring and investment in education and training must be carried out in order to raise standards and increase the focus on the opportunities that exist here. The education system must place enhanced emphasis on the development of practical skills at its core. The role of universities and colleges of further and higher education must be at the heart of any change, with functional partnerships being formed.

Another objective must be to create a positive culture for R&D. It is talked about as though it were a magic bullet; it is not. However, much could happen if attitudes towards it were changed to ensure that reasonable goals and timetables are set that allow improvements to be made and a cleverer and more efficient approach to be taken.

The current culture is one in which matters are left as they were 20 or 30 years ago. We desperately need to build better skills and become more competent. We must, at every opportunity, seek to make changes that will raise motivation and bring about improvement. As somebody said in a meeting that I attended, we may need to divorce the R from the D, because perhaps R&D intimidates people. Perhaps research must take place in and applications be doled out to small companies. Certainly, the less complicated it is for people to set up small businesses, and the more help that is available to them, the easier that will be.

There is a massive need to meet R&D challenges at the coalface of business. The economy cannot be improved or function at full steam if the intellectual power in universities is not harnessed. There is a major lack of investment in R&D in Northern Ireland — we have the lowest spend of any region in the UK or European Union. Many small businesses simply do not have the necessary resources, and support must, therefore, be made available to them. The tax system must be enhanced in order to encourage small businesses.

The Federation of Small Businesses said that it wants Invest Northern Ireland and DETI to encourage local, indigenous small businesses that have used R&D successfully to act as champions for it and sell the idea to other businesses. I believe that that would be useful.

Earlier, George Dawson said that more of the same will not be sufficient to provide the step change that is required to drive Northern Ireland's economy forward. We must avoid "more of the same". In order for that to happen, the universities must be harnessed. The universities could provide 10,000 to 12,000 high-powered, highly paid jobs, which in turn would provide an engine for 50,000 to 60,000 back-up jobs. The universities do not provide that at present. I have done research into that and could provide relevant details. There is a clash in universities between pure academic research and applied research.

There must be some mechanism in place to create a balance and a bias towards one area. For instance, there is a bias towards research in the United States, and that generates money for the universities. Many universities accept the need to become clear in their overall mission, and they find special and sustainable niches in the teaching-versus-research and in the pure-versus-applied spectrum.

4.00 pm

Our universities are fairly good at what they do, but there is still much to be done. There is a need, for instance, to create four or five times the number of spin-out companies that we have at present. There is also vast potential in the medical faculty, a flicker of which we saw in the new cancer centre; but the medical faculty in Queen's University could generate massive numbers of real economic opportunities. We need to remove the impediments that obstruct those opportunities; if I had time I would list them, but time is not on my side.

I urge colleagues to support me in the call for the establishment of a Northern Ireland technology alliance led by a small executive team and supported by a working board comprising high-level representatives from the Government, universities and the business community to ensure that the energy and potential in our universities are released.

Madam Speaker: Dr McDonnell, your time is up.

Dr McDonnell: Thank you, Madam Speaker. The energy and potential will not flow on their own; they must be released if we are to prosper. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. I will tell a Member when his or her time is up.

Mr Robert McCartney: Many of the major topics relating to our economic situation — or plight — have been developed by Members who spoke earlier. Some have been developed with gravitas, some with erudition, some with a mixture of both, and the least said about the rest the better. However, I endorse Dr McDonnell's comments about education. When one reads the report, particularly the sections on education, one notices the recurrence of several themes. Evidence was received from witnesses such as Mivan, one of our leading companies, and the Department of Education, and many of the witnesses mentioned the absence, in many circumstances, of basic literacy and numeracy skills — reading, writing and arithmetic.

When one considers Northern Ireland's ability to compete with Sri Lanka, China, north Africa and other places that have an abundance of relatively cheap labour, one should also remember that we offer a well-trained, educated working population that is capable of communication. There are also labour requirements in higher-skilled areas such as research and development and marketing. People involved in the higher levels of research and development should know something about physics, chemistry, mathematics and marketing, and they should possess the social and communicative skills that are necessary to place our workforce on a competitive footing with those who can overwhelm us with cheap labour and sheer force of numbers.

One may ask: "Where do we begin?" We begin at the beginning with the primary school children. It is in that aspect of our development — the education of our future scientists, researchers, development managers and engineers — that we must find out what is going on.

Some £42 million was recently spent on a strategy to establish the state of literacy and numeracy in our primary schools. That investment was investigated by the Public Accounts Committee, which concluded that the money was spent without any result. The Northern Ireland Council for Curriculum, Examinations and Assessment (CCEA) failed to build in the necessary testing measures for telling us whether the strategy was working. It was a waste of time.

Within the last week, I have had an interview with the permanent secretary of the Department of Education to discuss the early-years enriched curriculum, which is currently being rolled out. Examination of that project demonstrated that pupils in P1 and P2 receiving this so-called enriched curriculum actually performed much worse than their peer group who were pursuing traditional methods. This was despite the project allegedly being assessed by the department of psychology at Queen's University. My experience of psychologists of that kind is not a happy one; I will attempt to share it with the House.

Further investigation revealed that central to this whole escapade, for that is how it might properly be described, was that children, particularly from disadvantaged areas — the very areas that we seek to develop and give jobs to — would not be taught to read or to count until the age of seven. Children were to be involved in play and allegedly develop predispositions that, like some hump of educational happiness, would suddenly manifest in the children becoming very, very bright after a period of being very, very dim.

When I raised that with the permanent secretary, he said that he had investigated it all and was happy that the methodology employed in the early-years curriculum, which was patently failing, was nevertheless one that the Department should endorse. That meeting took place on Tuesday 5 September. The following day, the Secretary of State for Education, Alan Johnson, announced that the strategy for teaching reading and numeracy to the children of the United Kingdom through a mixed methodology since 1998 had been a total failure. From then on, the recommendations of the Rose Report were to be adopted, and children aged four and five were to be taught at the earliest possible date to read and count by the traditional method of phonics.

In the midst of Northern Ireland's economic plight, looking to the future and to developing people who can communicate and impress employers with their ability to read and count, as desired by Mivan and the Department of Education, our children are to be subjected to a form of primary school education that has been deemed a failure in England after nine years and has been condemned by those who have examined it.

Mr S Wilson: The Member has raised an important issue. Does he agree that the curriculum is being driven by a cabal of educationalists who have taken over the whole range of educational provision in Northern Ireland and by the amount of money that the CCEA has invested in the project, about which it is now embarrassed and on which it cannot go back?

Mr Robert McCartney: I could not agree more. There is a group of so-called educationalists in Northern Ireland, driven by some constructivist method, that is determined to impose, particularly on the controlled sector, a form of education that has been deemed absolutely disastrous by all reputable researchers in the United States, the United Kingdom and further afield. If the fundamental building blocks of being able to read, count and communicate are not put in place, at what level will our workforce be developed, be they neurological surgeons, plumbers, carpenters or bricklayers who are required to read plans and communicate directions to those below them, or researchers?

We are not lacking at primary school level alone. Recent results have demonstrated that, for the umpteenth year in succession, Northern Ireland has produced the best results in tough A level subjects in the UK.

I return to Alasdair McDonnell's point about research and development: if we do not produce physicists, mathematicians, chemists and, as he mentioned, linguists, where will we obtain the specialist skills that will be our defence against cheap labour from abroad? We will have no such defence. It is all very well to talk about a range of immediate panaceas to cure our economic ills, but if the basics for future generations are not put in place now, Northern Ireland will be put to the sword when competing with others.

It may seem a bit off the beam to concentrate so strongly on education in this debate, but from the days of Adam Smith and his book 'An Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations', the wealth of nations has depended on the education, skills and entrepreneurial drive of people who make up those nations. All those factors are formed from the earliest possible date.

When I look at some of the A-level results and, indeed, at some of the degrees conferred by our two universities, I wonder if there will be a surfeit of people who will thrust Northern Ireland forward as a result of degrees or A levels in media studies or drama? There must be a point at which there is a glut of people so qualified; yet that is what is being churned out.

The number of A levels studied by students are constantly increasing; standards are constantly decreasing, and the number of easy options is such that five A-grade A levels are no indication to any of the major UK universities that a person is a star act. Students are now being awarded A-star and A-plus grades. Some major universities are talking about holding their own examinations, moving away from A levels to an international form of examination.

If we are to guarantee an economic future for Northern Ireland, we must seriously examine what is going on and what is being foisted upon us and upon our society by the sort of people that Sammy Wilson mentioned, people who draw large salaries and try to create commercial kingdoms. Test papers and examination formulas have become a billion-dollar industry in Britain and in Northern Ireland.

If we do not examine what those folk are doing, we will be unable to produce the people who will be required to fill jobs that may be filled by Indian, Chinese and Malaysian graduates who are being taught in their universities the things that we used to be taught. They are coming here as first-class mathematicians, physicists and scientists. When we look at some of our home-trained people, we find that they are seriously lacking.

To establish an economic programme, let us begin at the bottom by looking at how we will produce children who, at every level and regardless of their status, whether they be tradesmen, professionals, researchers or scientists, have the basic ability to communicate with their fellow man and be educated in something more than simply being a tool of industry.

4.15 pm

We hear a lot about vocational skills, but, in this world, is it sufficient merely to be trained as some sort of robotic adjunct to the requirements of industry? Additional skills must be considered.

It is worth referring to Mivan's written submission to the subgroup's report. Mivan believes that, although they are essential, vocational skills cannot be capitalised on without other skills, such as communication, literacy, numeracy, team-working and technology. Unless a system is created that allows those skills to develop, any grand plans, whether they be for corporation tax or a packet of economic dolly mixtures or magic dust, will go nowhere. Instant solutions will not solve lasting problems for the economic future of Northern Ireland.

In so far as the report has highlighted that issue and others, I am more than happy not only to congratulate those who prepared it, but suggest to the House that it should be endorsed.

Mr Simpson: I add my thanks to those members of staff who assisted the economic challenges subgroup. I am not going to repeat a lot of the issues that have been raised. The subject tends to be repetitive. However, it is an important subject to debate and, hopefully, Members can move it forward.

I am certain that true democrats will agree with my wish that, finally, we shall soon be able to say that the nightmares of recent decades have been put behind us and that Northern Ireland is entering a new and better future. While some of us have been attempting to bring that day closer, others — and I refer to Sinn Féin/IRA MLAs — have been content to give only the illusion of a commitment to a better future for us all.

Yes, Sinn Féin sent representatives to the PFG Committee who trotted along to the meetings of the economic challenges subgroup. Yes, those Members agreed the subgroup's report. However, when it came to the crunch, to the time to progress the recommendations and to the time for the doing rather than the talking, the Sinn Féin/IRA overlords — to use a good Ulster term — shafted their own team. They shafted the economic challenges subgroup; they shafted the business sector in Northern Ireland; and, ultimately, they shafted the entire population.

I am given to believe that Sinn Féin/IRA's position on the report has changed yet again. First, the party agreed the report; then it would not. I am told now that Sinn Féin has decided to agree the report again, only this time its position is that, although it will agree the report, it will do nothing to progress the recommendations. I realise that it is early in the week; Sinn Féin's position could change a few times before the week is out. However, that should not overly surprise Members.

After all, when a party does not have any real economic policies or any real interest in growth and prosperity and no true commitment to a stable and prosperous future, it is hardly surprising that it ends up drowning in a sea of its own incompetence when faced with real bread-and-butter politics. When a party's commitment to Hamas and Hezbollah is greater than its commitment to the local high street, it is hardly surprising when it ends up making a spectacular fool of itself.

If we are to create a better future for our citizens in a vibrant and forward-looking society, we need to face up to what is becoming clearer with every passing day. One of the parties that the Government wish to see sitting in an Executive appears incapable of acting in the interest of the general good and to have no desire for, or commitment to, a stable and progressive future for our people. We cannot and dare not ignore that.

In the last Assembly, we witnessed Sinn Féin swap planting massive bombs in the hearts of local towns for letting off political bombs in their Departments. It appears not to have learned. There is a great onus on us, as the democratic parties, to attempt to put in place the necessary framework to take Northern Ireland forward. That being so, in seeking to underpin what I hope will eventually be the new and better future that so many of us long for, we cannot overemphasise the importance of a strong, prosperous economy, nor can we overemphasise the requirement for economic, political and social stability.

While there are some good economic indicators, they conceal underlying and well-documented structural weaknesses, such as an underdeveloped private sector; over-dependence on the public sector; low levels of business formation and R&D spend; low levels of labour market participation; high levels of long-term unemployment; and uneven sub-regional growth. The £5 billion annual subvention from Great Britain is not sustainable.

To the above list one might add a demographic time bomb. It all means that we are facing major challenges. We have an imbalanced and vulnerable economy, which has an aggressive economic competitor immediately to the south, whose Government have made crucial advantages available to its business sector that the UK Government have withheld from us.

My colleague Mr Dawson mentioned the recent debate in Queen's University on whether the Northern Ireland economy can be rebalanced. I stand to be corrected, but every single contributor to the debate agreed that the economy could, and would, be rebalanced, simply because of the ingenuity and determination of the Province's business community. Those businesspeople have come through 35 years of hell on earth — if they faced that, they can certainly face any future challenges.

Equally, our long-established dependence on the public sector does not help our economy achieve the increased levels of innovation and entrepreneurship and the competitive advantage that it will need in order to survive and flourish. To that end, we must develop a robust and more buoyant private sector and attract increased inward investment.

Another factor that can help to turn the situation around is having more effective R&D support. We have heard a lot about that today. Funding to the commercial and education sectors must be better targeted. Indeed, I fervently believe that closer co-operation between educationalists and entrepreneurs would be beneficial. We should reconfigure education so that it is made to measure for the needs of business and industry.

Dr McDonnell spoke earlier about linking the education and business sectors. In the subgroup, he mentioned closing the circle in that way. I supported him in that. The Youth Forum agreed that there is a gap in the circle between colleges, business and industry.

We need to close that gap in order, as Mr McCartney said, to create young entrepreneurs and people for the future. As an employer, I know just how often people present themselves as potential employees without even the most basic of skills. There must be a proper partnership between the education system and business, so that education is tailored to the needs of the workplace.

Research and development uptake is poor, although the available R&D assistance for firms could be better used. The creation of a business culture infused with a spirit of innovation would also be achieved with a reduction in corporation tax to below the rate in the Irish Republic — to clarify the position for Mr McNarry, that means 10%; we will not need the angel dust or the fairy dust to explain that — as part of an overall package of fiscal measures. [Interruption.] Yes, angel dust is used in the meat industry. The Member is going back and showing his age.

Mr S Wilson: He is going to dust. [Laughter.]

Mr Simpson: Madam Speaker, there are 21 recommendations before us, and I am sure that the business community and other interested parties will ask when those are to be acted on. After all, we have had discussions and debates before and assurances made by the Government regarding the Northern Ireland economy. For example, in May, the Secretary of State gave a commitment to establish a working group, chaired by Minister of State David Hanson, to explore the issue of industrial rates. My understanding, as of last week, is that that working group has yet to meet.

The Secretary of State was very keen that Members of this House should meet over the summer on both the economic challenges subgroup and the Preparation for Government Committee to deliver documents and recommendations, yet when it comes to such an important issue, which deals with the economic lifeblood of the manufacturing sector and others, it did not seem important for the Secretary of State to have any work done during the summer. Madam Speaker, I ask you, through your good offices, to make some enquiries about why that working group did not meet to help the manufacturing industry.

I am sure that everyone in this House who has agreed with these recommendations will join me in wishing the industry well and will look forward with me to a better and more prosperous future for Northern Ireland and for the generations to come.

Mr Nesbitt: I support the motion. I am conscious of the volume of paperwork that we all received and of the time spent by those who participated, and, like others, I thank them. However, I am also concerned and disconcerted that the underlying problems that have been alluded to in this debate are not new but long-standing. Dr McDonnell and Mr McCartney made very thoughtful comments about what needs to be done in Northern Ireland. These are not new problems. Until one is conscious of the problem that one is trying to solve, one can find it very difficult to identify the solutions. The problem is the first thing to identify.

We all wish to have a better standard of living in Northern Ireland. Ours is lower than that of the rest of the United Kingdom. That means greater productivity, a central element in any country with an industrial private sector and part of the wealth creation of that region. In this more global economy, there must be greater competitiveness. Other Members have talked about who might or might not compete and take the work from us.

4.30 pm

All of that is aimed at improving living standards. For economic reasons, people moved from working on the land to working in industry. In turn, they moved from working in industry to working in the public sector, which took up a lot of the slack. The public sector is now under threat, and it needs to be trimmed. However, many jobs must be created in the private sector, which must play a bigger central role. That is not to deny the fundamental role of the public sector, but the private sector must be enhanced.

Inactivity — hidden unemployment — is also a problem in Northern Ireland that must be addressed. We all know about the problems; they are not new issues. There have always been problems, and we are still discussing them. Dr McDonnell and Mr McCartney spoke about there being a means to address those problems. That means is the Northern Ireland skills base. Those people are the value-added element, and they can improve the standard of living. Those people can allow Northern Ireland to compete with the wider world, where there is an ever-decreasing interdependent economic market. We can make a phone call to a call centre in India to discuss a local or personal issue. Northern Ireland must compete in that global market, and people must have the appropriate skills.

The report also refers to enterprise. Dr McDonnell spoke about research in the university sector. With my background, I am conscious of that issue.

The Government have the capacity to deal with problems in the economic infrastructure. None of those problems is new, and we know what needs to be done. The sad thing is that we are at the stage only of discussing the issues.

The expression an “all-island economy” has crept into our vocabulary. It is used on the front page of tonight’s ‘Business Telegraph’ and in other publications. This constant push for an all-island economy is being presented as a panacea. I want to comment on that.

Politicians should not interfere with what the business community does best. They must create the environment, but must not impede the market. The business community in Northern Ireland must decide whether it wants to work with a sister industry in the South of Ireland or wherever, where comparative economies of scale might be financially advantageous. The European Union has freed up economies and broken down economic borders. We must ensure that the business sector is allowed to do what it does best.

North/South co-operation, which was referred to earlier, is not the only issue. The east-west dimension is as important — if not more important — as North/South factors. World markets and economies of scale can be achieved on an east-west basis that could lead to Europe and America. We must not have an insular mentality, believing that an all-island economy is the panacea; it is not.

Business should be allowed to do what it does best. Government can facilitate the private sector and make contributions to energy and transportation, which affects all of us. Government have their place in helping the economy, whether that be on an all-island basis or farther afield.

A third element is the fiscal taxation dimension. It is very easy to make the clarion call for 10% corporation tax, but it must be carefully thought through. My party wants to see the best economic environment for business to flourish. We do not want to be negative — quite the reverse. However, in being positive, we must also counsel caution. Mr Ford mentioned the case of Portugal and the Azores at the European Court of Justice. He said that it is limiting to be a separate taxation unit and that it is necessary to have a separate devolved Government in order to be able to do that. That was only one side of the argument. The principle is quite common throughout the European Union: whether you vary the rate, you must be a taxation unit.

One remembers the time when Southern Ireland had a 0% tax rate for all exports and a 40% rate for industry at home. That was discriminatory within the taxation unit. When Ireland had to change, it simply made the rate 12.5% throughout. A tax authority has the power to do that. The definition of a separate tax authority, as I understand it from last week's judgement, is that it can act independently. In other words, the Treasury would not be able to tell the Northern Ireland taxing authority what it could or could not do.

Mr Robert McCartney: Will my hon Friend give way?

Mr Nesbitt: Since he calls me a friend, I will give way. [Laughter.]

Mr Robert McCartney: It is your lucky day; make the most of it. [Laughter.]

Does the Member agree that since Northern Ireland is part of the United Kingdom, and since Edward Carson once said that we ask for no special privileges but simply for equality of treatment, it would not be in the interests of the Union, in real terms, for some sort of discriminatory separate tax arrangement to be put in place — helpful though it would be — that is similar to the South but different to the rest of the UK?

Mr Nesbitt: I am very grateful to the Member for North Down, and we can discuss afterwards whether he is a friend or otherwise. He is basically correct. Edward Carson also said:

“There can be no permanent resting place between complete union and total separation”.

That is a similar hybrid position. He was making the point to which I was coming: although the Stormont body could have the independence to make a taxation diktat without being controlled by London, the downside is that it could not then turn to London and expect financial assistance. We need to think this through very carefully. Do we want a financial package that would make the situation within Northern Ireland different to that in the rest of the United Kingdom?

Whenever we talk about fiscal incentives, the phrase that often comes up is “the all-island economy”. One of the economic commentators, a Dublin-based professor, said that if we had an all-Ireland economy we would be as good as the South, and that if we did not have that we would be one of the worst regions in the United Kingdom. That is, to put it bluntly, economic nonsense. It depends on the assumptions that the economist makes, and he was making some assumptions that perhaps gave him the outcome that he wished for.

To digress for a second, there is a joke about economists. An engineer, a mathematician and an economist were on a desert island, and there was only one tin of baked beans to eat. They needed those beans. The mathematician tried to find a formula. The engineer tried to work out how trees could be felled so that they would fall on the tin and open it. The economist said: “It is simple. You just assume that you have a tin opener.” One of the problems of economics is that assumptions are made in arriving at solutions. We must be conscious of that.

An all-Ireland dimension has benefits, such as in education. Co-operation with the regional technical colleges provides the skills base that is necessary for our future economy. For example, Irish chartered accountancy forged close links with Queen's University, Belfast and University College, Dublin. Those institutions taught the same course and provided the same exemptions, and those led to an all-Ireland qualification. That was all-Ireland co-operation on an educational level and it was non-political; there was no political interference. From a unionist perspective, there is nothing to preclude co-operation where it is needed and where there are no political overtones.

In conclusion, I shall return to where I started. A recent Sinn Féin press release stated that an all-Ireland economy was necessary because the Northern Ireland economy was a “basket case”. Northern Ireland is a region of the United Kingdom, and other regions are in a similar position. They need to improve, and the structure of their economies will have to change. Northern Ireland can do that equally well inside the United Kingdom. Notwithstanding thoughts of fiscal incentives, the essential element is the basic skills of the people of Northern Ireland. That must be fundamentally addressed, and that is why I referred to the words of Dr McDonnell and Mr McCartney.

Mr Weir: When one is the eleventh or twelfth contributor in a debate such as this in which there is consensus on the recommendations at hand, there is great difficulty in finding anything new to say, because all of the issues have been covered. We have even had a lecture on negotiating techniques from Mr McNarry. If nothing else, that shows that, whatever else the Ulster Unionists have lost, they have not lost their sense of irony.

Mr McNarry: Would the Member mind repeating that?

Mr Weir: Unfortunately, Mr McNarry has not been listening for some time. I said that whatever else they have lost, the Ulster Unionists have not lost their sense of irony. We are at the stage where everything, more or less, has been said, but not everyone has had the opportunity to say it. I shall endeavour to make some remarks that deal with the report.

I had the privilege of attending several meetings of the subgroup. Dr McDonnell and others said earlier that we had truncated a great deal of work that would normally have taken several months into a narrow timeframe. Consequently, we must view the report as a work in progress. However, much hard work went into it.

We were pleased that a wide range of witnesses gave evidence to the subgroup. The Northern Ireland Manufacturing Focus Group (NIMFG) made a valuable contribution, particularly on industrial derating. The end result has been that the debate has been kept alive. The pressure exerted by the NIMFG, and the work of the political parties and the Assembly, has provided some light at the end of the tunnel for the industrial sector. I also commend the work of the Federation of Small Businesses, which focused on a wide range of topics.

Anyone who examines the problems of Northern Ireland's economy has long ago moved away from the idea of having one big DeLorean-type salvation and towards a realisation that small and medium-sized enterprises are going to provide the backbone of the economy. Some are highlighting issues that have not previously been considered. The Federation of Small Businesses focused on business crime, a matter that others and I have raised with the Chief Constable. Those bodies provide a valuable contribution to the debate in Northern Ireland.

4.45 pm

It was vital that the economic challenges subgroup did not simply tick the appropriate boxes and hear evidence from the usual organisations and Departments, but that it heard from leading industrialists who work at the coalface, such as a representative from Moy Park and William Wright from Wrightbus Ltd, who gave us practical examples of the way forward. While considering the economic challenges that face Northern Ireland, it would be wrong simply to present a bleak picture, as that would be deeply insulting to those who have worked at the coalface for the past 35 years.

During those years, things have been difficult for those who have been involved in economic life in Northern Ireland. It has been difficult to attract new business against the backdrop of the troubles, and the economic circumstances that have been created by that have been a major problem. Beyond the issue of image, the IRA disgracefully went a stage further by targeting businesses and by trying to destroy the economy of many town centres. It is a testament to the hard work and dedication of many business people that they did not simply pack their bags and leave. Throughout the troubles, many of them fought to provide employment and to create wealth. As a result, there has been a reduction in unemployment, in spite of the many problems. Growth in this region has exceeded that in other parts of the United Kingdom. Nevertheless, there are unseen problems with that, for example, in the growth in jobs in the value-added sector and in the greater need for a knowledge-based economy. However, not everything in the garden is black.

I take grave exception to some of the Secretary of State's remarks. It is one thing for us to be aware of the challenges of globalisation — and I believe that there is no politician in Northern Ireland who is not aware of the challenges that we face from India, China, eastern Europe and north Africa — but it is another thing for the Secretary of State to bad-mouth, rather than sell, the economy of Northern Ireland abroad. How will that help FDI?

The Secretary of State obviously envisages himself in a more senior role than his current position. He sees himself as the next Deputy Prime Minister, but how will inappropriate comments and embarrassing gaffes qualify him to fill the shoes of John Prescott? On a serious note, the Secretary of State has done us a great disservice. We need to attract FDI. The duty of Government is at the heart of many of the recommendations in the report.

I confess to being a political anorak and to being an avid viewer of 'The West Wing'. Some time ago, I was struck, during a dramatisation of the presidential debate, when the Republican candidate was asked how many jobs his Administration would create. His reply was "none". That was said for effect, but what was meant behind that — and other Members have referred to it — is that the task of Government is not necessarily to create jobs, but to provide an enabling environment in which entrepreneurs can create them. That goes to the heart of our recommendations. In particular, there has been a lack of economic co-ordination in Government.

There must be an examination of how Government announcements have an impact on the economy, yet there does not appear to be any co-ordination on that, judging from the evidence from the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment and other Departments. An example was the recent announcement of the massive investment in roads infrastructure, but it seems that North Down and Strangford have fallen off the map, as no investment appears to be targeted there.

However, I will leave aside the issue of whether the money is being spent in the right areas. When the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment was asked whether it or other Departments had been consulted on whether the investment would be best for the economy as a whole, the answer was no.

Unfortunately, the structures of Government are such that economic functions are spread across various Departments. The Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment is the lead Department on the economy, but responsibility for employment and training has been hived off to the Department for Employment and Learning. Like others, I agree that it is vital that we prepare our workforce for the future. The Department for Regional Development deals with infrastructure, and the Office of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister has an Economic Policy Unit. There is a strong feeling that there is a lack of co-ordination within Government, with the end result that it is very difficult for swift, co-ordinated decisions to be taken.

I was struck by Dermot Nesbitt's remark that one of the roles of Government should be to not impede the growth of industry. We need look no further than the planning process. Let us leave aside our concerns about Draft Planning Policy Statement 14 and domestic planning for the moment, and compare how long the application process for industrial planning takes here with how long it takes in countries with which we are in competition. I agree with Dr McDonnell's earlier comment that we need to learn from what happens in north America. It would be simply unthinkable for new businesses in north America to have to wait years to get planning approval from a Department or a planning service. Therefore, we must ensure that bureaucracy, at any level of government, is not an impediment.

There are question marks over whether Invest Northern Ireland is fit for purpose. Recommendation 4 of the report proposes a review of that organisation, and it is vital that it attracts the right form of FDI.

A cocktail of measures is needed. The report covers a range of issues, and I disagree with Members who described the report as a quick fix; none of the recommendations could be described as a quick fix. Any measures that are adopted as a result of the report must work towards finding at least medium-term solutions. However, we must take the first steps.

It is right that the Assembly has given such a high priority to economic matters. Most of our debates have been about the economy. That shows the concern for the Northern Ireland economy, at least among the constitutional parties. Again, I decry the absence of one party, which perhaps shows Sinn Féin's lack of engagement on the issue and its poverty of thought on economics. It is difficult, even for Sinn Féin Members, to spend 15 minutes at a time repeatedly lecturing us on how all our economic ills are the evils of partition. If that is all that that party has to contribute to the debate, it is no wonder that the Benches opposite are vacant. Of course, I could be being harsh on Sinn Féin. [Laughter.]

I could be wrong; it may have some great contribution to make to this debate. It is clear that this debate will continue tomorrow, so let us lay down a challenge to Sinn Féin: if its Members have anything worthwhile to say on the Northern Ireland economy, let them come to the Chamber tomorrow and deal with the rest of us and with the subgroup's positive agenda. It is a work in progress, to which we will return.

The co-operation among the constitutional parties shows that, between us, we have a strong desire to help to create that wealth-generating society. Such a society would place an emphasis on an entrepreneurial spirit, attract high-tech technology instead of relying on jobs that can be only transient, and try to re-balance the economy — not by making cuts to public expenditure, but by ensuring that the conditions exist for rapid growth in the private sector.

The Assembly, via the parties here, has shown that it is committed to a better way forward. Consequently, we will come back to this matter and examine a greater range of issues, particularly the fiscal incentives, which have already been mentioned. The report lays the foundation for much of the good work that is needed in the Northern Ireland economy over the next few years. I commend it to the Assembly.

Mr P J Bradley: I, too, pay tribute to all those who are associated with the report. I had the privilege of attending the subgroup as a deputy on a few occasions, and I enjoyed the meetings. However, I was shocked to learn that one day the report was adopted and the next day it was not. That was very difficult to follow. Those people with a yo-yo attitude to the report must answer to those whom they have offended by not debating the report.

I will commence where Mr Simpson left off on industrial derating. It is not my specific brief in the Assembly, but it is one that all Members share. Around 30,000 people involved at different levels within the manufacturing industry are living with the fears that accompany the threat to impose unrealistic rating demands on manufacturers. In fact, that figure might be fewer than 30,000, as some may be tempted to relocate for economic reasons to Dundalk, Cavan or Letterkenny. Nevertheless, the figure is significant.

All the political parties are united in opposition to the imposition of unrealistic rate demands. The Northern Ireland Manufacturing Focus Group has succeeded in setting up a working group that involves manufacturers and civil servants working towards achieving an acceptable resolution of the issue. The manufacturers are on record as stating that they are willing to contribute to a fair and accountable rating system. I welcome those developments and wish the group well in its deliberations. I speak for the many manufacturers in South Down who see the proposed quadrupling of rates as a serious threat, not only to their businesses, but to the livelihood of their employees. Putting 30,000 people on the dole does not make economic sense and would be difficult for any Minister or Administration to justify.

Government statistics show that farming and the agrifood industry make agriculture the largest, and one of the most important, assets in this part of Ireland, with almost 60,000 people employed full time. The Ulster Farmers' Union pointed out in its evidence to the subgroup that 7.5% of total employment in Northern Ireland is directly or indirectly related to agriculture and the agrifood sector.

History has shown us that when the farming industry was thriving, the overall economy benefited, as the money that was created on the farms made its way into the coffers of the retail industry and local businesses. When farmers made money, they used it to improve their farm dwellings, stock and outbuildings, and to improve the environment. Their income was spread around.

As I have said before, it is to be regretted that the UK Government pay little or no heed to the agriculture industry and seem to ignore its contribution to the community in Northern Ireland. However, we should not be surprised. After all, within weeks of the CAP agreement being finalised, did Tony Blair not make it clear that he wished to do away with it completely?

I recall the SDLP's first meeting with Lord Rooker. When he was asked whether he supported the farmers of Northern Ireland or the Government's anti-CAP attitude, he replied in a short, five-word statement that he supported the Government line. However, it was easy to forgive him: we learned shortly afterwards that our new Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development knew little or nothing about Northern Ireland, let alone agriculture, and that he had never set foot on the island of Ireland prior to taking up his appointment.

Lord Rooker's parting gift to rural Northern Ireland and its economy by way of his PPS 14 diktat in March this year will not be so easily forgiven, and it will be remembered for a long time. He managed, in a few months, to distort the rural economy by driving young rural families from the countryside and forcing them to compete with the rising house prices. Those prices have moved far and above what they should be, given the average incomes in Northern Ireland.

5.00 pm

As this is an economic debate, I will avail of the opportunity to express my party's total opposition to modulation.

There is no logic in reducing single farm payments for the sole purpose of directing them away from the agriculture sector. The UK Government appear determined to make farmers pay for economic ventures outside the industry. The Government should ring-fence the money for those projects. However, Members must remember that they are not an ordinary Government; they are an anti-agriculture UK Government. Earlier, references were made to Carson's demands on the British. The only Carson of whom our present Ministers appear to have heard is Frank Carson. They treat this country as a joke.

I address the remainder of my remarks to the DUP. I call on that party to give serious consideration to its planned lack of action and the consequences that a strengthened direct rule Administration would have on the farming industry and the rural economy. The DUP can have its differences with Sinn Féin, but it should keep its political differences away from the Assembly.

Farmers in Northern Ireland are crying out for local political leadership. They want a home-based Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development, who knows the ups and downs of the business and its economics. Those Members who visit farmers on a regular basis hear their concerns about the stalemate situation and their support for the restoration of the Assembly. Often, the farmers refer to the good work of the former Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development Bríd Rogers and the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development. They talk about how the downward slide of the industry, which commenced in the mid 1990s, was halted by our own politicians' taking control.

I served on the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development and I know how committed it was to dealing with the issues. When the Committee met each Friday morning, the parties left their politics at the door. Members had more important issues to deal with, and deal with them they did. Regrettably, those days are now but a memory, and, meanwhile, our farmers are deprived of participating in the success enjoyed by their counterparts in the Republic of Ireland, Scotland and Wales, where the Administrations work in conjunction with the industries and are delivering on behalf of farming communities.

The DUP must get its priorities in order and, from a farming perspective, its members must decide whether they wish to stand by idly, leaving the agricultural community without a local Administration and outside the control of local decision-makers. A simple question must be asked: is the DUP prepared to leave the fate of Northern Ireland's farmers in the hands of couldn't-care-less UK Ministers? I want to repeat that question: is the DUP prepared to leave the fate of Northern Ireland's farmers in the hands of couldn't-care-less UK Ministers? It may seem ironic, but, in this instance, I am pleading with the DUP to say no.

I conclude by expressing the views of the SDLP. The Northern Ireland economy needs a thriving agriculture industry, and the rural economy needs the support of a local Administration to ensure —
[Interruption.]

Mr P Robinson: Members on this side of the House have a difficulty. We cannot hear a word of Mr Bradley's contribution. Every now and then, he seems to refer to the DUP. I am sure that he is praising my party, but we cannot hear what he is saying. Mr Bradley seems to speak about 60 words to the second. Perhaps he could start again. [Laughter.]

Mr S Wilson: Repeat the good bits about the DUP.

Mr P J Bradley: I am sorry, but there were not too many good bits about the DUP. Perhaps I should repeat my question.

Ms Ritchie: Good man.

Mr P J Bradley: Is the DUP prepared to leave the fate of Northern Ireland's farmers in the hands of couldn't-care-less UK Ministers? Is that clear? The DUP Members heard me that time. Also, I remarked that it is ironic that I hope that the DUP will say no.

The Northern Ireland economy needs a vibrant, thriving agriculture industry, and the rural economy needs the support of a local Administration to ensure that farmers have somewhere to turn when difficulties arise over farming incomes. Farmers need people who know what the problems are and how to deal with them. Our experience with direct-rule Ministers has been to the contrary.

I apologise to those Members who could not hear me.

Dr Birnie: One of the most difficult questions arising out of the report is the dilemma over which fiscal incentive we should opt for. It comes down to higher tax credits versus a lower headline rate of corporation tax.

As I was considering this fairly technical matter, I was reminded of a story about President Lyndon Johnson. He once told his economic advisers that he would remove their hands so that they could not suggest one thing on one hand and something else on the other hand.

Witnesses outlined some of the arguments in favour of increasing tax credits or allowances to the economic subgroup. It has been argued in some quarters that the administration of the policy could be fairly straightforward: it could be done by adjusting the software currently used to calculate the tax liabilities of companies that would be rewarded according to their investment.

Madam Speaker: Order. Members will be more easily heard if conversations are not being conducted.

Dr Birnie: For example, the investment could be in R&D, training and design. Hence, so the argument in favour of tax credits goes, the firms that would benefit most from the incentive would be those that had proved to be the most dynamic and had the highest growth potential. That would minimise the so-called deadweight problem, whereby the benefits of an incentive are simply spread too thinly across all companies, regardless of their circumstances.

However, there are arguments against tax credits, such as the obvious loss of tax revenue. However, that argument could be countered by the claim that, over time, the revenues collected may begin to increase as the introduction of tax credits impacted on companies' behaviour. Theoretically, a package of tax credits could be designed to have the same arithmetic effect as a reduction in the headline rate of corporation tax. However, given the complexity of any so-called cocktail of incentives — to use my colleague Mr McNarry's phrase — it is doubtful that there would be the same psychological impact on investors and hence on investment decisions.

Studies of how tax credits work in practice — notably the Economic Research Institute of Northern Ireland's research undertaken by Prof Richard Harris and mentioned in the report — suggest that, on balance, they simply do not provide enough encouragement to firms. Only one quarter of firms availed of R&D tax credits in Northern Ireland. A GB study of small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs), referred to in paragraph 2211 of volume 2 of the report, similarly cast doubt on the effectiveness of tax credits.

The alternative to tax credits is a reduction in the rate of corporation tax. That policy appears radical, but, after all, many commentators have urged that a step change in economic performance is needed to begin to narrow the gap in living standards between Northern Ireland and the rest of the UK. Victor Hewitt, also from the Economic Research Institute of Northern Ireland, told the subgroup that in a global economy, to which so many Members have referred, the most powerful fiscal instruments are needed when, as he put it, “hunting big game” in relation to foreign direct investment. International companies would easily understand a reduction in the headline rate of corporation tax. The subgroup was told about research carried out by the Centre for European Economic Research in Mannheim, Germany, that provided evidence that FDI flows would be affected by such changes. Therefore, a reduction in the headline rate of corporation tax could probably sway the amount of FDI coming into Northern Ireland.

There is also some international evidence that any reductions in corporation tax would lead not only to the greater profitability of companies but to higher wages for the workforce, which is highly desirable. It is possible that, after some delay, a reduction in the rate of corporation tax may promote investment, which, in turn, would lead to greater revenues being collected.

However, there are downsides, some of which have been mentioned. There would be an immediate reduction in the amount of revenue collected, and one commentator forecast that it would decrease by £300 million per year. However, in evidence to the economic challenges subgroup, witnesses from the Department of Finance and Personnel said that the reduction might be in the order of £70 million to £90 million. They conceded that the figures were rough at this stage and, by implication, further research in that area is required.

To return to the deadweight problem: unless corporation tax reduction can be targeted at new companies, as one witness suggested, all firms would receive windfall profits. One witness pointed out that some of the largest beneficiaries would be the already profitable banks. In the light of the current controversy about banking charges, we must ask ourselves whether that would be a socially, economically and politically desirable outcome.

John Simpson was another witness, and he reminded us that corporation tax reduction is certainly not the magic bullet that will solve all problems. It might be some time before the benefits are felt. After all, the Republic of Ireland has had low rates of taxation on corporate profits since as early as 1958, and the Celtic tiger really began to roar only 30 years after the low rate of corporation tax was introduced. It must also be remembered that the Republic is now far from unique in having a low business tax regime.

Sir Reg Empey: Estonia also has a low rate of business tax.

Dr Birnie: There are now many imitators ranging from Puerto Rico to, as my party leader has just said, many of the central and eastern European economies, the Baltic states in particular.

The position with regard to EU law is disputed. My colleague Mr Nesbitt referred to that, as did David Ford. In its evidence, the Industrial Task Force said that the European Court had previously allowed for some of the Spanish islands to be treated separately. However, during the past week, there has been a much more critical judgement on Portugal and the Azores. That must be factored into consideration.

With regard to the negatives, the United States Internal Revenue Service may tire of the way in which US multinationals have, for many years, been able to “transfer price”, as accountants call it, in order to boost artificially the profitability of their branch operations in low-tax countries such as the Republic of Ireland or, conceivably, the Province in the future. I refer Members to volume 2 of the report, paragraphs 406 and 2,299.

In the subgroup’s assessment of the complexities of the situation, it is probably inevitable that it would not have put all its eggs in one fiscal basket. I refer Members to recommendation 16. The subgroup has asked for further rigorous research to be carried out in order to tease out many of the issues to which I have referred. That said, three basic facts cannot be ignored.

First, the Republic’s share of European and, indeed, total British Isles inward investment far exceeds its population share. The Industrial Task Force indicated that, in 2003, the Irish Republic, which has just two thirds of 1% the world’s population, received 5% of global FDI. That rate is 10 times greater than might be expected.

Secondly, Northern Ireland’s effective business tax rate is now well ahead of that of the Republic of Ireland. That matters a great deal when we compete with the Republic. Indeed, our rate is now much higher than in much of central and eastern Europe.

Thirdly, tax credits have been tried with R&D. Their positive effects have been limited. Therefore, given the evidence that is available at present and those important qualifications, corporation tax reductions may seem superior to increased tax credits. Crucially, we must also bear in mind that whatever is best theoretically may be distinct from the package that we are most likely to get from the Treasury in any bargaining situation.

The undoubtedly strong business case that can be made for corporate tax reductions — some of which I have endeavoured to outline, as has the report — will be tarnished if it is sold as part of a process of harmonisation towards any prospect of a 32-county economy, whether now or in the context of a so-called Plan B, post-24 November.

Recommendations 9 and 13 highlight the absence of any one Department having direction over a regional economic development strategy, a point that was well made by Mr Peter Weir. The effect of that absence is illustrated by the lengthy delay in translating the economic vision of February 2005 into a regional economic strategy. That strategy is now at least a year late.

5.15 pm

Recommendations 8, 9, 12, 13 and 14 deal with the more general question of how well, or otherwise, the senior Civil Service delivers policy. The Business Alliance said, perhaps unkindly, that the Northern Ireland Civil Service needed to be broken with a hammer. That witness also pointed out that successive departmental strategies had failed to reach their own stated objectives. ‘Strategy 2010’ may or may not be a good recent example of that.

There must be high standards in the stewardship of public funds, but, to balance that, those conducting economic strategies must be allowed space in which to take risks, and they should be judged on their portfolio of activities rather than fear the imminent chop of the Public Accounts Committee on every occasion, because that would inhibit risk taking and autonomous action by policy makers, as highlighted in paragraph 1,869 of volume 2.

There has already been a plenary debate on derating, and all parties oppose current NIO policy. In his evidence to the subgroup, William Wright from Wrightbus Ltd emphasised that the rates hike will fall particularly heavily on those businesses that use large areas of space or ground.

The report stresses how much higher than the rest of the UK our rate of economic inactivity has become. That qualifies the success in lowering headline or claimant rate unemployment. One witness pointed out that our long-term illness inactivity rate was one and a half times that of Great Britain and four times that of the Republic of Ireland. In many cases, individuals are entitled to benefits, but in some cases it would be in the best interests of the individuals concerned if some tough love were used to coax them back into employment.

Members must also be aware of some conflicting or trading-off of social policy considerations. For instance, there may be long-term benefits to society if a parent wishes to remain out of the workforce for a time in order to care for children — particularly young children. Therefore the Ulster Unionist Party is not saying that we should always opt for the maximisation of gross domestic product at the expense of the general well-being of society.

Recommendation 15 highlights the need to take “serious action” to curb crime — especially crimes against business. A report published last week suggested that total organised crime nets £700 million annually. If the rackets of the various terrorist plcs — be they republican or loyalist — were put out of business, the total benefit to business would exceed that of reducing corporation tax to zero, because the total corporation tax yield is about £500 million to £600 million annually.

Public investment in infrastructure, public-private partnerships (PPP) and the Strategic Investment Board (SIB) are referred to in volume 2 of the report. I am concerned that too heavy a dependence on those methods of public sector finance could represent a 25-year mortgage with sometimes dubious terms — a policy much driven by the Chancellor’s quest to meet United Kingdom Government borrowing targets through an accounting exercise that, some would say, is something of a sleight of hand.

I am pleased to support the report, and I join with others in commending the hard work of the staff and witnesses.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Thank you, Madam Speaker, for calling me to speak towards the end of today’s proceedings. Members have probably glazed over by this point, but I hope that the debate will be over in a few minutes. If Members have not glazed over by now, I will finish them off. I hope that no one asks me to speak up and that Members can hear me. I will try to make myself heard and understood, unlike Mr P J Bradley.

I want to associate myself with my colleague the Deputy Speaker, Jim Wells, in paying tribute to the Committee staff, Hansard staff and those who contributed to the Committee. Those remarks should be reiterated over and over again because they did a tremendous job, and we owe them a debt of gratitude.

Some comments have been made about the activities of Sinn Féin. Indeed, that party’s approach has been very strange. On the one hand it seems to be for the report; on the other hand, it is against it. Sometimes it does not know if it is for it or agin it. The third paragraph of the report’s executive summary states clearly that it will form the basis for a debate in this Assembly in September 2006 — that was ratified by Sinn Féin, only subsequently to be pulled by that party. Sinn Féin’s confusion and state of mind may perplex a lot of people.

Some people have said that they have missed Sinn Féin in the debate — quite frankly, I do not miss it anywhere. The fact that Sinn Féin is not here indicates that it is not serious about contributing to the future, or indeed to a debate about the economic stability, of Northern Ireland.

Other comments have been made about the Secretary of State and Dermot Ahern's contribution on Northern Ireland at the weekend. It has been reiterated again and again that the DUP is a devolutionist party. We want to see local men and women running Northern Ireland's affairs. However, if the price of devolution is too high, it will not be paid. That does not give the Secretary of State the right to hold Northern Ireland to ransom and tell us that we will face stagnation and delay for three more years. His Government have a duty to do what is right by the people of Northern Ireland and to ensure that we have the same economic opportunities as other integral parts of the UK.

A term that comes around time and time again — and it should be the focus of every serious party in the Assembly — is “radical change”. The report calls for radical change if we are going to move both our business sector and Northern Ireland forward. What “radical change” actually consists of has been reiterated today. If there is going to be radical change, the game to be played is at the Treasury, not here in Northern Ireland. It will involve radical change to our tax regime, and it will involve headline corporation tax and other significant fiscal incentives, because without those we are only — to use common parlance — footering at the edges of the economy. We need to stop footering and get on with significant developments.

A consistent, agreed, uncompromising message must go out from the politicians and the business community to the Treasury. We still have some way to go to agree what that message is in terms of the fiscal changes that need to be brought about. That is where the work lies, and we should lend ourselves to it.

I was very interested in the little aside between those great friends Dermot Nesbitt and Bob McCartney about whether changing the tax regime would be the true unionist way forward. Changes and variations in the tax regime do not weaken the Union. Indeed, Scotland has a different tax regime from the rest of the UK. The Scottish Executive can alter income tax by plus or minus two pence in the pound, and that does not weaken Scotland's sense of being a major component in the UK. It was quite interesting to see that Dr Birnie appeared to come out with a view quite different from that that his colleagues Dermot and Bob had agreed on earlier.

Mr S Wilson: Does the Member accept that the differences between Scotland and other parts of the UK as regards legislative arrangements and tax arrangements have created tension to the point where some English MPs are saying that Scottish MPs should not have a vote in the House of Commons on certain matters?

Mr Paisley Jnr: I am sure that that is a debate for another place — as the debate has gone forward, parts of England are seeking to have variation in various tax regimes.

As I said, I am sure that that debate will continue in another place. I hope that it does, because the Union is only as strong as its component parts, and the stronger Northern Ireland is economically, the better partner it will be in the Union.

Some recommendations deal with Northern Ireland's political and security instability. Without doubt, that instability, which was caused by a terror campaign lasting more than 30 years, has not helped the business community. The public sector has helped to shore up the gaps made by years of terrorism, and Northern Ireland must move to a point where the business community is given the necessary incentives, and entrepreneurs are provided with the opportunity and freedom to generate a new way forward for the economy.

The threats to the economy from organised crime are significant. On 8 September, an article in the ‘News Letter’ reported that:

“Organised crime costs the Northern Ireland economy about £600 million a year”.

That is almost as much as is spent on the entire policing budget. It is significant that a massive criminal enterprise exists in Northern Ireland, which is aided and abetted by one of the parties in the Assembly. It is preposterous that, when that party suggests that it wants to sit in Government, it is aiding and abetting a massive organised crime empire. That issue must be tackled head on.

The report identifies many incentives, on which many Members have dwelt. I was particularly taken by Bob McCartney's and Alasdair McDonnell's contributions on the need to develop the Northern Ireland knowledge base to ensure that primary school children are given the ability to become the men and women of tomorrow's business community. Of course, suggestions were made to free up entrepreneurs and to ensure that there is a knowledge bank and similar significant measures.

One point that is made over and over in the report is the need to tackle bureaucracy. That issue must be considered. Bureaucracy subjects the Northern Ireland economy to significant constraints. In particular, it is evident in the Planning Service. In a recent report, Diana Fitzsimons of the Royal Institute of Chartered Surveyors (RICS) said that:

“A significant obstacle to Belfast becoming a world class metropolis before now has been the culture of decision-making in the Northern Irish planning system, which was often defensive and over-cautious. We need to see a more positive approach from government decision-makers in order to obtain timely planning decisions”.

When faced with those criticisms at a meeting of the subgroup, the Under-Secretary of State Maria Eagle tried to bat them off by saying that planning is not her responsibility. Only when the Minister with responsibility for the economy recognises that planning is an integral part of business success will we start to move forward this debate. The Ministers with responsibilities for planning and for the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment must recognise that there is a huge strategic gap and that their roles need to be joined up.

It is important that Members ensure that Northern Ireland's benefits are sold to the world. For too long, Secretaries of State and members of other political parties have wanted to pooh-pooh Northern Ireland's success and opportunities. Northern Ireland was an economic success, and it has the potential to grow and to become an economic success in the future.

A list of the top 100 companies in Northern Ireland shows that, this year, 18 of the top 20 have recorded increased sales. In fact, Northern Ireland's top 100 companies generated a total sales output of £14,370 million, which is a 31% increase on 2004. Politicians are too quick to criticise the Northern Ireland economy and to say that it is a basket case. The message from politicians should not be one of failure; it should focus on success and opportunity for entrepreneurs.

One would not hear any of our competitors telling us about their problems. People talk about India and China as places of economic opportunity. One never hears of the poor working conditions or other problems in those countries; the politicians would not dare breathe those details outside of the regime. However, the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland goes across the world, telling people of Northern Ireland's problems. We need to play and sing a very different tune, namely that Northern Ireland has potential, people and talent and should be given the opportunity to make a go of things.

5.30 pm

Agriculture is also an integral part of Northern Ireland's success. Members should not let their eyes glaze over when I mention it. We take our agriculture industry and the agrifood sector for granted, yet 27% of Northern Ireland's top 20 companies are in the agrifood industry and employ thousands of people. Of the main producers of raw material, the beef-cattle sector employs 20,000 people in Northern Ireland. We must encourage the other parts of that industry, which add value to the product, process and retail it, so that the agrifood industry — a significant success in the past — continues to be an engine room for success in the future.

Thankfully, there has been an upturn in beef prices. Beef prices are up by £100 per head of cattle since this time last year. That indicates that the lifting of the beef ban has played into the hands of farmers here. Long may that continue. I must also point out that bureaucracy in that sector cripples it. I want to see bureaucracy cut, not only at the planning level, which affects all sorts of development from tourism to business, but at the level of the agrifood sector. The sooner that happens, the better.

Finally, I hope that when the Government take this report, they read it, rather than set it on a shelf with all the other dust-gathering reports that they have received in the past. I pray that they do not come back to the Assembly and say that their response is to generate more consultation. Surely we are past the point of consultation. We have heard some hint that that is in the pipeline. The Minister told us that she has three forthcoming significant reports and consultations: the better regulation strategy; the skills expert group; and the science and technology committee. I plead with the Minister not to allow our report to go for more consultation with those others. We do not need any more consultation. We need action, and the sooner we get action on those issues, the better it will be for the entire economy, jobs, and success of Northern Ireland.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Shannon: I support the recommendations. After intensive investigation, the subgroup of the Preparation for Government Committee has very clearly outlined the economic challenges that face Northern Ireland. As my colleague Ian Paisley Jnr stated, the Assembly should take those matters on board, and we should do everything that we can to hasten the implementation of the report's recommendations.

I wish to focus on recommendations 8 and 12. Bureaucracy must be challenged, and planning is an issue for concern. My constituency of Strangford — I am sure that Members expect me to mention it — is somewhat overlooked due to bureaucracy. It is a spot of natural beauty, of historical relevance and unexplored potential. The success of Mountstewart gardens, of Exploris, and of the Somme Heritage Centre just across the border in North Down is evident. It is important to point out that we have even more to offer with regard to tourism. The bureaucracy referred to in the recommendations must be addressed.

Ards is currently celebrating a four-hundredth anniversary celebration. We are seeking to expound the culture and heritage that those celebrations bring to light. We must capitalise on such local community events through a strong community-based tourism board, working to draw people not only to the five big attractions in Northern Ireland that make a trip here worthwhile, but to events that are steeped in positive and attractive traditions.

Incidentally, Ards Borough Council is holding a special four-hundredth anniversary celebration on September 30 at which Ronan Keating will be the star attraction. Tickets are priced at £15, which is a small price to pay for a fairly good night out.

The tourist industry in the Strangford area boasts a strong workforce. Only the tip of the iceberg has been explored: imagine the potential were visitors to be aware of and take advantage of the possibilities for short breaks and holidays in the Strangford area alone.

I want to make Members aware of a bureaucratic matter that has been brought to my attention. I understand that, at the end of the last financial year, the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure returned £2.5 million to the Treasury. That money could have been used for the betterment of the people of this Province. Recommendation 8 of the subgroup's report states:

"any savings that may be made from government efficiencies should be retained and used in Northern Ireland."

It is important to underline that, as other Members have done.

The film industry falls within the remit of DCAL, which returned £2.5 million to the Treasury. The Department can do better. The ability to sustain such ventures in the Ards Borough Council area, and in the Province as a whole, is evident. The time has come for us to exploit that gap in the market.

It is a rare site that can boast beauty and character equal to that of Ards. The advantages of attracting money and jobs to the local community must be considered in the long term. We must also consider the profile of the area. On the back of successful films such as 'Mickybo and Me', we have a foot in the door. We must not waste time and let opportunities slide. Not only does the area benefit, but the local economy is boosted.

We must press on with boosting tourism in Northern Ireland, particularly the lesser-exploited areas of Strangford that have the uniqueness and quaintness of places such as Greyabbey, Kircubbin and Portavogie. Those are viable, industrious, modern communities that are peculiar to the Ards Peninsula and must be exploited. Providing an economic boost to Northern Ireland through this venue is an achievable goal, if we strike while the iron is hot. However, taking on board the report's recommendations, incentives must be given to those seeking to invest in Northern Ireland.

Promoting tourism in the Province, particularly in Strangford, with its many leisure pursuits, such as walking, fishing, water sports and an abundance of quality restaurants, can do nothing but reap benefits for the local community and for Northern Ireland as a whole. The Department for Regional Development has recognised that walks around the shores of Strangford Lough and the surrounding countryside can, and must, be developed. However, the Planning Service does not recognise that potential.

That brings me to an important point. Linked to the promotion of Northern Ireland as a holiday destination is the necessary improvement in infrastructure. To entice visitors, we must have a suitable network of roads, as well as areas of interest and a local booming economy with shops and businesses to be explored.

I advocate the proposed reform of the planning sector. I agree with recommendation 12 of the report that the planning process needs to be reviewed and must be adequately resourced. Last week in Downpatrick, a senior planning officer told me that five local officers had left, leaving the office under strength. That is just one problem.

Protracted planning and development control processes are major deterrents to local communities. Strangford is facing a serious planning problem in trying to boost producers and manufacturing. In Ards, there is a serious need for more housing. That would provide construction jobs and would keep young people in their home towns for as long as they wanted. Increased housing would also keep family units together and would allow proper benefit to be made of the proximity to Belfast by commuting to work using the carriageway.

The report refers to the need to keep our tradesmen and scholars in Northern Ireland. They should not have to go to the mainland and further afield, never to return, for jobs and housing, as so many have done. Planning can play a role in allowing houses and factories to be built, where the youth of the future can live and work. That might help to end migration to greener pastures, where houses are cheaper and employment opportunities better.

Reform planning allows houses and businesses to be built in local areas, so the need to move to bigger cities would be less critical. Agricultural land on the Ards Peninsula is exceptional, which is something to be proud of. However, that means that the land cannot be built on. When business people want to expand their premises, their money can drain away as they try to find ways to address the problems with the Planning Service. As my colleague George Dawson mentioned earlier, it is much less hassle to relocate to another area in which the planning controls are not as strict. That is not to say that any, or all, applications should be passed without qualm. However, unless the planning system in my constituency and across the Province changes, there will be little growth.

The report states that the planning process should be less costly, quicker and more business friendly. It should be able to look at the big picture to see what is best for the borough and the Province. Rather than get caught up in the mud and mire of legislation, it should examine long-term solutions. Let me give you an example of where the planning process is going wrong. Last week, a businessman who wanted to invest £5 million to £6 million in the Strangford constituency told me that the planning process had taken 18 months. He was told on a Friday that everything had been sorted out, but by the following Monday morning, it was back to the drawing board.

There is a clear and crucial need to link spatial planning strategy to the development of policies in respective jurisdictions and not simply to use sweeping area code mechanisms. We are all aware that the volume of planning applications has increased significantly; in 2004-05, there were 35,000 applications. Those queues could be reduced if the process were reviewed and funding were found to manage the unnecessary delays and if there were an appropriate balance between the needs of the economy and the need for consultations. Costs would fall accordingly, encouraging small and large businesses to assess the viability of expansion or development.

I would like to mention other issues, but most points have already been raised. The economic challenges subgroup has stated that it wants to encourage small-business growth and big-business investment, and other Members may expound on that topic. Reform is imperative for growth, and growth is an imperative for a healthy economic future for Northern Ireland.

I urge the Assembly to endorse the report and the motion, which asks the Secretary of State to implement its recommendations, which should be done as quickly as possible. Without growth, there can be no life, and Northern Ireland needs, and has earned, a new surge of life.

I support the motion.

Mr Beggs: At this stage in the debate, I wanted to find a new topic for my contribution. A couple of Members raised the issue of planning, but the report refers to other aspects of the planning system on which I want to focus.

The executive summary of the report clearly states:

“Delays in planning approvals are frustrating economic opportunities and there is a growing realisation that public services need to focus more on supporting the economy.”

I concur with that statement, and I suspect that every Member will also concur. People are very frustrated, and Government bureaucracy must change to enable our economy to improve. New developments that are sensitive, timely and minimise costs to entrepreneurs must be allowed.

Recommendation 12 states:

“That the planning process is reviewed and adequately resourced and effectively managed to reduce delays and to provide an enabling culture”.

At present, one of the biggest failings in the Planning Service is that it does not seem to have an enabling culture. Planners find it much easier to block applications and give reasons why things cannot be done than to enable developments to proceed with necessary conditions, where appropriate, so that environmental concerns can be protected.

5.45 pm

The Belfast metropolitan area plan was a trailblazing new system that was initially approved by the Planning Service. However, there is great concern that, after several years of consultation, objections to the plan have not yet been heard. I believe that that stage of the process will take place next April. Worryingly, many other area plans are following the same process. There is a great danger that it could be 10 years before those plans are eventually approved and that the decisions may not therefore reflect the realities in 10 years' time. The process is far too protracted and must be reviewed and improved.

In its written evidence to the subgroup, the Construction Employers Federation indicated that the current planning system and the lengthy six-stage planning process has been detrimental to the Northern Ireland economy. When a number of agencies criticise the Planning Service, politicians, Ministers and Departments must take note. Those criticisms are not just from one or two individuals; there is a collective body of criticism. Ultimately, public representatives will have to take responsibility for that. Until planning decisions are returned to local government, I suspect that those difficulties will remain. There is a need to move the process forward as quickly as possible and create the right circumstances to enable sensitive decisions to be made.

Through my constituency work, I came across an example of the problems that occur. A builder complained to me that a planning application lodged with the Department had been delayed for three or four months and that he did not know what was happening. He eventually worked up the courage to press and press for an answer. It transpired that the Planning Service required a dimension of the building, which he provided within two days. However, several months were lost because of a lack of communication between the planner and the builder.

It must be remembered that various costs make up the final cost of a property. First, there is the cost of the land that a builder or developer purchases. There are also building costs and costs in developing the plan and getting it approved. Further to that is the necessary cost of borrowing between the original purchase and final sale of the property. If that lasts for two or three years — a ridiculous length of time — builders undoubtedly include that cost in the final sale price. The result is that we, the consumers, ultimately pay more for our homes. The Planning Service is adding unnecessary costs. It is essential to have an efficient planning system that can be an enabling environment, taking on board appropriate consultations and concerns, which can lay down conditions and enable sensitive development, rather than a system that causes problems and delays.

A report published last summer by Investment Belfast highlighted that £1 billion raised in Northern Ireland is invested in Great Britain. Why is that? According to Prof Alastair Adair, all the research shows that investment in regeneration areas can provide returns that are at least equal to, if not greater than, market norms. Such opportunities exist in Belfast, but they are being blocked by a lack of strategic vision and planning structures that do not promote economic competitiveness.

Disadvantaged areas in parts of Belfast are ripe for redevelopment and would be greatly enhanced were that to occur. Creating an enabling environment is necessary so that local money can be invested in Northern Ireland for the betterment of our people. There is clearly a need for change.

The report contains a comment from the International Centre for Local and Regional Development. I must admit that I had not come across that organisation before. It stated:

“There is a need for greater synergy between spatial planning, economic development, inward investment and business engagement in growing the private sector.”

Again, there is a need for planners to improve their systems in order to engage with the local economy.

In that regard I will relay another unfortunate incident involving a constituent who wished to engage in a farm diversification project. He wanted to enlarge a lake in order to create a fishing opportunity. As we all know, the need for farm diversification is growing, as more and more people have to leave the rural community to find jobs. Therefore, it is much better if other enterprises can be developed. In this case, the almost-completed planning process faced one remaining obstacle, which was the refusal of the Environment and Heritage Service to grant approval. It would not give permission to the developers. The local council became involved, and a range of civil servants made site visits and had office meetings to deal with the situation.

When I asked the environment and heritage officer about the reasons for his concerns, he said that a nearby wetland area and wildlife habitat would be affected. I asked a simple question — how long would it take for a new wetland area to be developed in a new and enlarged lake, were it to be developed in a sympathetic manner? He told me that it would take two years. He knew the answer; the problem was that he needed to put down a condition and then grant approval. Rather than do that, he recommended refusal. We need an enabling environment from the Planning Service. It must solve problems; not simply identify them.

I will take this opportunity to highlight another visionary application in my constituency. I hope that it will be successful. I refer to the LaFarge application for development of the former Blue Circle cement works at Magheramorne, which is a huge scar on the east Antrim landscape. A huge quarry remains, and there is a large spoil site in Larne Lough. There are redundant industrial premises, and several acres have been desolated by cement and lime remains. No flora grows in much of the area. Clearly, something must be done to enable its sensitive regeneration.

Lafarge has been involved in detailed consultation with local community organisations, environmental groups and the council, all of whom are unanimous in thinking that the planning application is a good idea. It would remove the scar on the landscape and build something that would add attractiveness to the area.

The proposal is to build a state-of-the-art eco-village on the site of the old cement works and use some of the money that that would generate to establish a mountain cycling centre. There are few opportunities for mountain biking in Northern Ireland, and people have to go to Scotland and other places to avail of quality tracks. There are several other proposals, including one for a wildlife centre for viewing rare birds on the wetlands.

The question is: will the Planning Service be able to examine this proposal in a sensitive manner? Will it be able to recognise that it is a good proposal that ticks all the boxes? Uniquely, everyone is in favour of it, which, in my experience of planning applications of such a scale, is an all-time first. I hope that the Planning Service and the Minister will look sympathetically at the application.

In the report, the Northern Ireland Business Alliance condemns aspects of the planning system. They have identified the EHS as being responsible for most of the delays that occur.

We have yet to find out what is being done to get rid of the delays that are costing Northern Ireland business. The Northern Ireland Tourist Board has stated that there is a need for the development of Planning Policy Statement 16, which, apparently, is still being worked on. That policy will make it easier for tourism to grow in the areas where it is needed. Without that policy, it may be more difficult to gain planning approval within the tourism sector, which is becoming more important for our economy.

Many parts of the report refer to the need to change our planning system. Departments must listen more carefully to businesses because with businesses come jobs. We will all be better off if there is a healthy economy and job opportunities are available. We must not be afraid to assist our businesses but, at the same time, we must enable that development to proceed in a sensitive manner. Conditions can be set where necessary. We do not want planners to create blockages; we want them to open up opportunities for everyone in Northern Ireland.

I thank everyone who has contributed to this worthwhile report. I contributed briefly as a substitute for one of my colleagues. The civil servants who gave their time during the summer must be thanked, as well as those who served on the Committee and worked at least two or three days a week over the summer. Like others, I acknowledge that we could go further with more time, but compliments should be passed to all those who were involved in the production of the report in such a short time.

Madam Speaker: The number of Members whose names still remain on the list of those who wish to speak means that it will be impossible for the debate to be concluded this evening. By leave of the House, I propose that proceedings be suspended, to be resumed tomorrow at 10.30 am.

The debate stood suspended.

The sitting was suspended at 5.57 pm.

THE ASSEMBLY

Tuesday 12 September 2006

The sitting begun and suspended on Monday 11 September 2006 was resumed at 10.31 am (Madam Speaker in the Chair).

ASSEMBLY BUSINESS

Madam Speaker: Before we resume the debate, I propose to draw two issues to the attention of the House. During yesterday's debate, some comments were made about a Minister and a former Minister. I have examined those comments closely, and I would like to take this opportunity to remind Members of the convention previously observed by the Northern Ireland Assembly, which is that comments of a critical nature should not be made about named Members of other elected Chambers, not least because those Members are not present to defend themselves and, consequently, are unable to avail of the right of reply in this Chamber. I would be grateful if references to those unable to speak in the Chamber were confined to the offices they hold, rather than to specific named individuals. Members can find further advice about this issue in the 'Northern Ireland Assembly Companion: Rulings, Convention and Practice'.

I now move on to another matter that arose during yesterday's proceedings. Difficulties were experienced with the acoustics in the Chamber, both on the Floor and at the Table. The problems are being investigated and, until they are resolved, I ask Members to refrain from having conversations on the Benches while other Members are addressing the House.

Mr N Dodds: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I would like some clarification. You said that Members should be careful about criticising people who are not Members of this House. However, the Secretary of State and some of his Ministers, for example, might warrant criticism on a number of fronts. For the purposes of clarification, can you spell out the boundaries or parameters? Members could be forgiven for thinking that it is a fairly sweeping censure. It would be useful to know just how far that extends, given that some Members may be tempted to make criticisms in their speeches.

Madam Speaker: I thought that I was clear, but I will repeat what I said to clarify the matter. If Members want to make a comment of a critical nature, it should not be about a named individual. In other words, a Member could criticise the Secretary of State or a Minister, but not necessarily name him or her. Do not name them, because they are not present. That is the convention of this Chamber. I would be grateful if references to those who are unable to speak in this Chamber could be confined to the offices that they hold rather than to specific named individuals. Members can find advice about this issue in the 'Northern Ireland Assembly Companion'. It is simply a matter of courtesy.

Mr McNarry: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. How does that affect the rules of privilege?

Madam Speaker: At the outset of this Assembly, we said that Members here have the right of partial privilege. Should the Member require any further information, he can contact the Business Office or my office. At this stage, we have the right of partial privilege rather than full privilege.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Does that refer only to Members of this House, Members of the Scottish Parliament, Members of the National Assembly for Wales, and Members of Westminster, and not to Members of other Houses outside this jurisdiction?

Madam Speaker: It does not refer to Members of this House; it refers to Members of other elected Chambers.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: Does it refer to Members of elected Chambers across the world?

Madam Speaker: It refers to Members of other elected Chambers. You may interpret that as you will, and I will interpret your comments in turn.

Mr Dallat: On a further point of order, Madam Speaker. Does that mean that we cannot wish Peter Hain a speedy return to London? [Laughter.]

Madam Speaker: Thank you for clarifying my ruling. That is exactly what you cannot do.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. Surely Members should have clarification of what is meant by "other elected Chambers". It would be wrong for Members to tie themselves to not criticising anybody. Ministers deserve to be criticised. It seems very strange that I can criticise them under their title, but not under their name. It makes the ruling a laughing stock.

Madam Speaker: Thank you for your comments, Dr Paisley. The use of Ministers' names by Members would be looked upon as personal criticism. However, at the next meeting I will clarify what is meant by "other elected Chambers". I thought that Members would understand that term. The issue of naming officials is dealt with in the 'Northern Ireland Assembly Companion'. Any Member who wants to criticise Ministers should refer to them by their office and not by their name; it is a courtesy. However, the matter will be looked at further, if necessary.

Mr Paisley Jnr: On a further point of order, Madam Speaker. Does that mean that Members can describe the Secretary of State as an unhelpful toerag, but that they may not say that Peter Hain is an unhelpful toerag? Is that the issue?

Madam Speaker: We will move on. [Laughter.]

The point that Mr Paisley makes will be looked at. Members may name the office, but they may not indulge in personal criticism.

Mr Robert McCartney: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. The function of the House is to alert the public who elected us to political developments; however, not all members of the public will immediately realise that the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland is Mr Peter Hain — despite what we would wish. Is there any objection to saying: "Mr Peter Hain, the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland", or: "The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, Mr Peter Hain"? In those circumstances, Members are describing who he is and also his office.

Madam Speaker: I want to make it clear that what I have explained to Members applies in other elected Chambers, be that Westminster, the Dáil or anywhere else in the world. People may not know the person referred to, but they will know the office. In naming an individual, a Member makes a personal criticism. Members are free to criticise the office and the execution of the functions of that office; however, they may not align their remarks with personal criticism. That is not the convention. The 'Northern Ireland Assembly Companion' states what is and what is not convention. However, I will look at Hansard and report to the Assembly.

We will move on. I call Mr John Dallat.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. If I heard you aright, you said that you were referring to something that had taken place in yesterday's debate. Can you tell the House what Hansard references you mean?

Madam Speaker: I will come back to the Member through the usual channels; however, if he reads Hansard he will see the names that we are talking about.

I call Mr John Dallat.

Mr Paisley Jnr: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. When you come back with your clarification, will you also clarify whether a Member from inside or outside the House brought a complaint to you about a Member's comments?

Madam Speaker: I am sorry; I did not catch your meaning. Are you asking whether a Member complained to me?

Mr Paisley Jnr: Yes.

Madam Speaker: We considered that. A number of comments were made, though not specifically to me. That is why I made that comment. Members are free to come to the Business Office and to me for further explanation that cannot be got from the 'Northern Ireland Assembly Companion'.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Were those complaints brought to you by Members or by people outside the House?

Madam Speaker: They were brought by Members.

COMMITTEE BUSINESS

Report on the Economic Challenges facing Northern Ireland

Debate [suspended on 11 September 2006] resumed on motion:

That the Assembly approves the first report from the Committee on the Preparation for Government on the economic challenges facing Northern Ireland; agrees that it should be submitted to the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland and, pending restoration of the Institutions, calls on the Secretary of State, the Committee on the Preparation for Government and others to take action to implement the recommendations in the report. — [Chairpersons, Committee on the Preparation for Government.]

Mr Dallat: Fortunately, my speech is entirely positive, and therefore I do not have to redraft it following your ruling. [Laughter.]

I believe passionately that there is a direct correlation between economic prosperity and a sound educational process that enables people to think for themselves. I go further and say that the greatest weapon against injustice in any society is the ability to read and write at a level that maximises the individual's potential. For Members who have read it, volume 2 of the report records that representatives of the Department for Employment and Learning have given a strong commitment to stepping up the Department's input to basic skills. That must be welcomed. That Department is charged with putting 18,500 people through the essential-skills qualification by March 2007 and will then progress those people to level 2 qualifications, which, I am pleased to say, includes improving their literacy and numeracy skills. In its submission, the Department agreed that recent research indicates that the positive outcome of those programmes goes far beyond acquiring basic reading and writing skills. The added value — if I can put it that way — that those skills bring to individuals is an acknowledgement that self-esteem is increased, that health improves, and so on. I should like to develop the “and so on” part of that sentence, because it is relevant to the wider issues that confront us in Northern Ireland.

Without discussing the education system further — that is a debate for another day — it is an undisputed fact that many young people fall through the safety net that the education system provides. The people who fall through that net are the ones who have no basic skills, low standards of literacy and numeracy and low levels of self-esteem.

If history is to teach us anything, it is that people who have low levels of literacy and numeracy are particularly vulnerable to exploitation. In the past, the brigadiers and those who gave themselves lofty military titles gave those young people a false self-esteem by roping them into terrorism, drug dealing and many other forms of criminality.

By developing education and training programmes, we are equipping our young people with the tools that allow them to think for themselves and enable them to make positive decisions. That process is helped by enriched levels of self-esteem, pride and respect for the rights and views of others. In other words, we will develop a more caring society in which real equality and real democracy are nurtured because everyone is rising on the spring tide of new hope and new prosperity.

I acknowledge the role that the colleges of further and higher education played during the darkest days of the past. People often felt that there was little hope for the future, no prospect of reconciliation and no possibility of finding a new route to economic recovery. In the most difficult of times, the lecturers and students of those colleges made a huge contribution towards economic activity, often with the most meagre resources and poorly equipped buildings. During the previous Assembly, many of those colleges rightly received huge investment. Today they are in a strong position to take a lead in the kinds of plans and ideals that are contained in the report. Their contribution must not be undervalued or sacrificed in any way.

10.45 am

Surely it would be much better for children who enter further education to have skills in English and mathematics at level 4 or above. I acknowledge that vast improvements have been made, and I hope that the safety net has fewer holes now than it had in the past. However, being realistic, for the foreseeable future colleges of further education will have critical roles in picking up the pieces where others have failed. After all, some 250,000 people between the ages of 16 and 64 lack the most basic numeracy and literacy skills. In other words, they have not reached the first rung of the ladder at which skills can be measured.

The report refers to welfare reforms. The Welfare to Work programme is addressing the problem of benefits competing with the search for employment. Unfortunately, major changes, which will take the form of a new kind of income support designed to test the very nature of that important question, will not be introduced until 2008.

In the meantime, the Pathways to Work programme has already been rolled out in six of the 10 areas that it will cover in Northern Ireland. That programme considers the needs of the individual, whether they are lone parents, aged over 50 or on incapacity benefit. I hope that the claim that that programme will genuinely address people's needs is an indication that the revolving-door syndrome is finally coming to an end and that people will be treated as individuals, rather than simply being placed on training programmes that leave them back where they started. After all, did the Good Friday Agreement not promise equality in all its forms, not simply some kind of equilibrium between Protestants and Catholics?

When the subgroup was taking evidence, reference was made, time and time again, to the successful models developed in the Republic. In fact, there are exemplary models in both parts of the island. The greatest possible degree of student mobility is essential. During the summer, it emerged that students coming from the Republic to colleges of further education in the North, and particularly in the north-west, were experiencing serious problems. Those problems have been only temporarily addressed, for one year. That is no good and does nothing for students on both sides of the border who want to choose courses that address their needs and the needs of the local economy, but are not available locally.

By September 2007, the number of further education colleges will be reduced to six. Any new Assembly must ensure that the rationalisation programme does not swamp the identity of the existing colleges or the work in which they have been involved in serving their local communities. If that happens, the baby will have been thrown out with the bathwater.

I note that the term “vocational” is to be dropped from the vocabulary because it suggests a route that is for the less able and those who cause problems. I am not sure of the rationale behind that assumption, and I would guard against such a move. The technical or vocational colleges that were established at the beginning of the last century have served this island well over the years and produced some of the most talented people ever to contribute to the economy. I see nothing wrong with the term “vocational” and suggest that were people recognised for their vocations, there would be higher self-esteem, greater job enrichment and a rediscovery of the values that workers hold in their respective fields of employment. Perhaps then there would not be so many people without basic skills or hope.

A new Assembly must continue the work that has been started by the subgroup of the Preparation for Government Committee. Of course, it is the responsibility of every Member of this Assembly to ensure that there is a platform to discuss the issues and to reconfirm their commitment to creating a new economy based on maximising everyone’s talents according to their individual ability — 24 November is not far away.

Mr McCarthy: After almost four hours of exciting debate yesterday, there is not much left to say on the subject. However, I will give my tuppence-ha’penny’s worth anyway — although, having listened to the Stephen Nolan radio show on the way to work this morning, I wonder whether a tuppence-ha’penny’s worth in the Chamber is of any value.

Lord Morrow: That radio programme got the Member fired up.

Mr McCarthy: No, it did not.

Like my colleagues who spoke yesterday, I want to thank those who prepared the report, those who chaired the subgroup’s meetings on a cross-party basis — which was exciting in itself — and those who contributed to the report’s contents. The Alliance Party participated enthusiastically in the meetings on the economic future of Northern Ireland. Its prosperity and economic growth has too often taken second place or has been given even less priority. Northern Ireland’s economic affairs should have been given priority long ago.

Northern Ireland has, for many years, borne the significant detrimental consequences of being a divided society. It has experienced lower-than-expected economic growth because of the troubles. Consider this fact: as little as half a per cent less of gross domestic product (GDP) each year has a large cumulative effect over decades. How much have we lost because tourists and foreign businesses did not want to come here? In the background, the paramilitaries sustained their black economy with intimidation, extortion, arson and outright destruction. Thus, they denied the hard-working people of Northern Ireland a better economic future.

Partly as a response to that violence, private businesses either kept their heads down or never got started. Workers stayed in their own areas even after the worst abuses of discrimination were removed. The public sector, however, continued to grow. The report rightly recognises that the public sector is crowding private-sector development out. The public sector cannot be blamed for attracting talented individuals. However, Northern Ireland plc must provide worthwhile opportunities if it is to attract the best people, and, more importantly, retain them.

The Alliance Party wholeheartedly endorses the report’s recommendations on additional resources for R&D activity. That has repeatedly been a key pledge in my party’s election manifestos. Success in R&D will come about through collaboration between local businesses, universities and multinationals. Often, smaller enterprises are the most willing to venture here. We must recognise the vital role that the small and medium-sized business sector plays in Northern Ireland and provide the incentives that will encourage those businesses to grow. That requires proper investment in the infrastructure — more money must be spent on public rather than private transport. We must also support back-to-work programmes, and vast sums of money must not be wasted on segregated and duplicated public services.

The Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister policy, 'A Shared Future', will investigate that. The Alliance Party has identified around £1 billion of public expenditure in Northern Ireland that is wasted in dealing with the direct and indirect costs of managing a divided society. Direct costs arise from the policing of riots, civil disturbances, marches, parades and walks, and also through the distortions to normal policing that are caused by the security threat, and a wide range of agencies face costs for the repair of damaged buildings, facilities and so on. Indirect costs arise from the necessity to provide duplicate goods, facilities and services for separate sections of the community. Those include schools, GPs' surgeries, job centres, community centres, leisure centres and even bus stops. These costs are borne by both the public and private sectors.

The divisions and segregation in Northern Ireland have also proved to be a major deterrent to inward investment and tourism, as has the cost of attracting those investments. Millions of pounds could be freed by addressing that, and that money could be better spent on frontline services.

Beyond saving money and implementing the worthwhile recommendations of the report, Northern Ireland's economic future is intertwined with its social future. We can no longer afford the luxury of living and working apart and not creating our own wealth and prosperity. There is a need for optimism and an "Ulster can do it" spirit that recognises what is required to ensure success. I am optimistic, and I am encouraged that people want to come to Northern Ireland to work. If the depth of segregation and the lack of diversity marked a declining economy in Northern Ireland, greater integration and diversity will bring success.

Northern Ireland's greatest assets are: its good, clean, green environment; the beautiful countryside; the built heritage; and the wonderful coastline and beaches. Tourism in Northern Ireland should be a major economic earner. Substantial advances have been made, but we must do more. The last thing that we need is a reduction and blighting of our coastline by unsightly apartments, but, unfortunately, that threat does exist. A cartoon recently published in the press shows a map of Northern Ireland with buildings along the coastline from south Down, up round the Ards Peninsula and on to the Foyle estuary. A sign reads: "Private Coastline Development Co", and a group of tourists who have just arrived in Northern Ireland are being greeted by a mayor who is saying: "The council is at the advanced planning stage of an imaginative coastline development facility!" The visitors cannot even see the coastline for apartments and houses.

Unfortunately, the coastline is under threat, and to its shame, Ards Borough Council — of which I am a member — is proposing to sell off coastal land in Cloghey, Portavogie and Donaghadee to the highest bidder. I am sure that Members know where those places are and have visited them. However, the council is supposed to be supporting tourism throughout the Ards borough and Northern Ireland.

We should be providing more picnic areas, coastal parking areas and play areas for children and tourists to visit and enjoy. Comments are being made about more hotels; we should have more hotels. I read in this morning's press that a major new hotel is going to be built on the site of the Crumlin Road courthouse. Hotels should be built there rather than blighting our coastline. I therefore appeal to Ards councillors and to any other councillors in the Building: scrap the idea of selling coastal land; give a lead to promoting tourism throughout Northern Ireland; and help bring increased prosperity to all our areas.

A good, vibrant economy where everyone is gainfully employed is the aim of this report, and we all should support its contents and do what is necessary to fulfil its many recommendations.

Mr Campbell: I join with other Members in commending the staff who were involved in the Preparation for Government Committee over the summer, and particularly those who were involved in the report that is before the House.

I also commend all the democrats, right across the political divide, who were involved in the preparation of the report.

11.00 am

Much has already been said by other Members about the report. A big weaknesses of the previous Assembly, setting aside the political difficulties and problems that should be all too obvious to most of us, was that it could not ensure that the economy of Northern Ireland received the necessary financial boost, which made it difficult for people to recognise the tangible benefits of devolution.

That weakness — that shortfall — is why quite a few individuals and parties have upped the ante in anticipation of the restoration of devolution, whether that is in the near or not-so-near future. Yesterday, Mr McNarry, who is not with us at the moment, referred to those of us who had put forward propositions to help in that regard. It was unfortunate that his comments were negative, particularly as he did not feel the need to put forward a proposition himself. That was doubly negative and doubly unfortunate.

It will be difficult to convince the Treasury to agree to a differential in corporation tax rates. As other Members have said, if we do not convince the Treasury, be it the present incumbent — I am not allowed to name that person — or someone different in the near future, we should be saying that if we cannot get the 10% corporation tax rate, we should be getting something that equates to a similar figure. That would mean that we could compete with the Irish Republic.

Members have quoted past representatives of the Industrial Development Authority (IDA) and others who have said that their corporation tax rate is the big issue for them and that it makes them attractive and makes their inward investment programme much easier to conduct. That is unarguable. If that is the case, and if Northern Ireland is the Irish Republic's nearest competitor, it is equally unarguable that we must have something to compete with that. If we all concentrate our minds on trying to agree what that alternative should be, we can give the economy the turbo-boost that it undoubtedly needs, improving as it has been in recent years.

Mr Dallat referred in some detail to the benefits of the further and higher education system in Northern Ireland. We should all agree and concur with that. He mentioned an issue that has been concentrating the minds of our Minister and her counterpart in the Irish Republic in recent months. The further and higher education colleges are at risk of losing hundreds of full-time students who come from the Irish Republic to receive their education in towns such as Enniskillen, Londonderry, Limavady and Newry. I have been pressing the Minister to resolve that issue, as have some of my colleagues.

I have made my views clear to the Minister. The DUP will support whatever can be done to retain the colleges' ability to educate those students. However, in doing so, I have also drawn attention to the utterly deplorable fact that, up to now, the cost of that education has been more than £3.5 million a year. I received that information in reply to a parliamentary question. UK taxpayers have been paying to educate students from the Irish Republic in Northern Ireland. I would have no difficulty with that if there were an arrangement whereby we could see a return on that money — if students from Northern Ireland were to receive equivalent treatment in the Irish Republic — but, as I understand it, that is not the case.

Dr Farren: Does the Member acknowledge that university tuition fees were abolished in Southern universities some years ago, and that that abolition applies as much to students from Northern Ireland as it does to students from the South?

Mr Campbell: I acknowledge that, but I am talking about hundreds of students from the Irish Republic, who are resident in the Irish Republic but receive full-time education in the further and higher education system in Northern Ireland. The hon Member for North Antrim and I, and the other 1.7 million people in Northern Ireland, pay for that, and it is unacceptable.

I understand that the Departments in both jurisdictions have negotiated and agreed a package for next year, and I welcome that and want to see the details. However, in the long term, there must be some quid pro quo. Whatever that might be, let us see a satisfactory conclusion to that, as it would be beneficial for our further and higher education system.

Mr McCarthy referred to tourism. Tourism plays a significant role in Northern Ireland's economy, but it could be much more significant. A few months ago, my colleagues and I visited the United States of America. We found out about the Smithsonian Folklife Festival, which will take place in Washington in July 2007. It is a huge festival in which Northern Ireland will be showcased on Capitol Hill for a week. That opportunity must be maximised, and we must ensure that Northern Ireland is promoted from coast to coast in the USA. We must ensure that the Northern Ireland Tourist Board (NITB) and Tourism Ireland sell the Northern Ireland product to the 250 million people in the United States of America. We will probably be unable to replicate such a showcase in the next two or three years; we should take full advantage of it and press the Minister who has responsibility for tourism —

Mr Dawson: Does the Member agree that the NITB, the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment and Invest Northern Ireland should use the Smithsonian Folklife Festival to promote our indigenous companies?

Mr Campbell: I hope that that will be the case, and we will press for that to be the case.

The issue of Northern Ireland's economy being so dependent on the public sector has been raised and will continue to be raised. We must ensure that public sector employees do not see greater private sector involvement as a threat; it is not, and it ought not to be. What we are talking about is complementarity. The greater level of growth must be in the private sector, with high-quality, well-paid jobs offering a positive way forward for the well-educated workforce of Northern Ireland. We need to ensure that public sector workers do not see that as a threat.

The final issue that I wish to address is political stability, which is fundamental to developing an economy. In the past 36 years, it has been difficult to have a stable economic outlook in the absence of political stability. We must ensure that we work towards achieving that. As an integral part of political stability, terror and criminality must be given no legitimacy, no recognition and no place in the Government that provides that political stability.

In fact, it is something of an oxymoron to pretend that political stability could occur while allowing the corruptive and corrosive influence of criminality and terror into the Government. Therefore I think — and I hope — that people will understand our determination to resist that influence, regardless of what happens on 24 November this year or in subsequent years. We must keep working for political security.

Yesterday, Sir Reg Empey, a Member for East Belfast, referred to North/South structures. He stated that Dermot Ahern — or perhaps I should say the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Irish Republic — made comments at the weekend about North/South structures having a greater influence. I wonder how people can say that all North/South co-operation is not political and is not to be considered by unionists as worrisome or cumbersome in any way, and that that community should see that practical co-operation exists. Of course, we have no difficulty with practical co-operation, but it seems to be incongruous for people such as the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Irish Republic to use something that is supposed to be non-political as a political big stick with which to beat us. I do not know how such people can reconcile those ideas. Therefore we should analyse whether the North/South structures that are being anticipated for 25 November and beyond are of practical benefit. If not, they will receive the response that the unionist community has given them in previous years.

I shall conclude by discussing the need to get not only political stability but an agreement in Northern Ireland that commands the consent of both sections of our community. That is where the Belfast Agreement failed. I listened intently yesterday as Margaret Ritchie, an SDLP spokesperson, repeated a mantra. It seems that if one repeats something often enough, it will become reality. No matter how many times one says that something is unacceptable, it remains unacceptable. We must find something that is acceptable to the nationalist community as well as to the unionist community. The Belfast Agreement did not provide that, and terror and criminality in our Government will not provide that for unionists and will never do so. So we have to work our way through the matter. No mafia-type organised and structured crime should be connected to our Government. It destabilises the Government and does not provide the stability that the economic development of our country so sorely needs.

Mr K Robinson: I congratulate my Assembly colleagues of all parties who have collaborated on this mammoth undertaking. Their work rate and diligence in preparing the report within such a short time deserves wider recognition than the media — with some notable exceptions — have been so far inclined to afford it.

I also thank those individuals, organisations, institutions and Departments that brought important features, that are often buried in weighty reports, into clear focus. It would be remiss of me not to mention the tenacity of the Committee staff, who not only sought out several key contributors at short notice but pulled the discussions and submissions together in a meaningful manner to enable this debate to proceed.

To set the issue in a meaningful context, it would be helpful to place the findings in that well-worn framework — the strengths, weaknesses, opportunities and threats (SWOT) analysis. If we approach the challenges in that analytical manner rather than jump into the deep pessimism of the half-empty-glass syndrome, or the equally unhelpful gung-ho, glass-half-full stance, we may be able to build a coherent and cohesive approach to them. If we arrive at that consensus, we will be in the position that the American writer Frank Tyger described when he said:

“When it comes to winning, you need the skill and the will.”

Clearly, the emergence of the report indicates that the Assembly and the parties that are represented today have the will. Let us see whether they have the skill to put the package together for the benefit of all in Northern Ireland plc.

11.15 am

Education, in its widest sense, is crucial to maintaining and expanding our economy. We must invest our limited resources wisely. It is, therefore, my contention that we must immediately address the problems faced by primary schools in the most marginalised areas. Yesterday, my colleague Mr Robert McCartney mentioned the importance of the primary sector. How can we continue to produce excellent teachers and allow them to become unemployed or face a limbo in which they spend an occasional day covering for an absence or an in-service training demand? Why not use them as a task force of eager, enthusiastic role models for those children who so desperately need to be enthused? In doing that, they would also develop their professionalism at the chalk face. The permanent staff would also benefit by being saved from the present high levels of burnout that are features in many areas.

This initiative, together with smaller class sizes, would have a lasting impact on the low levels of educational attainment that have a lasting and damaging impact on pupils as they move up through the system, culminating in poor basic skills of literacy, numeracy and communication that so bedevil attempts to raise the skills of our potential workforce. In economic terms, early intervention is more cost-effective than remedial measures that have to be introduced at a later stage.

Our secondary sector has a higher percentage of pupils achieving two or more A levels than does England. However, we have about 20 schools that produce the almost 20% of our pupils who do not even achieve level 2. In numeracy and literacy we perform well at the upper end, as the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) benchmark studies have proved, but we also have a significant tail of underachievement and a noticeable difference in attainments by gender.

The Department of Education said, as noted in volume 3, page 90, paragraph 7 of this report:

“Since more young people with high qualifications leave Northern Ireland there is an impact on the overall qualifications levels of the workforce.”

The current approach of its sister Department, the Department for Employment and Learning (DEL) towards this ongoing brain drain is, therefore, somewhat puzzling. If Northern Ireland is to have a world-class economy, surely it cannot afford to lose this latent potential workforce every year. It is worth investigating the role played by some second-level institutions in so many students moving across the water for their third-level education, a factor that seems, for whatever reason, to affect Protestants in particular.

It also remains to be seen if the ongoing, much-publicised and as yet uncostered changes in second-level education will improve or impede the economy. Currently, 30% of pupils are not qualified to level 2, and 22.4% have no qualifications. Only 41% of our workforce is qualified to level 3, which is craft level. The role of the further and higher education sector in delivering the skills required to stabilise and extend the economy is critical. Earlier intervention at primary school level would free further education colleges from the task of providing the amount of basic literacy and numeracy intervention that is currently required. That would give added status and focus to the skills agenda and to the likes of the modern apprenticeship programmes.

Training for Success is a welcome initiative. However, some of the problems that surrounded former schemes are still embedded in the framework. Public perception of vocational routes can still be clouded by their association over the years with low achievers. Modern apprenticeships must be valued and be seen to have real currency in the eyes of the participants, employers and society if they are to become credible.

We must also be realistic about the problems that spring from the preponderance of small and medium-sized enterprises in Northern Ireland. Few employers can absorb the number of apprentices that the economy may require them to. Mundane issues such as supervision and insurance are burdens that the small-business sector cannot easily cope with. Those issues need further clarification. Apprenticeships could then be more strategically focused on sectors identified by the business community. That would also enable the further education sector to address its increasing role as a player in economic development. This sector, which is currently undergoing major restructuring, is having enhanced responsibilities placed on it. Although this may be a recognition of its ability to deliver quality education and to enhance our skills base, there are limitations inherent in the sector.

First, the physical estate must be the most modern available, not only as regards bricks and mortar but in respect of the quality and quantity of technical equipment provided. Secondly, I am concerned that, after the demise of the Government training centres during previous restructuring phases, the expertise of staff with actual experience of the workplace may be diminishing rapidly. That internal training need must be addressed to ensure that colleges have high-quality staff with qualifications and industrial experience. Theory must be matched with practice if we are to produce a highly skilled workforce that has been exposed to the realities of working in a business setting.

Thirdly, further education colleges must be given adequate resources to enable them to deliver the Department's agenda and the business sector's expectations. They must also be given a degree of flexibility that enables them to respond to the regional demands outlined in many submissions and short-notice requirements at local demand level.

The expertise and enthusiasm displayed by individual colleges — and I have visited several during the past year — allied to the vision for the sector expounded by the Association of Northern Ireland Colleges (ANIC) augurs well for the future. However, a closer degree of co-operation will be required between representatives of the Department, employers, unions and those who forecast the changing needs of our economy, if they are to be nimble enough to keep up with the pace of change.

In the higher education sector, we have been well served over the years by our universities. However, rapid change is also in the air in that sector. Queen's University and the University of Ulster have responded positively, seeking globally to widen their pool of lecturing expertise. They have developed links with other parts of the world and expanded their activities in a manner that will enable them to realise fully the potential of the intellectual property that they have generated.

However, there is a need to link venture capital and other streams of Government moneys in order to pump-prime those initiatives and help to bring ideas more quickly to market. Imposing top-up fees will not generate the level of finance that universities need. Indeed, such fees may even preclude a sector of society that could bring a new perspective to university life and subsequently transfer those benefits back into currently marginalised areas.

We are not persuaded by part of DEL's position paper 'Consideration of the Optimum Number of Full Time Undergraduate Places in Northern Ireland Higher Education', which refers to lifting the maximum aggregate student number (MASN) cap. Furthermore, we feel that the Department's laissez-faire approach is in stark contrast to positive activity in other UK regions.

The loss of 20% of potential graduates each year is a brain drain that we cannot continue to afford if we are to create a critical mass of undergraduates and expand postgraduate potential. It is crucial that the close relationship between the further and higher education sectors is maintained and strengthened. They are not competitors; they are, and must continue to be, a coherent and cohesive component in Northern Ireland plc's drive towards achieving a high-value economy serviced by a highly educated and properly skilled workforce.

The location of business clusters based on the commercial outcome of university research and development (R&D) projects is a vital area for future growth. Although those zones need not be adjacent to a campus, there is scope for them to be adequately housed within a reasonable distance. I encourage the Planning Service and Invest Northern Ireland to engage with the universities so that the present embarrassing void in my locality, known as Global Point, is seriously considered as a potential site within an enterprise zone. It could easily be linked with the excellent work carried out by enterprise agencies and spin-out companies generated by third-level research projects.

Global Point is unique to Northern Ireland in that the infrastructure is already in place: it is adjacent to a rail link; a motorway, the A8 (M); a trans-European network route in the A8 road to the ports of Larne and Belfast; an international airport; a university campus; and a good mix of small and medium-sized enterprises (SME) and larger employers.

However, all that potential growth is stymied by the bureaucracy that several contributors have firmly castigated. In the interim, our competitors in the Republic of Ireland — and I stress the words "competitors in the Republic of Ireland" — rezone land, expand the motorway system and rail links and plan multi-modal transport hubs that will threaten our growth potential in Northern Ireland. Their can-do approach is in stark contrast to our "let's have another strategy and some more consultation" inertia-bound model.

The Northern Ireland Manufacturing Focus Group's (NIMFG) key points document refers to industrial derating and illustrates clearly the inability of our Government to grasp the way in which any competitive advantages left to us are being undermined through their inept approach to our economy.

In conclusion, it is clear that if Northern Ireland is to achieve economic success on the required scale, a cocktail of measures is needed — perhaps we shall all need a cocktail after this mammoth session. That cocktail of measures must be based on up-to-date and reliable labour market research data, which should indicate those areas where there are, or are likely to be, skills shortages. Further and higher education colleges must be in a position to respond to needs in a flexible manner, so that the long-term and short-term requirements of business can be met at regional and local levels.

The critical role of R&D must be realised and supported by tax incentives that are broad and simple enough to encourage more businesses, especially in the SME sector, which is Northern Ireland's largest sector, to become involved. That might be achieved through clustering and the introduction of R&D champions, as suggested by the Federation of Small Businesses (FSB), or by encouraging those in the SME sector to become partners with larger businesses or universities. Northern Ireland can no longer languish at a private business level of 0.5% investment in R&D, while its neighbours continue to invest up to two or three times that amount. If the chronic shortfall is to be addressed, such an approach is needed.

I am also drawn to the knowledge bank idea, especially with its commercial manager's acting as a single point of contact for companies with high-growth potential. Members will have experience of having to wrestle with half a dozen agencies before a simple decision can be made. UUTech Ltd's suggestion for special economic zones, with economic potential for companies engaged in collaborative R&D, is worthy of note. DEL's collaboration fund for further and higher education has potential, and, although it is time limited at the moment, following evaluation, it would be worth pursuing. Also worth pursuing is the SMILE project, which stands for small medium innovative learning enterprises, in which the further education colleges target SMEs under the banner of ANIC.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Jim Wells] in the Chair)

It is clear that all sections of Northern Ireland society stand willing to play their parts in this vital enterprise. Although the issues are being discussed here in somewhat of a vacuum, my party stands ready to play its part in bringing rural prosperity to all parts of society. I support the motion.

Dr Farren: The motion serves two critical and highly significant objectives. First, the subgroup's report is based on the full support of all the parties that have met over the past weeks. It is also based on the significant input of representatives from a wide range of interest groups, and that alone should commend it not only to Members but to Departments and to the community and business sectors. Secondly, the report provides parties with a key opportunity to demonstrate their seriousness to restore the political institutions by 24 November.

Before I address the report's economy-related content, I will focus on its second purpose. As one of those Members who participated regularly in the deliberations of the Preparation for Government Committee and during the early stages of the economic challenges subgroup, I must confess that it was not always a positive experience. Difficult things were said, and accusations of ill will — and even worse — were not uncommon. Comments were misinterpreted, and offence was often taken. However, alongside that, Members who participated will acknowledge that, as those keen anoraks who study Hansard will have discovered, there was some good humour. The staff were wonderful and, in that remark, I include those who chaired the meetings.

Without overstating what has been achieved, I can say that some significant advances have been made, among them the report upon which today's motion is based. To date, the report is the high point of the Committee's work.

11.30 am

If we are to build on what we are too slowly addressing, we must take every opportunity to build confidence that all of us will deliver on our commitments and so enable restoration to happen in ways that are more, rather than less, likely to sustain our institutions. I regret and fail to understand why a party that so stridently claims that its ultimate objective is to unite Catholic, Protestant and Dissenter is not present to contribute to building that confidence.

What, I have to ask, has Sinn Féin to be afraid of in putting its views on this report and on the economy generally before the Members of the Assembly and, through it, to the public at large? Sinn Féin is prepared to contribute to the work of the Preparation for Government Committee and to compiling a report that states:

"that the report will form a basis for a constructive and informed Assembly debate in September 2006".

Why is it not making its constructive contribution here today? Instead, true to its name, "ourselves alone", Sinn Féin is huddling in its corner of the political field, clutching its ball to its chest, hoping that if it appeals to the two Governments they will oblige its future partners in the Executive to join it. It is a shameful position. The sooner Sinn Féin abandons it and fully joins the rest of us, the better it will be for the people who have sent us here.

If we are to make this debate meaningful, and if the report before us today is not to rest on a shelf already littered with similar reports from earlier Assemblies and elsewhere, we need to know that all will play their part in making restoration a reality. The DUP, which still will not commit to restoration by 24 November, also fails the challenge set by itself and the other parties who authored the report, all of whom agreed that:

"All the parties on the subgroup accepted that failure to have all-party agreement on the political institutions and policing will hinder and act as an impediment to business investment in Northern Ireland".

Their prevarication contributes to the failure to reach that agreement. If these words mean what they say, no party can find refuge any longer in prevarication, obfuscation and delay. No party can avoid committing itself to a wholehearted embrace of the principles of partnership, equality and human rights. No party can take it upon itself to be the sole arbiter of when and whether conditions set for assessing the state of paramilitarism and related criminality are being met.

We have the basic framework and the institutions set out in the Good Friday Agreement to guide us. That framework and those institutions should give us all confidence to engage with one another in the full knowledge that our constitutional rights, human rights and civil rights are fully protected, and that, like any living document of its kind, the agreement's implementation can be developed and amended in the light of experience. That should be our guarantee and our protection.

As to the details of the report, I wish to make a few points. Most of what it contains has been said many times over recent years: the need to move to a more wealth-generating economy; the need for business to become more export-oriented; the need to strengthen and fully develop our all-Ireland and wider business links; the need to modernise the infrastructure; the need to develop R&D capacity and to ensure that education and training programmes are better aligned with economic and social needs; the need to ensure that the best incentive package is available to encourage and sustain investment; and, above all, the need to ensure that the economy develops in ways that will contribute to community harmony and reconciliation.

Yesterday, I was struck by what I regard as very strong and — in part, at least — ill-informed criticism of our education service. Evidence from the most sophisticated international assessment of literacy, numeracy and scientific knowledge, conducted under the auspices of the OECD, shows that in those three skill areas the mean scores of 15-year-olds in Northern Ireland are higher than those of their peers in many other OECD countries, including the Republic of Ireland — by several ranking places — Denmark, Germany, France and Sweden, all of which would be regarded as having much more successful economies than we have. In respect of scientific knowledge, the mean scores of 15-year-olds are ranked sixth behind Japan, Finland, Korea, Australia and the Netherlands. None of our immediate competitors is ranked higher than we are.

That does not mean that we do not have problems with those whose scores are much lower than the mean.

Those results, however, tell me that our education system serves us very well. Furthermore, they tell me that, although we have the skills, we are not able to provide the best outlets for those who possess those skills. Therefore, we need more high-value jobs, such as have been provided in the South and in other successful economies.

I particularly endorse recommendation 11, on economic opportunities. It would be madness not to engage in strengthening clustering and collaboration with the South, and some instances of that are already taking place. Over the past decade, output in the South has almost doubled, and the rate of growth is three times greater than it is here. At present we can only match the South's standard of living by making even heavier demands on the Exchequer. Most, if not all, Members will acknowledge that evidence from consistent British ministerial pronouncements indicates that assistance from the Exchequer will not be easily forthcoming, if at all.

The financial services sector, among others, offers special opportunities for collaboration. Starting from zero in 1987, the international financial services sector in the South has created over 11,000 high-income jobs, has attracted over 450 international financial institutions and is host to half of the world's top 50 banks and half of its top 20 insurance companies. We must do more than learn from that experience; we need to piggyback on it.

There is more work to be done on some of the report's recommendations. We must be more precise as to our needs with regard to incentive packages. Far too often we talk glibly about peace dividends and financial packages, as if some extra financial support is all that is required to make the necessary step change in our economy. Figures are plucked from the air. If one party says that the figure should be £100 billion, another party is bound to say that it should be £200 billion. Somebody else will probably up that figure. That is a nonsensical auction game in which to get involved.

Given our circumstances, I support the call for special assistance. It should be in the form of special measures, incentives, and extra capital where that can be shown to be justified. A lower tax rate would help the competitive situation of local firms and add to our ability to attract greater inward investment. The benefits of low tax only kick in, as other Members have said, when businesses make a profit, and it is a much better way to stimulate entrepreneurial activity than grants and subsidies. A 12.5% rate will require approval from the European Commission, and we should not underestimate how difficult that will be to obtain. Only a devolved Administration will have the focus and the drive to lobby and achieve that.

The additional work that the economic subgroup is being asked to undertake on the issues identified should give confidence on how we structure and develop a strong social partnership, which is required in order to move forward. The basis for that has already been established in the engagement that took place with representatives from the business community and the voluntary sector in the course of preparing this report. We should build on that. We have seen the success that that has achieved in helping to stabilise the basis for economic development in the South.

Finally, last week I attended a seminar at which a representative of the greater Newry area spoke. Ten or 15 years ago that area was seen as a basket case in terms of economic and social development. Co-operation, determination, drive and imagination have transformed our new city into one of the North of Ireland's leading cities with regard to economic and social development. We can learn from the way in which that has been achieved in Newry and extend the same spirit of determination and imagination to our work on economic development.

Mr Donaldson: I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate. It is always interesting to follow the Member for North Antrim. I must deal with some of Dr Farren's comments about the Democratic Unionist Party before I come to the substance of the issue under debate. It is, of course, a tradition that when SDLP members criticise Sinn Féin they must balance that with an attack on the DUP. Any SDLP statement that is aimed primarily at Sinn Féin must include the obligatory paragraph that has a go at this party.

Let me make it clear to the Member — and he ought to know this — that the DUP stands ready to play its part in a partnership Government in Northern Ireland. It is the SDLP that has refused to sit in partnership with the DUP, despite the fact that we have offered on numerous occasions to go into a coalition Government, today, with it and other democratic parties. However, that does not appear to be acceptable to the SDLP. The fact that we do not have a devolved Government, as Dr Farren knows, is down to the failure of one party — a party that is absent from the Chamber today, a party that has still not met the democratic standards required of any party that wants to be in a democratic Government.

Dr Farren mentioned the importance of agreement on policing as part of the way forward. Of course that is important. However, I remind the Member that for years his party was unhappy with the policing arrangements in Northern Ireland and refused to take its seats on the Police Authority for Northern Ireland. Indeed, it was common parlance that, in unionist terms, SDLP stood for "Still don't like the police". That was its position for years.

11.45 am

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the hon Member that the subject of the debate is the subgroup's report; I am sure that he is about to drift back to it.

Mr Donaldson: Indeed I am, Mr Deputy Speaker. Given that the Member who spoke before me spent a considerable portion of his speech dealing with these issues, it is only right that I have the opportunity to respond in the context of creating a Northern Ireland that has the political stability to ensure a thriving economy in the future.

In concluding my comments on policing, I say to the Member who spoke before me that agreement is important. However, just as the SDLP took its time — two or three decades — to reach the point where it felt able to sign up to the policing institutions in 1998, it is equally important that we get the devolution of policing and justice right this time. If that takes a little longer, we ought to take that extra time to ensure that we get it absolutely right.

The DUP is not procrastinating; we stand ready to engage in the discussions that will take place in the coming weeks. My party is ready to do what it can to play its part in reaching agreement. However, let us be absolutely clear: partnership in a democracy is important, but it must be based on democratic principles. One party has not yet reached the standard required, and its absence from the Chamber today speaks louder than anything that I could say.

I welcome the subgroup's report on economic challenges; its recommendations are well thought through. In particular, I highlight recommendation 5, on vocational training, skills and research and development. That is an important element in driving forward our economy. We must look to the future and consider the type of industry that we want to attract to Northern Ireland. We must examine where future employment potential lies. That will enhance the types of vocational training that are provided for our young people. A real emphasis must be put on skills and vocational education.

I agree with the Member for East Londonderry, Mr Dallat, about the need for investment in the further education sector and its colleges and institutes. Like so many public-sector organisations, further education colleges and institutes are currently going through major changes.

Mrs I Robinson: I thank my colleague for giving way. Is he aware that young people who are trying to develop vocational skills in plumbing and electrical work through further education colleges are greatly concerned that firms are not offering apprenticeships, thereby denying young people the opportunity to go to further education colleges?

Mr Donaldson: I thank the hon Member for Strangford for that intervention. I agree with her entirely that there is a need to look at what skills are required and to focus the courses available in further education colleges and institutes on those needs.

Lisburn has an excellent further education institute. In the institute's main building, a hall is dedicated to the late Harry Ferguson, one of the great innovators produced by the Northern Ireland education system. We need more Harry Fergusons today, and, dare I say it, a few Sarah Fergusons — if Sarah, Duchess of York will forgive me. We need men and women with vision and innovation.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Donaldson: We need men and women who are capable of providing the leadership required in industry and the vision to create new opportunities and employment. That is very important. In getting that right through focusing on vocational education and skills, we must help young people throughout the education system to see the value of pursuing careers in industry and of going into business.

Even today, our education system does not place enough emphasis on that very important aspect of our life. Indeed, as the hon Member for Strangford said, it is almost frowned upon for a young person to think about becoming a joiner, a bricklayer or a plumber. That should not be the case. Some people whom I went to school with have done very well for themselves and have generated much wealth through building, joinery and plumbing businesses. We need to re-establish the value of those trades within the Northern Ireland economy.

This summer, I had the privilege of visiting China for the first time. I was amazed at the developments that are taking place in that country, especially in its economy. China is making huge investments in its infrastructure. However, during my visit, I was disappointed to discover that Invest Northern Ireland has not sent a trade delegation to China for years, despite the fact that it has probably the fastest-growing economy in the world. Our representative in China is based in Malaysia and occasionally visits Shanghai. However, the major area of growth in China is in the south and, indeed, increasingly in the north. We must do more through Invest Northern Ireland to examine emerging economies such as that of China and identify trade opportunities for Northern Ireland companies. The sooner we send a trade delegation to China, the better.

Having mentioned Invest Northern Ireland, I make a plea for small businesses in Northern Ireland. Too often, people come to us who are trying to establish a new business or are trying to grow their existing business. I am sure that other Members experience that. The small businesses of Northern Ireland are at the heart of the economy. They make up the majority of our employment provision and help the economy to grow. However, too often they are frustrated when they go to Invest Northern Ireland for help, only to discover that they do not fit into the criteria or the categories that are laid down by that agency. The Local Enterprise Development Unit (LEDU) and the Industrial Development Board (IDB) were amalgamated a number of years ago, and I wonder whether that has hindered our small business sector to some extent. I welcome the report's recommendation that we look again at the role, structure and functions of Invest Northern Ireland, especially in relation to the small business sector.

I also wish to mention the manufacturing sector. There is all-party support on the issue of industrial derating. I have no doubt that the imposition of industrial rates is damaging our manufacturing sector. Just last week in my constituency, Montupet in Dunmurry announced the loss of up to 90 jobs. A couple of weeks before that, Daewoo in Antrim made a similar announcement. Others will follow. I know of manufacturing companies that are considering taking their investment elsewhere. They are considering expansion but do not believe that Northern Ireland provides the most competitive environment in which to continue. I am referring to indigenous companies that are looking to relocate in eastern Europe and the Far East. That will mean a loss of jobs and a diminution of our manufacturing base.

There is all-party agreement that industrial rates should be capped at 25%. The Secretary of State, who shall not be named, has agreed to establish a committee to look at this again. However, time is of the essence. The DTZ Pida report that was prepared in conjunction with the discussion on industrial rates stated that companies would end up paying only 2.5% of their profits in rates. Today, some companies are paying more than 50% of their profits in rates. That is squeezing those companies and damaging their capacity to invest and expand. They are looking at Northern Ireland and asking: "What is the point?"

In my constituency, we have had recent examples of companies that were seeking to expand and took their expansion plans south of the border. That means a loss of jobs and a loss of investment in our economy. I urge the Secretary of State to get on with implementing the all-party agreement that has been reached and cap industrial rates at 25%. That would give our manufacturing sector a key competitive edge, which it has lost in the very competitive world of the global economy.

I shall also mention another factor that I consider a disincentive to investment, namely our planning process. I welcome the recommendation of the report that the planning process needs to be reviewed, adequately resourced and effectively managed. All too often when it comes to large investment in Northern Ireland, we get bogged down in the planning process, and, again, we lose our competitive edge. Companies that are seeking to invest here do not wish to get bogged down in the planning process for two, three, four or five years. They will simply decide not to bother and will move elsewhere.

We must also consider how we can make more use of planning gain for major infrastructural improvements. We have been doing just that in Lisburn, which is in my constituency. The two major multi-million-pound roads projects that have been undertaken in the Lisburn area in the past five years have been privately financed. The project at Sprucefield and the work on the north Lisburn feeder road are both making a major contribution to improving the traffic situation. A third project, the Knockmore link — which will link the M1 to the north feeder road — has been proposed and will also be privately financed. In developing our infrastructure in Northern Ireland, more emphasis must be placed on planning gain, which can be used to benefit the whole community.

My hon Friend the Member for East Londonderry, Mr Campbell, touched on tourism. For years, we have engaged in the visitor-centre approach to tourism, but we must adopt a big-picture vision. We have something very valuable to offer. Our greatest tourist asset and selling point is the beauty of our country. Are we exploiting that to its full potential? I am not sure that we are.

I recently attended the launch in Parliament Buildings of a study that explores the possible benefits of reopening the Ulster Canal. The reopening of the Northern Ireland canal network could greatly contribute to opening up the entire Province to tourism and could act as a driver for regeneration. The Ulster Canal, which links into the Erne-Shannon waterway system, flows into Lough Neagh. We are also working with Belfast City Council, Castlereagh Borough Council and Craigavon Borough Council to explore the potential of opening the Lagan Canal. A visitor to Northern Ireland could get on a boat at Belfast and go all the way up the Lagan — preferably not in a bubble — to Lough Neagh, into the Ulster Canal system, down into the Erne-Shannon waterway system to Limerick, or north on the lower River Bann to Coleraine. That would open up this country to tourism, and it would be an attractive offering. Such a project would cost a lot of money and require vision, but that is the kind of project on which we must now focus if we are to promote tourism development in Northern Ireland. It is big-picture stuff, but that is what Northern Ireland needs.

Mr Elliott: As many other Members have done, I pay tribute to those who participated in the work of the subgroup. I also pay tribute to the many contributions from the business community. The Ulster Farmers'

Union contribution was particularly relevant to me, and those from the Northern Ireland Tourist Board and from Mr Eric Reid of Moy Park are also worth mentioning.

The farming community faces two immediate problems: first, the difficulties that it currently experiences; and secondly, the future. The farming community has had a very difficult time in the past decade. It has suffered the BSE crisis, foot-and-mouth disease, the high exchange rate of sterling and decreasing produce prices. Twenty years ago, in 1986, milk prices averaged over 16p a litre. Some 10 or 11 years ago, they reached between 26p and 30p a litre. Today, farmers receive around 15p per litre, which is a reduction of 50% in the past decade. That is quite unsustainable.

Again, in 1995 and 1996 — some 10 or 11 years ago — the price of finished beef was about £2.65 a kilogram; now we are lucky to make £2 a kilogram, or less. The number of farms in Northern Ireland has decreased by one third in the past 20 years, from some 42,000 to just 28,000. I am not saying that rationalisation is bad for the economy, but it is bad for the traditional family unit. Farmers must realise the business sense of the agriculture industry.

12.00 noon

Even the grain trade has suffered. Twenty years ago, wheat and barley were making £114 and £103 a ton respectively; now it is in the region of £83 and £88 a ton — again, a major decrease. Mr Eric Reid from Moy Park Ltd highlighted the problems in the poultry sector. Twenty years ago, broilers were making 53.7p a kilo, and now they are making just 50p a kilo.

Fifty years ago, farmers received 50p for every pound that was spent on the food industry; now it is just 7.5p. Look at the difference between what the farmer receives for his produce and what the housewife pays in the supermarket. For example, a farmer might receive £500 for a beef animal at the abattoir. The retail cost of beef from that animal at the supermarket or the butcher's shop is about £1,500, leaving a profit of £1,000 somewhere in between in the food chain. While many farmers are going out of business, meat plants and supermarkets are amassing fortunes. I am not saying that they should not do that: the farming and business communities are just asking for a fair deal.

What does the future hold for the agriculture industry? The resilience of the farming community and of the producers in Northern Ireland has been immense, even though problems continue to mount. Every farming family knows the effects of the basic lack of profitability. Investment in agriculture is low, and farmers are working longer hours than they used to, having to cope with more administration, departmental bureaucracy and red tape for less return.

There is little reinvestment in the industry. However, the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development's (DARD) farm nutrient management scheme is one of the more positive issues. I hope that that will amount to an investment of around £200 million for the farming sector. It is crucial: DARD must recognise that the scheme is essential and accept its responsibility to help farmers to meet their needs.

Recently, I was part of an Ulster Unionist Party delegation that met representatives from United Dairy Farmers to discuss the mounting concern over current and future milk prices. Although milk prices are pathetically low at the minute, United Dairy Farmers predict that they will probably get lower. We are campaigning for the restoration of the export refunds from Brussels, and we have called on the Government to offer support packages to milk and beef processors to modify production plants and diversify into better value-added products. However, there is a caveat: any resulting financial advantage should be returned to the farmer and not be allowed to get stuck with the processors or the supermarkets. Unless such matters are progressed, the farming industry and the traditional family-run farm will be unsustainable in the longer term.

The milk and beef industries rely on exports, and that is why milk powder cuts and cuts in export refunds have had a devastating effect. The milk industry has lost more than £80 million this year alone because of the significant cuts in Europe. The export refunds were slashed in expectation of a World Trade Organization (WTO) deal, and therefore it seems reasonable — now that the WTO talks are in flux — that the European Commissioner for Agriculture should move to restore the balance for farmers in the short term, and then it can be looked at in the longer term.

Most people say that farmers are always complaining. Perhaps we are, but on this occasion, we have good and just reason. The Republic is investing over €3 million in an investment plan for the dairy sector over the next three years. Mr Donaldson mentioned competition between the Republic and Northern Ireland. If Northern Ireland is to compete, it must put a similar investment into the economy.

Support is a vital lifeline for smallholders in the farming community. When farmers make simple mistakes, they are penalised. When the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development makes a mistake, no penalties are applied. All I ask is for flexibility and leeway within the system and for some common sense.

There is a clear indication that farmers in Northern Ireland are more likely to be penalised for a breach of regulations or small misdemeanours than in any other European country. The Department's own figures reveal that £2.8 million has been withheld from single farm payments to Northern Ireland farmers. In the Republic of Ireland, the corresponding sum is just £229,000. I suggest that when DARD staff make mistakes, they should be penalised, and compensation should be paid to farmers. Farmers only want a level playing field.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member should be addressing issues that are referred to in the report. There is no reference to subsidies. Please return to the main recommendations of the report.

Mr Elliott: I certainly will. However, these are valid economic issues for farmers and for the economy of Northern Ireland, and they were referred to in the presentation by the Ulster Farmers' Union to the subgroup. Furthermore, Mr Donaldson mentioned planning issues.

I will move on to tourism, which suffers greatly from a lack of proper planning and administration in Northern Ireland. So much of Northern Ireland's potential tourism is lost to Scotland and to the Republic. Despite that, there is a growing tourism industry in Northern Ireland. Visitor spend in the Province has risen from £250 million in 1995 to £357 million in 2005 — an increase of over 40%.

The number of visitors to the Province has increased; between 2004 and 2005, there was an increase of 32% in the number of visitors from Europe, 19% in the number from North America and 12% in the number from Australia and New Zealand. That happened in spite of the fierce competition to which I have referred from Scotland, England, mainland Europe and the Republic of Ireland. Cheap flights throughout Europe have caused deeper problems for the Northern Ireland domestic market. However, I am pleased to say that we appear to be overcoming those problems.

Recent Northern Ireland Tourist Board (NITB) initiatives, such as the five signature projects, should help to combat the successful campaigns of our neighbouring competitors. However, some areas of Northern Ireland have been neglected by those projects; I would highlight the fact that County Fermanagh, one of the best tourism areas in Northern Ireland, was not included. That has been offset by the NITB's acceptance of the Destination Fermanagh project, which was recently launched in the county. There are many other initiatives to be proud of in Northern Ireland.

Significant international horse trials are held at Necarne, a world rally event will be staged in the Province and the innovative bluegrass festival, which takes place at the Ulster American Folk Park, is the largest event of its kind in Europe.

For the moment, tourism funding has dried up. There may be a further natural resource rural tourism initiative or further INTERREG grants, but that is not certain. Both programmes provided financial assistance to many people. However, as is usually the case with European funding, they are highly complex and often overly bureaucratic. The unrealistic deadlines set for applications put applicants under enormous pressure and undoubtedly acted as deterrents to those involved in many worthwhile projects.

Compared to many nearby areas, Northern Ireland lags behind with infrastructure investment. The Member for Lagan Valley highlighted the canal structure in Northern Ireland. However, I first want to see more central Government investment in the roads system. Areas throughout the Province, not only County Fermanagh, are crying out for that.

Finally, a recent announcement stated that £600 million is lost to taxpayers through racketeering and money laundering throughout Northern Ireland. That is a serious issue for the economy. Unless we get on top of that, the illegal economic base that drains some £2 million a day from the economy will become one of the largest economic bases in Northern Ireland.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Mr Poots will be the next contributor. There will not be time for any other Members to speak this morning.

Mr Poots: I assume that that means that I can speak until 12.30 pm.

After yesterday's ruling, I was wondering about the validity of a report that regularly mentions the Ulster Unionist Party Assembly Group (UUPAG). I understand that the UUPAG still exists, that David Ervine is still a member and that the ruling has made no difference. That is understandable, given that the reason for establishing the UUPAG was to wean loyalist paramilitaries off violence. The Ulster Unionist Party can decide whether it wishes to break that link with Mr Ervine later. The report, therefore, is accurate, and my concerns have been allayed.

I want to concentrate on a couple of issues in the report that may be of interest to some Members who have already spoken. The report contains a recommendation that the planning process be:

“streamlined by setting end dates for consultation and focusing priority on approving area plans.”

The report also recommends creating an “enabling culture” within planning.

Mr Kennedy: Will the Member give way?

Mr Poots: I have not started yet. Perhaps if I say something that Mr Kennedy finds interesting —

Mr Kennedy: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. I, and I suspect other Members, are having difficulty hearing Mr Poots because of the acoustics. I want everyone to hear his precious words. Is the secretariat aware of a problem that is affecting the acoustics? This has also happened with other Members?

Mr Deputy Speaker: Mr Kennedy is correct. We are having difficulty with the acoustics. The staff have been informed and are working to resolve the problem. I am aware that the problem may affect Members throughout the Chamber. Only the UUP seems to be having difficulty hearing what is being said. We shall persist, but if the acoustics do not improve, we may have to adjourn early.

Mr Poots: I could always offer to lend Mr Kennedy my ears; then he would have no problem hearing.
[Laughter.]

The Planning Service is in chronic crisis. There has been little significant development in Northern Ireland in recent years. In the retail sector, for example, there has been development at Victoria Square, and we have an outlet village at Banbridge and a minor extension to Junction One. However, there are huge opportunities for further development in the retail sector.

Coca Cola is the only currently significant industrial development in Northern Ireland. Invest Northern Ireland struggles to encourage inward investors to put money into Northern Ireland. Simultaneously, £5 billion of investment leaves Northern Ireland each year. People want to put their pounds elsewhere. Our laborious planning system is a major deterrent to investors. Many years ago, an investor decided that he wanted to invest £100 million in Northern Ireland and £100 million in eastern Europe. Within just two years, he started to get a return on the money that he spent in eastern Europe. However, he had to wait eight years before he got a return on the money that he had spent here because of the planning system. The Planning Service must remember that it is supposed to be a service, not an obstacle. It should not hinder job creation, wealth creation or business development.

12.15 pm

Housing costs have risen significantly during the past number of years. Some house prices in the area in which I live have risen by around 50% in the past year alone. That has a critical effect on workers who are unable to afford to own homes. Because house prices have risen, workers make more demands of their employers and, therefore, drive general employment costs up.

We must deal with that because the many people who have come here from eastern Europe and other parts of the world have added to the need for housing. They supply industry with essential skills, particularly in agriculture and the food and drinks sector. The food and drinks sector could not survive without foreign workers. Farmers would not be able to deliver the necessary level of food production if it were not for foreign workers. The housing sector must provide properties that people who come here can rent at a reasonable cost. It must also ensure that there are enough houses for those who want to buy a home in Northern Ireland.

Huge damage to rural development, tourism and agricultural diversification will be caused by Draft Planning Policy Statement 14. Unless that policy is reformed, economic development and job creation, particularly in rural communities, will be stymied. The inability of such communities to establish small businesses will lead to further losses in their areas.

We must examine the opportunities for job creation that are afforded by enterprise zones and technology zones. Low taxation in those zones would encourage investors to create high-quality jobs in Northern Ireland. Significant benefits would be felt throughout the community by the creation of such jobs, and they would filter down and create other opportunities for people who were unable to do such jobs themselves. The Titanic Quarter, the Maze, the north-west and the south of the Province have tremendous potential as areas where zones could be established and high-quality jobs created as a result of foreign direct investment.

(Madam Speaker in the Chair)

We must examine how culture can contribute to economic development. In particular, tremendous opportunities to create substantial tourism revenue are presented by the Titanic Quarter and the centenary of the sinking of the world-famous ship, which will take place in 2012. Another world-famous event that could affect Northern Ireland in 2012 is the Olympic Games. It is important that we move ahead as quickly as possible to ensure that we are able to facilitate elements of the Olympic Games and bring some events to Northern Ireland. We can deliver on that, and we can deliver the multi-sports stadium at the Maze that would contribute to bringing elements of the Olympic Games to Northern Ireland.

I am not only concerned with the benefit that that would bring to the people who live in the Lagan Valley area — I am not one of those parochial individuals who talks exclusively about his constituency — but with the 80% of Northern Ireland's population who live within one hour's drive of the Maze and would also benefit from facilities being developed there.

Many people are paying huge amounts of money for tickets for the Ryder Cup and then travelling two and a half hours to get there, so travelling one hour to the Maze will be easy for people who will benefit from the wonderful facilities that will be available there. There is a lack of quality exhibition facilities in Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland, and there is a huge opportunity to develop them at the Maze.

Dr Birnie: If the case for the national stadium at the Maze is as overwhelming as the Member is arguing, does he agree that the Department of Finance and Personnel should, as a matter of service to the public, publish the full business case and economic appraisal so that everyone can see the arguments?

Mr Poots: The public should be made fully aware of everything that can be made public, but commercially sensitive matters cannot be revealed now. The stadium will only be developed if the business case stacks up, and I believe that it will stack up when everything is brought together.

I recently visited an exhibition facility in Valencia. It has an income of €70 million per annum, but the income to the wider Valencian economy is €700 million. Every euro that is spent in the exhibition facility is boosted by €10 spent outside it. That shows that there can be advantages for the wider Northern Ireland population as well as for those at the facility venue.

The Federation of Small Businesses mentioned business crime during its evidence session to the subgroup. Members are aware of the loss to Northern Ireland's economy of £600 million by the sale of illicit fuel, smuggled tobacco, alcohol and counterfeit CDs, DVDs, clothing and perfume on the black market. That significantly undermines the legitimate economy. Loyalist and republican paramilitary groups are the main organisations involved in that activity. The Secretary of State regularly complains about the cost of this place, which is not legislating and which is not doing what it was established to do. Nonetheless, Members, in most cases, are busy in their constituencies and are doing a substantial part of the work that they are required to do. The same Secretary of State who moans, gurns and whinges about this place appears to be turning a blind eye to what is taking place, particularly around the border areas, and to the £600 million that is being lost to our economy and going into the coffers of paramilitary organisations.

It is about time that the Secretary of State took the mote out of his eye and got on with it. If he is not prepared to deal with the amount of crime that is taking place in Northern Ireland, and if he is not prepared to acknowledge that the people who are engaging in those crimes are also closely associated to political parties, he can forget about his 24 November deadline and his attempts to create deals in hothouse environments. There is no prevarication there. If people continue to engage in those activities, there is no place for them in the Government of Northern Ireland.

HM Revenue and Customs believes that there are 200 illegal fuel-laundering plants in Northern Ireland. Current resources allow them to take out only 16 plants per annum. Therefore, it will take about 13 years to wipe out that activity — as long as no new illegal plants are established. HM Revenue and Customs and the Assets Recovery Agency (ARA) do not have the resources; meanwhile, Sinn Féin/IRA, in particular, are not being pressured to deliver on removing those plants from Northern Ireland.

Mr Paisley Jnr: The Member mentions the issue of resources to combat serious crime. He will be aware, and would agree, that every effort should be made to try to combat that. I shall give Members an example. Queen's University recently put forward the idea of developing a "DNA mark" on all fuel so that it could be traced from where it was made to its purchaser. There has been some resistance to that idea on the part of the Government. I am sure that the Member will join me in pressing the Secretary of State to ensure that the DNA marking of fuel is developed and made available so that fuel can be traced from its genesis to its point of use.

Mr Poots: I thank the Member for that useful intervention. There are several ways to resolve these matters, and that is certainly one of them. Another way would be a reduction in excise duty on fuel in Northern Ireland. I understand that excise duty is being raised in the Irish Republic. If there were to be a closer convergence of fuel prices, there would be fewer opportunities for smuggling. However, it would not prevent the continued production of illicit fuel, whether it be red diesel — which has had the dye removed with acid — or kerosene. Ultimately, that would be a positive move.

HM Revenue and Customs and the ARA must be given the resources to do their jobs. The Secretary of State must make it absolutely clear that there will be no Government in Northern Ireland while those criminal activities continue and that he will support those democrats in Northern Ireland who are saying that there must be an end to organised criminality and that there must be support for the police and for organisations such as HM Revenue and Customs. Those organisations must be able to carry out their duties properly if we are to move forward to a situation in which we can have an Executive that delivers for the people of Northern Ireland.

Madam Speaker: Members will know that the Business Committee has arranged to meet at lunch time today. I propose therefore, by leave of the Assembly, to suspend this sitting until 2.00 pm. I hope that in the meantime the acoustics will be cleared up. There is something wrong with my microphone, as well as those in the Chamber.

The sitting was suspended at 12.28 pm.

On resuming (Madam Speaker in the Chair) —
2.00 pm

Madam Speaker: Before lunch, there were acoustic problems in the Chamber. I hope that those problems have been resolved and that we can all hear each other.

Mr McMenamin: I sincerely hope that we will be able to hear each other this afternoon, but I do not think that we will have any problem at the minute, as so few Members are present.

I commend the elected Members and staff who worked together to compile the report. The plight of West Tyrone and, in particular, the isolation of my home town of Strabane are historical facts. Thankfully, the lookout towers and the permanent army checkpoints have gone, but the infrastructure is lacking.

I welcome the report. The Federation of Small Businesses (FSB), which gave evidence to the subgroup, raised many issues that have an impact on the land border between the North and the South. European funding has not had the impact that it should in the west, and any Assembly must exploit the opportunities for developing infrastructure and rebuilding the regions that partition devastated. The Derry/Dublin railway is yet to be realised. A north-west motorway linking Dublin through Tyrone to north Donegal could become a linchpin of a North/South infrastructural upgrade.

Since the SDLP launched its North/South strategy and called for dedicated all-Ireland funds for infrastructural development, public support has grown on both sides of the border for a motorway that links Derry, Donegal, Tyrone and Fermanagh with the core of the Southern economy. People realise that the means are now available if the political will is there. Last year in Derry, the Southern Finance Minister told us that up to €100 billion will be spent on infrastructure on this island over the next 10 years. It is almost impossible to imagine spending of that sort not addressing the needs of what is possibly the most infrastructurally neglected corner of the island.

Ireland's eastern seaboard is in danger of being overdeveloped. Balanced regional development is in everyone's interest if the Southern economy is to continue to grow and if we in the North are to share in the benefits of the Celtic tiger economy. I welcome support from across the political spectrum for the north-west motorway; we will need cross-party action to get the British Government to play their part. I am sure that the cross-party goodwill exists in the South to make that motorway work.

Roaming charges may seem to be unimportant, but they are critical for the small and medium-sized businesses that make their living on cross-border trade. Corporation tax and industrial rating are the kiss of death for many firms that work at the margins of profitability. Those firms are crucial to the survival and economic recovery of Northern Ireland, particularly the west.

As the FSB points out, there are issues relating to banking and how the big four banks rip off small businesses that need to trade in both sterling and euro. Banks must be taken apart for their rip-off practices, and only a restored Assembly can do that. I do not intend to expand further; rather, I intend to acknowledge that there are many innovative recommendations in the report that would benefit the people of this small island, North and South.

During the summer, we all worked together to compile the report. We can work together in the Committee but, unfortunately, we cannot get together in the Assembly. The deadline of 24 November is approaching fast. Let us hope that common sense will prevail for the future of everyone on our small island.

Finally, I emphasise the need for a massive injection of capital funding in the west to address many years of neglect. The Government cannot continue to treat the people of Strabane and West Tyrone as second-class citizens. We deserve infrastructure and facilities on a par with those in other parts of the North. Western development needs to be top of the Government's agenda, and links between Tyrone, Derry, Donegal and the rest of the region must be developed for people on both sides of the border. I support the motion.

Mr McClarty: Members will agree that the Northern Ireland of 2006 is a far better place than that of 1996. Fortunately, we have relative peace and a growing tourism industry. We can also agree that we have one heck of an international football team — except perhaps those of us who have a Spanish background. However, our economy is struggling. There are many reasons for that, most notably the mishandling of the Northern Ireland economy by direct-rule Ministers and the fact that our entrepreneurial private sector is much smaller than in other UK regions.

I commend the subgroup for compiling this extensive report. It highlights many important points and is a platform on which a future Northern Ireland Executive can work. Fundamentally, our economy will only receive the attention that it deserves when a stable, accountable and fully functioning Assembly is operating here at Stormont. As a unionist, I watch with great unease as the British and Irish Governments prepare Plan B in case the 24 November deadline should pass without a deal being done. No one in the Chamber knows exactly what is in store for the Province should that happen. However, we can surmise how the Northern Ireland economy will be managed. We got an indication from the Secretary of State almost a year ago, when he told a New York newspaper that the Northern Ireland economy was:

“not sustainable in the long term” and that:

“the island of Ireland should be marketed as a single entity.”

That was a disgraceful statement from a Minister of the Crown. What kind of message does it send to potential investors in Northern Ireland? It was neither reassuring nor positive. How can we market this country when our Secretary of State runs down our economy? That is the threat to Northern Ireland plc should devolution not be restored. The Plan B model of greater co-operation between Dublin and London will only inject confusion, uncertainty and instability into the Northern Ireland economy. With the Labour Government in turmoil and the Irish Republic preparing for a general election, does anyone in the Chamber really believe that our economy will be anywhere on London or Dublin’s priority list? The answer is an unequivocal “no”.

Of course, the economy must be our priority. If we want to build a strong, prosperous and peaceful Northern Ireland for our children and grandchildren, we must build a strong and prosperous economy. To do that we need this place to work. We know that there are difficulties and obstacles, but it is imperative that we resolve them as soon as possible. If we can get this place up and running, we can give the economy the attention that it merits.

Just think what a local Assembly could do almost immediately if power were restored. We could address the obvious structural weaknesses of the Northern Ireland economy, which have been correctly identified as the four drivers in DETI’s ‘Economic Vision for Northern Ireland’ — something that is also stressed in the subgroup’s report. We could also address the crucial issue of increasing rates and energy costs for our manufacturing sector. The direct-rule Administration’s treatment of Northern Ireland manufacturing is costing our economy massive job opportunities.

Furthermore, a devolved Administration could address the rates burden on small businesses in Northern Ireland — something that my colleague David McNarry raised in the subgroup. I wholeheartedly agreed with his assessment that, although most taxation issues are reserved matters, a fully functioning Assembly could act on aspects of the tax burden for potential and existing SMEs.

Mr S Wilson: The Member raises some important issues for small businesses, but if, as he suggests, the rates burden were moved away from SMEs, to whom would it be moved?

Mr McClarty: That is something for a future decision in the Assembly. The matter must be considered extensively. The rates burden cannot be shifted to those who cannot afford to pay. Therefore, resolving the issue will require active thinking on the part of the future Minister and Committee with responsibility for Enterprise, Trade and Investment.

I will conclude by emphasising the need for the restoration of devolution in Northern Ireland. The economy is suffering. It will endure worse suffering if the 24 November deadline passes without a deal and Plan B is called into operation. Members on the Benches adjacent to me, and those who would normally sit on the Benches opposite me, realise that that is the case.

I welcome the work of the economic subgroup in producing its thought-provoking report. I hope sincerely that, in the not too distant future, a Northern Ireland Executive will act upon it. I support the motion.

Mr Storey: Northern Ireland’s economy has been forced to exist in extreme and torturous times. One example among many that I could cite is that of the traditional manufacturing jobs that have disappeared to low-wage economies in the Far East and eastern Europe.

Furthermore, no true debate could be conducted on the Northern Ireland economy and the need to take the right action now if Members were to fail to point out that, for several long decades, the business community in Northern Ireland, comprising local businesses run by local people and employing local people, was targeted by the republican movement. I pay tribute to those businesses, companies and workers who, despite what the leader of IRA/Sinn Féin described as a “morally justifiable campaign”, continued to provide our people with jobs and some sense of normality amid the economic wasteland created by terrorists.

The economy was placed under severe strain, not because of a lack of inventiveness on the part of Northern Ireland’s citizens or lack of ambition on the part of the business community, but because it was directly and systematically targeted by terrorists. Those terrorists calculated that by planting bombs, murdering the workforce, threatening businessmen and extorting money, they could not only terrorise the community, but destabilise the economy and make Northern Ireland appear less attractive to potential investors, thereby crippling the entire society.

Of Sinn Féin’s economic policy and its Marxist worldview, a senior politician from another House, whom, given the Speaker’s ruling this morning, I am unable to name, said that:

“They prefer the intellectual company of their friends in ETA, FARC and Havana. Like Fidel, Gerry would prefer an ideologically acceptable dictatorship to a liberal market economy.”

He went on to say that Sinn Féin’s record in Northern Ireland:

“shows that they have little or no interest in its well-being.”

Republicans, in their economic strategy, believed that they could advance their sectarian campaign by destroying Northern Ireland’s economic infrastructure. Therefore, they reasoned that their sectarian cause would be well served by crippling Northern Ireland’s manufacturing base, burning its economy to the ground, and condemning its people to lives on the dole. That they should now seek to block progress should surprise nobody. That they should seek to stitch up their own team, who agreed the subgroup’s report, is only in keeping with their character.

That they should run away and not have the guts to defend their desertion of the business sector, and not have the stomach to come and debate their abandonment of the labour market, is only further evidence of the deep-seated cowardice that compelled them to slink under cover of night when they were carrying out murderous activities.

2.15 pm

Mr S Wilson: I thank the Member for giving way. Does he not agree that it is a much more pleasant environment when the Benches opposite are empty, rather than full? [Laughter.]

Mr Storey: Of course I concur with my hon Friend.

Sinn Féin is very good at trying to bring its conscience and concerns to the public domain. Obviously, in real terms it is devoid of anything to say. I refer Members to the submission made by IRA/Sinn Féin. The party complained that:

“Neither did we have adequate time to resolve all of our differences in analysis”.

The party was looking for more time so that it could prevaricate and give a minimalist approach to the economic realities of the Province. Also, the submission includes the comment that:

“There is significant scope for moving security expenditure into a major strategy that can underpin the transformation of our society”.

That is the party’s attitude to law and order and to the forces of the Crown. It has nothing to offer and nothing to contribute, and its absence today seems to mean that it has nothing worthwhile to say.

Undoubtedly, inward investment and business growth was hindered during the years of the intense terrorist campaign. Northern Ireland is a small regional economy within the overall economy of the UK; similar to, but smaller than, for example, Wales or the north-east or north-west of England.

Despite all of the turmoil, violence and death visited upon the Province by terrorist organisations, the people displayed resilience, inventiveness, and dogged, iron determination to overcome adversity. Given fair opportunity, business in Northern Ireland can prove as good as, if not better than, anywhere in the British Isles. I have only to look to Wrightbus in my own constituency for an example. The company is a world leader; it gave a submission to the subgroup in that capacity. Recently, I visited a city in England and marvelled at the number of Wrightbus buses I saw, a result of the determination of the company to seize the market and produce a world-class product.

Northern Ireland is the only part of the UK that has a land border with another European Union state. That brings with it significant challenges. Not only are we neighbours to another European country but we are neighbours to a country that realised long ago that, whatever the dogmas of Irish nationalism, it is in fact a competitor to Northern Ireland. The number of international businesses with European headquarters in the Republic of Ireland is testament to that. We must set ourselves to competing fiercely and to winning that competition, but that will not happen unless the Northern Ireland business sector has the opportunity to prosper. It must not be harnessed into some political pipedream or straitjacket of political aspiration.

We should remind ourselves of the terms of reference of the subgroup. It was given the task of identifying the major impediments to the development of the economy in Northern Ireland. Rather than pleasing Irish nationalism with a cosy political strategy on an all-Ireland economy, we should view our neighbours in the Irish Republic as competitors and go all out to ensure that Northern Ireland has the best possible advantage in those markets that it seeks to secure.

Other Members have spoken of the actions that are necessary to do that, and those will be dealt with at length later in the debate. I shall therefore refer only to some of the steps that are necessary to ensure a vibrant economy in Northern Ireland.

We must tackle the skills crisis to ensure that our workforce is sufficiently trained and capable of meeting the requirements of the job. Investment in research and development must be addressed, and, as the hon Member for Lagan Valley said earlier, we must have a Planning Service that is fit to deliver the best to our Province. On 24 April 2003, the Water Service applied under Crown Estate to have major infrastructural works carried out. The Planning Service did not approve that application until June 2006. That delay is absolutely unacceptable, and radical change is necessary.

We must continue to modernise our infrastructure to its full potential so that we can build a vibrant economy. As politicians, we must not let up in our campaign to reduce corporation tax to below that in the Irish Republic. We must recruit the business community in a co-ordinated approach so that pressure on Government in that regard is maintained.

I pay tribute to my hon Friend David Simpson, who is our party's Westminster spokesman on trade and industry. Not only do we finally have a working MP in Upper Bann, but I welcome the commitment that he has shown in taking those matters to the House of Commons. Today he will address the conference of the Trades Union Congress (TUC) on those issues. I am sure that he will be better received than the Prime Minister — and I have no doubt that, without my mentioning his name, Members will know to whom I refer.

I hope that democracy and the rule of law will soon be fully embraced by those who have not yet done so. I hope that the changes that are required to obtain unionist — and nationalist — support for the institutions will be made and that a fully functioning, properly accountable Assembly will be in a position to assist in the task.

It is grossly negligent for the Government to withhold the necessary action in an attempt to bludgeon democrats into an Executive with mafia godfathers. Those are ham-fisted attempts to play the school bully. Instead of playing political games with our prosperity — and in the process endangering our future — it is the solemn duty of Government to discharge fully and properly their responsibilities. Members must demand such action today.

Northern Ireland has the potential to transform itself into an economy in which there is greater balance between the public and the private sectors. Yet the Government's policies on industrial derating and corporation tax and their refusal to act in order to blackmail local politicians could cause the greatest damage to Northern Ireland's manufacturing industry in a generation. Shame on them for that.

I also remind Members that one word that occurs frequently in the report — and Sir George Quigley highlighted it — is "stability". We require, and the business community in Northern Ireland requires, stability. The question that needs to be answered in regard to that is: have the absent Members of Sinn Féin/IRA the capacity to create the conditions for stability? For 40 years they built their political future on creating instability, making Northern Ireland ungovernable. Therefore, the challenge is not to the democrats in this House who have proved through the years that they can create and work towards stable government; the challenge is to those whom the Secretary of State is so keen that we put in power to prove, over time, that they are committed to stable governance in Northern Ireland, not to a rolling process whereby they are brought closer to their political objectives. They must show that they are committed to a Northern Ireland that is at peace with itself and to a Northern Ireland that has a strong economy that promotes the country.

Madam Speaker: This is the first time that the Assembly will have heard from the next Member to speak, Mrs Diane Dodds. She will be making her maiden speech. As Members know, it is the convention that a maiden speech be heard without interruption.

Mrs D Dodds: Madam Speaker, I thank you for that introduction and for the warning to my colleague Mr Sammy Wilson. Undoubtedly, that is what he would have done today.

I support the motion. The report is certainly wide-ranging in its recommendations, in the evidence that has been gathered and in the large number of interest groups that provided that evidence. However, the report also emphasises and demonstrates the large amount of work that still needs to be done if we are to bring coherence to the vision for the economy and some cohesion and structure to the implementation. The real value of this report will be if it acts as a spearhead for further work and as a catalyst for the Government to act on its recommendations.

Much has been said over the past two days about the economy, but today I want to focus on tourism, which is the fastest-growing sector of the world economy. It is incredibly important, and it must be taken into account if we are to develop a vision that will take us further in this new century.

Tourism contributes £500 million to Northern Ireland's economy and has created 51,000 jobs, which is about 8% of all those in employment. Indeed, tourism is so important that, looking forward to the autumn, my colleagues on the Northern Ireland Affairs Select Committee at Westminster are to engage in a little tourism and go on tour around the Province to look at the problems with the tourist industry.
[Interruption.]

A Member: A junket.

Mrs D Dodds: I know that my colleague would never be involved in a junket.

Mr S Wilson: Absolutely right.

Mrs D Dodds: The visit highlights for me the importance of tourism, and I look forward to the Select Committee's report. Last year, Belfast hosted 6.4 million visitors, creating expenditure of £289 million. That accounts for almost half the tourist activity in Northern Ireland. This year in Belfast, despite the negative spin in the press and the whingeing and moaning of nationalist politicians, we had the busiest July on record — we had the most visitors to the city ever.

2.30 pm

Although that is all good news for Northern Ireland, the real size of the true problem becomes apparent if we consider the tourist industry of our two closest neighbours, the Republic of Ireland and Scotland. In Scotland, the tourist industry adds £4 billion to the economy each year and accounts for 200,000 jobs.

In the Republic of Ireland, Dublin is the third most-visited city in Europe, behind Edinburgh, which is the most visited city in Europe. The tourist industry is clearly booming in the Republic of Ireland, particularly golf tourism. That will be evident shortly when those who are interested will, no doubt, be fascinated by the Ryder Cup.

The report and its recommendations mention a number of important aspirations common to all sectors of the economy. I shall highlight three aspirations that are of great importance to the tourist industry: strategic direction; investment in visitor servicing and product; and the lifeblood of any tourist industry — a marketing strategy.

The Belfast Agreement provides for co-operation with the Republic of Ireland on tourism. Tourism Ireland has the remit for marketing the island of Ireland in Great Britain and overseas. It is an all-Ireland body accountable to the North/South Ministerial Council, not the Assembly. During 2005-06, Tourism Ireland will cost the Northern Ireland taxpayer £12.2 million. For the same period, the funding allocated to the NITB is £11.7 million. In other words, more money is allocated to Tourism Ireland to market the island of Ireland than is invested in visitor servicing and product development in Northern Ireland. The question must be asked: is that value for money?

In his evidence to the subgroup on 10 August, the chairman of the NITB said:

“Sometimes NITB feels that generic marketing of the island of Ireland may not help the Northern Ireland tourism market.”

On hearing that, the Sinn Féin member of the subgroup began to get a little anxious; perhaps his dark green glasses started to cloud over a little. He asked whether any positives had accrued from marketing the island of Ireland as one entity. An intrepid NITB official replied that there had been positive outcomes. She said that the Tourist Board had been very successful in getting travel writers and journalists into Northern Ireland through Tourism Ireland, which paid the travel fares, with NITB picking up all the other bills for entertainment and touring round Northern Ireland. The hope was that the Tourist Board would get a glowing report in the local media.

I wish to give one further example to illustrate the glaring inadequacy of that marketing strategy. Last year, the screen adaptation of C S Lewis's book, 'The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe', was a major Hollywood production that was shown all over the world. The film should have been a huge opportunity to showcase Northern Ireland and the city of Belfast; it was premiered in Belfast to celebrate C S Lewis's connections with the city.

Belfast City Council promotes and develops a C S Lewis festival each year in the city. Quite rightly, it was decided to seize the opportunity for promotional work with the tourist industry, so Tourism Ireland was called in. Short advertisements were commissioned, which were to be shown in cinemas before screenings of the film so that people would associate the film, and C S Lewis, with Belfast and with Northern Ireland. Indeed, I took my daughter to see the film 'The Chronicles of Narnia', during a few days' break in London following the lull after Christmas. That is where I first saw the advertisement, because they were not shown in Belfast cinemas.

I raised my concerns about the advertisement with a deputy secretary from DETI. His reply stated that the advertisement was screened in 600 cinemas across Britain and reached an estimated audience of 6.5 million viewers. However, his letter went on to add that the advertisement never once used the term "Northern Ireland". However, it mentioned Belfast once, and all the scenes in the advert were filmed in Northern Ireland. I ask Members how any marketing strategy can be successful when we fail to mention what we are marketing.

How could anyone in Sunderland, Newcastle or Leeds be expected to know that the pub that was featured in the advertisement was the Crown bar in Belfast? If that was a failure of marketing in Great Britain, how many more times was that failure multiplied when one considers the global market? If someone in Sunderland could not recognise the pub as the Crown bar in Belfast, what are the chances for someone in Sydney, Los Angeles or Hicksville, USA? That failure is the direct legacy of the Belfast Agreement, and this folly must stop.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mrs D Dodds: Marketing is essential to the future growth and development of the tourism industry. Indeed, it is the lifeblood of that industry. That marketing strategy takes no account of political reality and refuses to mention the term "Northern Ireland". Indeed, the Northern Ireland Tourist Board tells me that if one wants a campaign that is specific to Northern Ireland and mentions the term "Northern Ireland", one must pay over and above the £12.2 million that one has already paid. That strategy is failing, and we must examine the unaccountable cross-border bodies that have proved to be costly to our economy — and none more so than Tourism Ireland, which refuses to recognise the political reality of Northern Ireland as an entity. It is time for an open and honest debate on this issue with those on the Benches opposite, so that we consider the future direction of the marketing of Northern Ireland as a tourism destination.

I wish to touch briefly on strategic direction and investment in the tourism industry. The lack of strategic direction is glaring and is sadly but a mirror of the lack of strategic direction in other sectors of the economy. I am told that seven out of 10 Departments allocate a budget for tourism. That is done without any reference to one another and without any strategic guidance or cohesion on the vision of what will be achieved in the end.

Quite rightly, we have seen a surge in tourism activity in our economy. However, we can be a discovery destination for only so long. We must develop a long-term infrastructure for projects that will sustain the tourism industry in the next number of years. The NITB identified five such projects and has since been struggling to identify revenue streams for every one of them. Londonderry fell on fortunate times with the city walls project because it benefited from the integrated development fund.

In Belfast, we have the biggest and probably the best known of the projects, namely the Titanic signature project. At the moment, just a matter of years from the centenary of that fateful ship, no Government funding has been earmarked for that project, and we are depending on a National Lottery application, which may or may not yield results.

There is clearly a need for direct Government investment in those projects. No new money could be found for tourism in the last spending review. The latest spending review, and any future financial package, must target those projects because of their infrastructural nature and the benefits that they will bring to the economy. No other country in the world can rightly own the brand of the Titanic like Northern Ireland and the city of Belfast. It would be a disaster if we allowed Orlando in Florida, Southampton or the impostors in Liverpool to get ahead of us.

I wish to mention another issue, which impacts on many other sectors. If we are to benefit truly from a boom in tourism numbers in this country, we must have a skilled workforce that is able to avail of the opportunities that such a boom would bring. So far, we have not invested in a strategy that allows us to do that.

Finally, Members may have noticed the welcome announcement in the news today of the investment in the Crumlin Road courthouse, which is in my constituency and in the Shankill ward, the most deprived ward in Northern Ireland. I particularly welcome that development, which will benefit local people. However, it will only be of benefit if the proper training systems are in place so that local people can gain the skills and knowledge to enable them to get a job, have a stake in society and end the generations of unemployment that that area has long experienced.

I support the motion.

Mr Cree: I add my appreciation of the work that the subgroup and the staff did this summer on the economic challenges facing Northern Ireland, and I was pleased to play a small part in that.

At this stage of the debate, the contents of the report have been fairly well aired, and many Members have spoken about their pet subjects. I will resist the temptation to rehearse some of the arguments and will deal instead with an area that has not been so well covered.

Although many issues have been covered at length, the report makes little reference to the Investment Strategy for Northern Ireland (ISNI). We must ensure the success of that strategy, and I wish to highlight several important points. The strategy does not appear to be linked to the Programme for Government. It must display more vision for the next 10 years and we must be assured that it will deliver, unlike 'Strategy 2010', which has disappeared completely. ISNI is a new strategy, and there are still questions to be answered about methodology and how it is designed to fit into the wider economic, social and environmental processes. ISNI needs to address, in a more meaningful way, social and environmental benefits. I would prefer that the strategy be developed into a plan, with the commitment that that would entail to encourage all stakeholders. There are also revenue implications, and the likely outcomes of the infrastructure strategy should be dealt with more visibly. Delivery is crucial, and the strategy must be seen to deliver from the outset.

There is evidence of tardiness in Government systems and a complete absence of a risk-taking culture. That must be corrected, and the Government's reinvestment and reform initiative must tackle those issues.

Planning has been addressed in the report, but it is essential that our planning regime is not allowed to constrain project implementation. Many examples have been given, but there is none better than the draft Belfast metropolitan area plan. That began when I was still in school, was published in 2004, and, as we have recently been informed, the Planning Appeals Commission (PAC) will hear objections to it in April 2007. That is hardly good enough. ISNI does not address the major problem of implementation. We need a fast-track system similar to that employed in the USA and other progressive countries to ensure that approvals are not seriously delayed, as they are at present.

More clarity is also needed on the role of the Departments and of the Strategic Investment Board. Accounting officer responsibilities must be reconciled with Strategic Investment Board and ISNI requirements. Without a resolution of that issue, and without a real joined-up approach by Government to infrastructure provision, ISNI will not be a real strategy. If it is, indeed, a strategy, who controls it, and who will shoulder the top levels of responsibility and accountability?

2.45 pm

After the failure of Departments to implement fully their budgets last year, one must query whether the Government have the capacity to deliver the £16 million strategy. However, I accept that ISNI is a new and bold process with the potential to create a step change in infrastructure provision. The strategy must be a main driver in developing our economy, and it is essential that it be allowed to succeed. I hope that Members share my views on the report.

Mrs Hanna: I thank everyone who was involved in the preparation of the report over the summer.

Every Member recognises the fact that the present fiscal situation is unsustainable. We also recognise that, in order to transform our society and economy, to reduce dependency and to maximise our greatest assets — the talents and abilities of our people — we must find a new, sustainable model for financing public expenditure. All Members realise that an essential element of an enterprise economy is an attractive taxation regime for business and an attractive economic environment. However, it is also important that home owners are not forced to bear an unsustainable burden. The taxation burden must be distributed fairly among all sectors of society.

Many enterprising people have created employment for themselves and others in my constituency of South Belfast. However, they face not only the prospect of industrial rating and exorbitant business rates in areas such as the Lisburn Road and the Ormeau Road, but a twofold or threefold increase in domestic rates.

I shall focus on the effects of the rating revaluation on thousands of home owners, particularly in South Belfast, where domestic rate increases have hit hardest. In 2010, the hike in rates will have a much wider impact. The direct rule Minister with responsibility for finance, David Hanson MP, has handled the rates revaluation in a perverse and misleading manner. Here are some of the sound bites that the Minister provided to the media: the rates bills of more than half of all homes will be reduced; the remaining 40% will face an increase of less than £450; and a mere 3% will have an increase in excess of £350. The reality for my constituents in South Belfast has given the lie to each and every one of those glib sound bites.

The South Belfast constituency comprises 19 wards, 13 in the Belfast City Council area and six in the Castlereagh Borough Council area. The effect of the rates valuation is that household rates have increased in 17 of the 19 wards in South Belfast — nearly 90%.

The overall increase in rates bills across the constituency is 28%.

To consider the extent of those increases, I shall give some examples. In the Malone ward, the average house value is £351,000. Last year, the average rates bill was £1,086. That has risen to £2,021 — an increase of 86%. In the Stranmillis ward, rates have increased by 65%; in Windsor, by 63%; in Botanic, by 52%; in Rosetta, by 34%; and in Ballynafeigh, by 53%. I could list many more examples. Increases for the vast majority of those South Belfast wards are grossly disproportionate for Belfast and for Northern Ireland as a whole. The Valuation and Lands Agency's website shows that the increase for Belfast as a whole is 56%; for South Belfast wards it is, in fact, 74%.

Mr Hanson gave an interview last weekend, when he added insult to injury. He said that he would not impose a cap on rates, as he was opposed to capping on principle. What a strange statement for a Minister of the Crown to make, considering that the Labour Government implement rates capping on principle. Capping may not be the best solution because it lets the wealthiest people off the hook; however, we need a fair system based on the ability to pay. The Minister may regret that statement because he may have left himself open to a challenge under human rights legislation.

At the weekend, the Secretary of State told us that the union was evolving. It certainly is. The richest person in England will pay a rates bill of no more than £3,000. Mr David Beckham, the footballer, who is a very rich man — and good luck to him — pays no more than £3,000 on Beckingham Palace. A constituent of mine in South Belfast, admittedly rich but hardly in the Beckham league, faces a rates bill of £14,000, five times what Mr Beckham pays. Such an unfair system can be challenged on grounds of equity.

South Belfast is the most integrated, vibrant constituency in Northern Ireland; the vast majority of people live there side by side in harmony. People want to live there, and, as a consequence, house prices rise. 'A Shared Future' describes a society that many in South Belfast are working towards. However, this new form of property tax is a penalty on integration. People from different backgrounds are forced to pay for wanting to live together.

Mr A Maginness: The Member referred to the double standards applied by the Labour Government to rating policy in Northern Ireland. In Britain, there is a cap on rates or local government tax. I bring it to the attention of the House that the Labour Government postponed the revaluation of properties before the last general election so that the electorate was not offended. So much for double standards.

Mrs Hanna: That reinforces my point: offending people in Northern Ireland does not matter.

I am a social democrat whose primary concern is for those on fixed incomes, those who live alone and those who were prudent and bought houses when they were cheap but who now see valuations rising all around them. Not only do they now face massive rates bills but, next year, they may face a double whammy when water rates are introduced. After their deaths, their families will face a triple whammy as inheritance tax is added. None of us is under any illusion that this new form of rating is anything other than a property tax. However, if it is a property tax, it is unfair on those who live in a pricey house that was bought a lifetime ago or on those who live on their own, while a family next door may have four or five separate incomes.

The justification for capping is that services themselves are capped. A widow living on her own will use only a fraction of the council services that a household of six or seven will use. The rating system must be fair, equitable and based on the ability to pay. The SDLP will oppose the Hanson “dog’s dinner” tooth and nail. My colleague Dr McDonnell, who is also the MP for Belfast South, will make the case forcefully for his constituency when the draft Order is laid before Parliament.

Mr N Dodds: It is a pleasure to follow the hon Lady. I noted with interest the intervention about what the Labour Party had done in England on revaluation. The Lady and her colleagues are members of the Labour Party’s sister party, so I expect them to have a great deal more influence over those matters than the rest of us. It will be interesting to see what they manage to get out of the Labour Party.

Mr S Wilson: Family in-fighting.

Mr N Dodds: I am sorry that I was not able to hear my colleague’s maiden speech —

Mr S Wilson: He will be sorrier when he gets home. [Laughter.]

Mr N Dodds: I heard that, but that is not the case. However, I am deeply sorry that, owing to other commitments, I was unable to hear the maiden speech of my wife, a Member for West Belfast. It is significant that her contribution was the first from a unionist Member for West Belfast in some 30 years. The people of West Belfast who are represented by the DUP now know that they are in good hands and will continue to be well represented.

It is appropriate that my wife made her maiden speech during a debate on economic matters, because both the unionist and nationalist sides of West Belfast have suffered greatly over the years from economic and social deprivation. The hon Lady for West Belfast will make a massive contribution, as she already has on the ground, in helping to improve conditions in that constituency. I think that I have done enough now, Madam Speaker, to earn my dinner tonight. [Laughter.]

I also congratulate those who worked on the report over the summer and the staff involved. The report is useful, because it gave people in the Province with a vested interest, from a wide range of organisations and backgrounds, an opportunity to come and put their views directly to elected representatives. That was one of the things that people most valued about devolution. It was not so much that people always got what they wanted or that their arguments prevailed, but that they felt that their elected representatives were listening. Ministers heard the arguments and responded — not always in a way that people entirely liked — but at least they responded. So, if only from that point of view, the report is a valuable piece of work. I have already come across people from the business community and trade unions who have made that point about it.

The report is entitled ‘First Report on the Economic Challenges Facing Northern Ireland’, and there are many such challenges. Before dealing with some of the major issues, I want to refer to matters that several Members have already mentioned. Sinn Féin Members continue to boycott Assembly debates. That bizarre situation deserves reiteration: Sinn Féin MLAs attended meetings of the economic challenges subgroup, they attended when witnesses gave evidence and they were present when the report was finalised, but they refuse to take their seats in the Assembly and contribute to the debate.

Anyone may wonder why there has been no progress and why there are difficulties in trying to restore devolution. The Secretary of State would be well advised to look at the record of this debate over the last couple of days and ask who is making an effort, and who is making a contribution to debating the issues. People are sick, sore and tired of hearing the one-way diatribe of excuses and arguments that suggests that it is all the fault of unionists. That is far from the case.

Today and yesterday, much was said about how essential it is to restore devolution and get the institutions up and running in order to make progress and ensure political stability. The report accepts, as do many of us, that it is essential to get the political stability that will be the bedrock of progress on several fronts, not least on the economic front. However, having listened to contributions from several parties, the DUP is conscious of the difficulties, problems and challenges that lie ahead in getting the form of devolution that the Government favour restored — namely, some kind of mandatory coalition. The DUP is concerned that that might not be achievable in the short or medium term because of IRA/Sinn Féin’s inability to sign up to policing and to act on criminality, illegality, racketeering and all the rest of it before the 24 November date set by Government. The DUP does not know when those conditions will be met, but Sinn Féin looks unlikely to do so by then.

It was precisely because we recognised that that was not likely to happen that my party suggested, at the start of last year, that a form of devolution be set up that would at least allow elected representatives to have some say in matters as we try to make progress towards a time when IRA/Sinn Féin meets the conditions for full inclusive Government.

3.00 pm

Of course, some parties in this House rejected that proposal. The SDLP, in particular, said that it would not accept that kind of shadow Assembly. Now that party says that we shall be left in a situation in which there will not be devolution, and in which we will not have any type of Government. My party offered a way forward that would have bridged the gap between the current situation and a situation in which Sinn Féin/IRA meets the conditions required of it. Unfortunately, that was rejected, and issues such as rates and water taxes — which the Assembly could have had some power over in an elected, devolved capacity, even if Sinn Féin did not meet the conditions to enter Government — are not our responsibility. Therefore, we cannot help the people of Northern Ireland in the present circumstances. We must bear that in mind.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Jim Wells] in the Chair)

When the Secretary of State tells us that he and others in Government were inclined to move forward with that approach, but did not do so because of the strong and united opposition of Sinn Féin, the SDLP and the Dublin Government, we must be clear as to where the responsibility lies for the current situation. Madam Speaker, it is important to put that on the record because it goes to the heart of the debate. Political responsibility and stability are big issues for discussions on economic conditions. If movement had been made in that area, real progress would have been made.

I apologise, Mr Deputy Speaker; I did not notice you earlier. [Laughter.]

I am sure that you will forgive me. This may not be the first time that I have sought your indulgence.

The report presents several big challenges. The public sector in Northern Ireland is large compared with that of other parts of the United Kingdom; it equates to 61% of gross domestic product, compared with 42% across the United Kingdom as a whole. A total of 89% of companies in Northern Ireland employ fewer than 10 people. Those figures illustrate the dominance of the public sector vis-à-vis the private sector. We must try to remedy that situation. It cannot be done, however, by a short, sharp measure that will cause great disruption to the economy. It must be managed properly and effectively. Simply to slash public expenditure and say that the private sector will have to take up the slack will not work.

Measures must be taken to develop those industries and sectors that have not been exploited to their full potential. Tourism is one such area. With the advent of cheaper travel, and as people's horizons expand, the tourism and leisure industry will undoubtedly be the sector that will grow most rapidly in the next decade or two. Northern Ireland, with its tremendous natural advantages, must not lose out to competition in that area. Some tremendous opportunities lie ahead as we approach the one hundredth anniversary of the voyage of the Titanic. We must also ensure that Northern Ireland is in a position to exploit the opportunities that will arise from the London Olympics.

Eloquent contributions have been made on the importance of education and skills, so I will not go over that again. However, it is important to say that our education system equips our young people for the challenges of tomorrow. Northern Ireland has a first-rate education system, but there are improvements to be made. We heard yesterday about some of the changes that are being introduced, such as the enriched curriculum and the changes to post-primary education — a debate we know all about. However, we are in danger of not building on what is best, and the Labour Government are in danger of tinkering for ideological reasons and not for the benefit of the people of Northern Ireland.

We have to deal with paramilitarism, criminality and organised crime, and that is rightly highlighted at recommendation 15 on page 5 of the report. Those issues cannot be glossed over. Organised crime and the large amounts of money that are being taken out of the economy and put into the black economy are seriously impacting on businesses here. The Northern Ireland Affairs Committee of the House of Commons recently highlighted that for the second time. The enormous sums of money that are being gained by illegal means, particularly in border areas, are damaging the economy, and that must be addressed. The DUP is determined that that issue will be dealt with in a way that will ensure that those who are in the Government, administering the law and dealing with these matters, are not tainted by that type of organised crime, paramilitarism or criminality. In the past, the mistake has been to not take a rigorous and robust position on all of this, but that will not be a failing on our part this time around.

The fiscal environment in which we operate is also important. Northern Ireland has the second lowest rate of formation of new businesses of any region in the United Kingdom, and that is a problem. Reasons for it, such as our high level of corporation tax compared to our competitor south of the border, have been highlighted and must also be dealt with. There is a raft of other issues, but a proper fiscal environment in which indigenous companies will be encouraged to grow, and to which companies that presently go to our competitors in the south of Ireland will be encouraged to come, is essential.

According to press reports, there will be negotiations and discussions in the near future. The DUP has already made it clear that the economy will be at the top of its list of concerns. A report in the May/June edition of 'Economic Outlook & Business Review', published by First Trust Bank, contains this contribution by Michael Smyth:

"Meanwhile, as local politicians continue to agree to disagree, the somewhat parlous underlying condition of the economy barely merits a mention in their discussions. Perhaps by default it will fall to unelected (by the NI electorate) Direct Rule Ministers to administer the unpleasant medicine needed to rebalance the economy."

That was written this summer. Any fair and reasonable commentator who looked at the events of the Assembly and listened to local politicians' concerns over this summer would have to admit that that is not the case. Local politicians have been very exercised by the local economy, to the extent that this report has been produced. A lot of thought and consideration have been given to it, and the DUP is serious in its intention to make the report a major issue in negotiating a financial package for Northern Ireland as part of any discussions.

There are other matters that I could raise, but I will conclude by welcoming yesterday's announcement of the plans to convert the Crumlin Road courthouse, which is in my area, into a major hotel. That is tremendously good news, and it accords with some of what I said about tourism and the leisure industry. Barry Gilligan and those behind this development are to be congratulated. The DUP has worked with Mr Gilligan and the local community on this, and those who live in the community are heartened by the announcement. I hope that we can work together to make it happen.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Mr Burns will now make his maiden speech. As Members know, it is the convention that this speech be heard in silence.

Mr Burns: I am grateful to all the colleagues and staff who contributed to the making of the 'First Report on the Economic Challenges Facing Northern Ireland'. The absence of a devolved Government is our biggest obstacle to successfully meeting the economic challenges facing Northern Ireland. Whatever our political differences, this report demonstrates that we can reach consensus when tackling crucial issues such as the future of Northern Ireland's economy.

A strong economy is underpinned by a stable system of government. A stable, devolved Government is essential if Northern Ireland is to prosper in the years ahead. To achieve that goal, we must recognise that we have in our hands the means to deliver stability.

Without political stability, where do we go? All the grants, rates reliefs and economic initiatives will go to waste if we do not have stability. We cannot continue to rely on the public sector to meet our employment needs. We recognise that public-sector jobs will be shed as the British Government toughens its demands for efficiencies from all Departments in the North.

The people who will suffer are real people with mortgages, car loans, and children to be educated. They are our constituents, and we must always remember that they elected us. Without a stable system of devolved Government there will be huge financial pressures from central Government with little or no interest in the economic future of the North. Direct-rule Ministers have their own constituencies and their own voters in England, Scotland and Wales. They do not want to be here. We must remember that ordinary people will be hit hardest by the failure to grasp opportunities.

People want jobs. They want to live in their homes in safe and good areas; they want to own cars and take a fortnight's holiday. They want their children to be educated in good schools with the real possibility of getting jobs in their country. Without a stable system of Government, jobs will be lost. Young people will be pushed towards stronger economies with greater opportunities, and our economy will suffer a brain drain as the best educated seek employment elsewhere.

Faced with water rates and hikes in the cost of living, disposable incomes will fall. Spending will fall, and the victims will be the local businesses. If we fail to move ahead positively, a range of economic negatives will come into play. The North will become a stagnant backwater economy with no attraction for the inward investor or encouragement for local businesses to grow. Our hopes lie with the growth of the small business sector and the strengthening of organisations such as the Federation of Small Businesses. However, it is essential that the right conditions exist — conditions that allow local entrepreneurs to have confidence to move ahead.

We need to create new opportunities and build on existing strengths. In my constituency of South Antrim, and across the North, the economic potential of the tourism industry has been underdeveloped for too long. There are huge untapped opportunities. How many small businesses could be created and sustained in that sector? I say that the opportunities are countless.

3.15 pm

A strong, stable economy needs a strong, stable, devolved Government. We cannot shy away from our responsibility to overcome the challenges and deliver economic and political stability. The report on the economic challenges facing Northern Ireland is to be welcomed. It lays out the theory behind those challenges, and helps us to plan for a more prosperous future.

However, action is urgently needed on the practicalities of making that a reality. I appeal to my colleagues and to the Government, who have ultimate responsibility, to ensure that the education system is radically restructured. The education system must prepare young people for the job opportunities and economic challenges that are out there.

During the debate, it became obvious that we must address issues in a more intelligent, efficient and cost-effective manner. That can only be achieved through a good-quality, applied R&D strategy. I appeal to the Government to ensure that small businesses have access to R&D support and that those who avail of it receive generous tax credits. That is necessary now more than ever, with the Northern Ireland economy facing its biggest challenge ever through the introduction of industrial rating. Manufacturing industry is facing huge obstacles. Northern Ireland has higher energy costs than the rest of the UK and a higher corporation tax rate than our Southern neighbours. The Government plan to quadruple the level of industrial rates in the short term. That is a disastrous policy for manufacturing industry and for the Northern Ireland economy. I support the considered and reasoned approach of the Northern Ireland Manufacturing Focus Group in working to bring about a cap of 25% on rates.

It is scandalous that, in a modern Northern Ireland, almost 25% of school-leavers enter the job market with poor literacy and numeracy skills. We are building an economy on a hollow foundation. If we remove the bottlenecks of educational underachievement and low investment in R&D, the economy will surge forward with great opportunities for everyone. A stable system of devolved Government is essential if Northern Ireland is to prosper in the years ahead.

Mr S Wilson: I congratulate the Member for South Antrim on making his maiden speech. It is always a daunting experience. Members were well behaved this time, but they may not be as well behaved next time, so he had better watch out.

It has been an interesting debate, and I have enjoyed observing the various styles that Members have used. When we debate an issue where the contributions are similar, Members have to make their mark by using different styles. However, the Member for North Belfast Mr Dodds made the most enjoyable speech. He has confirmed to everyone that “sorry” is the hardest word to say. It took him two and a half minutes to apologise for not being present during the maiden speech by the Member for West Belfast Mrs Dodds, but he got round to saying it eventually. That is significant: it took him one minute to demolish the SDLP’s arguments against, and criticisms of, the DUP’s approach to devolution, but two and a half minutes to get round his wife. I am not sure whether he has done that yet, because, at the end of his speech, he began a territorial dispute, undoing all his good work. The debate in the Dodds household tonight, and, perhaps, in many households across Northern Ireland, will be the question of where the courthouse is on the Crumlin Road. Is it in North Belfast or is it in West Belfast? Perhaps the Assembly can debate it at another time.

I enjoyed also, because it reminded me of my days at Queen’s, the speech that the Member for South Belfast Dr Birnie gave in the style of a measured economic lecture. He raised many important questions about one of the report’s recommendations.

Mr McNarry, a colleague of Dr Birnie’s from Strangford, lived up to his reputation as a kind of political thug. He is the only Member I know who can take a report that has achieved total consensus from all the parties and treat his speech as a means to give everyone a verbal kicking. I am not criticising him. In fact, I admire someone who can highlight so many differences in a report that has achieved such a degree of consensus.

I want to take issue with some of the points that have been made. Yesterday, the Member for South Down Ms Ritchie made an impassioned — if not misguided — speech in which she claimed that without devolution, Northern Ireland would be ruined and its economy would fall into total disarray. Her comments were made against the background of a Northern Ireland that, after many years of direct rule, is experiencing its lowest-ever rate of unemployment. It is even lower than it was during the previous Assembly. Perhaps Ms Ritchie over-egged the argument a little.

Although Members on these Benches want devolution and will work towards it, we will do so, as the Member for North Belfast Mr Dodds said, only when the conditions are right and when there can be confidence in the institutions’ being sustainable. Nevertheless, pro-devolutionists undermine their argument if they imply that devolution is a panacea by which all the economy’s ills can be wished away. Even with devolution, Members would be required to make some difficult decisions. Those decisions would be just as difficult for a direct-rule Minister to make, and they would be just as unpopular with the electorate. To present devolution as an easy panacea that would wipe away those difficult issues would not do us, as politicians, any good and would only make the electorate more cynical.

Some of my colleagues have commented on Sinn Féin’s absence today. On the one hand, I would have welcomed Sinn Féin’s being here: it is always good to have someone at whom you can direct your anger. Sometimes it can add to the sharpness of a debate. On the other hand, it is good that the opposite Benches are not filled with Members talking about the economy of Northern Ireland and what they want to do with it when, in the past, they have bombed and flattened businesses, and they still support an organisation that bleeds businesses dry and which the Organised Crime Task Force (OCTF) recently said costs the economy probably £700 million a year.

Rather than repeat a lot of what has been said, I want to consider certain issues. Although there has been consensus on the report and the measures that are required, Members should be aware that some of those would be difficult to implement. Consensus on implementation will not be achieved. In fact, in some cases, the report glosses over some of the difficulties that will be faced.

A big issue that has arisen is the question of the public sector versus the private sector and the need to put more emphasis on the private sector and less on the public sector. Members cannot argue that structural change is not needed. Northern Ireland cannot continue to have certain areas of the economy up to 70% reliant on the public sector. However, paragraph 30(ii) on page 13 of the report notes that the economy is “unbalanced”. There appears to be the hope that, somehow, Northern Ireland can move painlessly to a more involved private sector by cutting back the public sector without experiencing the pain that that structural change will cause.

If we get to the point at which we as an Assembly have to start implementing that change, we will find that there will be short-term pain for many, as the public sector will have to contract first to allow the private sector to expand. That adjustment has not happened easily anywhere else. If the private sector is to expand, that will crowd out skills, investment and money unless the public sector contracts. That will mean job losses in all of our constituencies and trade unions knocking at the doors. If the Committees are working, we will get adverse representations from the spokespersons for those affected. We ought to be aware that the policy that everyone has espoused during this debate will bring pain.

Next, we must tackle economic inactivity. While the current Government have got the macroeconomic approach right, and unemployment now stands at 4.2%, a microanalysis shows huge swathes of people who should be contributing to the economy and enjoying a better standard of living — but who are not, because they are economically inactive. Many people who are currently getting incapacity benefit will be transferred into work. Members can imagine the numbers that will come through the doors of constituency advice centres complaining that they have been put off benefit. Of course, we will all try to pretend that it is not our fault, but that is one of the policies that we are agreeing to get the economically inactive back into work. Dr Birnie used the phrase “tough love” yesterday. Most people will recognise the “tough” part and not the “love” part of this policy. As public representatives, if we put our names to a document like this, we must recognise that there will be some pain for us too.

It is significant that when the Labour Party put through measures such as this with welfare reform in the House of Commons recently, none of the SDLP MPs voted with it. I stand to be corrected, but I do not think that they voted at all. I do not know whether that was because they were not there, or because they recognised that there would be pain in that policy of moving people who are currently economically inactive into work. That will be an unpleasant move and a shaking of the nest for some.

I challenge the Member for East Londonderry who spoke on the question of industrial derating. That is also in the policy. The Member for South Belfast, Mrs Hanna, also made reference to changing the way in which the rates burden falls when she talked of capping the domestic rate. There is pain involved in that too, because if we do not take rates revenue from some people, we must take it from someone else. I am not so sure that we have thought through where the burden should fall; the response we heard from both Members who raised it is a fair indication that we probably have not. I imagine that there will be lots of different opinions when we debate that.

3.30 pm

Do we take the burden from manufacturers and load it onto shopkeepers? Do we take it from large manufacturers and load it onto small businesses? What do we do? Many businesses say that they are as much — perhaps more — in competition with firms from outside Northern Ireland, even though they are not classed as manufacturers.

Mr Poots: Does the Member agree that many people do not mind paying taxes if they provide tangible benefits? Is Government bureaucracy and the waste of so much taxpayers’ money not an issue? People get angry when they are taxed to the hilt yet see so much waste.

Mr S Wilson: I thank the Member for his intervention, but I am not sure that that is totally true. One of the arguments is not so much that businesses feel that the money has been wasted, but that they are at a competitive disadvantage compared to other firms because of the rates burden. We must ensure that the money collected is spent efficiently and that people know that it is put to a useful purpose. However, there will always be a resistance to the overall tax burden.

Another point — and I pick it out at random — is diversification in the rural economy. We have to move the emphasis of employment away from farming. However, when manufacturing or other businesses attempt to locate in the rural economy they come up against local opposition, and the same applies to tourist facilities. When it comes to planning consideration, the Assembly must make sure that it is prepared to withstand the criticism that such a change in emphasis will create.

That said, there are many pluses in our economic situation. The necessary changes will be carried out against a background of almost full employment and in a buoyant world economy that boosts everyone's confidence. Many of the players recognise that change is required; therefore there is probably a degree of goodwill.

Even though we have agreed a document, there are still some very difficult choices to be made and some divisive debates to be held before we reach our goal of a changed economy in Northern Ireland.

Mr Buchanan: The report highlights in detail the economic challenges facing Northern Ireland, and Members have dealt with different aspects of the report during the debate. It is therefore difficult not to repeat what has already been said; nevertheless, I have some points to make.

Recommendation 15 of the report deals with the need to tackle organised crime, especially where it affects economic growth and stability. Organised crime has a much broader impact on the economy than a crime committed against a particular business or sector. It affects the perception of businesses and influences their willingness to invest in a region. Perhaps that is the reason for Sinn Féin's absence from the debate. That party pretends to talk the talk, but fails to walk the walk of democracy.

It is vital that everyone involved in improving the economic situation of Northern Ireland fully supports all efforts to tackle organised crime, which is a serious problem that affects the competitiveness of Northern Ireland's businesses. The most recent report of the Organised Crime Task Force (OCTF) highlighted the fact that more than £10 million worth of counterfeit goods and £30 million worth of illegal assets have been retained, confiscated or seized by OCTF, HM Revenue and Customs and the Police Service of Northern Ireland (PSNI) between 2005 and 2006.

No one here needs to be reminded of the scale of crimes involving fuel smuggling and laundering, and the sale of illegal cigarettes. However, when you add in the effects of robbery, money laundering and protection rackets, it becomes obvious just how sizeable the effect on the Northern Ireland economy is, no more so than in west Tyrone, where it borders the South of Ireland.

No business should have to face competition from paramilitary groups selling illegal goods at cut-price. No business should have to factor into its start-up or running costs the price of paying protection money to a paramilitary criminal gang, and the public purse should not be robbed of income through the non-payment of taxes and duty.

We as public representatives are told continually that Northern Ireland must pay its way and that we have to ensure that more and more revenue is raised, yet at the same time, millions of pounds that should be going into financing public services are going into the pockets of criminal gangs. Progress has been made in targeting those criminals and in freezing their assets. I hope that this work continues and will be stepped up so that we can defeat those groups that are intent on continuing their illegal activities.

Although it could be argued that progress towards tackling organised crime is not within the power of Government to control, most of the proposals contained in the report are directly within the power of Government to implement. One of the simplest of those is recommendation 8, which states:

"That any savings that may be made from government efficiencies should be retained and used in Northern Ireland."

That was the basis of this party's proposal that, as progress towards a peaceful settlement moves forward, any savings made should be ploughed back into Northern Ireland in the form of an infrastructure package.

(Madam Speaker in the Chair)

There are also savings that can and should be delivered through the Secretary of State's commitment to examining a reduction in the number of Departments in Northern Ireland. As many Members mentioned, the Government should not do the job of business, but they do have a clear responsibility to ensure that the best possible conditions are in place for businesses to grow and prosper. For that reason, the Government must take the lead and show the same level of commitment to Northern Ireland that we expect from businesses that invest in this country. Significant savings can be made over the next few years, and those can be invested in the development of Northern Ireland at no new cost to the Government.

The circumstances in Northern Ireland must be borne in mind: it is not simply another region of the UK that is seeking to improve its economy. Spending was required to maintain security here. As a result, infrastructure and other areas suffered. Communities and businesses also suffered through 30 years of terrorism. The Government must recognise that and provide help to rebuild the Northern Ireland economy.

This report provides a very well-structured and detailed analysis of the situation. However, as it points out, it is not a finished work; the development of the economy will never be finished. We will always seek to improve and keep ahead of our competitors, wherever in the world they might be. Therefore in commending the report, I urge the implementation of the recommendations as soon as possible for the betterment of the economy throughout Northern Ireland.

Madam Speaker: I call George Robinson. This is the first occasion that the Assembly will hear from Mr Robinson. He will be making his maiden speech. I hope that you are comfortable with that, Mr Robinson. I remind Members that the convention is that a maiden speech should be heard without interruption.

Mr G Robinson: Thank you, Madam Speaker.

No one can deny that this is a most detailed and constructive report, and credit is due to everyone who was involved in its preparation. The detail of the report shows that the significance of the issue to Northern Ireland, as a vibrant economy is absolutely vital for our communities.

It is unfortunate that not all the parties represented on the subgroup are present for the debate. However, that should not deter us from carrying on with our work. The one party absent for the debate, namely Sinn Féin, is the party whose military wing has done so much to destabilise our economy over the past 30-odd years.

The importance of education in developing a successful economy has already been mentioned. Northern Ireland is capable of producing a highly qualified workforce. That has already been shown, with many employers citing their highly qualified workforces as a major strength to their businesses. However, we must protect the best aspects of our high-class education system to maintain that, while at the same time improving those aspects that require attention in order to provide the best possible workforce.

Northern Ireland does not require only university graduates, important though highly skilled graduates are to any economy; it requires people with different educational backgrounds who can provide the variety of skills required by the economy. For that reason, a one-size-fits-all comprehensive education system will not deliver the high-class economy that we need. An education system tailored to the needs of different students is the best option for both students and the economy, as it will produce people with different skills that the economy requires at all levels.

After secondary education, there is real potential for the increased use of knowledge transfer partnerships, which link businesses, and small firms in particular, with educational establishments to help businesses source expertise, without which they cannot expand and grow. In addition to the benefits to businesses, knowledge transfer partnerships provide universities and further education colleges with a link to businesses, which helps students to engage with the private sector and get experience and help with their future careers.

Education can help lay some of the foundations for a successful economy; another key factor is infrastructure development. The subgroup correctly highlighted that as a crucial area in which a financial package for Northern Ireland should be focused.

Businesses must be able to realise that they can operate in Northern Ireland as easily — or more easily — than in the rest of the UK, the Republic of Ireland or from wherever in the world our competition originates. Over 40 years ago, Northern Ireland was ahead of the curve in respect of roads infrastructure. The situation is somewhat different today, but it is vital that the required improvements are started so that that competitive edge can be regained. Businesses must be able to transport goods, no matter in what sector they operate. There will always be a need for good transport links.

The state of our infrastructure contributes to the general impression of Northern Ireland to potential investors. We must show businesses the benefits of establishing a base in Northern Ireland. We have many of the required natural resources, but infrastructure and services must be brought up to the necessary standards in order to compete with areas that can offer much lower labour costs and other financial benefits, which Northern Ireland will be unlikely to match. In such circumstances, other aspects must be promoted to ensure that Northern Ireland is seen as a desirable area in which to do business.

No single measure will solve the problems facing our economy. However, I commend the report and pay tribute to everyone involved in its preparation. It highlights problems but, more importantly, offers many solutions. The report contains many of the building blocks that can put the Northern Ireland economy in a very strong position. I support the motion.

3.45 pm

Dr McCrea: I wish to congratulate my hon Friend on an excellent maiden speech; it is a pleasure to follow him. I also wish to congratulate my hon Friend, the Member for South Antrim Mr Burns, who made a very competent maiden speech. I trust that we will have the opportunity to hear again the Members who have made maiden speeches, and others, during other debates in the Chamber.

There is a deafening silence in parts of the Chamber, which should come as no surprise to anyone. Sinn Féin/IRA has decided to stay away from this debate. That is nothing new; Sinn Féin/IRA's boycotting an economic debate is quite typical, bearing in mind that its members offer nothing to society and, over the years, have been associated with those who have blown our economy to bits. Therefore, there is nothing unusual in its boycotting this debate. Debating is one area in which Sinn Féin has always been very weak. That party has used other ways and means to exercise its power in the past, but certainly not the power of persuasion in debate.

Those who are here will certainly endeavour to debate the issues, which are very important to all our constituents. We are considering the 'First Report on the Economic Challenges Facing Northern Ireland', and I commend those who actively engaged during the summer to bring the report before us; their work is greatly appreciated.

It is interesting to note that Sinn Féin members of the subgroup agreed the report. When the report came before the PFG Committee, Sinn Féin tried to scupper it, kick it into touch and stop it from coming before the House. Finally, Sinn Féin caved in and agreed the report. After agreeing it, Sinn Féin went to the Business Committee to try again to stop it getting on the agenda for debate in the Chamber.

We are debating an important issue that impacts on all our constituents. The Member for East Antrim Sammy Wilson provided a good dose of reality, because it is very easy for politicians to blame everyone else. Some would try to deceive the electorate into thinking that somehow we are totally innocent of everything. For example, let us remember that the rates review came out of the womb of the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. Therefore, responsibility for that review falls at the doorstep of the SDLP, the Ulster Unionists and the Belfast Agreement. The Secretary of State is now carrying that policy forward, but it originated in the Assembly.

Industrial rating was conceived in the very same womb. Let us not deceive people; let us be honest and admit where those policies started.

Dr Birnie: Will the Member give way?

Dr McCrea: No. I have a lot to say, and the hon Member has had an opportunity to speak. I assure the hon Member that there is much more that he needs to listen to. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

Dr McCrea: The Ulster Unionist Party needs a good dose of reality. The Member for Strangford Mr McNarry talked about magic wands and magic dust. Let us have reality, rather than getting on a magic roundabout.

Let us deal with some of the issues that must be faced. The Member for South Antrim Mr Burns made a valuable contribution in his maiden speech, and he said something very significant. He made it abundantly clear that the only way that we can really have an impact on our economy is by having a strong, stable devolved Government. He said that over and over again. That is important, and we must heed what he said. We need a strong, stable devolved Government, not something cobbled together — not something out of the womb of the Belfast Agreement, which the general public has rejected, but something that will bring stability to Northern Ireland. The Ulster Unionists, the SDLP and Sinn Féin, which have supported the Belfast Agreement, had better realise that it is dead.

The people in our community want something that will bring stability instead of something that has the stench of death on it. They want life, a vibrant economy and a society that can move forward with a vision of hope for the future. Although we must face realities in any debate on the economy, we must also be careful to remind ourselves of the many good aspects of our economy. We need to talk up Northern Ireland.

I have heard certain Members remind the House of what is happening in the Irish Republic's economy. They tell us that what we really need is an all-Ireland economy. Let us get a wee dose of reality — the Republic of Ireland is our competitor. To use a good country expression, those Members would like to be on the hind tit of the cow instead of standing at the front and being the cow. Let us have confidence in ourselves instead of trying to tie ourselves to the tail end of a place that constantly relies on handouts from Europe.

On the one hand, the Irish Republic boasts of its Celtic tiger economy, while, on the other hand, it goes to Europe with a begging bowl every other day to ask for more money and handouts. I could solve many of the problems in my constituency if I were to get all the handouts from Europe that the Dublin Government receive. They plead poverty, but then they tell us that the Irish Republic is a vibrant economy and that everybody should try to emulate the success of the Celtic tiger. However, it relies on its begging bowl and on handouts from others. It is fine if the Irish Republic wants to behave in that way. All that I am saying is —

Madam Speaker: Dr McCrea, I take it that you are addressing your remarks through the Chair and not directly to Members. I do not mind where some remarks go, but other remarks should be made through the Chair.

Dr McCrea: Madam Speaker, I would not want to bypass you in any shape or form. However, I want to emphasise the attitude of the Members on the Benches opposite; it would be discourteous of me not to direct my remarks to them or to plead with them to get out of the muck and the mire. They must stop relying on others and have the dignity to stand on their own two feet and present their own case. Northern Ireland has much to present to the world. We should not be a tag-on in a Dublin tourist brochure. We have something to offer in our own right.

The Member for West Belfast Mrs Dodds gave one of today's most excellent and eloquent speeches. She pointed out that tourism is a vital ingredient that should be allowed to evolve in the interests of Northern Ireland and that our tourism industry should not be a tag-on but a vibrant industry in its own right.

We must recognise the hardship that our economy and industries have endured over the past 35 years of terrorism. We must give them credit and praise them for sticking in there and for standing up against all the terrorism that has been thrown at them. We must say, "Well done" to our workers and to those who have invested money in our Province.

Much more remains to be done, however. We acknowledge that there is a skills deficit. I have a genuine concern about our education system. For one reason or another, the Government believe that a young person who does not have a university degree is somehow a second-class citizen. With the greatest respect, that is wrong. Some of the best contributors to our economy, past and present, have no university degree, but they have an entrepreneurial spirit, innovation and vision. They are able to capture the moment and take themselves, their families and the community forward. A balance must be struck. Some young people have university degrees, but it is not relevant to life. When they are asked what they will do with their degree when they finish university, they do not know. Sad to say, some of them have to honestly say that they do not know, and I give them credit for that. We must build up the skills base in Northern Ireland. We need the university graduate and the academic, but we also need a good skills base, as many skills in our society are being neglected.

The transport system in Northern Ireland creates problems for industrialists who want to come here. I appreciate the fact that my hon Friends in the Department for Regional Development had a strategy to take matters forward. They not only planned for the moment but for the future as well, and if something fell by the way, they had another scheme ready to take over. That was done by my hon Friend for East Belfast and my hon Friend for East Londonderry and not by direct rule Ministers, and it was deeply appreciated.

However, we need more investment in our infrastructure. For example, there is a vibrant economy in the mid-Ulster area, and that is not due to the multinationals but to the entrepreneurial spirit of the people. They have lifted themselves.

News came to the Magherafelt area one day that 528 jobs were to go like the crack of a finger, which was a total disaster for that area. Did the people lie down and bury their heads in the sand and rely on others to do everything for them? No: they decided to act, and now they have one of the lowest unemployment rates in the whole country — a result of what was done by the community for the community — and I appreciate that.

However, Magherafelt is being held back because the town does not have a bypass. The townspeople need to get to Cookstown, and the area must be opened up so that the industrialists can get to the seaports and airports, but they are being hindered in the good that they want to do for the community. Many good things are happening that deserve praise, but the deficiencies must be identified and moved forward.

The report is a first step. Members should note that it is a first report, or a foundation report, which means that the subgroup has the desire to build on it, and the Administration in power must take it forward.

There is a lack of interdepartmental co-operation. It would appear that one hand does not know what the other hand is doing, so there must be more co-operation. There is plenty of talk about that, but there is little action. The Planning Service must come up to standard. Unfortunately, in many cases it is an impediment to moving forward. The Member for East Antrim Ken Robinson identified Global Point in south Antrim for industrial development, but it is sitting vacant. A former Minister with responsibility for the economy announced that it was the jewel in the crown, but the jewel in the crown is sitting in dust. In fact, the jewel cannot be seen for dust. Instead of being the jewel in the crown and being full of industrialists, it is covered with nettles and thistles. Global Point is vacant because of planning problems.

Joined-up government must move the economy forward. We have a great country and the best workers that anyone could ask for, and we want to improve their skills so that they can take industry forward, but we must give them the best tool, which is stability. We need a stable society. The hon Member for South Antrim spoke in a considered and passionate way when he said that we need a strong, stable, devolved Government, and that is what Ulster is crying out for. A devolved Government is needed, but we cannot have it while we have terrorism, criminality, and a political party inextricably linked with a terrorist organisation with all the minutiae of that organisation ready to break forth as it desires and wills. That will not bring stability.

We need to have integrity within our system, which must be based on the foundations of democracy. That is what the DUP stands for. My party is not seeking short-term fixes but strong, stable devolved government. If that is not on offer by 24 November, the Secretary of State had better realise that Ulster will not settle for second best. We have been living with second best for too long. We want the best for our future, and that is what our people deserve.

4.00 pm

Mr P Robinson: This has been a very worthwhile debate. There may have been those who thought that, 26 hours after the debate opened, we would have been tiring, but after the contribution from my hon Friend the Member for South Antrim, they now know otherwise. They now know that we have the stamina to see any job through to the end.

As others have, I congratulate those who made maiden speeches today. We had three powerful speeches, including one from the Member for South Antrim Mr Burns, who indicated clearly the contribution that he will make to the Assembly, given the opportunity. He made a salient point about the need for stability, and I will return to that. I congratulate my colleague and uncle George Robinson, the Member for East Londonderry. [Laughter.]

I have heard George speak on many previous occasions. He is a first-class constituency worker, and he will make a real contribution in this Assembly.

What can I say of the Member for West Belfast? I can probably say quite a bit about her speech because, unlike her husband, I was here to listen to it.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr P Robinson: She made important points about the tourism industry and how it has been taken down a side-road. I make those comments for the advantage of the Member for North Belfast, who did not hear the speech.

Mr N Dodds: I will read it. [Laughter.]

Mr P Robinson: Mrs Dodds talked about the courthouse in her constituency of West Belfast. She became a bit territorial, because she started talking about the Titanic Quarter in East Belfast, which concerned me. Perhaps her geography is imperfect. I have no wish to fuel any domestic difficulties, but I was here for my wife's maiden speech. I think it will probably take a contribution to the economy by the Member for North Belfast, perhaps in the shape of jewellery, to sort out that difficulty. [Laughter.]

Mr N Dodds: Thank you.

Mr P Robinson: I speak now of the missing Members, a topic that has been mentioned by a number of others. It was my understanding, and I believe it was the understanding of the Secretary of State, and certainly of my colleagues, that a distinct process was to be followed. First, there was a need to scope the issues. The Secretary of State lectured us all about the need to get the PFG Committee working. It had to identify the obstacles so that we would see clearly where future difficulties might lie. Secondly, there would be debates in the Assembly, which would enable Members to see more closely the nuances of one another's position. Thirdly, we would go into negotiations and try to resolve those difficulties. That was the progression that was laid out.

As I understood the position of Sinn Féin/IRA, it indicated that it would contribute in the Assembly Chamber only when that was essential to preparation for Government, or to contribute to the setting up of a devolved Government. That was the justification it gave not simply for going through the doors of this Assembly, but for going into Committees. Therefore I am confused, because Sinn Féin felt justified in going into the subgroup that dealt with the economic report. Sinn Féin Members not only went into the subgroup, but contributed to its work and, along with all the others, reached a consensus, and we had an agreed report, which, as two Members have already stated, says in its executive summary that it is important that matters are dealt with fully in debate in the Assembly.

Sinn Féin's position was that it would be involved only with a report that was essential to the preparation for Government. Members of Sinn Féin were involved in the subgroup and were part of the Preparation for Government Committee when it considered the subgroup's report. Eventually, after a little hiccup, they were able to endorse that report. Why are they not here? If Sinn Féin had already recognised that the report was important to the preparation for Government and that its presence was required at the subgroup and the PFG Committee meetings, what possible excuse can it have for not being here today?

Sinn Féin has missed an important opportunity, and perhaps its absence exposes a lack of interest in the Northern Ireland economy. In his maiden speech, my hon Friend from East Londonderry George Robinson clearly outlined the role that Sinn Féin has played in undermining, destroying and setting back the economy through the terrorist campaign that it supported and in which it was involved.

The one message that came through clearly to anyone who stayed in the Chamber for any length of time was that every Department has a role to play in addressing the challenges that face the economy. Members rightly spoke about planning. Several Members mentioned the restraints placed on the establishment of businesses in Northern Ireland by the Planning Service's inability to fast-track applications with important job content.

When I visited Australia as a Minister of this House, I was asked to meet representatives from a major Australian company. They told me that their company wanted to invest here but that Northern Ireland had the slowest planning system in the entire world. That was the view of an international company that invests billions of pounds. Even then, the Planning Service's actions resulted in companies not investing here. Companies want a quick return on their investment: they do not want to wait. Indeed, the example was given of a certain business taking eight years to go through the introductory stages of the planning process.

Members also spoke about agriculture and the agri-foods industry, which is a vital and important part of the economy. I say that as a Belfast representative. Some Members referred to tourism, and even the film industry got a mention. Transport, energy, education and skills were also mentioned. Every Department has a role to play in the challenge to revive Northern Ireland's economy and make it less dependent on the public sector.

I will talk briefly about transportation, as I have a particular interest in it. The infrastructure of any area is vital to its economy. When goods are being brought in and taken out, it is essential that a good road infrastructure exists and that airports and seaports operate effectively and efficiently. As I have no time to go into detail, I will simply put on record that I have concerns about the consultation on some of the proposals about the future of Belfast port that would undermine its ability to continue stimulating the economy.

Belfast is an essential part of Northern Ireland's economy. I am delighted that the Titanic Quarter development will bring real life to the city: I can think of nowhere else in the civilised world where an area that is so close to the capital and of such significance as the hundreds of acres of the Titanic Quarter is available for development. The development of that area can bring job opportunities to people in Northern Ireland.

In its heyday, Harland and Wolff built ships day after day and employed 20,000 to 25,000 people. That same area of ground is capable of bringing that level of employment not only to east Belfast or greater Belfast, but to the whole of Northern Ireland. Undoubtedly, the type of industry will change — and that point is pertinent to the discussion about corporation tax or other incentives.

We should take into account the fact that the types of businesses that will be stimulated by reducing corporation tax may be different to those that might be stimulated if other incentives are put forward. Therefore, we must be careful with people who approach us, because they will have a genuine vested interest in one incentive rather than another, and it will depend on their business viewpoint.

I do not have the same difficulty as the Members for North Down and South Down who suggested in discussion yesterday that to ask for a differential tax rate might be considered anti-unionist. The Union is diverse in many ways. If we argue that we do not want special privileges, should we then have the same amount per capita in Northern Ireland as in every other part of the United Kingdom? Being in a family means that the part in greatest need gets the greatest help.

I am not in the least bit embarrassed about asking for a differential tax rate for a Northern Ireland that, I hope, has come out of decades of destructive terrorism and has a neighbour to its south with a more competitive corporation-tax level. It will be difficult to secure a new rate of corporation tax and it is likely that some other incentive will be offered. I do not accept the argument that that is in any way anti-unionist. Indeed, the Union is based on the principle that we are a family — each with our own peculiar and diverse background, interests and advantages — and are able to help one another.

The Member for South Antrim referred to stability. Ultimately, any hard-nosed businessman seeking to invest anywhere in the world will want to be certain about that investment. He will not invest in a country with a stop-start Government. If there are suspensions from one month to the next; people coming in and out of the Assembly; violence and criminality continuing; and people associated with violence and criminality in Government, there will not be the background of stability that will encourage investment.

It is essential, therefore, that we hold out for real stability and that a level of certainty is reached, because that is what the business community will seek before it will invest. We must invest in our futures if they are to invest in our businesses. Both require a level of stability that can only come about when those who are in Government are committed to exclusively peaceful and democratic means.

This is the first report. Further reports must deal with infrastructure, a financial package, and whether a devolved Government can deal with issues such as the rates. People are being massively hurt by rates increases. However, as my colleague Mr Wilson said, what you give to one area you take away from another. If rates are to be capped, we must consider whether there should be a minimum level for the services being provided. Ultimately, however, people will have to pay.

Finally, some important contributions have been made in the debate and good work has been done in the preparation of the report. However, that will only be of any advantage if the report's recommendations are acted upon. Some recommendations could be taken forward by a devolved Government, but many concern reserved matters and can, therefore, only be taken forward by the Exchequer and the Government. The Secretary of State must consider the debate.

4.15 pm

As was said, the Secretary of State must not put this report on the shelf; he must deal with the issues in it. The Assembly can pursue other matters in a further report; we can push forward other issues if, hopefully, the right conditions are achieved and devolution is restored. However, the Secretary of State has the prime responsibility for resolving the issues placed before him and answering the people of Northern Ireland. The elected representatives of the people of Northern Ireland have spoken. What is the answer from the Secretary of State?

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That the Assembly approves the first report from the Committee on the Preparation for Government on the economic challenges facing Northern Ireland; agrees that it should be submitted to the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland and, pending restoration of the Institutions, calls on the Secretary of State, the Committee on the Preparation for Government and others to take action to implement the recommendations in the report.

Adjourned at 4.16 pm.

THE ASSEMBLY

Tuesday 19 September 2006

The Assembly met at 10.30 am (Madam Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

ASSEMBLY BUSINESS

Madam Speaker: In accordance with the Northern Ireland Act 2006, the Secretary of State has directed that the Assembly should sit on Tuesday 19 September 2006 at 10.30 am, and again, subject to the continuation of debate, on Wednesday 20 September 2006 at 10.30 am, to consider business as it appears on the Order Paper.

COMMITTEE BUSINESS

Report on Law and Order Issues

Madam Speaker: Item 3 on the Order Paper is the motion on the second report from the Committee on the Preparation for Government (PFG), on law and order issues.

The Business Committee has agreed that the arrangements for today's debate should be the same as those for last week's debate on the Report on the Economic Challenges facing Northern Ireland.

Therefore, a Chairperson of the Committee on the Preparation for Government will formally move the motion, but will not attempt to represent the views of the Committee, and there will be no winding-up speech on behalf of the Committee.

Members will be called to speak to the motion, according to the usual conventions, with an upper time limit of 15 minutes to be applied to all those called to speak.

In view of the Secretary of State's direction that the Assembly meet today and again tomorrow, subject to the continuation of debate, I propose to suspend proceedings today around 6.00 pm and resume at 10.30 am tomorrow. Any variation from this arrangement will be discussed through the usual channels.

If that is clear, I shall proceed.

Mr Wells: I beg to move

That the Assembly approves the second report from the Committee on the Preparation for Government, on Law and Order Issues; agrees that it should be submitted to the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland and, pending restoration of the Institutions, calls on the Secretary of State and others to address those matters identified in the report as requiring resolution or further discussion.

At the outset, Madam Speaker, I believe that it is appropriate that the House congratulates a member of the PFG Committee, Mrs Arlene Foster, on the birth of her baby son yesterday. That is tremendous news. Mrs Foster was one of the most faithful attendees up to the last, as it were. Knowing her dedication, it would not surprise me if she were to turn up tomorrow to take part in the debate. We wish her, and her husband and family, all the best on this excellent news.

Mr Kennedy: Is there a name yet?

Mr Wells: No name has been chosen yet.

I am sure that many Members will make contributions on this lengthy and detailed report, so I do not intend to spend time dealing with its finer points. However, I place on record my gratitude to those who made the report possible. While some hon Members were, no doubt, lying on sun-kissed beaches in July and August, a select few were locked in rooms, working their way through the details of the report. I am particularly grateful to those who attended all, or almost all, of the meetings for their dedication to the cause.

I also thank the staff who worked so diligently throughout the summer: the secretariat; the clerking staff; the Hansard staff who delivered such accurate and timely reports of the proceedings; and last, but not least, the catering staff who provided sustenance. I have nothing but praise for the staff who made the report possible. I ask Members to support the motion.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: I welcome the opportunity to speak in this important debate. I welcome the publication of the report and the opportunity to debate the issues raised in it. I congratulate the Committee officials for their work on the preparation and presentation of the report. Its findings are detailed, and the debate will allow us to deal with the main themes.

In recent days, it has become clear that IRA/Sinn Féin is engaged in a wrecking agenda. Again, its seats in the Chamber are vacant. Yet again, the boycotters have refused to come to the Assembly and have, at every opportunity, frustrated the work of democratic parties on the Committee on the Preparation for Government.

The report highlights that all democratic parties represented on the Committee and in the Assembly are united in their view that Sinn Féin/IRA's refusal to support the rule of law is the main obstacle to progress. At the heart of IRA/Sinn Féin's agenda is a hatred for the police and the rule of law. The IRA machine is built on lawlessness and criminality — there can be no escaping that fact. To this day, IRA/Sinn Féiners cannot bring themselves to support the police and the courts, or to uphold the rule of law.

Although some progress has been made on the issues before the Committee, we cannot deceive ourselves into believing that all is well. Sinn Féin/IRA has done nothing to demonstrate practical support for the forces of law and order in our Province. There are those who lecture that all would be well if an Executive were established, but there will be no Executive that includes those who refuse to support the police by word and deed. We will accept no sleight of hand on this issue.

Law and order is absolutely fundamental to the establishment of any lasting democratic form of devolution in Northern Ireland. As representatives of the majority community, we intend to maintain integrity in the democratic process. A party that wishes to sit in Government over the people of Northern Ireland yet, at the same time, does not support the police, will be resisted by all right-thinking people.

We will have no truck with those who try to foist such a programme on us for their own narrow political agendas. Those who will not support the police will not be in any Government over us. The days of those who would undermine democracy and the rule of law in Government are over for ever. All parties stated a preference for a single devolved Department for policing and justice issues. However, there will be no such devolution while the people of Northern Ireland have no faith that the IRA is out of business.

The unionist community must be convinced that the conditions are right for any transfer of policing and justice powers. Will we see in the days, weeks and months ahead the disbandment of paramilitary organisations, including the IRA? If that were to happen, it would greatly enhance the prospects of political progress in the Province and boost confidence across the entire community.

Sinn Féin/IRA is the only party in the House that refuses to support law and order. There can be no covering up that fact; no detailed reports are necessary to establish why it refuses to support policing. Sinn Féin remains committed at heart to crime, terror and an organisation that, by its nature, is structured to destroy our country. It is for Sinn Féin to step up to the mark. What is required from all those who aspire to Government is clear and simple. Support for the police cannot be, and must not be, a trade-off or precondition for undeserved rewards.

The unionist people resent the proposal that if the IRA gets all that it is promised — and we do not know what that is — Sinn Féin will have a party conference at which its members will decide our destiny as a member of the United Kingdom and how we should be governed. We cannot be governed by the party conference of any political party. We must be governed by the rule of democracy, and democracy demands that criminality be laid aside and that there be support for the properly constituted police forces.

Support must be offered and given without strings attached. It must be given with full recognition that the police are the exclusive, lawful, impartial upholders of law and order. There is no room for a second tier under the control of, or made up by, republicans. Suggestions that Northern Ireland should have a second tier must be rejected. There can be no second tier of the police in Northern Ireland. There is one tier and one police force.

The multimillion-pound crime empire must be practically and openly given up. Those involved in the £300 million empire must be handed over to the police. The ill-gotten gains of crime will be abandoned and law enforcement agencies will be supported in the seizure of those illegal gains.

There must be no reward for support for the police; it is a precondition of democracy. Republicans — like all other citizens — must submit themselves to the rule of law by the police and the courts. That means that the IRA must be stood down and abandoned. I regret the recent statement that we should welcome the structures of IRA/Sinn Féin because that would help to forward peace in the Province. No terrorist structure can do that. Those republican activists who will not give up crime and who were integral to the republican movement in the past must be handed over to the police with any available evidence. There are no “get out of jail free” cards to be handed out to the IRA or any other terrorist organisation.

There could be no question of anyone sitting in the Cabinet of the United Kingdom who refused to support and endorse the police and the law enforcement agencies.

10.45 am

By the way, the same is true of the Government of the Irish Republic. In May, when the Irish Minister for Foreign Affairs, Mr Ahern number two, was asked whether he would sit in Government with anybody who did not, as a matter of principle, support the gardaí, he confirmed instantly that no, he would not. There would be no place for such a party in the Irish Republic’s Cabinet.

No western democracy would admit into Government a party that does not support its police force. The DUP intends to ensure that democracy and commitment to exclusively peaceful and democratic means applies to Northern Ireland. On this there cannot, and will not, be any lowering of standards.

It is not a move towards full acceptance of policing that is required before Government can be restored in Northern Ireland, nor is it a hint or a nod that some kind of acceptance might be required: it is full acceptance and support of the police. I disagree with the Secretary of State’s comments that we have made great advances in dealing with the matter; I do not know of any such advances. This week, it was quite clear from my meeting with the Prime Minister that there have been no advances in this area.

My message to republicans is that they must get on with delivering. Why should democratic parties have to wait for the IRA to decide whether it will go out of business? There is much other work to be done.

To date, the record of republicans has not been encouraging. Take, for example, the case of the young 15-year-old girl who was attacked by a man armed with a screwdriver while walking with three friends along Blacks Road in west Belfast in August last year. A second man used a metal bar to batter the three boys who were with her and stopped them from rescuing her. Their mobile phones and cash were stolen, and the girl was dragged onto a BP petrol station forecourt and raped.

In response to that most despicable of all crimes, a Sinn Féin representative for West Belfast was quoted in ‘The Guardian’ newspaper as saying:

“I would urge local women not to travel home alone and ... to be vigilant.”

When questioned on BBC Radio Ulster following that attack, he made it quite clear that he would not encourage anyone with evidence to come forward to help to bring those brutal attackers to justice. The current situation is that Sinn Féin/IRA advises people that if they fall victim to the most brutal and depraved attacks, they should say nothing to the police and do nothing. Victims are forbidden from going to the police. We also know of the wall of silence that was evident in the investigation into the murder of Robert McCartney.

I said at the outset that law-and-order issues go to the core of this debate and are fundamental to the possibility of progress. It is Sinn Féin that stands indicted by this report. It is Sinn Féin that must tackle its failure to support the police and the forces of law and order in Northern Ireland. That party must support the police and must encourage others to do so. When that happens, we will be on the way to establishing full democracy in our beloved Province.

Madam Speaker: I remind Members who wish to use examples in their contributions that sub judice rules apply in cases for which charges are being proffered. That may be relevant to this debate.

Mr McFarland: I thank the Chairmen of the Committee on the Preparation for Government, Mr Wells and Mr Molloy, for their outstanding handling of its business. So fair and impartial have they been, that each may shortly be looking for a new party.

I stand before you, a weary survivor of the Preparation for Government Committee. I warn the Assembly that there may be some Members so severely psychologically traumatised by their time in the PFG Committee over the summer that they may need treatment. I suspect that there may be a medical bill for the Assembly at the end of its proceedings. It is arguable that the mental torture of Room 144 will be synonymous with that at Camp X-Ray at Guantanamo Bay when the annals of infamy are written.

This is the first and probably only debate that we will have in this Chamber on the business of the full Committee on the Preparation for Government. Sinn Féin has blocked the other two reports. It agreed the content of the reports but refused permission for them to be printed. That, apparently, is based on a statement that Dr Paisley made, in which he drew attention to the fact that the DUP might have problems meeting the 24 November deadline. Sinn Féin’s objection was that he was strong and vociferous about that. Members have known Dr Paisley for many years, and I do not understand why Sinn Féin is surprised that Dr Paisley is strong and vociferous about anything.

The Committee was set up to scope issues, and it was very particular about that. I want Members to note the word “scope”. On no account are they to use the word “negotiation”. That distinction was drawn daily by the DUP, which insisted that the Committee was not — whatever else it did — to become involved in any form of negotiation.

However, I could forgive Members who peruse Hansard for making that mistake, because they will discover that many issues have been agreed in the Committee. Other issues have been parked for the talks. Therefore, perhaps it could be argued that a small degree of negotiation was involved. Peter Robinson proposed in Committee that its reports should go forward to the Assembly for debate and be used as the basis for negotiation in October. That seemed to be a sensible use of the reports.

For the first time, the five major political parties in Northern Ireland sat in a room, around a table, and examined the issues that prevent a Government in Northern Ireland from getting up and running. That is encouraging.

I got into trouble over the summer, as some will have spotted, for pointing out in Committee that, for some reason that I could not understand, all of our work had entirely bypassed the media. The first journalist to spot that was Gerry Moriarty, who produced an excellent article for ‘The Irish Times’, which included some analysis. In that analysis, he examined Hansard — he had obviously read it — and worked out that there had been, over those months, a substantial thaw in the relationship between the Democratic Unionist Party and Sinn Féin.

The Committee started wearily, and members spent several weeks scrapping across the table. That is only to be expected. Members began without eye contact. The Committee developed like a Greek village main street on a Sunday evening, where chaperoned young ladies walk on one side, while chaperoned young men walk on the other, each trying to meet one another’s eyes, but refusing to do so. In this case, it looked as though the Ulster Unionist Party was chaperoning the DUP, and the SDLP was chaperoning Sinn Féin to get to a point where they could make eye contact across the room. That indeed happened.

Since August, there has been serious engagement in that Committee, with much good work completed. At one stage, with Martin McGuinness on one side and Rev McCrea on the other, Rev McCrea invited Martin to call him “William”, which was very exciting.

Mr Robert McCartney: It is difficult to discern how the contents of the report are the subject of the Member’s speech. Is it not time that he was asked to confine himself at least to the general ambit of the report?

Madam Speaker: Mr McFarland’s contribution is relevant to the PFG Committee’s report.

Mr McFarland: That was my verbose Bob McCartney introduction, which Members were well used to for the four years of the previous Assembly.

Mr Robert McCartney: At least there was some content.

Mr McFarland: Well, I will give you content. I want to give some background, and get into the issue of where all this came from, which was the Belfast Agreement. At the beginning of this process, the Prime Minister reminded us that we were examining the Belfast Agreement, which was the “only deal in town”. It has to be said that if this process comes to fruition, a great deal will be owed to the courage of the Ulster Unionist Party in creating a peaceful Northern Ireland and getting Northern Ireland to where it is now, so that the DUP can take it the rest of the way.

We have to remind ourselves, of course, that in November 2004 we got within a grubby Polaroid of a deal, and we had the comprehensive agreement. It is worth reminding ourselves again what Sinn Féin said in the comprehensive agreement about the policing issue:

“As a result of our discussions we now have a commitment from the British government and the DUP to the transfer of powers on policing and justice to the Assembly as soon as possible, a DUP commitment to a speedy, time framed discussion on the departmental model and the powers to be transferred with a view to agreement by the time the Executive is established”.

Policing and justice were well on their way in November 2004, so we have, in fact, been revisiting several of these issues over the past few weeks. What are the issues? All five parties attended the meetings, and all agreed that whatever talks should take place, all five parties should be involved. However, in the end, it will come down eventually to the two largest parties having to agree what happens.

I wish to briefly examine the positions of those two parties on several issues. The Democratic Unionist Party raised three main concerns; the first, decommissioning, has raised its head again. Having said that, Dr McCrea and Ian Paisley Jnr accepted that substantial decommissioning had taken place, which is an encouraging step forward. The Independent Monitoring Commission (IMC) pointed out that some weapons were outstanding. Shortly after that, ‘The Sunday Tribune’ newspaper reported that the south Derry brigade of the Provisional IRA had seceded from the organisation, “taking its weapons with it.” We will have to wait and see whether the IMC’s October report shows that those were the outstanding weapons. If they were, that clears up the issue of decommissioning for the DUP.

The issues of criminality and paramilitarism were raised: those are as much an issue for us as they are for the DUP. We have the Organised Crime Task Force and the IMC, and it is suspected — [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker, there is a burble in my ear.

Mr Robert McCartney: It is your hearing.

Madam Speaker: Members obviously did not listen to what I said last week. Perhaps the Business Committee will revisit that issue today.

Mr McFarland: The Secretary of State then said that he and the Minister for Justice in the Republic accepted that the Provisional IRA leadership was now committed to peaceful means and that there had been a decrease in criminality. We will have to wait for the IMC report in the autumn to see whether that assessment is correct.

However, the key issue is whether or not Sinn Féin will sign up to policing. Where has Sinn Féin got to on that? It has told us in the press and in the PFG Committee that it has had discussions with all its people and that it intends, when it reaches agreement with the Secretary of State and the Government, to hold an Ard-Fheis and take a decision.

Mr Adams told us at the weekend that Sinn Féin is waiting for the Government to produce their part of the deal. We questioned the Secretary of State yesterday in the Senate Chamber as to what their part of the deal was. The Government claim that they have met their obligations, and that the legislation is in place. Technically, according to the Government, all that they are required to do for Sinn Féin has been done, so we await Sinn Féin's response.

Sinn Féin is demanding from the DUP agreement on, and a timescale for, the devolution of policing and justice. We know from the comprehensive agreement that Sinn Féin secured both of those in November 2004, so, presumably, some sort of deal will be achieved in the autumn.

11.00 am

Mr P Robinson: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Like you, I am generous in allowing a substantial introduction. However, I am becoming a bit worried that Mr McFarland is so far into his allotted speaking time that he may forget to touch on the report at some stage.

Madam Speaker: I accept your remarks, Mr Robinson, but it is Mr McFarland's speech to make, so it is his time. If he does not speak as you want him to, that is his problem.

Mr McFarland: I am not speaking in the way in which the DUP would like me to speak. The DUP is clearly getting annoyed at what I am saying.

Mr P Robinson: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Are you saying that we can speak about anything?

Madam Speaker: No. I am saying that the time is Mr McFarland's. If he chooses to make a lengthy introduction, that is his prerogative. If he were not to mention the report and not keep to the motion, I would have to say something.

Mr P Robinson: I simply want to be clear that we can all make a 10-minute introduction on any subject of our choosing, without touching on the report.

Madam Speaker: No. Members must touch on the report. Mr McFarland has referred to the report several times, and, in doing so, he is keeping to the motion. Every Member will be treated similarly.

Mr Attwood: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Is it in order for the deputy leader of the DUP to interrupt proceedings repeatedly at the mere mention of the comprehensive agreement? I can understand why he would want to interrupt, given that he is the author of that insidious document, but is it in order for him to interrupt continually — [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order, Mr Attwood. I remind all Members that they must speak to the motion. Mr Robinson, you are correct to say that I must ensure that everyone speaks to the motion. I contend that, so far, Mr McFarland has referred to the motion — however scant you may think that reference to have been — and I hope that he will continue to do so.

Mr McFarland: My entire speech so far has related to the work of the PFG Committee dealing with law and order issues that led to this report. All the issues can be found in Hansard, and they are mentioned in the report. The DUP may not like what I am saying, but it should at least sit quietly and listen.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr McFarland: An aspect of the Secretary of State's speech in Glenties was slightly disturbing. He appeared to herald a two-tier police service, by which Sinn Féin does not have to be represented on the policing institutions as long as it supports policing on the ground. The Secretary of State was questioned again about that yesterday in Committee, but I am not sure that we received a clear answer. Some dealing may be going on in the background between Gerry Adams and the Secretary of State on how and in what format Sinn Féin will join the Policing Board.

Mr Donaldson: The Member has talked a great deal about other parties' policies and views. I ask him to elucidate a little on his party's policy. His leader has said that we must meet the deadline of 24 November. Does he share my party's view that that means that Sinn Féin must sign up to policing before that date, and that if it does not, we cannot go into Government with it? [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr McFarland: The Member has clearly not read the Official Report of the entire PFG Committee dealing with law and order issues, because all those issues are dealt with therein. We have said that Sinn Féin must sign up to policing before anything goes anywhere. We remain to be convinced as to whether Sinn Féin will do that by 24 November, but, in the end, that is its choice to make.

There are institutional issues that need to be resolved before the establishment of any Executive, and policing will be at the core of any future agreement. Sinn Féin must sign up to policing. Despite DUP encouragement that Sean Kelly be allowed to join the PSNI, the outstanding issues need to be resolved. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr McFarland: My colleagues will deal with other issues in detail, but one issue that I want to cover briefly before I finish concerns the fact that the PFG Committee decided that there should be one Ministry for policing and justice. That makes sense, as policing and justice are both currently handled by the Northern Ireland Office (NIO). It would appear to be effective and efficient to have one Ministry. Safeguards need to be put in place, however, and no doubt that issue will arise during the talks.

We discussed what some of those safeguards might be. The Government have a number of options from which to choose. The First Minister and the Deputy First Minister could have responsibility for policing and justice. Alternatively, responsibility could fall to two Ministers, or to a Minister and a “super junior Minister”. That issue will be a key part of any upcoming talks between Sinn Féin and the DUP, because we must have safeguards in place to ensure that no single party is allowed to have a free run on policing and justice.

Having said all that, a Department of policing and justice would be a strange organisation. As the Chief Constable of the PSNI has complete operational control, no Minister or Assembly Committee could interfere with his decisions. The PFG Committee has agreed that the Policing Board should remain in its present form, with the same number of MLAs in its membership. The Policing Board has responsibility for policing, and I cannot see a Minister being able to interfere in its work.

The legal system is fairly independent, and it is ring-fenced in such a way that it would be difficult to interfere with its structures. Indeed, as the Prison Service now has agency status, it is fairly independent. Therefore it is not at all clear how a Minister, outside the authority of the Assembly, could interfere with policing and justice. However, public perception of policing is a sensitive issue, and the Assembly needs to take account of that.

I have dealt with some of the issues; my colleagues will cover the others. I support the motion.

Mr Attwood: First, I agree with the comments of my colleagues and the Deputy Speaker in acknowledging the work of the staff. I acknowledge also the work of the two Deputy Speakers in chairing the PFG Committee. I echo Alan McFarland’s belief that some useful work has been done. Although that work has centred on the soft issues rather than the hard issues of law, order and justice, it has been important.

It is also appropriate to acknowledge the catering staff who fed us during our meetings.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Attwood: Indeed, the Deputy Speaker wanted, in particular, to acknowledge the vegetarian options on the menu. On one occasion, however, he did not realise that he was eating duck sandwiches. [Laughter.]

He may want to comment on that later.

Madam Speaker: Mr Attwood, will you keep to the motion? [Laughter.]

Mr Attwood: The approach of Downing Street and the Secretary of State to law, order and justice is fundamentally flawed. The triple lock that sustains and builds confidence in policing, law, order and justice is the primacy of the police; full acceptance of policing responsibility; and the authority of the justice system. However, the British Government have undone that triple lock, replacing the primacy of the police with the primacy of MI5; the full acceptance of policing responsibility with the false policing responsibility outlined in the Glenties speech; and the authority of the justice system with a foolhardy protocol for restorative justice.

The combination of the triple lock is delicate. If we get it wrong now — given the possibility that there may be no Executive or Assembly — we will have to live with the consequences for a very long time. Given the potential impact of that scenario, the SDLP urges the British Government, even at this stage, to revisit those three issues.

At yesterday’s meeting of the PFG Committee, the Secretary of State was understandably evasive about MI5 primacy. He was repeatedly asked a simple question: could he confirm that, in fulfilling his executive responsibility, he has instructed MI5, when it takes primacy in the North, to share all information with the PSNI — not essential information, not relevant information, but all information? Despite being asked that question three times, the Secretary of State refused to confirm that, in exercising his executive responsibility, he had so instructed MI5.

Every party and every Member should be alarmed that the British Government are not endorsing that principle. Consequently, when there is a serious incident that may have led to the death of a citizen or to important questions being asked about the administration of law and justice in the North, an Executive or a Minister of justice in this Building, a Chief Constable down the road or the Policing Board will not have the authority to find out what is happening. Members opposite talk about the stability of the institutions in the future. However, that lack of authority has not been addressed, and MI5 primacy is being revisited, so we will live with the grave consequences of that for a long time.

As Arlene Foster said during the Committee's deliberations on law-and-order issues, in his Glenties speech the Secretary of State established a new legitimacy on policing. He has now publicly stated that as well as the legitimacy that all parties in the Chamber signed up to — which is the legitimacy of the PSNI and the accountability mechanisms that surround it — there is now a second legitimacy in this part of Ireland: the legitimacy of merely having a relationship with the police. The Secretary of State refers to that as progress, and he has repeated that point since he made his speech in Glenties. The consequence of that is that the policing institutions and the authority of the police are devalued. That is a false position that creates a second authority in the delivery of policing in this part of Ireland. It is a little change masquerading as a big leap. As the Committee told the Secretary of State yesterday, that issue must also be revisited.

The Committee also said that all parties should face up to important policing issues; namely, they should recommend that anyone who wants to should join the police; everybody should be advised to assist the police with their inquiries; and no impediment should be placed in the way of those who participate in the police accountability structures. That is the proper way to resolve policing. The false dawn of the Glenties proposal will not suffice.

Restorative justice is the third issue that the British Government must face. In his speech to the Police Federation last week, the Secretary of State said that he accepted that the original protocol was “not sufficiently robust”. He told the federation and everybody else that they were right, and he said that the Government had listened. However, he did not listen hard enough. In that speech he outlined three areas in which the restorative justice protocol had been changed to be, in his view, more robust. First, he said that there will be direct communication between restorative justice schemes and the PSNI. However, no one has defined the nature of that direct communication. Will it merely be writing anonymous, vague or standard letters to the PSNI to confirm that an incident occurred the previous Friday night on the Falls Road? Alternatively, does it mean full and proper co-operation with the police as they attempt to fulfil their duty? Direct communication is better than third-party reporting, but if it is undefined and ill defined, it will only harbour future problems.

Mr Robert McCartney: Does the Member accept that the three areas that he has so clearly pointed out do not square with the most recent IMC report, which suggests that it is helpful to the political process for the IRA's control and command structure to be maintained?

Mr Attwood: Ultimately, we need to reach a point when organisations that are currently illegal change their form to become no threat to anybody on any part of this island. It is one thing for those organisations to end up becoming “old boys' clubs”, to borrow a phrase; however, it is unacceptable for any such organisation that continues to exist in this part of the island to maintain its authority and impose its will on citizens. That extends not only to republican organisations but to loyalist organisations.

A complaints mechanism was the second issue that the Secretary of State discussed in his speech to the Police Federation. He said that a new complaints system will be established through the Probation Board for Northern Ireland.

11.15 pm

However, he fails to acknowledge that that complaints system will include no power to compel witnesses to be interviewed, to search properties or to seize documents. How does that measure up for the young boy in Ballymurphy who gets hit by some IRA commander masquerading under the banner of community restorative justice (CRJ)? How will that reassure that young boy and his family that, if he makes a complaint about that IRA commander and about his treatment under that restorative justice scheme, his complaint will be rigorously and properly investigated?

The third issue named by the Secretary of State in his speech to the Police Federation was that of oversight. He said that the Criminal Justice Inspectorate would have the power to inspect schemes. What he did not point out was that the Criminal Justice Inspection has no powers to seize documents and to investigate individual complaints. In any case, that body is already stretched in the light of the fact that it investigates 20 other organisations.

We say to the Secretary of State that, when it comes to the triple lock of sustaining confidence in law, order and justice, he should not go down the road of the primacy of MI5; he should revisit his protocol on restorative justice and, fundamentally, revisit the Glenties approach to policing.

I would like to make two comments about the Irish Government. Today, I ask the Irish Government not to wait a single week longer to help to fund the police college recommended by the Patten Report. Patten offered a range of reasons why the Irish Government should sign up to that. There could be joint training, joint planning and joint investigation — enough reasons for a multimillion-euro injection of Irish Government funds into a police college in the North of Ireland. I urge them, as this decision comes before the Minister, not to wait a week longer in making a commitment to the training of police on the island of Ireland.

There are wider reasons that the Irish Government should do that. They are involved in a wide range of reconstruction projects in conflict areas around the world, including Sierra Leone and Liberia. The British Government are also involved in such projects. The police college in the North can become an international centre for training. The British and Irish Governments' efforts to reconstruct societies that are emerging from conflict can enable the police services from those societies to come to this part of Ireland and share in the best training facility in Europe.

My third point relates to Sinn Féin. In one way, I agree with Ian Paisley; I anticipate that after 24 November 2006 and before 17 March 2007, for reasons of a political bounce before St Patrick's Day and an electoral bounce before the Dáil elections next June, Sinn Féin will convene a special Ard-Fheis. There will be a hullabaloo about that: Blair will have kittens about it, people will get excited about it, and Adams will deliver that Ard-Fheis. However, he will deliver it to the proposition outlined by the Secretary of State at Glenties.

He will deliver the Ard-Fheis to the point of the republican movement having a relationship with the police on the ground, when it wants it, where it wants it and on the terms that it wants it. That is what the republican strategy is going to be, and if it is not done at an Ard-Fheis, it will be done at some other event, manufactured and engineered for the sole purpose of a political and electoral bounce, rather than the compelling purpose of properly signing up to policing.

I warn the British Government, and the Prime Minister in particular, that he is particularly vulnerable to that approach at this time, given that he is interested in his legacy rather than in the right approach for this part of Ireland when it comes to the police.

I wish to say a few words to the DUP before I conclude. On some issues, when it comes to law, order and justice, I am on the same page as some elements of the DUP, if that page means the right approach to policing, the acceptance of the rule of law, and lawful authority.

However, I want to advise the DUP that, although we may share some issues and even have a few places of common concern, there is little sense that the DUP is serious about sharing power with the nationalist community. Nationalists understood why the SDLP went into this Assembly and participated fully in the Committee on the Preparation for Government. They understood that it was necessary for democratic culture and was needed in order to scope out political problems; they understood that it was necessary to look for some tentative agreement around a handful of issues.

The mainstream nationalists that we represent do not see any evidence or proof that the DUP is up for shared institutions. On behalf of that mainstream nationalism, the SDLP has challenged Sinn Féin, both in its absence and its presence, to sign up to the policing arrangements in this part of the world and to share responsibility for policing. However, there is another challenge that, in the run-up to the October negotiations and the 24 November deadline, the DUP still fails to live up to: the responsibility of sharing power with nationalists in this Assembly.

Madam Speaker: Members, this will be the first occasion on which the Assembly has heard from Mrs Long. It is her maiden speech, and Members will know the convention that such a speech is heard without interruption.

Mrs Long: Madam Speaker, I hope that you have not given me too much of a build-up, for I fear that I may not live up to it.

I want to associate myself with the comments made by my fellow members of the Committee on the Preparation for Government. I especially thank the Deputy Speakers, Mr Wells and Mr Molloy, who chaired and managed our discussions so effectively over the summer. I also thank the staff, who managed to extract a coherent and comprehensive report from the fog of those discussions.

Other members of my party will speak later about the definition of ceasefires, community restorative justice and fifty-fifty recruitment, among other issues. I want to begin my own contribution at the fundamental starting point for any discussion of policing and justice, which is the rule of law.

We must strive to ensure that we build our society, and the structures that govern it, on the foundation of democracy, human rights and the rule of law. Those values are intertwined; none can survive without the others. If we are to make progress on policing and justice issues, we must start by building a culture of lawfulness where the dominant or mainstream thinking in society is sympathetic to, and consistent with, the rule of law. By doing that, we prevent crimes and other violations of the law, as people have a common understanding of the role that they can play in creating a lawful society by addressing their own behaviour and by actively working with the appropriate authorities to stop the lawless behaviour of those around them. In such a culture, most people act in a manner that is consistent with the law, because they expect others to behave similarly. Crucial to that is the need for the state and its institutions to act — and to be seen to act — in a lawful and impartial manner.

The alternative to a culture of lawfulness is a culture of lawlessness, where might equals right and the strong exploit the weak. While such a culture prevails, we cannot build a fair, equitable and just society. Northern Ireland suffers from a range of threats to the rule of law, including the continued threat of terrorist violence; the continued activities of paramilitaries and, in particular, their efforts to perpetuate social control over large areas of Northern Ireland; high levels of organised crime; and the highest rate of recorded hate crimes in the United Kingdom. Those threats have huge economic, social and personal costs for our community.

In far too many ways, the state and its agencies contribute to that situation through accepting that the local strongmen are the legitimate voices of communities and allowing them to broker what does or does not happen in certain areas. Often it seems expedient to cut deals and accommodations in such a situation rather than tackle it head on. What may seem to be a short-term gain often exacerbates the problem further.

Similarly, it is often the perception in the community that there is selectivity in how the law is enforced. Too often, it seems that those who engage in mass public disorder, or act with paramilitary muscle, or use implied threats, are only to be managed by the state rather than addressed properly. Such perceived impunity is a threat to the rule of law and undermines public confidence in it. There must be a wider debate on how, as a society, we can adequately ensure that the rule of law is not only upheld but is seen to be upheld. There must be a concerted plan to address paramilitarism rather than pander to it.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Jim Wells] in the Chair)

The Alliance Party believes that the recommendations of the Patten Commission represented a fair and realistic set of proposals for the creation of a single, professional police service for all the people of Northern Ireland. We recognise also that the proposals have, largely, been implemented. Those who allege that the Patten Report has not been implemented are often very vague on the detail.

Furthermore, the Northern Ireland Policing Board has been one of the few institutional success stories of the agreement. In fact, it is a good illustration of how bodies that are established on an integrative principle can make a successful contribution to positive change in a deeply divided society. The Alliance Party takes the firm view that the Patten Report should be the conclusion of major policing reform. Accordingly, there are no grounds to open a wider debate on policing.

However, the Alliance Party recognises that, since the Patten Report was written in 1999, significant changes in best practice for policing have occurred, and it is appropriate for those to be taken on board. The biggest difficulty is the failure of all parties to recognise fully the legitimacy of the police and to give their full support to the rule of law. Even though such a situation has existed in previous Executives, it has become increasingly clear that, in the medium term, it is not sustainable for any party to be part of Government, with responsibilities for upholding the rule of law, while not supporting the Police Service.

If the suspended institutions of the agreement are to be restored in the near future, it is critical that they are placed on a durable and sustainable footing. A key element of achieving that is to ensure that all parties that would, potentially, be in Government support fully policing structures and the rule of law. To date, much of that need has been distilled into the simplistic demand for Sinn Féin to sign up to policing. However, what that entails has yet to be properly spelled out by the British and Irish Governments.

Although most attention might fall on the nature of Sinn Féin's commitment to policing and the rule of law, it raises questions for others who, while engaging or partially engaging in the structures of policing, are not consistent on the rule of law. It is important that both the British and Irish Governments define what is entailed in parties' signing up to policing in the coming weeks. To that end, the Alliance Party has designed five benchmarks to assess parties' commitment to policing.

First, are the representatives of the parties engaging with the PSNI in a regular, consistent and constructive manner, both locally and centrally? Secondly, are parties prepared to recognise the PSNI as the sole legitimate policing agency in Northern Ireland, and to promote such a view in their communities? Thirdly, are parties prepared to take the seats that they are entitled to on the Policing Board and on the district policing partnerships (DPPs)? Fourthly, are Ministers prepared to take a revised Pledge of Office, containing a specific commitment to upholding and promoting the rule of law in a fair and consistent manner? Finally, are parties prepared to co-operate with the lawful authorities to address so-called individual acts of criminality that arise from any paramilitary organisation with which they may be, or may have been, associated?

The devolution of policing and criminal justice powers needs to be handled with great sensitivity, as it goes straight to the heart of people's sense of security. More than any other aspect of current or potential devolved responsibilities, the conduct and control of policing has been at the heart of the political disputes and conflicts that have afflicted Northern Ireland. Although there is little public discussion on the matter, that should not be mistaken for a lack of interest. Fear and tension, with the associated political repercussions, could easily build in the face of the imminent implementation of decisions.

Most of that fear may be based on a Sinn Féin Minister taking responsibility for policing and justice not long after the end of the IRA campaign of violence, and in the face of continuing republican criminality and ambiguity on the rule of law.

11.30 am

In other quarters, however, there will be concern over a unionist taking control of that Ministry, given the legacy of historical abuse of power in the 1921-72 Stormont regime, and the failure of unionist politicians in more recent times to demonstrate unambiguous commitment to the rule of law, primarily in relation to public order problems surrounding contentious parades.

In the worst-case scenario, a politicised Minister for justice or policing could seek to influence the operational decisions of the police — a situation that would, rightly, concern the public. Those fears can only be ameliorated by parties making the commitments that we have already outlined within the appropriate institutional structures. Notwithstanding such problems, the Alliance Party sees great potential in creating a sense of cross-community ownership of policing and criminal justice through the devolution of such powers to the Assembly. This party has been a consistent advocate of devolution in that area.

With regard to structures, the devolution of those powers to a Department that is part of a power-sharing Executive must go hand in hand with significant changes in the mechanisms for accountability and collective responsibility within that Executive. At present, the Executive structures in the Assembly are inadequate. There are few incentives for moderation and accommodation. Instead, once posts are allocated, Ministers have considerable discretion to take decisions within their own area of responsibility with little or no reference to their ministerial colleagues or to the Assembly overall. Although that situation is problematic with most portfolios, it could be disastrous in relation to policing and criminal justice. Structures must be put in place that recognise and facilitate the genuine interest in, and concern about, those issues, right across the community.

The Alliance Party does not believe that any of the structures offered in the joint declaration would provide an ideal way forward. In the absence of collective responsibility, the criminal justice and policing functions are far too politically sensitive to be given to one particular party through one Minister heading up a single Department. The Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister (OFMDFM) structure, either in its current form or in a replica for these particular functions, has proven to be far too unwieldy. Although there are international examples of policing and criminal justice functions being split between two Departments, this model could cause substantial confusion, on top of the split between the powers devolved to the Assembly and those retained by Westminster. In any event, even though powers would be distributed, the same problems of lack of accountability and collective decision-making would remain.

By contrast, the dangers of placing those functions within a single Department for justice would be substantially mitigated if that Department were part of an Executive working on the basis of collective responsibility. The Minister in question would be allocated his or her portfolio as part of inter-party negotiations, serve with the confidence of the Assembly and operate to collective responsibility, and could be removed from office — either with or without the collapse of the entire Executive — in the event of a major breach of faith.

The timing of the devolution of policing and criminal justice powers should primarily be determined by the correct conditions existing in society, not by an arbitrary timetable. Nevertheless, we can accept a target of two years from the restoration of political institutions for the transfer of such powers. Such a target was referred to in the comprehensive agreement and reflects my party's position on the matter. That is different from a firm timetable. The two years would allow the institutions to be tested through two marching seasons, irrespective of the starting point.

The Alliance Party supports the Secretary of State's assuming enabling powers with respect to eventual devolution, but that should happen after the parties reach agreement on the modalities of devolution, rather than before. Before powers are devolved, we recommend that a triple lock be put in place: first, and most crucially, a cross-community vote should be required in the Assembly; secondly, there must be a certification by the Secretary of State that the conditions are appropriate; and, thirdly, there needs to be an affirmative vote in Parliament. We note that in comments made in the House of Commons during the Second Reading of the Northern Ireland (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill, Government Ministers outlined such a triple lock. In practice, however, it is a quadruple lock as the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister will be required to table any motion in the Assembly to support devolution.

The Alliance Party is generally content with the proposed policing and criminal justice powers to be transferred to the Northern Ireland Administration as set out in the Northern Ireland Office publication, ‘Devolving Policing and Justice in Northern Ireland: A Discussion Paper’. However, there is an additional need for checks and balances to prevent a Minister, through either direct or indirect pressure, from influencing operational decisions. That could be addressed through the ministerial code of conduct or the Pledge of Office. We recognise the need for powers to be retained and exercised at national level and regard the list of those to be transferred as fairly expansive.

There is some concern at the lack of accountability in how UK-wide structures relate to Northern Ireland. Part of the solution lies with a more general reform of the UK structures for tackling terrorism, defending national security, dealing with organised crime and addressing other policing issues.

Another related problem is the perception that there are different approaches and responsibilities for continued republican and loyalist terrorism, with the former being addressed at a UK level and the latter at a Northern Ireland level, based on the rationale that only the former is a threat to national security. The Alliance Party has major concerns about that differentiation.

Part of the problem lies in the traditional view of terrorism; in practice, the organisations involved have diversified into a wider range of paramilitary and organised criminal activity. The definition and parameters of the concept of terrorism must be restored, and the wider threat to democracy and the rule of law that is posed by paramilitary and organised crime needs to be better understood.

I call on Members to endorse the report and the work undertaken by the Committee on the Preparation for Government. I also call on all the parties of the Assembly, both those present today and, importantly, the party that is absent, to redouble their efforts to create conditions where a common understanding of, and support for, the rule of law can underpin the political process to the benefit of our entire community.

Mr Weir: I associate myself with the earlier remarks thanking the Committee staff for their hard work over the summer, and also with your remarks, Mr Deputy Speaker, congratulating our colleague Arlene Foster on the birth of her third child.

Before turning to the substance of my speech, I want to deal with two issues raised by Members who have already spoken. It is unfortunate that Mr Attwood has left the Chamber. He seemed to be labouring under a degree of confusion today, challenging the DUP by saying that it is not prepared to share power with nationalists. Let me deal with that confusion.

Some time ago, my party made an offer to the other constitutional parties, and the SDLP in particular, to let go of the hand of Sinn Féin and join us, and other constitutional parties, in a voluntary coalition. Today, and with respect to my party leader, I reissue that invitation. If the SDLP wants to test the DUP’s bonafides on sharing power with nationalists, it should take up that offer. There could be a voluntary coalition tomorrow morning, with democrats running Northern Ireland. The ball is in the SDLP’s court.

Mrs D Kelly: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. That is not the experience of nationalists in many councils throughout the North. One need only look at Lisburn City Council.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, Mrs Kelly; that is not a point of order.

Mr Weir: I turn now to the remarks — indeed, the lecture — of the second Member to speak in this debate, Mr McFarland. Perhaps he is now the script-writer of ‘Zorba the Greek’. I am here not to meet his eyes across a crowded table as in some latter-day love story, but rather to respond to his lecturing of the DUP on its record on policing and justice.

If I were to take a leaf out of Mr McFarland’s book, I could probably spend the next 13 minutes of my speech dealing with the record of the Ulster Unionist Party on that subject. I could deal with the fact that the origins of the proposals for fifty-fifty recruitment to the PSNI do not lie with Mr Patten; the original progenitor was a certain Mr Kenneth Maginnis MP. I could deal with the fact that the Patten Commission led to the destruction of the RUC, at a time when Mr Trimble was giving assurances that Ken Maginnis and Cecil Walker had saved the RUC.

Mr Kennedy: I congratulate the Member on his excellent memory. Can I perhaps bring him a little closer to the present? I ask him whether he agrees with his party colleague the Member for East Londonderry, who is unfortunately not present in the Chamber, that people who are repentant can, in some shape or form, join the police? That is more relevant and more topical. Mr Weir might advise his colleague to go down the same line as the Pope, who has recently apologised to everybody — although that raises the question of what has happened to papal infallibility.

Mr Weir: I do not intend to drag sectarian issues into this debate.

The DUP has made it clear that it does not support, and has never supported, terrorists joining the police or getting into Government. In order to repent, people must remember what they did. It was not Gregory Campbell who destroyed the RUC; it was the Ulster Unionist Party. It was not Gregory Campbell who put terrorists in Government who not only had not decommissioned a single weapon but who did not support the police. In relation to the issue of justice, it was not Gregory Campbell who helped to open up the jails, allowing the vilest criminals in western Europe out onto the streets.

Mr Kennedy: Which party was the Member in at that time?

Mr Weir: My views on this issue have been entirely consistent. However, let me, in a spirit of generosity, welcome the repentance of the Ulster Unionist Party, which today has adopted the DUP position that 24 November is not a sacrosanct deadline. Rather, that date is only applicable if people are committed not only to ending terrorism and criminality but have signed up to supporting the rule of law and policing. I welcome that party's conversion to the DUP position because, for many years, that was not its position.

I want to discuss the report on law-and-order issues. At least my introductory remarks have been slightly shorter than the opening contribution from the Ulster Unionist Party. In preparing for Government, and identifying obstacles to Government, it is commonly agreed that law and order is the most important issue. I attended a number of meetings of the economic challenges subgroup, where most issues gained consensus. However, it will come as no surprise to hear that, on the PFG Committee that dealt with law-and-order issues, agreement was not reached on a wide range of issues, the reason being that many of those issues go to the very heart of how we should proceed in Northern Ireland and, indeed, demonstrate why we currently have no Government.

I want to deal with three issues from the report. Mr McFarland referred to the fact that the DUP position on the devolution of policing and justice powers is that they should be devolved as soon as possible. He threw up that fact as if it were a revelation. In fact, the DUP took that position on the Committee.

Where Mr McFarland has gone wrong is that he has misread the comprehensive agreement. We should not be surprised to learn that, given that he also misread the Belfast Agreement in 1998. The key point is that the conditions must be right before policing and justice powers are devolved. That is why, when proposals were put forward regarding a time frame for the devolution of those powers, the DUP said no. The DUP wants the people of Northern Ireland to have maximum powers but only if the system is run by democrats. It must be recognised — and at least it was recognised in 1998 — that there must be a higher level of public confidence in the devolution of policing and justice powers than in the devolution of any other powers. At this stage, there is not enough public confidence for policing and justice to be devolved. We must wait until the conditions are right.

Mr Attwood has already mentioned restorative justice, which is an important issue that was examined in great detail by the Committee. There are two key points about restorative justice. In the same way that there cannot be two-tier policing in Northern Ireland, there cannot be two-tier restorative justice. Groups that do not co-operate with the police cannot be put on an equal footing with groups that do co-operate. Everyone must sign up to precisely the same protocols. Government cannot ease the way for those who do not support policing by trying to use restorative justice as an alternative, back-door form of policing.

11.45 am

Page 311 of the report lists the proposals that were not agreed by the Committee.

A number of parties raised concerns in Committee about the present protocols. Unlike other aspects of policing here, restorative justice does not appear to have an accountability framework in place that would enable it to be scrutinised. The protocols seem to provide a loophole that allows criminality to be covered but not antisocial behaviour. All who are involved in restorative justice will say that cases of antisocial behaviour make up about 80% or 90% of their work. We cannot have the primacy of the police being undermined. Above all, the police should be responsible for vetting anyone working in restorative justice schemes.

Four out of the five parties on the PFG Committee were able to agree all the propositions that are outlined in more detail on page 311 of the report, should Members wish to read them. However, our voting system allows parties a veto, and the party that vetoed those proposals was Sinn Féin. It is clear throughout the report, not simply on restorative justice issues, that the flaw that lies at the heart of this matter is that Sinn Féin has a fundamentally different view of the rule of law. Indeed, it lacks an acceptance of the rule of law, and that makes Sinn Féin fundamentally different from the democrats in the Chamber.

That goes to the heart of the problem. We cannot have two-tier policing or two-tier support for policing. I join others in expressing concern about the Secretary of State's Glenties speech. Sinn Féin cannot just mumble a few words and, at some Ard-Fheis, sign up to a particular line that the Secretary of State has put out. Indeed, we cannot have Sinn Féin signing up to anything that falls short of full support for policing.

Mr Robert McCartney: Does the Member recall that Sinn Féin played exactly the same card with the Mitchell principles? Its alter ego, the IRA, then ran a coach and horses through them.

Mr Weir: Yes, and we should all benefit from our experience of what happened.

No half measures on policing are acceptable. There must either be full support for the rule of law, or nothing. As other Members have said, that should not only entail support for the institutions of the rule of law, such as the Policing Board. People could join the Policing Board tomorrow yet not support the police. Sinn Féin must recognise the police and co-operate with them. It must encourage people to provide information on crime, and, by saying that it is a worthwhile occupation, it must encourage young people, from the nationalist community in particular, to join the police.

Sinn Féin is a long way behind the rest of its community on policing. Many brave young men and women from the nationalist community have joined the police force, and there is a gradual acceptance of the police in the nationalist community. Sinn Féin's mindset is lacking, and there is no greater illustration of that than what we saw at the weekend in New Lodge, where 11 police officers were injured simply for making an arrest.

As one would expect in a riot-type situation, the local representative, who happened to be a Sinn Féin councillor, was interviewed afterwards. What were her conclusions? Did she condemn the rioters? No. She complained that the police had been provocative and heavy-handed. Presumably, they were being heavy-handed when they put their shields in the way of missiles. Presumably, the way in which they headbutted the missiles that were being thrown at them was provocative. When faced with a choice between the lawless and the law enforcers, Sinn Féin still consistently comes down on the side of the lawless. The fundamental challenge for Sinn Féin is to cross that Rubicon. As my colleagues have made clear, that is a fundamental prerequisite to the establishment of any Government of which Sinn Féin hopes to be a part.

At yesterday's meeting of the PFG Committee, my colleagues asked the Secretary of State whether he would accept Ministers of the realm who did not support the rule of law anywhere else in the United Kingdom, and it was clear that that would not be tolerated in any other jurisdiction. If a junior Minister in Tony Blair's Administration spoke in defence of rioters over the police, he would be out of office that day.

Similarly, in the Republic of Ireland, Michael McDowell or Bertie Ahern would not tolerate any Minister taking that sort of line. That is a fundamental point. We were told yesterday that we could not wait for perfection. Let me make it clear: to seek support for the rule of law and policing institutions is not to seek perfection; it is to seek the bare minimum that any democracy requires. It is a reasonable position, and without that bare minimum the DUP will not be moving forward to any Government that involves Sinn Féin. Sinn Féin must sign up in totality to policing.

The report highlights repeatedly, on a range of issues, the gulf between Sinn Féin and the other constitutional parties. That shows how far Sinn Féin has yet to go. Whether it is on 24 November or any other date, unless Sinn Féin signs up to the rule of law and policing, there will be no place for it in the Government of Northern Ireland. I commend the report.

Mr Cobain: I want to address the issue of restorative justice, which is included in the report.

Restorative justice, as a concept, can be of tremendous assistance to the police in large working-class areas across the United Kingdom, in which antisocial behaviour restricts the quality of life for many, and traditional policing is often seen as ineffective.

This matter was recognised by the Prime Minister himself in his Respect Action Plan launch speech in January of this year, when he said:

"spitting at an old lady on her way to the shops is and has always been a crime; graffiti is a crime and always has been. Petty vandalism, the same."

He continued:

"In theory, in each case the police charge, the prosecutor prosecutes and the court decides."

However, he added:

"Except that, in practice, it's not what happens. In practice, the person who spits at the old lady is not prosecuted because to do so takes many police hours, much resource, and if all of that is overcome, the outcome is a fine."

That is how the Prime Minister summarised the challenge posed by antisocial behaviour in communities across the United Kingdom. It is a reminder that alongside the headline crime stories is a harsh reality of vandalism, abusive and loutish behaviour and other antisocial behaviour, which mars the lives of individuals, families and entire communities.

Restorative justice offers an effective alternative to the status quo, which, as the Prime Minister said, can at best result in a fine. Too often victims and local communities can be left asking what exactly the system has done to make them feel more secure. In Northern Ireland, the situation is made worse by the presence and activities of paramilitaries. The beatings and shootings carried out by paramilitaries in response to antisocial behaviour can only further intimidate communities, reminding them that the rule of law does not apply to their locality.

How does restorative justice offer an alternative to the status quo of a hard-pressed policing and judicial system and to the rule of fear imposed by paramilitaries? Restorative justice seeks to change the behaviour of offenders. In other words, it seeks to end antisocial behaviour rather than merely impose fines.

I am aware that people across the community have voiced genuine concerns about community restorative justice. Some fear it will legitimise paramilitary justice; others fear that it will become an alternative policing service. To allay such fears, the Government have prepared draft protocols dealing with restorative justice, which are currently out for consultation.

The UUP position has always been that the restorative justice concept is valuable, but it must be done right and policing must be central to the entire process. My colleagues and I were relieved when, in July, Minister of State David Hanson recognised that:

“the centrality of the police to the way in which schemes operate is non-negotiable.”

The UUP believes that as an integral part of the restorative justice system, all organisations wishing to participate must give unqualified acceptance to the role of the Police Service within the criminal justice system of which CRJ schemes will become a part.

When the draft restorative justice guidelines were published in December 2005, I said that the Government’s proposals contained numerous grey areas and loopholes and that it was a loose system that practically invited manipulation. That was implicitly acknowledged in July when the Minister himself accepted that the first draft guidelines were not sufficiently robust to command public confidence.

In March, the Northern Ireland Policing Board published its detailed response to the consultation on the Northern Ireland Office draft guidelines on community-based restorative justice schemes. One of the main aspects of the first draft guidelines was that offences could be reported through a third party, bypassing the police. That is completely unacceptable. The Ulster Unionist Party is in no doubt that confidence in the system could be adversely affected if any participating organisations, endorsed by the Government, did not acknowledge the legitimacy of one of the scheme’s key partners, namely the police.

For that, and other reasons, the Ulster Unionist Party considers the Northern Ireland draft guidelines unacceptable and wishes new guidelines to be drafted. The party has also asked for a clear definition of the types of low-level crime with which the community-based restorative justice schemes would deal. Although the UUP welcomes the need for adherence to robust international standards, it believes that overall responsibility for ensuring that the schemes are held to account should be given to an oversight body and that a new organisation be established for that purpose.

My party also found it unacceptable that any complaint made by a victim of crime involved in the community-based restorative justice process would, under the current draft guidelines, be referred back to the same scheme about which they complained. The UUP believes that a truly independent external complaints system must be established. We also demand that the scheme operate to the highest human rights standards and that robust human resources and training management systems are in place to enable schemes to recruit, train and access their staff.

Northern Ireland Alternatives is an organisation that is active in the restorative justice field within certain working-class unionist areas. It operates in north Belfast, the greater Shankill area, east Belfast and north Down. Northern Ireland Alternatives found that there is a desire in working-class communities for an effective system for addressing crime, other than the paramilitary system. Its annual report published in December 2005 indicated what could be achieved when such schemes are properly operated and resourced.

The report stated that the recruitment of new staff enabled the areas where Northern Ireland Alternatives operates to become much more rooted at local level, enabling the prevention of many punishment attacks. The organisation works intensively with young people, and each group has intervened in approximately 20 cases.

In total, Northern Ireland Alternatives has prevented approximately 80 young people from being beaten, shot or exiled by local paramilitary organisations. Furthermore, those young people have been involved in intensive personal work, which has helped to change their offending behaviour choices. They have also participated in restorative processes with their victims, resulting in £4,000 being paid back in restitution last year. In the year up to December 2005, Northern Ireland Alternatives said that its work had reduced the incidence of violent punishments for antisocial behaviour to almost zero in areas where it has a presence and that there had been a dramatic decrease in paramilitary violence in all those areas.

The Northern Ireland Alternatives central office has spent much time liaising with Lord Clyde and the Independent Monitoring Commission. The first IMC report was extremely negative towards community-based restorative justice initiatives. However, Northern Ireland Alternatives addressed that issue by meeting directly with the commissioners and inviting them to meet the young people and victims who had participated in the restorative process through its organisation. That helped the commissioners to change their opinion of the work, and the next two IMC reports were extremely positive, reflecting the shift in attitudes.

In the 12 months leading up to December 2005, Northern Ireland Alternatives were involved in the delivery of 25 training sessions and 120 presentations; it facilitated 43 workshops and participated in approximately 60 radio, television and student interviews. There is no doubt that Northern Ireland Alternatives represents a good example of best practice in this field, and I commend it and wish it every success.

As I said earlier, it should be obvious and self-evident that if restorative justice schemes were to offer a genuine way forward for communities facing both antisocial behaviour and paramilitarism, they must work in conjunction with, and have direct involvement with, the PSNI. That is why robust protocols are fundamental to wider communities having confidence in restorative justice schemes.

Crucially, referrals to any restorative justice scheme must be made from the Public Prosecution Service (PPS) or the PSNI.

12.00 noon

Accredited training for those involved in the schemes must be monitored, and an independent complaints procedure must be in place to protect those who are referred to the schemes and to ensure public confidence in their operation.

All of that is essential if restorative justice schemes are genuinely to help communities to overcome both antisocial behaviour and the legacy of paramilitarism. The schemes cannot exist in a shadowy parallel universe outside the rule of law. Acceptance of, and full co-operation with, policing and judicial structures must be the rule for all restorative justice schemes. Otherwise, the schemes would represent a backward step, condemning communities to more injustice and preventing the wider community from having confidence in the schemes.

The Government's continued failure to ensure significantly robust protocols has already undermined political and community confidence in restorative justice and has the potential to undermine the positive work done by groups such as Greater Shankill Alternatives. The Government's duty is to promote public confidence in restorative justice through the publication of robust protocols that demonstrate that restorative justice schemes have a positive role to play, alongside the police and the legal system, in addressing antisocial behaviour effectively. To date, the Government have failed in that duty.

Community restorative justice schemes have an important role to play. New, innovative schemes are needed to deal with the increasing levels of antisocial behaviour in some working-class areas. Community restorative justice schemes that are properly policed and which have all the appropriate protocols and safeguards in place offer a unique opportunity to address those issues for the benefit of all.

Mrs D Kelly: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker. I congratulate you and your Co-Chairman, who — much to his regret, I am sure — is absent today, for completing the report's journey. Once again, Members have been invited to speak to a report that is the result of many hours of hard work by MLAs from all parties and Assembly staff.

The report sets out many areas that require greater discussion on an all-inclusive party basis. However, as the Secretary of State acknowledged at yesterday's meeting of the Preparation for Government Committee dealing with law and order, there has been much more agreement than he ever thought possible. For example, all parties agreed that the institutions, the structures and the independence of the Policing Board and the DPPs should remain. They agreed further on one Department for policing and justice. During discussions, all parties expressed their desire that, to maximise confidence across the community, appropriate community safeguards be built into the functions of that Department.

Both Sinn Féin and the DUP said much about wanting the devolution of policing and justice to happen as soon as possible, but under certain conditions. In effect, each of those parties has agreed to give the other a mutual veto. The DUP has done that by saying that it will not agree to the devolution of policing and justice unless, and until, Sinn Féin signs up to policing, participates fully in its structures and works with the police at a local level. On the other hand, Sinn Féin says that it will not sign up to policing until it has been given a date. Indeed, not just any date: the date must come from no less than the DUP. The SDLP believes, however, that the devolution of policing and justice could happen on day one in week one of month one of the restoration of the Assembly.

What does the failure to agree mean for the restoration of the institutions of the Good Friday Agreement? Due to the never-ending and changing preconditions set by the DUP, which has stated publicly that it will not be pushed to commit to an agreement on 24 November, it could be up to 10 years before devolution is again possible, according to the Secretary of State yesterday.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Although I understand the political reasons for Mrs Kelly's wanting to attack the Democratic Unionist Party, as she is perfectly entitled to do, would the debate not be enhanced by nationalism's taking on the real impediments to progress: the Provisionals and their mouthpieces in Sinn Féin?

Mrs D Kelly: Mr Deputy Speaker, perhaps the Member could wait until the conclusion of my speech.

A failure to reach agreement will mean that British direct-rule Ministers will continue to make decisions about the future of our health and education services. It will mean the introduction of unfair water charges and increased rates. What will Sinn Féin do then about policing and about law and order, since the devolution of those matters can happen only on restoration of the Assembly and its institutions?

Sinn Féin waxes lyrical in the report about the sanctity of the Patten Report and about how its recommendations must be fully implemented. However, Sinn Féin conveniently ignores the fact that Patten envisaged that all parties would have signed up to policing from the outset. What holds Sinn Féin back? According to its representatives who are quoted in the report, the only barrier to its signing up to policing is a date.

Sinn Féin has overplayed its hand on policing. It is out of step not only with the SDLP but with the wider nationalist community, which is represented by organisations such as the Catholic Church and the Gaelic Athletic Association (GAA). Irish America now also supports the police here. Indeed, there has been a recent seismic change in the attitude of Fr Seán McManus, who described the senior officers whom he met at Garnerville Police College as “fine, decent men”.

What does Sinn Féin’s intransigence mean for nationalists and for the wider community? It has not prevented young Catholic men and women from joining the PSNI, because applications have already exceeded Patten’s expectations. However, I acknowledge that young people from republican areas face much greater difficulties. Sinn Féin’s lack of moral courage and its political self-interest mean that many people who live in nationalist and republican areas are denied a police service that seeks to prevent and detect crime and to ensure greater community safety. People who live in those areas are forced to suffer antisocial behaviour, vandalism and much more serious crime, such as rape, in silence.

Sinn Féin’s continued failure to support the PSNI — despite reports from the Oversight Commissioner that state that the PSNI meets the highest standards of any police service in Europe, with human rights at its very core — and its failure to deliver on policing, have meant that, far from creating an “Ireland of equals”, many people who live in nationalist and republican areas live under the jackboot of an alternative police force.

An incident happened in my constituency less than two weeks ago. A group of young girls and boys was sitting in an open space in one of the housing areas of north Lurgan. A white van approached them. Out of the back of the van emerged not the A-Team but eight to 10 brave and strong men, who jumped out and scattered the young people. A 15-year-old girl was hit in the stomach with a crowbar. That is not what one expects in an Ireland of equals. Recently, a brutal and callous attack on an 18-year-old man in west Belfast resulted in part of his leg being amputated.

Is that what Sinn Féin means by safeguarding the rights of the child and preventing human rights abuses? Mr Deputy Speaker, that type of behaviour is not acceptable in any democratic society. The failure of Sinn Féin and the DUP to show leadership and to agree to restore all the institutions condemns countless people, young and old, to a life of fear and allows that type of behaviour to endure.

Mr Robert McCartney: I want to say at the outset that those Committee members who formulated the report, Mr Weir and Mr Attwood, must be highly commended for the detail and the principles that they have so clearly stated in this debate. It is sad that Mr Weir’s invitation to Mr Attwood and other SDLP Members to join a power-sharing Executive of unionists and nationalists is still unavailed of.

The DUP states with force and conviction that a democratic society cannot have in its governing body those who do not subscribe to the most fundamental principles of democracy, namely the rule of law and those lawfully appointed for its implementation. That is at the core of the debate.

(Madam Speaker in the Chair)

On Sunday, I listened to Minister of State David Hanson, who, with a robotic and Dalek-like delivery, stated that 24 November is the cut-off point, as a consequence of the refusal of democratic parties — I believe that the UUP shares the DUP’s view — to enter into an enforced power-sharing arrangement with a party that refuses to acknowledge, accept or implement the most fundamental principles of any democratic state.

I am disappointed that the SDLP has assumed the role of saying, “A plague o’ both your houses!” — those of the DUP and Sinn Féin — in an ostensible attempt to be fair. However, there is no comparison between their respective positions. Therefore when we deal with the rule of law and support for the police, we should be mindful of the British Government’s orchestration, at all levels, to produce a situation that, as Peter Weir, Dr Paisley and others have emphasised, would not be tolerated in the democratic institutions of the United Kingdom or the Republic of Ireland. Neither Government would tolerate Members who would not commit fully to the rule of law and its implementation. That is fundamental.

Some months ago, I spoke to Mr Hanson about restorative justice. He said that regulations and protocols would be put in place to control the concept of restorative justice. He seemed so confident that those would be effective that I told him that he should remember that he was not putting in place regulations to control beet-growing in Norfolk. This is a much more fundamental situation. Loyalist paramilitaries in north Belfast or republican paramilitaries in west Belfast will flout those regulations by setting up counter-law-enforcement agencies.

It is all very well to say that some people want to deal with young people, particularly those who are involved in antisocial behaviour, but the truth of the matter is that Sinn Féin/IRA has retained firearms. The Independent Monitoring Commission now tells us that it is good that the IRA retains its control and command structure, because it will push that organisation along the democratic process. When I read the most recent report of the IMC, paragraph 3.5 about the IRA stood out:

“The leadership is opposed to the use of violence in community control”.

There is scarce evidence that that is the case. The report continues to say that the IRA:

“has taken a stance against criminality and disorder amongst the membership, and has been engaged in successful dialogue to prevent violence during the 2006 parades season. Senior members are taking on roles in Sinn Féin and are encouraging other members to do the same or to engage in community work.”

What is new about that? For the past 30 years, senior members of Sinn Féin have been graduates of the IRA school of democracy. Is the suggestion implicit in that paragraph that the IRA needs to retain its control and command structure to ensure that its members conform to the leadership’s policy? How is that to be done? How will that be enforced? Are the Government and the IMC saying that they will condone whatever methods — including the covert use of violence — the command and control structure of the IRA deems sufficient to ensure that the political progress of Sinn Féin continues along the adopted path?

12.15 pm

Ten or 15 years ago, members of the hierarchy said that they were confident that the IRA command structure would exercise sufficient control to ensure that the IRA ceasefire was not broken. They were appalled at any suggestion that the command structure would ensure its magnificent control by the use or threat of violence. However, in its most recent report, the IMC is apparently saying that we should not probe too deeply into that control and that we should accept the assurance that the control and command structure is required — by whatever means the IRA command considers necessary — to ensure the continuation of the political progress of the party that is inextricably bound to the IRA.

After reading that section, I was interested to see the reiteration of the IMC’s guiding principles in annex II of the report:

“The law can be legitimately enforced only by duly appointed and accountable law enforcement officers or institutions. Any other forcible imposition of standards is unlawful and undemocratic.”

However, the implicit thrust of allowing the control and command structures of the IRA to remain appears to be the antithesis of that lofty aspiration.

The IMC’s guiding principles continue:

“Political parties in a democratic and peaceful society, and all those working in them, must not in any way benefit from, or be associated with, illegal activity of any kind, whether involving violence or the threat of it, or crime of any kind, or the proceeds of crime. It is incumbent on all those engaged in democratic politics to ensure that their activities are untainted in any of these ways.

It is not acceptable for any political party, and in particular for the leadership, to express commitment to democratic politics and the rule of law if they do not live up to those statements and do all in their power to ensure that those they are in a position to influence do the same.”

However, the Secretary of State, in his Glenties speech, and on other occasions, said that it is enough if some nominal commitment to support for the police is granted at community level. The real position is that the British Government, whether to ensure some sort of historical legacy for the present incumbent of the office of Prime Minister or to get rid of Northern Ireland as a problem, are willing to do a deal with Sinn Féin that they would not contemplate doing in their own backyard.

Therefore it is incumbent on the SDLP to say that it agrees not just with some of what the DUP advocates: the SDLP must go right to the heart of the democratic process in so far as it relates to the rule of law and its implementation and say that, all things considered, the DUP got it right and that it supports that party.

If the SDLP does not do that, it risks bringing into the core of the democratic process a canker that will eventually destroy that process — despite the outward manifestations of reasonableness by people such as Mr Martin McGuinness or Mr Gerry Adams and despite their voyages to the Basque region and Palestine to give others lessons in democracy. It must be made perfectly clear to both Governments that the democrats of Northern Ireland will not tolerate any form of enforced Government that does not conform to the most basic principles of democracy as they are recognised throughout the civilised world.

When I look at events in Baghdad and Afghanistan — suicide bombers and car bombers — and look at the fountain and origin of most of those tactics and strategies, I come back to Sinn Féin/IRA, in all its manifestations. It has given lessons in terror to the world and shown how a minority of a minority can utilise terror to bring forth benefits for that minority and distort democracy in a place where democracy and the principles of democracy apply. Terror can raise Mr McGuinness to a point at which he can sit and nod with the benign gravitas of some sort of statesman; terror can elevate these people to the status of world figures.

The British Government have been responsible for that over the past 30 years. Unless the democrats of Northern Ireland, and the parties that represent them, show strength and courage, the final fruits of that terror, those tactics and that strategy will be delivered to those who have perpetrated violence, bloodshed, terror, murder and mayhem in Northern Ireland.

I endorse the Committee’s report.

Madam Speaker: Members will know that the Business Committee has arranged to meet at lunch time today. I propose therefore, by leave of the Assembly, to suspend the sitting until 2.00 pm.

The sitting was suspended at 12.23 pm.

On resuming (Madam Speaker in the Chair) —
2.00 pm

Lord Morrow: I congratulate my party colleague Mrs Foster on the birth of a son yesterday. I am sure that the House will join me in wishing her and the baby every success. I am glad to say that mother and baby are doing well. I expect to see Mrs Foster back in the House in the near future.

As a member of the Committee on the Preparation for Government, I thank all those who laboured so hard over the summer to bring about the report. It is a large report, and it took much time, effort and conscientious work, not only by MLAs, but by staff, to produce it. It is right that Members show their appreciation of their efforts.

Today's debate provides Members with an opportunity to discuss one of the most important issues for any society, and, in respect of law and order, Northern Ireland is no different to any other society. It has had to endure 35 years of unmitigated, relentless sectarian terror. It is now, or is on the verge of becoming, a mafia-run or lawless state. Those are not my thoughts. They are the thoughts of a prominent senior police officer, who warned that that is the direction in which Northern Ireland could drift.

Recent remarks made by NIO Ministers lead me to expect them to offer Northern Ireland less than the best. The DUP will not accept less than the best. It will not accept second best for law and order. Ministers should be getting that message loud and clear. I would be amazed to find that they have not got it already, but sometimes they are hard of hearing, and we have to keep repeating ourselves. However, I can tell them in clear and unambiguous terms that there will be no fudge on law and order.

Since the signing of the pernicious Belfast Agreement, with all its ramifications and fudges, and the subsequent emasculation of the police, Northern Ireland has been left at the mercy of the thugs, hoods and corner boys.

The Patten proposals, which were the son of the agreement, left Northern Ireland in a state of disarray. Not only did they create a police force that seems unable to cope, but they introduced legislation to enforce fifty-fifty recruitment. Could those Members who do not sit on the unionist Benches, and who are not part of the unionist community, put their feet in our shoes and understand how we feel about legislation that discriminates against members of our community joining the police? Alas, that legislation came out of the Belfast Agreement.

Mr A Maginness: The Patten Report advocated fifty-fifty recruitment to create a balanced police service, in which both sides of the community — Catholic and Protestant — would be reflected fairly.

That was clearly not the case in the RUC. Can Lord Morrow suggest an alternative method to that proposed in the Patten Report, which would enable that very necessary balancing act?

Lord Morrow: I heard what Mr Maginness said, but I refer him back to the merit principle, for which there is no substitute.

After all, how did the imbalance in the RUC come about? It came about when nationalists or Catholics wishing to join the RUC were intimidated by the thugs that I have already mentioned. Unfortunately, those thugs are still on the loose today. I say to Mr Maginness that as far as I am concerned, Catholics are welcome in the police force, and they should take up their places. If legislation were put in place that discriminated against Mr Maginness's community, in whatever sphere of life, he would speak against it, and rightly so.

Sinn Féin has decided not to be here today to debate the issues. It is strange that having been involved in the preparation of the report, when it comes to debating matters in the Assembly, that party is far away. There must be a reason for that, and it is that Sinn Féin does not want the spotlight turned on it, because it would be exposed as anything but democratic. Sinn Féin demands to be a part of Government. Indeed, it claims that the policing portfolio in any future Administration should be its own. That would be the equivalent of putting the fox in charge of the chicken coop. I cannot think of anything worse.

Sinn Féin's ambivalence is costing its own community dear. Its refusal to assist the police in establishing law and order in areas such as west Belfast, south Armagh and many other places across Northern Ireland is nothing short of a downright disgrace. Sinn Féin leaves its own community exposed to thugs who administer their own course of justice. We had an example of that in west Belfast at the weekend. Sinn Féin's idea of policing is to let the young hoods take over. One hood turns on the other, and they batter the life out of each other. Sinn Féin says that this is the way forward. We are saying that it most definitely is not the way forward.

Sinn Féin's record over the past 35 years is clear for everyone to see. It was the Prime Minister himself who said that Sinn Féin and the IRA were "inextricably linked". Of course they are, and of course they are more paramilitary than political. Smuggling, racketeering and all the other shenanigans that go on along the Armagh, Fermanagh and Tyrone borders bring these criminals countless millions of pounds. They have built up an empire, and the addiction to that lifestyle is something that they are finding it difficult — well-nigh impossible — to divorce themselves from.

The vacant seats in the Chamber are a clear indication of Sinn Féin's attitude to the most important of issues — law and order. Reality tells us that if we do not have an effective, efficient and professional police force, the fabric of society will fall apart. We can see that happening all around us today.

Criminality and paramilitarism are alive and doing very well. They are bringing in high returns for those engaged in them. Yet, Sinn Féin and its masters turn a blind eye to what is going on. People across the Province are gripped with fear; they are afraid to speak out because they know that if they do, the thugs, hoods and corner boys will either drive their windows in round them or drive them out of their homes altogether. Then the hoods and thugs will step in with their own type of justice

Sinn Féin is conspicuously silent on those issues. I have referred to the incident in west Belfast at the weekend, and that young man who was taken out by thugs. I am not commenting on what that man was doing; I am saying that no one except the forces of law and order is responsible for dealing with that type of nonsense.

The business community is paying dearly for the lack of law and order and for the Government's failure to grapple with that. None of us should be proud of the fact that Northern Ireland is now at the top of the UK's crime league. The 'Lifting the Barriers to Growth 2006' survey clearly shows that 57% of businesses have been victims of crime in the past year alone. As crime is now one of the main barriers to running a successful business, the Federation of Small Businesses continually highlights it. Crime has closed down many businesses, particularly those that are in areas in which racketeering and extortion are prevalent.

Many businesses face problems due to the hassle that louts and vandals hanging around causes. That affects trade because potential customers and clients are intimidated. Crime, and the fear of crime, is a concern for most businesses in Northern Ireland, and there is a genuine perception in the business community that no one really cares.

Crime stretches already slim budgets and causes disruption and anxiety in the workplace. Research reveals that the true extent of business crime is not reflected in official figures because many businesses have effectively opted out of the criminal justice system. What does that mean? It means that businesses tend to report crime mainly for insurance purposes. They have no confidence that the thug who committed the crime against them will be brought to book. That shows the lack of confidence in the present policy. Of those businesses that have experienced crime, only 60% reported the crimes. The main reason by far that crimes are not reported is that business owners believe that it will achieve nothing.

The elderly, the most valued and the vulnerable are also victims in our lawless state. It is an indictment against society that those people cannot live in their homes without the constant dread of being on the receiving end of thugs who feel confident that they will not be apprehended and will not have to face justice for their cowardly crimes.

The Secretary of State said some remarkable things in his speech to the MacGill Summer School in Glenties, County Donegal. It is clear that he is preparing Northern Ireland for another fudge. However, I have news for the him: fudge might have been the order of the day when the Belfast Agreement was put together, but there will be no fudge on law and order. Sinn Féin/IRA will have to come up to the mark or they will never be in Government. I do not care whether 24 November comes 10 times between now and my next birthday. Even if it takes 10 years, I emphasise that we will not sign up to anything that has even a semblance of fudge about it. I hope that the Secretary of State is listening. If he feels that he will take a whole cabal to St Andrews or to St Anywhere-Else and set them down, feed them, wine them and dine them, groom them and send them out, I tell him now that he will fail. We are not going over there to sign up to nonsense. This will be the real thing or nothing at all.

Alex Attwood made a comment, and Dolores Kelly repeated it as though it were a mantra. They cast doubt as to whether the DUP is ready for Government and whether we will share power with their party. I do not know whether those Members have seen our document 'Devolution Now: The DUP's Concept for Devolution' but if they do not have it, I will get one for them because we have them in abundance. We are throwing down the challenge to the SDLP now. They are standing in the way of progress.

2.15 pm

If the SDLP detached itself from the Provos and Sinn Féin, and led its community, it could be in Government tomorrow.

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Member give way?

Lord Morrow: I am nearly finished. The SDLP could be in Government with the DUP tomorrow, but it has decided that it wants to hang close to its colleagues.

Mr D Bradley: We would go into Government with the DUP tomorrow under the agreement.

Lord Morrow: The Member will get his chance to speak in a moment. The DUP is not standing in the way of devolution. We are up for it, and we are ready to go.

Mr McNarry: Many eloquent and emotional points have been made today. Much of what has needed to be said has been said, although subsequent contributors, including my colleague Danny Kennedy, will address further significant points with the same eloquence and emotion that we have already heard.

I listened to Lord Morrow's well-made criticism and condemnation of Sinn Féin's ambivalence to participating in debates. The House should address that by asking the Secretary of State to intervene on abstentionism being used as another veto weapon against the integrity of hon Members. It is incredible. Lord Morrow has sat with me on numerous days opposite Sinn Féin Members and participated with them in Committees, yet when it comes to their taking advantage of issues that not just they, but others, have raised — which is what we are allowed to do in the House — tactically, they duck out.

Madam Speaker, as I have asked you previously, when will the question of Sinn Féin's participation in the Assembly be addressed? When will the integrity of the House be raised by some decision or declaration on this issue?

I would like to say something on behalf of ordinary people and in respect of good citizenship. Ordinary people who are looking for help come with problems to our offices each day or week. Unfortunately, and sadly, they will not have had the opportunity to hear the eloquent speeches that have been made on law and order in the House today. They will not pick up on those, and they will not know that we care. They will not know that we have opinions. Therefore it is up to the House to make a difference in restoring respect for those who uphold the law in a manner that reinstates visible confidence in the public's expectations of order. The jury may still be out on whether paramilitarism will go away completely and disappear for ever, to be no more. However, even if Utopia came, do we seriously believe that all those who have killed, maimed, bombed, robbed and dished out punishment beatings will leave those skills behind them with a promise for the future? We would be quite foolish to believe that. They may move away from a political terrorism that is linked to a bloodstained cause, but some will move into highly organised mercenary gangs for hire and self-plunder, which is what the pundits and commentators say is afoot.

There are two natural progressions. One is to give up paramilitarism, and the other is to go into criminality. The pundits talk about that as though it has not happened, but in fact some people have already moved. Such outfits were prepared in advance of any proposed end to paramilitarism, and they present a prospect every bit as frightening for society as the terrorists do, and have done. The ordinary people — the far greater number of law-abiding people — who yearn for normality want to see law and order working in tandem with positive action.

Some call for zero tolerance. When one does that — as I did in my constituency to fight yobbishness, antisocial behaviour, a knife culture and a couldn't-care-less disrespect culture — bright sparks ask what you mean. What people mean is that society's tolerance for yobbish behaviour, for old people being attacked and robbed, for daytime carjacking, and for wanton disrespect for the police, is exhausted. That reflects on society and on our politics.

The report makes many fine points. One that jumped out at me is under the heading "Building a lawful society". I suspect that it would be appropriate to add the word "again". We are talking about renewing confidence by building a lawful society again. That appears to be the prospect facing the House. When the need to build a lawful society is identified, what people are really saying is that the law has fallen, for all of the reasons that I have mentioned. The onus is on the House to build that up again.

The House owes our people a demonstration that whatever it takes to renew confidence in the law will be done here. Representations have to emanate from here. I do not think that our direct-rulers believe that there is any great problem out there. Why would they? They are not elected by anybody here; they do not have constituency offices here; they do not meet the public.

When we talk about confidence, surely we are saying that the elderly should not be living in fear, and certainly not in rural areas such as the one that I represent. It may have lovely tree-lined avenues, and it may be an area of natural beauty, but there are still folks condemned to their own houses, frightened to come out, because of what has happened to them or to their neighbours.

Are we really accepting that crime is OK and that it is allowed to pay for someone's drugs and drink habit? Are we really saying that mothers cannot go shopping with their children without being harassed and molested? Are we really saying that gangs can roam about? They do roam about. In lovely, beautiful Comber there is a gang of 50 louts that no one will stand up to. We do not have the police in Comber to stand up to them.

Lord Morrow and I talked together in Committee, and wondered why so many children do not achieve in education and why there is a great numeracy and literacy problem. Our shared opinion is that something is going wrong in the home. The problem is generational, and it did not happen yesterday but during those 30 years that Members often talk about. This is a big issue that must be addressed.

Madam Speaker, I probably have not got my head around the exactness of this, but shoplifting to you, me and everybody else is an offence. However, the shopkeeper has been told: "Give it to them. Do not take a risk. If they are coming to rob you of cigarettes or whatever, just hand it over. Give it to them." What on earth is happening when "give it to them" is a recommendation?

That is easy to say from here, because I am not a shopkeeper, and I would ask no one to put his or her life at risk. However, what a lovely thing to say to a thief: "If you want to rob a shop, go into that one over there and no one will stop you.” What is the point of informing the police? Has a crime been committed if a shopkeeper hands over goods without even being asked?

People want to know, and they deserve to be told, that they will be protected, and that detection and punishment are in place. Society’s view — and I suppose it is an old adage that renowned lawyers and people on soapboxes would use — is to let the punishment fit the crime.

Mr Robert McCartney: Gilbert and Sullivan.

[Laughter.]

Mr McNarry: Well put, sir. Ordinary people work with and accept that, and the disappointment can be seen on their faces when the punishment dished out for a crime does not meet with their approval. However, those who have had the punishment served on them wear the broadest of smiles, because they are free to carry out the crime again and again.

We must see the duty of appropriate punishment performed immediately. If the House can do anything, surely it can bring some real pressure to bear on those who govern us to listen and take note of what is said today. They are in Government now — how about their reporting back to us and telling us what will be done about it, rather than continually hanging threats of 24 November around our necks?

Page 20 of the report lists the key issues that were discussed — excellent issues that needed to be discussed. Five proposals of significant importance to society and to ordinary people are detailed on page 21. Unfortunately, none of those proposals was agreed, and we know where the block came from.

I draw Members’ attention to page 20 and three points that will resonate with the public. First:

“The importance of public support for and co-operation with the police, to making the police more effective in tackling crime.”

Secondly:

“The steps needed to establish trust in the police within all sides of the community.”

Thirdly:

“The role of political parties in providing leadership to the public in extending and enhancing support for the police in terms of recruitment, assisting investigations, etc.”

All of us can put our names to those points and support them.

The House should sign up to those expressions of support, and we must communicate that to the public. Madam Speaker, can you find a way to ensure at this important time that the feelings expressed in the House during our consideration of the report, today and tomorrow, are heard by the public? It is a worthy report, and I support it.

2.30 pm

Mr Hay: As many Members have said, this is a very important debate on policing and law and order. Some have referred to Sinn Féin’s absence from the House. It would be very difficult for a party to participate in a debate on policing and law and order when it does not support, and has not signed up to, policing and law and order in Northern Ireland. Those issues should be at the heart of every community. No part of Northern Ireland should be beyond the reach of law and order; no community should be isolated or cut off from policing.

The British Government have been prepared for a number of years to open a side door for Sinn Féin/IRA to come into policing, particularly in the past few months. In his speech in Donegal, the Secretary of State almost encouraged Sinn Féin to agree at least to the principles of policing, as if that might be enough to get its support.

For a long time the British Government and their officials worked with others to examine how they might create a second tier of policing in Northern Ireland in the form of restorative justice schemes. I will deal with the issue of restorative justice later. It took the Policing Board, of which there are many members in the House, quite a while to persuade the British Government not to go down that road. In fact, the Secretary of State and his Ministers talked to everybody else about such schemes while totally ignoring the views of the board. It was only after we made it absolutely clear that if they were not going to consult us before issuing the draft guidelines and protocols, we would certainly have something to say publicly about the issue. It was only after a number of meetings with Ministers and with the Secretary of State that we managed to persuade the Government to come on board with some of the suggestions that we made regarding restorative justice schemes in Northern Ireland.

I would be the first to say that there are schemes in unionist areas that are working in line with the protocol and with everything that the Government have asked them to do. There are other schemes that are not working at involving the police or the criminal justice system. Unfortunately, those are the schemes that are being funded. The ones that adhere to the Government’s protocols regarding the police and the checks and balances are not being funded.

My party and I have continually raised that issue on the Policing Board. The Government need to address some issues and grey areas if we are to support restorative justice schemes in Northern Ireland totally and absolutely. That view is shared by my party and by Policing Board members generally. I say to the Government that schemes that do come up to the mark — and I believe that there are schemes that can do so with the correct protocols in place — should be funded. It is important to say that in the House.

Members must be reminded that we are dealing with a Government with no morals or principles in relation to policing, law and order, and allowing terrorists into Government. Yesterday, I asked the Secretary of State where else in this United Kingdom, in all its Assemblies and Parliaments in England, Scotland and Wales, would a political party that did not support policing or support and sign up to law and order be incorporated into Government. Nowhere else would have it, and we in Northern Ireland are not going to have it here. That is the message that the Secretary of State needs to get.

Lord Morrow is right: there can be no question about supporting the police and law and order. It is a moral issue for the people of Northern Ireland, and there can be no compromise on it. If the British Government believe that by taking us away to Scotland or anywhere else, they can square the circle on those issues, they are mistaken. It will not happen until we are absolutely sure that Sinn Féin, the IRA and the republican movement are absolutely signed up to policing and law and order in Northern Ireland.

The report mentioned the future role of the British Army in Northern Ireland during what the British Government call normalisation and afterwards. The presence of the British Army in Northern Ireland is vital, because we do not believe that terrorism has gone away. We do not believe that the republican movement is totally and absolutely signed up to policing in Northern Ireland, or even to the rule of law.

The future role of the Army in supporting the Police Service of Northern Ireland is crucial. The Government are currently considering a number of areas and responsibilities for the Army after normalisation. Our party believes that the Army must remain in Northern Ireland to support policing and to be called upon at any time to deal with public disturbances and many other law-and-order issues in Northern Ireland. The British Army is still very much needed to back up the police when necessary.

National security was discussed in the Chamber this morning and, from some Members' contributions, one might think that this was the only part of the United Kingdom with an operational intelligence service. We certainly do not agree with Patten's views on policing, but he made a remark with which we can agree: he made it absolutely clear that, only for the expertise of our intelligence services and of Special Branch, many more people would have been murdered and maimed in Northern Ireland.

There are concerns about accountability in respect of national security and about how intelligence will be shared in Northern Ireland. However, the protocols in place will, I hope, address the misgivings of some Members in relation to intelligence-gathering in Northern Ireland.

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Member acknowledge that yesterday, at the Preparation for Government Committee meeting, the Secretary of State admitted that the forthcoming Police Ombudsman's report on the murder of Raymond McCord Jnr will result in serious embarrassment for the British state when it is revealed how agents were handled and that some agents were allowed to commit offences, including murder?

Mr Hay: The SDLP continually raises that issue in the House and on the Policing Board. I do not support everything that RUC Special Branch did over the past 30 years in Northern Ireland. Some Policing Board members learned the lesson over the Omagh bombing that the intelligence services could have done things differently. Intelligence should be shared, and I acknowledge the fact that, in the past, intelligence was not shared as it should have been.

However, for the past 30 years, there has been a vile terrorist campaign in Northern Ireland that has murdered and maimed many thousands of people. The police, RUC Special Branch and the intelligence services were under great pressure to deal with that thuggery. When members of the SDLP talk about the intelligence services, they seem to forget that Northern Ireland has not been a normal society for the past 30 years. They have had a memory lapse. Now that various police departments, including RUC Special Branch, have been reorganised, and intelligence is being shared, we will have better intelligence services in Northern Ireland.

Mr A Maginness: I agree with the Member that many problems in the past arose from intelligence not being shared. Does the Member agree that that problem could be replicated by handing over intelligence issues to MI5? There is a great danger that intelligence will, once again, not be shared and that MI5 will not be responsible to local people.

Mr Hay: The Chief Constable and Assistant Chief Constable Peter Sheridan, who is responsible for the PSNI crime operations department, have made very good presentations to the Policing Board. When board members questioned them, they made it absolutely clear that they will not sign up to anything whereby all intelligence is not shared with the Police Service. A protocol already exists. However, the Chief Constable has indicated that some issues still need to be addressed. I say to the SDLP and to the rest of the House that the bottom line is that an effective Police Service needs an effective intelligence service that works for everyone. We must try to achieve that in the House for the future of policing in Northern Ireland.

The police college has been a bone of contention for Policing Board members for some time. The British Government agreed to fund the entire college but, once again, they failed to come up to the mark. Alex Attwood spoke about that issue this morning, but I totally disagree that we take our begging bowl to any Government — and especially the Southern Government — to make up the shortfall that is needed to get the police college up and running. An effective and efficient Police Service needs a good training service.

2.45 pm

The college at Garnerville is third-rate. In fact, it is even worse than that. I do not know how we get away with what we do in that training college, but we should not go anywhere with a begging bowl to ask for the funding shortfall. The British Government should come up to the mark, as they said they would, and if they do not, it has been agreed that the Policing Board will investigate funding the shortfall. The matter is with the Secretary of State and the Treasury, and the Secretary of State must take the final decision. We should not approach any other Government for the funding to get the college up and running.

Mr P Ramsey: Today's motion is about the future of law and order in Northern Ireland. As public representatives, it means making our streets safer for all our constituents and ensuring that we have a well-resourced, effective police force to service the needs and concerns of local people.

I welcome the Committee's discussions on the roles and functions of the DPPs and the community safety partnerships. It is essential that we review those to ensure best practice and accountability in all the district commands across the North. The DPPs should have a stronger role in outlining priorities for the local policing plan, and, to avoid duplication of effort and to maintain the integrity and authority of the policing structures, the Policing Board should direct those priorities. In particular, such an approach would ease the tensions that exist between the DPPs and the community safety partnerships.

It should be the police's job to respond to local needs. The DPPs are in an excellent position to outline the views and needs of their communities and to ensure that the police recognise and address them. For example, in my constituency of Foyle, the DPP recognised the need to prioritise and address the rates of domestic violence, homophobia and hate crime. Those protocols have reduced the number of homophobic attacks and city-centre assaults in Derry. In response to concerns, the district commander developed partnerships with a range of agencies, introduced real protocols, which have reduced instances of hate crime, and developed new and innovative ways to report incidents to the police.

That is an example of how the DPPs can feed into local policing priorities and make the police accountable for addressing local problems and concerns. Those protocols and successes should be used as models of best practice and shared among DPPs throughout the North.

In Derry, the number of themed public meetings has increased greatly, with many members of the community attending and pupils from local schools taking part in question-and-answer sessions. A recent meeting, which was based on road safety, was well attended, with good contributions from victims' families and young people.

If the Policing Board decides to review the DPPs and their structures, thought must be given to developing what does work. How can the DPPs develop and share best practice? How could the excellent work that they do be built upon? How could their work be improved? How could their accountability be increased? How could they be made more accessible to local communities? Only by doing that will policing become accessible to all the people in our communities. There is excellent potential to maximise the role of the DPPs and to make policing in the North of Ireland fully accountable.

Mr Hay: Does the Member agree that the Review of Public Administration (RPA) might result in there not being 26 DPPs?

Mr P Ramsey: I agree with the Member for Foyle. The SDLP does have concerns, and Margaret Ritchie will deal with them. The RPA will cause a loss of ownership, and we are also concerned about the future of the councils.

As I said, there is excellent potential to maximise the role of the DPPs and to make policing in the North of Ireland fully accountable. Working practices must be examined to ensure that police officers are used to maximum effect and, in particular, can respond quickly and effectively to calls for assistance.

One of the mechanisms to achieve that is for Government to take forward the review recommended by the Committee of the respective roles of district policing partnerships and community safety partnerships. There is clearly confidence, trust and satisfaction, especially with the office of the Police Ombudsman. People now believe that their complaints are being investigated impartially. We should be ensuring, even in the absence of devolved government, that there are no changes to bodies such as the Police Ombudsman's office. Their roles should be strengthened to continue after May 2007, as they have built and developed capacity and skills over recent years.

As the Committee's report outlines, we need further debate and discussion around issues of community restorative justice. I support restorative justice. What I am opposed to, however, is state-funded paramilitary vigilantism. Restorative justice has an important role to play in the criminal justice system, but we must get it right, so that concept and practice are not jeopardised in future.

The NIO has argued that the new protocol meets the SDLP's concerns. That is not the case. Real change requires groups to work directly with the police. My party has many unresolved concerns with the proposals.

Under the Government's protocol, community restorative justice groups can be funded, even though the party establishing many of them, Sinn Féin, refuses to support policing and the rule of law, and is absent from the debate on those very issues. Groups will be funded even though the culture of paramilitary control persists in our communities, leaving people too scared to speak out. Groups will receive funding without proper inspection arrangements for non-criminal work and without a proper legislative framework for their activities.

Overall, the defective protocol is damaging the rule of law. It weakens efforts to build a lawful society, and leaves working-class communities such as the one I represent in danger of very rough justice. The British Government would never introduce such guidelines in Britain; nor would they be tolerated in the South. Why should people in the North have to live with them?

In conclusion, we, as elected Members, and political parties must be the guardians of young people, giving them encouragement and motivation, and preventing them from returning to the divisions of the past. We must support the police from across the political divide, and we must support those who see a career in the Police Service as their future.

We must support the police so that we can all have a future free from violence and create a safer environment so that everyone will feel secure and content to go about their daily activities with confidence, peace in their own homes, and freedom from sectarianism, hatred and fear. The police must work in partnership with local organisations, communities and individuals to bring about effective, efficient service and a sense of confidence and ownership in their work. The challenge for the future of policing in Northern Ireland is for all political parties to be a part of policing, by being members of the Policing Board, by encouraging young people from their communities to join up, by supporting policing inclusively and by assisting and convincing others to assist policing.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Jim Wells] in the Chair)

The bottom line is that Sinn Féin must sign up to policing and a lawful society. That would help considerably in building confidence — not because we or others say so, but because it is the right thing to do. There is no doubt that if Sinn Féin signed up to policing, we would have a much greater chance of devolution and the devolution of policing and justice.

Chris Patten said in November 2003 that:

"I think the Patten report is being implemented in full and I think that they [Sinn Féin] should get off the fence and support the police service in Northern Ireland and take their responsibilities".

It is now time for Sinn Féin to share the workload and responsibility of becoming part of a new beginning for policing.

Mr Kennedy: I am extremely pleased to speak in this important debate. I want to express my thanks as a member of the Preparation for Government Committee to the new occupant of the Speaker's Chair, Mr Wells, and to Deputy Speaker Molloy, for the impartial way in which they administered business. I also thank all the staff, including the catering staff. Those of us who are trying to rebuild our lives in the aftermath of the Preparation for Government Committee will acknowledge the important assistance given to us by Assembly officials.

The Member for Strangford Mr McNarry predicted that I would make an eloquent speech. I am not sure where he got that from. However, that reminded me of something: Lord Byron said of his mother-in-law that she had lost the art of conversation but not, alas, the power of speech. I hope that I do not fall into that category in what is traditionally known as the "graveyard slot". I could refer to many important issues, and I will attempt to cover as much ground as possible.

Although all of us in the Chamber today welcome the publication of the report, and the opportunity to examine it, let me, along with others, place on record my anger and frustration at the abstentionist policy adopted by Sinn Féin. That policy is now widespread in the Preparation for Government Committee. It is clear that there is an attempt to wreck the Assembly and to damage seriously any prospect — no matter how remote — of agreement between now and the end of November. Sinn Féin carries responsibility for that and should be indicted by all Members.

The PFG Committee with responsibility for institutional issues, and the PFG Committee with responsibility for rights, safeguards, equality issues and victims are in the advanced stages of preparing and agreeing reports, but Sinn Féin has effectively blocked their publication, which means that the process for a debate in the Chamber could be seriously compromised. The matters have been gone through in detail at Committee level. I call on the Secretary of State to intervene directly to ensure that the reports produced by the Committee be published and a debate organised in the Chamber, so that Members can properly exercise their democratic right to express their views on the reports. I hope that the Secretary of State will give the matter his urgent attention.

The report that we are debating covers many issues. The national security issue was mentioned earlier, and the SDLP, in particular, appears to have concerns with that. All parties are interested in any new arrangement. However, the Secretary of State could not have been clearer about the issue of national security when he spoke to us yesterday — although he might not have been clear about everything. Decisions that have already been taken at senior Government level mean that the arrangements and guidelines for intelligence services will be set and administered by Downing Street. That must be accepted. The SDLP displays some paranoia in respect of those issues. I, like William Hay the Member for Foyle, am content with the assurances of the Chief Constable and his senior officers — unanimously supported by the Policing Board — that the new protocols to be arranged and engaged in will deal adequately with the issue and give the Chief Constable, and his officers, sufficient insight into the role of the national security services in dealing with issues affecting Northern Ireland.

Mr D Bradley: I thank the Member for giving way. Considering what has happened on the British mainland as a result of the activities of the national security agencies, we need to be very careful about this issue. The national security agencies were in cahoots with the Government over the dodgy dossier that led to the death of Dr David Kelly.

3.00 pm

Therefore, the SDLP has good reason for refusing to treat national security lightly and would prefer local accountability.

Mr Kennedy: I thank the Member for his intervention. However, may I say to him that —

Mr McFarland: Will my colleague give way?

Mr Kennedy: Yes, I will.

Mr McFarland: Does Mr Bradley recall that the issue of national security has moved in this direction partly because the SDLP spent so much time whingeing about Special Branch? Members of the first Policing Board were hefted weekly by the appalling complaints from his party about Special Branch. The Government listened to the SDLP and, at its behest, moved intelligence operations out of Northern Ireland, giving that responsibility to MI5. Therefore, it ill becomes the SDLP to complain now, when the Government have done what the SDLP asked them to do by moving intelligence from Special Branch to MI5 — which makes a lot of sense.

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to my hon Friend for accurately predicting what my response was going to be.

[Laughter.]

The UUP and other parties consider matters of national security to be important. However, the SDLP must be careful not to give succour to Sinn Féin opposition to the lawful action of the security services. Also, much of the SDLP's paranoia is based more on MFI than MI5.

I want to talk briefly about a range of issues contained in the report. The bottom line for all parties present in the Chamber today is the importance of the rule of law, support for the rule of law and support for the PSNI and all policing institutions. I particularly welcome the SDLP's expression of its views on that.

The report considered the role of the Police Ombudsman in some detail. It examined how that role might be improved to make it more acceptable to the entire community, and particularly to the unionist community, in which there is a significant chill factor. It would be a mistake not to recognise that.

I do not doubt the integrity of the Police Ombudsman, Nuala O'Loan. I do not criticise her personally. However, her position is slightly compromised by family relationships that link her to the SDLP. In the perception of the wider unionist community, that still creates a significant chill factor. I put that to the House in, I hope, a responsible fashion.

There is a widespread perception that the Police Ombudsman is not only anti-police but particularly anti-RUC. The office of the Police Ombudsman will have to address that significant problem at some stage.

Through my constituency work, I have used the office of the Police Ombudsman.

Mrs D Kelly: Does the Member acknowledge that recent surveys found that the majority of serving police officers welcomed the Police Ombudsman and her office, and encouraged members of the public who remain dissatisfied to go there? Is the Ulster Unionist Party saying that police officers who committed crimes in the past should not be brought before the courts? Why have the backwoodsmen of the Police Federation so much to fear from the Police Ombudsman?

Mr Kennedy: That is a misrepresentation of the views of the Police Federation.

Current structures deal effectively with complaints about policing. However, some people seem to have an unending desire to continually dig at the work of the RUC and, in particular, Special Branch, which is not helpful. In the context of other matters, it is particularly unwelcome.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Does the Member agree that it is a gross misrepresentation, especially from a party that purports to be a labour party, to describe members of a trade union as backwoodsmen? That union fights for better pay, standards and opportunities for its members. I am sure that he agrees with me on that.

Mr Kennedy: I agree with the hon Member. I also agree with points that were raised earlier with regard to fifty-fifty recruitment of PSNI officers. That is an insult to democratic standards. The SDLP's support of that measure is a stain on a party that was apparently founded to bring about civil rights in Northern Ireland.

A party must either be for discrimination or against it; it cannot be ambivalent. It appears that the SDLP supports discrimination.

I was pleased that there was widespread agreement in the report that the Policing Board should retain its current powers and that its political membership should be based on that of the Northern Ireland Assembly. That will be helpful and will affirm the status of that body. However, certain issues must be carefully considered, such as the relationships — following the devolution of policing and justice — among an Assembly scrutiny Committee, an established Ministry, the Chief Constable and the Policing Board. There is much work still to do in order to establish how those relationships will function.

I was pleased that the Committee endorsed the proposal from the Ulster Unionist Party to condemn the practice of exiling and called for it to be ceased forthwith. However, it is not sufficient simply to make that call without giving it practical expression. I hope that that message will be heard loud and clear in all communities.

The issue of the police college was touched on by William Hay, and rightly so. I do not agree with the comments made by Alex Attwood, the West Belfast MLA and Policing Board member, who said that he expects the Irish Government to put money towards the new college. As Northern Ireland is part of the United Kingdom, one expects that Her Majesty's Government will fulfil those requirements. Modern facilities must be provided. Although the training package offered at Garnerville is excellent, the facilities and conditions that student officers have there are frankly unacceptable. I urge the Government to fund the new training college immediately.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I want to be associated with the comments that were made by the Deputy Speaker at the commencement of the debate, when he thanked the Clerk, the Committee staff and Hansard for their copious work in the preparation of the report, for which we are all truly grateful. I also want to be associated with the congratulations for our absent colleague, Arlene Foster, and to wish William Benjamin Thomas Foster well. I look forward to 18 years from now, when he will be able to vote for his mother to be the Member of Parliament for Fermanagh and South Tyrone.

I welcome the report, which I believe contains several issues that deserve consideration.

It is important to have a single Department for policing and justice. Partitioning those Departments would be bad for management, resources and joined-up government. That is a solid proposal.

I welcome the report's recommendation that the Policing Board retain its current powers. The ability to hold the police to account must remain with the board, and MLAs should remain its key members. Mr Kennedy, who spoke previously, mentioned the issue of exiling. I, too, believe that it is important that the practice of exiling has been highlighted and that an agreed recommendation appears in the report.

I shall call a spade a spade. The key impediment to progress has been identified in the report: the resistance by the party that is absent today to support the rule of law. That is the substance of the report. If people want to acknowledge the elephant in the room and want to know why the Government are not up and running, it is because one party aspires to Government but wants to use criminality, terrorism and everything else in the armoury of evil to pursue its ill-gotten gains.

I wish to comment briefly on the issue of MI5 accountability. Some Members touched on it, but we should continue to push the point. I can understand why people want the intelligence services to be accountable, but there will never be full visibility of everything that happens in the intelligence world. It is a murky world; it is designed to be so but, I hope, that it is a world that helps to save lives.

The DUP's proposal is that, when responsibility for intelligence services in Northern Ireland is transferred to Westminster, Northern Ireland MPs be invited to sit on the Intelligence and Security Committee, with their colleagues from England, Wales and Scotland. Parties with representatives in that House — and who attend that House — should be able to put themselves forward for that role. It is important that that issue is addressed.

The DUP has encountered criticism of the report, most notably from Captain McFarland. It is important that we address the hypocrisy —

Mr McFarland: Major McFarland. [Laughter.]

Mr Paisley Jnr: I beg your pardon. Sorry, the Member was not wearing his epaulettes.

The issues that Major McFarland identified highlight his double standards. When the Committee on the Preparation for Government was set up, all parties were asked to draw up working documents on the key issues that they wanted addressed. My party, and the Alliance Party, brought forward many issues in respect of the rule of law, paramilitarism, criminality and decommissioning. Sinn Féin, the SDLP and the Ulster Unionist Party Assembly Group (UUPAG), as it was then, did not bring forward any such issues. The agenda shows the glaring gaps —

Mr McFarland: Will the Member give way?

Mr Paisley Jnr: No, let me make the point on the glaring gaps that appeared.

That reluctance to put those issues on the agenda has forced those parties to adopt a very different position from that which got many of them elected.

Most of the Members opposite, with one or two notable exceptions, are pro-Belfast Agreement, and they all campaigned on such a manifesto. However, when those Members spoke today about how awful it is to let people out of jail free, the skin of the noble Member for Upper Bann — who is no longer in the Chamber — crawled at those Members' contempt for an agreement and a manifesto on which they got elected to this House.

That tells its own story. The double standards that Major McFarland claimed were the DUP's were, in fact, those of his own party.

3.15 pm

Mr McFarland: Page 3 of the Official Report for the Committee on the Preparation for Government sitting of 28 June is there for everyone to read. It shows that Mr Paisley Jnr's previous comments are absolute nonsense. The Ulster Unionist Party's views of that time are clearly expressed, and for Mr Paisley Jnr to say that the Ulster Unionists did not highlight any outstanding issues is daft.

Mr Paisley Jnr: All I have in my hands is the agenda paper — a Committee for the Preparation for Government working document. It shows a huge gap on the issue of criminality and the rule of law, and that gap belongs to the Ulster Unionist Party. My party did not draw up the working document; it was drawn up by the Clerks, whom we have thanked already for their hard work.

Another criticism must be responded to, and when I do so, I will move off the controversy. It was alleged that there was some sort of love-in between the DUP and Sinn Féin, with exchanges of coquettish glances, admiring blow-kisses and wolf whistling across the Committee Room. However, at yesterday's PFG Committee meeting, Conor Murphy was essentially pulling stumps because he said that there has been no progress and no engagement between Sinn Féin and the DUP. That tells its own story. The advancements that Mr McFarland dreamt of are his own nightmare. Major McFarland should stop eating cheese before he goes to bed at night so that he stops having those nightmares.

Mr Kennedy: Does the Member accept that there was an element of flirting between himself and his party with all of us who were engaged in the PFG Committee? I do not wish to be disingenuous, but at one stage it looked as if the DUP was prepared to go a-courting.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I have two points to make. First, when the Member is in a hole, he should stop digging. Secondly, he should not flatter himself.

The Secretary of State came to yesterday's meeting of the PFG Committee — at long last — and gave evidence. He said that some Members were looking for perfection. I want to make it loud and clear to the Secretary of State that, although we may want to pursue it, the DUP is not looking for perfection. The DUP is demanding normality, justice and equality. The Secretary of State has an attitude problem, and somehow deems it wrong for the DUP to seek those things, and he thinks that its members ask for too much.

How can that be so, when a party says that it wants to be engaged in criminality on the one hand and engaged in Government on the other? It is not asking too much to ask for that to be severed for all time.

Dolores Kelly, a Member for Upper Bann, and Pat Ramsey, a Member for Foyle, have commented eloquently on the torture inflicted on members of their society and community, and that clearly illustrates that there cannot be a double standard from Sinn Féin/IRA. It is either Government or crime. If a party is on the side of crime, it is opposed to law and order, and it cannot be in the Government of Northern Ireland.

In his comments yesterday, the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland said that there has been an absolute sea change in the attitude of Sinn Féin. He is living in a different world. There has been no such sea change. I wish that there had been, because this society would be a lot better than it presently is.

There has been no sea change from Sinn Féin; it is still out there torturing members of its own community and holding society to ransom. Eleven police officers were hospitalised in the past 48 hours — is that a sea change? A young man in west Belfast was so brutalised that he has lost part of his leg — is that a sea change? There has been no sea change in the republican movement's attitude to its own members and community or to law and order in Northern Ireland.

Mrs I Robinson: Is the Member aware that the only sea change that is happening in the community is that this Government are trying to change the face of terrorism? In Omagh and Castlereagh, we have been asked to remove photographs and collages of the victims of the Omagh bombing from the ambulance and fire stations, as well as the photographs at Knockbracken of the La Mon bombing. It is as if Sinn Féin/IRA never did any harm to the communities in Northern Ireland. The sea change is happening in those areas, not within terrorism.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I appreciate the Member's well-made point. There will be an attempt to airbrush from history the real victims of Northern Ireland. However, they will never be airbrushed from the hearts and minds of the relatives who have suffered so much, seen so much and felt so much pain, and who continue to grieve for their loved ones. There are enough men and women in Ulster today who will continue to grieve for them and who will not allow their memory to be expunged from the record.

I will turn briefly to the structure of the Provisional IRA. Very different messages have emerged from the various organisations that have tried to identify the structure of that organisation. Page 13 of the eleventh IMC report states:

“structure is an important element in maintaining the organisation on its chosen path.”

I do not think so — that is “mom and apple pie”. That statement is in stark contrast to the statement that Her Majesty’s Government issued in the report of the Organised Crime Task Force just four months ago. In terms of the structure of the Provisional IRA, it indicated clearly that:

“Organised crime is used by paramilitaries as a means of raising finance both for their organisation and for personal gain. They also use their paramilitary associations to exert control over communities.”

It also says that paramilitaries — the Provisional IRA:

“bring to organised crime networks of associations familiar with operating clandestinely, experience and a readiness to resort to violence and threats. The disciplined structures which were already in place in the paramilitary organisations have allowed them to evolve from effective terrorist organisations into lucrative criminal enterprises”.

Those are not the words of the Democratic Unionist Party, or of dissidents or naysayers in the press — of whom there are a few. They are the words of the Organised Crime Task Force, the chairman of which is a Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, yet the Secretary of State tries to tell us that those IRA networks are to everyone’s advantage. They are not to our advantage; they are part and parcel of the poison that affects Northern Ireland.

(Madam Speaker in the Chair)

Look at the Provisional IRA’s record over the past few weeks. There was the situation in New Lodge, and there was a punishment beating. In June, a Provisional IRA man, Richard O’Donnell, was convicted of extorting £300,000. Who spoke out against that conviction? None other than a Sinn Féin Assembly Member, who said that it was terrible that that man was convicted of extortion. A Sinn Féin councillor also told us how awful that conviction was. Sinn Féin is betrayed by its own words and actions.

In Dunloy, in my constituency, we witnessed Sinn Féin’s actions on the ground. Its members held a protest by sitting down on the road, stopping men and women from going to church. The police and the courts failed to prosecute them. Fuel smuggling costs this country £2 billion. Former members of the Provisional IRA have been murdered by the Provisional IRA — including Mr Donaldson, who once worked in this Building. Ongoing daily crime has been aided and abetted by the Provisional IRA. Sinn Féin has a significant distance to travel —

Madam Speaker: Order. The Member will resume his seat.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I was interrupted on a number of occasions. I thought that I had at least another few seconds.

Madam Speaker: The ruling is that if a Member has over 10 minutes’ speaking time, he does not get any allowance for being interrupted.

Mr Shannon: A gang of drunken youths attack at random two men eating a takeaway; an elderly man asleep in his front room in broad daylight awakens to find a knife at his throat and his property stolen; young foreign women are attacked and brutalised; pornography is rampant; sex offenders are on street corners — that is not the streets of Thailand, the slums of Brazil or the ghettos of Johannesburg, but a sad portrait of any number of towns in our Province. With this picture comes the message that the reform of law and order is imperative, as the report recognises.

Although I support the motion, I am disappointed that, because agreement could not be reached, many of the big issues have not been settled or even touched upon. I am disillusioned — as I expected to be — with the parties that would not subscribe to law and order and which will not recognise the law and policing governing bodies. I am disillusioned with those Members who will not fulfil their duty to encourage their constituents to cease resisting the police and to build up networks to support officers in their roles as peacekeepers and crime-fighters in the Province.

Some of those Members advocate the community restorative justice model. That system should operate in tandem with the police and be applied in minor cases. I do not approve of the proposals from Community Restorative Justice Ireland (CRJI). When we met representatives of that body, they told us that the system should be applied on an “M-to-M” basis — and I am not talking about M&M sweets; it stands for “from milk bottles to murder”. Community restorative justice can never be allowed to take over the role of the police. It must be applied only in minor cases, as it is in Protestant areas, with the total support of the police.

I agree with the report’s commendations of the DPPs and the community safety partnerships. As chairman of Ards District Policing Partnership, it is incumbent on me to highlight where it has worked effectively in the community. The idea behind the DPPs is for elected representatives and independent members to be the voice of the people by communicating their needs and fears to the police and, subsequently, implementing initiatives to relieve those fears and to foster a stronger, more unified and safer community.

It is up to the police and the DPPs to co-ordinate on community issues, which include antisocial behaviour, the protection of the elderly, crime rates and paramilitary activity. They must address public concern in a proactive way that builds good faith and confidence in the local police force, which will, in turn, benefit the police through the return of information that good relations inspire.

The more the community feels that the police are working for it, the more it will strive to aid the police in all possible ways. In my area, the DPP has implemented several effective schemes, such as the distribution of personal alarms, the Lock Out Crime initiative and the local policing strategy. All those programmes encourage belief in crime prevention. Although they are not always perfect, they show an ability and willingness to co-operate with each constituent who contacts the police. They show that the police value community involvement.

A few minutes ago, I mentioned community restorative justice. Some Protestant areas are notoriously underfunded and neglected. It is important for Government to understand that and to encourage people to restore the community's faith in the PSNI.

The report refers to a concern that has been expressed by my constituents: fifty-fifty recruitment to the PSNI. That practice is definitely a law and order issue. Renewed consideration of departmental structures is needed, and recruitment practices must be reformed. I do not wish to labour this point, but when a Protestant man who applies for a job in the PSNI is unsuccessful because he does not fall into the right religious category, how can that not be classed as an infringement of his human rights? I am referring to a very disillusioned and disgusted constituent of mine. Although he passed all the selection criteria and subsequent tests, he could not become a police officer, because the quota from his community background had been filled. Six times he applied, and six times he was turned down. No longer is it the case that the right person for the job is selected; the person with the right religion is selected. That is wrong.

We must ask the Government to ensure that police numbers are maintained so that any devolution of policing will not create a deficit of officers that is greater than that which the service already suffers.

3.30 pm

A reform of the provision of part-time officers is necessary. The Chief Constable ran a successful pilot scheme in four policing districts for part-time officers. We need more of those schemes, and we need more bobbies on the beat. Ards police allotted a great deal of overtime to its staff, and that led to a substantial percentage overspend — the biggest in the region — of the predicted budget. That amount of overtime was granted because 109 full-time reserve officers were operating pre-Patten, but post-Patten there were 86, with a further 17 of those to lose their jobs between June and September.

Has there been a huge drop in crime? The answer is no. In fact, the opposite has happened. The Chief Constable's annual report showed an increase in crime of over 4%. That is a Province-wide increase of more than 5,000 additional crimes. Surely it would make more sense to have more, rather than fewer, police officers on the street. An increase in part-time officer numbers would allow the full-time officers to concentrate on other matters, it would increase public confidence in the police, and it would give those who have a valuable contribution to make the opportunity to do so. For example, someone could perform the dual role of mother or carer and part-time officer.

It makes sense to have an additional, and vital, police presence at weekends and in the evenings as well as for general community policing. The part-time officers can then give the full-time police effective support. The well-publicised attacks in Ards last Christmas Eve highlighted the critical need for the immediate implementation of such a programme.

Although I welcome the progress that has been made on departmental structures, the Historical Enquiries Team (HET) compiled a computer database — the first of its kind in the UK — that is so detailed and intricate, it is on a par with the Federal Bureau of Investigation's (FBI) system in America. Its UK-wide links enable police forces to share information on criminals and hold them liable for their actions. It showcases modern policing in Northern Ireland, and its information will halt a great deal of criminal activity.

It was satisfying to witness the all-party condemnation of the practice of exiling from Northern Ireland. Even the self-exiled party, which is not here today, condemned that practice. We all find that hypocritical, but it is refreshing to note that those who have been involved in exiling in the past now accept that it is wrong. However, we wait to be convinced that those people have recognised the error of their ways.

My colleague William Hay mentioned the role of the Army in supporting the police in public order situations. There can be no doubt that the British Army needs to be available in a reserve role to support the police in the event of an upsurge in street violence. It must have a clear, mandated presence in the Province to be able to respond to urgent police needs. There is no logical argument against that point; therefore, it definitely requires further consideration and implementation.

In light of the few areas that other Members and I have highlighted, I support the motion. However, I also support the insistence that rationalisation should lay the foundation for any and all reform. Any future

Government must, without exception, support the rule of law in Northern Ireland. How can we expect peace and stability in the Province if those who are endeavouring to implement that peace do not have the support of the Government that they serve? A stable society cannot exist without a strong and unified police force that keeps the peace, defeats crime, upholds justice and seeks the truth behind the scenes and on the streets. Let us ensure that that is the police service with which this Assembly will be working.

Mr Elliott: I commend the work of the Committee in producing the report. When reading it, it is interesting to note the names of those who took part in the Committee's proceedings. It is particularly interesting that Sinn Féin members, such as Gerry Kelly, are now working on the law and order of the Province. I understand that he was imprisoned for a long time for his membership of the IRA and that he also escaped from the Maze Prison.

Francie Molloy is also a long-time republican. I almost question whether those Members, if they were opposed to law and order in the past, are still opposed to it. Most people will ask if it is a positive step that Sinn Féin is getting involved in law and order. The answer is yes, with the proviso that it is genuine in doing so.

Like many Members, I question how Sinn Féin can participate in Committees but not in the Chamber, where the debate is taking place. It makes me question Sinn Féin's ability, its reason for doing that and how genuine that party is. If Sinn Féin is truly genuine, why are its Members not here?

Are republicans preparing to hold the Northern Ireland political process to ransom?

Mr A Maginness: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Mr Elliott mentioned the Deputy Speaker, another Member, and Sinn Féin Members in general and questioned their genuineness in relation to law and order. Is it in order for the Member to impugn the Deputy Speaker in relation to a Committee to which he was appointed as a Chairman and in which he acted as a Deputy Speaker of this Assembly? It is unfair to impugn the Deputy Speaker in that context.

Madam Speaker: I have listened carefully to Mr Elliott's remarks, and I think that he was asking a question rather than impugning anybody. I would like him to continue.

Mr Elliott: You are absolutely right, Madam Speaker. I did not impugn anybody; I was merely asking questions. If Sinn Féin's participation is progress, I welcome it, as will the majority of Members in the Chamber.

Are republicans preparing to hold the political process to ransom over policing as it was held to ransom over decommissioning for a long time? Are policing and law and order arrangements the next issue that will be used to hold this entire process to ransom? I sincerely hope not. Must we continue to wait until more and more concessions are extracted from our Government, or can we expect Sinn Féin to sell the idea of being fully involved with, and supportive of, policing and law and order in Northern Ireland?

Will that party encourage grass-roots republicans to co-operate with the services of law and order throughout the Province and to stop all criminal activity in which its supporters may be involved? Will those criminals listen to Sinn Féin public representatives? Will they be content to accept the directive to give up what, for many, is a very lucrative and financially rewarding business to which they have become accustomed?

I note that the report mentions little about the future role of the Army in respect of law and order in this Province, which was touched on by the previous Member and a couple of others. It is very important that those issues be agreed. I ask that, in further negotiations, agreement be reached on them. In particular, there is no mention of the consequences for law and order in the Province as a result of the disbandment of the home service battalions of the Royal Irish Regiment.

For the first time in the history of Northern Ireland, there will be no locally recruited back-up service for the police. During their lifetime, the home service battalions of the Royal Irish and their predecessor, the Ulster Defence Regiment, have stood squarely behind the law-abiding community of this Province. I deeply regret that this regiment, which has bravely and successfully served the community during three decades of conflict — and suffered dreadfully, with over 200 of its members murdered in brutal and cowardly fashion, and another 60 murdered after leaving the regiment — will not have the opportunity to serve the community in what we all hope will be a peaceful future.

Although many will accept the financial package offered to members of the regiment on retirement, I have serious concerns about the future ability of the civil police service to deal with all the law-and-order issues that may arise in the years ahead. Given the troubled history of this Province, I am sure that most of us share those concerns. Although I have respect for the ability of the PSNI to deal with its work and its role, I have grave concerns that it might not be able to deal with the problems that could arise due to civil unrest without the services of a locally recruited back-up.

Equally worrying is the removal of most of the Army bases in Northern Ireland. For example, the traditional garrison town of Omagh is to have its military presence totally removed, as is the entire west of the Province, with the possible exception of Ballykelly. There will be no bases in Armagh, Fermanagh or Tyrone.

That is an unthinkable problem, with potentially serious consequences for the civil powers of this Province. It appears to be a substantial military withdrawal.

Mr Shannon has already mentioned DPPs and community safety partnerships. That is dealt with quite a bit in the report. Those are both community organisations and they often duplicate each other's work. It is important that the roles of those organisations in support of the Policing Board be looked at and joined up. Both often produce lengthy and detailed reports; many of the details are duplicated. I would like to see those two organisations looked at in detail to see how they can become more proactive and, indeed, more useful to society.

Madam Speaker, I have been very brief. My colleague Mr Kennedy said that he had got the graveyard slot. I do not know what this slot is called; it is quite a bit after his. I support the motion.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh míle maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Ar fud phróiseas na síochána, táimid cráite ag páirtithe a deir go bhfuil siad ar son an Chomhaontaithe ach atá ag cur moille ar dhul chun tosaigh an phróisis.

Is é an toradh a bhí ar an mhoill seo dochar a dhéanamh don Chomhaontú a deir na páirtithe seo go bhfuil siad ar a shon.

Mar shampla, chuir an UUP moill ar Fheidhmeannas a chur ar bun; agus chuir siad moill ar oibriú ceart na Comhairle Aireachta Thuaidh/Theas.

Throughout the peace process, we have been bedevilled by parties that say they are pro-agreement but that hold things back. All of that has served only to damage the very agreement that those parties claim to support. For example, the UUP held up the establishment of the Executive and the proper running of the North/South Ministerial Council. An even more apt example in the context of this debate is the position adopted by the Provisional movement on decommissioning. It argued that decommissioning was not necessary; that it was not desirable; and that it was dangerous even to suggest it, even though the agreement clearly required it to happen by May 2000.

Yet, last year, in a welcome but long overdue move, it decommissioned, and its members should ask themselves what they gained by waiting. The answer is that they gained very little.

3.45 pm

They pulled the rug from under pro-agreement unionism; they helped to grow the DUP's electoral support; and they helped to bring about four years of suspension, which might never have happened had they moved on decommissioning in time. That suspension has continued for more than a year after decommissioning because of the intransigence of the party that benefited most from the failure to decommission: the DUP.

There is a lesson there for Sinn Féin and for all of us. The peace process works best when we move forward; as soon as people hold progress back, things begin to unravel. That is why I urge Sinn Féin, having made one mistake on decommissioning, not to make another on policing. Sinn Féin admits that it is only a matter of time before it has to sign up to policing. Everyone knows that, so why not do it now? Sinn Féin will respond that it needs a commitment from the DUP to the devolution of justice. The SDLP also wants such a commitment, but it was never in the Patten Report that parties should stay away from the Policing Board until that commitment was given.

Where would we be today had the SDLP adopted Sinn Féin's stance? The Policing Board would not have been established; we would still have had the old, toothless Police Authority. The PSNI would not exist; we would have the old RUC instead. There would be no new leadership, as put in place by the Policing Board — Ronnie Flanagan, or his anointed successor, would be there now. Fifty-fifty recruitment and all the rest would have been put on hold, and the Patten Report would have been shelved.

Let us be honest about the gains to be had from the devolution of justice. It is important, because the Assembly will be able to pass its own laws on criminal issues. If we do not like antisocial behaviour orders (ASBOs), we can change them. If we want an all-Ireland criminal assets bureau we can bring that about. Those are the gains.

However, it is not about wresting power from the securocrats, as Sinn Féin claims. After all, under British plans, MI5 will be expanded. What is the British trump card in justifying that move? It is Sinn Féin's refusal to endorse policing. Sinn Féin's demand for the devolution of justice seems to be little more than a stalling device. After Weston Park, its demand was not for the devolution of justice but for new legislation to remedy the defects of Peter Mandelson's Police (Northern Ireland) Act 2000.

Just before publication of the new legislation — the Police (Northern Ireland) Act 2003, which implemented commitments obtained by the SDLP at Weston Park — Sinn Féin tried to take the credit for it. Mitchel McLaughlin said on BBC Northern Ireland's 'Good Morning Ulster' on 28 August 2002 that Sinn Féin had:

"secured a commitment from Tony Blair that he will introduce amending legislation that will bring policing arrangements up to the minimum threshold of Patten. That will be a significant development and it will be a challenge that Sinn Féin will rise to if and when it happens."

The challenge did come, but Sinn Féin did not rise to it. Suddenly, the new legislation was not enough.

There was a further demand: the devolution of justice. All we had from Sinn Féin was a new way to avoid signing up to policing.

The truth is that there is no good reason for waiting for a commitment from the DUP to the devolution of justice. It is no more than a stalling tactic; worse, it is one that hands the DUP a veto on Sinn Féin's policing position at a time when nationalist communities are crying out for better policing. At times, Sinn Féin appears to accept that. In an 'Irish Times' interview in May 2006, Gerry Adams said:

"Policing may be a necessary element in the resolution of the outstanding matters to do with the Assembly. But policing needs to be dealt with anyway ... If the DUP cast about for reasons why they will not be involved in powersharing, that's their choice. But I think we have clearly said the policing issue needs to be resolved."

If Sinn Féin will sign up to policing without the devolution of justice, why can it not do so now? Why wait, and jeopardise the chances of getting restoration? Why jeopardise the chance to get the agreement up and running? Perhaps the reason is that Sinn Féin does not really want restoration or the agreement. That is what many will conclude, if Sinn Féin does not make the move required. If Sinn Féin does not sign up to the new policing structures and continues to block police investigations, it will have to share the blame for not getting a deal by 24 November. After all, how can they create confidence that they are against criminality if they do not support policing and a lawful society?

If Sinn Féin really wants restoration, it should realise that its refusal to sign up to policing makes it easy for the DUP to reject any deal. Does it not see that it is playing right into the DUP's hands? Sinn Féin should sign up to policing, not because the DUP says that it should, but because doing its all for Patten and the agreement means that it should.

Endless foot-dragging by the DUP in accepting the agreement's political institutions or by Sinn Féin in accepting the agreement's policing institutions damages the process and undermines hope for a breakthrough. Both the DUP and Sinn Féin know full well what they have to do to make progress. In the next few weeks they will be put to the test, and we will see whether they are serious about delivering.

Finally, several Members have today invited the SDLP to join them in a voluntary coalition. The SDLP is most willing to do that — under the Good Friday Agreement. It is not willing to join any shabby coalition such as that agreed between the DUP, Sinn Féin and the two Governments — the so-called comprehensive agreement.

Madam Speaker, go raibh míle maith agat.

Mr Storey: I am glad to speak in this debate and to put on record the DUP's position and not some assertion by the SDLP in a foreign language that we cannot understand. I will state my party's position in the Queen's English: there will be no deal under the terms of the Belfast Agreement. It is clear that the Belfast Agreement is dead and it is not coming back. Members on the opposite side of the House should take that as read.

The motion does not stand in isolation. It did not appear out of thin air, nor did the political stork deliver it to the Chamber. The motion exists within a set of circumstances that helped to make it necessary and to shape its contents. Most Members of this Assembly hope that Northern Ireland is in the process of moving out of the nightmare visited upon it by terrorist organisations over many years. One of the crucial tests of this, and one of the key indicators of how realistic that wish will prove to be, is the issue of the rule of law.

No society can hope to prosper or grow closer if there is one law for the rich and another law for the poor; one law for white and another law for black; one law for one religion and another law for another religion. As a Presbyterian, I know that the history of the United Kingdom and the island surely tells us that that is the case.

We cannot hope to move on to a better and brighter future if there is one law for Protestants and a different law for Roman Catholics. We can never hope to achieve a lasting and real peace in Northern Ireland if there is one law for everyone else and another law for Sinn Féin/IRA. That is a truth that this Government, and particularly the Secretary of State, have been unable to grasp. It is a lesson that this Government and the Secretary of State have so far been unable to learn.

Just one example will prove my point to Members' satisfaction. In an interview with Adam Boulton of Sky News on 2 April 2006, the Secretary of State said:

"in the end the politicians have to decide are they going to discharge their responsibilities, assume the jobs for which they're being paid or do they want the curtain being brought down on this whole attempt, including stopping their salaries and allowances and that's going to be a choice for them."

He continued:

"people need to take up their responsibilities, assume their duties and carry out the functions for which they are elected, which frankly they've not been doing."

If I must make a choice between losing my position in the House and allowing into Government those who refuse to accept the rule of law, my personal circumstances are, quite frankly, of little consequence.

Attention must be paid to the fact that, despite the refusal of Sinn Féin MPs to take up their responsibilities and represent their electorate in the British Parliament, the very same Secretary of State does not utter so much as a squeak. Indeed, he is deafeningly silent. In short, he believes in one law for everyone else and a different law for those who represent the Provos. That is no example to set, it is no position from which to lecture others, and it is no basis for the future.

The behaviour and the example of the Secretary of State merely encourages Sinn Féin/IRA to continue in the belief that it is different, in that it can stick up its two fingers at democracy and the laws that govern everyone else. The spineless attitude of the Secretary of State must end.

The circumstances surrounding the report drip with the belief of Sinn Féin/IRA that it can flout the normal standards and practices of the rule of law that govern everyone else. We need hardly be surprised. In July 2005, the IRA gave its stand-down order, claiming that its campaign of sectarian murder was “entirely legitimate”. Sinn Féin gave this statement full and uncritical support — as did, I must say, members of the SDLP. Planting bombs, wreaking havoc, attempting to murder the entire British Cabinet and all the illegalities of the Provisional movement were not entirely legitimate. The issue is that Sinn Féin endorsed the republican statement in July.

Today we assemble in the Chamber. Sinn Féin holds with the wholesale sectarian slaughter of its neighbours, solely on the grounds of their religion. For an up-to-date assessment of the attitude of republicans to law and order, we only have to recall the words of the Member for Foyle who, commenting on the murder of Jean McConville — something that the IRA denies and says is a result of British securocrats and the secret services — said:

“It was not a criminal act.”

That is the attitude of Sinn Féin and republicans to law and order. All those years ago, Sinn Féin believed that the campaign was entirely legitimate, just as it does today.

4.00 pm

The report exposes a republican mentality that is confused about its identity. It is republicans who are the problem, not the PSNI. Sinn Féin alone rejects the structures of law and order, yet it singularly demands the transfer of the very powers that it refuses to accept. It is little wonder that there is a deafening silence in its own communities when it cannot bring itself to condemn the actions of IRA punishment gangs and finds justification for the maiming of joyriders. Why does Sinn Féin stand aside when drug dealers are murdered in cold blood on our streets? Let us cut to the quick. Sinn Féin is not fit to hold the reins of responsibility, or hold any powers relating to law and order, when it cannot bring itself to accept the rule of law. Sinn Féin has failed miserably, and the tombstones and the sorrow that it heaped on this Province for more than 30 years are the testament to its bona fides.

Dr McCrea: Does the Member agree that if Sinn Féin members join the Policing Board, that does not automatically give them credentials in support of law and order?

Mr Storey: I agree entirely. Joining the Policing Board makes Sinn Féin members no more committed to the rule of law than coming into this Building makes them unionists. When the Sinn Féin cavalcade passed Carson’s statue, no one believed that, all of a sudden, its members had become unionists. I commend the comments made by the Member for West Belfast earlier in the debate, when he painted a picture depicting the choreography that will undoubtedly take place over the next few months in a subtle, masked attempt to ensure that Sinn Féin yet again deceives the people of Northern Ireland. That will not wash with the DUP. In the past, the Ulster Unionist Party was bought and suckered by Sinn Féin, but the DUP will not be suckered.

What about the events that took place over the weekend, to which reference has already been made? What happened when police officers tried to carry out their duties? What attitude did republicans take? They said: “Let us attack the police and wreak havoc on them as we have done in the past.”

Mrs D Kelly: Is there not an inherent hypocrisy with the DUP: last year, during the Whiterock clashes, it failed to complain about police tactics, when live rounds of ammunition were fired, not bricks from a skip?

Mr Storey: When I was a child growing up in the early days of the troubles, SDLP representatives did not encourage their community to support, or join, the RUC. The party is late in joining the debate on policing. The party has now destroyed the morale and capabilities of the RUC. SDLP Members come out with diatribes, while offering some semblance of support for the police. This Assembly has no credibility if it continues to speak to Sinn Féin in the hope that it will metamorphose into a truly democratic party.

The time has come to leave Sinn Féin behind. Sinn Féin does not want to see progress here unless it is progress inside the narrow lines of the republican agenda. However, time has now run out for that party, which wants its own way on law and order. It sticks out like a sore thumb, because it is so opposed to the structures of law and order that the democratic parties that are committed to the rule of law advocate.

The details of debate and discussion contained in the PFG Committee’s report on law and order issues highlight one thing clearly: Sinn Féin and republicans want the transfer of the maximum number of law and order powers to a power-sharing Executive. That is totally removed from reality, because republicans have singularly failed to stimulate any real flow of trust in unionists. They are held in contempt, and that contempt is well deserved. They failed to speak out against punishment beatings; they have failed and failed again.

What is republicans' attitude to policing in my constituency? The public perception is that they do not engage and that they attack the police. We all know, however, that there are members of the republican community who go through the back door to talk to the PSNI. It is time that we had honesty, although honesty and Sinn Féin do not sit well together.

The answer is simple: Sinn Féin is caught in the shadows when it comes to law and order. Made up of paramilitaries, terrorists, ex-cons and those who never got around to doing anything violent for the armed struggle, Sinn Féin has delivered an anti-police tirade for years. How could it support the very police force that it has opposed? Sinn Féin's one avowed intent is to bring down this state. We have had disruption, civil unrest, muddying of the waters and confusion on the issues on law and order.

That deep-rooted cultural attachment to paramilitarism, law breaking and crime must end. I also congratulate the Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone Mrs Foster, and I want to ensure, for my children and for her children, that we do not put into Government those who are interested only in ensuring that they pursue their political agenda by minimalism, by destruction and by casting every possible aspersion on the security forces.

I pay tribute to those members of the security forces who lost their lives. There are widows and orphans; there are those who will look at today's debate and really wonder why we are paying any attention at all to the organisation that was responsible for creating their circumstances. I concur with what Lord Morrow said earlier: this party will not be putting that party in control of law and order in a Government.

Madam Speaker: A number of Members have indicated that they wish to speak to the motion tomorrow. I propose, by leave of the House, that proceedings be suspended and resume at 10.30 am tomorrow.

The debate stood suspended.

The sitting was suspended at 4.08 pm.

THE ASSEMBLY

Wednesday 20 September 2006

The sitting begun and suspended on Tuesday 19 September 2006 was resumed at 10.30 am (Madam Speaker in the Chair).

COMMITTEE BUSINESS

Report on Law and Order Issues

Debate [suspended on 19 September 2006] resumed on motion:

That the Assembly approves the second report from the Committee on the Preparation for Government, on Law and Order Issues; agrees that it should be submitted to the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland and, pending restoration of the Institutions, calls on the Secretary of State and others to address those matters identified in the report as requiring resolution or further discussion. — [Chairpersons, Committee on the Preparation for Government.]

Ms Ritchie: I am pleased to participate in the debate. Members' contributions yesterday ranged from full-frontal attacks by the DUP and UUP on new policing arrangements to those that fully embraced such structures and wanted to see violence and criminality removed from our communities. The DUP and UUP Members who ranted about the various new policing arrangements showed an arrant disregard for the need for change, for respect for difference, and for the need to address the problems, imbalances and injustices of the past.

Sinn Féin is yet again absent. Its unwillingness to sign up to new policing arrangements and its non-participation in these plenaries is simply giving the DUP a veto over political progress and development. Do Sinn Féin and the DUP want to derail policing and the political arrangements for their own political advantage and to perpetuate the problems of the past, or do Members want to build confidence in the community and ensure that political structures are restored? That choice lies with each Member.

The message from the community is clear. We all must move on and accept the rule of law, a lawful society, an end to criminality and an objective to work the institutions. No one wants a return to bombing, killing, maiming and destruction.

I want to concentrate on district policing partnerships (DPPs). The Committee jointly and collectively recommended that DPPs be reviewed in order to ensure best practice and effectiveness, and to maintain the accountability of policing arrangements. As a member of a local DPP, I agree with that.

Sinn Féin has thus far failed to countenance the new policing arrangements. On 'Sunday Sequence' this week, Gerry Adams said that the people of the North of Ireland need proper policing. What did he mean? What did Gerry Kelly mean on Monday when he said that the people need to be protected? Were they both referring to the community restorative justice (CRJ) programmes perpetrated by members of the IRA? Are they and their colleagues willing to embrace the new policing arrangements that are already in place, or are they still waiting for the Government to deliver on the devolution of justice and policing before they make that jump? Are they waiting to wring more concessions from the Government on policing and justice issues?

Perhaps the most fundamental question is whether Sinn Féin is serious about devolution or is simply using the policing tool as another stick or brake to prevent the restoration of the political institutions, in order to secure its own political advantage. Would signing up to new policing arrangements dismantle the summary-justice programmes that have been operating in republican and loyalist areas for years?

Sinn Féin must be asked other questions. Will it encourage people to join the Police Service? Will it encourage and persuade people with information on crimes, vandalism and antisocial behaviour to give those details to the police, so that those responsible can be subject to the due process of the law? Will it fully support the policing structures?

For the benefit of the electorate, Sinn Féin must answer those questions now. By not doing so and by not participating in this debate, that party is abdicating its responsibilities to the electorate.

Undoubtedly, policing has been transformed over the past number of years. A large proportion of the Patten reforms have been implemented: the Policing Board and other architecture of the new policing arrangements have acted as the drivers and catalysts for that change. New policing arrangements would not exist had that architecture not been in place or had the SDLP and others not taken the courageous steps that were necessary to reform policing. In fact, policing is the one area in which significant advances have been made as a result of the Good Friday Agreement.

I am a member of Down District Policing Partnership. DPPs have been one of the many enduring features of the new policing arrangements in Northern Ireland. Indeed, all 26 DPPs have facilitated partnership and dialogue between the Police Service and the community. They have ensured that members of the Police Service have been held to account by councillors and independent members, who represent a wide spectrum of public opinion. Once police district commanders have delivered their reports at public meetings, there is a mechanism by which the public can question them on issues such as antisocial behaviour, crime, vandalism and burglary. Members of DPPs and the public can submit written questions to the district commanders, who are then subject to further questioning. Members of the Down DPP have continued to monitor the local policing plan and its impact across the district. We have also developed outreach programmes so that the views of the citizens of Down on policing issues can be heard.

However, those who are opposed to the new policing arrangements have subjected some members of the district policing partnerships to vile crimes and acts of terrorism. Those people see violence as a means of venting their opposition and a way in which to obstruct the DPPs' good work. Members of DPPs throughout Northern Ireland have remained resolute in the face of that violence. They have stood strong and firm, and this Assembly should salute them.

Sir Reg Empey: I echo and support the Member's final comments. However, the purpose of a district policing partnership is to get across local views and opinions to the police. Does the Member agree that if the proposed changes to local government go ahead, the consequent policing arrangements would be anything but local and that the nuances of each locality could therefore be drowned out by virtue of their being part of large and unmanageable areas?

Ms Ritchie: I thank Sir Reg Empey for his point of information. I agree, and I intend to talk about the Review of Public Administration (RPA) and the impact that it will have on district policing partnerships in future. However, suffice it to say, after the RPA has been introduced the RPA, we will operate in a very different political landscape.

Much work has yet to be done on policing arrangements. People consistently raise the same issues with us, their public representatives, in our constituency offices and at public meetings of district policing partnerships. They want greater visibility of the police on the ground and more action to be taken to eradicate crime and antisocial behaviour. They also want to be able to live safely in their homes, and they want their streets to be free from crime. To that end, the district policing partnerships must be able to monitor the police to ensure that they are doing their job. However, the community also has a responsibility to co-operate with the police to ensure that they are best equipped with the necessary information.

Legislation and dialogue have ensured that problems with the new policing arrangements have been aired and resolved. However, because of the restructuring of policing command units as a consequence of the RPA, next year will probably be one of the most important that we will face.

I understand that the number of district command units will be reduced to seven or eight in order to mirror the new council divisions. Last week, the Policing Board gave a presentation to chairpersons and managers of DPPs outlining that. A reduction in command units will not provide the best administrative vehicle for the delivery of policing.

For example, the Down District Council area has been placed in the same group as those areas represented by Castlereagh Borough Council, North Down Borough Council and Ards Borough Council, which is the arrangement under the RPA. That happens to be the area with the greatest population concentration. Down has been placed with council areas in the greater Belfast metropolitan area, despite its being a totally different area politically, socially and geographically. Down is also a rural area, with different problems.

Castlereagh, north Down and Ards are essentially urban areas, with associated problems. What will be the impact of a reduction in command units on the delivery of staffing and financial resources? What will be the impact on community policing? How will response times be improved? Will current delays continue because of a lack of personnel?

Down District Council would be much better placed with Newry and Mourne District Council and Banbridge District Council. I urge that the matter be addressed immediately, as the new arrangements are due to be introduced in April 2007.

Another concern is the time that it has taken to recruit and allocate part-time police officers. After a pilot scheme in 2003, it was February 2006 before a further allocation of such officers was made. The areas selected were Moyle, Ballymoney, Newry and Mourne, Derry and south Belfast. Other district policing areas, such as Down, have been advised that expansion of community beat policing relied on the intake of part-time police officers.

The Policing Board has advised DPPs that police community support officers, who have been successful in tackling low-level neighbourhood crime in parts of Great Britain, are to be introduced. The legislation and vetting arrangements are expected to be in place in February 2007, and the officers are expected to be in post by the following year. I hope that that is the case. However, the delay in bringing that into operation is to be deplored.

The constituents of South Down want to see community police officers on the ground helping to eradicate crime. I hope that the new command unit structures will not interfere with the need for more community beat officers in Down. I have a significant fear about that, because it will no longer be local versus local; it will be distant versus local, which is a different problem.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I appreciate the Member's point. It is deplorable that the recruitment of additional police officers has been delayed. However, the Member's party must take some responsibility for blocking the recruitment of an additional 900 part-time reserve officers and for voting for the removal of 600 full-time reserve officers, hence the shortage of staff and the current crisis in police numbers.

Ms Ritchie: I thank the Member for North Antrim for his information, which is useful, although I am already aware of it. The discussion is about new policing arrangements and what must be addressed now: new training; new police; and new action on the ground in communities. I hope that the Member will take that on board and not hark back to the past.

At the most recent public meeting of the Down DPP in Downpatrick, which was held two weeks ago, members of the public told the DPP and the police that they want more community policing on the ground. They want community beat teams out and about to tackle problems such as antisocial behaviour, vandalism and under-age and after-hours drinking. It is extremely unfortunate that a member of the DUP — a colleague of the Member who gave a point of information a few moments ago — deliberately tried to scupper that meeting by putting political questions on the agenda. That so happened to precipitate a phone call from an unidentified organisation using an identified code word, which ensured that the DPP meeting was cancelled.

10.45 am

Two bodies were responsible for that. Clearly, the blame lies with elements in republicanism as well as with elements in the DUP. Does that party want new policing arrangements or not?

Mr Paisley Jnr: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. If the Member is suggesting that a member of this party was associated with telephoning a DPP meeting and giving a coded message that alerted a bomb scare, that is —

Dr McCrea: It is despicable.

Mr Paisley Jnr: It is a despicable claim that is completely unjustified. It was made maliciously, Madam Speaker, and you must make a ruling on a claim that identifies one member who asked a question and an entire party as being associated with a terrorist action. That is despicable, Madam Speaker, and you should make a ruling on it.

Mr P Robinson: The Member should sit down.

Madam Speaker: Order. What you say is correct, Mr Paisley. I am not sure whether that is what the Member said; however, I will read Hansard and make a ruling on it.

I remind Ms Ritchie that she is nearing the end of the allotted time for her speech.

Ms Ritchie: Thank you, Madam Speaker. You have confirmed what I said; I was very careful in those arrangements. Suffice it to say, the people want to see —

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Is it right for the Member to put words into your mouth? You said that you were going to see exactly what she said; you did not say that you would confirm what she said.

Madam Speaker: You are quite right, Dr Paisley.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: The hon Member should withdraw that comment. It was a gross exaggeration of her imagination.

Ms Ritchie: Thank you, Madam Speaker —

Madam Speaker: I did not confirm your point, Ms Ritchie, so I want to make clear what I said. I said that I did not think that that was what you meant. I will make a ruling when I have read Hansard to see exactly what you did say.

Ms Ritchie: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I will abide by your ruling. However, suffice it to say, there are problems, and people have to assume responsibility for their actions.

It is quite clear that the community requires policing on the ground and that it wants the police to co-operate with the community. We also want the community to co-operate with the police. Again —

Madam Speaker: I am sorry; I am afraid that your time is up.

Mr Moutray: I welcome many aspects of the report, particularly the all-party condemnation of the disgraceful practice of exiling. I hope that the report will indicate that a small degree of progress has been made towards reaching the point at which all the main parties oppose all forms of paramilitary and criminal behaviour.

The idea that a party could be in government yet continue to refuse to support the police or the courts is nonsensical. Nowhere in the democratic world would that be dreamt of; no society could operate in such a way. Equally absurd is Sinn Féin's idea that policing and justice powers should somehow be devolved before it decides whether to support the authorities.

One specific matter that affects many people in the Province must be dealt with. Business crime is a problem that must be resolved, because even if we achieve stability and peace here, it will prevent our society from progressing. Research has shown that 57% of businesses in the Province have been the victims of crime in the past year. That is a staggering statistic and is a much higher figure than anywhere else in the United Kingdom. Crime is proving to be a major barrier to running a business. Anyone who is contemplating starting or continuing a business must consider that fact. Crime has closed down many businesses, particularly in areas in which racketeering and extortion are rife.

In its investigation into organised crime, the Westminster Select Committee on Northern Ireland Affairs heard evidence from the Northern Ireland regional director of the Confederation of British Industry (CBI), Nigel Smyth, that the illegal sale of cigarettes, alcohol and other goods was having a serious impact on legitimate traders. That makes it difficult — if not impossible — for those traders to abide by the law and stay in business. He argued that businesses incurred extra costs in ensuring that their premises were adequately secure, such as the threat of attack by organised criminal gangs. He also said that businesses sometimes incurred extra welfare costs, because employees had been victims of armed robbery or other violent crime.

Certain retailers decide not to locate premises in areas known to be affected by organised crime. The potential for businesses to be targeted for extortion, coupled with the risk of being undermined by illicit sales of alcohol, tobacco or other goods, means that some businesses do not deem it profitable to operate in certain areas in the Province.

Extortion is a particular problem for small and medium-sized businesses. The practice appears to be growing across Northern Ireland, extending into new locations outside the Belfast area where extortion has historically been more prevalent. One of the most disturbing aspects of extortion is the fear that it engenders in communities and the consequent willingness of those who are threatened to pay up and keep quiet.

The true extent of business crime is not reflected in official figures, as many businesses have opted out of the criminal-justice system. It is estimated that only 60% of businesses report crime, and they tend to do so mainly for insurance purposes rather than because they expect the crime to be investigated. The Government must make greater efforts to protect businesses from the consequences of crime.

Business crime should perhaps be recorded as a category distinct from domestic crime. That would give a more realistic indication of the problem. Business crime could become a key performance indicator, which would enable the police to receive the required funding. Consideration should be given to relaxing planning regulations in order to allow businesses to install closed-circuit television (CCTV), metal shutters and any other security measures deemed necessary.

In July, the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee report on organised crime stated that petrol retailers in Northern Ireland have come under particular pressure to accept cheaper smuggled fuel, and they face threats when they refuse to do so. Many in the construction industry have been subject to extortion from loyalist and republican paramilitary organisations. Construction managers feel that they have no choice but to make protection payments, such as the threat and consequent fear of reprisals that follow a refusal to pay.

Demands for protection money are also common in the licensed trade. Although Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs (HMRC) has made some progress in combating oil fraud, the quantity of illicit fuel in circulation remains unacceptably high. Government efforts to regulate properly the private security industry, including door supervisors, are long overdue.

No police service in the world is perfect — it would be foolish for anyone to claim that that might be the case. As elected representatives, we should scrutinise and question the actions of the police. Members of my party have criticised individual police officers, policy decisions and operations. However, like the majority of the community, my party and I have supported the police and policing as a whole.

That attitude stands in sharp contrast with that of another party, which is absent today and which imagines that it has an entitlement to serve in the Government of Northern Ireland. Republicans give no allegiance to any force other than their own fellow travellers; they offer no support to any form of justice other than their own. Sinn Féin representatives continually and actively discourage people from reporting serious crimes to the police. Sinn Féin's basic refusal to support law and order is a clear impediment to progress.

In its most recent interim report, the Independent Monitoring Commission (IMC) confirmed that the natural instinct of Sinn Féin/IRA is not yet to live peacefully beside its neighbours or to uphold the rule of law; rather, it requires the bridle of terrorist command structures. That is simply not good enough. Republicans must begin to assist the police with their investigations and encourage their supporters to help in the fight against crime.

As well as ending terror and criminality, there must be an acceptance of, and support for, the rule of law and order. Unless parties sign up to the basic standards of democracy and the rule of law, and abide by them, there can be no place in government for them. The motion calls on the Secretary of State to address those matters that require resolution or further discussion. On this principle — that the rule of law must be upheld and supported by any party that wishes to have a place in government — the Secretary of State's duty is quite clear.

Mr McGimpsey: There are so many policing experts in our society that it is a wonder that policing presents problems and that crime goes undetected — everybody knows how to do it; everybody knows how it should be done. Policing, however, goes right to the heart of our problems and is the most vexing problem facing the political process. We are all aware of how the costs of a failure to support law and order, the police and the courts are paid in a society such as ours. Those costs, in human terms, have been well documented over the past 25 years.

At a time when we are trying to move forward, I was struck by last week's debate on economic matters. The costs of terror and of our failure to support the rule of law and to support law and order over a generation or so have resulted in the types of economic problems that were highlighted in that debate. Northern Ireland is facing a projected Treasury subvention of about £16 billion and a tax yield of about £10 billion. That is a massive deficit for Northern Ireland.

Although the Government here in the 1960s were criticised, they had a track record in creating jobs and investment. The difference between that record and the present is evident, as is the difficulty of attracting investment into an unstable society or into a society in which the state cannot guarantee — as far as a state can guarantee — respect for the rule of law and the courts.

Policing is about upholding the rule of law and protecting life and property. However, 25 or 30 years ago, the situation was entirely different. Our police force, the RUC, had to become an anti-terror police force. The RUC became society's first line of defence against terrorism, both republican and loyalist. The RUC won that war and defeated terror: roughly 10 years ago, the IRA sued for peace and entered the peace process.

Policing is a very emotional subject for unionism; a flavour of which was apparent in yesterday's debate. However, 10 years ago, the RUC understood the need for change and for a dramatic and fundamental review of the force. In fact, the report drawn up by the RUC's change management team, headed by Sir Ronnie Flanagan, was titled 'Fundamental Review of Policing'. In those days, the SDLP, and principally Alex Attwood, would shout about no Flanaganisation; an end to Flanaganisation; and that there would not be Flanaganisation. However, that was exactly what the fundamental review of policing gave us, and that is how the Patten Report progressed.

The Patten Report made 175 recommendations, 160 of which came from the fundamental review. In effect, Patten lifted the plan drawn up by Ronnie Flanagan and the change management team and put it into that for the new police force.

Mr Weir: Will the Member give way?

Mr McGimpsey: If I may develop my point a little, I will be happy to give way presently.

Some 160 of Patten's recommendations came straight from the fundamental review. Unfortunately, Patten decided to add some poison as an incentive to bring nationalism on board. That poison produced the measures that most offended unionism and most offended the force itself: the change in name, badge, flag, and so on and, above all, the refusal to acknowledge the sacrifices made by the force.

Mr Weir: I was seeking clarification, although the Member has just given a little clarity. Is the Member saying that, more or less, he supports 90% of the Patten Report?

Mr McGimpsey: I am setting out the record.

Unionism has had an emotional discussion about policing, although a proper debate has yet to be fully developed. However, the fundamental review made up the overwhelming bulk of the Patten Report. Whether one agrees with Ronnie Flanagan and his change management team's recommendations, the Patten Report is the fundamental review plus some poison. As I said, it is the poison that was added to the Patten Commission Report that did so much damage in unionism and in the force itself.

Most importantly, there was a failure to acknowledge the sacrifices made by the force, with 302 officers down and thousands injured in the line of duty. That remains a matter of great concern for those of us who rely on the police to protect us.

11.00 am

For the benefit of Mr Weir, when the Patten Report was published, the Police Federation for Northern Ireland publicly stated that it welcomed the report, and that there was much in the report to recommend it. Its former chairman, Jimmy Spratt, is now the Member's colleague and sits on Castlereagh Borough Council. It was he who welcomed the Patten Report and said that there was much in the report to recommend it. However, I am not here to talk about individuals. Parties have their own views and they will promote those views, but the Patten Report is what we are dealing with.

The comprehensive agreement of 2004 between the two Governments, the DUP and Sinn Féin is the next important piece in the jigsaw. It was the agreement that did not quite catch on.

The timetabling for policing in the comprehensive agreement was that following the Independent International Commission on Decommissioning (IICD) confirmation that 100% of IRA arms were decommissioned — and guess what happened recently — a shadow Assembly would be established and, within that Assembly, a Committee would be set up to consider the modalities for the devolution of criminal justice and policing. Agreement on that would be reached within two months.

There was a carefully plotted plan and, as far as I can see, it is still in effect.

The British Government would then introduce legislation giving effect to the devolution of criminal justice and policing. They were to promote confidence to allow a vote in the Assembly for such devolution to take place within two years.

Therefore, in 2004, it was anticipated that the devolution of policing and justice would take place within two years of the establishment of the shadow Assembly. That was the agreement between the two Governments, the DUP and Sinn Féin, and both parties made fulsome statements on that. The agreement did not work, but both parties added statements to the agreement saying that they welcomed it and had worked hard for it. It is quite clear that both parties accepted the Patten Report — practically and effectively — through the comprehensive agreement.

The comprehensive agreement was a non-runner due to the failure of republicans to provide proper evidence of 100% decommissioning. A key part of the comprehensive agreement was that the IICD report would confirm that 100% of IRA arms had been decommissioned. The IRA's failure to provide evidence of that halted the agreement. Everyone knows that the planning of the Northern Bank raid was taking place in the background. If suspension legislation had been abandoned through the comprehensive agreement, we could have found ourselves locked into a Government with Sinn Féin, irrespective of bank raids. The only way to deal with that would have been through a scorched earth policy and the full dissolution of the Assembly, which is now being threatened in the next six weeks.

That puts into context the fact that policing goes right to the heart of the political process. The notion that Sinn Féin can support policing only if it gets a handle on running the police and if republicans are involved is something that society — regardless of political allegiance — finds absolutely repulsive. There is some way to go before unionists can accept Sinn Féin's bona fides.

Mr P Robinson: The Member outlined what he saw as the context, but he omitted one thing. Will he tell the House the wording of the document agreed between Sinn Féin and the Ulster Unionist Party in October 2003 to have policing and justice powers devolved to the Assembly by the midpoint of the Assembly's life? The Assembly election was called after that, scuppering the outcome of that agreement.

Mr McGimpsey: There was no agreement that there would be devolution of powers. However, if that had been the case, the DUP has followed straight down the same pathway, because it has agreed the establishment of a shadow Assembly to consider the modalities for the devolution of criminal justice and policing within two months of the comprehensive agreement's publication, and to the British Government's introduction of legislation, in the early summer of 2005, giving effect to devolution of criminal justice and policing. The DUP also agreed that a vote on the devolution of criminal justice and policing would take place within two years of the introduction of legislation. [Interruption.]

That is clear. Members are making comments from sedentary positions. It is the same old situation; Members should be able to sit and listen to other people's contributions. The Member's behaviour might pass as mature debate in the DUP, but that Members cannot listen without whinging does not pass for mature debate in the Assembly.

We are coming up to exactly the same dance that we have had before. From 8 October to 10 October, the DUP, Sinn Féin and the two Governments will be brought together, in some shape or form, in a place in Scotland. I am glad that the DUP is consulting with its grass roots on whether it should go into Government with Sinn Féin.

For the sake of unionism, the Ulster Unionist Party agrees in principle to the devolution of policing and justice. The document that Peter Robinson alluded to reflects that, and it is reflected in the report that is before the House. However, my party is not confident that the time is right for that to happen, and it will not be right in the foreseeable future. The premature devolution of criminal justice and policing would damage confidence in the police force.

The view within unionism is that somehow or other Sinn Féin is running the police or has a say in their running. That is Sinn Féin's boast. Its members are telling their volunteers and supporters that they can support the police force because they are going to be running the police. That is a damaging charge that can be made — [Interruption.]

Are we having a conversation or a debate here? The devolution of policing would damage public confidence in the force. Unionists are asking about the good intentions of republicans; we remain unconvinced of their existence. The political process is one thing, but political institutions are another step, and the courts and policing are something altogether different. It would be wrong for those who have had so much as a whiff of terrorism about them to be involved in the Government, the police and the courts.

There is absolutely no reason why Sinn Féin and republicans cannot join the Policing Board. [Interruption.]

The sedentary remarks of Mr Donaldson serve only to illustrate the points that I am making; therefore I will not respond to them. Sinn Féin should be able to join the Policing Board and be able to show support for the police, and it does not need devolution of policing and justice to do so.

Madam Speaker: Mr McGimpsey, your time is up.

Dr McCrea: I am delighted to follow Mr McGimpsey's 'Alice in Wonderland' — or, rather, blunderland — speech. His contribution follows the contribution of Margaret Ritchie, a Member for South Down, who became carried away this morning. Seemingly, in her kind of democracy, one cannot even ask a question. One dare not ask a question or one is allowing somebody to make a telephone call or one is suggesting that one aided and abetted a telephone call. What a wonderful democracy the SDLP is recommending. However, that is no surprise, given that the party has been tied so long to Sinn Féin's coat-tails.

The hon Member Mr McGimpsey spoke about a friend of mine, Jimmy Spratt. I am just wondering whether that is the same Jimmy Spratt that wiped Mr McGimpsey off the map at the last election and put him into absolute disgrace with the people of South Belfast. A little humility from Mr McGimpsey would be very helpful because he is part of yesterday's team. Northern Ireland has moved on. His blushing says it all — it goes right over his head.

Not only does Mr McGimpsey seem to living in an 'Alice in Wonderland' world, but so also does the hon Member Mr McFarland, who is not here at present. On several occasions, members of the Committee on the Preparation for Government were taken aback by Mr McFarland's comments. When the Committee was in difficulties and really getting to the heart of major problems, he said that it was making encouraging moves forward. In fact, the Committee was taking 10 steps back at a time. In the midst of all that, he still said that the progress was encouraging. I am delighted that Mr McFarland has now entered the Chamber.

Furthermore, he said in yesterday's debate:

"Rev McCrea invited Martin to call him 'William', which was very exciting." — [Official Report, Bound Volume 20, col 1, p 74].

That was further encouragement to him. In fact, I do not speak to Martin McGuinness. As far as I am concerned, those with whom he has been associated have tried to blow me out of existence, so I will not be inviting him to call me "William". Mr McFarland knows that his claim is totally untrue. It is a lie, and he knows that the Hansard report will prove that. Of course, truth does not always necessarily come into the debate.

Mr McFarland: Will the Member give way?

Dr McCrea: No. The Member made a fool and a jackass of himself yesterday, and he will not do the same today.

Madam Speaker: Order. Dr McCrea, you should be careful about the statements that you are making. I know that you understand —

Dr McCrea: I am quite happy to stand over my statements. Madam Speaker, this House should have defended an hon Member against the untruths being said about him yesterday. The House should defend Members as they have a basic right to be defended.

Madam Speaker: Dr McCrea, I think that you know that it is not correct to challenge the Speaker, which is what you are doing at the moment. Could you be careful: as a parliamentarian, you know what you can and cannot say here. You were very close to saying something that you should not have said.

Dr McCrea: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. Those who want to talk about —

Mr D Bradley: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. I noticed during my colleague Ms Ritchie's earlier contribution, Mr P Robinson usurped your position several times by ordering her to take her seat.

Madam Speaker: No one usurped my position, Mr Bradley.

Mr McFarland: On a point of order, is the tradition not that if a Member is accused of something, he or she has the right of reply? In the past, the Speaker has allowed Members to exercise that right.

Madam Speaker: You can reply at the end of the debate, Mr McFarland.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker, it is in order that when you stand everybody should sit down. You should make a ruling on that. You have mentioned the House of Commons over and over again. In the House of Commons, the whole House cries out to a Member to sit down, and a Member is quite entitled to call for the Speaker to be respected when she is on her feet.

Madam Speaker: Thank you for those remarks, Dr Paisley. You are quite right. That point was reinforced when the Whips were in the Chamber at 2.00 pm on Monday.

11.15 am

Dr McCrea: I agree wholeheartedly with Mr McFarland that Members against whom accusations have been made have a right to defend themselves. That is exactly what I am doing. Mr McFarland wrongly accused me yesterday when he tried to be a smart alec and rewrite the history of the meetings of the Committee on the Preparation for Government. He was so positive during those meetings that when things were moving back, he claimed that they were moving forward.

When Mr McFarland was on the Ulster Unionist Party's negotiating team, he was easy meat for Sinn Féin, the SDLP and others. However, he is dealing with different folk today. He will not be allowed to put inaccuracies on the record. I defend my right as a parliamentarian to be correctly quoted. I remind the House that, instead of our being buddies in the Committee, Martin McGuinness accused me of trying to have him killed. He went on to say that he did not like Willie McCrea, and that he did not think that he would ever like him. What kind of buddies are we if he tells me how much he dislikes me? I could not care tuppence whether Martin McGuinness likes me, loves me or anything else. I was elected to talk about what is right and to take a stand for the unionist population of Northern Ireland, which has been tramped into the ground for years. DUP Members stand tall today. Unlike the Ulster Unionist Party, we are no longer crawling. We stand tall for our people, because we have something to say, and we are standing by what is right. I will defend my rights and those of my constituents.

Naturally Sinn Féin/IRA is not present for the debate. Why would it be? What, except heartache, has it contributed to law and order over the past 30 years? It has scattered the bodies of our innocent — Protestant and Roman Catholic — across the community. It has blown our businesses to bits. Why would it come to the Chamber? Why should Members be surprised at its absence? Sinn Féin would have a brass neck to be here to discuss law and order, especially when it could not even agree to the proposal that political parties should support the police and encourage others so to do. That is an ordinary democratic trait that is expected of any political party.

What was the mindset of the Sinn Féin members who were in the Committee? Let me remind the House of what they said. When I challenged Sinn Féin's position on criminality, Conor Murphy said that he did not regard racketeering, murder, extortion, money and fuel laundering or bank robberies as crimes. What kind of a mindset is that for a party that claims to be ready for Government? What kind of a mindset does the SDLP have to have allowed those people to get into Government in the past? I remind the hon Member for South Down that SDLP Members of the Executive did not require Sinn Féin to support the police. SDLP Members sat on the Executive but never squeaked about that because they loved their positions more than democracy. Therefore I will take no lectures from anyone.

In the very Committee that dealt with law-and-order issues, Sinn Féin members claimed that murder, racketeering, extortion, money and fuel laundering, bank robberies, exiling, etc are not criminal activities. Why would they say that? How did they justify it?

They said that if such activities were carried out with the authority of the Provo leadership, they were not crimes. If they were done for personal gain, they could be regarded as criminal. Therefore those people could blow businesses to bits, manage fuel laundering and a rob a bank of more than £20 million, but as long as the wee group of thugs that sits at the top of the Provo organisation said that those things were done for their organisation, they were not criminal activities. What kind of society would we have if this party allowed such persons to take positions in Government?

Mr McGimpsey referred to the DUP consultation exercise. The difference between David Trimble and us was that he was always afraid to consult his people. He was afraid to talk to his colleagues lest they found out what he was doing behind their backs. The Ulster Unionists did not consult their people; they did not talk to their constituents.

Let me make it abundantly clear; we are not asking whether or not we should go into Government with the IRA. It is unfit for Government. We are keeping our people up to date on where we stand and on the leadership that we are giving to the unionist population. Let no one get carried away. This party does not believe that those who have the mindset that murder is not a crime are a party for Government. They never were a party for Government, and until they renounce and repent for what they stood for, and until they turn their backs completely on all of those things, they will not be in Government.

That does not just apply to 24 November. They are not ready for Government while they hold on to the belief that they can carry out all their activities with the authority of the Provo leadership and at its behest. There is a lot more being done under their authority at this moment that they are not claiming.

We need a reality check here today. Look at the minutes of the PFG Committee meetings from start to finish. Policing is one ingredient of the situation; it is not the only one, with all the other matters solved. Does anybody think that if Sinn Féin joins the Policing Board that that means it supports policing? Does anybody think that it will have a total change of mind because it joins it? I know other people who have joined the Policing Board who are still anti-police; they attack the police constantly.

There is also the issue of total decommissioning. Let me say this to Mr McFarland, who made play on certain grounds.

Mr McGlone: Will the Member give way?

Dr McCrea: I will not. The Member will have plenty of time to talk, and I have only another four minutes.

Mr McFarland said that Ian Paisley Jnr and William McCrea had somehow moved on and had accepted that there had been decommissioning. This party has said that over and over again. The reason there was decommissioning was because of the DUP's stand. We did not crawl like the Ulster Unionists did in the past. What did they get for their decommissioning? They got two or three guns at the very beginning; a haul of weapons that had been wasted and buried in the ground. Let me just remind — [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. Please let the debate continue.

Dr McCrea: I know that the corner boys do not like these things, but let me remind them.

Madam Speaker: I am sorry to have to interrupt again, but Members are your colleagues, not corner boys.

Dr McCrea: I shall remind Members that there was significant decommissioning, but we have made it abundantly clear that it was not complete decommissioning. We are not going to be sold half a story. We are going to hold out to get total decommissioning, because that is in the interest of the people. Why would people who are supposed to be democrats want to hold on to guns? Why would they want to hold on to a terrorist organisation except they want to go back to what they do best whenever it suits them?

We are not willing to play the Provos' game. We are not suckers for Sinn Féin or the IRA. Not only must the intimidation and the exiling end, but certain people have to be allowed to come home. What about the Disappeared? What about those whose loved ones have never been able to give them an honourable and decent burial? We are not willing to close our eyes to what is happening. We believe that all those issues have to be dealt with to the satisfaction of the unionist population, who have been led by the nose by the Ulster Unionist Party for far too long. Thank God that the people caught them on. The unionist population has given the DUP the task, and by the grace of God we will do it, in the interest of this wee country that we love and cherish.

Let us not bury the facts about Robert McCartney. I was reading a document that came in the post this morning entitled 'Survey of Public Attitudes Towards Conduct in Public Life'. It contains a section with the heading "Key Political Events in Northern Ireland". In that section, it says that in December 2004 an armed gang robbed the Belfast branch of the Northern Bank of £26.5 million, and described it as one of the biggest bank robberies in history. That was when they were supposed to be behaving like good boys. It describes how in January 2005, Robert McCartney, a Catholic, was murdered outside a crowded Belfast bar by a gang including, allegedly, members of the Provisional IRA.

In February 2005, the Justice Minister of the Irish Republic accused three senior Sinn Féin members of sitting on the IRA Army Council. In December 2005, Denis Donaldson publicly admitted what he had done in the past. In April 2006, the body of Denis Donaldson was found; he had been shot dead.

People may attempt to treat those events as though they do not count. As far as the DUP is concerned, if violence is over, it must be over for good. It does not matter from where that violence comes. There is no place for terrorist organisations to sit alongside those committed to democracy. I am in no way equivocating on that issue. There is no place whatsoever for terrorists, whatever their political persuasion.

There are legitimate forces in this country, which serve under the Crown. Those legitimate forces are the Army and the police, and we, as democrats, must give them our total unreserved support to ensure that we have a peaceful and stable society in Northern Ireland. There can be no situation of move forward; move back; move forward; and move back. The DUP will not be party to any agreement that does not create a stable society.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr McGlone: I heard Mr McCrea calling for a reality check on law and order. I strongly wish to place on record that I resent sanctimonious lectures directed at my party from the DUP — the red beret revolutionaries; the mountain-top mutineers; those who have marched on the streets with paramilitaries. No more lectures. Those in glass houses should not throw stones.

Mr A Maginness: Billy Wright.

Mr McGlone: Yes, there is also the Billy Wright issue. To move to the issue that I was going to address —

Mr Donaldson: The battle of the Bogside.

Dr McCrea: Yes. I would not go down that road, if I were the Member.

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr McGlone: I have the Floor, I presume.

I turn to a material issue that is of more concern in my constituency. I wish to address the confusion that has arisen due to Minister Paul Goggins's comments yesterday on the location of the new police college. The decision on that location came about after a detailed and objective analysis of a number of locations. The site at Desertcreat in Cookstown emerged as the central preferred location for a state-of-the-art, twenty-first century policing college. That decision was accepted unanimously by the Policing Board as an integral part of a new beginning to policing.

Yesterday, the Minister injected some uncertainty into that new beginning to policing. It must be noted that the longer the Government dither on this matter, the more costly the project will become. I ask the Government directly whether they are prepared to invest the necessary funds for new policing arrangements. I call on the Minister to forthwith give his stamp of approval and to go ahead with the plans for Desertcreat in Cookstown, which are already at an extremely advanced stage.

A complete package must be put in place. The opportunities for enhanced training processes should be grasped immediately. That should have been done a long time ago. Those opportunities extend not only to improved training and enhanced facilities for our existing Police Service, but to national co-operation in the island of Ireland with an Garda Síochána and internationally with other policing services. The message to the Government from the Chamber today should be to stop dithering and do it now. The plans to commence work at Cookstown are at a very advanced stage in the Policing Board, and I know that meetings on that very topic have been scheduled for next week.

I am sure that those views are accepted by Members, including Rev William McCrea, who I am sure, despite our earlier differences, will support me.

Dr McCrea: Hear, hear.

Mr McGlone: The Government should press ahead, accept the views that have been expressed today, and proceed with what has already been accepted, planned and agreed by the Policing Board. Those views should be communicated to the Northern Ireland Office (NIO) forthwith.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: Will the Member give way?

Mr McGlone: I have finished, but OK.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: I just wished to say that —

Madam Speaker: Order. I was about to call the next Member, because Mr McGlone has finished. No doubt, there will be time at some other stage, Dr Paisley. The Member had sat down.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: I wanted to tell the House that I raised that matter with the Prime Minister when we met. It is an important issue for all of us.

Madam Speaker: Order. I am now standing.

11.30 am

Mr B Bell: I am not a member of the Preparation for Government Committee, but I recognise the excellent work that it has done over the summer, for which I thank the Committee members. I also thank the Committee staff and other Assembly staff who assisted the Committee. It is an excellent report, and I welcome it. The DUP and Sinn Féin have sat on the PFG Committee throughout the summer under the chairmanship of both Sinn Féin and DUP MLAs. That is a clear indication of how the two parties have been prepared to sit down together, and it may be a portent for the future.

Dr McCrea compared my party to 'Alice in Wonderland'. I wonder when we are going to get an invitation to his tea party. [Laughter.]

Building a lawful society with support for the police and for the rule of law and order is the foundation of all civilised societies. One major problem in Northern Ireland has been the reluctance of the nationalist and republican community, and its politicians, to give active support to the police over the years. It is important that that should be said. There has been a welcome thaw in recent years with the presence of the SDLP on the Policing Board. I welcome that. The onus is now very much on Sinn Féin.

Sinn Féin must accept that the republican community is entitled to have an effective police service. It constantly claims that it is being denied equality on this, that and the other. However, in the field of policing, it is Sinn Féin itself that ensures that its people do not receive the same level of policing as the rest of us, because it will not support the police.

As a unionist, I must say that Sinn Féin still has a lot to do to convince the unionist community that it is serious about pursuing a truly peaceful and political path. It could take a step along that road by giving unequivocal support to the Police Service of Northern Ireland and by encouraging its supporters to do likewise. The disgraceful scenes on the New Lodge Road in Belfast on Sunday night must be consigned to the past. There must be no more of that. As I have said before in other circumstances, nationalists and republicans must actively support the police.

As the Member for Mid Ulster Mr McGlone has said, a NIO Minister was on TV last night talking about the delay in building the new police training college. Unbelievably, it is nearly two and a half years since the chairman of the Policing Board announced that it was to be built in Cookstown.

That delay is completely unacceptable. New recruits need the best possible facilities, and I call on the Government to make the funds available so that the job can be progressed. If the Government had not squandered almost £200 million on the Bloody Sunday inquiry, they might have been able to find the £40 million that is needed for the police college, which will benefit everybody in Northern Ireland.

I want to say a word about law-and-order issues in my constituency of Lagan Valley. I thank the local police for all their work. The staff in my constituency office, and the staff of my colleague in Lagan Valley, Jeffrey Donaldson, work closely with the local police. We deal with many local community issues, and the police are also on hand for law-and-order issues. Recently, we worked closely with the local community police on the KJET project, which highlighted the issue of young people who have attention deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD) and how that disorder affected their lives. ADHD was a factor in many antisocial-behaviour cases. A seminar held in Stormont on the issue was a huge success, and we continue to pursue the issue.

Over the past year, a spate of burglaries against older people has been a big problem in Lagan Valley and, indeed, throughout Northern Ireland. Older people do not feel safe in their homes, and they are scared to answer the door, especially after dark. I have some personal experience of those burglaries. My 86-year-old mother-in-law was a victim of such a crime. While she was at home, a criminal gang broke into her house. She tried to resist the burglars, but they stole her handbag, which was found the following day at the border, just outside Newry. Needless to say, all the money, her bank cards, her passport, and so forth, were stolen. In addition to the theft of the handbag and its contents — especially the passport — such incidents are very traumatic for older people.

It took my mother-in-law a couple of months to recover completely from the burglary, and she is still unhappy about answering the door at night. She deserves to be praised for tackling those people.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr B Bell: I could quote many other incidents. The police in Lagan Valley have a good record in tracking down these criminals. The police have a good record with both communities in Northern Ireland, and I want both communities to support them.

I support the motion.

Mr Ford: I join other Members in expressing thanks to the staff who serviced the Committee on the Preparation for Government. I also thank the staff throughout the secretariat — the doorkeepers and, most notably, the catering staff merit a strong mention — and the two Deputy Speakers who chaired the Committee.

Undoubtedly, those who worked over the summer achieved more than the Secretary of State could have expected when he asked the Committee to consider issues relating to law and order, and criminal justice. Unfortunately, the Committee has not achieved enough. For example, the Committee agreed that there should be a single justice Department, rather than splitting the functions over more than one Department, as suggested by the Government. However, much work needs to be done on that issue before the Committee reaches full agreement.

Naomi Long has already outlined the Alliance Party's concerns about the community having confidence in an Executive that have powers over justice. Collectivity is required. If progress of that kind cannot be made, maintaining the silo mentality of the previous Assembly will not garner confidence from those who, on the one hand, might fear a unionist Minister, or those who, on the other hand, might fear a nationalist Minister having untrammelled powers.

Therefore there is much still to do. I do not intend to go over everything that Members said yesterday, or even everything that Mrs Long said. However, as she had only 15 minutes, there is a little left to say.

One of the key issues that the Government have failed to address properly, even yet, is how to define a "ceasefire" in terms of the relationship that the political parties and their associates have to policing and justice. There are two parallel standards: the traditional definition that has been around for at least a decade since the IRA announced its ceasefire; and the rather more comprehensive approach that was formally set out in the joint declaration of 2003 and subsequently adopted by the IMC.

The Alliance Party does not accept that a ceasefire is whatever a paramilitary group defines it to be. That could mean that it would take no further actions against the state or against economic targets but would maintain some kind of quasi-policing role in what it regards as its section of the community, allowing serious crimes to be perpetrated against ordinary citizens by members of the paramilitaries. It is essential that we move the Government's focus from a definition that, in its early days, was a simplistic way of trying to encourage the political process to be one that recognised that there must be a complete end to all violence. People should not be allowed to continue operating violence against troublemakers or those who fall out with the paramilitary godfathers in particular areas.

Simplistic demands for the IRA to declare that the war is over have compounded the problem. We should not be asking whether the war is over; rather, we should be demanding full reassurance that the IRA's campaign is over in every respect and, equally, that loyalist campaigns are over in every respect. The sad reality is that crises in the peace process have arisen largely as a result of events such as the Castlereagh break-in, "Stormontgate" and the Northern Bank robbery, rather than as a result of much more serious crimes directed against individuals. There will be real problems if that is not acknowledged. The authorities have slowly come to recognise that all paramilitary activity, of whatever kind, undermines democracy, human rights and the rule of law. Those key values must continue to underpin any sustainable progress that we are to make.

Paragraph 13 in the joint declaration of 2003 established a clearer definition of paramilitary activity than we have ever had before. It includes military attacks, sectarian incidents, training, targeting, intelligence gathering, acquisition and development of arms, so-called punishment attacks, involvement in riots and threats against exiles. It is a pity that Government Ministers are still using terms such as “punishment attacks”. In the time of the previous Conservative Government, Baroness Denton promised that they would not describe paramilitary assaults as punishment attacks. Only one group of people in this state has the right to inflict punishment — the lawfully constituted courts. Government Ministers should not suggest otherwise.

Building on that definition in the joint declaration, the IMC has continued to establish its standards with regard to paramilitary activity. Clearly, Governments that previously would have swept such incidents under the carpet are no longer able to do that; the IMC has shone the light on the dark deeds of paramilitaries. That has helped to develop the standard.

We should also recognise that there has been movement by the IRA, culminating in its July 2005 statement. The ambiguous language that it used initially to justify its actions — to say what did or did not fail the test of constituting an end to violence — has become much less ambiguous. To a degree, we can now understand that the IRA is talking a language similar, if not identical, to that of other people. That wider concept of what constitutes involvement in paramilitary activity will be a crucial issue when we come to consider paramilitary activity and organised crime in the autumn.

11.45 am.

We have only to look back to summer 2005, however, to find incidents that involved the UVF. The Government did not treat the murder of an entirely innocent citizen, Craig McCausland, as a breach of the UVF ceasefire, because he was a Protestant murdered by loyalists. However, the Whiterock riots were deemed a breach of the ceasefire even though, fortunately, no member of the Police Service was killed — despite live rounds being fired at them. It seems that the institutions of the state cannot recognise that a ceasefire cannot be a proper ceasefire if the lives of citizens are threatened during it. The Government must develop their benchmarks based on those used by the IMC to determine how all paramilitary groups must be treated, because there is clearly a major element of work that they have not yet covered completely.

I want to refer to police recruitment and, specifically, to the fifty-fifty quotas. It seems that that issue will be increasingly batted around the Chamber. Indeed, it is one of the brickbats being thrown between the DUP and the Ulster Unionists at the moment, and it shows the bitterness that the issue generates on one side of the House alone — and that is without the presence of certain people on the other side of the House. The Alliance Party has opposed the fifty-fifty quotas from the beginning for three reasons.

They are unnecessary, because there are better ways in which to address the current under-representation of Catholics in the Police Service, including wider methods of affirmative action. The Government in their statistics could give us information on which to assess whether the removal of the threat of violence, the wider political support from the nationalist community in general and the change of attitude in the Catholic Church on encouraging police recruitment might have had just as big an effect as the fifty-fifty quotas.

The quotas are discriminatory and contrary to European legislation, and we wonder why we should be seeking derogations of European legislation when there are other ways of encouraging Catholics to join the police.

They are fundamentally divisive, because people have a perception that only one section of our society can get into the Police Service and because those police officers who are appointed through the fifty-fifty quotas are looked on askance by certain people in the community. We need to move away from all those problems.

There are also problems with the entirely necessary recruitment of people from ethnic minorities into the Police Service. Fifty-fifty recruitment is based on the concept of Catholics versus all others. There are opportunities to recruit people from wider ethnic backgrounds, particularly given the law-and-order problems that afflict people from different ethnic backgrounds in many parts of Northern Ireland. There is a need for much wider recruitment into the Police Service, and fifty-fifty quotas damage that possibility.

There is another unresolved issue: it is possible to produce a simplistic figure of the number of perceived Catholics in the Police Service. However, there is no evidence about whether those are fully representative of the entire community. There would be a difference between the son of an Alliance MLA who is perceived as a Catholic and the son of a Sinn Féin MLA joining the Police Service.

The problem comes from crude, simplistic assumptions that this society is divided into two mutually exclusive homogeneous groups, with no interplay between them. It is almost certain that the Government will extend the quota system for another three years, until 2010, but if we are ever to move this society on to a more normal plane, we must ensure that we get away from such divisive actions. We want to ensure that citizens are represented as citizens and that applications come to the Police Service from every part of Northern Ireland and from every social class, political belief and ethnic background. If we do not do that, we will fail in the task of building a modern police service, and quotas do nothing to address the vast majority of those issues.

Finally, there has been much talk in the House and in the Committee about signing up to policing and about the so-called obligations on Sinn Féin to sign up to policing.

At different times, certain parties have taken part in and, due to political protests, walked out of DPPs. They have therefore failed to play their parts in the structures in which they are entitled to participate. It seems to be somewhat illogical for certain parties to demand that another party signs up to policing when their own members have failed to do so when given that opportunity. If those parties wish to talk about obligations, they should recognise that they apply to all parties.

Although the Alliance Party does not have a representative on the Policing Board, it cannot be suggested that it does not fully support policing. It does so through local co-operation, recognising the Police Service as the only legitimate force, and supporting the institutional structures in which my party can play a part. On the other hand, although the Progressive Unionist Party has a member on the Policing Board, it would be difficult to make the case that all its associates fully support policing structures.

Yesterday, my colleague Naomi Long outlined the five principles on which the Alliance Party will judge other parties' attitudes to policing. They include: constructive engagement; backing and acknowledging the role of the Police Service as the only legitimate policing agency in Northern Ireland, and calling on their supporters to do so; a revised ministerial Pledge of Office that would recognise that responsibility; and co-operation between a party and the lawful authorities to address criminality emanating from close associates of that party.

The outbursts in the Chamber this morning, and the virulence of the exchanges between the Ulster Unionists and the DUP in particular, should not cloud the fact that those requirements must apply to every party that aspires to be in government. It is simply not acceptable that, even one of the more reasoned contributions, which was made by Mr Bell, focused only on nationalists and republicans having a duty to support the police. It is absolutely clear that all parties have responsibilities, but all parties have yet to fulfil those responsibilities.

Mr Dawson: Inevitably, much of the debate has centred on the need for all parties to support the rule of law. Perhaps I should put that another way: the need for one party, which refuses consistently to support the rule of law, to do so. I refer, of course, to the representatives of IRA/Sinn Féin who should be seated on the Benches opposite.

As Mr Ford rightly outlined, support for the rule of law is a basic building block of democracy. In a democracy, it is acceptable for parties to criticise and question the implementation of policing policy. In a democracy, it is acceptable for parties to bring to account those responsible for leading policing, to question the delivery of services, to press for higher resources to be made available, and to campaign for the reduction of crime to be at a higher level. Those expectations are acceptable.

However, it is not acceptable for any political party, or any interest group that is seeking legitimacy, to systematically and continuously reject the right of the Police Service to exist and to carry out its legitimate role in society. Fundamentally, policing and the rule of law stand between society and those who seek to rule by the law of the jungle.

Over the past 35 years in Northern Ireland, Sinn Féin/IRA has sought to operate by the law of the jungle, murdering at will and terrorising communities. It is for those reasons, therefore, that Sinn Féin remains opposed to the rule of law and to the Police Service of Northern Ireland. The operation of law and the activities of the police have stood between it and its inflicting genocide on an entire community.

Sinn Féin did not wage a war in Northern Ireland. There was never any legitimacy for its so-called campaign. That movement waged terror — a dirty, sordid, cowardly, murdering rampage of terror directed at men, women and children across our Province.

Yesterday, with some colleagues, I had occasion to attend a funeral. In the graveyard, as I was following the family to the graveside, I came to be standing alongside the headstone of a young Protestant man. He had no connections with the security forces, but he had been murdered by the IRA in 1990. The only reason for his murder was that he was a Protestant. He was building a home for his family in an isolated rural community.

In any other part of the world, Sinn Féin's leadership would stand accused of crimes against humanity, yet, in Northern Ireland, Peter Hain wants to put them into Government. The current campaign against the Police Service of Northern Ireland — the legal and legitimate authority — is a continuation of terror by different means. Republicans have left off with the bombs and the bullets as a means of destabilising society, but they continue to use basic elements of destabilisation in their anarchist campaign.

In its current form, Sinn Féin/IRA is incapable of normal politics and of accepting the norms of a modern democratic society. It demands access to the levers of Government simply to undermine the very constitutional realities in which those levers operate. The rejection of policing and the rule of law are simply indicators of the underlying nature of that revolutionary movement. I see no evidence today — 20 September 2006 — that Sinn Féin has any desire to live at peace with its neighbours; rather, it is intent on continued destruction of the rule of law. I doubt that by 24 November that situation will have changed one whit.

That attitude is unacceptable. There is no room in a Government for those who will not support fully, unequivocally and absolutely those responsible for upholding the rule of law. Sinn Féin was not fit for Government in 1998 and on the other two occasions on which the Ulster Unionist Party put that party into Government.

As Mr Ford has said, all parties in a Government must support the police. They must encourage their supporters to join the police and to tell the police about individuals who break the law. The police must be able to arrest those individuals without fear of physical attack. There must be no equivocation as to what activities are legal and legitimate in society, as my colleague Dr McCrea has ably pointed out this morning.

On the current application and operation of policing in Northern Ireland, it is my view that Sinn Féin's influence on policing has gone too far already. As a result, Northern Ireland today does not have the police service that it deserves or one that is fit for purpose. The PSNI has been robbed of accumulated knowledge of terrorists and their activities by the destruction of the specialist branches of the old RUC, as a result of the implementation of the Patten recommendations.

The PSNI is the only emergency service not to operate efficiently. The Federation of Small Businesses (FSB) recent report indicates that businesses have stopped reporting incidents to the police because they do not believe that there will be any response from the PSNI. That cannot be acceptable in our society.

If the Northern Ireland Fire and Rescue Service responded in the same way as the PSNI, there would be many more burnt-out buildings across the Province, and much more loss of life. Consistently, police officers on the ground relate stories to us of the non-availability of resources, even to tackle major incidents. They have not the personnel available to go to the elderly families who are attacked and whose homes are burgled. The leadership of the PSNI continues to ignore and deny that there is a problem with resources. Instead, it points to comparisons with police service numbers in other parts of the United Kingdom.

I am not interested in comparisons with other under-resourced forces in other parts of the United Kingdom. We are in the midst of the political conference season in Great Britain. I am sure that we will hear repeated calls for extra resources to be made available to police services across the UK. We may even hear promises at the Labour Party conference that further police resources will be made available. Why should Northern Ireland have to settle for comparisons with under-resourced forces elsewhere, while its Police Service needs to be resourced to deal with issues at home?

Northern Ireland still has to deal with a higher level of local terrorist threat and with higher levels of organised crime — which is led by the paramilitary organisations — than other parts of the United Kingdom.

12.00 noon

The FSB report also states:

“Compared with the UK as whole businesses in Northern Ireland are more likely to experience threatening behaviour/intimidation and less likely to experience vehicle theft.”

As the Member for Upper Bann Mr Moutray has already said, Police Service resources must be used to deal with incidents of specific types of crime in Northern Ireland.

A tangled web of legislation lies alongside the lack of resources, and that limits police ability to deal with vandals and criminals. For example, over several evenings, some youths vandalised the property around a local primary school with which I am familiar. A resident telephoned the local police station to tell officers what was happening. However, due to a lack of resources, they could not make available anybody to go to the primary school to stop the vandalism. The resident who contacted the police then telephoned the principal of the school, who then contacted the police, only to be told that nobody was available to stop the vandalism. The principal offered to stay at the school the following evening and photograph those who were responsible for the vandalism, which cost thousands of pounds. She was advised that taking photographs of the vandals would be an infringement of their rights. That is a scandalous situation, and it reflects the lack of enforcement of the rule of law in Northern Ireland.

As well as the lack of resources, the loss of accumulated knowledge and the legislation that hinders police ability to take effective action, there are some in the Police Service of Northern Ireland who are believed to have sympathies with Sinn Féin/IRA. Those sympathies are such that their colleagues have to be careful about discussing in police stations the details of operations. They also have to be careful when discussing the names of individuals who are under investigation. I know the names of the police stations that are involved, as does the leadership of the Police Service of Northern Ireland.

Those truths may be unpalatable. However, the fact remains that the appeasement process has led to a neutering of effective police action in Northern Ireland. All the while, however, the antidemocratic forces, which are represented by Sinn Féin/IRA, demand further concessions and changes to policing, as well as access to the levers of Government.

I welcome the report. It exposes the inadequacies of Sinn Féin/IRA and demonstrates — for all who are willing to see — how far that organisation has to go before it can be regarded as part of the normal political process in the Province.

Mr Hillis: I welcome the opportunity to comment on the Committee on the Preparation for Government's report on law-and-order issues. I hope that those matters are dear to all our hearts.

I am not a member of the PFG Committee and therefore do not have intimate knowledge of the minutiae of the report. However, the law-and-order issues that the report deals with touch every citizen of Northern Ireland.

I watched carefully on the closed-circuit TV the interesting contribution of the representative from Mid Ulster Dr McCrea. I do not necessarily disagree with the sentiments that he expressed. However, given that we are here to discuss a report from the Committee on the Preparation for Government, I find it hard to believe that the Member will ever accept Sinn Féin into Government.

Therefore, I wonder whether the DUP is engaging in real consultation or a public relations exercise. I am not sure whether the DUP is waiting for Sinn Féin to "repent", which seems to be the current buzzword.

As I entered the Chamber, I heard the DUP say that the UUP put Sinn Féin into Government. That is true, but it is worth remembering that we also put Sinn Féin out of Government. Sinn Féin is a party that aspires to share, or shape, power here in Northern Ireland, and perhaps, as has been widely trailed, hold a Ministry for policing and justice. However, if we ever reach the stage of choosing Ministries, which I think highly unlikely, it would be up to the party with the biggest mandate to decide who gets what.

It is ridiculous, if not farcical, that Sinn Féin has participated in numerous meetings of the PFG Committee on law and order over the summer, as is reflected in the report, but refuses to participate in this debate. However, that is nothing new for Sinn Féin. In my East Londonderry constituency, a former member of the SDLP jumped ship to join Sinn Féin: presumably it was a career move and he could see a more guaranteed political future in doing so. Prior to that, he had manoeuvred himself into the chairmanship of a local community forum that met with the police. Needless to say, I am more than happy for everyone to participate in those forums. However, following his Damascene conversion from the SDLP to Sinn Féin, those of us on that forum never again saw hide nor hair of the new Sinn Féin member at any policing meeting. What is most bizarre is that that Sinn Féin man was, in fact, a former member of the RUC. How can anyone be taken seriously when in one moment he clamours to be involved in overseeing the police, and in the next he does not want to be seen in the same room as the PSNI?

If Sinn Féin is as serious about wanting to change the police as it seems to be, it should, as an absolute minimum, express confidence in the police, join the Policing Board, and encourage young nationalists and republicans to join the PSNI, instead of being constantly critical. When burglars are out and about and break into someone's house, they do not ask the householders whether they are nationalists or unionists. When the police are called, they do not ask that question either. We all suffer at the hands of the same criminals, and everyone should support those who try to clear up criminal activity in this country.

Paragraph 70 on page 21 of the report says that:

"The Committee considered a proposal that this Committee believes that association with, or support for, those involved in criminal activity is incompatible with the holding of Ministerial office."

Sadly, there was no consensus, and the proposal fell. The Ulster Unionist Party firmly believes that those who are lawmakers during the day cannot be lawbreakers at night.

The Committee discussed a wide range of matters relating to the rule of law. I wish to highlight the increase in racially motivated crimes in many parts of Northern Ireland. Sadly, I note from the statistics provided by the PSNI that that increase has been considerable. In Newtownabbey the number of incidents rose from 15 to 52 over the 12 months to the end of March 2006; in the borough of Coleraine, which is in my constituency, the number of reported crimes went up from 22 to 37 — an increase of 68·2%.

Although those figures are relatively small, I am sure that Members will agree that they are unacceptable. They are just two snapshots of Northern Ireland. Sadly, there are other figures that are also fairly negative. Immigrants from other parts of the EU and further afield make an important contribution to the workforce and, consequently, to the overall well-being of the general population.

The report addresses the need to enhance public confidence in the police's ability to tackle crime. I want to highlight the success that the police have had in improving confidence among victims of domestic violence. The number of reported incidents of domestic violence in part of my constituency, Coleraine, has risen by 30·1% from 824 to 1,072. However, the PSNI has made a difference. Victims who were previously afraid to report such crimes now come forward. I urge the victims of domestic violence to come forward and point the finger at the perpetrators: let us give them the punishment that they deserve.

I have listened carefully to the debate. We can do all the political posturing that we want in the House, but we must remember that the real world is outside this Building. When night falls — and even during the daytime — crimes of all descriptions are carried out. Unless the Assembly makes a positive difference to the lives of the citizens of Northern Ireland, we will not be doing the job that we were elected to do.

Madam Speaker: The Assembly will hear from Mrs Mary Bradley for the first time, as she makes her maiden speech. Members are aware that by convention a maiden speech should be heard without interruption.

Mrs M Bradley: Madam Speaker, I welcome the report, as far as it goes. However, I criticise the DUP for dragging its heels on a date for the devolution of justice, which would allow the Assembly to make its own laws on justice matters. DUP foot-dragging on that issue will cost us dearly. It means that the Assembly cannot pass laws to fight crime and ensure safety, such as stronger laws for the seizure of criminal assets. The Assets Recovery Agency (ARA) is bogged down in needless procedure, and is the poor cousin of the Criminal Assets Bureau (CAB) in the South. The Assembly could change that. It could establish a strong, all-Ireland criminal assets bureau.

Prisons are systematically used as dumping grounds for mentally ill people, who take up spaces that should instead be used for serious offenders. The Assembly could change that. The Assembly could also ensure that sex offenders are not eligible for automatic remission or have their sentences routinely slashed when they plead guilty. Those are measures that we should be taking but which we are not. That is the cost of suspension; it is a loss to us all.

I am also critical of Sinn Féin. Just as the DUP has dragged its heels —

Madam Speaker: I pointed out that a maiden speech should not be interrupted. However, I must advise that it is against convention for a Member to criticise a party in his or her maiden speech when Members of the party criticised cannot make an intervention.

12.15 pm

Mrs M Bradley: There is a heavy cost to the community for such matters. Nationalists are crying out for better policing, yet Sinn Féin is standing in their way. It will not encourage witnesses of crime to go to the police so that justice can be done. Sinn Féin does not want a policeman about the place, but how else can crime be solved: by vigilantes?

There is deep hypocrisy here. Gerry Adams and Gerry Kelly have told republicans to contact the police in the event of a car crash, as it is a legal requirement. That is correct, and failure to do so means that people cannot claim on their car insurance. Yet, no one was encouraged to go to the police with information about the rape of a 15-year-old girl in Belfast. Sinn Féin is encouraging republicans to contact the police if they have insurance claims but not, for example, if they have information about sex offenders. That begs the question: why does Sinn Féin put the no-claims bonuses of republicans ahead of a child-rape-victim's right to justice? Should the victims of such awful crimes be asked to bear the cost of Sinn Féin's refusal to endorse the Patten structures?

Sinn Féin is not the only party to operate double standards. When it suits them, other parties do likewise. Following the Whiterock disturbances, in which 100 shots were fired, the DUP and the UUP left the Belfast District Policing Partnership, yet both parties were content to remain on the Parades Forum along with those who carried out the shootings.

We cannot pretend that policing is perfect: it is not. This is the fourth year of Patten's 10-year programme of change. Even then, policing will be unable to rest on its laurels. We will always have to push policing forward to ensure that it changes as our community changes and as crime changes. We will always have to work harder to ensure that older people are safe in their homes; young people feel safe on the streets at night; there is a respectful and responsive Police Service, and that it responds to calls when it is contacted.

We can achieve more if everyone works together. Communities can beat crime when people work together. The reduction in car crime in west Belfast is an example of that. In Derry, there has been a great increase in car crime, and that is worrying. We must build on that progress by getting politicians, Ministers and members of boards and partnerships to work with the police and the community. That is at the heart of Patten's vision. It has been seven years since the publication of the Patten Report, so it is high time that all parties got on board.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Madam Speaker: Alex Easton will now make his maiden speech, and it is the convention that such a speech is made without interruption.

Mr Easton: It is no surprise that the Sinn Féin/IRA Benches are empty for this important debate on law and order. I am unsure whether Sinn Féin/IRA is boycotting the debate because it is running away from the issues, or whether it is simply scared of my speech. Members can decide. The only people they are letting down are themselves and the people of Northern Ireland.

Addressing law and order and policing is fundamental to the secure and democratic future of Northern Ireland. There must be an unequivocal commitment to peaceful and democratic means by all parties. The twin towers of that society must be law and order and policing. Listen up, Sinn Féin, when I say that you have been weighed in the balances of policing and law and order and found wanting, and that there will be no place for you in any Government of Northern Ireland while you are found wanting. On the one hand, the IRA claims to have stopped its activities but, the other day, there was rioting in north Belfast, and a young man was shot in the leg. Yet, we are told that all is well.

It is the same with decommissioning. Although I accept that some decommissioning has occurred, why were two IRA dumps found in the Irish Republic recently? We were told that all weapons have been handed in and destroyed.

I want to know what has been decommissioned. It is only fair and right that the people of Northern Ireland know the truth about decommissioning.

The United Kingdom did not gain lightly its reputation of having the mother of all Parliaments. Its deserved reputation was gained through the commitment and practice of the fundamental precepts of law and order. Progress has been made in the Committee, with the agreed recommendation in its report that one Department should be responsible for policing and justice. Let me make it crystal clear: that can only happen when there is public confidence in the establishment of such a Department. Public confidence is fundamental for a policing and justice Department to function. It is not optional or something for the future; it is mandatory, and the public must have confidence in it. That confidence does not exist at present.

It is not for democrats to generate that confidence; it is for the criminal terrorist organisations to prove that their organisations have disbanded, their criminality is at an end and their membership is stood down and gone for ever. Involvement in organised crime, bank robberies and extortion must be demonstrably left behind. I appreciate that that means a sea change and a seismic shift for some people, and in that respect there can be no constructive ambiguity. I challenge Sinn Féin/IRA that its position is untenable. It is impossible to be half-committed to law and order and policing, just as it is impossible to be half-pregnant.

I challenge the republican movement to move on; society has done so already. I challenge it to give up on its go-slow policing policy on law and order. No one should doubt the DUP's commitment to law and order. Its commitment to policing and law and order is non-negotiable; it is not subject to constructive ambiguity or side letters that the Ulster Unionists have tried and failed in the past.

Let us learn the lessons of the Ulster Unionist Party's failures. Remember the saying: "Fool me once, shame on you; fool me twice, shame on me." Members should not forget the Patten Report and the destruction of the RUC. It was the Ulster Unionist Party who agreed to the biggest disaster for policing in Northern Ireland's history by signing up to the Belfast Agreement.

The lessons of Trimble's troubles started when he embraced retarded republicanism and allowed into Government its representatives, whose commitment to law and order and policing was just not acceptable. Did Ulster Unionism bring Sinn Féin/IRA on? Did it lead, as democracy requires, to an appropriate commitment to policing and law and order? The answer to both those questions is no, and we are all the poorer for it.

There is no alternative to policing. I salute the police in my constituency of North Down who, in recent weeks, have dealt with an horrific murder, domestic burglaries, domestic violence and child abuse, as well as antisocial behaviour, which is rapidly getting out of control. Police numbers in North Down have dropped because of Patten Report recommendations. As a result, Holywood police station's hours of service have been reduced to part-time. Its gates are locked, and members of the public are not allowed to enter the station at night. A security guard is employed to guard the gates at night because there is not enough manpower. That is a disaster for the area, which has a population of 10,000 people. When that reduction of service was being implemented, Mr McFarland had very little to say on the matter, and he has had little to say since.

These men and women deserve the support of all right-thinking people in the Chamber. It is time for Sinn Féin/IRA to come up to the mark. The reputation of the DUP as the party of law and order will not be lost; the legacy of those who made the supreme sacrifice in defence and law and order is a honourable one.

Our challenge is to build that future on the foundations of law and order and policing. I appreciate that many who bear the physical and emotional scars of policing, in the face of the most severe terrorism that the world has seen, will be listening to today's debate. They have handed us the baton to build a society rooted in law and order and effective policing. It is to that challenge that the DUP has set its face, and we will work ceaselessly for a society where terrorism and criminality have no place. We will build on progress from this report; the challenge is for others to join us.

Sinn Féin/IRA must appreciate that the DUP will hold it accountable in respect of law and order and policing. The day of half-measures from Sinn Féin/IRA on this matter died with the Ulster Unionist electoral mandate. A fair deal demands commitment to law and order and policing, and it is for that fair deal that the DUP will continue to strive and why my party supports the report.

Mr Attwood: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. When my colleague Mary Bradley was speaking, you chose to correct her in relation to comments that she made about another political party, yet when Mr Easton on three occasions — and Hansard will confirm this — reprimanded another political party, in one case naming a Member of this House, you did not take the opportunity to correct him in the way in which you chose to correct Mrs Bradley. Both Members were making their maiden speeches. Is it in order for the Speaker of this Assembly to conduct herself in an inconsistent manner?

Some Members: Withdraw.

Madam Speaker: I will check the Hansard report, and I will comment on speeches this afternoon. Mrs Bradley was making her maiden speech, as was Mr Easton, and I told her that the convention is that it is not good to begin such a speech with criticisms, given that other Members cannot intervene. As far as I know, Mr Easton made one remark on which I was going to give way, but no other parties gave way, including the party that was named. I will be making a statement on the matter very soon. I regret that Mr Easton named another Member, even if that Member was present in the Chamber at the time. That is not the practice, and it is not courteous.

Mr P Robinson: Madam Speaker, is it in order for a Member to challenge your rulings and authority, and to question your role in this Chamber? Surely there is only one mechanism through which it is permissible to do that — a motion of no confidence.

Madam Speaker: I absolutely agree with you, Mr Robinson. As I said to Mr Attwood, I will comment on this matter this afternoon. However, as you said, it is not in order for Members to challenge my ruling. I will read the Hansard report of this sitting.

Some Members: Withdraw.

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr Attwood: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Hansard will confirm that at no time did I challenge the Speaker's ruling.

Some Members: He did.

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr Attwood: I did not challenge the ruling of the Speaker.

Some Members: Withdraw.

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr P Robinson: You questioned her ruling.

Mr Attwood: I did not question the ruling. I made a point of order —

Madam Speaker: Mr Attwood, please resume your seat. I will take that as a withdrawal if you did not mention —

Mr Attwood: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I did not challenge the ruling of the Speaker; I argued for consistency in the ruling.

Madam Speaker: I thank the Member for his comments. I do not honestly believe that my remarks were inconsistent. I hope that that will be made clear at the start of this afternoon's sitting. It is my ruling, and if the Member is challenging it, he should please do so as convention dictates.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. In considering that matter, will you also consider accusations that Members make about parties' behaviour in certain areas? An attack was made that could not be answered because it was made during a maiden speech.

Madam Speaker: I thank Dr Paisley for his remarks. I tried to address that issue in my earlier comments. I will examine the matter again and give Members further information on it. Members will be aware that the Business Committee has arranged to meet at lunch time today. I propose therefore, by leave of the Assembly, to suspend the sitting until 2 pm.

The debate stood suspended.

The sitting was suspended at 12.29 pm.

On resuming (Madam Speaker in the Chair) —
2.00 pm

ASSEMBLY BUSINESS

Madam Speaker: Earlier today, Mr McFarland sought a right of reply, as he had been referred to by another Member. I agreed to return to the issue. Yesterday, Mr Maginness asked for my view on comments, made by Mr Elliott, referring to Mr Molloy and other members of Sinn Féin. In view of further comments made shortly before lunch, I wish to make some remarks before the debate is resumed.

On the request for a right to reply, there is a clear convention in place following previous rulings from the Speaker. That may be found on page 32 of the ‘Northern Ireland Assembly Companion’. The Member’s reference to Mr McFarland did not allude to any breach of the law. Although the comments were not courteous, they were not unparliamentary. I will not, therefore, provide an opportunity for Mr McFarland to reply in this instance. Mr Elliott’s comments were also not decorous, but, again, they were not unparliamentary.

However, I remind Members that business should be conducted in a spirit of co-operation and respect. It is clear that, on occasion, Members choose to sail close to the wind when referring to fellow Members. Such an approach makes the conduct of debate more difficult. I do not wish to stifle debate, but I hope that Members will bear that in mind. I should be grateful if Members would assist me in upholding the dignity of the Chamber by offering courtesy in their personal references to other Members.

Other Members raised issues regarding maiden speeches, particularly about the content of certain maiden speeches and my interventions during one of them. I have asked the Clerks to prepare guidance for Members, on all sides of the House, in respect of that matter. Members will be advised through their representatives on the Business Committee as to my views on those matters. Indeed, the Business Committee is often a more appropriate channel through which to raise such matters, rather than the Floor of the House. I will not take further points of order on those issues.

COMMITTEE BUSINESS

Report on Law and Order Issues

Debate resumed on motion:

That the Assembly approves the second report from the Committee on the Preparation for Government, on Law and Order Issues; agrees that it should be submitted to the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland and, pending restoration of the Institutions, calls on the Secretary of State and others to address those matters identified in the report as requiring resolution or further discussion. — [Chairpersons, Committee on the Preparation for Government.]

Mr M Robinson: I welcome the opportunity to make a contribution to this debate today. On the second day of dealing with such a report, the biggest challenge is perhaps finding something new to say. As someone once put it, everything that could possibly be said on the subject has already been said, but yet everyone has not yet had the opportunity to say it.

I nonetheless welcome the opportunity of putting my views on this subject on the public record. This is my first speech in this version of the Assembly, and I would like to take this opportunity to welcome you, Madam Speaker, to the Chair.

Before turning to the detail of the debate, I would like to join with the tributes that have been paid to the Committee staff and others who have played such an important role over the past few months. I think that we have learnt over the last few months that, even if the politicians may not be ready to have devolution back by 24 November, the Assembly staff certainly will.

As I indicated, it is not easy to find much new to say in a debate of this length, but there are a few issues that, I believe, do warrant some attention. In particular, I want to focus on the challenges that are facing the republican movement over the next few months in the area of policing. I do not believe that the present weakness of the republican position, or, indeed, the comparative strength of unionists, is yet fully appreciated — perhaps on either side. It is a mistake to believe that the real pressure in the weeks ahead will be on the DUP. It will, instead, be on republicans.

It must be pretty clear by this stage that unless and until Sinn Féin can support the rule of law in Northern Ireland there will not be an inclusive Executive. The sooner that is faced up to, the sooner the problem can be addressed. While Sinn Féin Members are not in the Chamber today, I do hope that they will reflect on what has been said in the debate over the last two days.

The Preparation for Government Committee was tasked with the responsibility:

“to scope the work which, in the view of the parties, needs to be done in preparation for Government”.

It is apparent from the report that, while there are many areas of disagreement, only one really presents an obstacle to the return of devolution. If we were debating the issue of the devolution of policing and justice, there would be many, many more. The issue in this area that is an impediment to devolution is the lack of support for the rule of law.

In virtually every other society around the world, support for the rule of law would be taken for granted. Indeed, no one would even question the commitment of those who aspire to hold office to support the rule of law — but Northern Ireland is different. First, let us be clear about what we mean by the rule of law and what we do not. The rule of law is about the acceptance and legitimacy of the law of the land and decisions of the courts over any arbitrary or competing power. Support for the institutions of the police and the courts are implicit in support for the rule of law.

It is not about saying that every law is a good law but that every law should be adhered to. It is not about saying every decision of the police is the right one but that the police force, as a whole, must be supported, and people must be encouraged to report crime. It means an end to the absurd notion of the legitimacy of the IRA, and that the IRA is incapable of committing a crime. It does not mean that those who have offended in the past can have no part of the future, so long as they have changed.

The fact that someone has broken the law in the past does not mean that they cannot support the rule of law. Continuing to be involved in organised crime, on the other hand, would render one beyond the democratic pale. While other issues that are blocking devolution have seen progress made, there is still a huge distance for republicans to travel in this area.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Wells] in the Chair)

For some republicans, this issue is even more sensitive than that of decommissioning. Decommissioning was about getting rid of guns that had served their usefulness and were now an impediment to the expansion of Sinn Féin. Support for the rule of law is an acceptance of the legitimacy of, if not support for, the state — this from an organisation that did not accept that murders, punishment beatings, robberies or extortion before July 2005 were even crimes. I have real concerns that it will not be able to do so in the weeks before 24 November.

The historical precedents are not good. It took seven years from the Belfast Agreement and 11 years from the first IRA ceasefire to bring about substantial decommissioning, and Sinn Féin has now found itself with a real problem. For the first time in the political process, it is at the mercy of — rather than dictating — events. With the IRA decommissioning last year and the IRA statement, what cards has it left to play? If it does not like our terms for a return to government, what options does it have? Going back to war? Even if it could, it would be politically destroyed with no hope of future success. Concentrating on elections in the South until next May is purely a short-term option until Sinn Féin discovers that it is still a fringe political party with limited influence in the Republic of Ireland.

Ultimately, Sinn Féin and the republican movement have no option but to support the rule of law. As a political movement, it has nowhere else to go — a fact that must be recognised by the leadership. However, that process could take a long time. On the issue of progress towards support for the rule of law, in recent times the record of Sinn Féin has been mixed. I believe that it would be a mistake to dismiss entirely some of the comments that have been made by senior republicans, which demonstrate an inching in the right direction. For example, Gerry Adams has said that four men who failed to appear for sentencing at a Belfast court should have turned up, and he appealed to them to do so. That is progress. So too is the denunciation by Martin McGuinness of the vodka heist in the Republic. However, these are too little, too late.

What is now required is not inch-by-inch movement, or even small steps, but big jumps. On a few occasions, there has been some evidence of movement, however slight, but there is also the knee-jerk reaction and the reversion to the old mantra of “political policing”. The credibility of any positive signs was destroyed by comments such as Gerry Adams’s about Slab Murphy, when he said:

“Tom Murphy is not a criminal. He is a good republican.”

We have also seen, in recent days, the same kind of nonsense, both in comments from Martin McGuinness to the Secretary of State and, on the ground, from Sinn Féin councillors. We should not underestimate the task facing Sinn Féin to persuade its own core voters to support the institutions of the state — and it is the core support, not the wider nationalist or even republican constituency, that needs to be persuaded. I have little doubt that, even among Sinn Féin voters, there is an acceptance of the police force.

Where the problem comes is trying to persuade the people who the republican leadership has indoctrinated for the last 30 years that the time has come to change. The republican leadership has created a monster that it is now having to deal with. As one republican put it, the difference between the Stickies and the Provos is about 25 years.

It is one thing to persuade its members to bring their criminal activity to an end; it is quite another being prepared to turn them over to the police if they do not, but this is the kind of action that is required if people are to be persuaded that things really have changed. I fear that, for too long, Sinn Féin has assumed that this issue would go away or that difficult decisions could be avoided. If we were to turn a blind eye now to this, when would we ever be able to deal with it?

The challenge of persuading those who have lived on the margins of criminality for a generation to move away from it will not be easy, but it must be done. Mr Deputy Speaker, I wish to congratulate all those who have played their part in the process of producing this report. If this report has achieved nothing else, it has highlighted an issue that must be resolved before devolution can be restored. For that reason, I believe that we can say that the work of the Committee over the summer has not been in vain. Whether or not Sinn Féin and the republican movement have the will or the desire to address that will become clear very soon. That decision will dictate, Mr Deputy Speaker, whether this debate represents, as Churchill might have put it, the end of the beginning or the beginning of the end of the Assembly. I welcome the report.

Mr A Maginness: I take this opportunity to thank everyone who was involved in the preparation of the report that is before the Assembly. I also take this opportunity to congratulate my sister in law, Arlene Foster, on the birth of her son. Perhaps I should have said: “my sister in the law”. [Laughter.]

There is some puzzlement on Dr Paisley’s face. [Laughter.]

I hope that her son will enjoy a peaceful childhood and an even more harmonious adulthood in which this society is truly reconciled through the mechanism of this Assembly and the other institutions of the agreement. That is the objective of the agreement, and it should be the objective of all Members.

Over the past two days, I have listened very carefully to colleagues on the DUP Benches. They may have misunderstood the name of the Committee, which is the Preparation for Government Committee, not the Preparation for Dissolution Committee. Given the comments made by members of the DUP, I sense an almost lemming-like approach to 24 November; that they are looking towards dissolution rather than restoration of the institutions. I hope that I am wrong.

I left the Chamber yesterday feeling rather pessimistic due to some of those comments, and I hoped that, today, I might be proved wrong and that I might be elated by the contributions of the DUP. However, I then listened very carefully to the contribution of William McCrea, which was full of emotional political froth, negativity, and absolutes. It seemed to be designed almost to wreck the process of restoration rather than to assist it. I do not believe that that is a constructive attitude for anyone in this Chamber to adopt.

2.15 pm

The SDLP wants to work with the DUP, with the Ulster Unionists and with Sinn Féin, which is absent today. I do not understand why Sinn Féin is absent. If that party can work in the PFG Committee, and if it believes that that work is leading to some progress — and I think that it agrees with that proposition — why do its Members not come into the Chamber and make a further contribution towards that progress? I simply do not understand Sinn Féin’s position, which is inconsistent and contradictory.

Sinn Féin is not the only party, however, that is being inconsistent and contradictory in this process. I have heard much about the rule of law from the DUP during this debate. I do not understand how the DUP squares that with its position of last September, when DUP members walked out of the Belfast District Policing Partnership in protest at police actions during the Whiterock riots. How is that compatible with the strict application of the rule of law? How does that uphold the authority of the PSNI in Belfast and throughout Northern Ireland?

There was an incident on the New Lodge Road at the weekend when a Sinn Féin councillor criticised the police for apprehending a joyrider, thereby — she said — causing a riot. What is the difference between her trenchant criticism of the PSNI and the DUP’s criticism of the PSNI? Indeed, the DUP walked away from an institution that is designed to monitor the police, to keep an eye on them and to ensure that they do their jobs properly. That is a contradictory and inconsistent position.

If the DUP is going to preach to Sinn Féin about this issue, it must look into its own soul. The DUP must regard not the mote in Sinn Féin’s eye, but the plank sticking out of its own eye. If the DUP is going to commit itself to criticising Sinn Féin, it must get its own act together on law and order. It seems to me that the approach that the DUP is taking is one of “our law and Orange Order”. That is partial support for the rule of law, which should be neutral and wholehearted. The DUP’s position is negative, and it is doing great damage to the entire political discourse on law and order.

I have heard DUP Members saying that if Sinn Féin signs up to policing, by joining the Policing Board, that would not be sufficient. What is sufficient? The DUP keeps creating more and more preconditions.

Mr S Wilson: I do not know whether the Member was present at the PFG Committee meeting when his party colleague proposed what he believed to be essential when signing up to policing. That is found at page 21 of the report, in paragraph 67: “The Committee considered a proposal that this Committee calls on all parties to recommend that people join the police, assist the police with enquiries including into organised crime, encourage people to participate in the policing structures and co-operate with other agencies addressing crime and organised crime.”

That was an SDLP proposal. That is what we mean by signing up to policing, and I thought that it was also what the SDLP meant.

Mr A Maginness: I am glad that Mr Wilson adheres to that proposal. However, I would like to see the DUP sticking to it. I agree with that proposal — so does my colleague, and my party. However, we are not saying that that is a precondition for the restoration of the Executive. That was not a condition in the old Executive; it should not be a condition for the new Executive either.

Mr Paisley Jnr: The Member says that it is not a precondition. In Saturday's 'Irish Times', his party leader was asked whether he was making Sinn Féin's endorsement of the police a precondition. He replied that, although "precondition" might not be his word, it was a political reality. The SDLP is stating that Sinn Féin's acceptance of the legitimacy of the rule of law is a precondition; the DUP shares that view.

Mr A Maginness: My party leader said, quite straightforwardly, that a party cannot continue to ignore policing arrangements if the integrity, stability and sustainability of the Executive as a political institution are to be preserved. The SDLP is not saying that that is a precondition; it is saying that Sinn Féin must, at some point, sign up to policing. If Sinn Féin does not do that, further instability will be created. The current levels of criminal and antisocial behaviour on our streets constitute a crisis that we cannot address fully until all parties support policing. That is the goal.

Sinn Féin has said, in Committee meetings and to the Secretary of State, that it will accept policing if two conditions are met: first, policing and justice powers must be transferred to the Northern Ireland Assembly; secondly, the Assembly and the Executive must be up and running. It is my understanding that Sinn Féin is not looking for anything else. If it is looking for something further, it should tell us, either inside or outside the Chamber.

At the Preparation for Government Committee meeting on Monday, Mr McFarland asked the Secretary of State about the Government's obligations in relation to policing. The Secretary of State replied that the Government had fulfilled their obligations and that the only outstanding issue was the implementation of the transfer of policing and justice powers. That implementation can only happen with cross-community support in the Assembly. All parties must agree that. That support must be won through all the parties entering into the argument.

The challenge for Sinn Féin, and for all of us, is to create a new dispensation in which we can grow together in harmony and peace, in a spirit of reconciliation. It is the view of the SDLP that that is the political goal that we should all set for ourselves. Let us forget about negative politics and abandon the emotional residue of the past in order to move on to new politics that we can build together in a coalition.

There has been much talk in the Chamber about voluntary coalitions. The previous Executive was a voluntary coalition.

Mr Paisley Jnr: It did not work.

Mr A Maginness: Why does the Member laugh?

Lord Morrow: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: Let me just finish my point. Nobody was forced to join the Executive. Joining that Executive was a voluntary act. Therefore, it was a voluntary coalition.

Lord Morrow: I thank the Member for giving way. Does he accept that a big shortfall was the fact that the previous Executive did not have the support of the Democratic Unionist Party, which is now the major party in Northern Ireland? Does he also accept that the previous Executive simply did not work? Why did that Executive break down on three different occasions?

Mr A Maginness: The previous Executive did not work because of external — not internal — politics. The DUP did not have to join the Executive, but it did so voluntarily. The DUP may not have attended meetings of the Executive Committee, but it took part in decisions and played its part in the Assembly.

Mr S Wilson: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: No, I am running out of time.

With regard to voluntary coalition of the type that has been suggested, the SDLP is a party of inclusion, not exclusion. Even if we were to accept the DUP's premise and join that coalition, how sustainable would it be? How stable would it be? One cannot exclude a substantial and significant section of political opinion and hope to have stable political institutions that encompass everybody. That is the reality of the situation. We are right in principle, and we are right in practice. The analysis is quite correct.

I come now to the vexed question of fifty-fifty recruitment to the PSNI. When the RUC was set up in 1922, one third of the positions was set aside for Catholics. That was a sensible idea, but, because of many political factors, it did not come into being. Nonetheless, that should be borne in mind. In relation to membership of the RUC — Lord Morrow made this point — Catholic representation, at its peak, was 11%. That was at a time of peace, so it is not simply a matter of intimidation. A mechanism is required to create a fair balance in the PSNI, and fifty-fifty membership is the way in which to do that. It is a derogation from the normal standard, but it is a temporary one.

Mr Kennedy raised the matter of RUC Special Branch. The SDLP was right to criticise Special Branch and to put great emphasis on that issue. Special Branch abused its power and caused serious problems for policing in Northern Ireland. If Members do not believe me, they should ask Jonty Brown.

Mr G Robinson: I want to commend all those who worked so diligently on the PFG Committee over the summer months and to welcome the report.

I shall restrict my remarks today to the problems of organised crime in Northern Ireland. That is influenced significantly by the involvement of paramilitary organisations, loyalist and republican. Their disciplined structures have allowed them to evolve into lucrative criminal enterprises and to utilise their terrorist expertise when required.

All paramilitary groups in Northern Ireland have been heavily involved in organised crime as a means of raising finance for their organisations and also for personal gain. PIRA is closely involved in cigarette smuggling and has hijacked a number of lorries in the past couple of years. The UDA, the LVF, the Red Hand Commando (RHC) and republicans have been deeply involved in the drugs trade. One loyalist brigade was paying another brigade £250 a week for permission to trade in its area. A loyalist gang from County Londonderry has been responsible for a number of robberies over the past few years, netting many tens of thousands of pounds. Last year, one building contractor was believed to be paying the UDA £2,500 a week in protection money.

The Independent Monitoring Commission has recognised the fact that organised crime is a major continuing legacy of terrorism, with some 60% of all organised crime gangs in Northern Ireland, and some two thirds of the most serious gangs involved in international activity, having paramilitary links. The IMC has pointed out that those paramilitary associations brought to organised crime a ruthlessness, expertise and infrastructure unique to Northern Ireland.

An indication of the proceeds of those crimes can be seen in the amounts of money involved when law enforcement agencies conduct successful cases — and those cases represent only a small proportion of all illegal activity. In 2001-02, HM Customs and Excise seized 88·5 million cigarettes in Northern Ireland.

2.30 pm

Fuel laundering plants that have been detected in Northern Ireland can produce up to 20,000 litres per week. The loss of duty to the Exchequer, from which the criminal profits, could be up to £90,000. Counterfeit goods to the value of nearly £7 million were seized in 2002. Tackling organised crime here is particularly difficult, given the sophistication of the criminals, including paramilitaries. There is evidence of the existence of highly developed methods of marketing, distribution and sale. The criminals are flexible and resilient. Some operations involve vast sums and the services of skilled lawyers and accountants.

The involvement of paramilitaries in organised crime is deep-rooted. It makes the threat of such crime more complex and its impact more serious. It affects all levels of illegality, because organised crime depends on other criminal activity, such as the selling of drugs, illicit fuel and tobacco and the use of intimidation and violence to maintain the local control on which those activities depend. The funds that are secured from crime feed paramilitary groups.

In the year before last, the activities of 16 high-level, prolific gangs were frustrated, disrupted or dismantled, and 126 individuals were arrested. The majority of the gangs that have been identified in Northern Ireland's annual threat assessment report remain active. Violent crimes such as cash-in-transit robberies are on the increase, as are the so-called tiger kidnappings, which have a huge psychological impact on their victims and their families.

If we are to have a truly peaceful society, organised crime must be eradicated. The police and the authorities of law and order deserve the support of all elected representatives in their endeavours to stop that crime.

Mr S Wilson: The part of the report from the Committee on the Preparation for Government that deals with law and order issues is the most important that we will debate. Last week we debated the report on the economic challenges facing Northern Ireland. That was an easy subject to discuss, because everyone wants a share of economic prosperity. Of course, we were all asking the British Government to hand over money to do the job.

The issues in this report require some movement from parties in Northern Ireland. This is where local people have to divvy up. We have made it clear that, as far as we are concerned, these matters will be the bedrock on which we will have either strong and stable devolution or no devolution. It is as simple as that. For years we have tried to fudge the issue, mostly for the benefit of republicans. What is their attitude towards the rule of law, the police, policing structures and a proper democratic society? Every time, whether it has been local parties, the Irish Government, or the Westminster Government the issue has been fudged simply to allow Sinn Féin off the hook. Some people will praise the Ulster Unionist Party for that, but some will condemn it. Many times the UUP took a step forward or jumped over the edge of the cliff hoping that others would follow, and every time it was let down.

The electorate has put the DUP in the position of either acquiescing and letting devolution happen, or of withdrawing support and not letting it happen. I am sure that party colleagues have put repeatedly on the record that we want devolution to happen.

It must happen in a way that will ensure that it can be sustained next year, the year after that and the year after that. For that to happen, there must be unanimous support for the police.

During the summer, the PFG Committee dealing with law and order met on Wednesdays, and I would challenge any Member to say that my party's representatives did not try to play a constructive role in achieving levels of agreement. Indeed, at times, the DUP members helped to pull the Sinn Féin members out of some of the holes that they were digging for themselves. On occasion, because it was a bit difficult for members from Sinn Féin to consent to unionist proposals, and we thought that they might come better from the SDLP, we told the SDLP members that if they were to take forward certain proposals, we would support them to see whether we could get agreement on some of the policing issues. Even that did not work.

The signs do not look good. Let us consider just two of the unsuccessful proposals. They were not put forward in an aggressive way by the DUP: the SDLP made them. The first, which is in paragraph 67 of the report, states:

"That this Committee calls on all parties to recommend that people join the police, assist the police with enquiries including into organised crime, encourage people to participate in policing structures and co-operate with other agencies addressing crime and organised crime".

Members cannot expect to become Government Ministers unless they support that principle. The only party that refused to support it was Sinn Féin. The Committee went further and said that Ministers should have to adhere to certain standards, one of which should be dissociation from criminal behaviour. The second unsuccessful proposal that I wish to highlight is in paragraph 70. It states:

"That this Committee believes that association with, or support for, those involved in criminal activity is incompatible with the holding of Ministerial office".

Which party opposed that proposal? Sinn Féin, of course.

I listened closely to the Member for North Belfast Mr Maginness, who talked about the report's being part of preparation for Government, but parties cannot say that they have prepared themselves for Government if they renege on those two important proposals which were put forward by the SDLP and rejected by Sinn Féin. Unless those who wish to participate in the process make a commitment to abide by those two principles, Government in Northern Ireland will never be sustainable.

That is why the signs are not good. It is not because, as the Member for Foyle Mrs Bradley suggested in her maiden speech, the DUP wished to drag its feet. It is not because, as the Member for West Belfast Alex Attwood suggested yesterday, the DUP is not up for power sharing, and it is not because, as has been suggested, the DUP is not prepared to take the plunge.

I noticed that, after my intervention, the Member for North Belfast Mr Maginness said that if we did not achieve a commitment to policing, it would be a recipe for more and more instability. How can we hope for long-lasting devolved institutions if we choose a route that even those who criticise the DUP believe will create instability? It would be pointless to set up institutions that would be as unstable as those in the past. How could they work when those Members who want to be Government Ministers are not prepared to give their full support to the people who would have to uphold the laws that they would pass? How could they work if those Members are not prepared to dissociate themselves from those who are involved in criminal activity?

Mr D Bradley: I take it that the Member is dissociating himself from his party's past actions in challenging the rule of law. I am referring to the red beret brigade and to marching up and down hills in County Antrim, waving gun licences. I am also referring to the presence of one of the Member's colleagues on a platform with a member of the Loyalist Volunteer Force (LVF). Do I take it that that section of his party's past has been forgotten?

Mr S Wilson: For a Member of a party that tiresomely tells us that we must leave the past behind and look forward to the future, Mr Bradley has a great memory to drag up all of that. I am making it as clear as I possibly can that to participate in Government, Sinn Féin must support the police and dissociate itself from those involved in criminal activity. The Member should not try to cover up his embarrassment that his party is prepared to go into Government even when those conditions are not met, because he is afraid either that devolution will not happen and he may lose his job, or that he will offend Sinn Féin.

Our position is simple. You cannot have devolution, not because we say so, but because it will not work unless those conditions are met.

Mr Attwood: I submit to the Member that his position is somewhat inconsistent. Maybe he was on holiday or did not read the papers that weekend, but in the last 10 days the deputy leader of his party explicitly said that it was not a requirement for Sinn Féin to be on the Policing Board in order to have restoration of the Executive. Rather than berate Members on this side of the Chamber, I suggest to the Member that he has an urgent conversation with his deputy leader to clear up his quite evident confusion about his own party's position on Sinn Féin going into Government.

Mr S Wilson: I know the Member gets confused quite often, and I hope to have time to talk later about his confusion on the Policing Board. The current reason for the Member's confusion is that the deputy leader of my party has gone further and said that the sole requirement proposed by some people that being on the Policing Board makes a party eligible to be in Government is not sufficient. Supporting the Policing Board or being on a district policing partnership is not sufficient. There must also be a commitment to going out to encourage others to join the police and support the police. That is the DUP requirement, unlike watered-down requirements proposed by others.

We will be doing Northern Ireland a disservice if we let Sinn Féin off the hook once again. It has been let off the hook time and again. If it wants to be in Government, now is the time to pay up. Credit has been extended to the party for far too long; it has been given tick for far too long. It will not get that any longer. It will have to pay up. It is important for the whole of society that Sinn Féin be pushed down that path. If Sinn Féin needs more time, it will get more time. If it has so poisoned the atmosphere in its own community that it cannot turn people around quickly enough, we will give it time to do that. However, we are not going to take that party on its word that when we have handed it what it wants on a plate, it will eventually have an Ard-Fheis and present the matter there.

Committee discussions over the summer indicated that it is not the DUP, but Sinn Féin, that has a long way to go. Much as my party dislikes the idea of having Sinn Féin in Government, and much as it will rankle with many people across Northern Ireland, if certain conditions are met, we will accept that the Executive will be inclusive, but we will not move from the conditions we believe to be necessary.

The Member for South Belfast Mr Attwood made a point about the timing of all of this. There was much discussion during the Committee about timing. The conditions are important, not the timing, and the SDLP has accepted that.

2.45 pm

The SDLP supported the Northern Ireland (Miscellaneous Provisions) Order 2006, which stated that the timing would be right when there was sufficient confidence for the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to introduce a motion on the devolution of policing. The Assembly would then ratify that motion and the legislation would go through Westminster. That has been accepted, and no timescale has been set. It is disingenuous for the Member for South Belfast Mr McGimpsey to suggest that a two-year period has been accepted by the DUP. Of course, the Member renounced some of the policing arrangements that he had agreed to in the past, and I notice his dissociation with the Patten recommendations. However, I am not sure which of the Patten recommendations he supports and which of them he does not support. The one thing I do know — [Interruption.]

Mr McGimpsey: Will the Member give way?

Mr S Wilson: I think that the Member for South Belfast and the Member for North Belfast both want to speak. I was having a go at the Member for South Belfast, and the Member for North Belfast wants to answer for him. That would be very unfair. The Member for South Belfast should have a chance to speak.

Mr A Maginness: Does the Member, together with the rest of his party, now disown the comprehensive agreement completely and absolutely? Was that what the DUP agreed to do when it signed up to it?

Mr S Wilson: I am very happy to defend what was said in that part of the comprehensive agreement, which makes it quite clear that there could be devolution of policing only when there was confidence. Rather than allow the British Government, the Irish Government, or any other outside party to decide when there was sufficient confidence, the DUP asked for a triple lock, which, fortunately, went through Parliament with the support of the SDLP. The DUP appreciates the fact that Mr Maginness's three colleagues in Westminster supported it on that and allowed the triple lock.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Will the Member draw his remarks to a close?

Mr S Wilson: The requirement for confidence has been accepted, and the DUP will have the final decision.

Mr Donaldson: This has been a lively debate and I welcome the opportunity to discuss the report in plenary session. As my comments will be the last of the day, I reiterate the thanks that have been conveyed already to the Committee staff and to all those who participated in its proceedings.

The DUP welcomes the publication of the report. The Committee has made some progress, and there is cross-party support on the modality for the devolution of policing and justice powers in that they will be devolved to a single Department. There is a measure of agreement on issues relating to ministerial arrangements, although further discussion is required. There is also significant agreement on matters dealing with the powers to be devolved, and the areas that will come under a new Department's remit. However, further discussion is also required on those issues. There is scope for further discussion on the timing of the devolution of policing and justice, because there is no agreement on when that should happen.

The timing of devolution is very important. Indeed, reference has been made to the comprehensive agreement, and I will read an extract from the preamble. It states that:

“Despite intensive efforts over a number of months and very considerable progress, not all elements were agreed.”

I do not think that any of the parties signed up to every single aspect of the comprehensive agreement. However, the Democratic Unionist Party does not resile from the main thrust of the agreement and the major changes required to the political institutions. The DUP believes that those changes will be delivered in the fullness of time through the legislative process at Westminster. The DUP does not resile from the timetable contained in the comprehensive agreement on policing and justice.

I listened to the comments made by the Member for South Belfast Mr McGimpsey, who has inferred that somehow the Democratic Unionist Party had signed up to a two-year time frame for devolution. That is simply not the case. If Mr McGimpsey looks at the timetable that forms annexe A of the comprehensive agreement, he will see the following:

“British Government introduces legislation giving effect to devolution of criminal justice and policing. Legislation to come into effect once sufficient confidence has been established, as expressed in a cross-community vote in the Assembly, proposed by the First and Deputy First Minister.”

There is no mention of a specific time frame. The devolution of policing and justice is conditional on confidence rather than on a time frame. Those commitments are secured in the Northern Ireland (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 2006, and the triple lock to which my colleague the Member for East Antrim Sammy Wilson referred is now enshrined in that legislation.

In effect, that means that the DUP and unionism do not have to sign up to the devolution of policing and justice, and see that legislation given effect, unless we are satisfied that sufficient confidence exists in the community, which must be verified by a cross-community vote on a proposal put to the Assembly by the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. Parliament would then give effect to the legislation by way of an Order being passed in both Houses.

A number of safeguards ensure that the Assembly has control over the timing of the devolution of policing and justice powers. The DUP did not fall into the same trap as others did in the past. I have a copy of the agreement that Mr McGimpsey's former party leader, David Trimble, entered into with Sinn Féin and the Government in October 2003 that specifies that devolution should take place at the mid-point of the Assembly. Had that timetable been followed, the devolution of policing and justice would have happened by now. The DUP will not make the mistake of being tied to a timetable. It is important that the conditions are right: Sinn Féin must have endorsed the police and the rule of law, and there must be sufficient time to judge whether its commitment is genuine and unequivocal. Then, and only then, will the DUP consider whether the conditions are right for the devolution of policing and justice powers.

In that sense, the DUP has served the community well by ensuring adequate safeguards. Policing and justice are big issues: rest assured that, nine times out of 10, the lead news story on the radio in the morning will relate to either a policing issue or to a justice issue.

No other subject that will come under the remit of the Assembly is potentially as controversial. That is why it is essential to get this absolutely right — the Member for East Antrim was absolutely correct — and that is what the DUP is determined to do. The DUP does not want to leap into agreeing to the devolution of policing and justice only to discover that it got it wrong, that the timing was wrong or that there was not sufficient confidence.

The Member for North Belfast Mr Maginness told the DUP that a requirement for Sinn Féin to sign up to policing and justice should not be a precondition to the devolution of powers. However, in the DUP's experience, unless Sinn Féin has signed up to something before a move is made, there will be a long wait for it to sign up afterwards. Let us learn from past mistakes, when people leapt into Government only to discover that they had leapt over the precipice and there was nothing below. That is why it is essential to pin down Sinn Féin on this issue.

(Madam Speaker in the Chair)

After all, when it comes to prerequisites, preconditions, and so forth, the SDLP is a past master: for years, it would not sit on the Police Authority for Northern Ireland because the conditions were not right. I doubt whether the SDLP would have signed up to the Belfast Agreement had it not been for the inclusion of the elements that led to the Patten Report. Those were the SDLP's preconditions and prerequisites. Yet the SDLP tells the DUP that it cannot have any prerequisites or preconditions.

It tells us that we should put blind faith in Sinn Féin, that one day it will come good and sign up to policing. I am sorry, but experience tells us that it is better to have such matters firmly tied down and unequivocal commitments made, rather than go into a situation where those may not be achieved for some time. I agree with the Member for East Antrim: it is unsustainable to have Ministers in Government who do not accept the rule of law and who are not prepared to support the police. That would not happen in Dublin, London or Washington. Why should it happen in Belfast? That is why it is important to get that right.

The Member for South Belfast Mr McGimpsey berated the Democratic Unionist Party about there being, potentially, a Sinn Féin Minister in charge of policing. What is the difference between policing the streets and being in charge of the education of our children? Does the principle of the rule of law not apply in that situation? Of course it does; yet the Ulster Unionist Party was in a Government in which Martin McGuinness, the Member for Mid Ulster, was Minister of Education. The rule of law did not matter much to that party then.

The Ulster Unionist Party has berated the DUP about the comprehensive agreement. However, it has the potential to create greater accountability in the political institutions. Everyone must welcome that. It repairs some of the damage that was done and the mistakes that were made in the Belfast Agreement: it is not mere tinkering. As the Member for Foyle and leader of the SDLP said in a recent statement, contrary to what the Secretary of State — whom I will not name, so as to keep on the right side of you, Madam Speaker — has claimed in the House of Commons, the so-called comprehensive agreement does not provide for “mere tweakings” of the Good Friday Agreement. In other words, as the leader of the SDLP accepts, the comprehensive agreement brings about major, substantial changes that will be of benefit to Members. Indeed, the hon Member for South Belfast might have seen the new maternity hospital located in his constituency had there been the level of accountability in the last Assembly that there will be in the next one. The Assembly said that the maternity hospital should be located in south Belfast. However, the Minister decided that it should go to west Belfast. That is why there must be accountability.

Mr McGimpsey: The matter of the location of the maternity hospital was subject to a vote in the Assembly. My recollection is that the Minister won that vote. I agree with the Member’s remarks. However, the Minister was able to get support for that.

Mr Donaldson: I was not a Member of the Assembly at that time, but my recollection is that the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety voted in favour of the Jubilee Hospital. The Minister, however, issued a directive over the heads of the Assembly and went against the wishes of the scrutiny Committee.

I congratulate the Member for Foyle Mrs Bradley on her maiden speech. She cited a long list of laws that the Assembly could change. I agree with her and look forward to the day when some of those judicial laws could be changed with regard to dealing with offences. She blames the DUP for the inability of the Assembly to do that. My party supports the police and wants there to be devolution of policing and justice. Sinn Féin does not support the police and blocks the creation of circumstances in which there could be devolution of policing and justice powers. I want to clarify that my party does not stand in the way of devolution. The DUP is a devolutionist party. It wants the Assembly to be fully functioning. It is worth bearing in mind that the unionist Government of 1972 resigned because their policing and justice powers had been removed. The DUP wants those powers to return to Stormont, but only in the right circumstances.

3.00 pm

Mr Attwood: If the Member supports the police, perhaps he will respond to Alban Maginness’s comments about elements in the DUP and in the Orange Order — of which Mr Donaldson is a member — who failed to support the police and to dissociate themselves from criminal behaviour last September. I ask so that there will be no ambiguity on the matter. Will the DUP dissociate itself from anyone in its organisation who acted in such a manner?

The Member said that he expected the comprehensive agreement to be legislated for. Given that this is an important matter, and in advance of the negotiations on 11, 12 and 13 October, will he confirm to the Assembly that the DUP has a commitment from the British Government to legislate for the comprehensive agreement, independent of whatever transpires in St Andrews?

Mr Donaldson: I thank the Member for West Belfast for his intervention. I condemned the acts of violence that took place last summer. The DUP met with police commanders and, where we felt that the police had acted inappropriately, we said so, and where we felt that there had been violence against the police, we condemned that unequivocally and will do so again.

The Member for West Belfast supports the police in principle, but he is always quick to criticise when he feels that they have stepped out of line. Does he not accord the same privilege to other Members who, when they feel that the police have got it wrong, tell them that they have got it wrong? Every Member should have that right.

With regard to the comprehensive agreement, the Secretary of State has said publicly that he will introduce legislation in the autumn to give effect to changes that are required to make the institutions more accountable. The DUP welcomes that. I hope that we can make further progress, but the obstacle to that progress is the party that is absent and its failure to fully engage on this issue. Sinn Féin stated that when it got legislation on policing and justice, it would call an Ard-Fheis and make a decision to support the police. That legislation is in place, so what is holding it back? Why is it delaying? Why will it not step over the line, embrace democracy and the rule of law and join the rest of us in building a better future that is based on respect for that rule of law?

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That the Assembly approves the second report from the Committee on the Preparation for Government, on Law and Order Issues; agrees that it should be submitted to the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland and, pending restoration of the Institutions, calls on the Secretary of State and others to address those matters identified in the report as requiring resolution or further discussion.

Adjourned at 3.02 pm.

THE ASSEMBLY

Tuesday 26 September 2006

The Assembly met at 10.30 am (Madam Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

ASSEMBLY BUSINESS

Madam Speaker: In accordance with the Northern Ireland Act 2006, the Secretary of State has directed that the Assembly should sit on Tuesday 26 September 2006 at 10.30 am to consider business as it appears on the Order Paper.

THE LATE MR MICHAEL FERGUSON MLA

Madam Speaker: Members, it is my sad duty to inform the House of the death of Mr Michael Ferguson, a Member for the West Belfast constituency. In accordance with convention, as a mark of respect for Mr Ferguson, the sitting will now be suspended until 11.00 am.

The sitting was suspended at 10.33 am.

On resuming (Madam Speaker in the Chair) —
11.00 am

ASSEMBLY BUSINESS

Madam Speaker: Before today's business, I wish to address the issue of references to members of other elected chambers. Members will recall that, on Tuesday 12 September, I drew attention to a convention previously observed by the Northern Ireland Assembly.

For the information of the House, I will quote the words of the former Speaker, which can be found on page 77 of the 'Northern Ireland Assembly Companion'. In referring to comments made on the Floor about two Northern Ireland Members of the European Parliament, which were capable of being construed as personal criticism, the former Speaker said:

"It is generally accepted in most responsible elected bodies that Members should not comment on Members of other elected chambers, not least because those Members are not present to defend themselves."

I would also refer Members to the twenty-third edition of Erskine May, which refers, at page 439, to the need to guard against all appearance of personality in debate. I believe that it is appropriate for the Assembly to adhere, where possible, to the guiding principle of guarding against the appearance of personality in debate.

In reminding the House of this principle, and given the range of issues that emerged in the ensuing exchanges with Members, it is apparent from Hansard that the issues on which I sought to offer guidance became less than clear. I would like to take this opportunity to restore some clarity by dealing with each of the areas of apparent confusion in turn.

I will turn first to the issue of naming officials. It has been the convention in the Chamber that references to civil servants should be to an official position and not to a named individual. Indeed, Members may recall that I drew this convention to the attention of the House on 5 June 2006, when I reported that the head of the Civil Service had agreed that Northern Ireland Civil Service officials would attend relevant debates and sit in the officials' boxes.

With regard to the comments about members of other elected chambers, I have already referred to the background of the existing convention. The convention appears to be more concerned with the avoidance of comments that could be interpreted as being of a personal nature, and to be closely associated with the importance of maintaining the dignity of the House. It is clear that critical comments of a personal nature are equally out of order whether the reference is to a named individual or to that person's official title.

The two earlier rulings may have become confused, particularly the misconceptions that arose about the use of names. This confusion then became further compounded by reference to "other elected chambers" and "criticism of Ministers", to which I will now turn.

Always mindful of the dignity of the House, to which I have already referred, it would seem that the proper role of Members of this Chamber would be to comment on, and challenge, the policies of the Government and its Ministers — whether by name or office — in the interests of the electorate. As Speaker, I can think of many occasions since 15 May 2006 on which this has been the case, and I consider that it is perfectly in order for Members to do so.

In the same context, and subject to it being relevant to the business being conducted, I would not generally consider it to be out of order for a Member to comment on the policies of the Government of any country in the world. In so doing, references might properly be made to particular Ministers or, indeed, to the heads of those Governments, with regard to the policy in question.

However, what I would not consider to be in order, in relation to remarks about members of other legislatures, is where comments stray into the arena of personal insults, vitriol or invective.

I would have no hesitation in asking a Member to temper his or her comments where, in my view, a line has been crossed.

My original intention in reminding the House of our conventions stemmed from noting a number of references in the previous day's Hansard both to civil servants and to current and former Ministers, here and elsewhere. I therefore considered that it might be timely to draw attention to the earlier ruling.

I hope that there is now greater clarity about these issues. If Members continue to have concerns, or seek further clarity, they can be addressed through the usual channels or on advice from the Clerks in the Business Office.

I trust that those matters are now clearer. I shall move on.

SECRETARY OF STATE MOTION

Report on Rights, Safeguards, Equality Issues and Victims

Madam Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed that Members will be called to speak to the motion, according to the usual conventions, with an upper time limit of 15 minutes to be applied to all those called to speak. The debate will continue until all those who have indicated that they wish to speak have been called to do so. I intend to send a copy of the Official Report of the debate to the Secretary of State.

Motion made:

That the Assembly notes the work of the Committee on the Preparation for Government and the report on Rights; Safeguards; Equality Issues and Victims. — [The Secretary of State.]

Mr McCausland: In the elections to the Northern Ireland Assembly, the Democratic Unionist Party committed itself to seeking a fair deal. That principle of fairness is very much in keeping with the core principles of the document ‘A Shared Future’, one of which is equality. The work of the Committee on the Preparation for Government (PFG) was to scope and explore areas that needed to be addressed, and I wish to examine several of those this morning.

The first is the issue of victims. In the course of our discussions about victims, Sinn Féin attempted to remove real differences and to argue that the perpetrators were victims, just as much as those who suffered at the hands of the perpetrators. That position is dishonest; however, it is very much part of republican thinking, because there has been no remorse from the IRA, and there is certainly no sign of repentance. Furthermore, Sinn Féin continues to glorify and extol the role of the IRA in its terrorist campaign over the past 30 years.

Our position is absolutely clear. There is no correlation or comparison between, on the one hand, the terrorist who planted a bomb in a shop on the Shankill Road on a busy Saturday and was blown up by that bomb and, on the other hand, the innocent victims, including children, who were killed by that bomb.

The PFG Committee touched on the issue of the past and how to deal with it, and how to explore and remember the past. However, although those issues were raised, there was no agreement, in spite of the confusion on one occasion in the ranks of Sinn Féin. How can we hope to get to the truth when Martin McGuinness is bound by an IRA code of silence, and Gerry Adams cannot even remember being in the IRA. We may ask what his role was in the republican movement in west Belfast, for example, at the time of the Bloody Friday bombings, but we are unlikely to get much help from him in answering that question.

On the question of victims, the DUP put to the Committee the possibility of developing a border fund. Along the border are Protestant communities that suffered a campaign of ethnic cleansing by the IRA. Many of the victims were farmers and young Protestants, who carried on working on border farms, but who were selected by the IRA and murdered in order to drive the families off the farms. The way in which that was done was sustained, systematic and sectarian. The IRA took its terrorist campaign to every part of Northern Ireland, but that aspect was unique to border areas. Those communities that suffered in that way deserve special support to rebuild themselves.

For that reason, there should be a special border fund for those border communities that have been targeted by terrorists.

The PFG Committee touched on the parades issue; it is now quite a number of years since Sinn Féin started to agitate around parades of the Orange Order and other Loyal Orders. As part of its strategy of broadening the battlefield, the republican movement organised residents’ groups, orchestrated protests against parades, demonised orangemen, and cultivated a hatred of them. That cynical political decision was aimed at damaging the Orange Order, demoralising orangemen, dividing the unionist community and diverting unionists from other important work.

Today, we live with the legacy of Sinn Féin’s strategy, which claims main arterial routes as the property of republicans and demands that those who wish to use those roads seek Sinn Féin’s consent. There must be an end to the Parades Commission and the current processes. A new approach is needed, based on a shared future, that sees our main arterial routes as shared public space. Sinn Féin says that it wants to share Government with unionists, but at the same time refuses to share main roads with us. Sinn Féin has created a poison that pollutes the life of our society. If the desired stability and peace are to be achieved, that problem must be resolved.

‘A Shared Future’ envisages a society with equality at its heart. However, the Government continue to pursue policies based on inequality and discrimination, one of the most notorious examples of which relates to the funding of festivals, particularly in Belfast. For many years, the Government have given substantial annual grants to the West Belfast Festival. Indeed, one civil servant, whom I dare not name, told me that a way had to be found of “laundering the money” so that it would find its way to the West Belfast Festival — an organisation whose board reads like a who’s who of the republican movement.

Money also went to the Ardoyne Fleadh, which benefited from the renowned cultural skills of Eddie Copeland, and to the New Lodge Festival, which has more than a nodding acquaintance with Sinn Féin. Over the years, millions of pounds have been handed over to those festivals, enabling a growth in infrastructure, expertise and skills that is not available to unionist communities. This has enabled the construction of other cultural projects that now operate almost, or entirely, independently.

The disparity in funding was brought to the attention of the Government, which, after years of prevarication, initiated a review. In the meantime, the Government decided to fund only those festivals that were already being funded. As a result, the three republican festivals were locked into funding and unionist communities were locked out. The equality implication of that decision was ignored. The review took several years, and throughout that period unionist festivals remained locked out while republicans were assured of continued funding.

Eventually a new, fairer system was introduced — something for which the DUP had lobbied for years — in which everyone was to be treated equally. However, that was not good enough for Sinn Féin. After both Gerry Adams and Gerry Kelly made their way to the Northern Ireland Office and met the Secretary of State, republican festivals received not only money from the new scheme, but additional money on top. Such arbitrary decisions, which give a preferential position to Sinn Féin, create anger and frustration.

Sinn Féin talks about equality, but is not interested in equality. Sinn Féin is interested only in patronage and preferential treatment. Despite its references to equality, the Belfast Agreement entrenched and increased cultural inequality — in fact, the agreement's section on equality is a prime example of inequality, as illustrated by the difference in funding between the Ulster-Scots Agency and Foras na Gaeilge. Since the creation of cross-border bodies, there has been a massive differential in the level of funding of the two cross-border language bodies, and year-on-year that differential increases. It has been suggested — and I have heard this from the former Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure Minister Michael McGimpsey — that the Ulster-Scots Agency was unable to spend its budget. That is a somewhat disingenuous comment, because from the time of the Belfast Agreement, there has been a substantial need within the Ulster-Scots community for funding for its projects and programmes. The problem did not lie with the Ulster-Scots community but with the way in which the agency was operated. It was also the result of Government policy.

11.15 am

A report that I submitted is included in the Committee's report. It is a copy of an internal Government memo that dates from before devolution, when the old Central Community Relations Unit (CCRU) directed language and cultural policy. It was the Government's social engineering unit. In that memo, the Government set out how, on one hand, they wanted to depoliticise language, but, for political reasons, would give concessions on the Irish language to encourage Sinn Féin. At the same time, they would hinder the development of Ulster-Scots and, therefore, deny equality. The programme set out how that would be done. The policy shaped the cultural element of the Belfast Agreement. That is why it was such an unfair document.

The legacy of that discriminatory policy remains. In 2006, the budget for the two language bodies meant that for every £1 that was given to the Ulster-Scots Agency, Foras na Gaeilge received £6. In one year, that disparity amounts to around £10 million, which continues year-on-year. Moreover, the Ulster-Scots Agency has to pick up the tab for educational and other projects that Government Departments, such as the Department of Education, should fund but fail to.

Cultural equality requires much more than money. There is also the issue of broadcasting. The BBC provides extensive broadcasting in Irish and gives extensive coverage to Gaelic sports. The treatment of other cultural traditions, however, in particular Ulster Scots, has been paltry and sporadic. The BBC has deliberately attempted to conceal that. When it reported to the Council of Europe, it did so in such a way that was so misleading as to be dishonest. Indeed, the BBC eventually had to submit an amended report to the Council of Europe. That discrimination in language broadcasting, which is symptomatic of a deeper problem in the BBC, continues.

I am glad that the Committee managed to reach agreement on one issue, which was that of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child, which sets out specific cultural rights for children and young people and puts those in the context of the education system. Those rights are implemented across some of the education sectors, in particular the Irish-medium sector, which is based on Irish cultural tradition, and the Roman Catholic-maintained sector, which also has an Irish cultural ethos. The cultural identity of schoolchildren in those sectors is affirmed through teaching and learning. However, in many controlled-sector schools, there is a different approach to cultural rights. As a result, children from unionist and Protestant homes, the vast majority of whom attend schools in that sector, are denied the cultural rights that the Irish-medium and Roman Catholic-maintained sectors have by a significant margin.

I am glad that the Committee agreed to call on the Department of Education to initiate a programme of work so that the cultural rights of children, as set out in the charter, are implemented and monitored across all sectors. That will require guidance for school governors, appropriate training for teachers and the production of school resources. The overall responsibility for the implementation and monitoring of those rights lies with the Department. I hope that, in the light of that broad agreement, the Department of Education will face up to its responsibility. Whatever the culture in the home, whether it be Ulster-Scots culture or orange culture, children have a right to learn about that culture at school, just as other children have a right to learn about Irish culture.

I want to mention two aspects of cultural tourism and two organisations that are involved in its development and promotion. The Northern Ireland Tourist Board has the role of product development for tourism, but it has treated cultures other than Irish culture in a shoddy and shabby way and has failed to recognise their potential in the development of Northern Ireland's cultural tourism product.

International marketing is the role of Tourism Ireland. There is a vast potential market in America among the 20 million Scots-Irish Americans, just as there is an equally vast market among a similar number of Irish Americans. Only recently has Tourism Ireland taken its first tentative steps to look at that Scots-Irish American market. Northern Ireland's product development through the Tourist Board and the international market must be reviewed and reshaped to ensure that all its cultural divisions have a place within the cultural tourism industry and, through that diversity, ensure the product differentiation that is necessary in the marketplace.

The divisive nature of various aspects of Gaelic culture must also be considered. The Gaelic Athletic Association (GAA) is the governing body for Gaelic sports. It is unique among sports' governing bodies in that political aspirations and a political agenda are built into its constitution.

That agenda is nationalist, and that is why grounds, clubs and competitions are often named after republican heroes. A primary school in west Belfast has even named its club in honour of Bobby Sands. That sets him up as a role model for children.

During the recent debacle when Sinn Féin staged a rally in Casement Park, Francie Brolly defended his party's position by saying that he did not understand how representatives from the GAA could say that it was not a political organisation. Casement Park was named after Roger Casement, not due to his hurling skills, but due to the fact that he was a republican icon. The old IRA paraded at the opening of Casement Park in 1953.

I urge the Sports Council for Northern Ireland and the Community Relations Council to work with the GAA to address the issue and to depoliticise the sport, shed the political baggage and become a genuinely sporting organisation like others in Northern Ireland.

Some items in the report deal with the differential in the voluntary sector's capacity in the two communities, unionist and nationalist. There are some issues that recent reports from the Committee on the Administration of Justice (CAJ) and the Northern Ireland Council for Voluntary Action have attempted to disguise. I am glad that there is also agreement for a non-lottery funding source for those who have difficulty in securing lottery money for moral reasons.

The Committee on the Preparation for Government was asked to scope issues that needed to be addressed. We did that, but there was no agreement. There is a range of issues that the Government have tried to ignore and put on the long finger, but equality delayed is equality denied. We are not looking for concessions, but for equality.

Madam Speaker: Mr McCausland, your time is up.

Mr Nesbitt: I shall primarily address equality and human rights issues, and my colleague Mr Hussey will address the equally important subject of victims.

Recently, CAJ — a body that has had much to say on equality over the years — launched a report entitled 'Equality in Northern Ireland: The Rhetoric and the Reality'. The first sentence of the report states:

"Issues of equality and non-discrimination have fed and fuelled the conflict in Northern Ireland over the decades."

Much has been written to support the notion that equality and rights have been central to the problems in Northern Ireland. Therefore I welcome the motion. It is important that we discuss this matter, but I regret that Sinn Féin is absent.

Equality and human rights are sensitive topics. As Sir Walter Scott said:

"Oh, what a tangled web we weave, when first we practice to deceive!"

I see much deceit in the equality statements. I am also struck by the comment attributed to Benjamin Disraeli:

"There are three kinds of lies: lies, damn lies, and statistics."

If you combine statistics with a tangled web, you end up with a sensitive issue called "equality". What can we say about it today with reasonable objectivity? Prof Eithne McLaughlin and Neil Faris were appointed to conduct a review of equality policy in Northern Ireland. They concluded that Northern Ireland was internationally unique in that it has one of the most rigorous, strenuous and legalistic equality processes anywhere in the democratic world. An article in 'The Irish Times' some time ago described Northern Ireland as the consultation capital of the world, such is the intrusive nature of the equality agenda in our society.

In the preparation for Government in 1997, it was concluded that the consultation was required as there was a lack of employment opportunity and a need to promote equality and to combat discrimination. Indeed, the Queen's Speech of 14 May 1997 heralded that the new Government would take measures to combat discrimination in the workplace.

There is a clear motive for Government policy and section 75 to show the need for equality of opportunity, equality impact assessments and equality schemes. How do we know whether there is equality? UNISON and CAJ, the two bodies that organised last Friday's seminar, said that the unemployment differential was a clear measure of discrimination and must be addressed. The SDLP and Sinn Féin were also clear about that. In the booklet published last week, CAJ said that success in eliminating the unemployment differential was the acid test of the commitment to equality. It remarked that the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment (DETI) and Invest Northern Ireland (INI) had not delivered on the equality commitment to eliminate the unemployment differential.

I do not want to get into statistics, but I want to place on record my belief that the argument put forward by CAJ in the 1990s, and in the booklet published last week, are based on fundamentally flawed statistics and cannot be used as an measurement tool to assess whether Government are delivering on policy. I challenge CAJ today. Why? I do so because, three times over the summer, I wrote to that organisation about a wider human rights issue — I still await a response. I presented a 30-page statistical analysis to the Committee and during meetings, I challenged parties, particularly Sinn Féin and the SDLP, to meet with me to discuss the issues. I am still waiting for a response.

Mr Robert McCartney: Will the Member give way?

Mr Nesbitt: If I give way, will I be allowed extra time? Yes.

Mr Robert McCartney: Does the hon Member agree that Sir Robert Cooper and other members of the Fair Employment Agency (FEA) repeatedly confirmed that discrimination and lack of equality were absolutely minimal factors in any disparity between Catholic and Protestant unemployment?

Mr Nesbitt: The evidence shows that those had no direct relevance whatsoever to the unemployment rates in the 1990s.

It is annoying that Sinn Féin said that I have a "flat earth" policy, and an SDLP member said that my writings on the matter rival the best-selling book, 'How to lie with statistics'. Those who made such statements should step up to the plate and discuss the matter with me.

I recognise disadvantage in Northern Ireland, and I have always said that it must be addressed. However, let us be honest with ourselves about some of the data. Let us take the example of INI and the report it published yesterday. Of course, there is more assistance to the east than to the west, but there is a greater population in the east than in the west. In fact, spending on assistance per head of population is much higher in the west, at £1,273, than it is in the east, where it is £1,200. Similarly, more is spent on foreign direct investment (FDI) in the west than in the east.

CAJ cited the fact that far more is spent in South Belfast than in West Belfast. However, 30% of the spend in South Belfast was put towards centres of excellence at Queen's University to enable more research to be carried out. As Dr McDonnell pointed out two weeks ago, such research will not only benefit South Belfast, but all of Northern Ireland.

People often use parliamentary constituencies as a comparator for employment figures. However, that is not a good comparator — travel-to-work areas often cut across parliamentary boundaries.

Of the 37 foreign companies investing in Northern Ireland, 74% were in New TSN areas, almost matching the target of 75%.

The Government are silent on the issue. They crouch so low below the parapet that they are virtually non-existent. They need to step up to the plate and make it clear that the analysis of the 1990s was wrong and that there is equality of opportunity in recruitment. An FEA booklet provides evidence of that, using the benchmark of social mobility and showing that in the 1990s — at the very time when the Government set out to combat discrimination — religious base had no bearing on recruitment. Regrettably, the UK Government have failed to come up to the mark — never mind the foreign Governments that you, Madam Speaker, have asked us not to mention.

I turn now to human rights. We have had a conflict in Northern Ireland. Often, in addressing that conflict, international standards are mentioned. We must understand and observe human rights; that is a central plank of a modern democratic society. However, when war broke out in the Middle East this summer, Dermot Ahern said that Israel must abide by international law. On 18 July, he maintained that Israel must abide "strictly" by that law. The Prime Minister Tony Blair, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office Minister for the Middle East Kim Howells, and even Sinn Féin have said the same: Israel must abide by international law.

11.30 am

Sinn Féin often waxes eloquent on what should be done abroad. In the Committee on the Preparation for Government, I challenged Sinn Féin members to tell me whether their party would subscribe to the principles of international human rights law in the context of Northern Ireland. The answer I received was fudged; it was no answer. When Gerry Adams went to the Middle East, he spoke of principles that applied not only to the Middle East, but to Northern Ireland. He stated that there should be respect for human rights and international law. I put it to Sinn Féin in Committee, and I say again today, that if Sinn Féin had respect for human rights and international law, this would not be a shadow Assembly but a full and functioning one.

Sinn Féin walks the world stage pretending to be moderate, modern and internationalist. It pretends to champion human rights. However, at the very core of that party is a form of aggressive nationalism and a lack of respect for the institutions of state that has been rejected everywhere in the democratic world.

Where are the Government? They have made an interesting statement. They have asked Sinn Féin to draw a distinction between constitutional and practical policing; at one stroke, the Government have undermined their commitments to international obligations. They are playing fast and loose with the democratic values needed to underpin any stable settlement in Northern Ireland. With regard to human rights and equality, stark questions must be asked.

How is it that the UK Government expect unionists and nationalists to sit in an Administration with Sinn Féin, when they themselves have undermined the necessary ingredients for a stable, functioning Administration to exist in Northern Ireland? I am being penalised because Sinn Féin does not abide by standards of international democratic practice. The party I represent signs up to all these standards; Sinn Féin does not.

Yesterday, the Chancellor of the Exchequer Gordon Brown said that all in our country are to play by the rules. The United Kingdom is a member of both the Council of Europe and the European Union. When one is in a club, one plays by the rules. However, the United Kingdom Government are not playing by the rules, and Mr Brown's statement is not relevant to Northern Ireland.

I read thoroughly the words that were carefully crafted by Dr Seán Brady, Archbishop of Armagh, and, I regret to say, they did not match up to the international standards that are meant to apply in a democracy.

Mr Robert McCartney: What did he say?

Mr Nesbitt: I have said all that I wish to say in 14 minutes.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Nesbitt: I have been asked to tell what the archbishop said, and I will do that in the minute of my time that remains. I request some latitude, because Mr McCartney has requested that I tell the House what the archbishop said. He said that those people who tolerate criminality are incompatible with those who have responsibility for Government. That implies that if one does not have a responsibility, the toleration can be wavered. He also said that where there is a commitment to the institutions of policing, there should not be a problem in the formation of the Government, especially if that Government do not have policing responsibility. Dr Brady's implication there is that we should form the Government now, and the commitment will be given and then, possibly, delivered.

My problem, Madam Speaker, and I finish on this —

Madam Speaker: Mr Nesbitt, your time is over.

Mr Nesbitt: Will you not give me another 30 seconds to respond to Mr McCartney?

Madam Speaker: Mr Nesbitt, your time is up.

Ms Lewsley: I preface my contribution by thanking the Committee Clerks for the hard work, commitment and professionalism they showed during the PFG Committee meetings, and for the endurance that they demonstrated during the debate about two boxes, particularly. I also thank the Hansard staff for their professionalism and commitment, especially considering that it was the summer holidays and the team was 12 short.

The fact that all the parties got round an oblong table — not a round table — at the beginning of the proceedings was progress, as was their achieving consensus on nine proposals or basic principles. Sadly, that consensus was turned into censorship by Sinn Féin just over a week ago when it vetoed the opportunity for many of the political parties — including some of its own members who attended the meetings during the summer and who gave their time and commitment, none less than the late Michael Ferguson — to engage in this debate, and, worse, the right to have the report printed. Sinn Féin's excuse for that action was that it was not taking part in any Hain talking shop. However, in the comprehensive agreement, that same party, along with the DUP, agreed to a shadow Assembly that was nothing more than a Hain talking shop.

I welcome the opportunity to speak in the debate, and I will touch on many of the issues that were debated in the PFG Committee. The issues debated in the Committee were not contributory to suspension, and, therefore, should not be viewed as preconditions to the restoration of the Assembly and its institutions.

The first proposal or basic principle agreed by the PFG Committee was the need for a bill of rights. All parties in the Committee agreed to follow agreement on that proposal with a half-day seminar on 5 October 2006, which will be facilitated by the Human Rights Commission, and that must be seen as progress. The SDLP, like many other parties, wants to see the best possible bill of rights for Northern Ireland, one which reflects socio-economic rights as well as political rights.

Above all, we want a bill of rights that everyone in Northern Ireland can buy into, so that rights are not solely for nationalists or for unionists but for every individual. The best way to reach agreement on a bill of rights is through a round-table forum that involves the political parties and civic society. The chairperson of that forum should be someone of international standing, appointed by the two Governments, and able to choose his or her own independent secretariat.

The round-table forum should report its findings to the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission, which, in turn, should report to the Secretary of State. The Human Rights Commission should also, at the request of the chairperson, contribute to the round-table discussions. The SDLP would like that round-table forum to be set up straight away. Members should remember that the DUP and Sinn Féin agreed, as part of the comprehensive agreement, that that forum should be set up.

We, and many other parties, have lobbied direct-rule Ministers, past and present, to get the round-table forum up and running. While the SDLP supports a bill of rights for Northern Ireland, we also want to see an all-Ireland charter of rights, which would be at the cutting edge of rights in Europe. It is also important that any future Administration engage the help of the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission to rights-proof any policies and legislation throughout all Government Departments.

I want to make three points on equality, the first of which is the issue of need. The Good Friday Agreement is clear that need must be targeted objectively. If real need is targeted, all communities — Catholic or Protestant, unionist or nationalist, or from any other background — will be enhanced. There is also an opportunity for perceived need to be dealt with.

I know that there is educational underachievement in Protestant communities. The SDLP believes that, by tackling that need, that issue will be addressed. However, the proportion of Catholics who leave school with no qualifications is higher overall, and that is a fast track to unemployment. Therefore, it is important that that problem also be tackled on the basis of need. I welcome the proposal on that matter that was agreed by the Committee.

Secondly, there can be no regression in equality laws. Those laws are a given, and the SDLP will consider opportunities to enhance them. However, we will not support any dilution of those laws. An integrated equality agenda is needed, and that should be brought about through a single equality Bill that harmonises our laws upwards as far as practicable. During the lifetime of the previous Assembly, its two junior Ministers hoped to take Northern Ireland into the lead with a single equality Bill. Unfortunately, because of EU regulations on age and sexual orientation, the Assembly had to defer that Bill. I hope that that matter can now be moved forward.

Equality of opportunity can be created through the realisation of the promise of section 75 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998. In order to do that, the standard of equality impact assessments must be improved. Often, they lack statistics and rigour, and they should place greater focus on key policies. A strategy for the implementation of section 75 would be helpful.

Thirdly, the commitment to the eradication of unemployment differentials referred to in the agreement must be realised. The unemployment differential in 1971 was 2·5; it has now been brought down to 1·8. I want any differential to be eradicated.

Mr Nesbitt: Will the Member accept a point of information?

Ms Lewsley: Yes.

Mr Nesbitt: Between 2·5 and 1·8, the employment differential was as low as 1·6, and is now up to 2·1. It moves and varies over time. There are two ways of measuring the unemployment differential: one is a ratio, and one is an absolute gap. I support the latter and not the former, which is statistically flawed.

Madam Speaker: There is no such thing as a point of information, Mr Nesbitt. However, I am sure that Ms Lewsley accepts your comments.

Ms Lewsley: I gave way to what I regarded as an intervention.

As with unemployment, there are differentials in economic activity. There are many unemployment black spots, especially west of the Bann. A process to deal with those problems must be introduced, and the Government must also take responsibility centrally to ensure that differentials in housing allocations are dealt with.

11.45 am

Progress has been made; however, there is more to do. As well as being a right in principle, equality of opportunity will help to build a more harmonious and cohesive community.

Creating a shared future is the purpose of any peace process and is about equal citizenship and human rights for all. All public goods, services and facilities should be accessible to everyone. A shared future should be about living, working and playing together. When making policy, a new Executive must take account of 'A Shared Future' and give it their full support.

As things stand, those who are intimidated, rather than the perpetrators of that intimidation, are moved on. It matters that people are frightened when they go through our city and town centres at night and that flags and murals — and, more recently, football regalia — intimidate people. Such attacks cannot be justified, nor can the failure to reach political agreement.

'A Shared Future' cannot be seen as a small, side policy; it must be a major structure of Government.

That means opposing all forms of sectarianism and taking a firm stand against all that is said and done in a sectarian way, rather than explaining, minimising or making excuses for sectarianism. It means removing flags from all public properties.

The Committee heard about the building blocks of 'A Shared Future'. There are many such building blocks; for example, good relations. Good relations must be the mainstay of central Government and their Departments, as it must be of our current councils and the new ones that will emerge from the Review of Public Administration (RPA). Good relations should be implemented as a key part of section 75 alongside the new power-sharing arrangements that will promote working partnerships when the RPA is put in place. Good-relations committees have been set up in most councils; however, a few have yet to be established, some are working while many are not, and some are paying lip service to the idea. All our councils must reach a standard, and it is particularly important that political parties on councils sign up to the concept of good relations and ensure its delivery.

In trying to reach a compromise, we need to understand respect and diversity. As I said, good relations can help to achieve that. We have talked for a long time about a shared future, and it is time that we made that talk a reality.

The SDLP believes that, on a moral basis, we must leave the past behind. There is a danger in our society if we do not face up to that past. Moreover, it is deeply unfair to deny victims the truth, if that is what they seek. It is also important that the language used is more sensitive to the needs of victims and survivors. The very least that those people should expect from us is the acknowledgement of their terrible loss and a commitment to ensure that they do not carry the burden of remembering on their own.

More can, and must, be done to address the needs of victims and survivors of conflict. As we rebuild our society, they struggle to rebuild their lives. The SDLP wants a greater platform for victims so that their needs can be articulated and their stories heard and acknowledged. It wants to ensure that any process for dealing with the past is victim-centred. That is why my party supports the role of the Interim Commissioner for Victims and Survivors, although the manner of the appointment of the person in that post was unfortunate. My party also supports the establishment of a victims' and survivors' forum.

The Committee agreed the proposal to make victims' needs a priority in the Programme for Government. Through that, we will have the opportunity to address how services for victims can be improved and better compensation payments given to those who have received little or nothing. Funding has often been mentioned. Only last night, those in a meeting of a victims' group in north Belfast asked why £3.3 million has been given to loyalist communities to remove murals from walls, given that that group often finds itself scraping around for funding to help victims. The entire sector needs more focused funding. Funding should be more flexible, as some victims are now elderly and their needs may have changed. For example, they may have mental health issues or problems with dementia.

A strong monitoring role is needed to oversee how money is spent and to assess its impact. That should be reviewed regularly to ensure that the funding targets those most in need.

Victims have told me that the restoration of the Assembly is important, as it would give them the opportunity to talk more freely about the issues that concern them, as well as greater access to Government. Any future Government should ensure that victims' needs are centred, rather than policy-driven, so that those needs are taken into consideration. Services must be monitored and matched to need. The Interim Commissioner for Victims and Survivors could carry out that monitoring role.

The commissioner's office should be a one-stop shop where victims can get direction on the issue that concerns them. Services must be equitable across Northern Ireland and across all age ranges. I commend the commissioner on her latest report, 'A Forum for Victims & Survivors: Consultation Responses', which is a summary of feedback from consultation seminars on the role and purpose of victims' and survivors' forums. It represents the voices of victims and survivors, not that of the commissioner.

Lastly, Madam Speaker, I would like to address the issue of the disappeared. The British Government recently responded to a series of recommendations on the disappeared made by the independent Commissioner for the Location of Victims' Remains. Although that announcement is welcome, it is long overdue. The SDLP has already expressed its concerns about the delay and is pleased to see the commitment being made at last that there will be a liaison officer for the families; the Committee agreed that in principle.

There must be a renewed will to find the bodies. Some people mistakenly believe that everything that can be done has been done; that is simply not true. No amount of good work by Governments will make up for the lack of co-operation shown by those in the IRA or INLA who were involved in those terrible crimes in the first place. Their victims' lives and bodies were stolen. If the perpetrators have any conscience at all, they must do everything they can to ensure that they do not rob the families of a Christian burial.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Ford: I join Ms Lewsley in expressing thanks to the staff of the Committee, the co-chairpersons, and the important people such as Hansard and the catering services who kept the work flowing over the summer.

Madam Speaker, the debate is supposed to be on a report of the Committee on the Preparation for Government. That Government will by necessity involve power sharing, so it is regrettable that much of the debate so far has actually concentrated on accusations in one direction or another about equality issues. Mr McCausland's speech was almost entirely about equality — or rather, his perception of Protestant inequality. He was backed up by Mr Nesbitt, who devoted almost all of his speech to the same topic. Ms Lewsley countered with her version of statistics, in a speech which at least covered rather more than the single issue of equality. It seems that the statisticians will have much work to do, and also, given the reaction in the Chamber, that it does not matter what they say, as we each have a set of inbuilt prejudices.

Mr Nesbitt: Will Mr Ford give way for a moment?

Mr Ford: Oh, give us a chance. [Laughter.]

Mr Nesbitt: Will he?

Mr Ford: I think that it is customary, Madam Speaker, that Members are allowed at least to start to develop their argument before being asked to give way. I would have thought that an experienced former Minister like Mr Nesbitt would be aware of precedent.

The equality section of the report also talks extensively about a shared future. One of the more interesting points of debate was between Michael Ferguson and the Alliance Party as to whether the issue of a shared future was solely about equality. The Alliance Party believes that it clearly is not. An enormous amount of work needs to be done — the debate this morning has proved just how much — to change mindsets and start to build a shared future.

I do not believe that there would be any stability in the institutions that we are seeking to restore by 24 November if we did not also actively work to build a shared future. Community relations is not an add-on to be done by nice people in their spare time. If we cannot establish good relations in every Government institution and build a shared future in every aspect of the working of this Assembly and the institutions that depend on it, ultimately there is no chance that the process that we are engaged in will succeed.

It is, of course, unfortunate that the devolved Executive were unable to make any progress prior to suspension on the shared future agenda. We were promised that the publication of the report was imminent several times, but we depended on direct-rule Ministers to take that forward.

Now is the time when we must turn the general statement of a commitment to build a shared future, contained in paragraph 23 of the report, into a meaningful commitment to address the issues. We must first address the issues of the way in which Members arrived in this place. We must get away from the notion that Northern Ireland is a society neatly divided into two antagonistic communities with no connection between them, each of which is completely homogenous internally. That was never correct, and it is certainly less and less correct as society changes, yet this society continues to bear the huge costs — economic, financial, social and political — of trying to maintain a society as if that were the case.

The simple reality is that, economically, we cannot afford to waste £1 billion a year on managing segregation. As a community that needs to be modern, forward-looking, outgoing and welcoming to visitors — whether they be tourists or those wishing to set up businesses — we cannot afford the cost of neglecting that need, while maintaining segregation and division.

Although I welcome the fact that parties gave a commitment to building a shared future, it is a matter of considerable regret that the Committee was unable to achieve the consensus to sign up to the specific documents: the 'A Shared Future' framework document; and even the first triennial action plan. I cannot understand how Members can carry out their commitments to build a shared future unless they are prepared to work on the basis of the available documentation.

I keep thinking, Madam Speaker, that Mr Nesbitt is about to take the opportunity to intervene.

Mr Nesbitt: Shall I do it now?

Mr Ford: Certainly. The Member was shuffling his papers.

Mr Nesbitt: I was passing something back to my colleague; it was nothing to do with this.

When I invited any or all the parties around the table to enter discussions, they did not respond. Alliance was one of those parties, and it too has not responded. I am more than happy to discuss any statistical dimension with Mr Ford and to try to reach an objective conclusion. However, I am afraid that Alliance, like the other parties, said no, and that it did not want to talk.

Ms Lewsley: We did not say no. We have not got around to replying.

Mr McCarthy: We never say no.

Mr Ford: My colleague has spoken for the Alliance Party, as has Patricia Lewsley for the SDLP. The timing priorities, while the Committee was working so hard, perhaps countered the opportunities for the delights of further discussion on employment and equality, such as I had on one occasion that I remember, on a particular sunny morning in Hillsborough some years ago. I have no doubt that Mr Nesbitt will be his usual informed and erudite self, and I look forward to those discussions, perhaps around the environs of a golf course in Scotland shortly.

I wish to consider the wider issue of the past and its legacy. There is a mood within this society that it is dangerous to talk about the past, that that is counter-productive to attempts to move forward, and that to do so opens wounds. However, all that we know about seeking the healing that individuals require, and the reconciliation that this society needs, is that we must deal with the wounds of the past in a comprehensive and holistic fashion. We must provide a measure of closure to those who have suffered more than others. If we cannot do that, we will again threaten the possibility of making progress.

There have been far too many piecemeal events in the past. Indeed, the rather unfortunate manner of the appointment of the Interim Commissioner for Victims and Survivors was an example of that. I welcome the work that Mrs McDougall has been doing; my party has met her, and I believe that she is doing the job to the best of her ability. However, the manner of her appointment gave her a profoundly difficult start, which was most unhelpful.

We need to look at a variety of options in an open way and not always retreat into the immediate holes that people retreat into when difficulties arise. Is there scope for some form of memorial? There is almost certainly not scope for a physical memorial — that might create too many difficulties. However, a day of remembrance or reflection might enable individuals, in their own ways and in whatever company they feel content and safe, to think back over the suffering of the entire community.

12.00 noon

We need to find a way to allow victims to put their stories on the record. Clearly, we will never have a South-African style truth and reconciliation commission, but people should at least be given that opportunity. It would help them to define how they felt and how they suffered, and it would allow them to experience the healing that having their stories recognised by the wider community would bring.

Although it would be extremely difficult, maybe we could consider a wider truth and recovery process. There are international precedents that we need to consider. There is a real need for the Government to take that measure on board, perhaps in conjunction with an incoming Executive. Doing so would ensure that, instead of just talking about what needs to be done and having occasional debates, we would be engaging in a wider process that would enable that to happen.

It is clear that a large number of victims still suffer in this society. I wish to highlight two groups in particular. The first is the families of the disappeared, who still suffer from not having Christian burial sites to which they can go to visit their loved ones. There is no doubt that, even after all these years, more could and should be done. Since my election as a constituency representative, one of the most moving experiences has been my visit to the house of a constituent to attend the wake — it was 30 years late — for his mother, Jean McConville, and my attendance at her funeral a few days later. To some extent, that family's suffering has been eased, but other families are still suffering in silence, and we should never forget them.

The second group that we must remember are the exiles: those who remain outside Northern Ireland because of threats, fears of threats, and because the practice of exiling certain groups and people is not over. We must ensure that, in any attempt to move forward and to address the needs of victims, we remember those who are active victims, as well as those who are victims because of events that occurred years ago.

I urge unionists, who seem to be prepared to countenance a day of remembrance, to consider seriously whether it is a possibility. It does not need to be an event that, for particular reasons, their political opponents could easily hijack.

Finally, I want to consider human rights and the proposed bill of rights for Northern Ireland. My party has supported the introduction of such legislation for a long time. I believe that historians have recorded that, as long ago as 1962, in the Northern Ireland House of Commons, the Liberal MP for Queen's University, Sheelagh Murnaghan, proposed such a measure in this Chamber. The incorporation of the European Convention on Human Rights went some way, but, as a document from 1948, it is somewhat out of date. It solely covers civil and political rights; it does not deal with the social and economic rights that concern us so much now. Therefore, we need action to address the bill of rights.

We need action from the parties in the Assembly and from civil society to work with the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission (NIHRC) — the body that has the formal statutory duty — to draw up an appropriate Northern Ireland bill of rights. There is precedent in European and international work. There is much that could be drawn on. We need to encourage NIHRC in its work by participation in a round-table format. It is to be hoped that our meeting with NIHRC in October will enable us to move forward on that process, to establish the round table, to tease out the areas of agreement and disagreement, and to make a constructive input to the work of NIHRC, as it makes its proposals to the Secretary of State.

Earlier, Patricia Lewsley referred to the belief that the SDLP has in human rights for every individual. I endorse that, but let us be clear that that means human rights for everyone as an individual. It refers to the rights of people who belong to minorities, and to the rights of those people who choose not to define themselves as belonging to groups into which others may wish to place them. It is not a matter of a bipolar society's looking at the balance of two groups. It is the right, which is in line with modern European and international legislation, to assert the rights of each and every individual to ensure that each and every individual has the same rights and abilities to make the most of his or her opportunities in this society.

Mr Robert McCartney: I am grateful to the Member for giving way. The Member has stressed rightly, along with Mrs Lewsley, that these rights are individual.

That being the case, what about the rights of those individual applicants to the PSNI who come from the unionist or Protestant community? They, as individuals, are discriminated against by Order.

Mr Ford: I thank the Member for making the Alliance Party's point using a somewhat unionist form of language.

The issue for the Alliance Party is not whether unionists or Protestants are discriminated against in their applications to join the Police Service. Rather than simply designate on the basis of religious belief, affirmative action must be taken to encourage the widest possible recruitment from every section of this society. To get the best possible Police Service, each and every individual should have the right to apply.

Mr Kennedy: Therefore the Member supports discrimination?

Mr Ford: It would help if the deputy leader of the Ulster Unionist Party learned to listen rather than to interrupt.

We should not impose quotas, which are based on an inappropriate way of dividing up this society. We should take affirmative action to ensure that we attract people to apply to the Police Service, and then ensure that the best possible people are recruited.

Mr Nesbitt: Will the Member give way?

Mr Ford: No. I do not have much time in which to give way. The Member has already had his one go.

I welcome the report, because it records that there has been progress on a number of items. However, on reading the report, and especially when one reads Hansard, it is clear that a vast amount of work remains to be done, particularly on building a shared future, meeting victims' needs and building a culture of human rights for everyone in Northern Ireland.

Mr Dawson: My colleague Mr McCausland covered a wide range of issues that appear in the report. I take this opportunity to associate myself with his comments.

I shall focus on one of the equality issues that comes out of the report — section 75 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998. I welcome Mr Nesbitt's comments, and his analysis of the equality issues debated in the Preparation for Government Committee, but I remind him that, in agreeing to and accepting the section 75 provisions as part of the Belfast Agreement, and as part of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 that flowed from the agreement, his party compounded the problem.

Mr Nesbitt: Will the Member give way?

Mr Dawson: I shall perhaps give way to the Member later. Let me develop my comments in line with precedent, as Mr Ford reminded the Member.

Ms Lewsley has spoken about section 75 in glowing terms. On this side of the House, section 75 of the 1998 Act is seen as a charter for the persecution of those who hold to a Christian world view. Section 75 establishes equivalence in the name of equality among groups for which no equivalence exists. For example, individuals have no choice over their race or their disability, but all individuals have a choice about whether they wish to engage in a homosexual lifestyle.

It should be remembered that section 75's remit goes much further than simply equality of employment; equality, for the categories listed in section 75, must be promoted in every aspect of Government policy. It is there that section 75 goes much too far. Section 75's approach to sexual orientation springs from the false notion, which the gay lobby promotes as an agenda item, that homosexuality is healthy, natural and normal. In fact, it is none of those things.

From that false basis, section 75 has delivered to Northern Ireland an industry of paper production and report writing, much of which has little relevance to the whole community and adds nothing to our country's economic well-being. In fact, it deters inward investment from many organisations.

I said at the outset that section 75 is a charter for the persecution of Christians. Section 75 requires that individuals promote equality of opportunity among the named groups.

There can be no disagreement that equality of opportunity should be promoted on the grounds of race, gender, disability, politics, religion, and so forth. However, those categories and the category of sexual orientation clearly differ. Given that the categories listed in the Act are used to screen every Government policy, and that there is a responsibility to promote equality, Christians in government and in local authorities are being asked to promote an agenda and a lifestyle that they find morally and ethically repugnant, unacceptable and contrary to their religious beliefs. It is not acceptable that, in the name of equality, the religious beliefs of the majority of the population in Northern Ireland, from the two main traditions, are being undermined on the subject of homosexual practice.

Let me illustrate my point with a few examples. During the debates on civil partnership in Northern Ireland, many councillors, because of the provisions of section 75, were unable to resist the creation of a false equivalence between marriage and civil partnership. Those provisions mean that the groups listed under section 75 must have access to exactly the same facilities as those who want to marry in council chambers. Councillors were systematically bullied into offering council facilities to those who wanted civil partnerships, including the marriage suites and full ceremonies. Let me put it on record again: there is no equivalence between marriage and civil partnership. There is no justification for forcing councils to treat marriage and civil partnership as being equal. In those debates on civil partnership, the deeply held religious and moral views of councillors were trampled on and ignored in the interests of equality.

I want to refer to the attitude of the Police Service of Northern Ireland to Christians on its staff. A report jointly commissioned by the Police Ombudsman and the Northern Ireland Policing Board, 'Policing, Accountability and the Lesbian, Gay and Bisexual Community in Northern Ireland', states that police officers must not display homophobic attitudes. We have been told that police officers are always on duty; there is never an occasion when a police officer is off duty. The Ombudsman has confirmed to me that a police officer who is a lay preacher or a Sunday school teacher who decides to preach on Genesis, chapter 19, Romans, chapter 1, or First Corinthians, chapter 6, would be guilty, in the eyes of the law, of expressing a homophobic attitude and would be subject to discipline. It is unacceptable that freedom of speech and an individual's beliefs are curtailed in this way in the name of equality.

The view of the Equality Commission for Northern Ireland is that the home and property of a school governor would be at risk if he or she allowed his or her religious views on homosexuality to influence the decisions that he or she might take on a school board. Councillors are voting and acting against their conscience, policemen and policewomen are unable to express their religious views, and teachers and governors on school boards are under threat of having their homes seized. That is the equality under which we live in Northern Ireland.

However, it does not end there. Consultation ended yesterday on proposals to outlaw sexual-orientation discrimination in the provision of goods and services. If the proposals are accepted in their current form, churches will be guilty of an offence if they do not allow their church halls to be used by gay and lesbian groups or do not allow their property to be sold to such a group if it happened to be for sale. Christian owners of bed-and-breakfast accommodation will have to put up gay and lesbian couples under their own roofs. Schools will become battlegrounds about gay lifestyles, and Christian teachers will be forced to promote the gay agenda in classrooms, against their conscience and beliefs.

Scripture unions could be banned from schools for being anti-gay. Bible colleges, care homes, adoption agencies, Christian conference centres — the list goes on — would be required to offer double-bed accommodation to gays and lesbians who present themselves at the door.

12.15 pm

Laws that are promoted in the name of equality are attacking, undermining and destroying the rights and beliefs of ordinary Christian people. That cannot be right; it cannot be allowed to continue. That is equality gone mad. It is not equality; it is the dictatorship of a vocal minority, inflicted on the morality of the people, with no sound basis.

While section 75 remains in place in its current form, Christian moral attitudes will continue to be unacceptable in society and the persecution of Christians will increase. It will not be long before the first pastor or layman finds himself before the courts for holding to the moral teachings of the Bible that he seeks to promote. The irony, of course, will be that in the courthouse —

Dr Birnie: I thank the Member for giving way. Does he not agree that the source of the problem that he identifies may not be section 75 itself, but the current interpretation of European law? In a sense, therefore, section 75 is not all that relevant to his argument. It is European law that is the driver.

Mr Dawson: I thank the Member for that. European law is in place but, as he will know, section 75 goes further than European law in giving rights to Northern Ireland that do not exist in the rest of the United Kingdom. For example, the issues that councils here have faced in relation to civil partnerships have not been faced in the rest of the United Kingdom. It is section 75 that brings those problems to Northern Ireland.

As I was saying, the irony will be that when that pastor or layman goes to court, he will be asked to swear his truthfulness on the Bible from which his attitudes are taken, and the law of the land will oblige him to reject those attitudes.

I wish to turn to the issue of parades, which is also referred to in the report. Members will know that, with colleagues on the joint Loyal Orders working group, I have been engaged since autumn 2005 in seeking to bring about a resolution to the present issues about parading. We have consulted a wide range of stakeholders and a large number of interested parties to present our concerns, seek their views and provide a way forward on the issue. We have worked from the premise that the present arrangements are neither satisfactory nor desirable. The Parades Commission has become the third party in parading disputes. It is not seen as an independent body; indeed, it is not an independent body. Rather, it is contributing to the extent of the conflict and to the division that is seen on our streets over parades.

We have also approached our task in the belief that there is no system or set of procedures that cannot be improved. Any set of rules formulated by man can be improved on. The attitude of our colleagues in the SDLP — which seems to believe that the Parades Commission must be in place, and its procedures continued, because they cannot be improved — is one that we reject.

Now that the summer is over and the immediate objective of ensuring that the season passes peacefully has been achieved, it is time for a fundamental review of the legislation governing parades and of the structures and procedures that flow from it. The Secretary of State is aware of our various proposals. He is aware of a process that could transform the situation. The Secretary of State is always keen to remind Members of this House of the importance of meeting deadlines.

I warn the Secretary of State that his time is ticking away. It is the end of September. If I may paraphrase his words, I am not threatening anyone, but I must point out that there are consequences and dangers in delay. It is time for the Secretary of State to make a choice, and it is time for him to deliver.

The Committee's report rightly points out that parading has a direct impact on the overall political process. The Secretary of State's failure to deal with the legitimate grievances of the Loyal Orders will render political accommodation impossible, now and in the future. It is the Secretary of State who holds the key to progress on this matter; it is he who must act. The Secretary of State's time is running out.

Dr Birnie: I wish to refer to the linked themes of diversity and rights. In this debate, we should concentrate on some of the major impediments and obstacles to the restoration of devolution. The point can be made that an exclusive emphasis on the so-called two communities model of our conflict could be hindering the very necessary move towards peace and prosperity because it fails to allow for the richness and diversity of our society.

Northern Ireland is clearly becoming more diverse. There is a long-established ethnic minority population here. In the early years of this decade, it was probably in the order of 15,000 persons. Since 2004, the arrival of migrant workers, particularly from new European Union member countries, has probably boosted that ethnic minority population by two- or threefold.

It is important to say from the outset that migrant workers have performed a major service to our economy. In the short to medium term, that inward migration has allowed the Northern Ireland economy to continue to grow and not be held back by labour shortages, which might otherwise have become critical.

There are, of course, other important longer-term concerns. For example, why has it been necessary to import so much migrant labour when there are still such large pockets of long-term unemployment? As has been said in previous debates, policy-makers must ask why our own long-term unemployed and economically inactive are either unwilling — or unable, because of the skills they have or do not have — to do certain jobs. A question can also be asked of parts of the Health Service, where there is a preference, perhaps on cost grounds, to bring in staff from third-world countries rather than train local people.

It must be emphasised that, on balance, the arrival of outside labour has been economically beneficial. Sadly, as we well know from reports in the media, even as recently as last weekend, this process has been accompanied by a terrible rise in racist activity. There are up to 1,000 attacks every year, and the number is rising. That is a horrendous total, and the figures have doubled or tripled in a small number of years.

It is probably still true that the rate of racist attacks per head of population is less here than in England. That is from a comparison between PSNI and Home Office figures. There is little solid statistical basis to the claim made by 'The Guardian' in January 2004 that Northern Ireland is the race hate capital of Europe. However, we should all redouble our efforts to ensure that that never becomes the case.

A joined-up response is required from Government Departments, agencies and the private sector to welcome migrant workers, to ensure that neither they, nor the more established population, are exploited and to deal with some of the underlying social problems that perhaps are exacerbated, such as housing problems, particularly the ongoing debate about houses of multiple occupation.

The private sector group Concordia has pointed out a number of policies that could be adopted to help to absorb migrant workers into our economy and society. The five political parties at Stormont have formed an ad hoc all-party working group on ethnic minority issues, working with the Northern Ireland Council for Ethnic Minorities (NICEM), other charities, and non-governmental organisations in that sector.

The Ulster Unionist Party recognises the challenge posed by recent research from the Joseph Rowntree Charitable Trust and the Electoral Commission, which shows that only about 40% of the ethnic minorities here are on the electoral register, and of which only about half have actually voted — barely one in five. That is a challenge for the political parties, and it is also a challenge for the ethnic minorities to engage with the parties in political activity.

My colleague Mr Nesbitt has already referred to human rights, and the issue generates a strong sense of déjà vu. On 25 September 2001, a debate was held in this Chamber on the motion that the NIHRC had exceeded its remit under the Belfast Agreement. The 1998 agreement instructed the NIHRC to advise and consult on the scope for human rights, supplementary to those in the European Convention on Human Rights, to reflect the particular circumstances of Northern Ireland. Eight years on, the Human Rights Commission has not done that, and it has failed to realise its stated objectives under the 1998 Belfast Agreement. Instead, it has spent its time — some parties, including mine, would argue that it has wasted its time and resources — drafting two versions of a bill of rights, which were grandiose, maximalist and very complex.

It was significant that the PFG Committee with responsibility for rights, safeguards, equality issues and victims agreed in principle that there should be a bill of rights for Northern Ireland, but there was no agreement among the parties as to what should be included in it. Hansard for that meeting of the Committee shows that there was disagreement around the notion of so-called social and economic rights.

Members should wish that every member of our society avails of excellent health services, the best possible standard of education, the cleanest environment in the world and the highest possible wage, etc. However, will a statement of those rights — or alleged rights — in a bill of rights help to achieve any of those very laudable objectives? The productivity of the economy and the level of resources available to both the private and the public sectors determines the adequacy of health care, and who gets an operation and when, not the judgement of judges and lawyers.

The argument against so-called social and economic rights, or at least their enshrining in statements of bills of rights, is extremely old and valid. An argument was made on this island as early as 1791 when the great Irish political philosopher Edmund Burke argued against a statement of human rights coming out of the French Revolution. He said, and rightly so, that if somebody was sick, they turn to a doctor and not to a metaphysical statement of human rights, as that would do no good.

It would seem bizarre for the Assembly to struggle to restore devolution, only to strangle any future Assembly within the straitjacket of an all-encompassing complex bill of rights that would remove discretion from any future Northern Ireland Executive, take decision-making in areas such as health policy, education, the environment, industrial development, etc, out of the hands of elected politicians and hand them over to unelected lawyers and judges.

Someone once argued that the human rights project is politics by another means. If that is so, it is politics in which most of the population are denied the right to vote.

Finally, I shall return to diversity and its relationship to rights. It is a necessary condition for a free society — and I hope that that is what we all want — that sometimes we have to endure the expression of views that we find deeply offensive. Mr Dawson referred to the danger, or perhaps the actuality, of the situation we are now in, that on occasions the freedom to express one's self, particularly in religious terms, may be infringed.

Sadly, especially in the context of parading — though it does not only occur in that regard — there is the crazy notion that there is some right not to be offended. We have to wake up and realise that in a free society there will be occasions when we, and our views, be they political or religious, will be offended. That is the price of freedom and democracy.

Mr P Ramsey: I wish to make a few comments before I read from my prepared script. Almost a year ago, the Police Service of Northern Ireland introduced clear guidelines, aims, objectives and protocols to deal with homophobic attacks occurring in the Derry City Council area. The circumstances were such that all the political parties on Derry City Council participated in drawing up the guidelines. We wanted to ensure that those people, irrespective of creed, colour or background, had the same fundamental human rights as everyone else.

It was therefore disappointing to hear the comments of the Member for East Antrim Mr Dawson. He has a right to those opinions —

12.30 pm

Mr Dawson: Will the Member give way?

Mr P Ramsey: No — I wish to develop my argument. Mr Dawson had eight or nine minutes to talk about homophobia. I shall spend a few minutes talking about homophobic attacks in my constituency. Whether it is a young lady from Antrim who is a lesbian, or a young man from the Bogside who is gay, both have every right to be a part of our society, and no one should intimate that they be excluded in any way.

In general, the debate to date has been very good. I support David Ford's idea of a day of reflection and reconciliation. A good opportunity will present itself next year when two distinctive events will take place commemorating the Plantation of Ulster and the Flight of the Earls. We should ensure that one of those days is used as a basis for helping people towards reconciliation. I do not have any difficulty supporting that.

Patricia Lewsley made the point that the discussions by the Preparation for Government Committee on rights, safeguards, equality issues and victims did not play a part in the suspension of the Executive and the Assembly. Therefore, they should not be used by any party as a precondition for restoration. They should be a priority for a Programme for Government after the restoration of the Assembly.

All parties reached agreement on several issues in the Committee, but there are many proposals that require further work and discussion. I am delighted that all parties involved in the Committee stressed their commitment to building a shared future. As elected representatives we need to show leadership in our communities. What use is sharing power if we cannot share our streets?

Over the past 20 years in politics, I have been proud of my ability to reach out to the Protestant community in my constituency in Derry. Several years ago, my colleague William Hay and I set out on a course of action as a result of the first phase of the peace programmes. We were instrumental in setting up the Shared City project in Derry. It was obvious that Protestant communities had not taken advantage — and were not in a position to take advantage — of the first phase of funding.

After a major consultation process, visiting and talking to community groups across the city of Derry, Mr Hay and I established that there was a relatively weak community development infrastructure. That had resulted in a lack of confidence, limited capacity, low self-esteem, poor leadership skills, a sense of neglect and isolation, and a perceived disparity of funding in favour of nationalist areas.

The aim of the project was to establish an outreach support programme targeted at marginalised and disadvantaged communities in Protestant areas. It is still in operation, thankfully, and I hope that it will become part of the mainstream within Derry City Council and the Department for Social Development. The project is a model of good practice on increasing capacity, confidence-building measures and addressing the serious alienation and marginalisation that a number of Protestants in Derry still, unfortunately, feel. It should be replicated across Northern Ireland to involve all marginalised communities in civic society.

The Committee agreed that there should, and must, be support for a bill of rights for Northern Ireland. However, when the SDLP put forward a proposal to reach agreement on such a bill, members could not achieve consensus. What has any party to lose from participating in this forum? The best way for all parties to contribute to a bill of rights is to participate in roundtable discussions with members of civic society. If all nationalist and unionist politicians and members of civic society were to agree on a bill of rights, it would have the widest possible ownership and public confidence and could not be ignored by the Northern Ireland Office.

The SDLP has consistently called for the establishment of a forum for the victims and survivors of the troubles. Any process of truth, remembrance and justice must be victim-based. Sustainable peace and true reconciliation will be achieved only through acknowledging and accounting for the past and helping somehow to redress the suffering of victims and survivors.

All parties agree that victims should be a priority in any Programme for Government. However, when the SDLP put forward its proposals to that end, there was no consensus. Let us be clear that there is no hierarchy of victims: victims of the state, republican terror and loyalist terror are all entitled to the same consideration.

Victims have a right to the truth and to have the events of the past recorded, acknowledged and, as far as possible, accounted for. They have a right to have their needs recognised and dealt with. Different victims have different needs, but all require an acknowledgment of their loss. For those who want it, that means providing proper support and compensation and remedying the wrongs and injustices of the past. For some, the fundamental issue is finding the body of one of the disappeared. Victims have the right to be remembered. The enduring legacy of the past is the lives damaged and lost, the suffering inflicted and the suffering that continues.

The SDLP has long championed the rights of victims and survivors and will continue to do so. In particular, we will work to place the rights of victims and survivors at the heart of any process of truth and remembrance. We must ensure that future generations are free from the bigotry and hatred of the past. A tried and tested method of doing so is to encourage good manners, courtesy and respect for all.

Assembly Members should make a public pledge to support, and commit ourselves to promoting and working to achieve, an inclusive society that values and empowers people. We must show collective leadership by ensuring that everyone has equality of opportunity and equal access to facilities and resources, and that there is equality of esteem for all political and religious beliefs.

MLAs must also encourage, recognise and promote the richness of culture of all traditions, groups and communities across the North of Ireland. Our responsibility is to ensure that the rights of others are respected. At all times, we must affirm our commitment to non-violence. More importantly, as politicians, we must ensure that we acknowledge the rights of each individual through our actions and by avoiding words that could in any way damage, injure or deny the civil rights and well-being of others.

We should also ask all those in our communities — individuals, schools, youth groups, community groups and others in the community sector — to pledge their support for a more inclusive society that values and empowers people.

Members have the opportunity to lead by example — to come together to share power in Government. Contributors to the debate have spoken passionately about the issues. Those issues could be at the heart of a Programme for Government in a devolved Assembly. We could take action that would bring about progress in Northern Ireland and would provide its children with a better life based on equality. It is important that a shared future be built.

I want to reiterate that actions, words and deeds can, as has happened in the past, lead to violence being perpetrated on certain members of the community.

Mr Poots: As the previous Member to speak did not give way to my colleague, it is appropriate that I point out that Mr Dawson said nothing that could be construed as homophobic. He did not say anything to incite or support violence against the homosexual community. He pointed out that there has been an attack on people who have Christian beliefs, and that there are issues and problems with how homosexuality contrasts with biblical teaching.

That brings us to the subject of the debate: it is a challenge to freedom of speech, which is one of the first principles of equality. Freedom of assembly and all other rights follow from it. People who expound freedom of speech and say what they believe in a way that is not inflammatory are being challenged. Mr Dawson went to great lengths to illustrate the sort of challenges that ministers of the Gospel and lay preachers could face if they chose to go down a particular route.

I want to focus on the Equality Commission. How can high standards of equality be achieved when the equality watchdog in Northern Ireland has failed so miserably? Since its inception, the Equality Commission has stuck rigidly to recruiting about 60% of its staff from a Catholic background, whereas 60% of its staff should come from a Protestant background and about 40% from a Roman Catholic background.

The Equality Commission grew out of an amalgamation of the Equal Opportunities Commission and the Fair Employment Commission, which had replaced the Fair Employment Agency. The Equality Commission was given all their roles. However, since the establishment of the Fair Employment Agency in 1976, the appropriate percentages of the religious background of staff have never been achieved. The Equality Commission is charged with monitoring that activity in other organisations but has never achieved that itself.

The Chief Commissioner of the Equality Commission, Bob Collins — who, by the way, hails from the Irish Republic — states that it is not the religious background of his staff that is important, but their impartiality. Although that could be taken at face value, one must consider how those staff discharge their work. I challenge the Equality Commission to cite one case in which it acted for the collective rights of Protestants. In fairness, I admit that it has acted on behalf of individual Protestants only.

Mr Weir: I wonder whether the Equality Commission would accept similar words to those of Bob Collins from a firm that it had under investigation for an imbalance in its workforce? Would it be acceptable for the managing director of such a firm to say it that it does not matter that there is an imbalance as long as the staff are impartial?

Mr Poots: It is unlikely that the Equality Commission would accept that as a reasonable response.

When one looks back to what happened to Shorts plc and other companies, but particularly the high wire act that the Equality Commission undertook as regards Shorts plc, that high profile contrasts with its actions as regards many other companies in Northern Ireland, which have a greater proportion of Protestant under-representation in their workforces. The Equality Commission has never publicly challenged those companies in that way.

Gregory Campbell and I have met the Equality Commission many times. We have quoted the employment statistics of those companies and the fact that statistical records show that that under-representation is worsening every year. The Equality Commission's response was that it requested those companies to make welcoming statements. Clearly, those statements have not worked. The commission pushed Shorts to do more than simply make welcoming statements.

It is clear that there is one policy for the Protestant community and another for the Roman Catholic community. I put it to the Equality Commission that it does not treat the two communities fairly in practice.

12.45 pm

The Equality Commission agreed that fifty-fifty recruitment was acceptable in the case of the PSNI. Its basis for adopting that process was the apparent inability, over a prolonged period, of the police to encourage Roman Catholics to join. However, the same situation applies to the Equality Commission in that it has failed to encourage Protestants to apply for its jobs over a protracted period. Perhaps the Equality Commission should seek to address its problems by introducing fifty-fifty recruitment. If it is good enough for the PSNI, it should be good enough for the Equality Commission.

Dr McCrea: Perhaps my Friend could address the fact that there is total silence from the SDLP and other groupings on this issue, yet there have been howls for fifty-fifty recruitment in the police. Why is there silence about the inequalities of the Equality Commission?

Mr Poots: Perhaps we can discuss the matter later, but the SDLP seems to think that the Equality Commission, the Human Rights Commission and the Parades Commission are perfect. They believe that the legislation that has been introduced is good and that it can be built upon, but it cannot be taken away from. Patricia Lewsley stated that she would allow further issues to be added and developed on, but would not allow the legislation to be weakened in any way.

Mr Robert McCartney: Is the Member aware of a recent decision relating to police recruitment in England in which a white male applicant was successful in receiving compensation, because he was able to establish that his application had been turned down in favour of a policy of recruiting women and members of ethnic groups, and it was held that that was a breach of his human rights?

Mr Poots: That individual may have had the support of the equivalent body in England. However, if a Protestant were to take a case against the PSNI, they would not receive the support of the Equality Commission because it has identified that the fifty-fifty recruitment process must be in place. Therefore a better qualified Protestant would not be entitled to challenge a decision with the support of the Equality Commission.

Representatives from the Equality Commission told us that they had difficulty in recruiting Protestants because the numbers of Protestants attending the School of Law in Queen's University Belfast were so low. When those representatives were asked what they were doing about that problem, there was silence. Again, there is failure.

Mr Weir: I appreciate that my Friend seems to be up and down quite a bit today.

The Member mentioned the Equality Commission's comments on the School of Law at Queen's University. However, applicants to the Institute of Professional Legal Studies outnumber places by about four to one. Thus many law graduates cannot enter the legal profession to become solicitors and barristers. Given that spare capacity, surely it should be easy to recruit equitably to provide an appropriate community mix. We must therefore take the remarks about the School of Law with a pinch of salt.

Mr Poots: I thank the Member for those points. The chill factor in our universities is important, but Protestant representation in the legal field is even more important as there is a significant lack of Protestants in the legal profession. That trend will be extrapolated in the appointment of Queen's Counsels (QCs) and judges, and thus the entire legal profession in Northern Ireland will lack balanced representation. We should be deeply concerned about that — if that is allowed to continue, significant problems will arise.

The students' union at Queen's University, in its employment practices and its promotion of cultural issues, has not helped matters. It has clearly discriminated against the unionist and Protestant community.

I will finish by touching on the parading issue, which the SDLP mentioned earlier. The DUP made proposals for restructuring the Parades Commission to enable it to operate better. The DUP believes that the Parades Commission cannot act as both a decision-making body and a mediating body — the two roles clash. The party's suggestion was that the decision-making role should be semi-judicial and that the commission should examine and address its mediation role.

I note that Mr Alban Maginness is in the Chamber. He put up most of the resistance to the DUP's proposal, and perhaps he will clarify his position later. The SDLP seems to think that the Parades Commission is some kind of Utopia that has already reached a state of perfection and thus needs no improvement. It appears that as the Parades Commission is most acceptable to the nationalist community, it is absolutely irrelevant that it is wholly unacceptable to unionists.

I challenge that attitude. If we take that approach — we have what we hold — to everything in Northern Ireland, there will be little prospect of progress on any issue. I suggest that the SDLP review its attitude to parading, which has been hugely contentious for a long time. If we are to resolve the parading issue, the Parades Commission must command the support of both communities, not just of the nationalist community. Changes will have to be made. The DUP's proposed changes would not have damaged the process — rather they would have helped it.

Mr Storey: Does the Member agree that an SDLP councillor in my constituency has an extremely provocative attitude to parades? Declan O'Loan plays the green card, which plays into the hands of republicans and dissident republicans in Ballymena whose clear agenda is to stop parades. He assists them in doing that.

Mr Poots: People can be provocative about parades. This year, people in many areas of Northern Ireland — particularly those in the unionist community — sought to take much of the heat out of the parading issue. Therefore we had a relatively successful summer. However, if we are to build on that, there must be changes to both the Parades Commission and the current attitude to parading. The SDLP has a central role to play in that.

Madam Speaker: As Members know, the Business Committee has arranged to meet at lunchtime today. I propose therefore, by leave of the Assembly, to suspend this sitting until 2.00 pm.

The sitting was suspended at 12.56 pm.

On resuming (Madam Speaker in the Chair) —

2.00 pm

Mr Hussey: In supporting the motion, I am reminded of a newspaper headline last week, “Sinn Féin Snubs Victims”.

Like Patricia Lewsley and David Ford, I thank and congratulate the Chairpersons and everybody involved in assisting the Committee with its work. It was a privilege to be involved in the work of that format of the Committee on the Preparation for Government (PFG Committee).

The PFG Committee dealing with rights, safeguards, equality issues and victims considered a bill of rights for Northern Ireland and human rights in general. What greater human right is there than that of the right to life? What organisation has been more responsible for the denial of that fundamental human right than the organisation that does not even have the courage of its own misguided conviction to be here to even try to publicly justify its position?

The Committee considered parades; Sinn Féin has manipulated and orchestrated unjustified scenarios on that issue for blatant political gain. It has asked for face-to-face dialogue in respect of many parades throughout the community, but we are here to debate the issue face to face. It appears that the writing that I have seen on many walls in republican areas about the IRA is ringing true for its political wing — I Ran Away.

The Committee, which included Sinn Féin members, reached agreement on many vital issues that can be progressed. However, it is unfortunate that the House cannot ratify the report because Sinn Féin has decreed that it is not prepared to enter into political debate with the democratic majority in Northern Ireland represented in the Chamber. Rather, Members can note the excellent work of the PFG Committee. It considered equality, good relations and a shared future. Sinn Féin, obviously, has nothing to share with Members.

Madam Speaker and other Members will remember that, in debates of the previous Assembly, I clearly distinguished between an elective mandate and a democratic mandate. No one can deny that Sinn Féin has an elective mandate, but it has yet to fully endorse the democratic mandate.

My main remit within this format of the PFG Committee concerned our past and its legacy. The normal society that the PFG Committee, its subgroup and the House are endeavouring to work towards may not emerge in our lifetimes if we do not adequately deal with our past. It is a central precursor to moving forward.

It was agreed that those with primary responsibility for the disappearance of the disappeared needed to finally resolve the issue. The Committee recognised the need for greater support to be given to the families of the disappeared, recommending the establishment of a family liaison officer to support those families. I am confident that the House will concur.

The Ulster Unionist Party's comments on victims and survivors of terrorism were, and are, predicated on three points. First, we do not equate victims with perpetrators, and I concur with Mr McCausland's point on this subject. Secondly, each victim's situation is personal and specific, and any process must reflect that. Any process that may be established must be victim-centred and not subject to a loose, generic system. Thirdly, there is no hierarchy of victimhood.

However, there is a spectrum of victimhood: from those who still bear the physical and mental trauma and those who can forgive and those who will not; to those who regard themselves as survivors and who wish to carry on with the rest of their lives while, no doubt, retaining their private and personal memories.

In the Committee, the Ulster Unionist Party focused primarily on the establishment of agreed principles to provide the necessary framework for victims' issues to be dealt with sensitively and fairly. The definition of a victim was important to all parties, but could not be agreed. That central factor resulted in several important proposals not finding consensus. The Ulster Unionist Party believes that only those who have suffered through illegal and criminal actions — not the perpetrators themselves — are the true victims of the troubles.

We are all aware of the efforts of perpetrators of violence to sanitise their respective murder campaigns. The efforts of terrorists to legitimise their actions create the problem that we were unable to resolve. I contend that it is only right that account is taken of responsibility and criminal culpability in determining society's collective approach to victims' issues. In our view, perpetrators of violence are plainly not victims.

Further, we recognise that illegal and criminal actions have not been perpetrated by only one side of our community. Those who operated outside the framework of civic society; who acted beyond law and order, and who sought to remove from others the most fundamental of all rights — the right to life — cannot be classed as victims or survivors. In spite of widely differing views, the Committee agreed that the issue of victims should be identified and given priority in any Programme for Government. I am confident that this House can concur with such a proposal, which would mean that that we should examine existing levels of support for victims and the glaring need for increased support and proper mainstream funding for victims' groups.

Many on this side of the House are aware of the tenuous situation facing victims' groups, which operate from hand to mouth and wonder whether they will be able to open their doors the next day. Those groups must continuously reduce hours and/or lay off essential core workers who have gained irreplaceable understanding and knowledge of their client base. Those are personnel in whom the client base has confidence and who can empathise fully with those with whom they work.

Although I know that it is wrong to single out any of the many victim support groups throughout Northern Ireland, I cannot fail to mention West Tyrone Voice in my own constituency, which supports victims whom I know well. The work of that group is second to none and is mirrored in all such groups throughout Northern Ireland.

Is it not insensitive and grossly insulting to expect groups that represent victims and survivors of terrorist actions to have to sit down with groups that are representative of the perpetrators of those actions if they are to access the funding that is vital for their survival? Would it not be more productive to let such victims' groups grow in confidence and, in their own time — if and when they are ready — engage with others, rather than find themselves being financially blackmailed into doing so?

There are many individuals who believe that they were poorly treated by the state in the past in regard to their rightful needs. There should be a review of past levels of compensation.

We do not know it all. The Government should examine international best practice in support of the development of special community-based initiatives, such as a trauma and counselling service. In that respect, I had the privilege of being involved in the work of the South West Local Strategic Partnership Community Victims and Survivors Initiative, partnered with our local health trust. I recommend the recently published report of that initiative, 'Casting Bread upon the Water', as essential reading for those taking forward victims and survivors' issues. I congratulate Sean Coll, our community victims' support officer, for his work on that excellent report.

The Committee considered the establishment of a victims' forum. All members agreed with that principle, but consensus could not be achieved on participants. Again, the issue of definition arose. From my own engagement with various individuals and groups, I fully understand that many would have difficulty in sitting down with those who were responsible for their situation.

A victims' forum should be just that: a forum for the true victims of terrorism. Once again, because of definitions, consensus could not be reached either on a day of remembrance and reflection or memorials. It is tragic that there are many memorials for the victims of terror in our land. Those memorials, which have been erected by relatives and friends, are victim-centred, personal and specific. My experiences with the families of many friends who were murdered in the troubles have shown me that they would not want their kith and kin to be associated in a single national memorial with those who carried out terrorist acts.

Sinn Féin-controlled councils attempted to plant trees of remembrance as part of a cross-community day of coming together to remember victims. Even though its Members are absent, Sinn Féin is fully aware that that project failed because the Protestant/loyalist/unionist community did not want to be associated with it. It was viewed as yet another political exercise to sanitise the actions of Sinn Féin's military wing.

Contrast that with Omagh District Council's refusal to support the Omagh Support and Self Help Group's efforts to place a memorial plaque at the site of the Omagh bombing. Why was that the case? Sinn Féin would not support the acknowledgement on the plaque that the perpetrators of that attack were republican terrorists. I trust that Members will agree that that represents a blatant Sinn Féin denial of the facts. However, what is new? I congratulate the Omagh Support and Self Help Group for its tenacity in its ongoing fight for justice, and I wish it well in those efforts.

The nationalist and republican community appears to expect two standards in a truth-and-reconciliation process. It expects: first, full disclosure and accountability from the forces of law and order; and secondly, codes of honour that grant secrecy to terrorist organisations. The Ulster Unionist Party is clear that the South African model for truth and reconciliation is not suitably transferable, either in whole or in part, to meet the needs of Northern Ireland.

Mr Elliott: Does the Member agree that it is important to get to the truth in any truth-and-reconciliation process but that, in doing so, we must realise that those who have murdered and maimed in the Province in the past three decades are highly unlikely to tell the truth in any such forum?

Mr Hussey: I thank the Member for that intervention. As I said, codes of honour that allow for secrecy will hide the truth.

The Ulster Unionist Party congratulates Bertha McDougall on the excellent work that she has done to date. The establishment of a permanent victims' commissioner is the way forward. In the absence of an Executive Government in Northern Ireland — which has come about through no fault of the democratic majority, which is in the Chamber — I urge the Secretary of State to take note of and act on the many excellent suggestions that were made in the meetings of the Committee on the Preparation for Government that dealt with rights, safeguards, equality issues and victims. I support the motion.

Mr Shannon: Thers aa'hale lok o'issues brocht up in this report. Mony that aa' wud laek tae taulk aboot.

But thers jist gaun tae be a breef disgusshun, o'yin ishyee, an because aa'cum fae Strangford, ye nicht hae sum soart et at least a guid idea, o'whut am guan tae sae. An that is tha permotshun o'tha hamely tongue, Ulster Scotch, I Norlin Airlan.

Whiles A'hm no wantin' tae gae owre agin whit bes gyely clear hit maun bae pointed oot hoo thair isnae onie parity o'treatment atween Airish an' Ulster Scotch permotshun. Ulster Scotch bes entitlet tae bae treated the saime es Airish, es an officially designated minority leid — no jist a dialect! Tae risk comin acroass laike a wean A hae tae point oot at the wie things stan' theday isnae fair. The latest facts adae wi'catter an' fundin A cum oan wur fae 2002-04, an shew hoo far ahin we ir i gien hefts tae the cultural velue o'Ulster Scotch I Norlin Airlan.

2.15 pm

There are many worthy issues raised in the Committee's report that I would like to address. However, time permits only a brief discussion of one issue. As I come from the Strangford district, you may have a fair idea of what I am at pains to stress: the promotion of the Ulster-Scots culture in Northern Ireland. While I have no wish to rehash what will be abundantly clear, I must point out that there is a clear lack of parity between the promotion of Irish and that of Ulster Scots. Ulster Scots is entitled to parity of treatment with Irish as an officially designated minority language, not merely a dialect. At the risk of sounding juvenile, I simply must point out that the way things stand at present is not fair. The funding facts for 2000-04 show exactly how far behind we are in the promotion of the cultural value of Ulster Scots in Northern Ireland.

I would like to focus on paragraph 39 of the report. My colleague Mr McCausland has mentioned the clear disparity in funding. It is a ratio of 6:1; for every pound that Ulster Scots gets, Irish gets six. There is currently an imbalance of £10 million. Although funding for Ulster Scots has increased, it is still nowhere near the level it should be at when the sheer volume of those who are part of the culture are taken into consideration. From the beautiful shores of Strangford Lough to the shores of Lough Erne and the hills of Donegal, the whispers of Ulster Scots can be heard in everyday terminology.

The problem lies, perhaps, in the fact that people do not always understand their culture, and cannot have any pride in their culture and heritage unless it is brought to light for them. This failing must be addressed as speedily as possible. Not only do the people of Northern Ireland miss out on their history, but Northern Ireland misses out on the boost to the tourist industry that the proper promotion of this non-political, rich and rewarding aspect of local culture could bring.

Over 200,000 tourists come from Scotland to Northern Ireland every year. Imagine the potential for even more growth were we to fully explore the links, both current and historic. Local pipe bands have returned from the annual World Pipe Band Championship in Glasgow with success in many areas. Also present at the competition were bands from Canada and further afield. The potential to expand this aspect of local culture would be welcomed by many who can trace their ancestry back to our fair shores.

There are information sites dedicated to Ulster Scots in many countries: Canada, Australia, New Zealand and America, to name a few. The subscription to learning about their roots in Ulster is by no means small. In America, a nation that takes pride in its rich heritage, over 22 million people can trace their roots back to the wee Province of Ulster. Imagine if we were to draw a mere percentage of that number to our shores through effective promotion of the Ulster-Scots language. That would increase tourism and boost our economy no end.

How can we achieve this? In Ards Borough Council, a subgroup is dedicated to the promotion of Ulster Scots. In Newry and Mourne Council, there is a similar committee, and Castlereagh Borough Council has also made a commitment to the language. These councils are trying energetically to promote Ulster Scots. Ards was the first council to put up Ulster-Scots signs, with unanimous cross-community support in the council for the motion, including the SDLP. I was reminded after the meeting that some of the more proficient speakers of Ulster Scots in the Ards Peninsula are members of the SDLP.

Mr Dallat: Does Mr Shannon agree that more money would be available to finance Ulster Scots if the former chairman of the Ulster-Scots Agency, Lord Laird, had not spent so much money hiring private taxis to go to Dublin?

Mr Shannon: I will leave that comment for someone else to answer; it is not worthy of a response.

We in Ards were the first council to support Ulster Scots, but we also support the funding of many books and plays, such as 'The Scot in America and the Ulster Scot' by Whitelaw Reid.

Our own Billy Kennedy, who is a close relative of one Member, has promoted Scotch-Irish books across the Province, Europe and the United States. That indicates how many people have promoted Ulster Scots internally, but it also shows that much more is possible.

Numerous celebrations are planned to mark the four-hundredth anniversary of Hamilton and Montgomery's plantation of Ards. Those celebrations are the culmination of years of effort. Indeed, thousands of people from across the entire community have attended the ongoing Dawn of the Ulster-Scots festival in Greyabbey.

There is a clear celebration of Ulster Scots across the divide; indeed, some of my constituents speak Ulster Scots fluently. If Northern Ireland as a whole were to embrace Ulster-Scots tradition and heritage, it would be in a much better economic and social position. Fair and adequate promotion and funding will benefit not just one sector in Northern Ireland; it will profit everyone in the Province. Ards is displaying a true celebration of culture and diversity: why not allow the entire Province to experience and enjoy the simple pleasures that can be found in the tribute of a rich, extensive and inclusive culture that reminds us all of where we came from and who we have the potential to be?

I shall give some examples of very prominent Ulster-Scots men: the poet Edgar Allan Poe; the United States President George Washington; the army general Robert E Lee; and Blair Mayne — or Colonel Paddy, as he was also known — who was a local hero in Ards, the Province and the world. Just for the record, Elvis Presley was also an Ulster Scot, and he was a man for the rock and roll.

Mr McNarry: He still lives in the peninsula.
[Laughter.]

Mr Shannon: He is heard regularly in my house.

The very blood that flowed through those prominent Ulster-Scots men is the same blood that flows through me and many Members. That blood also flows through the veins of many people outside the Chamber. Many people feel part of the Ulster-Scots heritage and experience. If we can find a way to instil a sense of pride in our up-and-coming generation, perhaps it will take those men as examples and be more successful as a result.

To fully comprehend where we are going, we must first understand where we have been. Let us invest in our future by collectively priding ourselves on our past.

Mr Gallagher: As Members know, the Review of Public Administration (RPA) will radically change the future of local government. If the Secretary of State has his way, there will be seven "super councils": three will be dominated by representatives of the nationalist tradition; another three dominated by representatives of the unionist tradition; and Belfast will most likely be more evenly balanced.

The direct-rule Ministers who are dealing with the RPA have chosen to ignore the dangers that are in those new arrangements. There is a danger of ongoing political domination and, indeed, a real danger that a form of Balkanisation could emerge. When the subject has been brought to the attention of direct-rule Ministers and their civil servants, their rhetoric has been that everything will be all right and that safeguards and protections will be in place. Those safeguards and protections are needed because, despite the positive signs in many local councils that we are on the road towards a more normal society, some unionist-dominated councils to this day refuse to share power and refuse to allocate top posts on a cross-community basis.

Rhetoric from direct-rule Ministers that they will do something about that is just not good enough.

Members will know that the Minister with responsibility for the RPA has established a task force and several working groups, which have been active and reporting for months. They have ignored, however, the need for protections and safeguards for the minorities living in the council areas. Safeguards are not mentioned in a single sentence of any of their reports.

I remind Members that it is of fundamental importance that safeguards are put in place in advance of the new arrangements, so that all the new councils can operate on the basis of fairness and equality. It is imperative that the new arrangements include statutory safeguards and legislative guarantees for cross-community representation in the top posts in all councils and for proportional representation in appointments to all council committees and outside bodies. Most importantly, mechanisms must be put in place to ensure sufficient consensus on all important decisions.

Members will be aware of plans to return additional powers to local government. In the present circumstances, that is premature. We are all aware of the contentious issues, of which planning and housing are examples. The future working of those issues must initially be based on regional policy that has been agreed by the elected Members of an Assembly that works on the basis of partnership and inclusion.

The report contains wide-ranging views on education, not least the contributions of our different school systems to the acceptance of difference and the healing of division. Separate schooling is a feature of the history of Northern Ireland. These days, however, parents are increasingly exercising their right to choose the type of education of which they wish their children to avail. The result of that is, of course, the growth that we have seen in the integrated and Irish-medium sectors. That diversity of provision has been a welcome development, and parental choice must continue to be a guiding principle in any future education policy.

Mr Storey: The Member referred to the RPA. Does he agree that he is at variance with the Roman Catholic bishops who, in their submission to the RPA, made it abundantly clear that, regardless of all the buzz words and nice phrases about equality and inclusion, the best form of education is a Roman Catholic education, dominated by the Church, and, as far as they are concerned, any other form of education is not to be welcomed?

Mr Gallagher: I have not seen the report to which the Member referred and, therefore, I cannot comment. However, I am coming to the issue that he raised.

Members will know that the majority of parents will, for the foreseeable future, continue to choose either maintained or controlled schools. That choice does not mean that they are advocating continued division in society. Separate schools did not cause the divisions in this society; they merely reflect them. Research has shown consistently that the home, not the school, is the most powerful influencer of children's social attitudes.

For the benefit of Mr Storey, I want to say that, over the years, all of our schools, often in the face of violence or polarisation, have played an influential role in promoting positive community relations. We must all encourage schools to achieve greater levels of co-operation and new levels of appreciation of difference on the basis of race, religion or culture.

Schools now face the challenge of educating our young people to be at ease in a multicultural environment, in which mutual respect, acceptance and appreciation of diversity are values that must be nurtured in the promotion of social cohesion and the creation of a normal civic society in which all individuals are considered equal.

2.30 pm

Many Members have mentioned the plight of victims in this society. Dealing with the past is one of the preconditions for lasting peace and a safe future. The task of facing and dealing with the past is a challenge that any future devolved Assembly will have to confront and make a top priority. As we know, the House of Commons' Select Committee on Northern Ireland Affairs' interim report last year stated that the time was not yet right to put in place a formal "truth recovery" mechanism.

Although clear consensus has yet to emerge on mechanisms to promote reconciliation and healing for victims, much good work has been done, and continues to be done, on the ground. The Healing Through Remembering project has conducted much consultation and research at both local and international level on methods that can be adopted to help victims. Possible methods of doing that have emerged from its deliberations, and those include story telling and testimonies. A scoping study has revealed that more than 30 local story-telling projects are already taking place. There are also proposals to hold a day of reflection in June 2007 and for a living memorial museum. That work, and the other genuine contributions to the healing process are to be commended, and all are worthy of further discussion. Any process for dealing with victims and survivors must be based on victims' needs and must take a bottom-up rather than top-down approach.

My colleague Ms Lewsley, as did many other Members, referred to 'A Shared Future'. After a long consultation, the Government's 'A Shared Future:

Policy and Strategic Framework for Good Relations in Northern Ireland' was published in March 2005. As I have pointed out many times, we all share the future here, because we must share this piece of territory. The quality of that future will hinge on the relationships that we manage to build or on those that we fail to build. The strategy for building a shared future has been laid down. A priority for any new Government will be to translate that plan into action.

Mr McNarry: The House is being asked to note the work that the Committee completed and its resulting report on rights, safeguards, equality issues and victims. In other places, "to note" means "to dispose of", "to take no further action on" or "to file away and perhaps dust down later". I trust, Madam Speaker, that that is not to be the fate of this report, because it is a good report, which is worth holding on to and returning to. Page 10 of the report contains an eye-catching bullet point that has not been included in the executive summary. It refers to parades and the issues surrounding parades, and it states:

"Solving the problems that have been associated with parades as a fundamental prerequisite to political progress and stability in Northern Ireland."

That is fair enough. However, from an Ulster Unionist perspective, I do not think that the bullet point goes far enough in interpreting and spelling out what my party colleague Danny Kennedy said in Committee. I later endorsed and elaborated on his remarks.

Does the House seriously believe that a newly formed devolved Executive could withstand the pressure of office unless the Drumcree situation and other such disputes are resolved, when it remains patently clear that such disputes are not even under consideration? On this issue, and on the general issue of parades, only the Ulster Unionist Party has raised the bar to the extent of stating that disputes over parades must be on the way to resolution before devolution can be restored. Members should refer to the "Official Reports Relating to the Report", page 169, where my colleague Danny Kennedy stipulates that:

"any outstanding controversies around parades must be well on their way to being resolved before devolution is restored."

The issue of parades was originally tabled for discussion in the Preparation for Government Committee that dealt with law-and-order issues; I had the issue moved to the PFG Committee that dealt with rights, safeguards, and so forth. During the law-and-order debate last week, Members delved into the ramifications of creating the post of Minister for policing and justice. Would he or she be responsible for parades?

Let us move forward beyond today's report on the issue of rights to a time when the DUP has repaired its splits and patched up its factions in order to get things right and gauge — yet again — the public mood, which is asking the party to do the deal that Her Majesty's Government require it to do in order to restore devolved government. Between today and 11 October, or between that date and 24 November, or within a short time after the alleged deadline, what evidence will have been presented to indicate that a shared future includes a shared space for people to exercise their cultural expression by way of organising traditional Loyal Order walks or processions? What evidence will be advanced that those who have tactically master-minded the formation of concerned residents' groups to oppose by any means, lawful or unlawful, the Loyal Orders' right to peaceful and lawful assembly has been withdrawn? What evidence will be brought forward to state, without conditions, that permission from the so-called host community is not an issue and is no longer being withheld by any key holder from members of the loyal orders so that they can walk peacefully along a road or pass through a certain area?

Between now and whenever a devolved government is to be formed, what evidence is there that all outstanding problems and disputes surrounding the issue of parades are well and truly on their way to being resolved? The answer is that there is no evidence. The key players with the numbers required to do the deal are not even thinking about a resolution of the parades issue before agreeing to enter into Government with each other. If I am wrong, let us hear about it. Let us know where those key players have placed the parades issue on their negotiating priority list.

Reference has been made, and thanks given, by earlier contributors for the past two reasonably peaceful summers. That showed how communities, annually caught in the thick of tension and the daily risk of violence exploding onto the streets, could, under the right conditions, find an outcome of negotiated compromise that satisfied each other. Members of the House helped to deliver some positive achievements that might not normally have materialised, and their efforts should be duly recognised.

However, the major effort came from community activists. It was they who actually made the difference.

When it came to resolving local parades disputes, it was not only the Ulster Unionist and DUP representatives who worked; the Progressive Unionist Party and Ulster Political Research Group (UPRG) activists also punched in the hours. Apparently, for some, it was OK for the lads to marshal routes at flashpoint interfaces and weed out the troublemakers, and, if things looked like getting hot, it was only proper that the lads work on it.

However, memories are short. As we witnessed in this House recently, the lads may be good enough to stand shoulder to shoulder with in the summer, but their representative is apparently not good enough to link into my party's Assembly group. Do we really want loyalists of only a certain kind, and at a certain time, when we can use them and put them in a box until the following year?

The response to that question is every bit as important as the response being sought by unionists from republicans and constitutional nationalists as to how they can support the view that failing to resolve controversies over parades poses a serious impediment to restoring devolution. Without the resolution to this issue, as demanded by the Ulster Unionists, we risk placing any new Executive on a knife-edge every summer. In those circumstances, it is inevitable that parties in an Executive will take sides over the handling of a controversial parade or even a decision to allow or ban it in the first place. The ingredients to wobble, if not topple, a new Executive are in the reality bag so long as the issue remains outside the resolution box.

A lodge collar, a shirt and tie, one's best suit and good shoes are hardly the uniform of a person preparing to riot. The non-obligatory bowler hat and umbrella are to protect against showers of rain — they do not protect against showers of bricks and bottles. We have a choice: will every summer be how it used to be, with Northern Ireland closing down for July? Is that what we are looking for? The parties also have a choice: we can pass today's motion. Unfortunately, we are restrained from amending it. It does not really mean anything to me, and I wish that I could have amended it. Please do not just note it.

The Ulster Unionist Party is resolved to prioritising the parading issue at the first opportunity. There is no bartering and no negotiating position over rights or the perplexities of a primacy of rights. When did that apply? For over 3,000 days Portadown district number 1 has been waiting to secure free and safe passage for its return walk from Drumcree parish church to Carleton Street orange hall. All along, the Parades Commission has overseen a rioters' charter and the erosion of rights and freedoms applicable to the cultural expression of the Portadown men and many others.

In simply noting the report and doing nothing else, we all fall into the complacent trap of putting the issue away for another year. I urge all Members to join the Ulster Unionists in making parading the priority that it deserves to be. Do not leave it until next summer; do not believe that devolution will flourish as the parades issue remains in limbo and unsolved. Resolve the disputes, and we will go a long way towards creating stability and real peace. If this House can bring that, it will have done a great duty.

2.45 pm

Mr Easton: When we deal with victims, our parading culture, the disappeared and human rights, we deal with the most important and sensitive issues of our time for the unionist community and further afield.

I want to turn to the critical issue of the disappeared. That word, in and of itself, does not do justice to the trauma and agony that loved ones feel for the nearest and dearest of whom they have been cruelly deprived. All the lives that are referred to by the term "disappeared" are very important, but allow me for a moment to come close to home and the case of Lisa Dorrian.

No words of mine can adequately express the trauma, the agony and the daily pain that this family is suffering — their lives and livelihoods have been put on hold as they await the return of Lisa. I add my voice to those of all right-thinking people and call on anyone who can help the police in any way to do so immediately. I believe that someone somewhere can help, and it is that person's bounden duty to do so. All these months have gone by, and Lisa is still missing. This is unjustified and unjustifiable, and the consciences of those responsible must be killing them. In the name of human decency, I appeal for an end to the family's agony.

Let me turn to those many other families who lost loved ones through the evil of terrorism and for whom no grave can yet provide a place of solace and comfort. Theirs is indeed the loneliest of roads and the most painful of paths. The irony is that those who often cry the loudest for human rights are those who have violated the most fundamental human right of all: the right to life. The absence of Sinn Féin today is an insult to those victims yet again. Sinn Féin has run away and is hiding behind closed doors. To those who have tortured and killed, I say that the ignominy of their actions will leave an indelible stain on their characters that they will take to their graves. Let them not be deceived by perverted terrorist ideology: their actions were wrong and a fundamental affront to democracy.

The need for a liaison officer for those who deal with the moment-by-moment consequences of having a loved one "disappeared" is important. The case has been well made, and it has my full support.

Now let me turn to culture and to the parading tradition of the pro-British community. This matter must be addressed. For too long the Ulster-Scots culture has been discriminated against by those with warped minds and by those who do not understand any culture apart from their own. Parading in the Ulster/British community, and particularly for the Loyal Orders, the Royal Black Institution and the Apprentice Boys, is a long and honourable tradition. It should be cherished and welcomed. It also has an international dimension: the Orange Institution can be found in Australia, Canada, Togo and the United States, among other countries.

It is to be welcomed and respected. Let no one be in any doubt that if we are to live in a mature democracy, parading must be settled. I challenge those whose democratic development is stunted to move on from the failed practice of cultural apartheid. In North Down, on 12 July, we celebrated 100 years of Bangor district, and 80,000 people lined the streets of Bangor to watch a carnival and enjoy a family occasion that was no threat to anyone. Families had a great time celebrating their culture, and Catholic and Protestant neighbours stood side by side enjoying the day. The Twelfth has great potential for tourism; if only those who oppose this could see the benefits that it could bring to the economy and people of Northern Ireland.

As I have said, parading has been part of our tradition and heritage for generations. Make no mistake: it will still be there for generations to come, long after we are gone.

I challenge those opposed to our culture to move on and accept the inevitable, and to step up to the mark and accept the right of freedom of assembly, which is the key to success.

Mr Hussey: I thank the Member for giving way. I noticed that in his list of parading organisations he did not include the band parading culture. Will the Member explain where the band parading culture fits in with his view of parading?

Mr Easton: The band culture is part of our culture, and must be welcomed. However, we want a band culture that is acceptable to everybody and enjoyable for everyone in Northern Ireland.

The unionist community has tolerated the tradition of the right to march by the Ancient Order of Hibernians, and I demand the same courtesy and rights for the Orange Order.

The Parades Commission is an unelected, unaccountable body, and it must go; it is part of the problem, and not a solution. Its failure to understand, and its obvious bias against, the Loyal Orders is obvious and unacceptable and, therefore, it must be done away with.

Finally, I appeal for a fair deal for the innocent victims. A proper package of support will not address the legacy of hurt that terrorism has caused, but it can, and should, help. The innocent victims are due the utmost that society can offer, and it is high time we moved on to make that a reality. Fairness compels us to address adequately the needs of the victims, and we must now move from words to actions.

Mrs D Dodds: There has been much debate about the contents of the PFG Committee's report on rights, safeguards, equality issues and victims. I welcome the report and thank those who worked so hard to produce this lengthy document.

Like other Members who have already mentioned the fact, I am not surprised that the only party that wanted to censor the report, prevent its publication and stop the Assembly debating these important issues is not in the Chamber. There has been much discussion, quite rightly, on various aspects of the report: the bill of rights; the implementation and the implications of section 75; the parades issue; the shabby treatment of victims over many years; and the need to do more for those who have suffered the most from the violence our community has experienced.

However, I want to confine my remarks to a couple of issues — equality and confidence building within the unionist community — and I say that unreservedly. Over the past 30 years, unionist communities such as those in west Belfast have suffered badly from violence, both from within and without. Republican violence has left many scars, but much harm has also been done by direct rule Ministers who have pandered to the strident demands of republicans that have been dressed up in the fine words of equality.

Republicans in west Belfast have abandoned any notion of equality and a shared future agenda, and their cultural agenda has now taken on the mantle of cultural apartheid, with republicans trying to hive off large tracts of the constituency for a Gaeltacht quarter. Not only is that agenda swallowing up huge amounts of Government funding, it is also segregating the city. The small, vulnerable unionist community in west Belfast is evermore squeezed by a vision of the area that is totally Gaelic and Irish, and driven by that well-known moderate Máirtín Ó Muilleoir.

It is communities such as those in unionist west Belfast and along the border who need confidence in equality legislation, and who need that level playing field created, so that they can be empowered to take their rightful place in any future Northern Ireland.

The PFG Committee agreed one important issue: equality measures need to be implemented to address objective need and current trends to avert future problems, and all interested parties, including Government, should be fully committed to addressing the issue.

That is a fine objective, but easier to say than to practice. The phrase "equality is for everyone" is much flaunted, and much trotted out to satisfy political correctness, and many heads in this Chamber will nod their assent. However, what are we doing about it?

Today, I want to look at equality in the Youth Service. Every child in Northern Ireland is guaranteed a place in school — a good concept of equality. However, the situation is very different when we consider the provision of youth services, particularly in Belfast. The Shankill ward in West Belfast, which I represent and which is very dear to my heart, is the most deprived ward in Northern Ireland. It is at number one in the Noble indices of deprivation.

On 6 September, the members of the Belfast Education and Library Board (BELB) were given the latest figures for youth provision in the city. During the financial year 2005-06, the allocated budget for youth provision in the Shankill ward was £275. The allocated budget for the remainder of West Belfast was £831,210.

In the Oldpark electoral area of North Belfast, BELB spends the princely sum of £768 in a youth club known locally as Top Spot, which has been closed for four years. I presume that the £768 was for broken windows or repairs of some sort. BELB spends £265,000 in supporting youth facilities in nationalist areas. That is a situation that my colleague Nelson McCausland and I have questioned repeatedly in the board. We have taken the issue to the Children's Commissioner, and we will be approaching the Equality Commission. At our instigation, an equality impact assessment is being carried out on the matter.

I hear Members asking what board members have done about tackling inequality. They have simply voted to perpetuate it by reinstating the status quo year after year, after year. They tell me that they inherited the situation, and that it is a legacy of 1973 that they can do nothing about. They have totally failed to face up to the inequalities and in doing so have institutionalised them.

I have raised this matter over and over again since joining the board last year. I have been accused of bringing sectarianism into the Youth Service. I demand no more for the young people that I represent than I do for any other young person; that is, an equal share of the allocated budget. If equality is for everyone, then it is also for the Protestant young people in north and west Belfast who deserve to see it in practice in their communities.

Let me develop the theme a little further. Equality of opportunity is a common goal espoused by all in this Chamber. However, this laudable goal will not ensure equality of outcome if Government Departments and the voluntary and community sector do not recognise the difficulties experienced by many communities.

I read Sinn Féin's complaints in the report about the allocation of money for the renewal and regeneration of Protestant communities. Sinn Féin denied the fact of weak community infrastructure, and has been supported by many in the voluntary and community sector who are well paid by Government and who have presided over this shambles for many years.

3.00 pm

Let me outline a small example from my constituency. In May 2001, my colleague Maurice Morrow, as Minister for Social Development, and Sir Reg Empey, as Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment, set up the greater Shankill task force and the west Belfast task force. After the publication of their findings in 2002, a joint working group was established between the two task forces to take forward initiatives, with a budget of £21 million allocated by the Integrated Development Fund.

An update in June 2006, provided through Belfast City Council, shows that almost £9 million went to projects in west Belfast and only £900,000 to projects in the greater Shankill area. Members may have guessed that £1 million went to the Gaeltacht quarter — which has helped to segregate the city even further. That is a prime example of equality of opportunity not bringing about equality of outcome, and there is no doubt that a weak community infrastructure and various other ongoing issues within the unionist community contributed to that situation.

What can be done about that? I have made many representations to DETI over a long period of time. Despite West Belfast still not being ready to run with some of the projects, DETI will not reallocate the funding. The money is out there in the ether, but the Department will not allow it to be touched. Instead, the Department set up smokescreens, established inter-departmental groups to consider the situation, and has still not consulted elected representatives. It is easy to espouse the ideal of equality; it is another thing to implement it. Those two ongoing situations, within a small, vulnerable, unionist community that has faced many problems, demonstrate how equality has now become institutionalised.

Not one Sinn Féin or SDLP member of the Belfast Education and Library Board (BELB) has supported the fight for equality for the young people from Protestant communities in north and west Belfast. If all communities in Northern Ireland are to experience a prosperous future, lip service is simply not enough. If we are to ensure that everyone has a stake in society — even those from the community in Northern Ireland that is most disadvantaged for any number of reasons — we must ensure that there is more than mere lip service to equality.

The confidence of the unionist community has been sapped by republican terrorism and by Government side deals with republicans. My colleague Nelson McCausland took great care to demonstrate that this morning when he talked about festival funding. After the unionist community had been locked out of festival funding for many years, the DUP thought that it had eventually created a level playing field — until Mr Hain took the overtly political decision to issue funds, yet again, to the West Belfast Festival and Ardoyne Fleadh.

Equality for unionists has not been high on the Government's agenda; there is inequality both in budget allocation and in the workplace. The Royal

Group of Hospitals is the largest employer in west Belfast. Some 96% of its workforce, including cleaners, security staff, porters, etc, come from the Catholic community, despite sizeable Protestant communities living adjacent to the hospitals, in the Village, Sandy Row and unionist west Belfast.

The inequality in funding for festivals and other cultural activities, and the large funding grants being given to republican propaganda rags such as 'Daily Ireland' contribute to the widespread alienation of the Protestant community.

Inequality eats away at communities. It saps their confidence and completely destroys their trust in the institutions and in Government. It is within the Government's power to deliver the equality agenda; so far, it has not chosen to do so. Like many colleagues, I warn Mr Hain that we also hear the clock ticking. The deadline of 24 November is fast approaching. It is in Mr Hain's power to deliver the equality agenda.

Mr McGimpsey: In common with other contributors, I want to thank the staff who have worked so hard to prepare the report, which is a significant and important piece of work. I have no problems in supporting it.

Culture is a pertinent issue. Many years ago, when I took over as Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure, I looked up the definition of "culture" in a dictionary. Everybody has a different idea of what culture means. I discovered that culture is defined as being the training and refinement of the mind, taste and manners, and acquainting oneself with the best that has been known and said in the world. That definition was not much help to me. Although that definition may apply to repositories of the best of what has been known and said in the world as far as libraries or museums are concerned, there is a further aspect to culture. It is not popular culture but one that is deeply imbued in society that is of interest to me.

The community's sense of its own heritage and, at its heart, a desire to develop from within the prerequisite of an outward-looking dynamic society could potentially pay rich dividends for our society where, all too often, a type of activity, school of thought or philosophy might lead to conflict.

We use cultural symbols to communicate and to understand one another. Cultural symbols are imbued with significance and personal meaning. We rely on those symbols. The parades issue has been discussed, and the procession is an important cultural symbol of unionism. The right to hold processions and to march or parade has been present in unionism for the past couple of hundred years. When groups oppose the right of procession, they appear to attack the symbols of a particular community — symbols that have been imbued with personal meaning and significance.

Around 10 years ago, on an Easter Monday, an Apprentice Boys parade went wrong and ended in civil unrest at the Ormeau Bridge. I was caught in the middle of the riot, which continued all day. I was struck by how quickly it had escalated out of control. I was also struck by the fact that despite the offer to hold the parade at 8.00 am, when most people are at home in bed, a group of people from the lower Ormeau Road would not accept that offer. They simply said, "You shall not pass". The parade did not pass.

Some might ask why that issue should be regarded as important. It is because people regard it as a vital symbol of their community. As David McNarry said, that is why the issue, which has huge potential to dog our society, must not continue to do so. People must tolerate one another's particular symbols, such as the symbol of procession. The report rightly considers that issue in some detail.

I was also involved in Ulster Scots. The North/South Language Body was set up as part of the Belfast Agreement, and the Ulster-Scots Agency was set up under that remit. When I took office as Minister at the end of 1999, Ulster Scots received funding of just over £100,000, but Irish received about £2 million. That was roughly a 20-fold disparity. I examined not how we could close that gap but how we could address the demand in the Ulster-Scots movement.

Unlike John Dallat, I wish to pay tribute to John Laird for the way in which he took over as chairman of the Ulster-Scots Agency. He took it from a dead start: before him there was nothing. He got a great deal of criticism, as did Ulster Scots, not least from the unionist community, a substantial proportion of which does not regard itself as Ulster Scots — rather as Anglo-Saxon or British. Prominent unionist commentators in the media, among others, criticised Ulster Scots. John Laird had a difficult task. I pay tribute to him and to the work of the board members — Alistair Simpson; Dr Ian Adamson; George Patton, now chief executive; and Bob Stoker.

During devolution, the Ulster-Scots Agency was established, as was the Institute of Ulster Scots Studies at the University of Ulster and the Ulster-Scots World-wide Academic Network. I was part of that, because I took the view that Ulster Scots was more than a language. It had only just been recognised and a great deal had to be done to codify it, write it down and record it.

There was a culture and a diaspora there, so I gave authority for the agency to operate outside Northern Ireland and the island of Ireland. The agency did that very successfully. Ulster-Scots Day was established in the United States. Jim Shannon mentioned the size of the Irish community — there are 40 million people, and 58% of them are Scotch-Irish. There is a huge diaspora there and a huge potential for tourism and other markets. The Ulster-Scots Academy was established with a budget of £10 million over and above the moneys that were voted through.

Ulster-Scots is recognised as a language in Part II of the European Charter for Regional or Minority Languages. That is significant, because many people have said that it is a vernacular, an idiom, and not a language. They mocked and scorned it, but now it is indisputable, as it is clearly defined as a language under the European Charter. It is a minority language, which has a long way to go, but it is a language nonetheless.

Over 200 Ulster Scots groups have been established in Northern Ireland, which shows the vibrancy in that community and tradition. The important achievements of John Laird and the Ulster-Scots Agency were supported by devolution. None of that would have been possible without devolution and the reference to Ulster Scots in the Belfast Agreement. They are important achievements, and it is wrong to be negative about them. We are only scratching the surface of the work to be done in the United States and the potential there.

3.15 pm

Similarly, the Irish language has made strides. The Irish language had the benefit of Bord na Gaeilge, which had an established infrastructure in the South. It had a very substantial budget — around £8 million — and its own staff, and it looked at the all-Ireland dimension.

The 1991 census in Northern Ireland showed that 142,000 people claimed some knowledge of Irish — that was basically the market — while around 40,000 claimed some knowledge of Ulster Scots, although that has been continually revised upwards to around 100,000.

The new body, Foras na Gaeilge, examined the promotion of Irish on an all-island basis. Given that the population in the South is about 3.5 million and that some of the population in Northern Ireland regard themselves as having allegiance to both Irish and Gaelic, it is no wonder that there is a major disparity in the budgets for the two languages.

We must look at Northern Ireland's contribution to language. As I said, during my time as Minister, the Northern Ireland contribution to Ulster Scots rose about 15-fold. At one stage, the Ulster-Scots Agency was being given so much money that it could not cope; it had to hand some back. It was important to keep the budget rising, and we kept that support going.

Unfortunately, the lack of devolution has arrested progress on that matter. Without the restoration of devolution in some shape or form, it is difficult to see how that momentum can be regained — for Ulster Scots in particular, and for the Irish language, although it benefits from the fact that the Dublin Government see it as integral to Irish culture.

It is important not to use the treatment of one language as the benchmark for the treatment of another. We should deal with this matter according to demand and different stages of development. It is wrong to run down the Ulster-Scots language for being a long way behind the Irish language — of course it is behind. The Irish language has had the benefit of Bord na Gaeilge, and, about 70 years ago, a de Valera Government produced a standardised dictionary, grammar and so on. Indeed, the language was being worked on for more than 200 years before that. The Ulster-Scots language has only just got going.

My next point is one to which no reference has yet been made, although it is important. I am surprised that it has not been mentioned, but let me mention it now because I am always fond of surprising people. The most important cultural development in the history of Northern Ireland, in capital spend terms, is being proposed right now — the Maze project. That culture and sports development project will cost around £400 million; a stadium will cost around £80 million, and there will be all sorts of ancillary works. Most controversially, there will be development around the Maze hospital. I strongly believe that that is a mistake.

The debate on the stadium was thrashed out at Belfast city hall last week. Alban Maginness, Diane Dodds and I were all present to listen to the presentations on the different stadiums. There is an argument over where the stadium should be, how much it should cost and who should pay for it. No business plan is available for the Maze project and no economic appraisal has been drawn up, yet we have been told that it is a done deal. An economic appraisal and a business plan are the two key requirements outlined in the Government's green book. Therefore, the proposal is a political one. We can argue about the Maze, but, as everyone knows, my preferred location would be Windsor Park. It is an ideal investment opportunity for that type of stadium; it is already built, and, alongside Casement Park and Ravenhill, it is the most economically sensible option.

One proposal is that the Maze hospital should become part of an international centre for conflict transformation. The hospital where the hunger strikers killed themselves is now protected as a listed building, and that facility will be at the heart of a £10 million investment. That is vindication and validation of what happened there. This matter relates to earlier comments about who is a victim and who is a perpetrator. I, and the people whom I represent, do not consider that those people who starved themselves on hunger strike were victims.

It is exactly the type of cultural development that Northern Ireland does not need. We should not forget the past, but neither should we live in it. We must draw a line under the past and move on. That project has the potential to wreck, in the way that the blocking of parades does.

Mr A Maginness: I thank everyone who was involved in the compilation of this timely report, which is worthy of Members' reflection. We have shared a divided past, and, having done so, we deserve to share the future in harmony, peace and reconciliation. The means by which that will be achieved lie in the establishment of partnership in the Assembly and in society. All Members' efforts and discussions should be aimed at restoring the institutions, rather than at preventing their restoration. Having listened to today's contributions, I cannot help but feel that rather than trying to create a smooth transition to restoration, some Members have set their faces against it.

It is essential that those who suffered most in the troubles have a place in the shared future. They should be an integral part of it. That is the SDLP's position. Those who suffered must be given a special place in society, so that they do not feel alienated from the peace process, or from the institutions established under the Good Friday Agreement.

I have been saddened and disappointed by some of the contributions in the PFG Committee and on the Floor of the House, particularly from members of the DUP, who have failed to move on the victims' issue. The SDLP has made a reasonable proposal, supported in part by the consultation process of the Interim Commissioner for Victims and Survivors. The proposal is for the establishment of a forum for victims, where victims can come together to address the same issues that Members addressed in the PFG Committee. It is through that mechanism that victims can create a programme for change that genuinely reflects their interests. That would be the best mechanism for progress.

However, others, and particularly the DUP, object to that proposal because, they say, progress cannot be made until "victim" is defined. The problem, which is apparent in victims' groups and organisations, is that if we do not move from first base, we will never move. Therefore, the opposition and the insistence on a definition are wrong and contrary to victims' interests. If we stick on that point, we will stick there forever, and we will never be able to address the interests of victims and survivors fully and satisfactorily. In holding that position, Members do a great disservice to victims.

The SDLP believes that it is important to give the victims' forum a chance. If there is restoration, one of the first priorities of the new Executive should be establishment of a victims' forum in order to move that process forward.

Victims in our society must be acknowledged — collectively and individually — and there are many ways of doing that. My colleague Tommy Gallagher referred to a number of groups, such as Healing Through Remembering, who tell their stories individually and collectively throughout Northern Ireland. Why can that not be done centrally? Why can we not establish a publicly funded audio-visual archive, where those who have suffered in the troubles can tell their stories and where the stories can be recorded for posterity? It would be a therapeutic process for those people who have suffered, and it would be a collective and individual recognition — officially and publicly — of that suffering.

Surely that is not something that is too sophisticated for us to establish and develop on a centralised basis? The establishment of such an archive would bring closure to a great number of families throughout Northern Ireland who continue to suffer because their suffering and the suffering of their loved ones has not been properly acknowledged.

Mrs D Dodds: Mr Maginness has explained the SDLP's position on victims. Many of the victims that I speak to, and whom I meet frequently in my constituency, say that they want not only their situation to be acknowledged but, more importantly, to see justice for their loved ones. Will the Member elucidate further his view on justice for the victims?

Mr A Maginness: Mrs Dodds has made an interesting point. Acknowledgement is important, because people feel alienated and left behind. They also feel that there is a political process and a peace process in which they are not involved and from which they feel disconnected. We must, therefore, involve them in that process, and we must reconnect with those people. In the circumstances, where justice can be done, it should be done. We have a Police Service and courts, and an individual who is implicated by any evidence that is brought forward can be tried. It is important that that be pursued, and the SDLP does not exclude that.

The Historical Enquiries Team is looking at many cold cases and at the whole gamut of killings arising from the troubles. That is an important process. It should be maintained, properly funded and given the proper personnel, and so forth required to carry out that task.

Mr Hay: Can the Member clarify his party's position on the definition of a victim? Does he view someone who has deliberately gone out to murder somebody as a victim?

Mr A Maginness: I do not see the perpetrator of such a crime as being a victim; I have never said that and neither has the SDLP. I ask Members to consider instances where people who are suspected of being members of paramilitary organisations are killed in controversial circumstances. Could they be viewed as victims? I think that they could be. Are the families who are affected by those killings victims? I think that they are.

There is a grey area in some of these cases, but we cannot be simplistic. We cannot say that one person is a victim and another person is not. We have all suffered. Both sides of the community have suffered grievously.

Let us not nit-pick or hoke over the ashes, as it were. We should recognise that there has been suffering, and move on.

3.30 pm

The Alliance Party proposed to the Committee that we have a proper day of reconciliation and reflection. There is some merit in that idea, yet both unionist parties — again — dismissed it, on the grounds that confidence levels in the community have not reached sufficient heights to allow for such a day. Surely the point of having a day of reflection is to try to create confidence and bring about reconciliation in our society. If we had reconciliation and true peace in our society, we would not need a day of reflection.

I was disturbed by Mr McNarry's comments, which set the resolution of the parading issue as a prerequisite to restoration. That cannot be the case. Returning to a central point that I made, if we want to resolve some of these difficult and seemingly intractable issues, the institutions must be restored. To do otherwise is to put the cart before the horse. We want to resolve the parading issue, but it is essential that it happen locally. Unless we get local dialogue going we cannot resolve what are essentially local problems. However, we should not let local problems become so disproportionate and so all-absorbing that they distort, destroy or undermine the process of restoration or, indeed, devolution itself. A devolved Administration is the best political context in which to solve the problems of parading. Therefore, we should work towards that.

Mr Hussey: I am aware of the clock and that I should not speak on behalf of Mr McNarry, but my recollection is that he said that a process towards resolution had to be started, not the actual resolution itself.

Mr A Maginness: I hope that the Member is right, because the terms in which Mr McNarry expressed himself seemed to me to be more absolute than that. However, I am subject to correction by Mr Hussey.

I emphasise that Members on this side of the House have confidence in the Parades Commission; we believe that it is doing a good job. That is not to say that we think it is perfect, that it cannot be improved upon or that it does not make decisions with which we disagree. Of course there are decisions that we dislike, such as the Drumcree decision the other day. We must work with the commission, which was set up to remove decision-making powers from the police in these circumstances.

The DUP proposed that the Parades Commission's functions be divided into powers of mediation and determination. The proposed determination process was so complex as to bring about a quasi-judicial system that would fail as a result of being so bound in regulation.

The Parades Commission has at least blended the mediation and determination processes. The current situation is not perfect, but it is better than it was prior to the establishment of the commission. We must all support the Parades Commission, because doing so is the best way to resolve the outstanding problems. The Parades Commission can promote local dialogue and create a situation in which all parties are satisfied and in which local solutions to the problems that affect various communities can be found. We live in a divided society, and the parading issue simply reflects those divisions. However, if we have a partnership Administration, we are in a much better position to resolve the outstanding parading issues.

Finally, as regards a bill of rights, it is important that we proceed with a round-table forum of all the parties once we establish restoration of devolution in the institutions. There is an argument that the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) is purely civil and political. That is not the case; the jurisprudence of the convention is much more extensive than that and deals with many social and economic issues. We can replicate that in a local, domestic bill of rights.

Mr McCarthy: I would like to record my thanks to Committee members, staff and chairpersons who worked during the summer to produce the report. I also acknowledge the decision of Peter Hain to ensure that the report was printed in the first place and the opportunity he gave us to debate the contents of the report this afternoon. We are making progress.

I will focus on community-relations issues. Overcoming the deep divisions of this society is perhaps the biggest challenge facing us all. Unless we can build a united community, it is very difficult to see how the institutions of the Good Friday Agreement can be placed on a stable and sustainable basis. Unfortunately, sectarian attitudes remain prevalent in this society. Recent studies show that children as young as three or four years old are repeating sectarian slogans, presumably picked up at home or on the streets. This is disgraceful. Worryingly, we are also seeing intense racism from some quarters. It seems to be increasing; this too is disgraceful.

To our shame, we have a higher rate of racist attacks per 100,000 people than in England and Wales. The figure produced by the NIO for 2002-03 in its hate crime consultation confirmed this. It is worth stressing the value —

Dr Birnie: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCarthy: I have only started. Give me a minute to get started first. Come back later on.

It is worth stressing the value that new migrants bring to our economy. If the truth be told, these people are probably doing jobs that local people have turned up their noses at.

Both parts of Ireland have long been exporters of people, bringing religion, Christianity, to all ends of the earth. We should be proud of that — though perhaps it would be better to concentrate on the local area.

The fact that people want to come here to work is surely an encouraging sign. We must do all to welcome them. Some of the most successful economies in the world are in diverse societies.

Northern Ireland has deeply ingrained patterns of segregation. Far too many parts of Northern Ireland are marked out by sectarian symbols as the exclusive territory of one side or the other. In some cases the provision of separate services to different sections of the community is openly the policy of the state, but in many others the provision of separate goods, facilities and services is reality and practice. This is not just an issue for the Government; it is also how businesses and voluntary associations do their work.

Segregation carries huge political, social, economic and financial costs. Far too many issues are analysed on a sectarian basis: how much one side, versus the other, is getting; because this side gets something, the other must too. What can be the political outcome of that? Unfortunately, we had to listen to that approach this morning, and more recently this afternoon. People are encouraged to think as “them” and “us” battling over resources, rather than as a community working together for the betterment of all. We should all be striving for the latter.

There are social costs, because segregation denies people opportunities to mix with one another and to develop their full potential. There are economic costs, because businesses and tourists are deterred from coming to Northern Ireland — or to particular parts of Northern Ireland. Finally, there are financial costs, because segregation leads to skewed public expenditure. The Alliance Party estimates that, each year, about £1 billion is spent on managing our divided society. A large proportion of that money goes towards providing separate goods, schools, facilities and services. The Alliance Party fully supports integrated education as a means to bring our children together and to provide a choice for parents.

With its crumbling infrastructure, the longest NHS waiting lists in the UK, and the threat of punitive rates bills and water charges, which will have a drastic effect on so many of its people, Northern Ireland can hardly afford this segregation. The Alliance Party embraces warmly the concept of a shared future. For the Alliance Party, a shared future means creating a society where people can live, learn, work and play together in safety.

People want to integrate. Time after time, opinion polls show that although an overwhelming majority of people want mixed schools, workplaces, housing and leisure facilities, they are held back by a lack of facilities and security fears.

My party welcomes the framework document ‘A Shared Future’ which was published in March 2005, and the first of the action plans, which was published in April 2006. The term “shared future” is not simply another label to repackage community-relations policies of old. It is not primarily about considering the way in which projects are funded; rather, it must be seen as a challenge to the range of policies and practices in Northern Ireland.

It is regrettable that most of the progress towards a shared future has occurred under direct rule, rather than under the local Executive of the last Assembly. There needs to be local ownership of the process. In the PFG Committee, parties were able to endorse the concept of a shared future, but I fear that, for some, that is just another slogan. When asked to endorse the Government documents, the PFG Committee could not reach consensus. Much of the debate was polarised.

On human rights, there seemed to be some consensus on the concept of a bill of rights, but I fear that that apparent consensus masks a much deeper division on what should be included in that bill of rights. Human rights are for everyone. The Alliance Party is opposed to explicit rights for unionists, nationalists or any other grouping. We are opposed to entrenching any vague parity of esteem. We are concerned about any bill of rights that would institutionalise sectarianism in Northern Ireland or entrench division, either directly or indirectly.

It is worth noting that international norms recognise a right of people not to be treated as part of a minority against their will. Similarly, on equality, the Alliance Party is committed to protecting the rights and ensuring the opportunities of every individual. We cannot, and will not, be selective. Equality is essential in order to give everyone a stake in society. For the Alliance Party, that means equality of opportunity, equality of access, equality of treatment, equality under the law, and equal citizenship.

The Alliance Party does not believe that there should be a hierarchy in equality. In Northern Ireland, equality issues are overly associated with religion and/or political identity. Discrimination or other inequalities on the grounds of gender, race, disability and sexual orientation should be of equal concern. Opportunity, a sense of belonging, and fair treatment do not exist evenly and consistently across society. Due to historical inequalities, discrimination, geography or other obstacles to participation, some individuals are more marginalised than others.

As a result, it may not be sufficient to apply good public policy generally in the hope that all sections of the community will benefit equally. The use of neutral policies does not necessarily produce neutral actions or outcomes.

Madam Speaker, there is, therefore, a case for affirmative action being taken, but we remain opposed to discrimination and the use of quotas.

3.45 pm

We support the targeting of resources towards particular disadvantaged and under-represented neighbourhoods and sections of the community.

Mr Nesbitt: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCarthy: I am pushed for time. Let me see how I get on.

Resources should be allocated on the basis of need —

Mr Kennedy: Debate.

Mr McCarthy: I have a great deal yet to say.

Resources should be allocated on the basis of need rather than on the basis of perceived religious or political affiliation. It is counterproductive always to divide people into Protestant and Catholic camps and then complain if one side seems to be doing better, more or less, than the other. Resources must be allocated on the basis of need. It is important that vacancies be filled and resources distributed on the basis of the merit of an application.

The Alliance Party opposes the use of quotas to fill vacancies or allocate resources, because that inevitably leads to individual cases of greater merit being passed over in order to address the need of someone who has been identified as belonging to a disadvantaged group. The Alliance Party is concerned that the overemphasis on equality for groups on the grounds of religion and identity further institutionalises divisions.

The Alliance Party is a long-standing advocate of fair employment legislation and monitoring. Those ensure equality of opportunity and non-discrimination in the workplace. Fair employment legislation has been very successful in removing discrimination here. It has helped the country move towards having a workforce that is more representative of the entire community.

We recognise and understand the need for workforces to be monitored; however, we have concerns about the methodology that is used to categorise people in pursuit of those objectives. The Alliance Party looks forward to the creation of a single equality Act, which would standardise and harmonise upwards equality protection on all existing grounds.

I am also concerned at how language matters have been polarised. It was mentioned not so long ago that Irish is not just a language for nationalists and Ulster Scots a language for unionists. Both should be open to all who have an interest in language. We should celebrate the rich cultural heritage that is available to us here rather than scorn what other people enjoy.

Resources should be made available to encourage the entire community to develop an interest in language. However, a word of caution must be sounded on the issue of need. When people demand the right to request written responses from the state in either Irish or Ulster Scots, they are not really seeking to address a matter of need. There are few, if any, Irish or Ulster-Scots speakers who cannot access services in English. Those who suffer are migrants to Northern Ireland whose first language is not English, or those who have little grasp of the English language. That is especially true of migrants from an older generation. Although many public bodies are trying to assist them, it is worth remembering that, when others demand the creation of language rights, those rights will do little to help migrants. The European Charter for Regional or Minority Languages does nothing for those whose first language is not a European language.

Finally, I wish to address the issue of the past and its legacy, which is a very complicated and multifaceted issue. Some may argue that to focus on the past is counterproductive and keeps wounds open and that society should move on. The Alliance Party disagrees with that. To address the past and its legacy is fundamental to the process of reconciliation and building a shared future. Failure to do that comprehensively and holistically is a barrier to political progress. How we handle the past has been allowed to become a source of division in society, and that has served only to create further division. That tendency can be countered only through the creation of a comprehensive approach. Efforts to deal with the past and its legacy have been piecemeal. It was a real shame that the Committee became bogged down in seeking a definition of a victim.

Some type of permanent memorial could be created. There is certainly room for creativity when it comes to dealing with the past and its legacy.

Consideration should be given to a day of remembrance and reflection. The Committee considered that suggestion but, sadly, could not reach consensus.

An experience-telling forum should be created that would allow victims, as they define themselves, to place their testimonies, positive and negative, on the record. That could lead to some form of permanent archive.

We must never forget all the people who, throughout these islands, have suffered grievously during these long years. We have all suffered in one way or another. A long time ago, I remember turning on the radio early one morning only to hear that a young man from Portaferry, in my constituency of Strangford, had been shot down in cold blood in Newtownards as he made his way to work. That was a total waste of a young life, and it created untold suffering for the man's family and his community — that wound is raw to this day. Over and over again, that type of suffering has been replicated — to the shame of Northern Ireland. Let us hope that no more people from these islands will have to endure such suffering. We must never forget the exiled or the disappeared. I have met relatives of exiled people and have enormous sympathy for them; we must ensure that those people are brought back to Northern Ireland.

Lord Morrow: From time to time, the Secretary of State has come in for much criticism in this Assembly.

Dr McCrea: Rightly so.

Lord Morrow: As my colleague Dr McCrea says, rightly so.

However, today I want to praise the Secretary of State and thank him for allowing us to have this debate. Had Members been depending on the system that was being used in the PFG Committee, whereby all decisions had to be unanimous, no doubt this debate would not have been held, because Sinn Féin objected vehemently to it. Sinn Féin members were involved in Committee discussions and in the preparation of the report, but they did not want it to be printed, published and debated. If Members examine the report, they will see why: it is riddled with Sinn Féin contradictions. I understand why that party would not want to debate the report.

On behalf of the DUP, I commend all those who worked hard to realise the report. I want to place on record my sincere thanks and appreciation to the staff who worked hard and played a large part in ensuring that the report came to fruition and for having it ready for today's debate. It is a hefty report, and it touches on many important issues.

Several Members took swipes at the DUP during the debate, and I do not want to disappoint those who thought that their contributions had gone unnoticed. I want to respond in kind. I am delighted that at least one of them is in the Chamber; he is waving frantically, acknowledging that he is also delighted that I intend to refer to his speech. I will not disappoint him.

It is a pity that Mr Tommy Gallagher is not in the House. He sounds as if he has been out of the country for several years, because he does not seem to inhabit this planet at times. He said that unionist-controlled councils do not share power with nationalists.

Mr A Maginness: Some councils.

Lord Morrow: He did not use the word "some". Unfortunately, he did not name those councils. I suspect that he got things slightly mixed up; we all do that from time to time, and Mr Gallagher is no different. He was probably thinking of Down District Council, in which the SDLP is predominant but refuses point blank to share power with unionists. That is disgraceful, and SDLP Members ought to hang their heads in shame.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Wells] in the Chair)

Another Member could not help but take a whack at the DUP — Mr McNarry. I served on the PFG Committee with Mr McNarry, and no doubt he has many attributes. I would be the first to recognise and acknowledge that. However, occasionally, he suffers lapses of memory. I am sure that there are ways of treating that, and perhaps we can speak to him about it later.

Mr McNarry is in the House; I am glad to see that. I thought that he had "gone away, you know", but I see that he has returned. Mr McNarry chided the DUP, asking whether we were now patching things up in order to carve out a deal that will enable the restoration of devolution. He wanted to know where parades have featured on our list. The answer is: infinitely higher than they appear on the Ulster Unionists' list.

Whether Mr McNarry is guilty of this, I do not know, but his party did not seem to think that the parades issue was that important before it went into Government on three occasions with Sinn Féin/IRA. I suspect that, if his party had thought it to be important, it would have had it on its list — it might even have made it a prerequisite for devolution. Perhaps Mr McNarry's party is now at the stage at which it is saying that resolution of the parades issue is a prerequisite, because I recall Dermot Nesbitt saying in Committee; "We are not ready to go into Government with Sinn Féin/IRA." I know that Dermot will want to reinforce that point, and I will gladly give way to him in a moment or two.

Is that the Ulster Unionists' position? I sincerely hope that it is, although at times the party speaks with a forked tongue and confuses us. Mr McGimpsey seemed at one point to be saying that the time was now right for devolution and that nothing would happen until devolution came about. I have no doubt that some of the Ulster Unionists will want to pick up on that point, and when they are ready to answer, I am ready to give way. Come on, Dermot; get up on your feet.

Mr Nesbitt: Our leader, Sir Reg Empey, speaks on behalf of the party. He has made it clear on many occasions that a judgement will not be made until October, when all the evidence is available. That means that no judgement can be made now. I cannot speak for any individual member of the party who may speak at any given time, but I assure Lord Morrow that this party, along with the DUP, is not ready to form a Government at this juncture.

Lord Morrow: Thank you, Mr Nesbitt. I am glad that that is on the record; it may be very useful in the coming weeks.

Mr Kennedy: Is that plain enough? Did you understand that all right?

Lord Morrow: It was quite clear.

Mr Poots: Pages 349 to 351 of the report set out the DUP's position on parades and its analysis of where we need to go. We went to the bother of providing a written submission and making our position clear in Committee. Perhaps, in order to assist Mr McNarry, Lord Morrow can identify where the Ulster Unionist Party's submission on parades is.

Lord Morrow: I thank the Member for that intervention.

Mr McNarry: Will the Member give way?

Lord Morrow: I will give way briefly, but this is the last time.

Mr McNarry: Does the Member agree that Mr Poots, who spoke on the parades issue, did kindly outline for us the DUP position, and that it is distinctly different from the Ulster Unionist position, which is to scrap the Parades Commission? We did not hear that from the Benches beside us.

Lord Morrow: Mr McNarry, you are taking this memory thing a bit far.

Mr McNarry: Is there a doctor in the House?

Lord Morrow: Yes, there is.

I understand that the Parades Commission was the brainchild of the North Report. I remember that that report was debated in no less a place than the Northern Ireland Forum for Political Dialogue. Lo and behold, there is bad news coming for you: your party supported the creation of the Parades Commission. You do not have to take my word for that, because you can check the minutes or Hansard from the Forum. You and I can sit down one day and go through it line by line, stroke by stroke.

Mr McNarry: What about the scrapping of it?

Lord Morrow: You will find that you are among friends when you talk that way with us, because we believe that the Parades Commission should be scrapped.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. When you refer to "you", you are referring to the Speaker. I can assure you that I am not guilty of anything that you are accusing me of. Please direct all your comments through the Chair.

4.00 pm

Lord Morrow: That is a point well made, Mr Deputy Speaker; my apologies to you.

Mr Maginness touched on a subject that is very near and dear to unionists, and it should be near and dear to nationalists too. I do not believe that he dealt with it in a flippant way. I believe that he tried to bring sense to it; I believe that he tried to bring a degree of respect to the whole issue, and that is the issue of victims. It is a big issue for all unionists, and it is a big issue for many nationalists — I believe that it should be a big issue for all nationalists. I listened intently to what he said. He did say one thing with which I disagreed when he referred to the possible opportunity for people to have storytelling. As I said in the Committee, I prefer the term "experience relating". That would not give the impression that this is just a mere story. For many it was a very hard and sad reality. I know that Mr Maginness did not mean it other than in that way. I merely make the point.

I say this to him and to the House today: a day of reflection has also been mentioned, but what happens after the day of reflection? A day of reflection is one thing; a day of reflection after genuine repentance is quite another. To me the two are very different. I happen to believe that if there were a day of reflection which had before it a day of repentance, he would find it easier to convince those of us who are sceptical about going down that road. I am not saying that those who push this idea — and I listened to Mr McCarthy, who I think mentioned the same thing — are not sincere when they say these things. However, they will find little support among us if they cannot urge a day of repentance first. Repentance comes first and forgiveness second. I ask them to reflect on that.

I want to come back to some of the other issues in the report, and they are important. Sadly, the Committee could not agree on what a "victim" is. The definition of "victim" is paramount. Until we decide on that we cannot move forward. I want to make it very clear that we in the DUP see a vast difference between someone who has been gunned down in a van, at home or in a place of work, and the perpetrator who did it. Then I hear an equation being drawn between the families of both: an interesting point. We must have a definition of "victim" before we can take this forward. We see it as paramount; it cannot be that a person who was blown up by his own bomb and a person who was shot dead are considered equal. My colleagues and I do not see it that way, and neither do the vast majority of law-abiding people. I include in that nationalists and unionists right across the political spectrum. They see a clear difference.

My time is flying on because I gave way on too many occasions. Being the reasonable sort of individual that I am, I do those things, and then they militate against me. However, I do want to make mention of the disappeared. They have already been referred to here today. For over 30 years some families have been waiting patiently. They have had a horrid and torrid 30 years, and the challenge that I make to Sinn Féin/IRA today is this: how many more years of torture do you feel it is going to take to satisfy your lust for torturing these families?

It is nothing short of a disgrace that families are still waiting to know the whereabouts of those who have been lost for over 30 years and who were near and dear to them. We hear a great deal about peace, but those families have had no peace: their agony goes on. We may be moving on, and Sinn Féin will be the first to stand up and say that it is ready for Government. It may be ready for Government, but it is not fit for it — it has a long way to go. Members have been told that 24 November is destiny day. That day will come and go, the rain will fall as often as ever, and the sun will shine as infrequently as ever, but anyone who is holding their breath for 24 November can forget about it. I state clearly: those people can forget about 24 November because nothing will happen.

I emphasise that the DUP is not taking Sinn Féin/IRA's word for anything, and any Member who does not understand any part of that can jump to their feet. The DUP will judge Sinn Féin/IRA on its actions, not on what it says it does or on what two reverend gentlemen said that it did.

Mr Attwood: On behalf of the SDLP in West Belfast and in Lagan Valley, I convey our condolences to the family and colleagues of Michael Ferguson on his untimely and tragic death.

My first comments actually refer to Michael Ferguson. The single best conversation that I witnessed in the PFG Committee dealt with issues from the past. Indeed, Members should read that part of Hansard. Although Members know that very little agreement was reached, the contributions of all the parties were substantial, deeply felt and well-developed. Lord Morrow echoed some of that.

The recovery of the truth of the past was one issue that divided the parties. Some Committee members argued that we should move on and that if we did not, the past would invade the present. Other members were vague about whether paramilitaries should co-operate in full with a truth-recovery process, which some members demanded of state agencies. However, other members argued that the recovery of truth was one-sided and centred only on the actions of the state.

In a way this debate is academic. Unless the parties here and elsewhere decide on and define the issue now, others will define it for everybody in the North in a way that will be deeply uncomfortable to the majority of people. We can talk about days of reflection or days of redemption, and we can talk about story telling or sharing experiences, but the truth is that issues on dealing with the past are being decided elsewhere as we speak. Unless parties — and victims — collectively pull together their efforts to decide the best way to deal with the past, it will be defined in a negative and backward way.

The SDLP believes that unless there is agreement on the model of truth recovery and that that model has a moral basis, our community will not be able to move forward. If we do not address that now, we will live with the consequences for decades and generations.

We need to learn that lesson and can do so by stepping outside the North for a moment. After thousands were massacred in Srebrenica, important efforts were made to recover and identify bodies and tell the story of that atrocity. However, a couple of years ago a citizen living in Srebrenica at that time told me that the older citizens of the area who had lived there and survived the Second World War sought the truths of what they had experienced in those years. President Tito suppressed those truths after the end of the Second World War.

Following the massacre of recent years, the Second World War generation in Srebrenica wanted to talk about the truth of the war years and not solely about the atrocity they had just experienced. They wanted to know about Nazi collaborators and the truth of that awful period of their history. If we conclude that we can simply move on without a moral basis, we run the risk in decades to come of visiting the experience of the older citizens of Srebrenica — of truths suppressed, truths not faced up to and of truths that come back to haunt us.

Of course, there must be care not to apply the lessons of other conflicts or the history of other places strictly to this place and to this conflict. We have to acknowledge that some good work in dealing with the past is being done. The Historical Enquiries Team, a range of survivors and victims organisations and other initiatives are all part of the way forward. The SDLP believes that a more dedicated effort is needed to create a full and inclusive truth recovery mechanism. It must be done now, because if it is not, it will be left to those who most wish to avoid a spotlight on the past — those elements in the British system and in the IRA leadership who conspired together to produce the “on the runs/state killings” proposals, engineered to deny the truth of the past, marginalize victims and survivors and protect the guilty.

As this Assembly faces its final days, the SDLP urges all the parties to agree one final contribution on the issues of victims and survivors and to do so in the St Andrews talks. The contribution would be to agree to a proposal for a victims' forum, structured in whatever way they choose, to work up a model of truth recovery for their needs and for all our needs.

The model will be imperfect; but better than leaving issues about the truth of the past to go unaddressed. Questions will remain unanswered, but better that than leaving those in the state and in illegal groups who have questions to answer never to be asked to account for their actions. A sense of injustice will endure; but better that than leaving the past to be defined by a deal done by the IRA in Downing Street in their shared “on the runs/state killings” proposals, which leaves families, groups and victims with nothing but a sense of injustice.

The SDLP says to everyone here: if we do not work up a proposal for dealing with the past, others will work it up for us. We learned last year how that was defined by the IRA and the British state — a process that denied the truth, suppressed justice and did not even have the moral basis of having the guilty stand in open court. The most courageous voices have been those of the victims and survivors. That is how it should be, because they carry the deepest pain and the deepest wisdom. We should rely on a victims’ forum to work through, with difficulty and pain, how best to recover the truth of the past. That is what we should do at St Andrews.

I also wish to comment on our discussions about parades. I rebut and deny the serious allegations made against my colleague Declan O’Loan. I was not here to hear those allegations; I have been told what was said. It is outrageous that someone who has made a contribution in that area — as we all know, at some personal sacrifice — should be demeaned and defamed in the way that he was in this Assembly.

Though I know that the SDLP will differ greatly with David McNarry and others on the subject of the Parades Commission, I wish to make some comments on that matter.

4.15 pm

Regardless of whether the institutions of Government are restored, mechanisms will be required to deal with contentious parades next year and in the following years as, over time, procedures to resolve local disputes are agreed. Although the SDLP, as Alban Maginness outlined, has had profound differences with several determinations made by the Parades Commission, the party has publicly and consistently called for everyone, in the best interests of the people in the North, to accept them.

While I am on the Floor of the House, I want to put down some markers in advance of the October negotiations leading to the November deadline and thereafter. Given that the Parades Commission is currently conducting a review of its procedures, and in the context of the wider political situation, the SDLP has sent out warnings to the commission and to the British Government.

The SDLP is concerned that the Parades Commission, and parading matters in general, are now in play in order to satisfy narrow needs and seek quick fixes. Both objectives are deeply prejudicial to the integrity of the commission and to adopting the correct approach to parading issues. A body of evidence on, and a broader perception of, the issue support my contention. There are concerns relating to the appointment of members to the present commission and to the unpicking by the current commission of non-negotiable principles of dialogue that informed key decisions taken by previous commissions. There is a sense that bad practice by a marching Orange Order has been rewarded, particularly given the continued failure of the Orange Order to engage directly and respectfully with the Parades Commission. The commission did not completely understand the corporate intentions of the Orange Order. There is an impression that the commission’s current level of independence is neither what it should be, nor what it was.

That forms part of the backdrop to the current review of procedures by the Parades Commission. It gives rise to a concern that the commission, in its conclusions, or the British Government, in its response to the review, may reshape the Parades Commission, thus jeopardising the achievements of the first and second commissions. Moreover, the wider political approach adopted by the British Government on a range of issues, whereby core matters are subjected to barter or concession in an effort to jolly along the political process, is potentially hostile to the integrity of the Parades Commission.

Given those circumstances, the SDLP holds firm views on how the Parades Commission should act after the review. In particular, the SDLP is concerned at the suggestion beginning to circulate that certain marching Orange Order parades deemed to be non-contentious should be de-scheduled and no longer be subject to the authority of the commission. Whatever model of de-scheduling may be proposed, the SDLP opposes it.

In addition to objecting in principle, there are other substantial grounds for our opposition. The general parading environment is not amenable to such developments, and the present political context means that any de-scheduling proposal may end up as part of a bartering process and become enlarged in a manner that reworks the best practice for parades. It is undesirable that the police should become the primary agency in relation to certain marching parades, and there is potential for the abuse of power. Experience shows that a parade can go from being non-contentious to contentious.

Therefore, the SDLP today puts on record that the Parades Commission and the British Government should keep the door firmly closed on any de-scheduling proposal. Once the door has been opened, the danger is that the approach may become extended in a deeply unhelpful manner. Therefore, the SDLP urges the Parades Commission, during its deliberations on the review, to assert its independence and to legislate against the potential risks that have been detailed. We urge the commission to be mindful of the doubts that now exist about the independence and authority of the current commission and to constrain its considerations to strictly procedural matters.

There are other matters of which the Parades Commission should be mindful, but today I will mention only its weekend determination on the Garvaghy Road parade. That determination indicated that the commission may be developing an approach, whereby, independent of any proposal to de-schedule those parades deemed to be non-contentious, it may bring about, managerially, a similar outcome by making no determination about a parade deemed to be contentious. That was the initial approach of the commission in respect of the 3,000-day parade on the Garvaghy Road.

The SDLP is concerned that that may become, by stealth, the practice of the commission in relation to future parades that it deems to be contentious. Such an approach is damaging, because it misunderstands the emotions and electricity that surround potentially contentious parades. The nature and history of those parades mean that strict requirements must be laid down and must be seen to be laid down. Failure to issue a determination in such cases leaves too much that is vague and results in excessive risk, as the High Court identified in its judicial review on the Garvaghy Road parade.

(Madam Speaker in the Chair)

Secondly, a contentious parade that is without determination places a particular burden on the PSNI — a role that it does not seek and should not acquire. The commission will make a grave error if it begins to widen the approach that was adopted with regard to the Orange Order parade last Saturday, as it is not a response that can be rigorously applied to contentious matters, and it is ill-conceived with regard to the heightened role of the PSNI.

Thirdly, to adopt the approach of not issuing determinations on matters that are contentious is inconsistent with the approach of the Orange Order, which has shifted little in its attitude to the commission and on the requirement for respectful relations with the community. It still fails to accept the principle of direct, sustained and genuine dialogue. The SDLP warns the British Government and the Parades Commission that if they do not open doors in coming days and weeks — with regard either to the review of procedures or to how contentious parades are handled — the community in the North will have to regret and live with that for years to come.

Dr McCrea: This debate goes right to the very heart of the feelings of the community, which must be taken seriously. My colleague Mrs Diane Dodds made a powerful speech on the inequality experienced by the Protestant community in west Belfast and certain parts of north Belfast. Many of us could cite instances of inequality throughout many parts of the Province. Many unionist people feel isolated in the community. If the Review of Public Administration gains momentum, as is intended, those people will feel even more isolated.

However, unionism is more confident today that it has been before. Unionism stands on its own feet and is not willing to lie down and be trampled over any more. Unionists must be proud of that, because for too long their voice has been completely ignored and their rights completely denied. I want to congratulate the unionist community for its resilience in the midst of that most bloodthirsty, vicious, sectarian campaign that has been waged against them in the past 35 years. Protestants right across the Province — particularly those living in isolated areas along the border — were targeted in a deliberate genocide, the purpose of which was to wipe out that community and to push the border back. Anyone who denies that has closed their eyes completely to reality and adds insult to the injury of those people.

One of the report's conclusions is:

“That all parties stress their commitment to building a shared future.”

Many in the community will never be able to share that future. I want to put on record my thoughts for the families of those who have suffered grievously during 35 years of a bloodthirsty campaign by the Provisional IRA, which was anarchy and rebellion against the lawful authority of Northern Ireland and of the United Kingdom. I pay tribute to the members of the security forces and to the B-Specials who, for years, patrolled the roads for nothing: they even had to pay for buttons for their own tunics.

I pay tribute to the UDR, the RUC GC and its Reserve, the gallant members of the Royal Irish Regiment (RIR), and the PSNI. For years, they wore their uniforms with pride while a bloodthirsty, vile campaign was waged against them, especially in border areas. The community owes them a great debt of gratitude, and we need to put that on record.

We talk about a shared future, but many people were murdered simply because they were Protestant. Members of the RUC and the UDR were murdered regardless of whether they were Protestant or Roman Catholic. Their religious tag did not matter. They wore the uniforms of the Crown, therefore, they were identified as enemies of republicans and were butchered. Some victims' bodies were cut asunder. I recall a murder near Cookstown in which a young man was tortured, and the Provisional IRA cut his body asunder, piece by piece.

I understand what Patricia Lewsley meant when she said that we must leave the past behind, but we must ensure that we face up to what happened then, because a community that does not learn lessons from the past will replicate what was done then. We must learn the sad lessons of the past and consider the suffering that some families went through.

Yesterday, some Members met a delegation from the Presbyterian Church. A minister made a poignant statement about a senior member of his congregation who recently died. That woman's son had been a member of the security forces and was murdered by the IRA. Until the day that she died, she sought simply one thing — justice. She was not filled with hatred or bitterness, nor did she seek revenge. She carried her broken heart with grace in her search for justice.

In many ways, the Belfast Agreement denied justice to the people of Northern Ireland, because the doors were opened to some of the most vicious murderers. They were sent back into the community, and some of them returned to terrorise the communities from which they came. Therefore we should not paint the picture that all is well.

I despise those who equate murderers with their victims. It is insulting to suggest that someone going out with murder in their heart, and who is stopped in their tracks by security forces and shot, can somehow be equated to the would-be murder victim. Someone who is butchered to death while sitting innocently at home in a republican community cannot be equated to their murderer. Nothing could be further from the truth, and nothing could more add insult to those people's injury.

People say that we should express our feelings and bury the crimes, but no one is suggesting that the crimes in Kosovo should be buried. The perpetrators of those crimes are being sought so that they can be brought before the International Court of Justice. Some of the Sinn Féin/IRA leaders should be brought before the International Court of Justice for planning crimes, as should those who carried out crimes in Serbia and elsewhere. That will not do for some: we are expected to brush those matters aside and whitewash the situation as though it were not reality.

Mr Dallat: Will the Member give way?

4.30 pm

Dr McCrea: No, I will not.

It is right that those who carried out genocide against the Protestant community along the border should be brought before a court of justice just like everyone else. Everyone should be equal under the law and equally subject to the law, and that goes for the unionist and Protestant community as well as for the nationalist, republican or Roman Catholic community. I want to make it abundantly clear that no one in this country should be treated differently.

There was a rebellion against the state for more than 30 years — a deliberate, manufactured rebellion was purposely carried out against lawful authority. Those who carried out that rebellion against the people of this community should be brought to proper justice, and those who led it should be brought before the European Court of Human Rights or the International Court of Justice at the Hague. Those people should be dealt with appropriately. I am not willing to brush this matter under the carpet. The SDLP may not like that, but I do not care — we must face the truth and the truth shall set us free. I would rather tell it exactly as it is, even though some people are unfortunately not willing to do that.

The amazing thing is that people travel miles to be insulted by a parade. A couple of years ago, a feeder parade in Maghera was disrupted before it made its way to an Apprentice Boys' march in Londonderry. Was it the people of Maghera who came to burn the bread van? Not at all — those who did so travelled from other places to be insulted because that is what they do.

Were the majority of the protestors at the Garvaghy Road parade from the Garvaghy Road? Not at all, and the photographs show that. Some were from Belfast — they were bussed in to be insulted by the parade. Those protestors then try to tell us that they are serious. They are not serious; if they were, they would deal with the situation. The orangemen at the Drumcree parade have a right to go to their church service and they have a right to get home from it. If SDLP members want to align themselves with those who oppose that parade, so be it, but they should not pretend that we can have a shared future.

Mr Dallat: Will the Member give way?

Dr McCrea: The Member should settle himself. He has yet to speak; he will have his 15 minutes of glory.

Do not try to make us believe that somehow there is a shared future. The truth is that the protestors do not want an orange foot on the road. If they could get away with it, they would not let one orange foot on the road, so much do they despise the orangemen and their institution. The Drumcree parade will have to be settled; orangemen have a right to return from their church service to their orange hall as they have done for 100 years.

I live beside the town of Desertmartin, which is 98% Protestant. An Ancient Order of Hibernians' parade is held in Desertmartin — do the people of Desertmartin believe in the Ancient Order of Hibernians or want such a parade in their town? Not at all. However, do they come out on the streets to be insulted by it? Not at all. I will tell Members what they do: they sit and have their cup of tea. They do not come out and insult people. Those who want to be a part of the Ancient Order of Hibernians and who want to parade have the liberty to walk the road. Of course, we are expected to accept that, but we are also expected to accept that we have no right to walk the Queen's highway. However, we do have rights, and this Committee report is about rights.

Some people have been demanding human rights under different legislation. However, some of those campaigners will find that this matter will come home to roost for them because the unionist population will claim its rights. The unionist people are now on their feet, standing up for their human rights, and nobody will deny them those rights in future. Those rights belong to the entire community, but this matter has been "sectionalised" and a part of this community has been denied its rights.

The families of the disappeared are not even permitted to bury their dead.

In the Committee on the Preparation for Government, Conor Murphy said in relation to activities carried out after its statement of 26 July 2006:

"If the IRA engaged in any activities before it issued that instruction, I would not consider that to be a crime".

In his view, therefore, the shooting of Mrs McConville was not a crime. Yet, his party is supposed to be ready for Government.

As my hon Friend Lord Morrow said, some may close their eyes to what has happened in this country and others may accept being second-class citizens, but the unionist population will not take second place any longer. It is the majority community in this country and has a right to be treated with respect. Sinn Féin is not fit for Government. Anyone who likes may try to wash Sinn Féin white, but that party has a long way to go before anyone can accept that it is ready for Government or that its members are true democrats.

There was a hullabaloo when my party leader talked about the Provos having to repent in sackcloth and ashes. So what? The Provos left many an innocent person in ashes and sackcloth. The families of those innocent people have been grieving for them for the past 30 years. The DUP wants a shared future, but let us be honest about the situation and learn the lessons of the past. God forbid that we ever replicate what our community has endured for the past 30 years.

Mr Dallat: Madam Speaker, I do not rise to claim 15 minutes of glory; I want to make a positive contribution to a debate. I begin by condemning the people who attacked the home of my colleague Pat Ramsey in Derry. They do not believe in democracy.

Dr McCrea's impassioned speech would have conveyed greater meaning to me had he never appeared on a platform with Billy Wright. That one incident demolishes everything that he says. As a young person in years past, I listened to daily news bulletins reporting the deaths of nationalists in Mid Ulster. I wish that Dr

McCrea had put the same passion into his condemnations of those murders.

Dr McCrea: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I ask you to read carefully the words that I said. Some time ago, in a radio report, I condemned murders of members of the Roman Catholic community not only in Mid Ulster, but throughout the Province — not half-heartedly, but unreservedly. I ask you, Madam Speaker, to protect Members' reputations. I will be studying carefully what happens.

Madam Speaker: If you had been in the Chamber this morning, Dr McCrea, you would know that I advised Members to read Hansard.

Mr Dallat: I simply regret that the same level of passion was not evident to me as a young person.

Let us hope that we can concentrate on what unites us rather than on what divides us, and that we can build anew. That is what partnership must be about. Perhaps I am wrong — I hope that I am not — but I believe that there is a wind of change. It is perhaps not a sweeping wind, but it is certainly rustling through the community, calling for dialogue and recovery. Evidence of that was witnessed at a public meeting in east Belfast recently.

What greater challenge is there than to identify a common purpose, rather than a divisive purpose that gets us nowhere? There is a dearth of positive thinking in the House today, and an affirmative approach to the issues addressed in the report is lacking. However, it is not too late. I ask the DUP to reflect, settle down and listen to what I have to say.

I am not suggesting that we should forget the past and ignore the victims. I am sorry that Dr McCrea has to grin during my speech, but I am sure that the cameras will tell that. We must remember all the victims. We can create a living memorial — not granite, although I do not rule that out — to the victims of the past 35 dark and dreadful years. That can bring hope, indeed sunshine, to a new generation that has the task of identifying and addressing all the issues of inequality wherever they arise.

Some years ago, a cross-party delegation of Members — including one from the DUP, although he is not a member of the party any more — visited Dresden in Germany where they learnt at first hand of the fateful night in April 1945 when Allied planes killed 350,000 people. Despite the horrors of that time, Dresden is now a thriving city full of hope for the future. The first rabbis to be ordained in Germany since the war received their holy orders in Dresden this month.

During that trip we visited other parts of the former East Germany, and we were introduced to a peace group that is still discussing the horrors of the First World War. Members will appreciate that it is a long process. Members have a choice to make; we can harbour bitterness, or we can grasp the challenge and give leadership. That may not lead us to a promised land, but it will, very likely, drag us out of the quagmire in which we too often find ourselves.

Much has been made of the rights of orange bands to parade. It may interest the Members opposite to hear that when an orange band paraded with an hibernian band in Kilrea some years ago, its members were not exactly embraced by those who shout loudest for the right to parade. Rather, the practice ceased; but the question remains. Why was it unacceptable that two bands from different backgrounds should parade together in an innocent festival that brought people together, many of whom were victims of the troubles?

Nothing would please me more than that we could recapture that wonderful moment in history in a small town that was rebuilding itself after the horrors of a sustained bombing campaign.

In the weeks and months ahead, the challenges “will not go away you know”, to reuse the hackneyed phrase that has been used a few times here today. Whether we agree to work a new Assembly or not, the painful process of building peace and reconciliation will continue. I can assure the DUP that there are enough people out there to do it.

In that respect the DUP has promised its voters a great revival. How can there be a revival if its members will not sit in the Assembly and challenge their adversaries? That is the real challenge facing all unionists. There are also serious challenges facing Sinn Féin and its approach to the future. Members’ contributions today have not convinced me that the desire to put the past behind them is evident. That does not augur well for the immediate future. I am suggesting not that they should forget the past, but that they should learn from it.

I do not want to follow the pessimistic mood of the debate. I prefer to stay out of that rut, because a journey of that kind serves no one and fails everyone, particularly the victims. That is not to say that we should ignore inequality. However, efforts to eradicate inequality must not be portrayed as some kind of threat. It is far from that. Efforts to redress inequality in housing, education, health and employment — and there are many of those — are not a threat. Nor should they be processes that create fear. If we can reach agreement on the processes that will address those inequalities, we will have moved forward significantly and, in doing so, created a firewall against any renewed threat of political instability.

Violence and the threat of violence did no favours for either community. It did no favours for unionism, and it did nothing to enhance my vision of a new Ireland free from partition and at the forefront of building a new Europe.

Dresden is a long time away, and the unity of Europe will ensure that the events of that tragic night will not happen again. There must be a new beginning and a new opportunity in which to create it. Much of Dresden lay in ruins for more than 30 years, but it is now rebuilt.

Do not turn the clock back. Let us build anew, because the past is our present to the future.

4.45 pm

Mr Nesbitt: I have a genuine question for the Member, Madam Speaker.

Mr Dallat: I am glad to hear that.

Mr Nesbitt: The Member should not provoke me, because there are some things that I could say. He talked about a new Europe. John Hume has often talked of standing on the bridge between France and Germany, and how those countries have built the new Europe. One of the central tenets of the new Europe is that borders and cross-border co-operation are recognised, as are the sacrosanct integrity of the state and the rule of the law. Does the Member not concur that the wish of his Sinn Féin fellow travellers in Irish nationalism for a new, united Ireland mirrors the old Europe of the 1930s, when the wish of the Germans of the Sudetenland for a new Germany caused the bloodshed of Dresden?

Mr Dallat: Madam Speaker, the new Europe that John Hume and I believe in is one without borders. I am happy to report that I was recently in the divided island of Cyprus. Its borders are coming down, and it is now possible to visit both parts of the island.

I hope that we have gone a long way beyond that and can convince the two great communities here to live together on one island free from the sectarianism of the past — irrespective of from where it came. I have no doubt that if we achieve that, the Rev McCrea will have a long and happy retirement, because he will be redundant.

Dr McCrea: That must be a long time off, because I have no intention of retiring. [Laughter.]

Mr Dallat: Do not count on it. [Laughter.]

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That the Assembly notes the work of the Committee on the Preparation for Government and the report on Rights; Safeguards; Equality Issues and Victims.

Madam Speaker: I shall refer the decision of the Assembly to the Secretary of State.

Adjourned at 4.47 pm.

THE ASSEMBLY

Tuesday 3 October 2006

The Assembly met at 10.30 am (Madam Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

ASSEMBLY BUSINESS

Madam Speaker: I begin with an apology. There is something wrong with the tannoy, so Members throughout the Building may not have heard that I was about to take the Chair. The Members who are here obviously know to be here; I hope that no one has been inconvenienced.

In accordance with the Northern Ireland Act 2006, the Secretary of State has directed that the Assembly should sit on Tuesday 3 October 2006 at 10.30 am to consider business as it appears on the Order Paper.

SECRETARY OF STATE MOTION

Report on Institutional Issues

Madam Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed that Members will be called to speak to the motion according to the usual conventions and that the first round of speeches will be limited to 15 minutes, with subsequent Members being allowed 10 minutes. The debate will continue until all Members who have indicated that they wish to speak have been called to do so. I intend to send a copy of the Official Report of the debate to the Secretary of State.

Motion made:

That the Assembly notes the work of the Committee on the Preparation for Government and the report on Institutional Issues.
— [The Secretary of State.]

Mr P Robinson: I begin — and I am almost embarrassed to do so, because it sounds like a ritual — by expressing our appreciation to the officials and to all those who serviced the Committee on the Preparation for Government (PFG). However, it is not a ritual, because those Members who gave up their summer to sit on the PFG Committee will recognise that the staff may not have anticipated that they would be spending the summer months on the preparation of so many reports, of which the 'Report on Institutional Issues' is one.

It has been no small task for them to distil the key conclusions from such a volume of work. However, we have a report, which may be purchased for 36-odd quid. That price is bound to ensure that it will be on the best-sellers list before Christmas; it is something that everyone will want to read.

The members of the Committee on the Preparation for Government at least had in common the fact that they wanted devolution in Northern Ireland. Undoubtedly there was suspicion about the motives of one group or another — all of us had vested interests. What deters people from making essential changes is the protection offered by the Belfast Agreement. To some, it is as though it was written by the hand of God, and departure from it would be sinful. To some, making an adverse comment on the Belfast Agreement is like insulting their wives. In fact, one would probably get off with insulting their wives a lot easier than one would with making some adverse comment about the Belfast Agreement.

That is particularly true of the SDLP. The notion that the Belfast Agreement was imperfect, or that there is something faulty, or lacking, in the structures that the agreement created, is met with incredulity on its part. That party had better face up to the reality that the agreement has failed. The structures set up by the Belfast Agreement have collapsed. The fact that the Northern Ireland Assembly has been suspended for so long demonstrates that failure. Denial will not resolve the issue. All parties must be candid and realise that change is necessary.

Some of us are reluctant to say: "We told you so", but, nonetheless, we did. The DUP pointed out fundamental faults at an early stage; we said that changes were needed for to bring about stability, accountability, effectiveness and efficiency. By their very nature, coalitions are difficult creatures, and mandatory coalitions all the more so. I will return to that point later, if time allows. The kind of mandatory coalition that is a part of the existing structures is not a democratic form of government. By the nature of mandatory coalition, the Government do not change. There may be some variance in the quota that each party might have, but the shape of the Government does not change, and voters do not get what they want. Under mandatory coalition, candidates do not win from voters a mandate for certain things to happen and, once elected, implement that programme. Rather, mandatory coalition always works to the lowest common denominator. Whatever views the electorate may hold on issues, they cannot make the necessary changes.

I recall being told in television studios by other politicians and reporters that the Belfast Agreement was here to stay, that there would be no changes to it and that there could be no alterations to its institutions. No one, we were told, would negotiate with the DUP. Now people complain that the DUP is not negotiating with them. This report is evidence of a broad view that change is needed. Some progress has been made, to the extent that people now recognise that progress can be made and that the structures set up under the Belfast Agreement are far from perfect.

The key issues raised in the report show that the chief faults relate principally to accountability. There is no more fundamental issue than that of accountability.

Of all the issues in a democracy, accountability is chief. It goes to the very heart of the democratic system — the responsiveness of the Assembly and the Executive to the people, and the collectivity of an Executive. Some Members of this Assembly have had experience of the previous Assembly; no one who had that experience could fail to recognise — at least in their heart, if they cannot admit it publicly — that the process did not work and needed to be changed. There were instances when ministerial decisions were taken that did not have the support of the relevant departmental Committee, the Executive or the Assembly. Such a situation cannot arise in a democracy — there must be a higher degree of accountability.

The DUP's view of accountability is different from that of the SDLP. Over the years, it has transpired that, to the SDLP, accountability is more a matter of answer-ability — the ability of people to ask questions of a Minister. However, accountability goes beyond that. It allows an Assembly to call a Minister to account and say that the Minister's view is not that of the Assembly or of the community. As far as the Assembly and democracy are concerned, that is a most fundamental issue.

The report by the PFG Committee dealing with institutional issues recognised that some fundamental changes were therefore required. Although other parties were not willing to put their hands up and say that those changes were deal-breakers for them, the DUP had no reluctance in saying that those changes were so fundamental that they must be dealt with before devolution could be restored.

A series of other important issues was raised, but they never became deal-breakers. Nonetheless, we recognised that they must be addressed. The Committee identified a swathe of issues that it believed a new Assembly could address but that were not so urgent that they needed to be dealt with at the pre-devolution stage. Therefore, a series of agreements is mentioned in the report, limited though they may be. There are also matters that have not been agreed but that can be dealt with by an Assembly in due course. Then there are further matters that have not been agreed but that must be agreed before devolution can be restored. I hope that that section will be considered when the parties go to St Andrews.

I hope that the Secretary of State and the draftsmen in the Northern Ireland Office (NIO) or beyond have been following the work of the Preparation for Government Committee and have considered the issues from the comprehensive agreement that were flagged up. I do not know whether we will receive a report from them by the time we get to St Andrews — it would be most helpful if we could. Those issues clearly have to be dealt with, and if not at St Andrews, in the weeks, months and, perhaps, years that follow, depending on whether progress can be made.

The next issue on which I want to comment is the election of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. The comprehensive agreement proposes one way of dealing with that matter, although some people — particularly in the SDLP — believe that the purpose of that proposal is to deny them membership of an Executive. I do not think that we ever received a satisfactory answer from the SDLP as to why it would want to be part of an Executive for which it was not prepared to vote. I still await a response to that. However, there cannot be a mandatory and automatic system for the election of Ministers but not a mandatory and automatic system for the election of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. The SDLP cannot duck that issue — it must be one or the other.

10.45 am

The issue of the election of a First Minister and a Deputy First Minister should be put in bold relief, considering the difficulties that the previous Assembly experienced with simple matters such as the appointment of a Speaker. We went through the first mandate without reaching agreement on the appointment of a Speaker, yet now there is an expectation that Members will simply put up their hands to elect a First Minister and a Deputy First Minister. There were difficulties in the previous Assembly when the SDLP was the lead nationalist party, and there may be greater problems now, given the Assembly's present numerical make-up.

A mandatory coalition lies at the heart of the problem. The Democratic Unionist Party published a document entitled 'Devolution Now', in which it stated its preference for a voluntary coalition. That preference was not simply a method of avoiding some unpalatable choices. The DUP recognised that, if one cannot have a majority Government made up of one's own party, a strong and stable Government must be made up of like-minded people, who substantively agree on policy and other issues, working together. That is the reality.

However, a voluntary coalition can also pose difficulties, as can be seen in the Republic of Ireland. A mandatory coalition would be a more difficult proposition, even if all the parties were to proceed on the basis that they trusted each other's bona fides.

Mr Nesbitt: I would be grateful if the Member were to answer a succinct question in his three remaining minutes. Is the DUP in favour of an acceptable mandatory coalition, or is it, like Jim Allister, against such a coalition under any circumstances, of which Mr McCartney was given an assurance? I ask the Member to clarify whether the answer is yes or no.

Mr P Robinson: If I ever thought that it were possible to get a yes or a no answer from the Member who has just spoken, I would ask many a question. Usually he gives such woolly and convoluted responses that it is difficult to get an answer. He may have been better not asking the question but listening to the rest of my comments on the matter.

The difficulty, therefore, is greater if one attempts to form a mandatory coalition with those who have a murky history. Mandatory coalitions around the world have only occurred in exceptional circumstances. Perhaps such a coalition was justified in South Africa where a Government of reconciliation was formed, through the Government of National Unity (GNU), to bind the nation together as it came out of conflict. It was also justified during war years when, again, it was necessary to bring people together. In all those circumstances, mandatory coalitions were temporary.

During the Committee's deliberations, DUP representatives recognised that, if there were a mandatory coalition, which is not this party's preference, it should be temporary, and that structures should be put in place to change that into a more democratic, responsive form of government.

We have yet to get any certainty about that, but it is an essential ingredient. In my speech yesterday, I outlined that it is necessary to ensure that, in the next couple of weeks, we do not impose on the people of Northern Ireland and on future generations a system of government that is inherently undemocratic. I put it to the SDLP, because the offer still stands today, that there is an alternative. The alternative is a voluntary coalition in which those who believe in democratic values come together. The offer is still open to the SDLP, if it is prepared to accept it.

Mr McFarland: I welcome the report and the final PFG Committee debate, although we may have others on upcoming reports of the economic challenges subgroup.

I thank the Chairmen for their independent stance, the Committee staff for their hard work and my party colleagues for giving up their summer to beaver away on the Committee.

It is worth noting again that this was the first time in Northern Ireland's history that members of all five main political parties sat in a room together to discuss the key issues that prevent there being a Government here. In most cases, the parties operated in good faith. Sinn Féin, however, was objectionable at the end; perhaps that is in its rebellious nature. Useful work has been done, as can be seen in the substantial reports and in Hansard. Agreement has been reached on some issues, others have been parked for decision from the Assembly, when it is up and running, and some are deal-breakers that will be debated in Scotland.

Most of the issues that are raised in the report were raised during the reviews of 2002 and 2004. Everyone has understood for some time that the Belfast Agreement is not perfect and that there are areas that need improvement — with regard to effectiveness and efficiency — and tweaking. My party's point of view is that the Belfast Agreement has never been sacrosanct. Its key tenets were right and still hold, but certain issues need to be improved. Many of those issues reappeared in the comprehensive agreement. The DUP likes to believe that it invented some of them, but that is not correct — most of those issues were raised during the reviews of 2002 and 2004.

Despite what Mr Robinson has said, I believe that the parties will be discussing the Belfast Agreement in Scotland. It will be the core element of a settlement in Northern Ireland. A few skirts may need to be put onto it in order to hide the DUP's embarrassment at its acceptance of the comprehensive agreement and to assist its efforts to persuade its backwoodsmen that it is correct. In essence, it is the same as the Belfast Agreement. The Ulster Unionists will help the DUP as best it can to get over its embarrassment on that issue.

Mr Nesbitt: Does the Member agree that the DUP has done more than just buy into the Belfast Agreement since December 2004? Rather than merely considering an all-Ireland civic forum and an all-Ireland parliamentary forum, the DUP members of the Executive were committed to supporting such bodies.

Mr McFarland: I thank my hon Friend for his intervention. The comprehensive agreement contains many strange proposals, one of which is the proposal for the election of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. That was a vital issue during negotiations on the original agreement, because there was no trust. It was decided that the essential nature of the office was a joint one and that its job would be to co-ordinate issues. From that office would come the nominations for North/South bodies, so that there would always be agreement between the communities as to who should attend. It is fair to acknowledge that there were difficulties between the personalities involved. However, the essence of the office itself was right, and continues to be so.

Clearly, DUP Members were going to have difficulty with putting up their hands for a Sinn Féin Deputy First Minister — perhaps even Mr McGuinness. The cunning plan that the DUP devised in the comprehensive agreement was that the largest party from the largest denomination would select the First Minister and the largest party from the second largest denomination would select the Deputy First Minister. Afterwards, d'Hondt would take effect and there would be rounds of votes. Therefore, instead of voting for one Sinn Féin Minister, the DUP would be quite happy to vote for five others. That is fine as long as it saves the DUP's embarrassment for reverting to the Belfast Agreement.

A funny little clause at the end said that if the SDLP and the Ulster Unionist Party did not support that, those parties would be excluded from Government for the duration of the new Assembly.

It is most gratifying to see that clause disappear off the radar, because it would have been strange for the DUP to have thrown out the SDLP and Ulster Unionists and remained in Government with Sinn Féin by itself.

Madam Speaker, I am having trouble with some burbling to my left. We seem to have — [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr McFarland: As can be seen from the series of Hansard reports of Committee meetings, several further interesting matters were introduced. Although they do not appear in the main body of the report, Hansard shows that the DUP is trying, as far as I can gather, to separate the roles of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. Not only is the DUP trying to separate the roles in the voting system, but it has also expressed the view that the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister need neither meet nor appear in public together.

Another suggestion was to divide the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, thereby giving the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister separate roles within that Department. Constant attempts are being made to divide those two posts and to interfere with the joint nature of the office. The attempt to remove the central safeguard of the Belfast Agreement, which is the joint nature of that office, presents a big problem for my party and, I suspect, for others.

There is a clear need for accountability. However, it is odd that red herrings are constantly being thrown about how Ministers in the first Assembly were not accountable. Two particular examples involved the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, Ms de Brún, closing the Jubilee maternity unit and Mr McGuinness writing off the selection procedure.

People do not understand how those two things happened, but it is quite simple. The case involving Ms de Brún came about because, between November 1999 and April 2000, there was no Programme for Government and no agreed system as to what should be done. In the melee, the Minister was able to get away with the closure, despite the fact that there was no agreement in the Executive with her action. After 1 April 2000, a Minister could not have got away with that.

Mr McGuinness's slaughtering of the grammar school system was a fit of pique on leaving office. Had the Assembly not been suspended in October 2002, it would have been impossible for Mr McGuinness to do that; he would never have got it through the Assembly or the Executive.

Mr Robert McCartney: Perhaps the Member will inform the House who was responsible for the suspension of the Assembly from 1999 to 2000. My recollection is that it was the then leader of his party, who was disappointed —

Mr McFarland: The responsibility for that clearly lay with Sinn Féin, which was being silly about the entire process. It was not possible to continue in Government with Sinn Féin adopting such an approach. However, that does not take away from the fact that had the Assembly survived, under the rules in place at that time, Martin McGuinness would not have been able to act as he did. It is odd that the direct rule Ministers and civil servants proceeded with an issue that four of the parties would not have supported on the Floor of the House. They proceeded and have since continued with ending the selection procedure, leading to potential chaos in November.

At the end of the report, there is a substantial and useful body of work on the ministerial code. The code was in draft form in 2000 and 2001, and the Committee managed to dig out subsequent amendments. The report contains the up-to-date draft ministerial code, which includes the modifications. The Secretary of State has tasked the PFG Committee to produce an agreed ministerial code in October. It would be encouraging to ensure that there are safeguards and accountability within the Executive.

Mr P Robinson: Will the Member please tell us what would be the sanction for a breach of the ministerial code under that system?

11.00 am

Mr McFarland: Mr Robinson knows that we are discussing whether some parts of that need to be included along with the Pledge of Office and other matters in legislation. However, that will be a matter for the PFG Committee when it discusses the substantive issues.

I wish to deal briefly with North/South bodies. As Mr Nesbitt said, the DUP consented to all sorts of additional North/South bodies, such as civic forums, in the comprehensive agreement. Also included in the PFG report is an SDLP document entitled 'North South Makes Sense'. During the negotiations for the Belfast Agreement, the North/South issue was very difficult, but unionists recognised that nationalists needed some expression of their Irishness. Therefore in strand one we had the Assembly in Northern Ireland, and in strand two we had agreed North/South bodies. It was clear to everyone that those areas were agreed and made sense to everyone — the Republic and ourselves — and that they were controlled, in that we had six bodies and six areas of co-operation.

Unfortunately, we discovered shortly after suspension that the Governments and the Civil Service did not see it like that, and were attempting to go forward with the North/South bodies and allow them to operate and expand. We managed to stop that, and they remain on a care and maintenance basis. However, one can see from the comprehensive agreement that attempts have been made to expand those bodies dramatically, and that concerns us.

It is unfortunate that there is the suggestion that "Plan B" — should the Assembly fall and be removed — will involve "North/Southerly" continuing apace and expanding. That was not the deal. The framework documents of 1995 fell because they gave Sinn Féin and the SDLP the ability to bring down the Northern Ireland Assembly and expand North/South issues: they were stopped at that stage. The agreement was absolutely clear: there is a clear link between strand one and strand two — if one goes, the other goes too. Broad unionism will be extremely exercised if we end up in November with the Assembly being brought down while North/South issues continue.

That is a matter for the DUP to consider when it begins to look at making a deal. The Review of Public Administration has the potential to re-partition Northern Ireland, and broad unionism will not forgive the party that sits back and watches that happen. Likewise, some steps need to be taken as part of the agreement. The DUP keeps telling us every two minutes that it is the lead party in unionism and is therefore responsible for unionism. It has a responsibility for doing something to make sure that "North/Southerly" does not continue at an advanced pace after November. I support the report.

Dr Farren: I wish to express my appreciation, as others have done, to the staff who serviced the PFG Committee throughout its deliberations, and on institutional issues in particular. In a perverse way, I enjoyed many of the encounters in the Committee. I am not suggesting that we should continue in the same vein all the time, but nonetheless there was an element of satisfaction to be gained from participation in it.

We would all agree that the devil is in the detail. This report is about detail: the detailed procedures that would guide us in an Assembly; its Executive; the North/South Ministerial Council (NSMC); the British-Irish Council (BIC); and so on. Because the devil is in the detail, it is important to get those details right, not just to the satisfaction of one party, but to the satisfaction of all. That means that we have to continue to work hard to achieve the necessary compromises.

Before we can successfully address the details that remain to be resolved, we need to know that our work will not be in vain. Much has been made of the allegation this morning of the difficulties that existed throughout 1999 to 2002 with the Executive, the Assembly, and so on. However, it is important to recall that difficulties with the operational procedures of our institutions were not the cause of suspension; rather the failure to meet more fundamental commitments was.

Addressing those details in the PFG Committee dealing with institutional issues should not impose obstacles to restoration. Indeed, the Good Friday Agreement made provision for reviewing procedures in an orderly and regular manner, and there is little doubt that we would have engaged in that process had suspension not occurred. During the PFG Committee meetings, I recall making the point that the SDLP regards the Good Friday Agreement — like other constitutional and political agreements — as a living process. That process must learn from experience and make changes where necessary, and if significant change is determined by our experience, I hope that we will agree to make that change.

The SDLP has never adopted the head-in-the-sand attitude alleged by Peter Robinson earlier. I challenge him to cull the reports of the Committee and point to where we adopted a negative, no-change attitude towards the operational procedures of the institutions established by the agreement. The SDLP adopted a positive approach and will continue to adopt a positive approach where the lessons learned suggest that it should.

If we do not know whether our institutions will be restored, there is little point in torturing ourselves about the election procedures for a First Minister and a Deputy First Minister, much less with the numerous procedural issues that would be contained in the ministerial code, or with how to achieve greater accountability and efficiency in our political institutions.

The essential challenge before us over the next few weeks — and particularly during our talks in Scotland next week — will be to convince ourselves that we can restore the Assembly and all the other institutions. If we can succeed in that, there will be an unavoidable imperative to resolve the outstanding operational details enumerated in this report. The greatest challenge that we have to face with our restored institutions will be to instil a new sense of self-respect among ourselves so that we can work together and begin to put the pain of the past behind us. We need to build a society that shares a collective sense of responsibility for taking decisions that will be to the mutual benefit of all — not a society that operates in two separate domains where each section glowers enviously at the other side; where what one side gets is jealously measured against what the other side does or does not get; and where sectarian interests and attitudes — and not co-operation — rule.

Putting the pain of the past behind us will not be easy, and we will never be able to do that completely. However, to help with that, we can cease to allow the past to dictate the future, colour our relationships and determine that we can behave only as we did in the past.

I believe that that is what most people who wish us success in our talks want to see happen. If we can convince ourselves that we will restore our political institutions and face the challenges of building a new society, we can turn to the operational details that are discussed in the report. However, we should bear in mind that, since much of the clamour for change to the operational details comes from the assertion that neither the Executive or the Assembly worked and that much of the fault for that lay with the procedures — the rules and regulations that governed the operation of all the institutions — some people have an impression that the power-sharing Government was a failure. I reject that analysis as over-simplistic. Yes, lessons can be drawn from that experience, and we would be foolish to ignore them.

The SDLP acknowledges that changes for the better can be made to how we make decisions and to how we operate the institutions. We submitted detailed recommendations and suggestions to improve the workings of our institutions. However, against the backdrop of ongoing attacks on the Good Friday Agreement and crises that arose from a failure to meet commitments on decommissioning, all of which were constant threats to the institutions' stability, the Assembly and its Executive functioned, as did the North/South Ministerial Council and the British-Irish Council. Decisions were taken to the mutual benefit of all, and, indeed, the basis for further progress was being laid.

Although we accept that some operational changes are required, those changes should not imply fundamental change to the Good Friday Agreement. They cannot be used as a cloak to save party blushes or, worse still, to allow for vetoes, unnecessary exclusions and impediments to the smooth operation of any of the institutions.

The changes to be made to the operation of our institutions must better enable, not inhibit, joint leadership and co-responsibility at the levels of Executive and First Minister and Deputy First Minister. To call for collective responsibility yet not look for the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to exhibit collective responsibility would be a contradiction. To call for greater ministerial accountability that would inhibit Ministers' leadership role would also be contradictory. To call for greater accountability on North/South matters that would unnecessarily impede decision-making on developments that would benefit people in both parts of Ireland would, likewise, be contradictory and counterproductive.

If there is a genuine desire to make our institutions more efficient, more effective, more accountable and less cumbersome, the details that must be resolved will be resolved without great difficulty. However, if the motive is to inhibit, to curtail or to set boundaries to what is possible and desirable, resolution will not be easy. Indeed, it may prove impossible, so we must be clear about where we are heading. The big picture must be resolved, and resolved quickly. We require clarity and commitment on working in genuine partnership in all our institutions. Clarity and commitment are needed on policing, on upholding the rule of law and on putting criminality, in all its forms, completely outside the political realm.

11.15 am

Let us grasp the opportunity; let us restore hope as we move to restore our institutions. Difficult as it may be to imagine how we can work together against the history of division and violence to which we have all contributed in one form or another, let us have the courage to take the steps that will enable us to do so.

Finally, and in anticipation of next week's talks, I offer a rare, or even unique, compliment to the DUP for having invited Archbishop Brady to a meeting next week. I do not know whether Dr Paisley regards the meeting as being between Old Testament and New Testament prophets. However he regards it, we hope that it will be fruitful and set a positive tone at the beginning of the week in which we are to meet in Scotland. I hope that it will make a major contribution to the healing process that I hope Scotland will expedite and that it will help to ensure the restoration of our institutions.

Madam Speaker, I beg indulgence for the hesitations during my speech, which were due to my cold.

Madam Speaker: I hope that you feel better soon.

Mr Ford: I will take the advice of the leader of the SDLP and not say how much I enjoyed the meetings of the Preparation for Government Committee in the hope that that will protect me from Dr Farren's cold or possibly from a more serious illness higher up the body.

I join Peter Robinson, Seán Farren and Alan McFarland in the opening ritual that has marked all these debates: expressing our thanks to the Committee Chairpersons, the Committee staff, the other support staff in the secretariat, the doorkeepers and even the catering staff in ensuring that we got the work done through the summer. I suspect that without the significant support of our staff, the Committee would not have managed to produce its three reports.

One of the embarrassing things for me — although perhaps less embarrassing for him since he has left the Chamber — is the number of occasions on which I found myself agreeing with Peter Robinson. In case that is excessively embarrassing for members of the DUP —

Mr Kennedy: That is very worrying.

Mr Ford: Indeed, it would be worrying for the Ulster Unionists if they were ever to agree with the DUP on anything.

Peter Robinson referred to other parties not being prepared to set preconditions. Let me make it clear where the Alliance Party starts: we did not enter the PFG Committee with a set of preconditions; we were not there to set obstacles to progress. What we did during the work of the Committee — and will continue to do today; at St Andrews; and right up to 24 November — is to highlight issues that we believe will require attention if stable, durable and sustainable institutions are to be restored.

Those issues may not be preconditions; it may be entirely possible that the quick fix that was attempted in December 2004 may be cobbled together between the two largest parties and the two Governments. However, we do not believe that such a proposal would provide the people of Northern Ireland with the stability that they expect and deserve and that they have a right to see us working for. We are not interested in a quick fix, because we do not believe that it would provide long-term government. We must deal with the fundamental issues that have shown the flaws in the working of the agreement.

There is a danger. Look at the Governments' last attempt: the so-called comprehensive agreement was comprehensive neither in the people who were involved in it nor in the issues that it covered. At the end of the day, it was not even agreed by the two parties involved. It was a good example of Orwellian doublespeak. The so-called comprehensive agreement was an attempt to address short-term problems without making any real effort to tackle the long-term underlying difficulties. The Alliance Party will not take part in that, because we are not interested in a superficial process that could lead to breakdown in six months' or a year's time. This is the opportunity to get things right.

Alan McFarland said earlier that everybody agrees that the agreement must be modified, and he is right. The problem is that some people respond to such a statement by saying that they do not agree and that they are working under the terms of the agreement; other people respond by saying that they are not, in fact, modifying the agreement. In practical terms, that is what the Preparation for Government Committee has been doing over the summer.

It is important that the flaws in the agreement are considered. The final document was cobbled together in the last few days of negotiations, and there are problems with some of the operational details. There were major problems with the agreement's implementation. Changes in the balance of power do not make the Good Friday Agreement mark I — the original agreement — workable or easy to operate.

We must deal with problems such as the institutionalisation of sectarianism, which is evident in the current working of the agreement. The current arrangements mean that there is a politics of "them and us" rather than that of a shared future, which is stated Government policy. We must ensure that there is a system that rewards accommodation rather than grandstanding, so that we do not find ourselves in a position of intra-communal outbidding, in which those who bid loudest are rewarded. Over recent years, organisations such as the Policing Board, which is based on simple, straightforward integration, have worked best.

Some of our difficulties stem from the fact that people have different understandings of power sharing. Dividing up power and giving some power to individual parties, so that they have a major say on some areas of Government work and very little say on others, amounts not to power sharing but to power division.

That is what we had, intermittently, from 1999 onwards, and some Members have already referred to the problems that that created. All sections of the community have an interest in all the outworkings of government. We do not need power division; we need genuine power sharing, accommodation and the promotion of an enhanced sense of collective responsibility, even if we cannot have collective responsibility as that would be understood in London, Dublin or Edinburgh. If we do not reach that point, the chances of achieving worthwhile government in this Assembly by 24 November are extremely remote.

It will come as no surprise to the House, Madam Speaker, that I wish to dwell on the issue of the voting system in the Chamber and the operation of designations. Seán Farren was almost right when he said that the problems that we have experienced since the signing of the Good Friday Agreement have not been connected to the operations of the Assembly but were concerned to a lack of faith on matters beyond the Assembly. However, there were major operational problems in the Assembly in November 2001. Under the rules of that time, we were incapable of electing a First Minister and a Deputy First Minister, until I, along with my colleague Sean Neeson and the then deputy leader of the Alliance Party, played games with the rules of the Assembly for 22 minutes. There is something fundamentally wrong with a system in which those kinds of games can be played in order to establish an Executive.

Although the DUP comes from a different perspective — and its members have still not forgiven the Alliance Party — I welcome the fact that that party acknowledges that we need a different voting system. We need a voting system that does not institutionalise divisions that result in some MLAs' votes being worth less than others and, therefore, result in their constituents being worth less than other constituents. We need a voting system that can adjust to changing demographics and that does not allow minorities to hold up business completely and hold the Assembly to ransom. Unless we move towards the type of system that exists in other legislatures — such as a simple weighted majority — we will never move on from the problems that were exposed in the Chamber in November 2001. If the current voting system remains, we will remain hostages to fortune.

I welcome the DUP's recognition of the virtues of weighted majority — at least as Peter Robinson proposed it in the PFG Committee — as a possible third method for carrying a cross-community vote. I regret that I never found out the Ulster Unionist Party's view on that during all of the discussions. I regret also that the attitude of both nationalist parties seemed to follow that of St Augustine — they wanted to be non-sectarian, but the time was not quite right.

There has to be a time when it is right to move away from sectarianism in our society. There has to be a time when it is right to say that we are working to build a united community and a shared future, and to get away from the divisions of the past. If this is not the opportunity to do it, I suspect that nationalists will be telling us in 30 years that the time is still not quite right.

We ought to be grasping this opportunity so that we can at least run different systems in parallel as a precursor to moving on. In practice, a weighted majority of 67% would have carried virtually every cross-community vote — there was only one vote during the entire workings of the first Assembly that would have required a higher percentage. In both votes in November 2001 the David Trimble/Mark Durkan ticket achieved more than 70% of votes in the Assembly. There is absolutely no reason why we should stick to our divisive, sectarian and outmoded system; we must move away from it.

Allied to that system is the way in which the Executive is formed. We have seen so many examples of the problems associated with mandatory coalition — in particular, a coalition in which there is almost no collectivity whatsoever. It may be that a ministerial code will address the issue slightly, but if we continue to operate on the basis that silos are acceptable and that Ministers do not have to work together, we will continue to suggest that some issues are only of concern in some areas, and others elsewhere.

As it happens, one of the examples cited has been the decision on the siting of maternity services in Belfast. Based on the medical opinion that I read, I voted in support of the Minister. However, in many cases, people made their decisions on the basis that the Jubilee Maternity Hospital was in south Belfast and the Royal Maternity Hospital was in west Belfast — that was the only issue for them. If the Assembly is to take decisions based on what is worthwhile and not on the basis of sectarianism, we need an Executive that works collectively, considers matters properly, takes account of issues at the Executive table and comes back to the Assembly with a united voice.

Mr Campbell: I thank the hon Member for giving way. Does he accept that the Health Committee, when discussing the siting of maternity services, comprised members from beyond South and West Belfast? Their view was not shared by the hon Member or the Sinn Féin Minister.

Mr Ford: I accept that the unionist majority on that Committee — and one Member who was not a unionist, but who represented South Belfast — took a different view from that of the Minister. I repeat that I, along with the Minister, was working on the basis of the medical advice that was given. However, this was a classic example of how politics was played out between a Minister and a Committee, rather than a sensible, coherent decision being taken by an Executive in which there was collectivity. Collectivity was sadly lacking.

I noted with some amusement that, when I questioned the Secretary of State at the British-Irish Association in Oxford about collectivity in the Executive — and as he has released his text, I think that I can comment on his answer to me — he said that he wanted to see circumstances in which there would be an Executive on the same basis as that in Dublin, which is a voluntary coalition operating on the basis that a programme for Government is agreed before a Cabinet is formed.

There are real lessons about good governance that we need to follow, because inclusion in governance does not necessarily mean inclusion in the Executive for all parties at all times. Unless we can establish appropriate roles for the Executive, the Assembly and its Committees to work for the good of all our people, rather than run sectarian dogfights over every available issue, we will not move the situation forward.

11.30 am

Part of that improved collectivity was shown in the so-called comprehensive agreement, when the idea — although not the one that the Alliance Party had put forward at Leeds Castle — arose for a collective validation of the Executive. In common with Peter Robinson, I cannot see why anyone would want to be a member of an Executive in which he or she had no confidence. That view would have been more strongly expressed had it not come from someone who was himself a Minister, without sitting in the Executive. The behaviour of the DUP in the first Assembly proves the point that it now tries to make: that an Executive in which people have confidence and work together is an absolute necessity.

We must move away from how things previously operated, and that includes running the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister as a single Department. That failed. The offices of the First Minister and of the Deputy First Minister are as far apart as it is possible to be in this Building, and that is not an example of how collectivity should operate. However, it is an example of what must be done to redress the problems of sectarianism in the voting system, and in the Executive and their relationship with the Assembly. Those points must be addressed over the next seven weeks.

Madam Speaker: Before I call the next Member, I remind the House that the time limit for speeches is now 10 minutes.

Mrs I Robinson: I welcome the opportunity to speak today. The importance of this debate lies not only in the report, but in the process that accompanied and produced it. The real significance is not as much in who sat around the table, but in what was discussed. In the area of institutional issues, in particular, we saw a breakthrough.

Today, the question is not whether there can be changes to the Belfast Agreement, but what changes are in the interests of good government in Northern Ireland.

In the draft proposals for a comprehensive agreement, both Governments accepted that the Belfast Agreement was not set in stone. Considerable progress was made, and that must be the basis for legislation this autumn. The work of the PFG Committee has resulted in a greater understanding of where each party stands and why. The absence of Sinn Féin from this debate is, once again, evidence of its lack of good faith in the process, and — whatever the true reason for that absence — it makes restoration more difficult.

The Committee covered a huge amount of material and addressed a significant number of issues. That preparatory work will act as a useful resource in the future.

The work of the Committee marks an acceptance that things must change. No longer can people live in a 1998 time warp. Circumstances have changed, and the institutions must change accordingly. For years, many people claimed that the Belfast Agreement was effectively written on tablets of stone and could not be changed. The work of the Committee ended that myth.

I remember being told on many occasions between 1998 and the autumn of 2004 that the Belfast Agreement was it — take it or leave it. It was as if the verdict of those who had cast their votes in 1998 had been frozen in time, never to be changed. It is now clear that the Belfast Agreement can, must and will be changed. Political and electoral realities meant that “no change” was never a suitable position and, although only a limited amount was agreed around the PFG Committee table, the fact that discussion was taking place indicated that the issue was no longer closed.

Fidelity to every dot and comma of the Belfast Agreement is political dogma and not common sense: the world has moved on. It was not a credible position in 1998, and it is a ludicrous one today. Who could expect the DUP to sign up in 2006 to arrangements that it rejected in 1998? The issue of changes to the institutions was one of the main sticking points of the talks at Leeds Castle.

Nationalists have seen the DUP's attempts to bring about changes to the Belfast Agreement as somehow being an attack on their role in helping to govern Northern Ireland. That has never been the case, as our many manifestos and policy documents of recent years have demonstrated. As a result of their attitude, nationalists have used the Belfast Agreement as a comfort blanket, when they should have been questioning what actually needed to be changed. Surely what is important is that we find arrangements that unionist and nationalist communities feel able to support. Given the DUP's position, who today can say that the unionist community supports the current institutional arrangements?

As for the SDLP argument that the institutional arrangements did not lead to suspension and should therefore not prevent restoration, that party should remember that the DUP was not the largest unionist party during the lifespan of the previous Assembly. I assure Members that had we been the largest party, the unamended institutions as then existed would never have got off the ground.

The Secretary of State indicated previously that the Government will introduce a Bill to change the institutions. We welcome that, and I look forward to seeing it. The other parties should see that as an opportunity for them and not as a threat to their positions. No one can seriously argue that, during the lifespan of the first Assembly, the institutions functioned as well as they should. Even within the constraints of an enforced multi-party coalition, things could be done much better.

For years we have been pointing out the fundamental flaws of the Belfast Agreement. Those include: the lack of accountability; the lack of effective decision-making; inefficiency; and the instability that exists in our community. Those issues should be of concern not only to the DUP but to all parties that are interested in good government. If people are interested in that, how can a system in which there is no collective responsibility be appropriate? If people are interested in safeguards for each community, how can they allow Members to redesignate with the sole purpose of frustrating those safeguards? If people are interested in accountability, how is it appropriate for Ministers to be free to make major decisions, given that they were appointed on the basis of a ministerial selection system that is no more predictable than picking names out of a hat?

The report is a welcome step in bringing about change to the institutions. The next stages of that process will be the negotiations in Scotland and the publication of the Bill that will detail the proposed changes. That will be a key test for the Government to deliver on the promise that they made previously on the institutional changes that the DUP requires. I hope that that is not seen as simply a victory for the DUP but as an arrangement that will ensure the better functioning of the Assembly.

Although some changes are now essential to allow the Assembly to be restored, the new Assembly will also have a great deal to do in its consideration of how it and the Executive operate. That process can best take place away from the atmosphere and attitudes that are often adopted in political negotiations. Unless there is long-term consensus that we are prepared to amend and review the institutional arrangements, our system will not be as effective as it should. We must incorporate provisions to allow agreed change and to meet the changing circumstances, and we must base those on experience. That is one way to avoid another breakdown.

Natural evolution has been a characteristic of the British constitution throughout the ages, and it has served our country well. It would be as absurd for every detail of how government worked a century ago to remain frozen in aspic as it would be to pretend that the arrangements that were reached in 1998 are incapable of change.

To achieve that change, some parties will have to face the reality that things have altered and that they will need to move with the times. I hope that we start to see changes in attitude in the next few weeks. If we do, and the appropriate alterations are made, resolution of this issue will no longer impede the return of devolution.

Mr McGimpsey: One could say that making an agreement is one thing but making it stick is another. Like many in the Chamber, I have been involved in several talks processes that failed to make an agreement. Those talks mirrored each of the failures that occurred from the 1970s and 1980s through to the 1990s.

Therefore, when the Belfast Agreement — or the Good Friday Agreement, as it is commonly called — eventually came about, I suppose that it was obvious that it would contain many compromises. However, discussions in the PFG Committee have shown that parties have moved on. We had the Belfast Agreement, then we got the comprehensive agreement, and now we have the PFG Committee's report.

This debate concerns the Belfast Agreement, and I listened to Mrs Robinson state that it is not about DUP victories. It is about the agreement's capacity for review, and, as Seán Farren put it, we have seen changes to operational details. The DUP is on record as saying that the fundamentals of the agreement do not contradict the party's fundamental principles.

What has the report achieved? Although it includes a number of sensible changes, many of them were, in fact, banked before the PFG Committee was formed. Indeed, many of those changes were banked before the comprehensive agreement was drawn up. The key issue is getting an agreement that people are prepared to make work, and where there is a will, there is a way. If we really want to, we can make the changes work. Therein lies the fundamental question about the agreement, because, although the DUP said that it opposed the agreement, it worked it by taking its ministerial places and missing certain opportunities to pull down the structures during key votes.

My argument, as far as Sinn Féin is concerned, is that that party did not exactly play the game; republicans did not play the game. They did not honour what it was understood that they were going to honour. They did not do what we understood that they were going to do, and, on three occasions, the process collapsed. Therefore, therein lies the question. If, as Mrs Robinson said, this report is a breakthrough and the key test, the DUP, as the lead party, must answer the question through its actions at the talks. A successful outcome at the talks would mean that the agreement, with the reviews and changes, would fly.

What are the essentials of the agreement? They are devolution through power sharing, weighted-majority voting and the use of the d'Hondt mechanism to share out ministerial posts. All those feature in strand one of the agreement. Such an approach results in a mandatory coalition, with Sinn Féin in Government. That would be the logical outworking of a successful talks process in Scotland that meets the 24 November deadline. We have been told that that deadline is set in stone, but, of course, we all have our doubts.

Successful talks are key. Unionists want Stormont back. Northern Ireland is a unionist creation, so it is up to unionists to make Northern Ireland work. The Ulster Unionist Party sees Stormont, with limited self-government in the United Kingdom, as a key part of making Northern Ireland work, along with considering the mistakes of the past and ensuring that everyone has given his or her assent. That was the origin of the strand one model, imperfect as it is.

Another factor to be considered is strand two, which deals with the North/South bodies. There were six implementation bodies and six consultative bodies. Is that to change? No, it is not. The British-Irish Council recognises the common polity of the British Isles, because it includes the Irish Republic in the grouping of the other Governments in the United Kingdom. Is that arrangement to change? No, it is not.

Therefore, although we could talk all day — and the public, like most of us, are sick talking about the details of agreements — the key issue is whether we can get the agreement to fly. The key to doing that is to achieve a breakthrough in the talks, and that means that the DUP must accept Sinn Féin's being in Government. That is what we are talking about. Gregory Campbell talked about Sinn Féin showing repentance. That appeared to be his test. This morning, it was reported that Jeffrey Donaldson said that Sinn Féin in Government could be considered if it dismantled the command structures of the IRA, and the Assembly has debated criminality and decommissioning. However, the Assembly will fly only on the basis of a mandatory coalition. That is the only way in which this will work.

If the DUP is not up for that, or, to put it another way, if Sinn Féin is not prepared to meet the DUP test, the Assembly cannot work — and it does not matter how many changes are made to the Belfast Agreement or to the comprehensive agreement. This is not about operational details; it is about what we were talking about before.

11.45 am

As far as the comprehensive agreement is concerned — and I have flagged this up before — there is agreement on the modalities of the devolution of policing and justice. In principle, we all agree that that should happen, we all agree that there are ways in which it can be done, and we have all agreed, more or less, the methodology. In the comprehensive agreement, the British Government gave an undertaking that they would work to promote the necessary confidence to allow a vote to take place within two years to bring about the devolution of policing and justice, but it seems to me that that is a step that the people of Northern Ireland, or certainly the unionist community, are not ready to take.

The changes are operational not fundamental. The only way in which the Belfast Agreement will work is by making it work, and those changes are aids to making it work. The question is whether, at the talks, Sinn Féin and the DUP will come back to something like the comprehensive agreement position, which effectively allowed for the Assembly to be back in place with the DUP and Sinn Féin.

The DUP alone is in a position to answer that question. I do not expect it to give an answer, but if one looks at the history of the three failures that the Ulster Unionists had with Sinn Féin, a key factor has to be the need for an insurance policy, which was, of course, the suspension legislation — the Northern Ireland Act 2000 — that allowed us an exit when necessary.

A key issue now is about getting rid of the suspension legislation. If the DUP were to jump when Sinn Féin shows repentance, without that legislation it would be locked into either a sticking-it-out or a scorched-earth policy.

Although the basis may be there — and Mrs Robinson may see a breakthrough and want us not to view this as a DUP victory — the questions answered at the talks, and later, will determine whether anyone can talk about a DUP victory.

Ms Ritchie: For the past eight years, the people of Northern Ireland have been subjected to highs and lows and to gains and deficits in the political process.

The process has been punctuated with hope and expectancy since the Good Friday Agreement was signed and subsequently endorsed by referenda on the island of Ireland in May 1998. That hope was further emphasised when the Executive, which included DUP Ministers, was established in December 1999. The agreement provided the framework for future political institutions and developments based on the concepts of inclusivity, working together, respect for difference, equality and partnership. Most importantly, it provided safeguards and mechanisms to ensure that both traditions worked together and were treated equally in the institutions of government. Such provisions need to be sustained and protected, and the agreement is the only recipe that provides for the protection of all within the institutions of government.

So far this morning we have been subjected to the doctrinal contributions of the DUP. I hope that, over the coming weeks, that party will create opportunities not obstacles along with Sinn Féin for an accommodation on which the institutions could be restored, providing hope and opportunity for everyone in the North of Ireland.

The hope that we recognised so clearly in 1998, which characterised the endorsement of the Good Friday Agreement, was quickly replaced by sorrow, anger, despair and a sense of weariness in the community.

When unionists were slow to act as persuaders for the agreement, that was because the IRA refused to decommission — it only did so last year — and Sinn Féin, sadly absent once again, refused to commit to a peaceful society, to policing structures and to an end to criminality. Those outside influences led to the suspension of the institutions in October 2002.

Those institutions did work, and we have already had evidence of that in this debate. Next week we will all have an opportunity to restore hope and confidence in the process through a commitment to democratic values, equality and a willingness to work all the institutions of the Good Friday Agreement, which have the necessary ingredients for both traditions, unionist and nationalist, to work in Government for the betterment of us all and of future generations.

We in the SDLP hope that all those who have caused problems and impediments to the process will now say goodbye to violence, terror, criminality, supremacy and sectarianism, and embrace difference, policing and a lawful society. We also hope that they will agree to work all the institutions of government, including the North/South and British-Irish institutions.

Momentum in the economy; the need to address and reduce economic inactivity; the skills deficit that we have heard so much about; the need to locate inward investment and business development in areas where there is an adequate pool of skills but an inadequate level of investment; the urgent need to address regional inequalities; and deprivation and disadvantage — all those issues demand the immediate restoration of the political institutions. People need hope to replace sorrow and despair.

Communities throughout Northern Ireland are looking for hope and for collective responsibility on our part. They do not want to be subjected to punitive measures from direct-rule Ministers. At a recent evidence session of the economic challenges subgroup, the leader of the Northern Ireland Business Alliance stated unequivocally that the restoration of the political institutions and devolution were necessary prerequisites for confidence and growth in the community. Political stability, devolution and a subscription to all the institutions will give a significant impetus to economic growth in the North of Ireland and assist in the further development of economic co-operation and development on the island of Ireland.

Constant delays and hospital waiting lists for elective and non-elective surgery demand a radical re-examination of the Health Service. That can only come about through the restoration of the political institutions — with local people at the helm giving local solutions.

Cutbacks in education services that have a severe impact on children demand a children- and education-focused agenda, which can only be delivered by those who appreciate, empathise with and understand the situation. That is why local people need to be at the helm, making decisions on education through the restoration of the institutions.

There needs to be an emphasis on the provision of economic infrastructure, and on an all-island approach to that provision, to ensure opportunities for all. We need an all-Ireland infrastructure and transportation body so that networks — whether they be ports, airports, roads or railways — are linked to provide greater opportunity and greater wealth in local areas. There also needs to be an emphasis on the construction of roads that will contribute to the local economy and remove bottlenecks and delays in town centres. This will require imaginative solutions by those who understand and care about the future growth of our economy and about people. Only we can deliver that, because direct-rule Ministers do not really understand our needs or our past and current problems.

There can be no à la carte approach to the working of the institutions or to the agreement. Each of us must subscribe to the full menu, and we must work to ensure the full restoration of the institutions on this island, including the Assembly, the Executive and the North/South, and British-Irish, institutions.

The SDLP has never opposed working for better efficiencies or better effectiveness. We will not be found wanting, but we want an accommodation that works well for the people of this island. My message to the DUP and Sinn Féin, on behalf of the SDLP, is: please do not create further impediments; please do not create further obstacles; seize the opportunities that are available to us now; and create a better future for everyone on this island.

Mr Poots: As I travelled here this morning, I heard a blast from the past, Lord Trimble of Lisnagarvey, speaking on the radio. He took the title of Lisnagarvey, even though the only time that he stood for election there, in a council election in the 1970s, he was roundly defeated. It is perhaps somewhat ironic that he should have taken that title, but, in some respects, it is not surprising.

Lord Trimble said that the DUP did not have the moral courage to do a deal before 24 November. The DUP has the moral courage to do a deal; whether it can be done by 24 November remains to be seen. However, we will not listen to lectures from Lord Trimble about moral courage, because he allowed the most immoral measures of all, including the release of paramilitary prisoners without any deal on decommissioning.

The DUP will respond to deeds, not deadlines. We will ensure that when we do a deal we will get it right. That deal will not be like the Belfast Agreement, which David Trimble believed to be the best deal, but which did not work and collapsed three times.

I have no doubt that there is a public desire for devolution, but, more importantly, there is a public demand for resolution. There is a difference between bringing about a deal and bringing about a resolution to the difficulties in Northern Ireland. The Belfast Agreement brigade is living in denial if it believes that no changes will be made. The SDLP — certainly in the run-up to the comprehensive agreement — tried to portray the Belfast Agreement as an infallible, sacrosanct document, indeed as a Holy Grail. However, it appears that, during the deliberations of the PFG Committee, it recoiled from that position to some extent, although Margaret Ritchie seemed to be going back into pre-comprehensive agreement mode in her speech.

There are substantial differences between the positions of the DUP and the Ulster Unionists.

Dr Farren: Does the Member not agree that the entire agenda of the PFG Committee dealing with institutional matters was structured around the basic framework of the Good Friday Agreement? Page six of the report lists the issues requiring resolution — the deal-breakers — only one of which requires explicit change to the provisions of the Good Friday Agreement. Talk about fundamental changes to the Good Friday Agreement is so much hot air.

Mr Poots: The purpose of the PFG Committee was to scope the issues on which there was disagreement. If Dr Farren believes that there is only one area of disagreement, I am not sure where he is living.

Mr S Wilson: Does my colleague agree that, even using the logic of the Member for North Antrim Dr Farren, one of the major issues that still needs to be addressed is accountability, and that changes in accountability mechanisms will fundamentally change the agreement?

12.00 noon

Mr Poots: I was coming to that point. Fundamental changes are required. The 'Report on Institutional Issues' does not stand in isolation from the other reports that the PFG Committee produced. Each of those reports requires fundamental changes to be made before agreement can be reached.

The Ulster Unionist Party considers it acceptable to have unreconstructed terrorists in Government, but the DUP's position is that paramilitary organisations must be completely disbanded. The Ulster Unionist Party is content for Members to be Ministers by day and terrorists by night, but the DUP says that terrorism must become a thing of the past. The Ulster Unionist Party is content for ministerial accountability to be considered unacceptable, but the DUP's position is that Ministers must be accountable to the Assembly and the Executive. The Ulster Unionist Party is content that North/South bodies be unaccountable, but the DUP's position is that any decisions taken must be accountable to the Assembly and the Executive. The Ulster Unionist Party is content for Ministers to be opposed to policing and justice, but the DUP's position is that support for policing and justice is a prerequisite for any party to be in Government.

Mr Kennedy: I am not sure what wonderland Mr Poots is in this morning, but he is certainly in some type of fantasy land. In the event of a deal, does the Member for Lagan Valley think that it will be Government with Goldilocks?

Mr Poots: I do not know from where the Member is coming, but the DUP is certainly not living in any wonderland. It is a historical fact that, when the Ulster Unionists were in Government with Sinn Féin in the previous Assembly, Martin McGuinness was taking unaccountable decisions. At the same time, he did not accept the principles of policing and justice, and terrorist activity was taking place.

The DUP will insist on forcing Sinn Féin to divest itself of paramilitarism and to become a wholly democratic party as prerequisites for entering any Government. That is only one aspect of bringing about a political agreement in Northern Ireland. The other aspect is to bring about fundamental change to the agreement, and that must be made before a new Government is established in Northern Ireland. Those fundamentals will bring proper accountability to the House — something that did not exist in the previous Assembly but that must exist in any new Government.

Dr Birnie: I want to make some comments on the three strands to the agreement based on what is contained in the report. Eight years on from the Belfast Agreement, it is clear that reform is necessary, but the record of time has in no way suggested that the agreement should or could be “smashed” — to use a term used some years ago by a party to my left in the Chamber.

The record of recent years — particularly after the publication of the comprehensive agreement, which has been frequently cited this morning and afternoon — suggests that any so-called fair deal will be a fairly similar deal to the broad structure that was outlined in 1998.

On that basis, I will consider — in reverse order — aspects of the three strands. Crucially, strand three gives institutional recognition to the importance of the east-west relationship between these islands. There have been powerful movements of population back and forth over the centuries, as well as in recent decades. There have also been extensive trade flows between this island and the neighbouring island of Great Britain, and, very often, there has been a shared history.

The report rightly suggests that the British-Irish Council should be given greater recognition through, for example, the creation of an independent and separate secretariat similar to the secretariat that has been working in Armagh to the North/South Ministerial Council.

By implication, the report suggests that there should have been — and that, if there is restoration, there should in the future be — a greater equality in number and frequency of meetings between the North/South Ministerial Council and the British-Irish Council.

On strand two — the North/South aspect — the Committee agreed, sensibly, that there should be regular appearances before the relevant Assembly departmental Committees by the chief executives and chairmen of the North/South implementation bodies. It is important to add that there was no obstacle to that under the 1999-2002 dispensation, although it does not seem to have happened.

The 1998 agreement stated, crucially, that all three strands were interdependent. The successful operation of the North/South aspect was dependent on having the Northern Ireland Assembly in place and operational. The former Northern Ireland Office Minister for Political Development, Mr Paul Murphy MP, speaking in the House of Commons on 8 March 1999, went further. He said emphatically that were there no Assembly, there would not, and should not, be a North/South aspect or implementation bodies.

Mr Robert McCartney: Does the Member agree that if this Assembly collapses after 24 November, the North/South bodies must automatically come down in accordance with the terms of the agreement, and that the British Government would have to enact new and intricate legislation to resurrect them? Such legislation would have to go through the House of Commons.

Dr Birnie: I thank the Member for North Down for his intervention. He makes my point for me. I am arguing that any attempt to keep North/South bodies operating after 24 November — assuming that work in this Assembly comes to a complete stop — would be contrary to both the spirit of the agreement and the letter of the Minister’s speech on 8 March 1999. In that context, the Ulster Unionist Party views with great concern what has been emerging from recent meetings, particularly the July meeting of the British-Irish Intergovernmental Conference. The communiqué issued after that meeting strongly suggested a ramping up of the entire North/South process, notwithstanding what might happen to this Assembly.

My party has never been against North/South co-operation per se. We accepted the North/South aspect both in 1998 and in its outworking in the subsequent agreement of 1999. However, it has to be subject to two clear tests. First, it must work to the mutual advantage of Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland. Secondly, it must be accountable to representatives elected locally in Northern Ireland.

Members should note the economic evidence suggesting that the economies either side of the Irish border are already highly integrated and co-operating to a substantial degree. The Irish Business and Employers’ Confederation — the Southern Irish equivalent of the Confederation of British Industry — reported this year that the volume of road traffic across the border in both directions is already the same as that between Scotland and England, although both those countries obviously have much larger populations.

Strand one relates to the Assembly, and so forth. President Abraham Lincoln of the United States, in describing his approach to politics, once said that he would appeal to:

“the better angels of our nature”.

Members of the Committee on the Preparation for Government are to be commended for working to the better angels of their nature, rather than pursuing narrow personal vested interests, on several occasions.

Some of the recommendations reflect the public interest rather than the interest of particular MLAs — for example, the recommendation that we should move towards ending multiple mandates and the recommendation that we should reduce the number of MLAs from 108. That number seems anomalous when compared to the 129 Members in the Scottish Parliament and the 60 Members in the National Assembly for Wales. The report necessarily allows for a degree of elasticity regarding the timescales for implementation of those two recommendations, but it is important that they have been proposed.

The Committee was also right to suggest that, in due course, there should be a thoroughgoing review of the distribution of the functions of the 11 existing Departments, which would obviously include the Office of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister (OFMDFM).

Some Members may find my final point a little esoteric, but it is worth noting. The Committee endorses the single transferable vote (STV) system. The Hansard report of 7 August 2006 shows that the PFG Committee considered the voting system at about 3.30 pm in the afternoon; thus it is entirely understandable that there was not a full debate on rival voting systems and psephological considerations.

It may well be that the STV system is the only system that can provide broad proportionality between votes cast and representatives who are finally elected. However, it is worth putting on record that, several years ago, Democratic Dialogue — a group with which I do not always agree — suggested that consideration be given to the so-called alternative voting system. It was used for many years in England and Scotland, until, I think, the turn of the nineteenth century into the twentieth century. Democratic Dialogue argued that, in the context of Northern Ireland, the STV system does not give candidates an adequate incentive to reach out beyond what might be narrowly defined as their own communal constituency. However, it suggested that the alternative voting system could do just that.

We should also note that a number of commentators have argued that the STV system in the Irish Republic has led to excessive political pork-barrelling there. Such activity always occurs, but it occurs to an even greater extent in multi-member constituencies, and it is a waste of public funds.

I support the motion.

Mr Robert McCartney: This debate is about institutions. The institution under which these debates take place is a monster. It is a farce and a puppet: the Speaker puts forward motions that are determined by the Secretary of State, and our Standing Orders are determined by the Secretary of State. Members come here to utilise a very limited opportunity to speak about matters that concern us.

However, we must not forget the underlying lack of democracy in this institution. To a great extent, it mirrors the underlying lack of democracy that has always existed in the political Caliban called the Belfast Agreement and the Assembly that it spawned. Almost every single principle of representative democracy, as understood throughout the civilised world, has been violated by the terms of the Belfast Agreement and the subsequent settlement. Can Members think of any place in the world where there would be enforced mandatory power sharing between the representatives of democratic parties and a party that several Prime Ministers and umpteen

Secretaries of State have described as inextricably bound up with a terrorist organisation? Yet, those were the principles that the Belfast Agreement gave us.

12.15 pm

It was born out of deceit and ambiguity. Everyone said that the agreement was the product of constructive ambiguity. One high cleric in the Roman Catholic Church said that the agreement was wonderful, as there was enough ambiguity in it for everyone. However, four or five years later, the blessed Tony Blair told us in one of his peripatetic speeches in Belfast that ambiguity, while once our friend, was now our enemy. How is that for a piece of Jesuitical reasoning?

From day one, I said that the Assembly and its Executive had no collective responsibility. All the major parties were represented in the Executive, so there was no opposition except that which was offered by the Alliance Party, myself and the other smaller parties. I also said that Ministers in turn became hares or hounds. Given the absence of any form of collective responsibility, a Minister from one party became the hare and the other Ministers became the hounds that harried. It was a joke.

An election is a basic principle of democracy that enables people to remove one Government from office to bring in another, but that is not so under the Belfast Agreement, because, broadly speaking, each election would return the same parties. There would perhaps be a Minister less in one group, but, essentially, they would be representatives from the same parties. Those parties would appoint their Ministers, and they would be responsible only to the party that elected them, not to the Assembly or to the people. There was ongoing stagnation, because it was never intended that the Assembly would develop into a working democratic body: it was simply to continue as an ongoing sop to unionists, while the mechanisms of North/South bodies gradually developed into a factually united Ireland. I pointed that out time and again, and the Assembly never did anything, because it was under the control of the British Treasury at all times.

Turning to another aspect of democratic institutions, we are told that we should have an enforced mandatory coalition in the Executive.

Mr Nesbitt: Will the Member give way?

Mr Robert McCartney: No, I will not give way at the moment.

That was the d'Hondt system. In fairness to the DUP, its 2005 general election manifesto stated that it would not enter into any form of mandatory coalition under d'Hondt or any other similar method in the foreseeable future. That position was also outlined by Mr Allister, the DUP MEP, in this morning's edition of the 'News Letter'. However, that is rather different from the suggestion made by Peter Robinson this morning and in his speech yesterday that, for a time — albeit limited — there may be an acceptance of a mandatory coalition while it developed into, at some future unspecified date, something that represented normal democracy. That is similar to being slightly pregnant or “slightly constitutional”. Can one be slightly in favour, even for a limited time, of a mandatory coalition with people whom one has, quite properly, for decades condemned as the representatives of terrorism, in the hope that they may become reformed? The fundamental principle of a mandatory coalition is wrong.

The DUP is correct to offer the SDLP — fellow democrats — an opportunity to enter into a voluntary coalition. Indeed, if the NIO is to be believed, Sinn Féin/IRA has undergone a Damascene conversion and soon will appear robed in pure white as a fitting partner in any democratic process. That being the case, why is it necessary to have a mandatory coalition of any kind? If Sinn Féin will observe the principles of democracy, accept the views of the electorate and no longer resort to violence or the threat of violence, what is to be feared by the normal principles of democratic government?

Why should any party — minority or otherwise — be entitled to places in Government as of right? After the previous general election, the Conservative Party had a huge number of Members of Parliament, and probably it will have more after the next election. However, if it is not the majority party, or one of a coalition of parties that share the same view, it is not entitled to a single place in the Government. Yet a party that has seven or more Members in an Assembly of 108 is entitled to a place in the Executive simply on the basis of d'Hondt. The whole procedure is patently ludicrous and it is a violation of all commonly understood principles of democracy.

During the past two months, there has been discussion on the minutiae of how the monster is to be restored in some attenuated form. This is a typical example of the elephant-in-the-drawing-room scenario, in which everybody walks around talking about every other matter, such as the Dresden china in the china cabinet, ignoring the fact that there is a bloody great elephant in the middle of the room. The elephant of democracy must be addressed.

Mr Dallat: Will the Member give way?

Mr Robert McCartney: I will not give way.

Mr Dallat: That is democracy.

Mr Robert McCartney: That is democracy: the right of free speech. We must consider the elephant of democracy and stop fannying about on irrelevant details.

Mr Campbell: I add my commendation to that of Members who thanked the staff who served the Committee diligently throughout the summer. Some Members referred to the PFG Committee as though they felt that to serve on it was more than just honourable, but a wonderful experience. Some went further and said that it was a joy and a privilege to see the historic event of the DUP and Sinn Féin's being together in the same room. I do not know where those people have been. Some of us have been in elected forums with members of Sinn Féin for 25 years. If that party continues to adhere to criminality, violence and terror, the DUP will ignore it for the next 25 years as it has done for the past 25 years. However, if Sinn Féin departs from those activities, that will herald a new beginning that the DUP will look forward to, if and when it comes.

Some people have short memories and want to imply that there has been a historic departure from past practices.

Mr Nesbitt: Will the Member give way?

Mr Campbell: If the hon Member will give me a chance to get started, I will happily give way to him at some point. If he does not mind, I want to get into first gear and on my way.

The issue of accountability has seized the attention of many Members, today and on previous occasions. Some Members, particularly those from the Ulster Unionist Party, have concentrated their fire on the 1998 agreement. In their eyes, it appears that the DUP has signed up to that agreement after it has undergone a little tweaking. They referred to some changes that may be agreed in the near future, or remain outstanding, as being the essence of such tweaking.

Ministers in the previous Assembly were unaccountable, as outlined by my hon Friend the Member for East Belfast Mr Robinson. They could put forward their views to the Assembly and even to the Committees that shadowed their respective Departments. Having outlined what they intended to do and listened to any objections from the Floor of the Assembly and from the relevant Committee, Ministers could go away and do as they pleased. That could, and did, happen for the duration of the previous Assembly.

If the DUP is successful, that will change. In future, as in the past, Ministers will have to come before the Assembly and Committees to put forward their views. However, in whatever way can be agreed, they must bring the support of the Assembly with them. The Ulster Unionist Party may say that that is tweaking, but it is much more than that — it goes to the core of accountability and democracy in this place.

If, under —

Mr Dallat: Will the Member give way?

Mr Campbell: I am afraid that the Member will have to join the queue. If I am allowed to develop my theme, I will give way to him and to the other hon Member Mr Nesbitt in a moment.

There is a similar issue of accountability in relation to North/South issues. Under the old regime, Ministers decided, in conjunction with their counterparts from the Irish Republic, what they wanted to do. They then merely informed the Assembly of their intentions. Ministers answered questions but would not change anything, no matter what the view of the Assembly was. A move to a situation wherein Ministers, whether in the Irish Republic or in Northern Ireland, must go back to their respective Parliament or Assembly and seek the endorsement of the elected representatives is not mere tweaking — it goes to the core of accountability.

I am not sure whether the hon Member still wants me to give way.

Mr Nesbitt: Mr Campbell has moved on from the point on which I wanted him to give way. He referred to interchanges between the DUP and Sinn Féin that had perhaps not taken place before. Having previously refused to sit in the same television studio as Sinn Féin, the DUP clearly changed its position and agreed to do so. Is it correct that the reason given by the DUP for that was that the BBC had not provided money for separate studios? Is that a fallacious statement from the DUP?

Mr Campbell: I thank the Member for making an incorrect point. The DUP has never said that the decision had anything to do with money. The BBC said that the provision for separate studios would not continue. Whether the DUP sits in the same studio, council chamber, Assembly Chamber or parliamentary Chamber, it will not change its attitude to those who advocate criminality, terror and violence. The DUP will continue to confront and oppose those people, whether they are in the same studio or a separate one.

Mr McClarty: However, they are all right on the Policing Board.

Mr Campbell: I am glad that the hon Member, from a sedentary position, has raised the issue of the Policing Board. I have never rationalised any repentant terrorist joining the police, and I am pleased that the hon Member has given me the opportunity to put that on the record.

Indeed, his colleague, the Member for East Belfast, Mr Copeland —

Madam Speaker: Mr Campbell, please address the Chair.

12.30 pm

Mr Campbell: I am sorry, Madam Speaker. Mr Copeland followed me on that programme and never raised the issue. Had I even contemplated that, I am sure that Mr Copeland would have been the first to jump on the bandwagon; the fact that he did not proves that I did not contemplate it. I know that Alban Maginness wants me to give way, and I will be happy to do that.

We have continually raised the matter of the number of offices that would exist under a new devolved structure. They need to be cost-effective. It is absurd that there was a Department of Education and a Department of Higher and Further Education. It is even more absurd that there was a Department of the Environment and a Department for Regional Development — one Department was responsible for planning issues in a wider corporate sense and the other was responsible for the day-to-day minutiae of such applications. The number of Departments can and ought to be reduced. If we are serious about making government cost-effective, we should be considering the number of Departments.

Mr A Maginness: Will the Member give way?

Mr Campbell: I will, if the intervention is brief this time.

Mr A Maginness: Mr Campbell described the Executive as a mandatory Executive. In fact, the DUP joined it voluntarily, and Mr Campbell joined it voluntarily as a Minister. It highlights Mr Robert McCartney's point in relation to what Jim Allister says in today's 'News Letter'. Does Jim Allister's position faithfully reflect DUP policy or does Peter Robinson's position in the Assembly today reflect the genuine DUP position?

Mr Campbell: I never cease to be amazed at the extent to which the SDLP tries to imply that there is a fundamental division in our party. I will discuss what used to be the case and what I hope will be the case under a new regime. The issue ought to be clear: of course it is a mandatory coalition. There is no option but to be a partner in a coalition, and voluntary coalition is out of the question — and it is out of the question because Mr Maginness's party has put it out of the equation. It has explicitly said time and time again that —

Madam Speaker: I am afraid that your time is up, Mr Campbell. [Interruption.]

Order. As Members know, the Business Committee has arranged to meet at lunchtime today. I propose therefore, by leave of the Assembly, to suspend the sitting until 2.00 pm.

The sitting was suspended at 12.33 pm.

On resuming (Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Wells] in the Chair) —

2.00 pm

Mr Dallat: The PFG Committee report on institutional issues suggests that nationalists require cross-border bodies to reinforce the Irish dimension of Stormont. Although there is no doubt that anything that helps to soften the history of this place is helpful, it should not be assumed by any unionist that the sole purpose for wanting cross-border bodies is a comfort blanket for being Irish — far from it. It is not helpful that that angle is constantly used by unionists to undermine the existence of cross-border bodies dealing with real issues that affect the everyday lives of people on both parts of this island.

It would be helpful if there were a greater sense of maturity among unionists, and less scaremongering about the perceived threat of cross-border bodies. We need to take cross-border co-operation away from the bogeyman syndrome and begin explaining to people just how necessary those institutions are if, as Mr McGimpsey claims, we are to reach a potential market of 60 million people in the United Kingdom and 400 million in the European Union as a whole.

Trade between the North and South is increasing, but it is only a fraction of what it should be. The aggregate trade from Ireland as a whole could be vastly increased if we had an end to the obstacles that stand in the way as a direct result of partition.

Whatever Members' views, partition has been a costly experience, and everyone is the poorer for it. Although I have never been in the camp that believed that it could be ended by force, everything possible must be done to address the serious impediments partition imposes, North and South. Indeed, it has been a miracle that the Republic has managed to achieve so much over the past 20 years. However, that advantage will not be around for much longer, as the rest of Europe pulls down the barriers that have kept countries apart, inefficient and uneconomic.

The world is moving on at a pace unthinkable a decade ago. Who would have believed that the border that split Cyprus for 32 years is now open, with plans to create more openings? I am not suggesting that the Greeks and Turks now love each other — far from it — but, even in the troubled history of that place, there is a recognition that partition is a serious impediment to free trade and, consequently, to economic prosperity.

In our case, Waterways Ireland has provided the platform to develop rivers, North and South, and here in the North there is everything to gain from that. In my constituency of East Derry, preparation is well advanced for transforming the River Bann from a drainage system out of Lough Neagh to a tourist Mecca equal to the River Shannon. Much of the work is already in place, but investment from the private sector is essential. That will not happen in a disjointed way, but under the stewardship of Waterways Ireland, which is a splendid cross-border body that has been impeded in the most disgraceful way since the suspension of the last Assembly. By putting the work of Waterways Ireland on a care-and-maintenance basis, purely for political expediency, unionists have well and truly made our people suffer.

The Coleraine office of Tourism Ireland has brought new meaning to international tourism, but sadly there is still begrudgery among unionists about its achievement. Do they ever stop to think why there are so many cars with Republic of Ireland registrations touring our beauty spots? Many of those cars have been hired in the Republic by tourists who would never have ventured into the North in the past, either because they were too scared or because they were simply not aware that the place existed.

The report suggests that the foot-and-mouth disease crisis could have been handled without a cross-border body dealing with animal health; that, surely, cannot be a serious argument.

The development of cross-border institutions is necessary and is not a threat. Take, for example, the vexed question of road safety. Is anyone suggesting that there would be no gains to be made through increased co-operation in practical matters such as harmonisation of laws relating to offenders who exploit the border to speed, drink and drive, and generally add to the mayhem? I think not.

Perhaps the fact that somewhere in the region of 500 people are slaughtered on the roads on both sides of the border each year is a good argument for giving the recently constituted Road Safety Authority (RSA) an increased cross-border role. I am pleased that representatives of that body are in Belfast today with the PSNI and others involved in road safety. The Road Safety Council of Northern Ireland, a voluntary body, has one full-time employee and one part-time employee. The RSA has 309 full-time staff addressing the serious issues that are making Ireland, North and South, one of the worst countries in the European Union for death and serious injury on the roads.

Part of the solution to improve road safety is, of course, better and safer roads and, if I may say so, better railways, airports and seaports. Surely it makes sense to do that on a shared basis, with the Republic of Ireland making a contribution to the development of City of Derry Airport, for example. Surely it would make very good sense to have an all-island strategy on railways, with the Republic again contributing to building a decent service between Belfast and Derry on the same principles as applied to the airport. How could the European Union say no to chipping in on what would effectively be a trans-European initiative?

Unionists have had their guarantees that the constitutional position of the North will not be changed without agreement — in the 1998 referendum, this was recognised by citizens North and South for the first time. It is therefore a bit rich for unionists to continue standing in the way of practical co-operation on an endless list of issues that promote economic well-being, better educational opportunities, animal health and, in the longer term, new enlightenment that will make the border a thing of the past — by agreement, of course. I appeal especially to the DUP to ensure that the talks in Scotland are successful in the days ahead.

Mr Kennedy: This important debate is the last in the series under the auspices of the PFG Committee. I endorse the remarks of other Members — the almost obligatory, yet sincere remarks — and thank the officials involved in the Committee. I also commend your role, Mr Deputy Speaker, and that of your erstwhile colleague, the Member for Mid Ulster Mr Molloy, for so efficiently and impartially chairing the Committee. [Interruption.]

Yes, I am conscious of not wanting to go overboard.

I want to express yet again my disgust at the non-appearance of Sinn Féin. It is unsatisfactory and expresses political cynicism in the most extreme form. Sinn Féin would do well to reflect on the responsibilities that it will have in the coming days, particularly in respect of the rule of law, as we enter an important phase for the future of this Assembly and that of a possible devolved Administration.

The Committee has looked at the three strands. We looked at the workings of the Assembly, and it is my clear view that the work done by the PFG Committee amounted to a review of the workings of the Belfast Agreement. The DUP may not like to imagine it in those terms, but it is the overall framework of the Belfast Agreement that is being modified, changed or slightly amended. That general and basic framework is still in place. Sensible changes to the working of the Assembly can and should be made. However, they should not be made out of political convenience or to save political face or give political cover. I say that particularly to members of the DUP.

An interesting point about strand one issues has emerged overnight in the press: there is a clear difference of opinion among senior figures in the upper echelons of the Democratic Unionist Party. Unfortunately, the deputy leader of the DUP is not in his place this afternoon, but in press reports he has indicated that:

“while mandatory coalition would never be my party’s preference,” it might be accepted

“in very exceptional circumstances”.

Mr Deputy Speaker, that contradicts the view expressed in your constituency, perhaps even in your local DUP branch office in Ballymena — I am sorry; for the record, that should be Ballynahinch.

In Ballynahinch, Mr James Allister, an MEP and senior DUP figure, said:

“Little wonder d’Hondt is not used anywhere else in the world as a means of selecting a government. Also, little wonder, the Northern Ireland electorate so strongly endorsed the 2005 DUP Manifesto which declared inclusive mandatory coalition government under d’Hondt as ‘out of the question’.”

Jim Allister finished by saying:

“And, so it should remain.”

In the House, we have been told on many occasions that the DUP speaks for unionism. My question is: who speaks for the DUP?

Members of the Ulster Unionist Party know what it is like to cope with internal differences, so I have some sympathy for the deputy leader of the DUP. We wish him well as he considers those issues.

The UUP welcomes aspects of the report. All the political parties appear to agree that, at some stage, dual and triple mandates will no longer be allowed. That is an interesting issue, particularly for the DUP.

Executive accountability is important, and collective responsibility goes to the heart of this issue. Members of the previous Assembly know that it had no collective responsibility. The four parties that made up the rainbow coalition faced in four different directions on most issues. The UUP hopes that, either through the negotiations in Scotland or the ensuing talks, something can be done to resolve that issue so that we can move forward on a proper basis.

I listened carefully to Mr Dallat as he spoke about strand two issues. Strand two issues have always been problematic, not because of the concept or an unwillingness or lack of effort from unionists to engage in a meaningful relationship with the Irish Republic for mutual benefit — there is no problem with that. The problem is that there has been an insatiable greed and an absolute desire, especially from the SDLP and others, to pursue North/South issues too far. We should learn from the mistakes of the past. The SDLP’s insistence on pursuing North/South ministerial links and creating institutions that unionists were not, and will not be, comfortable with undid the 1973 Sunningdale Agreement and led to severe problems with the 1985 Anglo-Irish Agreement. I want to highlight that as a possible issue that the SDLP and republicans will have to take seriously.

2.15 pm

I am almost out of time, but I still have a little more ground to cover. As regards strand three issues, the Ulster Unionist Party would like to see expansion. A proper BIC secretariat and work programme would be very good to have if the institutions get up and running. We are also interested in the concept of a new Council of the Isles. It will be important to establish and maintain links with the rest of the British Isles and the United Kingdom. Who knows — at some future date, it may well be that the Republic of Ireland may wish to rejoin the Commonwealth.

I conclude by saying that there is much work to be done. The work carried out by the PFG Committee was useful, but it amounted to a review of the workings of the Belfast Agreement. The exchanges were useful. Although engagement was limited, it was real, and it is to be welcomed. We look towards St Andrews, and we hope that the parties will address seriously all the issues that have yet to be resolved.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I want to make a statement. I want to say something that is loud, clear, unambiguous and not open to interpretation — and I will say it slowly, so that even Danny Kennedy will understand what it means.

The Belfast Agreement is dead: it was killed by the people of Northern Ireland in the previous two elections. It is dead and buried because it was a bad deal for the majority of people in Northern Ireland. It was a rotten deal as far as unionists were concerned, and it was a bad deal for everyone. The only way that we will get a better future is for everyone in Northern Ireland to agree on the way forward. It is unfortunate that the Belfast Agreement failed miserably to win the support of the unionist people.

If anyone on the Benches opposite disagrees with my assertion that the Belfast Agreement is dead, I would like to know why they have sat since July on a Committee that has agreed change upon change to the Belfast Agreement. The 'Report on Institutional Issues' documents in detail the numerous changes that must be put in place before all of the parties in this Chamber — and even the party that has not bothered to attend — can come to any agreement that is acceptable. That is a fact.

The precious Belfast Agreement that many hold out hope of reviving is dead and buried; it is over, and the sooner that the other parties recognise that fact and that we must build a new and better agreement, the better. They are the ones that have to get real. Do not cling to the old institutions. Look for something that is better and will work. The Belfast Agreement failed, and we are moving on. The sooner that others move on with us, the better.

I was listening to the radio this morning when a Mr Trimble — whom I have not heard anything about for a long time — made some comments about the Democratic Unionist Party. There he was, Lord Trimble, the noble Member for Upper Bann, saying that the DUP did not have the moral courage to do a deal.

I repeat — loud and clear so that Mr Trimble and others can hear — that, when it was necessary, the DUP had the moral courage to say no when it was difficult to do so. When the whole world was against us, we said no because it was the right thing to do. We will have the moral courage and the strength of conviction in bucketloads when we have to say yes. We are a party of conviction that leads its people. We are not a party that believes in "followship"; we believe in real, decisive leadership. When it comes to deciding whether to say yes or no, the DUP will make that difficult decision. That is not demonstrating a lack of moral courage; it is a sign of strength and conviction. It is a sign of a party that is determined to lead its community because it believes in leadership.

Mr Trimble and his party were pushover unionists. They were pushed around by Bill Clinton, Tony Blair and Bertie Ahern. They were even pushed around by Gerry Adams. What did Gerry Adams say about Mr Trimble? He said, "Well done, David." I doubt that Members will ever hear anyone from this party say those words in the Chamber.

Mr Dallat: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. Will Mr Paisley Jnr explain what that has to do with the motion?

Mr Paisley Jnr: That is not a point of order. Perhaps I should speak a little slower so that the Member understands and realises that the debate is about the institution in which we sit, why it is not up and running, and the desire for institutional changes. All of those points are relevant.

Earlier today, some Members heralded the debate as a preamble to the talks to be held in St Andrews. It is good that some groundwork has been done for those talks. However, in recent days, I have wondered whether the correct Prime Minister — or, indeed, correct Prime Ministers — will attend the talks. One of those Prime Ministers is a lame duck, and if the other does not do a good enough job in another place today, he may also be out on his ear. Nonetheless, those talks will go ahead next week in St Andrews.

It is important to have clarity about the obstacles that exist on the road to re-establishing devolution. Let us make it clear: the DUP wants those obstacles out of the way and dealt with, so that there can be democracy in Northern Ireland. The obstacles that must be addressed are, for me, institutional, as the report has identified, and, for many, they are ideological.

Furthermore, we must deal with issues that have been identified not only in the Committee report but in other reports that concern the rule of law and support for the courts; the Police Service of Northern Ireland; a proper and adequate financial package for the people of Northern Ireland; and the necessary institutional changes. Those matters deal with the preconditions that every party will bring to the talks in St Andrews, and people should recognise that everyone will take packets of preconditions to those talks.

For the DUP, if the next Assembly is established, it must work. There is no point in having a start-stop Assembly; it must function for everyone, and it must be stable and durable. The problem with the previous Assembly, which collapsed so many times that I lost count, was that it was neither stable nor durable. Frankly, it did not work. A great deal of changes to the Belfast Agreement have been identified in the report; therefore, if we have a new agreement, people will recognise that new institutions must function, and function well.

Perhaps if others had been as deliberate as the DUP in their work on those issues, we would not be in the business of repairing and rebuilding, but we would be sustaining something that works.

From day one of the Committee meetings, Sinn Féin's activities have indicated that it has not yet crossed the river of no return — it has not yet reached the point of wanting to be ideologically removed from terrorism and pathologically removed from criminality. It must change. The message from this Assembly must go out loud and clear that Sinn Féin is the party that is holding everyone to ransom because it has refused to change.

On one occasion in that Committee, Martin McGuinness looked at my colleagues William McCrea and Lord Morrow and at me, and told us that he did not like us and that he would never like us. I am glad to report that encouraging remark. On another occasion he slanderously alleged that certain people were trying to kill him. Of course, once the cloak of privilege was removed and he was challenged on those allegations, he did not have the bottle, the moral courage or the ability to repeat them.

It is easy to conclude that Sinn Féin came to this process to destroy it. It is not interested in building a better tomorrow or a new and better institution. It is not interested because it has had things its own way for too long and because pushovers were prepared to be pushed over by it. Those parties ought to be ashamed of themselves.

In 2002, the DUP published a document called 'Towards a New Agreement: DUP Analysis Vindicated: A Critical Assessment of the Belfast Agreement Five Years On'. In that document, we identified that there had to be institutional changes, that there should be no terrorists in Government and that there should be collective Government responsibility, accountable Departments and a rebalancing of North/South institutions. I am glad to say that at this late stage other parties are coming around to that point of view. We were glad to lead them there, and it is to be hoped that we will persuade them to sign up to it in Scotland.

Dr McCrea: I concur with the remarks of my hon Friend the Member for North Antrim. I once again remind the House that the Belfast Agreement was not based on democracy. It seemed that the level at which we were to progress was designed to appeal to the lowest common denominator. The agreement was born in deceit, and I thank God that it has now been buried in disgrace. Even Danny Kennedy, one of the great friends of the Belfast Agreement, said today that it has been altered, modified and changed. Of course, we were told that it could not be changed, modified or altered. The agreement was therefore deemed to be a totally sacrosanct sacred cow that nobody could even look at. I am glad that Danny Kennedy has reached the point of making his confession, because it is good for the soul. I am also glad that he now acknowledges that the Belfast Agreement was a deceitful document that did not create the democratic principles on which we could move forward.

We have talked today about a new future, and I find it interesting that the SDLP Member for East Londonderry, even after he tried to charm the bees from the trees, could not say his constituency's name.

Mr S Wilson: He did not succeed in charming the bees, mind you.

Dr McCrea: He did not succeed.

He could not even say that his constituency is called East Londonderry. He talked about his constituency of "East Derry". With the greatest respect, he did not stand for "East Derry"; he stood for East Londonderry. That name was in all the election material that was used in the place for which he stood. The Member should be proud of his constituency and be proud of what London has given to it. He should not be ashamed of that.

I read carefully what some of these folks say in the newspapers. For example, Reg Empey interestingly said that when his party goes to Scotland, it will want to know whether the DUP is on for an inclusive democracy, and whether Sinn Féin is on for a lawful society.

In actual fact, when he talks about an inclusive democracy, he, as one of the arch designers of the Belfast Agreement, should be humble, because the agreement was anything but democratic. On three occasions, Sir Reg was happy to include terrorists in Government — people who were inextricably linked to murder gangs — without their having to renounce their terrorism.

2.30 pm

Therefore, let us be quite honest, when we talk about inclusive — [Interruption.]

The hon Member Mr McClarty gets excited sometimes, but if he wants to make a speech, I am sure that he will get his 10 minutes. There will be time available to him. However, I do not think that he has put his name down to speak too often in previous debates. He does not seem to have too much to say, other than from a sedentary position.

When he referred to the Belfast Agreement, Sir Reg Empey said that he would consider inclusive democracy.

That is interesting, because he is entering into a new mode. He is thinking about democracy. At least that is a step forward, because it was the UUP that insisted that Northern Ireland would have a system of government that was not based on democratic principles. That party insisted that it would not foster links with terrorist organisations.

Sir Reg Empey said also that he would determine whether Sinn Féin supports a lawful society. His party has shared power with Sinn Féin three times. Why did he not determine whether Sinn Féin supported a lawful society on one of those occasions? Why did his party not consider that before it first went into Government with Martin McGuinness, who was a member of the IRA's Army Council? His party did not look to see whether Sinn Féin was aiming for a lawful society; instead, it became involved with an organisation that was blowing up the people of Northern Ireland. Sir Reg Empey is approaching the situation with a new mind. However, it is a pity that he did not consider Sinn Féin's credentials on the three previous occasions when the UUP opted to share power with it.

It is interesting to note that Mr Dallat has moved on as well. In one of this morning's papers, I noticed that he spoke about south-east Antrim: Mr Dallat's constituency responsibilities seem to cover a wide geographical area. This morning, he said that:

"This UDA gang reckons it can transform itself into a community development body in just five years for a mere £8 million."

Then he said that:

"Democratic society should make them a counter-offer: desist from crime and rackets and you can stay out of jail."

That is an interesting statement: if he can say that about the UDA, why not the IRA?

Mr S Wilson: He wants to let the IRA away with it.

Dr McCrea: Yes. He is interested in putting the IRA into Government over the people whose relatives they murdered for more than 30 years, and it seems to me that it is one policy for one community and another for the other community.

There is no room for any paramilitary group in this society. There is one legal authority in this country: the forces of the law and the Crown. The rule of law must prevail in every section of the community. The Democratic Unionist Party stands for this: everyone is equal under the law, and everyone is equally subject to the law. Therefore, it is wrong to suggest that if members of the UDA desist, they will stay out of jail. Mr Dallat let them out of jail, because the Belfast Agreement opened the doors of the jails to let out the greatest murderers, who were totally unrepentant. The Belfast Agreement let those people back into society.

There has been much talk about Scotland. There has been an awful lot of hype. People are getting all worked up, and the Governments are trying to tell us what will come out of next week. Let me make it abundantly clear: as far as 24 November and Scotland on 13 October are concerned, and as far as democracy is concerned, this party will not stand democracy on its head for anyone.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Hear, hear.

Dr McCrea: My party is based on democratic principles, and if there are those who think that we will be gulled by Sinn Féin/IRA's turning on and turning off violence, as and when it likes — for example, when Clinton came, the IRA turned off its violence just like that, as quickly as clicking one's fingers — they are wrong. Of course, while Clinton was here, the IRA continued to plan future activity, and when he left, it carried on the actions that it knows best.

The DUP will not be gulled in the same way as the Ulster Unionist Party. David Trimble said to Gerry Adams:

"We have jumped, you follow."

As far as we are concerned, the DUP will not jump. If we make a move, it will be based on democratic lines and principles alone. If Sinn Féin/IRA thinks that a devolved Government here will mean the swift transfer of policing and justice powers to the Assembly, it had better wake up and smell the coffee, because I can assure Members that it is living in cloud cuckoo land as far as that is concerned.

Those who sit in this Assembly and those who have power over the people of Northern Ireland must be seen to be wedded solely to the principle of democracy and not to the power of their guns or the thud of their bombs.

That brings me to accountability. The SDLP lectured us about how, when Ministers came back from meetings of the North/South bodies, they condescended to come to the Assembly to allow Members to question them. Of course, the Ministers got up and gave a spiel; they spoke gobbledygook. They did not answer the questions, yet that was accountability. Let me make it abundantly clear: Ministers, irrespective of which party they belong to, must be accountable to the people through the Assembly.

I am glad that there are new converts to that idea — Mr Dallat did not ask for that previously. Martin McGuinness could destroy our education system with the stroke of a pen, but nobody had the power to stop him. The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, Barbara Brown, was able to remove maternity services from the City Hospital and place them in west Belfast, and no one could stop her. The Health Committee opposed the move, but it could not stop her. That was totally unaccountable government. There must be accountability, and there must be efficiency. There are too many Departments. The basis of the Belfast Agreement was jobs for the boys and girls, not good government for the people. The DUP stands for efficient, effective government — and especially democratic government. Unlike other parties, we will accept nothing less.

Mr N Dodds: It is a pleasure to follow my colleagues today. I know that the Member for East Londonderry Mr Dallat would be the first to rise to his feet if people were even whispering on this side of the House, yet he is carrying on a monologue from his side of the House. I hope that he will do us the courtesy of listening for a change, although I see that he is tempted once again to speak from a sedentary position. What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander, in this case.

Mr Paisley Jnr referred earlier to remarks by David Trimble. I was surprised that none of his party colleagues mentioned them, at least in passing. I was delighted to hear him on the radio this morning. We need to hear more from Lord Trimble, and I hope that he continues. To have the previous leader and the possible future leader speak today was wonderful. It showed people here exactly what the Ulster Unionist Party did in the past with the political process and what it is likely to do in the future. I am all for encouraging Lord Trimble to speak out more; it serves to remind people that he has not gone away and that his legacy is still very much part of what is going on. He is still part of the Ulster Unionist Assembly group, so let us hear more of him.

With regard to the current situation, we have the invitation to go to Scotland. The work that has been carried out in the PFG Committee — and I pay tribute to all those involved in producing this report for our consideration — will be the basis of some of the issues to be discussed in Scotland. However, it strikes me as a little odd that the one issue on which there was agreement on all sides of the House was that we should not go to Scotland at all. There was cross-party consensus, which was relayed to the Government, that the discussions should be held in Belfast. It would save hundreds of thousands of pounds, and we have all the necessary facilities here. We have been lectured all summer by Peter Hain about the need for Assembly Members not only to do their job but to be seen to do their job in Stormont.

It strikes me as extremely strange and counter-productive to take everybody over to Scotland at what I imagine will be incredible expense. However, the Government, who preach about consensus and value for money, and have done all summer, rejected that. So we are off to a good start. If that is the sort of attitude that we are going to get from the Government, some of us who are going to be on the receiving end of the attempts to make us go in certain directions will just take it with a pinch of salt.

We will also look carefully at those other persuaders in society, and not just at political persuaders but at persuaders from other fields as well. They give us advice and counsel, and for all of it we are deeply grateful.

We will listen to them, but we will judge what they say on the basis of people's past records. Some of the people who are telling us that things are perfect and that there is no reason not to move forward in a certain direction are exactly the same people who, eight years ago, were telling us to move in a certain direction when it was quite clear that everything was far from right.

Dr Farren, who is not here, said that procedural matters did not lead to suspension. I note that a lot of people who take part in debates make their speeches and then disappear, and that is something that needs to be looked at. When one Member responds to another, the latter is not here to hear the answers given.

[Interruption.]

I hear Mr Dallat at it again from a sedentary position. It should be noted that when he ever complains in future about anyone on this side of the House interrupting, he has been at it all afternoon.

Ms Lewsley: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker.

Mr N Dodds: Now Ms Lewsley is joining in —

Ms Lewsley: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. Where is Peter Robinson? He took part in the debate this morning.

Mr N Dodds: I did not make any reference to any particular party, and what I am talking about is the mumbling and sedentary interruptions that are going on. Mr Dallat makes a lot of that in every debate, and he is at it continually today. I think that it is unfair and needs to be pointed out.

Dr Farren — who is not here at his place — said that it was not procedural matters that had led to suspension. It is almost as if the institutional arrangements do not matter, but, of course, they do.

People have talked about accountability, the efficiency of the institutions and the way in which things were allowed to happen that should not have been allowed to happen. We have made it absolutely clear in all of our policy documents and election manifestos that those are key areas for us. There is now an attempt being made to downplay all of this. It has been said that somehow it is tweaking, making small changes or slight amendments, and that everybody is operating within the context of the Belfast Agreement.

It is as if somehow there has to be some kind of devolution settlement in Belfast and some kind of relationship between the North and the South and that Northern Ireland's relationship with the rest of the United Kingdom has to be recognised.

Everybody accepted that back in 1990. It was in 1991 when the Brooke talks took off that the strands were developed. Everybody recognises that that is the context and not the Belfast Agreement. Those strands pre-date the Belfast Agreement by many years, but now people are trying to say that if anything is done about devolved arrangements in Belfast, that is the Belfast Agreement. That is not the view that Mr Durkan adopted when he was talking about the comprehensive agreement. Writing in 'The Irish Times' on 14 December 2004, he said of Sinn Féin:

"Instead of getting the Good Friday agreement honoured by all parties, the DUP got a contrived 'Comprehensive Agreement' which it could boast superseded it."

He added:

"The Irish people may feel a sense of affront, and, dare I say, humiliation that the agreement they approved has been renegotiated behind closed doors."

More recently, he said that Sinn Féin, the Governments and other parties must reject the comprehensive agreement, because it undermines the Belfast Agreement. We cannot have it both ways. He cannot say, on the one hand, that this all has to be rejected because it undermines the agreement and then, on the other hand, say that there is only minor tweaking and all the rest of it. Those are fundamental issues that have to be addressed, and will be addressed. No matter about the Committee on the Preparation for Government and the discussions, we know what sort of legislation is coming, and when we see that legislation, we will see changes to the Belfast Agreement. There will be a different form of devolution from what we had previously. Mr Durkan took a particular view there, and I hope that he has moved on a bit and that he realises that we are in a different situation from what was voted on previously. That will not stand, because it did not withstand the test of democracy or the test of time.

2.45 pm

There are several other issues that I would like to address, but I do not have time. One example is North/South bodies. No one today has — or ever had — any difficulty with cross-border bodies that operate for the mutual benefit of people, either in Northern Ireland or in the Irish Republic. However, I picked up on an interesting remark that Mr McFarland made. He referred to the need for a North/South dimension because it addressed an Irishness aspect that had to be recognised. He used words to that effect; I will read his comments more carefully in Hansard tomorrow. In my view, we must deal with North/South cross-border bodies on the basis of sensible and practical co-operation, not on the basis of political considerations. We start to go wrong when we state that we need those types of institutions for political reasons.

Mr McFarland: Will the Member give way?

(Madam Speaker in the Chair)

Mr N Dodds: No. The Member has made his speech. Other members of his party are present and have not spoken, such as Mr McClarty and Mr Beggs. They could speak on this matter after me, and deal with this issue.

I look forward to hearing from them, but I will not give up my time.

The desire for North/South bodies for political reasons is fundamentally in error, and that is what is wrong with that approach.

Strand three issues — the east-west relationship — must be addressed. Those issues did not emerge in the Belfast Agreement. We are dealing with those matters now, but our recognition of the value of enhancing those arrangements goes way back to 1991. One of the great failings of those who negotiated the Belfast Agreement was the way in which the North/South arrangements were greatly enhanced at the expense — and to the detriment — of east-west relations. That matter must be looked at very carefully.

There are other matters that I would have liked to address, but time beats me. On that note, we look forward to the negotiations in Scotland, but on the basis that whatever form it takes, whether voluntary, mandatory, or whatever, there will be no one in Government who is not committed to exclusively peaceful and democratic means — unlike what went before.

Mr S Wilson: I do not know whether I will be the last Member ever to speak in the current Assembly, which has existed for the last few years. However, I suppose that the omens are a bit better because at least the Member for South Down is not going to be allowed to be the last Member to speak. He is, as we all know, the political Jonah of institutions in Northern Ireland. In 1992, he was the last Member of the Prior Assembly to speak, and down it went. In the previous Assembly, he was the last Member to speak, and down it went. I will not let him intervene at the end of my speech, in case he also casts a jinx on this Assembly.

I make it clear that it is not our wish that this should be the last opportunity for this Assembly to sit, but it will be unless there is movement from the party that is putting up the barriers and the obstacles to the establishment of democratic and stable government in Northern Ireland. I say to the pro-agreement parties that, over the next weeks, they must stop pussyfooting around the sensitivities of Sinn Féin. If these institutions are not to fall, we must collectively bring a dose of reality to the thinking within Sinn Féin. I am afraid that, to date, that record has not been very good.

We have had a debate on policing, and there are two important related issues that must be addressed. First, we must address the attitude of parties in this Assembly towards law and order, the rule of law, and those who have to uphold the rule of law — the police. The SDLP has, on occasion, talked tough and insisted that Sinn Féin should sign up to policing and the rule of law, and should turn its back on criminality. However, when it has come to making that a condition for sitting in Government, the SDLP has shied away, because it knows that that is a bar that Sinn Féin cannot and will not clear. Rather than stick to that as a requirement, the SDLP has sought to lower the bar. The SDLP, the British Government and the Irish Government might be prepared to lower that bar. I am not sure where the Ulster Unionist Party stands on that matter at present. Some of them do, and some of them do not, want to lower the bar.

The DUP will not be lowering the bar, because we believe that the signing up to policing and justice by all parties is an essential ingredient for a devolved Administration.

The mechanics of the institutions must also be addressed, and that is what the 'Report on Institutional Issues' is about. We may well find ourselves in a situation in which our Government include people who distrust one another. It is, therefore, important that safety mechanisms are built into any agreement to ensure that, in the absence of trust, there is at least a mechanism to ensure that Ministers cannot go off and do their own thing, as happened under the Belfast Agreement.

The Member for South Down Margaret Ritchie, who is not in the Chamber, said that the menu is in front of us. She described the Belfast Agreement as a menu to which there can be no à la carte approach. One must eat the lot, or one does not eat any of it.

Mr Kennedy: Sammy Wilson has eaten too much.

Mr S Wilson: I have eaten too much of it, and I do not intend to suffer further indigestion by eating parts of the menu that the DUP finds unacceptable. Ms Ritchie has said that the menu is delightful, and she alleges that the institutions worked. The institutions collapsed three times in four years, so that is hardly a good endorsement of what we had under the Belfast Agreement.

If devolution is restored, the DUP will aim to ensure that the devolved Government lasts, is stable, is not stop-go, and is one that gives some degree of certainty. That is why the institutions must be changed.

There has been a huddling together today of some pro-agreement negotiators and those who negotiated the Belfast Agreement. Members including the Member for South Belfast Michael McGimpsey, on this side of the Chamber, and the Member for North Antrim Dr Farren, on the other side of the Chamber, have told us that any recommended changes can be brought about by a simple tinkering with the operation of the agreement. Dr Farren said that the issues to be addressed are all within the agreement.

As the Member for North Belfast has previously told me, the SDLP leader does not share that view. He said that the issues negotiated in the comprehensive agreement undermined the Belfast Agreement. One might ask what issues were addressed in the comprehensive agreement. The issues addressed were: a ministerial code; collective responsibility; ministerial responsibility; the accountability of Ministers on North/South bodies; and the requirement to uphold the rule of law. Strangely, those issues are also included in the list of 20 proposals that were agreed by the PFG Committee on which SDLP Members sat.

It is fine with me if the SDLP wants to have some political cover by saying that what is being negotiated is still the agreement. When those issues were negotiated in the comprehensive agreement, the SDLP leader said that it undermined the Belfast Agreement. However, SDLP representatives have sat down with us in the PFG Committee; they have talked about those very issues, and they have agreed that they must be addressed.

Some Members have said that there could be no change made to the agreement — however they may wish to present their remarks or dress them up — but the DUP is happy that some issues are being addressed. Those issues must be sorted out if there is to be stable Government in Northern Ireland.

The SDLP and the Ulster Unionists have said that the DUP does not have the moral courage to lead people and to take them down the right road. The DUP has the moral courage. However, although we will go into Government, certain conditions must be met. If Sinn Féin is to be included in Government, it has to do two things. First, it must renounce its criminal past and disassociate itself from criminals, and, secondly, it must face up to the issue of policing. If those conditions are met, there will be inclusive government.

To include in Government people whom one does not trust, such safeguards are necessary. That is why those changes are essential. They are not, as the Member for Newry and Armagh Mr Kennedy said, simply face-saving changes. They are required in order to ensure the stability of any future institutions. That is why they are so important. Those are issues that must be addressed.

The DUP will go to St Andrews with a united voice, although some Members today have tried to imagine that there are splits in the party. Our manifesto commitment was clear: if Sinn Féin did not sign up to policing arrangements and disassociation from criminality, it could not have a place in Government; if that changed, the situation could change. If we have to say no, we will say no. If we have to say yes, we will say yes. However, do not mistake saying no for simply going with the flow. We will not go with the flow. It does not matter what kind of pressure is put on us.

People in Northern Ireland deserve workable and sustainable devolved government. They do not deserve a shoddy deal, and they will not be getting one at St Andrews, I can assure them of that.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That the Assembly notes the work of the Committee on the Preparation for Government and the report on Institutional Issues.

Madam Speaker: I shall refer the decision of the Assembly to the Secretary of State.

Adjourned at 2.58 pm.

Committee on the Preparation for Government

COMMITTEE ON THE PREPARATION FOR GOVERNMENT

Monday 14 August 2006

Members in attendance for all or part of proceedings:

The Chairman, Mr Francie Molloy
Mr Gregory Campbell
Dr Seán Farren
Mr David Ford
Mr Danny Kennedy
Ms Patricia Lewsley
Mrs Naomi Long
Mr Alan McFarland
Mr Michael McGimpsey
Mr Conor Murphy
Mr John O'Dowd
Mr Peter Robinson

The Committee met at 10.03 am.

(The Chairman (Mr Molloy) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Members, let us begin. I remind members to switch off their mobile phones completely. Hansard lost part of the recording from Friday's sitting because of mobile phone interference.

Are any members deputising for other members from their party?

Mr O'Dowd: I am here on behalf of Michelle Gildernew.

Mr P J Bradley: I could toss a coin to decide whether I am Mark Durkan or Alasdair McDonnell. I am more like Mark, I think.

Mr Ford: Naomi and I are representing ourselves.

Mr McFarland: Mr McGimpsey is representing Mr McNarry. Mr Kennedy is due shortly.

Mr P Robinson: Gregory and I are representing all three DUP members.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are members content with the minutes of the meeting of 7 August?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Last Monday, several members, particularly Alan McFarland, asked for a paper to be written that outlines the structure of Committee Bills and the drafting services that are available to Committees. A paper has been prepared. If members have any further queries about that issue, they should alert the Committee Clerk.

We shall move to our discussion on institutional issues. Am I correct to assume that members do not need to state any declarations of interest?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The updated list of institutional issues is before members. We dealt with a number of the issues at the meeting on 7 August, when the Committee decided to resume its discussions at 'Stability'. Are members content to open with that issue?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The main issue on 'Stability' was raised in the DUP submission. Therefore, perhaps the DUP would like to open the discussion.

Mr P Robinson: The aim is to avoid continual suspensions due to the behaviour — usually outside the Assembly — of parties or those linked to them. The Independent Monitoring Commission (IMC) has a role in that, but because a veto is available, it cannot exercise that role, as that requires the support of both sections of the community as represented in the Assembly. That means that the only option is to fall back on the Secretary of State, and I do not think that anyone would consider that to be a safe option.

Therefore, the IMC requires further power, which is what the DUP asked for originally. The DUP requested that the IMC be given some real teeth, so that, rather than relying on the Secretary of State, and having only the power to make recommendations, it would have the power to take decisions where vetoes could otherwise be used.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Hansard shows that Sinn Féin also has issues with 'Stability'.

Mr Murphy: The 'Stability' issue that Sinn Féin raised is the 2000 Act, which brought in suspension provisions. It is no secret that Sinn Féin has stated, both at the time and since, that such legislation is outside the terms of the Good Friday Agreement. The British Government introduced it unilaterally. The suspension mechanism allows parties to jump out of the institutions at the first hint of trouble, and it has been shown, particularly with the last suspension, that issues that have caused people to jump out of the institutions have been found to be huge smokescreens.

In Sinn Féin's view, that legislation contributed significantly to instability. If walking out of the institutions had triggered elections and given the people their say on the issues that had caused the collapse of the Executive, Sinn Féin thinks that more thought would have been given on walking out.

The 2000 Act added to the instability. That is not to say that there were no issues of concern or that the institutions did not face any difficulties from 1998 until now but, in our view, the existence of suspension legislation significantly added to the instability and allowed the much easier option of shutting down the institutions at every turn. If my memory serves me correctly, there were four suspensions. We made it clear to the British Government — and they have accepted — that the abolition of the 2000 Act and the ending of the British Secretary of State's ability to suspend the institutions on a whim should accompany the reinstatement of the institutions.

Mr McFarland: It is worth reminding ourselves that the reasons for the suspension of the institutions were the activities of the Provisional IRA and their Sinn Féin colleagues in Government. The whole issue of safeguards has dogged this process right from the beginning, whether Sinn Féin and the IRA were going to decommission, or whether in fact they were seriously intending to play a proper part in the Assembly. The Northern Ireland Act 2000 was introduced as a safeguard. Rather than crash the entire process, it provides for a time out to suspend the Assembly, to examine what had happened and why, and, if that could be put right, to fire it up again.

In theory, the Government will not get up and running again until the DUP is happy that Sinn Féin is ready for Government, and that all the outstanding issues are cleared. Technically though, we begin with everyone happy that everyone else should be in Government — otherwise, presumably, we shall not get past first base. The question then becomes: if things have settled down, but one party or another is engaged in some nefarious activity, how do we deal with that?

Our view is that the Northern Ireland Act 2000 should remain for a specified period of time. We must ensure that if the institutions are fired up again, and if the south Derry battalion of the IRA — which has just seceded from the movement, with its weapons, in upset at what the leadership are doing — or the group in east Tyrone decides that it is not happy and is messing around, there must be some sanction to suspend the system, examine what has happened, and deal with the culprits.

Although we can see that, in the longer term, the 2000 Act could be set aside once stability has been achieved, now is not the time to do that. We must buy ourselves some time with the 2000 Act in place, so that if people are messing around, we can suspend the institutions, examine what has happened and impose the necessary sanctions.

Mr O'Dowd: It follows that if the mid-Ulster brigade of the UVF misbehaves again, we should also call into question the role of the Ulster Unionist Party Assembly Group (UUPAG). We must make politics dominant. We must ensure that politics wins the day. As politicians, we must strive to ensure that the institutions are robustly defended against any outside force that would attempt to bring them down. We do not need legislation for that; we need confidence in ourselves and in our communities.

Dr Farren: From the outset, the SDLP's position in this debate has been that if the Executive collapses, there is no reason for all the other elements of the agreement to be suspended. If the problem is the inability to form an Executive, then, after the statutory period to test that has passed, there should be a move to restore the Assembly and the other institutions with the two Governments seeking approval from the Assembly and appointing an Executive drawn from outside the pool of Assembly Members. The SDLP published those proposals a long time ago and we still advocate them in the case of the collapse of an Executive.

10.15 am

Mr Ford: Clearly, no one can be satisfied with the Assembly remaining liable to suspension at any time, effectively at the whim of the Secretary of State. There are provisions for the removal — or temporary suspension — of Ministers from office, partly through the IMC legislation that gives that responsibility firmly to the Assembly. The potential for removing Ministers from office for a period of time will apply only if, for example, in the case of misbehaviour by the UVF, the DUP is prepared to stand up to the Ulster Unionist Party Assembly Group and similarly, in the case of misbehaviour by the IRA, if the SDLP is prepared to stand up to Sinn Féin. That was where we ran into problems in the past.

However, the IMC legislation allows the Secretary of State limited powers to remove Ministers without suspending the entire Executive. The Alliance Party's view is that it is preferable to keep in office those Ministers who are democratically elected, accountable to the Assembly and not misbehaving, rather than end up with the potential for replacing the entire Executive with undemocratically appointed commissioners. The IMC legislation provides scope to carry things forward, but the first question is whether the Assembly is prepared to follow through on the IMC reports.

Mr P Robinson: Let us be clear that the suspension legislation is mere window dressing. It is a one-day measure in Parliament: the Government can repeal it today, and pass it again tomorrow. Some people may want that fig leaf of cover, which will not exercise anyone too much because people know that, if required, the Government can legislate speedily, as they have shown in the past. It would be more convenient for the legislation to remain, but that is a matter for those who have to find time for legislation at Westminster.

People are avoiding the problem that would arise should the scenario that Alan McFarland mentioned come about, wherein a judgement is made that it is possible to set up an Executive. All the available intelligence, the IMC and the general community on the ground may well support that judgement. However, everyone knows that the IRA retains its capacity for criminality and, six months down the road, it could be the Ulster Bank's turn to be robbed. The outcome of that would be that no unionist would remain in an Executive with Sinn Féin. That would result either in suspension or in the entire Executive being brought down. Clearly, the people who should be punished in those circumstances are the individuals identified as having links with those who robbed the Ulster Bank — not the rest of the community.

Why should the community lose its political structures because of the actions of one organisation? There must be provision for those individuals to be expelled or suspended. That cannot happen under the existing legislation, because Sinn Féin would hold a veto in those circumstances. Everyone knows that the British and Irish Governments would not have the guts to act and therefore the whole show would collapse. Is that what people want? Are people willing to face up to that?

If Sinn Féin has turned over a new leaf, it will have nothing to worry about, and there should be no excitement in its ranks. If Sinn Féin is so convinced that it is squeaky clean, it will not want to resist any change in this area. Why would an innocent man have anything to worry about in those circumstances?

Mr McGimpsey: At the time, the UUP regarded suspension legislation as important, and we still do. We saw it as fail-safe legislation in case things went wrong. The initial institutional set-up was a gamble, and the odds were stacked against its success, so we wanted to be able to get out without much trouble. That issue also locked in Tony Blair. Peter Robinson is correct about the sovereignty of Parliament — Northern Ireland is part of the United Kingdom and Westminster is sovereign. If Westminster repeals that legislation, it can re-enact it tomorrow. However, if Blair and company get rid of the Act, they will never take that power back. They will do everything in their power to avoid suspension legislation, as they did before.

Peter is also correct to say that unionists will not remain in Government with Sinn Féin if there is a repeat performance of February 2000, when what was supposed to happen did not happen. Sinn Féin was aware what would happen if it did not do what it was supposed to do, or what republicans were supposed to do. When that did not happen, we were set for a crash. The question is whether we want scorched earth or a crash that can be repaired.

Seán Farren said that if the Executive went down, everything else should stay in place. However, that cannot happen, because there is interdependence in the institutions; strands one, two and three are dependent on one another. If strand one goes, strands two and three must also go. Under strand two, North/South bodies are supposed to deal with care and maintenance, because they are dependent on strand one.

A great deal is being asked of unionism in entering into an arrangement with no suspension legislation in place. Unionists will not remain in Government if there is a repeat of February 2000, but guess who will get the blame for crashing the democratic institutions? The purpose of the legislation was to avoid that.

The British Government also have a role to play. There was clear thinking about putting suspension legislation in place. If the institutions get up and running again — and that is a gamble — they will not be mature enough to continue into the foreseeable future without suspension legislation. I do not see any measures in strand one that would allow the institutions to expel Sinn Féin. Therefore, we will return to the previous situation in which the whole system remains hostage to republican intentions.

Mr Murphy: Sinn Féin contends that the system remains hostage to the whisperings of people in Special Branch and other agencies who have political axes to grind. We are confident that there will be no accusations against us, or against anyone associated with us. However, all it takes is a leak from someone in Special Branch, MI5 or some other agency, for Sinn Féin to be tried and found guilty within 24 hours. If that is the sort of mindset with which members are heading back into the institutions, it highlights the fact that we are in for an unstable time. We will not allow ourselves to be tried and found guilty by the IMC, or any other such agency that relies on reports from people who were sworn enemies for a long time, and who, over the years, have been interfering in a political fashion in the democratic process here. Our contention is that if we are in Government, it is on the basis of our electoral mandate — people voted for us to be in Government.

Ultimately, the people will decide whether Sinn Féin or any other party is fit for Government. Other parties want a safety net of suspension that can be triggered in the aftermath of reports by agencies to the IMC. In fact, we have seen recently that it does not even take the IMC — all it takes is someone to leak a word in someone's ear and suddenly there is a crisis which must be responded to.

That may be the type of institutions that other people think they want, but they will soon discover them to be unstable, because there are people in the security agencies who have been working to their own agenda, who have political agendas and who have axes to grind. I am confident that — as has been proved — the accusations do not stack up. However, the difficulty is that every time an accusation is made, unionism goes into crisis and into a tailspin and rushes for the door of the Executive. If that is the type of institution that some members want, they will find that it will not survive very long, because someone will make an accusation in order to destabilise unionism.

We must have the confidence in our own ability to sustain and work the institutions; we do not need safety mechanisms from the British Government or from any other agency. I am confident that we can do that. However, relying on the IMC or on other mechanisms for exclusion or soft landings — as some people are wishing for — is an unstable basis on which to start the reinstatement of the institutions.

Mr P Robinson: Let us dispense with the notion that the Northern Bank robbery was merely the result of some Special Branch individual's whispering — it was not a whisper; it was a significant gulder. That robbery was not the figment of the Special Branch's imagination — the IRA's responsibility was recognised by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and the Prime Minister of the Republic of Ireland. The IRA's responsibility was also recognised by the police forces and the intelligence services on both sides of the border. However, the republican movement is still in denial, as it would be if it were the Ulster Bank that was robbed next time. That is why these issues must be dealt with.

Michael McGimpsey shares my unease about relying on a British Government — present or future. A Government that are not prepared to bring forward a new Act are unlikely to use existing legislation. That is why I put less faith in the suspension-legislation option than in the more secure mechanism of removing a party that was involved in such behaviour. The suspension proposition is one by which everybody will be punished, and that is not fair.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do we have any proposals on this matter?

Mr McFarland: The IMC contains a mechanism to identify what happens when any party is not playing by the rules. Is Peter Robinson suggesting that the Government should have separate new legislation to remove a party?

Mr P Robinson: I am suggesting that the legislation be changed so that an IMC report would be sufficient to remove a party. Such a motion will not be successful in the Assembly because there are vetoes there, and we will not get any action from Governments who will be looking at the political rather than the security or criminal issues involved.

Mr McFarland: The IMC was established through an agreement between the British and Irish Governments, with accompanying legislation. Therefore, for any modification, there would have to be an acceptance between Dublin and London to amend the legislation in their respective jurisdictions. Is that the outworking of what is being suggested?

Mr P Robinson: The legislation that would affect the Assembly would be the United Kingdom legislation.

Mr McFarland: Would the legislation in Dublin and London have to be changed to enable the IMC to have the power to remove a party from the institutions?

Mr P Robinson: I am not sure, but it would require a change to the agreement. I am not sure whether that requires a change to the legislation in the Irish Republic.

A change to the legislation in the United Kingdom would certainly be required, because it is a United Kingdom institution. That is a legal matter.

10.30am

Mr McFarland: That mechanism comes from the IMC, which was created by a separate agreement, which was then put into legislation on both sides of the border. Are we now beefing up the IMC's ability? At the moment the IMC makes its report and the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland takes action. The Dublin Government are not involved; there was a long and specific row about that at the time. The logic of what is being proposed, as I understand it, is that, once the IMC says that party A is guilty, the law dictates that there is an automatic suspension, so that process will bypass the Secretary of State?

Mr P Robinson: Some formal process might have to be introduced; we would need to speak to the lawyers. The Secretary of State might have to take action, but it would be mandatory for him to do so — in terms of authority to Parliament he may have to do it.

Mr Murphy: To correct Alan on one point, the Secretary of State is not required to take action. That is clear because the IMC recommended financial sanctions against the PUP, which is now the UUP's sister party. However, the Secretary of State, while imposing financial sanctions on Sinn Féin, did not feel that it was necessary to impose financial sanctions on the PUP, despite a recommendation to do so. Therefore he is clearly not required to act under any recommendation from the IMC.

I want to make it clear that we do not accept the IMC's right to judge our party or any other political party in this Assembly. The parties are here as a right of their mandate, and the people who judge their suitability for office are the people who vote. Therefore we would not accept the IMC sitting in judgement on any party, particularly our own.

If we were to make proposals, they would be to get rid of the IMC and do away with the 2000 Act. However, I do not presume from the discussions today that there is any sense in making proposals because I cannot see consensus being reached. At the same time, there would not be consensus from Sinn Féin to beef up the IMC in any regard or to retain suspension legislation.

We can discuss how the IMC can be beefed up, but I assure you that there will be no consensus from us.

Mr O'Dowd: We are getting ourselves into a tailspin about how to exclude parties. The evidence used by the IMC would not be enough for a disciplinary hearing against a member of the Assembly staff, never mind the exclusion of a democratically elected Government party. The ability to deny the democratic rights of a large section of society is very precariously based.

If a senior unionist MLA had his offices, including his council offices, searched as part of a fraud enquiry, would Sinn Féin walk away from Government? If, for instance, an Ulster Resistance weapon were used to kill a Catholic or added to the growing list of Protestants who have been murdered since suspension, would Sinn Féin walk away from Government? No, we would not. We would stick in there and ensure that the sanctity of the institutions remains supreme and that we build politics. That is what this process is about. None of the parties who are sitting here can be sanctimonious about the past or the future. Let us debate how we include people instead of excluding them and how we build inclusive institutions and an inclusive Executive.

Mr Campbell: I took from this heading of "Stability" that we were talking about circumstances. We have hit the buffers on three occasions in similar circumstances. In some respects, that is why we have been having these discussions in recent weeks.

Enduring stability is not about the specific exclusion of any particular political party. However, the stability mechanism is designed to ensure that, when an independent assessor—in the form of the IMC—has identified one or more political parties that are part of the Executive as being party to one or a series of criminal or terrorist acts, that stability is such as to allow the Executive to continue to function, despite that activity. For us and, I know, for others, it would be intolerable that the Executive should continue as though the act had not occurred. The integrity of the institution would be at stake. As Mr Robinson pointed out, one simply could not participate in an institution if an Ulster Bank robbery took place that was a mark II of the Northern Bank robbery.

Therefore there has to be a mechanism that protects the integrity of the devolved institution, ensures continuing stability and upholds the right of the people to continue to have that devolved institution. That mechanism must ensure that those who are guilty of being party to certain activities know that those activities have to stop and that their continued participation in a devolved institution is not just threatened but reaches an automatic cessation point because of those activities. Participation would be restored at the point either when those activities cease or when sufficient time has passed to ensure that they do not recur.

That is what stability means. It is not about specifically excluding people and walking away from government; it is about trying to ensure that government continues despite the activities that some people have engaged in. It is also about trying to ensure that such activities do not occur again and that if they do, people will have to pay a penalty.

Mrs Long: There are a couple of things that I want to pick up on. First, the suitability to hold office is not simply based on a mandate. It is also based on people being willing to take a pledge of office, accept a ministerial code, and live up to both those things. To say that suitability is just about a mandate is simply not correct; it is about more than that.

It is entirely conceivable that any politician, or indeed, any group of politicians, might pay lip service to a pledge of office and a ministerial code but not live up to them in practice. In any democratic society there are conditions in which such people would need to be removed from office. However, in other democratic societies that would not mean the collapse of government; it would simply mean the individual or party being removed from office while government continues.

In that respect, the Alliance Party would be sympathetic to mechanisms that are likely to be able to address conceivable difficulties that might arise during the term of an Assembly without having to collapse the entire Executive and the Assembly. We certainly would not want that to happen.

I am not sure that the British Government would accept giving powers directly to the IMC. The Government agreed to the IMC on the basis that they should retain the power to act at the final decision point. If, for example, the Assembly could not make up its mind about sanctions, or if it failed on a cross-community vote to adopt sanctions that were proposed, it would fall back to the British Government, albeit in consultation with the Irish Government and the Assembly, to make such decisions.

Whatever the decision or the outcome of our discussions, the British Government are not likely to cede that power to any other body. I am not really sure that the British Government would adopt a position whereby the IMC would produce information and take the final decision.

Dr Farren: We are essentially talking about the confidence that is necessary between parties, particularly those that would form the Executive. They should be totally committed, not only to working the institutions but to doing so within the context of the law—passively and actively—so that all the parties fully support the adherence to and upholding of the law and, indeed, support the agents—in other words the police and security services—who are there to ensure that the law is upheld and implemented.

Therefore, parties that fail in that respect are not contributing in any way to the confidence that is necessary to sustain the institutions.

Sinn Féin is the only party that does not currently lend its full support to the police and security services. It must cross that bridge and make that major commitment. If that commitment were made and seen to have been actively followed up, it would go a long way to developing the confidence that is essential to sustain the institutions.

The current discussion must take full account of commitments to, and upholding of, the law, and support for the agencies of the law.

Mr Ford: I shall follow up the DUP's suggestions about the IMC and add to Naomi's comments.

There must be some mechanism to ensure continuity in the event of illegal activity by those who are linked to parties in the Assembly or, more specifically, the Executive. The DUP proposed that the IMC be given the power to impose sanctions. When the Alliance Party proposed to the two Governments the creation of the IMC, they were not entirely happy about the process, largely because the then leader of the Ulster Unionist Party made a similar proposal at the same time. That proposal included giving the IMC the power to impose sanctions. The British Government were unwilling to give the IMC that power, favouring instead powers of investigation, reporting and recommendation.

In those circumstances, we must be realistic and recognise that there is no likelihood that the Governments will have changed their minds. The 2003 Act that established the International Monitoring Commission makes it clear that the power to regulate the IMC's activities should initially rest with the Assembly, but with a backstop in the form of the British Government should the Assembly fail to take action.

Our fundamental problem is that circumstances might arise in which certain Members believe that those who are linked closely to one party are not behaving themselves, and another party that is perhaps on the same side of the community designation divide takes the view that those Members are not that bad. In those circumstances, there is a major problem with any powers resting with the Assembly, if the Assembly is required to act on a designation-led, so-called cross-community vote. Some type of backstop must be found. Clearly, we hope that we do not need it, but experience unfortunately shows that something of that nature is required.

Mrs Long: Seán Farren made a useful point about democratic credentials for Government. He also raised the issue of the rule of law and our understanding of it. That plays a role as regards confidence-building because there must be some form of shared acceptance of what the rule of law entails — and it must be much more than simply signing up to policing structures, which seems to be the current focus.

A party can sign up to policing structures and at the same time disregard the rule of law. There is something contradictory in that requirement; it would not, of itself, eliminate the potential need for a Member, or a party, to be removed from office in the future. Even with the same understanding of the rule of law, people might break it. An issue remains about what would happen if a party were in default of the underlying principles of being fit for Government.

I do not see this simply in a Sinn Féin dimension; it is more fundamental and wide-ranging because it requires all parties — not just one — to sign up to certain standards if they wish to be in Government. Unless the discussion is focused in a more wide-ranging way, it is likely that resistance will come from Sinn Féin, because the mechanism appears to aim for exclusion of Sinn Féin. I prefer to see it as a mechanism for ensuring that Government is in no way sullied or held to ransom by the activities of people who are outside Government but linked to parties within it.

The discussion must be kept in broad terms, rather than focusing on particular parties, because any party could potentially find itself in that situation. There could well be circumstances in which parties that feel uncomfortable with the discussion may wish to see this legislation used against parties other than Sinn Féin.

10.45 am

Mr Murphy: We are not arguing on the basis that it has an impact only on Sinn Féin. I made it quite clear that we would not accept the IMC sitting in judgement on any party. Attention has focused on us, and I remind people that that is in the context of it being one year on from the IRA disposing of all its weaponry and instructing its volunteers to engage in no activities whatever. We are still in this circular discussion, and the unionists are trying to get a clause included that will allow Sinn Féin to be thrown out at the first sign of trouble.

I do not accept the IMC simply on the basis that it has had a negative impact on our party; I do not accept it on the basis that it applies no standards of proof that would be acceptable anywhere else. Its membership has its own political bias, and its recommendations and reports have been shown to be highly flawed. As I said, the Secretary of State can decide to act on one series of recommendations but not on another. For all those reasons I do not accept the IMC.

Naomi made the point that it is not just a party's mandate that dictates whether it is entitled to sit in Government. The Committee on Standards and Privileges can decide whether individuals have breached the Pledge of Office. However, it is not the case that one party can sit in judgement on an opposing political party and decide that it can throw it out of the Government. Parties have a choice about forming a Government in other circumstances; however, these are not normal democratic circumstances.

Seán Farren's point started to creep into the realms of precondition. We have made clear our view about what needs to be done on outstanding policing matters, and our proposed course of action on that has been achieved. It is interesting to note that, particularly when you consider the intelligence-gathering powers that MI5 is being given, the SDLP gives full support not only to the police, but to the security agencies. Having said that, Sinn Féin's position on policing is quite clear. That discussion could take place here; however, another part of this Committee meets to discuss policing issues, and that discussion would probably be best carried out there.

This discussion is in the context of the actions that the IRA took last year. It is amazing that we are having a circular discussion on how to draft a clause from the unionist perspective — forget about how the Alliance Party or the SDLP feel — that will enable Sinn Féin to be excluded from Government. That shows how far we have to go to get the institutions functioning on a satisfactory basis.

Mrs Long: In other democratic societies, if parties are partners in a coalition Government, they can sit in judgement on other parties.

Mr Murphy: In normal democratic circumstances a party can walk out of a coalition, but these are not normal democratic circumstances.

Mrs Long: We are supposed to be trying to move towards normal democratic circumstances; that is the point of this process. If one party refuses to govern with another that it judges for valid reasons to be unfit, it does not necessarily mean that Government falls. That is the difference here. It is a ludicrous proposition that a democratic society, however abnormal it may be at the moment, can have a party in Government that none of the other parties in that coalition have confidence in. That cannot be sustained in the long term. A short-term crisis of confidence is one thing; a long-term lack of confidence is something entirely different.

Mr Murphy: We had a previous discussion about the make-up of the Executive. If the Alliance Party proposes to change the Good Friday Agreement and people's entitlement to be in Government on the basis of their mandate, perhaps that is where that proposition should have been made.

Mrs Long: I think it was.

Mr Murphy: We had this discussion last week. These are not normal democratic circumstances. People are entitled to be in the Government on the basis of their mandate. That is what the Good Friday Agreement allows for. In normal democratic circumstances — and that is what we are aiming for — people can choose to go into coalition, or they can choose not to go into a coalition. They can also choose who their partners will be in that coalition.

Mrs Long: Conor, do you claim that —

Mr Murphy: If I may just finish. In that circumstance, people can choose whom their partners in coalition Government may be. In the circumstances that exist here, people are entitled to be in Government on the basis of their mandate. I do not think that in normal democratic circumstances parties could claim to have no interest in sitting in judgement on whether another party is fit for Government.

Mrs Long: Is that irrespective of an individual's or party's adherence to, for example, a ministerial code or Pledge of Office? You are saying that their entitlement to be in Government is irrespective of any acceptance of democratic norms, that it is an entitlement, fair and square, without anything else having an impact on it. Is that your position?

Mr Murphy: No. What I am saying clearly is that individuals who hold executive office have to abide by the Pledge of Office.

Mrs Long: If they do not, what are the sanctions?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): One at a time, please.

Mr Murphy: The sanctions are there. If you are proposing to change the Good Friday Agreement, perhaps you should have said so last week. There are sanctions in the agreement. People who are nominated for ministerial office must affirm the Pledge of Office and abide by that. If they do not, there are sanctions available to have them removed from office for a specified period. That does not exclude their party; the nominating officer of that party can nominate someone else. If that person behaves in a similar fashion, the same sanctions will apply. I fully support that. It is part of the agreement that I signed up to and that you signed up to.

We did not sign up to a set of sanctions whereby other parties in Government could decide that one party and its entire membership, not just those in Executive office, is not fit for government.

Mr P Robinson: Let us be clear: the Belfast Agreement — and I am not one of its supporters — also had a mechanism for the exclusion of parties in those circumstances. I find it disturbing that Sinn Féin does not want to have a mechanism that can ensure stability if a party behaves in a way that clearly shows that it is not committed to exclusively peaceful and democratic means. I cannot see why any party would resist the inclusion of such a mechanism unless it intended to abuse the process in the future. Therefore the resistance of Sinn Féin probably makes unionists more suspicious.

There are several points that flow directly from that. Of course this is not the normal democratic situation; there are no democratic norms for a mandatory coalition of this type. That is why it becomes all the more important that a mechanism to sanction exists if people abuse their entry into Government through a mandate in order to be in Government while at the same time carrying out such activities that are patently contrary to any principle of democratic government. That was recognised in the Belfast Agreement, although that agreement never had the mechanisms that would have allowed sanctions to kick in. The Belfast Agreement permitted vetoes under the voting system that allowed for exclusion, so it was meaningless. The principle was enunciated, but the mechanisms to realise that principle were not put in place.

The IMC scenario does exactly the same thing. It puts in place the principle but does not have the mechanisms that would realistically allow for exclusion. If the principle is right, it must be backed up by the proper mechanisms.

Mr McGimpsey: I do not want to prolong this discussion, Chairman — there is not going to be a meeting of minds. If this place gets up and running again, it will be via a political deal. However, we do not exist in a bubble; the history goes back decades and tempers our views as we go forward. The deal in November 1999 that allowed us to go forward was a gamble, and we knew that it was a gamble that probably would not come off at that time. Part of the gamble was to make sure that we were not locked in and that we had an exit if we needed one. That exit was the suspension legislation, the Northern Ireland Act 2000. It seems to me, given three live failures plus a further one that was not quite live and saw the Northern Bank raid, that it is a bigger gamble now than it ever was.

We must be aware of that and factor it in. Conor's view may be to dogmatically adhere to every dot and tittle of the agreement, but I do not believe that that will wash. When the Assembly was set up, internal measures were created to deal with such issues. However, they were not adequate and were never going to be adequate. To proceed without adequate measures could result in scorched earth, a complete collapse of everything: back to square one, year zero. Alternatively, a suspension would allow us to reconsider matters before going forward. That is what we have now. It is valuable and we must hold on to it.

It does not help when Conor says, "We have made those arguments and the British Government have accepted them, so that is it — the comprehensive agreement it is." We do not buy into that. We do not accept it. It may be that a deal is possible, but the London Government must consider that if they take a gamble and repeal the suspension legislation, they could lose unionism. That is a decision that they would have to make. I felt strongly in 1999 that the deal was a gamble; as things stand it is a bigger gamble now than it was then. We must all face up to that.

Mr Murphy: If that was the intention of suspension legislation, it has not had the outcome that the Ulster Unionist Party intended. There was no "pause". The Assembly has been suspended since 2002. That is a long pause during which to assess what can be done in the circumstances. Suspension legislation has raised a huge question mark over the sustainability of the institution. Since 2002, 108 MLAs have been elected and paid their salaries, but they cannot do their jobs. That has caused huge scepticism of the institutions among the general public. Suspension has not had the impact that the Ulster Unionist Party thought at the time that it would have. Instead, it has raised questions about the credibility of the institutions and their functions.

Michael is correct about one thing: we do not exist in a bubble. There is experience and history behind the politics here. Sinn Féin's experience is that when unionists have been able to exclude us from having a meaningful role in any of the institutions, they have done so. When people within the security agencies or the Police Service were able to have a malign influence on the political process, they did. That is why we would not leave ourselves in hock to those people's judgement of our democratic credentials.

It is not a matter of our wishing to have a facility whereby republicans can default on anything that is expected of them under the terms of the agreement, and get off with it. It is about our experience of unionists and their abuse of power, and of those within the security agencies who have supported and encouraged abuse of power, and of where that has largely been directed. That is what governs our attitude to the IMC, to suspension legislation, and to placing the democratic institutions under the whim of people within the security agencies and the British Government.

Mr McFarland: Does Conor accept that the suspensions were directly related to the activities of the republican movement, or lack of them, and therefore the loss of unionist confidence? That is what it was about.

The IRA statement of July 2005 may prove to be a watershed. However, the matter is not about Sinn Féin's exclusion. The republican movement prides itself on its discipline. Is Conor saying that he does not have confidence in that discipline, confidence that there will be no future incidents? Unionists are still worried about that. If the safeguards that relate to suspension are left, Sinn Féin should be fully confident that they would never be needed anyway, because the republican movement is coherent and its members will all adhere to their instructions. The safeguards are a confidence-building measure for unionists. If Sinn Féin is confident that the republican movement is not going to start wobbling, those measures will never be needed, so what is the problem?

Mr Murphy: Perhaps Alan will explain what caused the last suspension in 2002. He says it was republican inactivity.

However, who was behind pulling down the institutions? Who was behind the raid on our offices? Who was behind the spoof story that led to the institutions' collapse? Perhaps Alan will explain that to us.

I am confident that no accusation against us will stand up. The difficulty is that our experience of unionism shows that they are prepared to jump ship after any accusation has been made, regardless of how little or how much evidence is produced to support it. Unionism has had a problem with the type of political change that has been underscored by the Good Friday Agreement. It has sought ways and means to frustrate and slow down that political change, and it has used the issues that caused suspension to do so.

The difficulty is not about having a mechanism. I am confident that there will be no situation in which any accusation against us will stand up. However, what could happen — and our experience shows has already happened — is that people can make accusations without having to provide any evidence. On the basis of those accusations unionists have jumped ship, perhaps because they are genuinely concerned about the accusations or perhaps because they want to slow down the process of political change. One can make a choice as to which unionist party might act on those allegations, but I am not confident that unionism will stay in the institutions if it has an escape clause.

11.00 am

Mr McFarland: It sounds as though Conor is saying that the Ulster Unionist Party was bobbing in and out of the institutions at the slightest whim.

Mr Murphy: You were out of them four times.

Mr McFarland: We have nearly destroyed ourselves —

Mr Murphy: You cannot blame all that on Sinn Féin.

Mr McFarland: We have nearly destroyed ourselves attempting to show good faith that unionists could not be accused of not wanting a Fenian about the place. We have also attempted to show that we were willing to test the bona fides of Sinn Féin as to whether it was serious about moving away from paramilitarism and on to the constitutional path.

We did that three times. Many would argue that once would have been enough, but the fact is that we cannot be accused of bad faith in this matter. It is wrong to say that we were using excuses: there were good reasons why people needed visible decommissioning, and we covered those at length during the first two months of this Committee meeting. If the republican movement was saying that it was no longer offering violence to the unionist community, why was it hanging on to its weapons? All those things dogged the process from the beginning.

The IMC has reported that there has been a clear change. Therefore if Conor Murphy is saying that last July's statement was a watershed, that there will be no more republican threats or violence and that the movement is turning on to the constitutional path, I am saying that unionists are still not confident that that has all gone away and is done with. In the meantime, the unionist community needs those confidence-building measures and safeguards.

I reiterate my point: if the republican movement is absolutely committed and there is to be no more messing around with this process, what is the problem with having a few safeguards? After a specific period they might lapse, but in the meantime unionists could be confident that there would not be a return to any of the nonsense that we had in the first six years of this process.

Mr P Robinson: First, I must ditch the idea that 108 people went to the electorate and got a mandate to get the Assembly up and running. That was not my mandate at all; my mandate was that I should not go into Government until certain conditions had been met. I am in keeping with my mandate. Others may be breaking theirs, but that is up to them.

Secondly, I dispel the other idea that removing the suspension Act would somehow create an element of fear because unionists would not want to face an election in those circumstances. To take the scenario that I outlined earlier, if an election was forced because republicans had robbed the Ulster Bank no unionist would fear going before the electorate. In those circumstances, if such unionists thought that that was not the kind of action that a partner in Government should carry out, their position would be reinforced rather than weakened. I do not see that fear of an election is a factor at all, no more than I think that if the Government wanted to avoid those circumstances they would not move sharply to introduce a new suspension Act.

However, we have missed the purpose of the discussion, which was supposed to be under the heading of 'Stability'.

I have suggested that strengthening the role of the IMC would be a mechanism to bring stability. However, I have not heard too many other suggestions, other than that we allow the instability to continue or that we suck it and see. For the most part, those are the propositions that other parties have been making.

Let me pose the question: if the IMC is not deemed to be a suitable body to pass a judgement on such matters as suspension — although clearly its evidence would be important no matter who does — what is? Should a judicial process make such determinations? Clearly, a political process would be unacceptable because it could be vetoed.

What about the mechanisms that flow from the ministerial code and the Code of Conduct? They could include — if they do not already — the requirement for those in Government, individually and collectively, to maintain various standards. Is a breach of the Code of Conduct justiciable? Can we ensure that there is a mechanism to punish those who have been associated with the breach of the conditions of Government, rather than the offenders simply saying, “Tough, we have a mandate, and that is how it is going to be”?

Mr Murphy: Sinn Féin has always said that it is open to examining how to strengthen and tighten up the provisions of the ministerial code and place it on a statutory footing.

Peter Robinson’s point that going to the electorate holds no fear for the DUP begs the question as to why unionism — or the Alliance Party or any other party — requires a mechanism to exclude a party. If an accusation were of such magnitude and made on such a solid basis that it would stand up to any scrutiny, surely the guilty party would be punished by the electorate, who would reward those who were right to walk out of Government.

Why, therefore, is a shortcut mechanism required, whereby people can be excluded from office on the basis of an accusation that has not been sustained? If parties are so confident that their own view on this matter would stack up should such an allegation be made, why is a mechanism is required at all?

Certainly, we have always said that we are quite open to considering the ministerial code and the Code of Conduct to see how their provisions could be strengthened and tightened.

Mr P Robinson: Mr Murphy is being deliberately obtuse. He knows perfectly well that although the unionist electorate would endorse the position of its representatives, there is no guarantee that the nationalist electorate would punish Sinn Féin in such circumstances. Therefore the outcome would be that a new Assembly would face exactly the same problems: nothing would have been resolved and the instability would continue. If the point is to remove the instability, we must consider the mechanisms that are necessary to achieve that.

To take this a stage further, if parties are prepared to examine the Pledge of Office and Code of Conduct, I assume that no one objects to those requiring the same kind of standards that we discussed earlier. Are people content that the courts should determine any breaches of either?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We need to conclude this discussion soon, as it has been going on for an hour and we will probably not reach consensus. Perhaps there should be a proposal to move the discussion on to the ministerial code.

Mr Murphy: May I say that Peter Robinson’s remarks on the electorate border on being racist. He said that unionism would consider any breach of standards as a true breach and support those who walked out of Government, but that nationalists would not and would continue to support Sinn Féin. I do not see the scenario that he outlined arising —

Mrs Long: May I object to —

Mr Murphy: Perhaps I could finish my point. I cannot see a scenario wherein the unionist electorate could make a correct judgement if such a circumstance arose, but the nationalist electorate would not be able to do so.

We are prepared to examine the code of conduct, and, if there are proposals on how that could be carried forward, we would like to see them.

Mrs Long: I object to the use of the term “racist”. If Mr Murphy feels that Peter Robinson’s comments were sectarian, he should say so, but abusing the term “racist” is a bit rich. Members around this table may have political and religious differences, but we are not of different races, so let us not overplay the differences between us. There is more that unites us than divides us, and let us not get carried away with the situation.

Mr P Robinson: What has happened in the past few years is not racism: it is realism. The electorate has been prepared to vote for a terrorist party — that is a fact. That is not sectarian or racist: that is reality. That has been the judgement of the electorate, so it is not a case of my stating that this may happen in the future — this has been happening for decades.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I am loath to draw this to a conclusion. It seems that unionism has complete faith and trust in the IMC and security forces reports, but Sinn Féin and nationalism in general have complete distrust. We must consider how to achieve the independence of a group that is required to produce a report acceptable to everyone. With regard to the ministerial code, we must consider where the report comes from and how one gains trust and agreement to accept those reports. It is also necessary to get an endorsement from unionism that there is confidence to make the institutions work. Those are the questions that divide us.

Mr Campbell: It is clear from the past 70 minutes that it is unlikely — and that is probably putting it mildly — that we will reach consensus on the stability issue. We could get it down to a vague catch-all where everyone agrees that stability is a good thing, but there is no agreement on how to achieve it. I am unsure that further intense discussion would progress this one iota.

Mr P Robinson: I wish to deflate the view that unionists have complete trust in the judgement of the IMC. That is not the DUP's position. We opposed the IMC legislation for two reasons: first, it was unrepresentative — there are no unionists on the IMC — there is a nationalist and plenty of others, but there are no unionists; secondly, it was toothless. Therefore the DUP is not content with all its utterances. We recognise, as have others, that an independent body must be set up; the IMC probably leans more in its representation towards nationalists than unionists. However, we have been prepared to accept the outcome of IMC reports, because, so far, they have been reasonably soundly based.

Mr McFarland: The agreement put in some safeguards, and others were added through the IMC. Changes will only be made to the IMC through whatever deal is done in the autumn — each side will get a little of what it wants, either by beefing it up or removing it.

In the comprehensive agreement, Sinn Féin won the removal of the “Mandelson” 2000 Act. The question is whether in future dealings the DUP can get a beefing up of the IMC's role.

However, it strikes me that the Committee has probably run as far as it can, as colleagues have said.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Peter Robinson is not necessarily saying that the DUP wants a beefing up of the IMC; it may want it to have a different structure.

Mr McFarland: I suspect that a modification of the IMC is only likely to come about as part of a deal.

Mr Ford: I disagree with Peter Robinson's allegations. I am not sure that the presence of Joe Brosnan, an Irish official, alongside that of John Grieve, a British policeman, somehow makes the IMC a nationalist rather than unionist body. People are chosen for their experience of roles that are of a non-political nature, with the possible exception of one member who used to have a political role here.

While there is a major distinction between Sinn Féin, which does not want the IMC to exist, and others who have a more or less greater acceptance of the role of the IMC, there may be something in the legislation that set it up that would provide the option for the Secretary of State, by direction, to exclude Ministers, in the absence of an Assembly decision to do so. There might be some way of reducing the power of the Secretary of State and, perhaps, enhancing the power of the IMC by spelling out within its responsibilities that the Secretary of State must have regard for the IMC's recommendations. That would take it slightly away from the political role, but I suspect that it may not be enough of a change to satisfy Sinn Féin.

One must recognise that it is not the legislation that causes the problem. Regardless of the legislation, there have been occasions in the past — and there might be more in the future — when one or more parties have wished to walk from the Executive, so one cannot blame the legislation if the problem lies with the attitude of the parties to one another. We must seek to find some legislation that caters for that. We could talk about making the ministerial code justiciable, for example, but the courts take time, and we would have to go into some sort of temporary suspension while those matters were resolved. Therefore we cannot depend on the courts to deal with what are political problems, and I do not know what we would do for the two or three months that it would take for the courts to get round to hearing the case.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are members content to look at the ministerial code as a means of dealing with this issue?

11.15 am

Mr P Robinson: No. There are many mechanisms that can be used; that is one worth exploring, but it is not the only one.

Mr Murphy: Sinn Féin is content to look at the ministerial code. This morning's discussion is about stability, and it is our contention that the suspension legislation and the IMC have contributed to instability. They have not served the purpose for which they were set up. The IMC — in its make-up and how it conducts its business — and the suspension legislation have added to instability rather than helped resolve it.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): As Gregory Campbell said, we need a wide-reaching statement. Everyone agrees that the Assembly must have stability in order to work and to be maintained. How do we go forward to create that stability? Does anyone have any proposals that can take us to the next stage?

Mr McFarland: If we get to the stage where the DUP and Sinn Féin agree to go into Government, that will bring with it a degree of stability. However, we must also talk about safeguards.

Mr P Robinson: It did not bring stability when the Ulster Unionists went into Government.

Mr McFarland: There were different problems at that time: the republican movement and Sinn Féin were unsettled; and, within unionism, the DUP was most unsettled about the situation. The logic of getting to a stage where the DUP and Sinn Féin do a deal is that both traditions — in their entirety — are settled except for any necessary tweaking. There will be a residual problem of confidence on both sides. Therefore safeguards are needed — whether in the voting systems or in other mechanisms — to hold to account any party that defaults. This discussion is not only about stability — and our best chance of stability will come with that deal — but about the implementation of safeguards, which will ensure that those who are not playing the game can be held to account.

Mr P Robinson: I hope we are agreed that we need to explore further mechanisms to ensure that there is stability, at least at a low level.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We need greater detail on what those mechanisms are.

Mr O'Dowd: Stability is best achieved by making politics work.

Mr McFarland: That would be the deal between the DUP and Sinn Féin: making politics work.

Mr P Robinson: First, history has recorded that the DUP was right not to be settled, because conditions were required. The danger is that those conditions could be met today but all might change tomorrow. That is why you require some mechanism for stability.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Can we park it there for the moment, with the general heading that we need a mechanism to deal with it? Agreed?

Members indicated assent.

Members asked for two new items to be put on the agenda. One is accountability mechanisms: broadly, the Assembly and the Executive. The other is the voting system. It was suggested that parties might want to put forward papers on those matters, or they may prefer to discuss them today. Seán, you had put forward the idea of a paper.

Dr Farren: Are we addressing the issue of collective responsibility or general accountability?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Accountability of the Executive and related issues.

Mr McFarland: I think we agreed that accountability in the Executive would be left to our next major discussion on the Executive; however, the concern is the referral of matters between the Assembly and the Executive. Is that correct?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Yes. Do you want to continue that discussion today, or do you want to prepare papers?

Mrs Long: The Alliance Party hopes to circulate tomorrow a paper with its views on those matters. However, if others wish to discuss it today, we are happy to do so, but it may be better to have sight of other parties' papers beforehand.

Mr McFarland: Chairman, I thought it was agreed at the beginning that, in general, we would not get into swapping papers. There is a time factor with regard to preparing them; people tend to wave them around if anyone wishes to modify their views as they go through; and the entire purpose of this Committee was, for the very first time, that five parties should sit around a table and discuss the ins and outs. Hearing other people's points of view and discussing them has the potential to achieve modification of thoughts. If we get into papers that is OK, parties can do that, but the essence of this Committee was that we sat and discussed the matters.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): One proposal concerned papers; not that each party would present them, but the option was there.

Mrs Long: I was just going to make that point. The option of circulating papers never closed down. The parties retained that option, but papers were not a prerequisite for discussion. I say only that we are willing to circulate our paper tomorrow; if you do not wish to read it that is fine.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do Members wish to continue today, or set the matter for a particular day, once they have read the papers?

Mr P Robinson: I am happy to read papers from anybody, and I promise not to wave them. [Laughter.]

Dr Farren: Issues of accountability have been widely discussed and aired in all kinds of fora, so I see no reason for us not to discuss it. We are not unfamiliar with the subject.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Who wants to open?

Mr McFarland: This started off in the comprehensive agreement, so Peter and the DUP may want to cover those proposals and say why they were there.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): It was also part of the DUP written submission. Peter, do you want to open up?

Mr P Robinson: No, not really; I could do with a bit of a rest.

The accountability mechanisms in the comprehensive agreement were not the first choice of the DUP. I outlined at the previous meeting that the best option is for power to be devolved to the Assembly, rather than to the heads of Departments, which is the arrangement under the Northern Ireland Act.

If power were devolved to the Assembly, it would have authority and primacy, and its support would be required when there is contention. That is the best proposition, and it is the one that I favour. It would mean that Ministers would have to have the support of the Assembly at all times, and it would stop off-the-wall decisions being taken by Ministers and Departments. The Executive would need to have a high level of collective decision-making, and Ministers would be sure that their ministerial colleagues in other parties would have to carry their Members along with various proposals.

In effect, it would be the normal democratic situation and would be the best option. If we are not to have that, and I prefer that we do, the only way forward is to give some level of accountability to the Executive and to have powers in the Assembly to refer or to negate decisions. Those are the options, and there may be permutations.

The comprehensive agreement moved more towards giving the Executive authority but with a requirement that there be a level of support within the Executive before major decisions could be taken.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I remind members that there is some commentary in their papers on this matter.

Mrs Long: Part of this issue was discussed last week and is already on the record. The Alliance Party believes that additional accountability mechanisms are required because there is a deficit in collective responsibility within the Executive. Our preferred system is one in which there is collective responsibility, and that would not require the same degree of additional accountability mechanisms.

In the current situation, we differ from the DUP inasmuch as we do not believe that ministerial decisions should require the support of the Assembly. However, there are some circumstances in which the Assembly should be able to negate a ministerial decision.

Mr P Robinson: What do you mean by that? A Minister must have the support of Parliament for every decision he takes. Parliament would not call a Minister in unless it disliked a decision and therefore it became contentious. It would not be a case of Ministers coming to the Assembly with every decision.

Mrs Long: The Alliance Party would make that distinction — there would not be a vote on every ministerial decision in the Assembly. Where, for example, a petition of concern is raised by Members — and I went into that in more detail last week, when there was a debate around the numbers concerned — and is judged not to be vexatious, but where a substantive issue is involved, it would be possible in such circumstances for a cross-community vote to negate the decision of a Minister.

We see that as the situation which provides additional accountability between the Executive and the Assembly — and that is our proposition. However, it is our proposition in default, because our preference is for collective responsibility within the Executive.

Mr McFarland: We are into a number of topics, one of which I raised last week — where power lies.

The UUP was thinking along the same lines as Peter about whether power and authority can be devolved to the Assembly rather than to the Departments. The paper prepared by the devolution and legislation division of the Northern Ireland Office suggests that this does not matter. The issue of where power lies, according to that paper, appears to have been settled, and whether it is with Ministers or the Assembly would seem to be neither here nor there.

I will move on to the part of the comprehensive agreement that deals with referrals to the Executive, because it would be useful to tease this out a bit. The proposal is that if 30 Members have difficulty with an issue, they can raise what amounts to a petition of concern. Presumably, and I assume there would be an Assembly debate although paragraph 6 in the comprehensive agreement is not clear about that, the Speaker would have to decide whether the petition were vexatious; the Assembly would have a debate; and the matter would be referred back to the Executive.

Difficulties would arise if a Minister made a decision on an issue in the middle of August. That issue could not be referred to the Assembly within seven days, as the Assembly would be in recess. Does that mean that, during a recess, any 30 Members can make a request for a referral from the Speaker, who then decides in the absence of the Assembly whether the matter should be referred? I am unclear about the detail of the mechanism that is suggested in paragraph 6 of the Annex B proposals on strand one of the comprehensive agreement. Can anyone shed any light on that?

11.30 am

Dr Farren: Some discussions on accountability seem to be based on the assumption that the accountability mechanisms laid down in the Good Friday Agreement for the Assembly were weak to the point of non-existence at times. That was not the case at all. After all, ministerial responsibility must be discharged with respect to the law in general, legislation applying to a Minister's departmental responsibilities in particular, and the Budget.

The Assembly has complete authority with respect to the Budget, the Programme for Government and the pledge of office. The discharge of ministerial responsibility is subject to quite a range of requirements and parameters already. We can consider ways to refine those, of course, but we must be cautious about the suggestion that the Assembly should have authority over ministerial decisions to the point where all ministerial decisions are potentially subject to Assembly approval.

That seems, at first sight, to be well founded. However, if decisions are made within the parameters that I indicated, they are made in a responsible manner and with the appropriate authority. Problems could arise if ministerial decisions that had been taken with regard to those parameters were challenged to the point of gridlock. Government decision-making would be slowed to an unacceptable pace, and the operation would no longer be smooth.

In her capacity as Minister for Agriculture and Rural Development, Brid Rodgers took significant ministerial decisions during the foot-and-mouth crisis. Taken in isolation, some of those decisions might have seemed inappropriate or incorrect to some Members. However, in those circumstances, to circumscribe that Minister's discretion by challenging some of those quite significant decisions, which she felt that she had to take, would have had a serious impact on how we responded to that crisis.

We want to be very careful about seeking to enhance authority over ministerial decisions in cases in which that would certainly not contribute to the smooth operation of Government.

Mr P Robinson: Either Alan has misread the advice, or the advice has not been sufficiently clear. The advice begins by properly indicating that, whereas statutory functions are collectively devolved in Scotland and the UK as a whole, that is not the case in Northern Ireland. Indeed, such functions cannot be devolved collectively because the Belfast Agreement required that they should not.

The last paragraph, to which Alan refers, answers the second part of the question. The paragraph is accurate where it says "subordinate", as opposed to the heading, which says "subordinates". The question was whether the fact that the power is in the Department does subordinate ministerial authority. There is no argument about that. That was not the question that was being asked. Someone has taken a new question to himself. The question asked was: "Are Ministers, therefore, unaccountable as a result of that?" and the answer to that is "yes".

Nobody is suggesting that Ministers have fewer or different powers or that they exercise their powers differently — it is that they are doing it in a way that is not dependent on the collective view of colleagues. In Scotland and the UK that is under the authority of the First Minister or the Prime Minister. All of us know from practice that Ministers took decisions that did not require their colleagues' support in the Executive, and many decisions were taken that were not even brought to colleagues in the Executive. Some of the decisions that were brought were ones that the Ministers were capable of taking anyway, irrespective of the views of their colleagues.

The Assembly could not overturn the decision of any Minister. On one occasion it tried to but clearly failed. Assembly Committees had no power or authority over ministerial decisions, so we had the ludicrous situation in which a minority decision was taken that did not have cross-community support, and that clearly meant that we had an unaccountable Minister.

That does not mean that we require every Minister to come to the House with every decision, for example, on whether a new streetlight is needed at the corner of Edgcombe Gardens. I am not unhappy with the mechanism for a call-in power, be it a petition of concern or whatever. However, there must be a requirement for Ministers to be accountable to someone. It is better for them to be accountable to the Assembly, but they should certainly be accountable to the Executive, which is accountable to the Assembly.

Mr Murphy: The paper correctly shows that a key principle in the Good Friday Agreement was that Ministers were to have executive authority in their respective areas. It was one way of ensuring that there was proper power sharing and that one set of Ministers was not subject to majority rule in the Assembly while another was able to carry on as it pleased.

There was a key recognition of the fact that if there were to be power sharing, it had to be genuine — people had to have some degree of authority within the areas of responsibility that they received as a result of their mandate. There are significant accountability mechanisms within that: if a Minister wants to take legislation through the Assembly, he requires the support of the Assembly. There are other mechanisms, and there is responsibility within the Executive itself. Also, 30 members of the Assembly can submit a petition of concern and have a debate on any issue. A balance is required between what is genuine power sharing and what could be seen as abuse of office.

We have always been happy to explore accountability mechanisms but with that balance in mind. A majority in the Assembly cannot be used to effectively police one or two ministerial Departments and allow the rest to act as they would under the terms of the agreement. It is about getting that balance right.

I do not see the same lack of accountability that Peter Robinson sees. I see potential difficulties if a number of Ministers were to vote against a proposal from an Executive colleague. Things such as that undermine the Executive's collective responsibility. We have always been quite happy to look at propositions to enhance collective responsibility and to improve accountability. However, that is on the basis of a recognition that there must be genuine power sharing; one set of Ministers cannot be subject to control while another is allowed to carry on as it pleases.

Mr Ford: Conor Murphy put his finger on it when he talked about "genuine power sharing"; what we have at the moment is power division. Any proposal that enhances collectivity within the Executive would be beneficial. I have had a quick skim through Hansard, and I see that last week Naomi talked about accountability within the Executive, which is where it should be. We believe that there is still the need for a potential backstop within the Assembly. Clearly, what we have suggested is very different from what I understand the DUP's position to be, which is effectively that no Minister could do anything unless he gets a cross-community vote.

Our proposal attempts to take account of some of the concerns that Seán Farren raised: the Speaker's role in scrutinising any motions to negate to ensure that they are not vexatious; the requirement that there be sufficient signatures; and the requirement that a ministerial decision could be overturned only by cross-community vote. That would give the right level of ministerial responsibility and independence and at the same time ensure that Ministers do not go off on a complete solo run without any support at all. Ideally, it would all start with greater collectivity within the Executive to ensure that we have genuine power sharing in the first place.

Mr P Robinson: Before anybody else builds up more straw men just to knock them down, I must point out that the DUP has never put forward any proposal that the Assembly, or indeed the Executive, should decide on every single decision that a Minister takes. That would be a recipe for disaster. You could not do it; you would not have the time. It clearly has to be on a call-in basis. That has always been the argument so let us just dispel that nonsense.

Mr Ford: My point concerned the difference in the requirement of the vote to overturn a decision as opposed to the circumstances in which call-in would be made, where, I understand, there is a difference between the DUP position and ours.

Mr P Robinson: The call-in that we suggested is the same call-in power that is available with a petition of concern in the Assembly. With regard to the Executive, is a call-in power is recommended by the comprehensive agreement — I think that three Ministers are suggested.

Mr Campbell: That is not the same as saying that no Minister could do anything without getting cross-community support for any decision he or she might take.

Mr Ford: As I understand it, the DUP's requirements for call-in require that a Minister could in those circumstances only have his decision carried provided that it was endorsed by a cross-community vote. Our proposal is that it could be negated only by a cross-community vote.

Mr P Robinson: Why?

Mr Ford: I am trying to establish what the point of difference is between us.

Mr P Robinson: There is a massive difference. You know well that there is a difference between us.

Mr Ford: You seemed to be suggesting that there was not. At least now you agree that there is. Thank you.

Mr P Robinson: The obvious reason is that for a proposition to go forward, it needs to have the support of the Assembly. Your argument is that a veto can be used in the Assembly and that a proposal can therefore go forward that does not have the support of the Assembly.

Mr Ford: No, our proposal is precisely that there is not a veto. The collectivity within the Executive should have resolved matters in the first instance.

Mr P Robinson: You are suggesting that there should be a call-in power of the Assembly — a backstop, as you referred to it. Therefore, irrespective of the views of the Executive, it would come to the Assembly. You could have a proposal going forward that is vetoed by Sinn Féin or the DUP, in present circumstances, but that may not have the support of the Assembly as a whole.

11.45 am

Mr McFarland: I sense that there will not be consensus on changes to the Belfast Agreement as regards Ministers having authority within their own bailiwicks. The question is, therefore, how to have safeguards at Executive level to ensure that there is control.

Perhaps I am being dozy, but I am somewhat confused. My understanding is that if a Minister proposes to put through legislation or secure money, it requires the Assembly's agreement because it is in the Programme for Government. If a Minister does something outwith that, a petition of concern can be put forward that has been signed by at least 30 Members, and the matter can be debated in the Assembly with all the ensuing media coverage. How are these proposals different from that?

Mr P Robinson: Why were you not able to stop the closure of the Jubilee Maternity Hospital?

Mr McFarland: The only reason that the Jubilee Maternity Hospital closed was because the decision was taken during the period between the setting up of the Assembly and the first Programme for Government the following April. Without a Programme for Government, nobody had signed up to anything and Ministers could do what they wanted. Had the closure of the Jubilee Maternity Hospital been proposed after April 2000, it would never have got through because it would have been stopped in the Executive. The Minister was able to do that because no one had signed up to a Programme for Government.

In theory, all key decisions normally require legislation or money. If a Minister is doing something strange, a petition of concern can raise a flag to say that the Assembly — or at least 30 of its Members — are not happy about it. If that power already exists, what will the proposal provide in addition? I understand that we need to beef up ministerial collectivity and accountability, which we will consider when we discuss the Executive. When there is a beefed-up ministerial code, pledges of office, a Programme for Government and when everyone operates properly, what scenario would not be covered by a petition of concern, a debate in the Assembly and the waving of flags? The proposals do not go much further than that.

Dr Farren: Section 11 of strand one of the agreement — the special equality measure — seems to strengthen the basis on which decisions could be challenged. The special equality measure allows the Assembly to appoint a special Committee to examine and report on whether a measure or proposal contravenes the bill of rights or the European Convention on Human Rights. While the Good Friday Agreement says, “examine and report” on a measure, Standing Orders restricted that to Bills and legislation. The SDLP suggests that we revert to the original intention — that any measure that the Assembly feels is in breach of equality should fall under that provision. Along with the petition of concern, there is a set of safeguards that will allow challenges to be put to decisions in ways that do not push us towards what I cautioned against earlier.

Mr P Robinson: I will respond to some of the points raised.

The Jubilee Maternity Hospital proved that the system did not work. The Assembly voted in favour of the Jubilee site, as did the Assembly Committee. The Executive was not able to stop it, neither was the Assembly, so something was clearly wrong with the system.

Mr McFarland: The system was that nobody was signed up to anything. In November 1999 this thing fired up and there was no Programme for Government. No Minister had signed up to anything at all, so every Minister could do his or her own thing. The only surprise at that stage was that we did not have more Ministers crashing around with their favourite topics. [Interruption.]

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): One at a time, please.

Mr Campbell: The education decision on the final day was at a point when the Programme for Government was in place.

Mr McFarland: The education decision on the final day was a total nonsense and remains so.

Mr Campbell: But it was still taken; it was not stopped.

Mr McFarland: There was no possibility that, had the Executive or the Assembly continued, that decision would have got through.

Mr Campbell: It went.

Mr McFarland: It had to; it required all sorts of money and legislation. It was able to go forward only because the civil servants, for reasons best known to themselves, bashed on with it even though the Assembly was suspended.

Mr Campbell: But it went.

Mr McFarland: It would not have done if —

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I have to allow PJ Bradley to speak.

Mr P J Bradley: It is obviously difficult to get one set of rules to fit all. Of the two situations that have been referred to, the Jubilee Maternity Hospital and the foot-and-mouth crisis, the former could have been considered non-urgent. At the time of the foot-and-mouth crisis the Minister and the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development often met through the night in emergency session to deal with the situation. Some situations can wait for debate, but Ministers must have the power to make urgent decisions. The foot-and-mouth crisis was a prime example of that.

Mr P Robinson: First, there is a view that the Programme for Government is such a detailed and far-seeing document that it incorporates every decision that a Minister may be required to take over the following 12 months. That is not the case. It is a very general document under which Ministers can move with considerable flexibility, as has been seen.

Secondly, it is assumed that the spending plans are so rigid that a Minister has no flexibility. That, of course, is not the case either. The spending plans are largely based on headings under which, I can assure you, a Minister can move from one point to another.

Those two assumptions are not safeguards in themselves. They might put some restraints on how clever a Minister has to be, but they certainly do not constrain him from taking a decision of his own. Legally, there is nothing that stops a Minister from taking a decision. We took the advice of a very well-respected senior counsel — who was not of my political persuasion — on that issue. There is no question that we need to have a change.

This is not about waving flags: that only draws attention to the issue; it does not stop it from happening. The referral system ensured that if, under the comprehensive agreement proposals, something got through the Executive net, it would have the ability to ensure that only genuine power-sharing decisions could be made. My views of power sharing and Sinn

Féin's ideas of power sharing are completely different. Sinn Féin seems to believe that power sharing is power allocation. That is not my view. My view of power sharing is one in which Ministers collectively take shared responsibility for the decisions that have been made. That is very different from saying, "We have the cards and we will dole them out. You take the decisions on this and we will take the decisions on that, and it does not matter what decisions either of us take; that is the way it is going to be."

That is not power sharing; that is simply an allocation of power. That is very different and is what can happen under the current circumstances. However, the comprehensive agreement ensured a collective decision-taking process and that any decisions that were contrary to the views of one section of the community or another had to be dealt with and agreed by the Executive. If a decision went unnoticed because Members' attention was elsewhere, the Assembly could throw it back to the Executive to ensure that that decision was taken collectively.

Dr Farren: I mentioned the safeguards that are provided by the special equality procedure. Peter Robinson highlighted decisions that he feels should, or could, have been challenged on equality grounds because they concerned the fair treatment of the two communities. In what respect would the special equality procedure not provide the type of safeguard that he mentioned?

Many of those matters are essentially political decisions that Ministers must take. If two hospitals bid for a particular service, a decision must be made about which one will win that bid. If it were felt that a decision breached equality provisions and was not based on the Minister's best judgement — albeit that that judgement may be described as political — would the special equality procedure not provide a safeguard?

Mr P Robinson: Special equality provisions would certainly be a factor, if equality were the sole concern. However, a range of political issues is involved, where political ideologies and other factors will come into play for an extended period long into the future. A division may be on an ideological, rather than an equality, issue. Is it right that, contrary to the wishes of the rest of its colleagues in the Executive and Assembly, a party in Government takes a decision that is based on, for example, its Stalinist approach to life? An issue may not be one of equality, but it certainly might affect the way forward for Northern Ireland.

Dr Farren: We must focus on enhancing the nature of collective responsibility within the Executive to ensure that we can agree on the best form of such responsibility. Ministers, and the Assembly as a whole, could then be assured that the Executive have the support of all colleagues.

Mr P Robinson: I had hoped that that is what we were doing.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We will deal with that under the next topic, which deals with decision taking within the Executive.

Mr Murphy: There is a balance between collective responsibility and exercising a veto. Interestingly, the two examples given by unionists related to decisions taken by Sinn Féin Ministers; one on education, the other on the Jubilee Maternity Hospital. That latter decision stood, despite being subject to several judicial reviews.

The issue concerns whether parties want to use a majority to veto the actions of any Minister whom they consider unsatisfactory or whether we want power-sharing. I do not see power-sharing as a mere allocation of power, but as a genuine sharing of power. That is why issues such as agreeing the Programme for Government, prioritising the Executive and legislative proposals exist — they are all the collective responsibility of the Executive.

However, in Sinn Féin's experience, and given the examples cited by unionists, the decisions that members targeted seemed to be those that were taken by Sinn Féin Ministers. Interestingly, when one senior unionist commentator was asked what turned unionists off the Good Friday Agreement, he said that it was the prospect of Martin McGuinness exercising ministerial power in the Department of Education.

Therefore, in our experience, accountability measures would be used to exercise control over decisions taken by Sinn Féin Ministers and, perhaps, by SDLP Ministers. While we are in favour of collective responsibility — and there are accountability mechanisms in the agreement — there is a balance between accountability and exercising a veto over Ministers and ministerial decisions that Members may be unhappy with.

12.00 noon

Mr McFarland: What is the difference between the proposals in paragraph 6 of Annex B to the comprehensive agreement and a petition of concern? They both require a minimum of 30 Assembly members, and both result in an Assembly debate. In paragraph 6, the matter would be referred back, but you would be a brave Minister if you lost a cross-community vote in the Assembly, which presumably would have the same effect as referring it back, or would it?

Mr P Robinson: You have just answered your own question — the matter would be referred back. As you said, it would be a brave Minister that would want to defy the Assembly.

Mr McFarland: I said that it would be a brave Minister who would want to defy a cross-community vote in the Assembly as a result of a petition of concern. Therefore the matter is likely to end up back in the Executive anyway, because the effect of the system is the same — you have 30 Members, and you have won a petition of concern or a referral. Presumably, there is also a debate in the Assembly. The only difference is that a referral must be initiated within seven days. During suspension, in the middle of August, can 30 Members send something to the Speaker, which she can adjudicate on? Can there not be a vote in the Assembly without referring a matter back to the Executive? I have not yet had answers to those questions.

What is the system tied in with the Assembly referral, which would allow that to happen in the middle of August, with no Assembly?. The Executive could not consider it within seven days. For instance, at Christmas, or on Boxing Day, could 30 members decide that they are upset about something?

Mr Murphy: Under Standing Orders, 30 members can call for a meeting of the Assembly at any stage.

Mr McFarland: What notice is required for that?

Mr Murphy: I am not sure what notice is required under Standing Orders.

The Committee Clerk: Three working days' notice is required.

Mr McFarland: If the Assembly is suspended, that cannot apply.

The Committee Clerk: Are you talking about recess?

Mr McFarland: Yes. I am merely seeking clarification to ensure that everyone understands, because members can get confused about the matters under discussion.

At any stage during the year, 30 members can exercise their right, under Standing Orders, to call an emergency meeting of the Assembly at which there would be a petition of concern, and there are rules for that. No vote can be held until at least 24 hours after the petition has been presented, is that correct?

Mr Murphy: No vote may be held on a matter that has been discussed under a petition of concern until at least 24 hours after the petition has been presented.

Mr McFarland: The Assembly, therefore, can be called back from recess and have a cross-community vote. That vote can be the quorum of the Assembly, and as long as there are 60% of those present and 40% of each tradition voting, a cross-community vote challenging a ministerial decision could be passed.

Dr Farren: Is that not the consequential effect on the ministerial decision that is absent in the normal application of a petition of concern?

Mr McFarland: No, because what happens then is that you flag up the fact that cross-community concern is challenging a ministerial decision. Presumably, the press would be there to record the fact that the Assembly objects to a ministerial decision.

While there is no obligation to reconsider, there would be an obligation to re-examine a ministerial decision through the Assembly referral provision. The only difference is the obligation to re-examine. However, Ministers representing the parties that voted for the ministerial decision by cross-community vote would re-examine it in the Executive. Apart from the obligation to re-examine the decision, there is no difference between the two systems as regards public relations, press and the parties involved.

Mr P Robinson: I could hear the cogs turning as we laboriously went through that.

Mr McFarland: Sometimes, it is important.

Mr P Robinson: The position is simple: the Executive would have the ability, under the comprehensive agreement proposals, to take collective decisions, and such decisions would be required to be collective. As I said earlier — though it obviously was not picked up — there may be occasions when Ministers' eyes are elsewhere and something goes through that has not caught their notice. The proposal gives the Assembly a power to send a decision back to the Executive so that it is given proper attention and a collective decision is taken. It is a belt-and-braces approach.

Mr McFarland: Would a cross-party petition of concern from the Assembly not have the same effect of alerting the Minister? As Peter said, the proposal would only come into operation when Members noticed that something had slipped through. Therefore, would a petition of concern and a cross-party vote not have the same effect of alerting the Executive?

Mr Murphy: It would be better to ask these questions of someone from the British Government, which drafted these proposals. However, the only point that I would dispute with Peter Robinson is that an Assembly referral does not turn a decision that was not considered as taken collectively into a decision that was taken collectively. That is not mentioned in paragraph 6 of Annex B to the comprehensive agreement. However, whoever devised those proposals may be able to give a better explanation.

My understanding is that the proposal allows an issue to be referred to the Executive for the Ministers' reconsideration; it does not re-designate the status of that decision in the first instance. If an issue has not been agreed under collective responsibility, a referral does not re-designate a decision into a collective one. However, the people who are best placed to answer questions on these proposals are those who authored them.

Mr P Robinson: I was unaware that there were separate designations for decisions. The proposal is simply a mechanism to ensure that decisions are taken with the knowledge and approval of the Executive. That is all there is to it; I cannot see anything harmful in that proposal.

Dr Farren: Is that type of referral mechanism necessary if, from what Peter has said, the essential concern is to ensure a greater degree of collective responsibility? Surely we need to consider collective responsibility rather than providing another mechanism in the Assembly that seems to indirectly aim at collective responsibility.

Mr P Robinson: The difference is that the proposal in paragraph 6 refers to a decision that is already past the post and knocks it back onto the track.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Would a petition of concern not do the same thing?

Dr Farren: Yes.

Mr P Robinson: It would not, because the decision would already have been taken.

Dr Farren: I agree with Alan McFarland's suggestion: it would be foolish for a Minister, or, indeed, the Executive as a whole, to proceed with a decision that did not have a significant degree of approval, or at least acquiescence, in the Assembly.

Mr P Robinson: A Minister may feel strongly about an issue and, irrespective of what colleagues might think, he or she may want to pursue it. That is not unknown.

Dr Farren: The Assembly can be wrong.

Mr P Robinson: So can Ministers.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do members wish to make any proposals or would they rather deal with this issue under 'Collective responsibility' and 'Ministerial Code'?

Mrs Long: Are there not, however, two distinct issues? One is the right of the Assembly to refer something back to the Executive; the other is collectivity in the Executive. Although, with proper party discipline, it is hard to envisage, it could happen that the Executive were happy with something and the Assembly was not. The two issues must be separated.

Mr P Robinson: There are two issues there for the Assembly: should it have the power to send something back or should it have the power to negate? Another issue that was mentioned earlier is whether it is a requirement of the Assembly to get the cross-community support to do either of those two things, or whether it is the responsibility of the Minister to get the support of the Assembly for a proposal.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are there any proposals to move the matter on, or to see if we have consensus?

Mr P Robinson: I think we know that we do not have consensus.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Sometimes these things need to be clear.

Mrs Long: We put our proposals last week, and they were not agreed. I do not detect any change of heart around the table from any party. I am not sure that putting them again this week will add any clarity to the situation.

Mr P Robinson: I detect that people are coming closer to agreeing my proposals, but they have not quite reached that stage.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do we want to park that or can we conclude on it?

Mr Campbell: The car park is filling up.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We will need traffic wardens.

We will move on to the next item, which is "Voting system". This is an issue mainly for the Alliance Party.

Mrs Long: Our position was presented in a fair degree of detail last week, and I do not wish to take up time by repeating it.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are there any other issues? It was requested that "Voting system" be put back on the agenda, so it is there for discussion.

Mr McFarland: There was a great deal of discussion, and I sensed at the time that we probably would not get agreement to move from the present system, unless particular parties have had a Damascus conversion somewhere along the line.

Mr Ford: It was agreed last week that this was an issue to be considered at some point, but that there was no agreement as to how to consider it at this stage. If that is the case, it may simply be an item —

Mr P Robinson: That is why we are considering it now.

Mr Ford: Yes, but if there is nothing further to consider at this stage it may be something for the ever-expanding car park. Damascus may yet be reached by some of you.

Mr McFarland: This became an issue in the first place because of the mistrust between the communities. It seems a reasonable aspiration that, somewhere down the line, we could move to weighted-majority voting. When all this eventually settles, we could reach a stage where we were not so traumatised about particular communities being disadvantaged, and a weighted majority would give the same result without the designation issue. My sense is that we are not there yet, and, as a result of the previous week's discussion, we will probably not get agreement on it.

Mrs Long: I find it particularly traumatic when the community I represent is ignored in these votes. It is still an issue for the Alliance Party, but we accept that it is unlikely to be resolved. I understand that the DUP made a proposal last week to include a weighted-majority system in addition to the current system but that that was knocked back. If parties were to give some indication that they were willing to move in that direction, that would be something tangible, but that was not the case, so I doubt that people have moved to a position where they can embrace it entirely.

12.15 pm

Mr P Robinson: I agree — there was an opportunity. If a proposal were made that it cannot happen immediately the Assembly gets up and running but that we are all committed to moving towards a weighted majority system in the future, then it would be different from the other proposal and would represent some progress.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): OK, have we taken it as far as we can?

Mr P Robinson: We could look at it later.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Back to the car park again.

Mr Ford: There is a point in what Peter has just said. As I read and understood the comments of the parties, two seem to say that there is merit in a weighted majority as effectively being a third option alongside parallel consent and 60:40:40 — if that is a correct interpretation of the DUP's position. Others seem to say that we should consider when it may be appropriate to move to that point. That is an emerging degree of consensus, if I have correctly interpreted the positions of the three other parties from reading last week's Hansard.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are there any comments?

Mr Murphy: The voting mechanisms in the agreement were to deal with the situation in which we found ourselves then. Everyone has said that they would prefer at some stage to move to a different type of voting mechanism in which the safeguards provided by the current voting mechanisms are not needed. I do not think that it is necessary to get into prescribing that voting system at this point, but there is an agreement in principle that the voting mechanisms — whether people agree with them or not — are necessary to provide safeguards at the moment.

The desire by all parties is to get to a situation whereby such safeguards are not seen to be so necessary and the voting system can be looked at again.

Mr Ford: We might be potentially looking at the day when we wouldn't need any safeguards at all and 50% would be an adequate majority to carry a vote in the Assembly. Our proposal recognises that this is a very long way away and that is why we have looked at having a two-thirds straightforward weighted majority as a step in that direction.

Dr Farren: Do not jump too fast.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Last week, the Committee decided to refer this matter to a review Committee of the Assembly, if that were in place. That is probably as far as we can take it. The consensus is along the lines that people are prepared to look at the issue some way down the line, but that it is not an obstacle at this stage.

The Committee was suspended at 12.18 pm.

On resuming —

12.48 pm

[Proceedings between 12.48 pm and 1.19 pm were not recorded due to technical problems.]

Mr Campbell: — I hope that there is nobody here — although there may be some — who is saying that that prospect would have to be spearheaded by this manifestation of the election of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister because that is the way we did it before.

Our community drew many negative things from that — it was a farce; it was show; it did not work and no matter how many times it was set up it simply fell apart.

I do not think there would be much support in the wider community — certainly there would be none in ours — for the prospect of a four-year term with a functioning Executive and the First Minister and Deputy First Minister at its head being jeopardised because the door to it had to be the joint election of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister.

I find it difficult to understand how the wider community would give consent to the prospect of embarking on an election that allows the four-year term to transpire — hopefully, without any interruptions, bank robberies or antagonistic and illegal activities on the part of one or more parties, or those associated with them — but which might be jeopardised because of a particular method of electing the First Minister and Deputy First Minister which was not agreed eight and a half years ago.

They do not have to carry out their offices as they did before. That does not mean that we have to have some underhand ‘Blue Peter’ type of mould under the table that we can say we prepared earlier. It does not have to be the way it failed before: there can be a better way, which is more likely to succeed next time.

Ms Lewsley: For the record, I am deputising for Mark Durkan. Like everybody else, I am a bit confused now. On the one hand, Peter says that it really does not matter how the First Minister and Deputy First Minister are elected; if there is a clash of personalities then they are not going to work together anyway. On the other hand Gregory said that the election of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister and the way they worked in some way caused suspensions, when, in fact, it did not. Other issues caused suspension.

Mr Campbell: I did not say that.

Ms Lewsley: You did — you said that we have reached this point because of the way they worked and because of the on/off nature of the Assembly.

Mr Campbell: I was not saying that the on/off nature of the Assembly was a direct result of the way in which the First Minister and Deputy First Minister were elected.

Ms Lewsley: You said it was because of the working of their office; you said it did not work.

Mr Campbell: The election and the functioning of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister did not work. However, it was not that they did not work because the Executive was up and down, although that was a contributory factor; the two things were not part of the same thing. One was a portion of the other but one was not directly related to the other. The First Minister and the Deputy First Minister did not work from the very start, before the first time the Executive collapsed; they were not working together even though the perception was that they were.

Ms Lewsley: Then Peter said that he would surmise from what was being said around the table that if there were not consensus on this matter, that we would have to take the responsibility for any deadlock, which means that we will have a pre-condition to restoration.

Naomi talked about the community. I think the community is important. I have met people from both sides of the community who are telling us to get elected and go back and do the work. They say that if it worked last time, and the Assembly was up and running for the longest period of 18 months, then there is no reason why they should not have that back. People are crying out for proper government.

I know that the election of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister has always been an issue for the DUP; but now it is talking about changing the roles of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister. That would be very serious.

Mr P Robinson: I think that there has been a misunderstanding. I will be frank: if I must choose who I would be in Government with, I would not choose Sinn Féin. If such a proposal were a matter of choice, I would not propose a Sinn Féin First Minister or Deputy First Minister. That is why a mandatory system is preferable; it indicates that there is no choice in the matter, and sets down a mandatory mechanism whereby those posts are filled. It is as simple as that.

The role of the office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister is defined by existing legislation, which allows the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to designate particular functions to Ministers, including themselves.

Mr Murphy indicated that one of the difficulties with the Government’s December 2004 proposals was that the DUP was talking to the Government, Sinn Féin was talking to the Government, and the Government have an agenda of their own. Therefore, not every nuance of what the DUP said may have been passed on to others, and vice versa. I have no doubt that that was the case, because I have heard things said publicly since 2004, which Sinn Féin indicated that it made it very clear during the negotiations. Those points were never put to us; in fact, quite the opposite was clearly put to us during those negotiations.

I can tell members that throughout those negotiations in the autumn of 2004, we made it very clear that there should be changes to the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister (OFMDFM). We made it clear that there was a lot of duplication in that Department, and that it was doing work that was being done by other Departments. We made it clear that OFMDFM was tying up staff and causing conflicts with officials and we sought changes to that.

Those changes were catered for in paragraph 10 of the proposed comprehensive agreement, under which a reallocation of functions would be available to OFMDFM. Also, under section 17 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998, the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister could determine that one or other of them take responsibility for particular aspects of work. All of that is provided for in existing legislation. It could have been done anyway. That would not mean a change in the role of OFMDFM; it is using the powers that presently exist in legislation to ensure that the Department operates and functions more beneficially.

The First Minister and the Deputy First Minister chanting the same words together does not represent the best use of their talents, quite frankly. It is far better to have agreement on the areas where agreement is necessary, and to carry out the administrative and other work in a separate way. That is the best way to deal with OFMDFM.

Dr Farren: Given what Gregory said earlier about all of the conditions being established whereby we could restore the institutions, he and his community would find it difficult to understand why restoration did not take place due to a failure to agree on the manner in which the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister are put into office. If, in those circumstances, we are talking about the nomination of two people to office, I would find it very difficult to understand any serious objection within the nationalist and unionist communities to the nomination and endorsement of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister by the Assembly in the manner laid down in the Good Friday Agreement. A new era, in the full sense of those words, would not have dawned, but that would be one means of showing that we were beginning a new journey together, with all of the difficulties that will lie in our way.

Mr P Robinson: How do you then hold on to the view that you would somehow be disenfranchised if there were a mechanism that required the whole of the Executive to be voted for?

1.30 pm

Dr Farren: That is because of the significance of the joint nature of the office. I stressed that point last week when we discussed the matter. The office of First Minister and Deputy First Minister is significant because it is — in a general sense — representative of the Assembly and Northern Ireland when we must be represented in some form, particularly outside Northern Ireland. Therefore, there is significance in that joint office that does not apply to any of the other ministerial offices. That significance calls for the office to be treated in a somewhat different way.

Therefore, the greater concern is with respect to having a First Minister and a Deputy First Minister at all, in the sense that the Good Friday Agreement sets out the nature of their responsibilities. That is regardless of the way in which they would be nominated and elected, which is what lies at the heart of the DUP's concerns.

I must reiterate the point that Michael McGimpsey made earlier. The office of First Minister and Deputy First Minister did not fail. It had some significant difficulties; there were blow-ups; and there were problems associated with the duties that they had to discharge jointly. However, despite those difficulties, business was done, agendas were agreed for business, and they did jointly represent the Assembly and Northern Ireland on many occasions. That could be said to have characterised the First Minister and Deputy First Minister when they were David Trimble and Seamus Mallon and, later, when they were David Trimble and Mark Durkan. That office was not a failure in the manner in which the DUP want to characterise it.

Anyone who believes that we will suddenly enter a new dawn or a new era the day after a new Executive is in place is not living in the real world, regardless of whatever means we finally agree to put the Executive place, whether those are the existing means or whether we change them — and I am not endorsing change. We must work our way through the difficulties that exist, and we can do that jointly.

Mr P Robinson: That is a good reason why we should not face that obstacle on the first day.

We really have reached the absurd when the argument for having a joint election is because the First Minister and Deputy First Minister will be going overseas, and that gives the right message. Does anybody really —

Dr Farren: Do not exaggerate what I said, Peter. I made that point among many others.

Mr P Robinson: The Hansard report will show exactly what you said.

Dr Farren: Yes; I made that point, but that is not the only point that I made.

Mr P Robinson: I am addressing that point to show how absurd it is. Does anyone believe that in the United States or in Africa — or anywhere else in the world — when the First Minister and Deputy First Minister arrive off the plane, the first words that every citizen will utter are, “You know they were elected on a joint ticket in the Northern Ireland Assembly”. Frankly, I do not think that that will be uppermost in their minds. The factor that will make any difference is that they hold office, not how they were elected to that office.

Mr Murphy: I wish to make a brief point in relation to the discussion about paragraph 10 of annex B of the December 2004 proposals. There is a clear distinction between the joint operation of the office of First Minister and Deputy First Minister and any decision on the functions of the Department. There was a broad concern in the last Assembly that OFMDFM had a tendency to Hoover up any new issues that arose or any new areas of responsibility. There is a distinct difference between operating at a joint level, and deciding that some of the functions within OFMDFM would be better exercised by or farmed out to another Department. There is a marked difference between those two matters.

Mrs Long: There are two separate questions to consider. First, how are the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister elected to their office? Secondly, do they share joint office? Those two matters can be separated. It is possible, for example, not to specifically endorse the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, separately from the rest of the Executive, yet at the same time to maintain the joint nature of the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. That would be our plan B.

Plan A would be that the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister be endorsed, followed by the rest of the Executive, by a vote of the Assembly. However, if that is not to be, at the very least the entire Executive, including the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, should be endorsed by the Assembly, but their office should be joint. That is our position.

There has been talk of the failure of OFMDFM. Let us put it this way: OFMDFM had failings — if that is a more acceptable way of describing it. One of the major failings from our perspective was OFMDFM’s inability to drive forward the agenda of ‘A Shared Future: Policy and Strategic Framework for Good Relations in Northern Ireland’ until direct rule was reintroduced and made it happen. That does not necessarily mean that the concept of joint working is a failure. It simply means that we need to look closely at how we get to the point where that joint working can happen.

We definitely wish to see the office remain a joint one, but we believe that there is room for discussion. I note that, last week, Peter Robinson specifically mentioned the Assembly’s acceptance, through a vote, of the entire Executive, including OFMDFM.

Mr P Robinson: I said that today as well.

Mrs Long: I was out of the room, so perhaps I missed it today, but that was specifically mentioned. My party would much prefer a situation in which the entire Executive is endorsed by the Assembly. To do so would suggest a greater degree of collectivity within the Executive than there was during the previous Assembly mandate. That can only be a good thing. Decoupling the two votes for the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister is less important than recognising that the entire Executive acts with a collective function. However, we do not believe that those roles should be decoupled. I want to put that on record.

Mr P Robinson: I would make only one distinction. The vote that we would seek is such that A,B,C,D,E and F, etc, be the Executive. Anything other than that leads to people’s picking and choosing, and then we will be into amendments to the effect that such-and-such a person do not be the Minister for the Department of the Environment, and someone else should be. We would be in a real mess if that happens, because it goes against the nominating-officer principle.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): OK. We have probably taken this topic as far as we can. Does anyone have a proposal in relation to the nomination of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister?

Mr P Robinson: You know that there are none that will get consensus, one way or the other.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): OK.

Mr P Robinson: Shall we put that issue in the car park?

Mr Murphy: It will have to be a multi-storey.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Perhaps underground, even.

The matters of the appointment of Ministers and the powers vested in them are linked.

Mr McFarland: We discussed that matter at length last week. To follow Peter Robinson’s point, there is an issue about interfering with the current system by which nominating officers from each party employ the d’Hondt formula internally. Is the Assembly capable of gainsaying the nominating officer of a particular party if Members do not like his or her choice of Minister? What are the outworkings of interfering with the determination that parties, by right, have x number of Ministers in a particular order that we simply run through?

We could, technically, take a vote at the end. However, the logic of taking a vote is that we are able to change something — otherwise there is not much point. We would then be gainsaying the nominating officer of the party, and the question becomes: “Will the party change its mind when a percentage of the Assembly objects to person A being nominated from a particular party?” That would put us in another ball game of amendments and interference, and comments such as, “I don’t like him or her”, etc. That will make a mess of everything.

Mrs Long: When we discussed the issue last week, I said that the Alliance Party was not of the view that Members would try to undermine confidence in particular Members. However, that would certainly be possible, if it were the wish of the Assembly. Given that the four largest parties will be in the Executive, it shall be within their remits to control their members so that that does not happen on the Floor of the Assembly.

The point of the vote is to enhance the degree of collective responsibility. At this stage, the vote may simply be a recognition that those Members with whom another Member enters Government have a right to be there on an equal basis. That was not the case with all Ministers in the last Assembly; some Ministers were not even members of the Executive.

There must be some form of acceptance that, when Members become Ministers, they become members of the Executive and recognise the right of all other parties to be in the Executive on the same basis. The vote allows that to happen.

Ministers can act off their own bats, do all manner of strange things and contrive any degree of disaster. However, if Members have a will to make this work — and we must base this on Members acting in good faith — it will simply be a matter of those parties collectively endorsing the Executive. That would send a clear, important message to the public, and to the other parties, that Members were serious. If Members are not serious, that will become apparent when these types of vexatious proposition begin.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The normal procedure will apply, therefore, with nominating officers appointing Members. Mrs Long’s suggestion is that the Assembly endorses the entire Executive at that stage.

Mr McFarland: In the far-famed comprehensive agreement, there was a proposal to do that, except that any party that did not vote for the Executive would be excluded from it for the four-year term of the Assembly. My understanding was that it was not vital for that proposal to be included in any future discussions and that it disappeared off the scene slightly. Is that still the case or does whoever suggested the proposal still intend that any Member who did not vote for a Minister or for the First Minister and Deputy First Minister will automatically be excluded from the Executive?

Mr P Robinson: If there is a vote, that must be a requirement. It would not be possible to have a Minister in an Executive who is not prepared to vote for the Executive. That would be simply ludicrous.

Mr McFarland: No, but a Member could vote against another Member whom they thought should not be in the Executive.

Mrs Long: That is still ludicrous.

Mr P Robinson: With respect, Alan, you cannot attack the DUP for wanting to change the system because we might not want a certain Member in the Executive and because we believe that a vote should be mandatory and then say that you want to be able to pick and choose at a later stage.

Mr McFarland: I am not saying that; I am merely enquiring. On the one hand, you want to change the vote on the First Minister and Deputy First Minister because you do not want to publicly stick up your hands to vote for Martin McGuinness as Deputy First Minister. On the other, you are happy to have a round-up vote to protect Members from being identified as having objected a particular Member. However, any Member who might wish to abstain, for example, or, indeed, vote against any Minister, will be turfed out of the Executive by law.

Mr Ford: We collectively see this issue as, in effect, the equivalent of the European Parliament endorsing the European Commission. It is not an opportunity for amendment; it is a slate put for endorsement by the legislature as a group. As someone who is unlikely to find himself in that position, I cannot see the circumstances in which a Member would wish to be part of an Executive if they were not prepared to vote for the other members of that Executive.

The Executive is supposed to work together. We have all talked, to a greater or lesser degree, about increasing collectivity and enhancing the operation of the Executive together. To suggest that Members would wish to be part of an Executive when they were not prepared to vote collectively for that Executive suggests that certain Members are trying to maintain the position that one party managed to occupy in the previous mandate of being half in and half out.

Mr McFarland: Why would Members not wish to vote for a Deputy First Minister in a joint office if their party were about to go into the joint office of First Minister and Deputy First Minister? The argument that applies to the thingummy applies to the vote for the First Minister and Deputy First Minister, does it not?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): To look at it another way, is it a bad thing if there is cover for the collective?

Mr Ford: To an extent, that provides both cover for, and recognition by, all Members — at least all Members who aspire to be in an Executive — of all the other Members who have a right to be in an Executive, according to this system. There appear to be benefits both ways.

1.45 pm

Mr McGimpsey: A key provision of this proposal is exclusion; it is not purely about voting and endorsing. If a Member does not vote in favour of the Executive, that Member is excluded. Sinn Féin agreed to the comprehensive agreement and has spent much of this morning talking about the need for inclusion, that a fundamental principle of the agreement is that no party should be excluded and so on. I was pointing out that there are certain instances in which that need not be the case.

This issue is outlined in paragraph 9 of the Annex B proposals on strand one. Although Conor said that the comprehensive agreement is now off the table, we know that, once something is on the table, it will stay there. This proposal was on the table not so long ago. In agreeing to the comprehensive agreement, Sinn Féin was, in fact, agreeing to exclusion.

If a Minister duly nominated to the Executive through d'Hondt decided that he or she could not endorse all his or her colleagues and voted against the Executive, that Minister, and eventually his party, would be excluded. David Ford strongly argued for that; I find that somewhat surprising.

Why can a nominated Minister not register a protest vote? If there is any point in having a vote, a protest vote should be permitted. However, according to the comprehensive agreement, if a Member exercises the democratic right to register a protest vote, he or she will be excluded from the Executive. This is another exclusion provision. How does Sinn Féin feel about that?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I will let Conor reply to that.

Mr Ford: I too wish to reply, as I was specifically named.

Mr Murphy: I have confidence in Sinn Féin's negotiating ability to decide what is on or off the table. Michael seems to think that, when proposals are discussed, they remain on the table for ever. There would be no point in negotiations if we adopted such a defeatist approach.

I have outlined Sinn Féin's position on these proposals on a number of occasions. I will reiterate it: we did not sign up to any comprehensive agreement — there was no comprehensive agreement. Proposals were considered in 2004 in a certain context, which no longer exists. In relation to these specific proposals, I have also said — and the Hansard report can be checked — that Sinn Féin has no history of practising the politics of exclusion at local government level, or at any other level, unlike all the other parties around the table.

Any proposals that Sinn Féin considered concerned locking Members into a working Executive — they were not about locking Members out. During the last Assembly, the UUP and the SDLP agonised over the DUP's refusal to participate in the Executive, that party playing fast and loose with the Executive while holding ministerial power, and what could be done about it. That was discussed on many occasions, but no action was taken.

Mr Ford: Michael McGimpsey said that I spoke strongly for exclusion. I have been speaking about the Alliance Party's proposals, including those that we suggested at Leeds Castle. I have not been speaking about the proposals in the so-called comprehensive agreement, in which we had no part. However, having read those proposals, I note that they mention excluding individual Members, not parties en masse. Michael is getting worked up about that point.

I repeat my earlier point — and I ask Michael specifically: as someone with ministerial experience, why would he want to be part of an Executive if he did not have confidence in its other members? If we are supposed to be enhancing collective responsibility and improving the workings of the Executive, it seems pointless that a Member would wish to be part of a body if he or she did not have confidence in other members of that body. If that is so, such a Member should simply opt out and let those who are prepared to work together to do so.

Mr P Robinson: Michael will also perhaps reply to this point. I am having difficulty in understanding the principle whereby Members want to vote against another Member being in the Executive because his or her presence is so repugnant that Members need to register their votes against that Member, yet not so repugnant that the same Members would not have that Member as a partner in the Executive. I want to understand that principle.

Mr McGimpsey: I do not wish to reiterate what I have just said, but Members have a vote and they should have the right to exercise it. If Members want to state a point of principle or wish to protest about an individual or a party, they should have the right to do so. Let us suppose that Martin McGuinness or Conor Murphy is proposed as Minister for policing after a deal is done between the DUP and Sinn Féin, and Peter Robinson supported that and was prepared to make a deal. David Ford and Peter are saying that I should be excluded if I wish to protest against that. That is neither fair nor just.

Mr Ford: That is specifically not what I said.

Mr McGimpsey: The Executive is an enforced coalition. Perhaps I should not name you, David, because I do not wish to misquote you, and I apologise if I have. However, in an enforced coalition, one can be in an Executive almost against one's will, because that is the way it is set up. The Executive is not a voluntary coalition. If that is the situation, one should have the right to register one's vote. Policing and justice are clearly part of this issue, and a timetable was laid out for that. If, for example, as part of a deal, we end up with Martin McGuinness as Minister for policing, and I am asked to vote for him, and I say that I am not prepared to do so, I would be excluded from office if I were duly nominated. That is neither fair nor just.

Ms Lewsley: The issue is about setting the precedent of exclusion, and bringing that into any new Assembly. In setting that precedent, we will open the door to the use of that exclusion mechanism in subsequent votes. I can understand the problems about people who were half in and half out of the Executive but who were not excluded from the Assembly. Sinn Féin abstained from voting for a First Minister and a Deputy First Minister at one stage, and it was not excluded from the Assembly.

I understand the ethos of having the endorsement of the whole Assembly, but there is a possibility that one or two people from any party could feel so strongly about the make-up of the Executive that they feel that they should have the right to vote against it, and they should not be excluded for that.

Mr McFarland: The argument begs the question: why would one not wish to vote for colleagues in an Executive of which one was part? Why would one not wish to vote for a Deputy First Minister with whom one was going to be joined at the hip in running a country for four years? The DUP argument is that it does not wish to vote for a Deputy First Minister, therefore we should have a split of the OFMDFM vote. There is no point in the DUP's asking why one would not want to vote for that if they are proposing a separate vote, because they do not want to have to vote for a Deputy First Minister.

Mr P Robinson: I got lost in that argument. The position is as I have explained it. If there is a vote, then I vote according to what I want the outcome to be. I would not vote for a Sinn Féin First Minister or a Sinn Féin Deputy First Minister because that is not what I would choose if I had a free choice in the matter. If we are setting up a mandatory system, I do not have any choice in that matter, and a mechanism determines who will take office. I am quite happy that we remove voting from that process in its entirety. Therefore the exclusion mechanism would be removed, there would be no requirement to vote for the Ministers, and there would be no requirement to vote for a First Minister and a Deputy First Minister.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The proposal is that we have no vote at all; that we simply nominate the Executive, the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister.

Mr McFarland: There is no vote for the Ministers at the moment anyway, so the proposal is that we do not have a vote at all for OFMDFM. Is that right? Each party would nominate —

Mr Campbell: The nominating officer would nominate.

Mr McFarland: The nominating officer would nominate. Was it the original DUP proposal that we elect the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister separately?

Mr P Robinson: The original DUP proposal was that the nominating officer of the largest party and the largest designation nominates the First Minister. The nominating officer of the second-largest party and the second-largest designation then nominates the Deputy First Minister.

Mr McFarland: My understanding of the original system was that the nominating officer of the largest party nominates the First Minister, the largest party in the other tradition nominates the Deputy First Minister, and they go forward as a joint nomination. It is a new proposal that those two go forward as a joint nomination without any vote.

Mrs Long: There are a couple of issues to address. First, if the DUP is saying that it does not particularly wish to have any vote, the inconsistency that Alan was trying to highlight has now been made clear.

We have been consistent on that point: we wish to have a vote on the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister and on the entire Executive.

Michael referred to Ministers being in the Executive against their will. Let us be clear: the system is mandatory only inasmuch as the way in which the Executive is formed is mandated. People are not obliged to take their posts. If they feel strongly that others are not suitable partners in the Executive, they have the choice not to nominate Ministers. People cannot be in the Executive against their will. This nonsense about people being forced into the Executive with no choice in the matter pervaded the last Assembly. The nominating officers make the choices on behalf of the parties and put people's names forward. I assume that in democratic parties people have to agree to be nominated for those posts. It is mandatory only in the sense that I referred to earlier. People are not made to take up posts against their will. Perhaps the vote would belie the nonsense that they are made to do so.

Mr P Robinson: That is not quite accurate. Sinn Féin and the DUP have to be represented in the Executive. If they were in opposition they could stop everything.

Mr Long: The votes certainly suggest that for the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, but not for the nominations of the Executive Ministers.

Mr P Robinson: But if they are not in the Executive, they have a veto. If any opposition had that, it would grind the thing to a halt.

Mrs Long: Which they are exercising at the moment.

Mr Ford: Surely, on a mathematical point, unless both of those parties were in opposition and attempting to exercise a veto, they would not be able to since the 60:40:40 voting rule would carry everything except when electing the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister.

Mr P Robinson: Which would bring everything to a halt — you would never get moving.

Mr Ford: You refer to a veto over everything. It does not —

Mr P Robinson: It does. Nothing would move.

Mr McFarland: If you cannot get past first base —

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Can we draw this to a conclusion? The Committee Clerk will read the suggested proposal.

The Committee Clerk: It is proposed that the positions of First Minister and Deputy First Minister be filled by asking the nominating officer of the largest party of the largest designation and the nominating officer of the largest party of the second largest designation to identify their nominees for First Minister and Deputy First Minister respectively.

Mr McFarland: As in the comprehensive agreement?

Mr P Robinson: No. The comprehensive agreement goes on to have a vote.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): There is no vote and no exclusion. It is a nomination.

Do we have consensus on that proposal?

Mr Ford: The proposal does not appear to do anything to enhance collectivity in the Executive, and therefore we oppose it.

Mr P Robinson: Nor does it do anything to harm it.

Mr Ford: We seek to enhance it.

Mr P Robinson: It does not enhance it by any other mechanism either.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We are looking at how to appoint people. Regardless of the enhancement issue, the question is how we get an Executive up and running.

Mrs Long: Are we saying that that is the mechanism by which people's names are put forward? That is the way it is currently done. The issue is what happens after that. At the moment, there is a vote.

Mr P Robinson: Names are put forward by somebody proposing both people.

Mrs Long: We are talking about people putting forward one and then the other. Are we then going to look at how those two are confirmed in post?

2.00 pm

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Their endorsement is another issue. This refers to the appointment of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister and to the appointment of Ministers. Do we have consensus?

Members indicated dissent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): If there are no other proposals, let us move on.

I suggest that we leave discussing appointment to outside bodies until last and deal next with collective responsibility and decision-taking within the Executive.

Mr Murphy: What are we on to next?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The two items are collective responsibility and decision-taking within the Executive. If members are happy, we will leave appointments to outside bodies to a later date.

Mr McFarland: What was appointment to outside bodies about? Refresh my memory. Was it about the North/South Ministerial Council (NSMC)?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I am not au fait with that topic.

Mr P Robinson: Was it the Civic Forum?

Dr Farren: No, it had to do with appointments to outside bodies above a certain level. If my memory serves me correctly, those appointments were not brought to the Executive. They might have been reported to the Executive but they were not brought to the Executive for any level of collective agreement or endorsement.

Mr P Robinson: If you accepted the comprehensive agreement proposals, Ministers would be able to ensure that they were brought to the Executive.

Mr McFarland: Who are we talking about, as a matter of interest?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Perhaps we should discuss this now instead of skipping it.

Mr McFarland: It may not be an issue, in which case we can agree to park it.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The DUP raised it originally so perhaps Peter can clarify matters.

Mr P Robinson: I cannot remember what it was.

Mr McFarland: It is not clear about whom we are talking.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Hansard will have a record of it.

Mr McFarland: It could be appointments to cross-border bodies, or whatever, in which case —

Dr Farren: It is generally understood that nominations to public bodies at a certain level might need to be brought to the Executive's attention.

Mr McFarland: OFMDFM decided quite a lot on its own the first time around, so what you are saying is that now, instead of residing with OFMDFM, those matters should go to the Executive for confirmation. Is that correct?

Mr Murphy: There is a general question mark over how that matter was handled by OFMDFM and about the degree of transparency and accountability that existed.

Dr Farren: It could apply to all Departments; every Minister makes appointments. It is a question of whether some, but not all, of those appointments at whatever level should be notified to the Executive and discussed and endorsed by them. It is a matter of principle. We cannot possibly go through this in any degree of specificity, but we could say that, in principle, to demonstrate the transparency of such public appointments, it might be necessary to bring appointments to the notice of the Executive for endorsement.

Mr McFarland: For the sake of transparency and accountability it would make sense to do that.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do we have a proposal?

Dr Farren: We could agree in principle that public appointments should be endorsed by the Executive but note that we have yet to establish at what level that would be required.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do we have consensus on that?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We now move to collective responsibility and decision-taking within the Executive. We have dealt with some of this already. We are probably repeating ourselves to some extent, but we need to make some decisions.

Dr Farren: I hope I can assume that there has been a general acknowledgement of the need to enhance collective decision-making within the Executive. From time to time, many, if not all, of my fellow Ministers and I would bring proposals to the Executive, only to find that colleagues had not informed their party Members about the proposals in sufficient detail to create the general understanding that would have assisted their endorsement in the Assembly. At times the Executive, if not working against themselves, were certainly not working for themselves 100%.

Some of the necessary measures are straightforward and obvious, such as subcommittees being established within the Executive. At the lower level of suggestions to consider are: putting the ministerial code into legislation, a stronger endorsement of the Programme for Government by all Ministers, and perhaps changes to the protocols whereby Ministers address Executive business with Committees.

Another suggestion is to introduce a code of ethics to the Civil Service that would give it, specifically permanent secretaries, the right to notify the Executive, and the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister in particular, whether Ministers were in breach of Executive decisions or the Pledge of Office.

We need to consider a range of issues, some of which are of greater and some of lesser significance. The SDLP has a brief paper that it can circulate — if members so wish — that contains a number of suggestions. However, some general discussion on matters related to collective responsibility would be useful.

Mr Ford: The fundamental question is whether we are talking about power division between Ministers who operate in Departments as though they were individual fiefdoms, or power sharing at the highest level. It seems logical to the Alliance Party that parties would have an interest in more than just the Departments that they control. If there were greater collectivity in the Executive when discussing the full range of subjects, any power that parties might lose in their own Departments would be gained from having a greater say overall.

Seán spoke from ministerial experience. I noted of his point on Executive subcommittees, and I would like to tease that out a bit further. How the Executive achieves wider collectivity on several key issues is crucial. The Alliance Party has highlighted that in relation to justice. A justice Department simply could not function without collectivity within the Executive. That must be covered by the ministerial code and by agreement on the advanced circulation of papers. Perhaps Executive subcommittees may enable wider discussion of issues before they are announced.

The Alliance Party also referred to the Executive having some method for challenging ministerial decisions. Perhaps three members of the Executive should be able to request from the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister the right to call in a decision of a Minister for full Executive discussion. There is a range of issues but, fundamentally, business must be done notwithstanding the formal constitutional proprieties that mean that Departments have certain responsibilities.

If collectivity is to be enhanced and if the community is to be brought together on issues, there must be a wide-ranging discussion throughout the Executive. Discussion should not be confined to a single Department when key decisions are being taken.

Mr P Robinson: Some of David's remarks are consistent with the Government's proposals for a comprehensive agreement.

If the basis of collective decision-making is to emerge from a ministerial code — which requires Ministers to inform colleagues about decisions and seek approval in certain circumstances — then such a code must have a statutory footing.

Any sensible Minister who requires funding or legislation will wish to bring his Executive and Committee colleagues along with him. It makes sense for a Minister who wants to get his proposal through to seek collectivity in the decision-making process.

As for accountability, there is a need for mechanisms to ensure that a Minister does not attempt a home run and simply leave everybody else behind, uninformed. Such mechanisms should require a Minister to inform his colleagues about major decisions and seek Executive approval for proposals. The mechanism for three Ministers to require a cross-community vote under the present size of the Executive seems sensible. However, if the Executive were reduced to seven Ministers, that figure might well be reviewed.

Mr Murphy: Sinn Féin is quite happy to look at proposals for enhancing accountability and collective responsibility. I referred previously to an incident when one Minister's Executive proposals were voted down in the Assembly by at least two other Ministers, along with their party. That undermined the work of the Executive. We see the way forward through having a ministerial code and putting it on a legislative basis — and I think that there would be scope for agreement among most of the parties. Enhanced accountability could not be viewed as a bad thing. However, there must be a balance between Executive authority and a veto. We would be quite happy to consider enhancing collective responsibility through the use of a ministerial code.

Mr McFarland: This proposal was fairly well developed before the last Assembly broke up. It is not new, and we would support any ministerial code that would increase accountability.

The Committee Clerk: It has been mentioned that the ministerial code be put on a statutory footing; that colleagues should inform each other about major decisions; and that there should be a call-in for controversial decisions. Is that one proposal or three separate proposals?

Mr P Robinson: I might get support for one and not another, so it is probably better to frame them as several proposals.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are there any other proposals?

Mr Murphy: It might collectivise matters to agree to the deployment of the use of a ministerial code to enhance accountability within the Executive.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Does that tie a couple of the proposals together?

Mr P Robinson: One could have a ministerial code without it being on a statutory basis. No sanctions can be applied if the code is not on a statutory basis — it would just be bad politics if it were broken. However, it would be illegal to break the code if it were on a statutory basis.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Would the Clerk please read out the proposals?

The Committee Clerk: The proposal is that the ministerial code be put on a statutory footing.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do we have consensus?

Mr Murphy: The word "agreed" should be included because some work needs to be done on the code.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do we have consensus on the proposal that an agreed ministerial code be put on a statutory footing?

Dr Farren: Is a draft already in existence?

Mr P Robinson: Nobody saw it, other than those on the Executive.

Dr Farren: Sorry?

Mr P Robinson: Nobody saw the draft; it did not go to the Assembly; it was not issued.

Dr Farren: That may have been because of suspension.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Therefore that draft would be available as one of the options.

Dr Farren: Whatever happened, the draft exists, and it might be a useful starting point.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do we have consensus along the lines —

Mr P Robinson: Not all Ministers were given a copy.

Dr Farren: If you had attended meetings, you might have been given it.

Mr P Robinson: Do Ministers have to attend meetings to be given copies of ministerial codes?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): You were going well there for a minute or two, boys. [Laughter.]

2.15 pm

Mr Campbell: We must be clear about collectivity. In the past, there were a couple of references to it when the parties and Ministers voted in one way or another. This discussion, I presume, is in the context of the main parties, and possibly even all the parties, endorsing a process that the Assembly would subsequently endorse.

I know that Seán's reference was an aside, but it would not be a re-run of 1998, when a significant section of one community did not endorse the process. It would not result in a sizeable section of a community refusing to endorse a process. Therefore there would be no objections, and Ministers would not vote in a certain way because their communities had not endorsed the process. On this occasion, both communities would endorse it.

Dr Farren: It is always dangerous to make a statement of fact.

I was just drawing attention to the fact that a draft ministerial code existed. The intention was that it would become law and would, therefore, have been available to all parties in the Assembly.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Perhaps Mrs Dunwoody should read the proposal again.

The Committee Clerk: That an agreed ministerial code be put on a statutory footing.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do we have consensus on that?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Sign it off quickly, Mrs Dunwoody.

The next proposal is that a mechanism be established to ensure that colleagues inform each other of major decisions.

Mr P Robinson: Are we not agreed on the general principle that we should use the proposed ministerial code to increase collectivity?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Yes, and that proposal covers the need for a mechanism to ensure that colleagues inform each other of major decisions.

Mr McFarland: Have we dealt with the Pledge of Office?

Mr P Robinson: We have not reached it yet.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are members agreed on that proposal? Is there consensus on the need for collective responsibility?

Members indicated assent.

Dr Farren: I take it that that assumes that all the other operational issues that it would be associated with have —

Mr P Robinson: That assumes that you agreed to the comprehensive agreement proposals. [Laughter.]

Dr Farren: Do not put words in my mouth. [Laughter.]

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The next issues are the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister's referral to the Executive, the ministerial code, the ministerial code of conduct, and the Pledge of Office.

Mr Ford: Mr Chairman, you did not take any further discussion on my point about Ministers having the power to call in decisions from other Ministers. The DUP referred to it, but other parties have not commented.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do members have any comments to make?

Dr Farren: Would that be dealt with during discussions on the ministerial code?

Mr Ford: If members treat the issue as part of the ministerial-code discussion, that is fair enough.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The next item deals with the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister's referral to the Executive, the ministerial code, the ministerial code of conduct and the Pledge of Office. The requirements for Ministers to attend Executive meetings come under that issue also.

Does the DUP want to open the discussion?

Mr Campbell: We are far too open, that is the problem.

Mr P Robinson: Alan is champing at the bit to get going.

Mr McFarland: I want to discuss the Pledge of Office. It is quite confusing. Paragraph 7 of the Annex B proposals on strand one of the 'Proposals by the British and Irish Governments for a Comprehensive Agreement' says that:

"Reflecting the Pledge of Office, the 1998 Act would be amended to require a Minister to act in accordance with any relevant decisions of the Executive".

That is fairly logical; it refers to the Programme for Government. However, it goes on to say:

"and/or Assembly."

I am worried about the reference to the Assembly because, on occasion MLAs have tabled motions that have been supported in an Assembly vote, and that, under other circumstances, would have required a Minister to act on them.

As members know, some of those votes took place at 4.30 pm, with the bare quorum in the Assembly. I just wonder if the intention was to say that a Minister would be required to act on any relevant decisions of the Assembly. Of course, the first Assembly took a whole swathe of decisions that did not meet ministerial or Executive requirements. If that were included as a requirement, it would open a whole area away from Government, the Programme for Government, and the Executive.

Mr P Robinson: Democracy is an awkward thing, is it not, that the Assembly would have the audacity to take a decision and expect a Minister to act in accordance? It does not stretch the principles of democracy too much for Ministers to abide by a democratic decision of the Assembly. A Minister who knows that a motion relevant to his or her Department is to be debated in the Assembly will have a responsibility to ensure that the whipping arrangements are such that the Assembly does not take a decision that the Minister — if not the Assembly — might later regret.

Mr Campbell: If the Assembly voted to cut a motion that a relevant Minister was seeking to table, the Assembly's decision would be a considerable restraining influence on that Minister's resubmission of that motion. The Minister would know that the Assembly's decision would have to be considered in resubmitting any motion or amendment.

Mr McFarland: We had a lengthy discussion on referrals to the Assembly, cross-community votes and the fact that a motion would simply be sent back to the Executive. This proposal does not suggest that; rather, it suggests that a motion be sent back to the Executive, which is required by law to carry out the instructions of the Assembly. The proposal seems to subsume the process of firing a motion back for reconsideration, on which we spent over an hour's discussion this morning.

Mr P Robinson: A section in the Northern Ireland Act 1998 exercises that precise power on a North/South basis. Can you remind me of it, Seán? The proposal replicates in Northern Ireland what Ministers are required to do on a North/South basis.

Dr Farren: In the Act?

Mr Campbell: In the 1998 Act.

Mr P Robinson: Mark Durkan used to quote the section to me regularly. I cannot remember the exact section, although I remember his regularity in quoting it. [Laughter.]

Mr Murphy: The authors of the comprehensive agreement would need to be spoken to, but the key word in paragraph 7 of annex B on strand one matters is "relevant". A range of decisions is specified. Further work on the ministerial code might make it clearer what specific types of decision require Assembly approval. It must be made part of the pledge of office that Ministers abide by decisions of the Assembly. In relation to which decisions require Assembly approval and which do not, the key word is "relevant".

Mr Ford: Further to Conor's point, surely to "act in accordance with" does not mean to follow slavishly? It means to take note of issues things such as financial resources as well.

Mr P Robinson: In relation to participation on the North/South Ministerial Council, British-Irish Council, British-Irish Intergovernmental Conference and so on, section 52(3) of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 states that a:

"Minister... shall act in accordance with any decisions of the Assembly or the Executive Committee".

If Ministers are expected to act in accordance with decisions of the Assembly in a North/South format, it does not seem unreasonable that Ministers should do so in our own Assembly.

Dr Farren: What happens if an Assembly decision cannot be complied with for budgetary reasons?

Mr Ford: That is where the term "act in accordance with" would take account of realities such as budgetary limitations, equality legislation or any number of other factors.

Dr Farren: Had they attempted to do so, Ministers would have been unable to implement many motions that were passed by the Assembly, as there would not have been the resources to do so.

Mr P Robinson: That is why motions should not be passed in such terms. It is for a proper functioning Executive to ensure that decisions of the Assembly take account of financial restraints.

Dr Farren: Of course, but you and I know that the Assembly is not often minded to do that.

Mr Campbell: A variation on that occurred when we dealt with free personal care in the previous Assembly. There was pretty strong cross-party support on what should be done, but most of us knew that there were financial constraints. While Members voted along the lines of what they wanted to see, they also were reminded very strongly by the relevant Ministers about the practicalities of passing that legislation.

Mr McFarland: It is important that we are clear on the meaning of any proposal; that it is in accordance with the decisions of the Assembly and the Executive; and that it is flexible. It would not do to state in law that Ministers had no option, as you would end up with all sorts of hassle.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): OK. Do members wish to further tie down the ministerial code?

Mr Murphy: We have already discussed that matter, which comes under the previous heading. Unless there are other issues, there was a view that we needed to agree a ministerial code and put it on a statutory footing.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): So it is about taking the matter forward and agreeing on it.

Mr P Robinson: Must the ministerial code be approved by the Assembly?

Mr McFarland: It must be legislated for, so yes, it must be approved.

Mr P Robinson: Whose legislation? Will the code be set up before or after the Assembly is running?

Dr Farren: It was intended to be the Northern Ireland Assembly.

Mr Murphy: I am trying to remember the discussions of the autumn of 1998. According to annex B of the 2004 proposals, the 1998 Act must be amended to put the ministerial code on a statutory footing, so it would not be a matter for Assembly legislation. However, I assume that if all of the parties that intend to be in the Executive agree to the code, it would pass any vote in the Assembly — if one were required.

Mr P Robinson: I asked the second question because, going back to 2004, the issues in the ministerial code were so central to what was required by the DUP, that we would not have assented to the setting up of an Executive until those issues had been resolved. If that had been left to the Assembly, we could not have had the legislation until the Assembly and the Executive were up and running.

Mr McFarland: We talked about an agreed position so, if a proposal could be developed and circulated for agreement among the parties, we would be backing what Peter wants. The Government may well wish to amend the 1998 Act so that a code is in place before an Executive is set up. That would make a degree of sense.

Mr P Robinson: There would have to be an agreed ministerial code anyway. There would not be an agreement otherwise.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): How are members proposing to tie down that matter? Who are we asking to put that together?

Mr P Robinson: That would have to go before all of the parties.

Dr Farren: That is why I referred to a draft. We could look at that draft, provided that it is not beyond amending.

Mr P Robinson: The Government may wish to consult parties on the terms of a ministerial code.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Shall we ask the Secretary of State for a copy of whatever is available at present?

Mr P Robinson: Yes, with a view to reaching an agreed position among the parties that can be put in legislation.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Is that agreed?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We now turn to the code of conduct.

Mr McFarland: Is that the same as the ministerial code? Has someone got confused, or are we talking about the behaviour of individuals?

Mr P Robinson: That is a separate matter.

Mr McFarland: Is it the individual's code of conduct?

Mr P Robinson: No.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are we happy with what we have at present?

Mr P Robinson: I assume that that code of conduct for Ministers included all of those aspects. Did it?

Dr Farren: All of the —

Mr P Robinson: The code of conduct that was in annex A to strand one of the Belfast Agreement?

Dr Farren: Yes.

2.30 pm

Mr P Robinson: That is duplication, to some extent. That code of conduct is replicated in schedule 4 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998, so, unlike the ministerial code, this has a statutory basis. Therefore we are asking the Secretary of State to give the ministerial code a statutory basis as well.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are we agreed on that?

Members indicated assent.

Mr P Robinson: We are changing the heading "Code of Conduct" to "Ministerial Code of Conduct" and making the latter more detailed.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Mr McFarland, do you wish to comment on the Pledge of Office?

Mr McFarland: No, my query has been answered.

Mr P Robinson: The ministerial code of conduct could be a lengthy document that would add to legislation, and you may want to legislate for key elements of it. The leaked copy of your draft proposals for a ministerial code that came my way —

[Laughter.]

Mr Murphy: That must have been that spy ring at Stormont.

Mr P Robinson: It was a thick document — you would need a major drafting process to put that into legislation. There may be key elements on authority, just as in the Local Government Act (Northern Ireland) 1972, which sets out key standing orders, but allows each council to add its own.

Dr Farren: The draft proposals contain the main issues, and then there would be Standing Orders and the normal operational matters.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I am sure that the Secretary of State also has a copy of that.

Does the SDLP have any other issues about the Pledge of Office?

Dr Farren: You have caught me unawares.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I apologise.

The other issue that we need to deal with is the requirement on Ministers to attend Executive meetings. Again, that could come under the heading “Ministerial Code of Conduct”.

Mr Ford: With regard to the Pledge of Office, there must be a requirement in that to support the rule of law.

Mr McFarland: Absolutely.

Mr Murphy: I would not consent to change the Pledge of Office yet. Support for rule of law is a broad topic. I presume that, when we get to the stage of forming an Executive, outstanding issues in relation to policing matters will have been resolved — perhaps, we could reconsider it then. However, where outstanding policing and justice matters have not been resolved, I reserve the right to refuse consent to that.

Mrs Long: The rule of law is much broader than simply accepting the structures for policing. That may be part of it, and signing up to those structures may be part of it, but the rule of law is about something more fundamental than simply accepting policing arrangements. It is important, not only for the stability of future institutions, but for the stability of the society in which we live, that there is common understanding of the rule of law and that that is signed up to by everyone in Government.

Mr P Robinson: Does the responsibility of Ministers not go beyond their signing up to support for the rule of law? They must also encourage others to do so.

Mrs Long: Absolutely.

Mr P Robinson: There is overlap here with some of the work of the PFG Committee dealing with law and order issues. We may want to reflect this discussion to it to see if it will make some recommendation to us or vice versa.

Mr McFarland: The Wednesday team has an entire section on this that we have not reached yet. It is a key issue for discussion.

Dr Farren: We could not expect Ministers to do anything other than pledge to uphold the rule of law. The suggestion that they would have to encourage others to do the same is essentially a party matter. The Pledge of Office should simply include that Ministers would uphold the rule of law.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Can we take it that this all will become part and parcel of any code of conduct and ministerial code and that it will have to be agreed at a further stage within this discussion?

Mr P Robinson: The issue is whether it is in the Pledge of Office or the ministerial code.

Mr Ford: The Alliance Party sees it as being part of the Pledge of Office although I suspect that the detailed discussion on the code will impinge on the pledge. As long as we are not regarding the issue as closed at this stage then that is fair enough.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do you have a particular proposal? I do not think we will get consensus.

Mr Ford: There appears to be an acceptance that the issue is for discussion as we go into detail on the code.

Mr Murphy: And among the PFG Committee dealing with law and order matters.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Is there consensus?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): As regards the requirement for Ministers to attend Executive meetings, should that matter be slotted in under the heading “Ministerial Code of Conduct”?

Mr P Robinson: Subject to some conditions, I assume. Ministers may not always be able to be at meetings.

Dr Farren: The principle should be that they do attend.

Mr McFarland: Did we cover decision-making within the Executive — presumably that means the system for taking decisions — and the First Minister and Deputy First Minister’s referral of items to the Executive? If not, are we coming back to them?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We actually opened with the latter item.

Mr McFarland: What was the Committee’s decision?

Mr P Robinson: We did not decide whether there should be a cross-community vote on the Executive, for instance.

Mr McFarland: I am thinking that we will have the First Minister and Deputy First Minister busy glad-handing the world, running their little Department etc, and chairing the Executive. Presumably, like other Ministers, they will bring departmental issues to the Executive; or are we talking about a special system for them to refer non-departmental issues?

The Chairperson (Mr Molloy): Basically, the collective responsibility proposals covered that as regards sharing information between Executive members. It would also be part of any ministerial code.

Mr P Robinson: I have no difficulty with how things will get to the Executive. However, how will decisions be taken within the Executive? I assume that Ministers will pass issues up to the First Minister and Deputy First Minister that they need discussed, and presumably the First Minister and Deputy First Minister will put down issues they need discussed. They will set the agenda and therefore they will bring the issues to the Executive meeting.

Mr McFarland: As we have several ex-Ministers here, it might be worth it — for the rest of us who were not privy to the inner council meetings —

Mr P Robinson: You make it sound like UDA meetings.

Mr Murphy: Just slip in there for a minute.

Mr McFarland: It would be useful if we could just have a canter round how the Executive meetings worked for our benefit, what the implications are for a new Executive and whether it would work in the same way.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Peter wasn't at the Executive table, so I will move to Seán.

Mr P Robinson: I was not on the inner council either.

Dr Farren: What is the question precisely?

Mr McFarland: Would you remind us how the Executive operated, and whether there are implications for the new Executive? Those of us who were not in the first Executive will be curious about how it operated.

Dr Farren: There are no mysteries about how it operated, if you are talking about how business found its way onto the Executive agenda.

Mr McFarland: Yes, and how decisions were taken, because as I understand it, if there were three members of the Executive there was a veto —

Mr P Robinson: That is what is being suggested by David and myself.

Mr McFarland: Therefore the question is that if there are four other members on the Executive, do they outweigh the veto even though they are from different parties, or is it the three from the single party who hold the veto?

I am curious how all that will work in the new DUP/Sinn Féin Executive. [Laughter.]

Dr Farren: It must be remembered that we were not working to any formal set of rules, and as much consensus as possible was sought on particular issues.

On two or three occasions, the Executive voted almost in a straw poll to try to achieve the maximum consensus. There might have been acquiescence from those Ministers who were not strongly in favour of an issue or proposal. For instance, a ratio of 6:2 was enough to suggest that it was better to accept something than to continue opposing it to the point where it became clear that the Executive would have divided on an issue.

Mr P Robinson: In the future, the Executive will probably attempt to achieve consensus in that way 99% of the time, when some Ministers will not feel strongly enough about an issue to divide on it. However, if an issue arises on which the Executive are divided, is a cross-community vote required? Would three members have to trigger a cross-community vote by indicating that they considered an issue so important as to warrant such a vote?

Dr Farren: Those issues were discussed under the "Ministerial Code of Conduct" heading and were not fully resolved.

Mr McGimpsey: The Executive's practice was to operate by seeking consensus. If it came to the crunch and no consensus was achieved, any three Ministers could veto. There were 10 Ministers at the table: the First Minister, the Deputy First Minister and eight Ministers; and any three Ministers could veto a decision by the Executive. That was not laid down in a code; it was the Executive's custom and practice.

A Minister was expected to bring any business to the Executive's agenda, which was agreed by the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. They decided what was on the agenda and what was not. There was nothing complicated about the process. The First Minister and the Deputy First Minister had the important role of co-ordinating the agenda and Executive Committees.

Mr P Robinson: Sometimes, however, the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister included subjects, rather than proposals, on the agenda. Therefore, they could agree that a certain issue should be on the agenda, but they might not have considered the resolution of that issue. That did not stop a potentially divisive issue being included on the agenda.

Mr McFarland: This type of detail is probably fundamental to the eventual success of the Executive. Is there any merit in establishing a small working party to work with the Secretary of State to identify what should, and should not, be included in any documents relating to the workings of the Executive, and the level of detail required?

It is important that such detail is right at the beginning. If we expect the Government to amend the Act in advance of any deal, it would make sense to do some homework. Whether that is done by the NIO or by the parties, we must get more detail on it. Potentially, the parties could be doing a deal, only to discover fundamental disagreements about how Executive decisions are taken, weightings and so on. It would be better to do the homework earlier rather than later.

It will obviously be worthwhile to take the Secretary of State's view on this. It may also be worthwhile establishing a working group with the NIO, comprising a member from each party to attempt to agreement on the detail of this issue.

2.45 pm

Mr P Robinson: I suspect that there is more knowledge in this room than in the NIO about what happened in the Executive. There is no major issue about how a matter gets on the agenda — it will simply happen. However, when the matter comes to the Executive and does not get agreement there, the options are: to have a veto system where a certain number can veto an issue; to require cross-community support; to have a regular majority vote, or to have a majority vote on all issues, unless a certain number are required for a cross-community vote.

Dr Farren: There are many informal avenues to be pursued before a decision is made. Matters should be foreseen early enough and issues tested out, and advisers played a role in that. There was a weekly meeting of advisers, which helped to filter some matters in preparation for an Executive meeting, so that things could be agreed in advance, and the meeting did not get clogged up with unnecessary detail.

Major issues will not come up at the last minute — they will come up with a degree of foresight, and, if there are cross-departmental implications, informal discussions must take place between the Ministers involved. Most issues have budgetary implications anyway, so there is a great deal of toing and froing with the Minister of Finance and DFP officials before matters are brought to the Executive.

Some matters will come to Executive meetings even though no agreement has been reached on them. In that case, the mechanisms that we are discussing will be introduced, using a simple majority, a weighted majority, objections by three Ministers, or whatever is the appropriate number. We need to have a mechanism, but matters do not necessarily have to come to that point. A lot of the groundwork can be cleared by good preparatory discussions.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Perhaps officials and parties could draw up some ideas on that.

Mr P Robinson: It would be useful if we could find out the extent to which the operation was simply on the basis of custom and practice, the extent to which requirements are set down in legislation and, under “Ministerial Code of Conduct” — albeit a ministerial code that had not been approved by the Assembly — the extent to which those procedures were set out. If we had that, we could pick the best procedures and decide how to entrench them.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We will come back to the Committee on that point. We will deal now with the functions of OFMDFM under the heading “Efficiency/Effectiveness”.

Mr McFarland: Where do we park the subheading “Where power is vested in NI”, because we cantered around that earlier? Peter Robinson wanted to have power devolved to the Assembly. Did we have a discussion on that?

The Committee Clerk: It was discussed this morning, but the Committee did not reach a conclusion on it.

Mr McFarland: I know that it was discussed, but has it been parked? Are we coming back to it, or is it a dead issue?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): There were no conclusions — there was merely a discussion. It is still in the car park. It is something that the Committee will have to come back to and finalise. The papers are there for members to read. We will put it on a future agenda.

Mr McFarland: Peter Robinson was keen to have power devolved to the Assembly. Is that parked, or are we coming back to it? At what stage are we likely to come back to it?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): It is up to the Committee to decide what it wants to do with it.

Mr P Robinson: I got the impression that there was no consensus on it.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): There was no consensus on it.

Mr McFarland: If that is where it is, there is no problem — I was merely inquiring.

Mr Campbell: If there is consensus on it, that will move us on quickly.

Mr McFarland: I was not trying to raise anything; I was simply inquiring about what stage it was at.

Mr P Robinson: We would have preferred there to be power devolved to the Assembly or Executive collectively. If it was not to be so, and it was to remain with Ministers, we would need to have some mechanism in place to ensure that Ministers become accountable to their Executive colleagues and, ultimately, to the Assembly.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): That takes us back to the code of conduct. All of those issues come under that.

Mr McFarland: That is fine.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): OK. We will move to the functions of OFMDFM, the number of Departments, the implications of the Review of Public Administration (RPA) and the devolution of policing and justice.

Mr Murphy: The first matter is straightforward. There was a concern, although perhaps not among all of the parties, about the number of functions that had been absorbed into OFMDFM during the previous Assembly mandate and about the lack of functions in other Departments. Essentially, it is up to the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister — when they are elected — to agree those functions, as well as the number of Departments. If others wish to have a discussion aimed at reaching agreement among all the parties, we are happy to discuss functions. We shall not argue for a reduction in the number of Departments, but we are willing to look at the list of OFMDFM functions to see whether some of them would be better transferred to other Departments.

Mr McFarland: This is a complex issue, and we have had several discussions on it. The difficulty is the number of imponderables, such as the issue of policing and justice. The PFG Committee dealing with law and order, which meets on Wednesdays, has taken a general view that those functions should not be split into two Departments, which obviously makes matters easier in that we would have only one Department to find. We currently have 10 Departments, and if we are going to create a policing and justice Department, logically, something else has to give.

Many of the parties went into the most recent election promising a re-examination of the number of Departments. There was a general view that there were too many, and that they were too costly. The RPA will have implications for areas that will leave Departments to become the responsibility of local councils. That also raises the question of OFMDFM.

We shall probably not reach a complete resolution on this matter, not least because the policing issue is likely to be outstanding for a while before an election or before a Government is set up again. The question is whether this topic is best left to the far-famed efficiency system that we had decided would examine such issues after the Assembly was up and running.

Mr Ford: We can at least agree that there are too many functions within OFMDFM, but I wonder whether a Committee is the right place to start going into detail. We remember some of the discussions in 1999 that led to the setting up of the Departments.

We also all seem to agree in principle on the devolution of justice. As Alan said, it would be preferable to have only one Department. I am not sure, however, that we simply need to free up one of the current Departments. It certainly seems to my party that there are too many Departments, regardless of whether justice is to be devolved. We should be looking at a wholesale review of the number of Departments at the same time as examining the functions of OFMDFM. In many senses, that would be better done before an Executive were composed.

We may then need to take account of the issue of junior Ministers, which the agreement did not cover. If we found ourselves with only six or seven Departments, it might be that some would be bigger than others and would require a junior as well as a full Executive Minister. That has not been covered insofar as we had only two junior Ministers in OFMDFM. Ideally, that Department would not have hundreds of functions and would be the one least likely to need junior Ministers.

Mr P Robinson: But most likely to get them.

Mr Ford: I could not possibly comment.

Dr Farren: I am sorry; I lost my train of thought for a second. There is consensus on the need to examine the range of functions within OFMDFM, with a view to reducing their number.

Obviously, the devolution of policing and justice will necessitate a reconfiguration of departmental portfolios. I am never completely convinced by the argument that too many Departments — 10, in our case — make for inefficient Government. It is the range of functions and services that absorbs resources, not the top tier of ministerial offices. Having six or 10 Departments does not make a great difference in the amount of required ministerial resources. If we take on board David Ford's argument that we need junior Ministers to take charge of subsections of large Departments, we will end up in a similar situation as already exists with 10 Departments.

One benefit of having 10 Departments was that the spotlight was turned on services that never received the same degree of attention when they were part of much larger Departments. Ministers would answer questions in the Assembly about services that, in the normal course of events, might have got very little attention during Question Time. Also, delegations came along to meet the Minister to address particular issues. If a large range of functions and services were under the control of a Minister, he or she would not have time to meet all of the delegations that might wish to raise particular issues.

There are benefits in having 10 Departments, as opposed to the six or seven that seem to be preferred by those who believe that there is merit in reducing that number. Obviously, the number of departmental portfolios must be put under the spotlight because of the arrival of policing and justice, the need to reconfigure, and the question of OFMDFM's functions. I am not sure that we will be able to do much of that specific work within the context of this Committee. However, that work must be done.

Mr P Robinson: I will cover the two points with which we have been dealing. First, I do not feel that OFMDFM has too much work to do — I do not object to the Department having plenty to do. My problem is when it gets involved in areas that are better placed elsewhere, and that, in some cases, have already been placed with other Departments. I am more concerned about duplication than whether the Department has too much work. Frankly, there is not an awful lot of day-to-day executive decision-making in OFMDFM; it plays much more of a co-ordinating role. That is not to minimise its role, which is very significant. It is all the more significant when one is trying to co-ordinate the efforts of Ministers from a wide range of parties.

Realistically, the number of Departments cannot be changed during the course of an Assembly term. After an election — of which nobody knows the outcome — everyone will start looking at the numbers based on what suits their party at that moment. That must be decided in advance. For example, we could say that, from the next election, there will be X number of Departments.

I do not wish to make too many proposals today that would be consequent on the devolution of policing and justice. That may not be imminent, so I do not think that we should ditch Departments simply to make way for that. We might be waiting a long time for that to happen.

3.00 pm

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Where do we go from here?

Mr P Robinson: Section 17 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 provides the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister with a legal responsibility to determine the number of Departments and their functions. I am unsure to what extent that power can be taken from the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. Although that power will rest with those Ministers, any decision is subject to the will of the Assembly.

We are simply highlighting that the obligation in section 17 will have to be addressed at a very early stage by the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, to determine the number, and function, of Departments, and bring a report thereon to the Assembly. Furthermore, if the number of Departments is to be changed, we are emphasising that it would be better to do so in advance of an election for what should occur thereafter.

Mr McFarland: That makes sense. In relation to the RPA, there are all manner of implications about what powers rest with what bodies, for what areas councils will assume responsibility and so on. Everything will presumably be clearer if Sinn Féin and the DUP reach the stage of forming an Executive, because several issues that are currently clouded will be clarified in the process of the two parties forming an Executive.

If Departments are to be merged, it will obviously interfere in people's lives and jobs, with trades unions becoming involved. The Committee will not have that fairly substantial planning process completed by the autumn. However, it would be sensible to try to add some detail to that process between the formation of an Executive and the next election.

Mr Campbell: The RPA will have immediate and obvious implications for two Departments that are already quite closely related. Some people would argue that the functions of those Departments should have remained within a single Department, but I shall set that aside.

There are several quite obvious and significant immediate consequences for a small number of Departments, aside from any political implications or any consideration of a reduction in the number of Departments.

Until the implications of the RPA become absolutely clear, it is difficult, though not impossible, to envisage how many Departments there should be. However, the ramifications of the RPA, and what will inevitably follow from its implementation, should not be avoided, whether they are felt shortly, or some time, thereafter.

Mr P Robinson: That depends, of course, whether an election will be held before or after the implementation of the RPA.

Let us be very clear: significant savings are to be made with a reduced number of Departments. A Department is not simply the Minister — he or she is very small beer. Removing a junior ministerial post, for example, would save around £10,000 — I cannot remember the exact figure. However, removing an entire Department would involve getting rid of the ministerial private office, the senior staff that are involved in running that office and all the logistics that are required to run an office. The potential savings for a private office run into millions of pounds.

Dr Farren: Not at all, Peter.

Mr P Robinson: Of course they would.

Dr Farren: The savings might be in the region of millions, but, in the context of the Budget, that is a very small figure. Savings depend on how the balance between political gain and operational efficiencies is struck. A Department that is headed by one Minister, for example, would have only one private office.

The issue should be considered in the wider context. I hope that Michael McGimpsey will not mind me referring again to the Department of which he was Minister. A spotlight was put on the services for which Michael's Department was responsible, which would not have existed had there not been a Minister with that particular portfolio. Indeed, the same could be said of a number of Ministers in the previous Executive.

Mr P Robinson: It could be argued that some of the responsibilities of that Department would be ideal for transfer to the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. It would allow a number of those issues to be highlighted, and would give the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister something to get out and about with, which is currently lacking in that office.

Dr Farren: Let us put all that into the mix.

Mr Murphy: I am content with the proposition for the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to resolve this and proposals go to the Assembly for debate. My only concern is the reference to altering the number of Departments after an election. I know that Peter is pessimistic about the prospect of the devolution of policing and justice, but I would not want to postpone that until after an election. If the transfer of powers for policing and justice requires a shake-up, Sinn Féin would want that to happen as soon as possible rather than put it off until after an election.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are we agreed that the remit of OFMDFM should be reviewed?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): By whom, asks the Committee Clerk.

Mr McFarland: The proposal was that the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister review the functions between the setting up of an executive and the next election, so that it all goes live at the next election. Is that correct, Peter?

Mr P Robinson: Yes.

Mr Murphy: That is fine as long as we are quite clear that that does not interfere with the process of transfer of powers for policing and justice, and that it is not accepted that such a thing could not happen beyond another election.

Mr P Robinson: I do not think that that issue will delay the devolution of police and justice.

The Committee Clerk: Is the proposal that, at an early stage, the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister review the number of ministerial offices to be held by Northern Ireland Ministers and the functions to be exercised by the holder of each such office, and bring recommendations to the Assembly?

Some Members: Including their own office.

The Committee Clerk: Including their own office.

Dr Farren: I have some reservations about that being left exclusively to the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. I know that Peter has quoted the legislation —

Mr P Robinson: Do you want to change the Belfast Agreement, Seán?

Dr Farren: Consultation is required. Given that quite a wide-ranging consultation took place before the existing set of portfolios was established, it should be understood that there should be consultation on the issues that we are discussing. Also, we are not conceding anything on the number of Departments.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We will add a line to reflect that.

Dr Farren: The proposal should say “in consultation with the parties”.

Mr McFarland: That is a safeguard, just in case.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The last point was about stability. Does anyone have anything further to add to that?

Mr P Robinson: On the previous proposal, it occurs to me that, if we had a Committee of the Centre with the same powers as any of the other departmental Committees, presumably it would have the ability to question the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister on those issues and be consulted about their functions. The First Minister and the Deputy First Minister would want to consult their Committee and perhaps the Executive. That is somewhat different from consulting just the parties.

Dr Farren: Perhaps the proposal should read “consult with all relevant interests in the Assembly”.

Mr P Robinson: Or “after consultation”.
[Laughter.]

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The final issue is the Civic Forum, which the Alliance Party has put on the agenda.

Mr P Robinson: Abolish it.

Mr Kennedy: Agreed. [Laughter.]

Mr Ford: We mentioned it in our presentation. I do not remember making a great meal of it — says he, looking for his papers.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): It says here that it is a make-or-break issue. [Laughter.]

Mrs Long: We should make clear at the outset that we are not making the Civic Forum a precondition to the restoration of devolution.

Mr Campbell: We have consensus on that.

Mr Ford: I thought that Gregory was about to add something.

Dr Farren: Is the proposition that the Civic Forum cease to exist or is the absence of debate an assumption that it will continue?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): That is in your hands.

Mr McFarland: From our point of view, the Civic Forum was an issue with which the Women's Coalition was obsessed at the fifty-ninth minute of the very last hour of debate on the agreement. In order to finish, everyone said, "Oh, all right, then."

During the first four years of its existence, the Civic Forum proved beyond doubt that it was of no value. Even the forum's members privately admit that they quickly understood that it was not going to do anything. Given the checks and balances in the Assembly, particularly with regard to Committees, and the fact that anyone could appear before a Committee, the views of civic society were well represented.

We should encourage anyone from civic society who has any proposals for Government, amendments to legislation or anything else to offer to do so. The first approach should be through the relevant Assembly Committee. That is the route through which general society can make its voice heard.

The Civic Forum was expensive, its attendance fairly sporadic, and its members got fed up and did not bother much with it. It did not do anything that could not have been achieved through Assembly Committees.

Dr Farren: Earlier, I defended the concept of the Civic Forum. The fact that the Civic Forum is provided for in the Good Friday Agreement does not mean that it was agreed at the fifty-ninth minute. I remember discussing such a forum with the Women's Coalition and others much earlier than that. There is a value in having some form of continuous engagement with what we understand to be civic society, and we feel wedded to the particular forum that emerged from OFMDFM.

Notwithstanding Alan's suggestions about how to tap into the opinions of civic society in general, there is value in maintaining a forum of some description. Positive consideration should be given to maintaining the forum and how it can most effectively be shaped.

I envisage the future contribution of the Civic Forum as considering medium- to longer-term policy issues, rather than addressing the business of Assembly Committees, which deal with ongoing business. A medium- to longer-term perspective on key issues would be helpful. Although the Executive or Assembly would not be bound to adopt any recommendations, the forum could provide different areas of civic society with an avenue to inform the Assembly in a concerted way that would not otherwise be available.

The forum is valuable, and we should seek to sustain it. However, consideration could be given to its operation, structure and future remit.

3.15 pm

Mr Murphy: As I agree with much of what Seán said, I will be brief. The purpose of this Committee, besides discussing the operation of the institutions, is to build a way out of conflict. The responsibility for that extends beyond the people who are elected to the Assembly. Others in society have a role to play in commenting more widely than would be possible through the method that Alan McFarland advocates, which is through giving evidence to Committees. Such people can make a broader contribution than by simply giving their views on whichever narrow issues a Committee may want to hear evidence.

There is a role for ongoing engagement with representatives of civic society, as we try to chart our way from conflict to a better future for all. We should encourage a broader ownership than that that simply rests with the political parties. Whether that comes through the Civic Forum or a similar body, the rationale remains sound, and perhaps only the operation and make-up of the body require further consideration.

Mr Ford: There were difficulties with the composition of the Civic Forum. I am not sure that having six nominees from the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister was the best way to represent civic society outside party politics. Undoubtedly, there were problems with the internal workings of the Civic Forum, partly because of the unclear and limited remit that it was given in its first mandate.

Without wishing to repeat much of what Seán and Conor have said, the Alliance Party feels that the Civic Forum has its virtues. Undoubtedly, Alan's point about civic society being able to engage with Committees when they were conducting detailed inquiries or doing detailed work on legislation is correct. However, that did not mean that people got the macro-picture; they got only a series of micropictures. Perhaps if the Civic Forum had had a formal right to comment on the Programme for Government and proposals for legislation, rather than getting sucked into the minutiae of a few small details, it could have taken a wider look at the overall direction of this society as it seeks to move out of conflict. Such a remit should expressly be given to the Civic Forum to enable it to continue. Perhaps the Civic Forum requires more resources to fulfil that remit, but at least it would then be doing something worthwhile with them. It was given neither the resources nor the remit in its first instance.

Mr P Robinson: There seems to be some perverse view, certainly unproven, that civic society has one view. Civic society does not have one view; it has dozens, if not hundreds, of views on various issues. The way to ensure that having or expressing a view becomes useless is to have members of the Civic Forum appointed in the way that they were previously. Effectively, those appointed had gone through the sieves of two of the political leaders. That resulted in the two sets of views from civic society that were the least offensive to the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister being heard, rather than a broad range of opinions.

I am generally in agreement with Seán. Civic society has a contribution to make, but why must it be formalised in the way that has been suggested? Under the Civic Forum proposal, its duty was to bring views to the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. Why can we not simply place a responsibility on the First Minister and Deputy First Minister to arrange to communicate regularly with civic society and to facilitate it expressing its view on various issues to the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister? We can do that without going through the expensive charade of having a Civic Forum that is made up of those who are acceptable to two people.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Is there a proposal?

Have we consensus on that? I suspect not.

Mr Murphy: I know that Alan has fixed views on the uselessness of the Civic Forum, but perhaps we should look at ways of engaging civic society. That leaves open the possibility of retaining the Civic Forum or finding a better way for civic society to interact, formally or informally, with this institution. There may be consensus that it would be a good idea to broaden the interaction between politicians and civic society beyond bringing in people to give evidence to Committees. However, further discussion and agreement are required on how that should operate.

Ms Lewsley: I attended at least three Civic Forum meetings at which the public was permitted to contribute. Regardless of the work carried out by the Civic Forum or the documents worked on, those meetings were well attended, and the public showed a lot of interest in what was going on. They felt that the Civic Forum was somewhere where they had ownership of the process and where their voices could, hopefully, be heard. I accept what people say; the make-up of the Civic Forum and some of its actions may not have been ideal, and it should be reviewed. However, it offers civil society a voice and gives it a sense of ownership of the process.

Alan McFarland said that people had the opportunity to come before Committees, but when I was on Committees, I noticed that the same faces always came forward with evidence. Therefore the ordinary person on the street was not taking that opportunity, except when they got the chance to meet the Ministers through us.

Mr P Robinson: The Civic Forum was not made up of the ordinary people on the street; it was the chosen ones.

Ms Lewsley: The membership was representative, and they cascaded the information to those they represented.

Mr P Robinson: They were representative of the First and the Deputy First Minister's choices.

Mr McFarland: A small section of the Civic Forum's membership was appointed by the OFMDFM, and the remainder was selected by the churches and unions. Therefore the entire membership was not chosen by the First and the Deputy First Minister, although it was appointed eventually by their Department. The membership of the forum came from various areas of society that were specified by the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister.

It is healthy to have a link with civic society and for civic society to be able to make its views known, but that was not implemented properly through the Civic Forum. If one wants to find the views of the churches or the medical profession, there should be a way for that to happen. The Health Committee was never stuck for views from the unions, specialists, psychiatrists or paediatricians. There may have been others who were not able to access those Committees or Ministers, and we have to find a way to correct that. It is healthy to be able to give views to those who make laws.

People were not encouraged by the Civic Forum. It was not effective in making its views known, and its members will say openly that they got fed up because it did not do anything constructive. In the end, many of them voted with their feet and did not attend the meetings.

Mr Campbell: I venture to propose that the DUP supports further consideration of discussion on a Civic Forum-type body and any usefulness that it may serve. However, I suggest that its implementation and establishment is not a barrier to the further establishment of an Executive.

Mr P Robinson: Or perhaps at a lower level, are we agreed that we should review the mechanisms for civic society to promote its views?

Mr Murphy: That is similar to my proposal, and I am happy to be subsumed into that. There is a broad acceptance that there is a need for engagement with civic society. In agreeing that, it does not preclude people arguing for the reinstatement of the Civic Forum, but it allows us to examine it and other options that others feel might improve the interaction between this institution and civic society.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Shall I ask the Committee Clerk to read the proposal again?

The Committee Clerk: Mr Campbell, do you want me to repeat your proposal, which is to review the ways in which civic society may engage with this institution?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do we have consensus on that matter?

Members indicated assent.

Dr Farren: That is fine, as long as it does not assume that we are consenting to abolish the civic forum.

Mr Murphy: I made that clear.

Mr Campbell: Equally, we are not agreeing to its continuation. [Laughter.]

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): OK. We have reached agreement on that matter.

That brings us to the end of the strand one issues that we wished to deal with. Next week, we will deal with strand two.

Members have received a letter from the Northern Ireland Youth Forum about the work of the Subgroup on the Economic Challenges facing Northern Ireland. The forum will not be available to provide evidence to the subgroup until after the 25 August deadline. The letter requests permission to provide evidence later, without holding up the report. Are members content with that?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Is there any other business?

Members indicated dissent.

Adjourned at 3.26 pm.

COMMITTEE ON THE PREPARATION FOR GOVERNMENT

Wednesday 16 August 2006

Members in attendance for all or part of proceedings:

The Chairman, Mr Jim Wells
Mr Alex Attwood
Mr Fred Cobain
Mrs Arlene Foster
Mrs Dolores Kelly
Mr Gerry Kelly
Mr Danny Kennedy
Mrs Naomi Long
Mr Fra McCann
Mr Alan McFarland
Mr Sean Neeson
Mr Peter Weir
Mr Sammy Wilson

Witness:

Mr Tim Moore (Senior Research Officer,
Northern Ireland Assembly)

The Committee met at 10.04 am.

(The Chairman (Mr Wells) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Wells): When I was sitting in on Monday's meeting, I heard the odd sound that indicated that some people had their mobile phones switched on. Everyone must switch off his or her mobile phone. The Editor of Debates has informed us that some of the recording has been lost because of mobile phone interference, so somebody was illicitly listening to something. Therefore, please turn off your mobile telephones.

Mr Kennedy: Chairman, have you ever considered that that might be in the public interest?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Something may have been said of such importance that it would be a pity to lose it.

Can members indicate whom they are representing today?

Mrs Foster: I am here for Lord Morrow; Sammy Wilson will be here in place of Ian Paisley Jnr, and Mr Weir is here for Rev William McCrea.

Mr McFarland: Mr Cobain is here for Mr McNarry.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I thought that you said Mr Beggs.

Mr Cobain: I wish that Mr Beggs were here.

Mr Weir: So do we. [Laughter.]

Mr Neeson: I am here for Mr Ford.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Alex, who is on your team?

Mr Attwood: Am I here as myself? I will take your guidance on it, Chair.

The Committee Clerk: Mark Durkan, Alasdair McDonnell and Seán Farren are the three nominated SDLP representatives. We shall work it out.

Mr G Kelly: I am here for Mr McGuinness, and Fra McCann is here for Conor Murphy.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Will there be a third member from your party?

Mr G Kelly: A third member will not be present today.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): At least one new member is present this morning, so are there any declarations of interest to be made?

Mr Kennedy: I arrived late at the previous meeting, but I said at the time that I was a member of the Northern Ireland Policing Board. That does not appear to be recorded in the draft minutes.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is very important that that be recorded.

Mrs Foster: Chairman, must we declare interests at every meeting?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Only if it is a member's first appearance at a meeting, and he or she is a member of the Policing Board, a district policing partnership (DPP), MI5 or the security forces.

Mr Cobain: Do not say that or everyone will put their hand up.

Mr G Kelly: Welcome to MI5.

Mr Kennedy: You said that you would not say that.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): If you are being paid by the intelligence services, you must declare it.

Mr Weir: It is purely voluntary work.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Members should have had a chance to look at the draft minutes of 9 August. Are there any amendments or additions? I have noted that Mr Kennedy's declaration of membership of the Policing Board was not recorded. I take it that the draft minutes are acceptable.

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is our first consensus of the morning.

I now move to matters arising. I chaired the meeting at which these matters were raised, and I recall it vividly. Several members requested that research documents be prepared. Mr Alban Maginness asked for a paper on the functions of the Lord Chancellor, particularly his role in the Judicial Appointments Commission. That was an especially difficult task, but it has been done. A paper was also requested on excepted and reserved matters. From memory, I think that Mr Maskey asked for a definition of national security. Those papers arrived this morning. That was quite a tall order, given that this is the holiday period. I am conscious that it may not be reasonable to ask members to discuss those documents now.

We have two options: we can adjourn for an hour, and rooms are available to which members can adjourn to examine the papers, or we can defer consideration of the material until next week's meeting and deal with the other issues that are listed for discussion. Of course, we can also discuss the papers straight away.

We are trying to arrange for Minister Maria Eagle, whom I have not yet met, to attend next Wednesday's meeting. It may dovetail nicely if we discussed those issues during our meeting with her next Wednesday. That is only for information — I am not trying to steer the Committee in any direction.

Mr McFarland: The UUP is happy to defer those issues, as we have been awaiting research papers from London, which have not yet arrived. However, if we have those discussions today, that is fine.

Mr G Kelly: My inclination is to take the advantage of suspending the Committee for an hour. Mr McFarland is probably right that we will not refer to the detail of those papers. Some of this material is relevant to the discussion paper, which we started to discuss on 9 August. We will probably return to that material at a later date, but the next item on the agenda is the discussion paper.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do other parties have a view on that?

Mr Attwood: We could begin discussions on those papers today, but some of the matters may soon become irrelevant. Consequently, I suggest that we suspend for an hour, because the papers will crowd in on the conversation sooner or later during the course of the meeting.

Mrs Long: Last week, the Committee adjourned because we recognised that the requested paper would impinge on later discussions. Therefore the Alliance Party has no objection if the Committee wishes to defer detailed discussion on those matters until next week. However, I am concerned about what we could usefully discuss today if those discussions were deferred. Our preference is to suspend for an hour.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is a good point. We could have a general discussion on policing issues, and then we could get discuss the Police Ombudsman and community restorative justice. We could fill today with substantive material, so we will not lose time — it is simply about how we manage that time.

Mrs Foster: The DUP is minded to suspend for an hour to read through the papers. We may not go into detail on those today, but we feel that we should read them.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is an either/or option. Gerry Kelly has accepted that the Committee could resume after the hour and still defer the issue.

Mr Weir: I appreciate that a great deal of work has gone into the research paper, and it does contain some comparative material. However, I am disappointed that it seems to only include references to the Northern Ireland Act 1998, the Scotland Act 1998 and the Northern Ireland Constitution Act 1973. We also received a separate list last week. Part of the reason for requesting a compare-and-contrast paper was to consider whether any issues had shifted between 1998 and now. Has there been any change in the devolution of policing and justice powers since 1998?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Tim Moore, Senior Research Officer, prepared the paper, so I will ask him to clarify that.

Mr T Moore: In my research paper, appendices 1 and 2 set out schedules 2 and 3 to the Northern Ireland Act 1998, which deal with excepted and reserved matters. The appendices detail any changes that have been made to schedules 2 and 3. Having examined those schedules to consider where changes had been made, I would be loath to say that there have been significant or insignificant changes. That is for members to decide.

Mr Weir: The DUP is happy to suspend for at least an hour. I doubt whether everyone could absorb all the information in that time, but we are open-minded in that regard.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): No one is dying in the ditch on this issue, but it seems that there is consensus to suspend for an hour and let members decide whether that is sufficient time for them to discuss the material this morning. If not, we shall return to it at a later date.

Four Committee rooms are available if Committee members, or party members, wish to avail themselves of them.

Mr G Kelly: Party rooms can also be used.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is almost 10.15 am now, and we will resume at 11.15 am. Please do not disappear, because we will not resume if one party is missing. Do not take the day off.

The Committee was suspended at 10.14 am.

On resuming —

11.20 am

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We have had an hour to look at the material. I am interested in views on whether we proceed with it or leave it for a week.

Mrs Long: The Alliance Party has no strong preference. It might be better to defer in order to allow a more detailed look at the material. However, we are content to deal with the issues today. Some matters could be resolved today, and we could specifically consider more contentious issues in greater detail. There are some issues on which we may find agreement. Others may have strong feelings, but we are flexible.

Mr Attwood: Some of today's agenda items will refer to these papers anyway. Next week, when a Minister comes — I believe that it will not be Maria Eagle — some of the remaining matters from today's papers could be raised. There is no easy way to handle this, because it all gets joined up, but that might be the most logical way to proceed.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We have made initial contact with NIO, and it could be either Mr Goggins or Maria Eagle. It looks likely that one of them will be available.

Mr G Kelly: Sinn Féin is happy to go through the set agenda. The papers are very helpful, but there are a lot of them. There are issues concerning the NIO and national security detailed at paragraph 13 of the Clerk's briefing to the NIO discussion paper that we could go through, but if the Minister is coming it is probably better to deal with everything at once. My only difficulty is that I will not be here for that.

Mr McFarland: We are happy enough. Most of the material is non-contentious, and there are issues that clearly need substantial discussion. We keep reminding ourselves that time is not on our side, so we should have whatever discussion we can have today.

I presume that we will discuss the matters contained in the Secretary of State's letter of 9 August. My impression of the general tone of the letter was that, if we wanted the Minister to answer questions of fact, we should provide questions beforehand so that the Minister could answer them.

What is it that we do not have here? The Secretary of State is clearly saying that he will not allow a Minister to be cross-questioned on attitudes and views. If we are dealing with questions of fact, what factual questions do we want answered? There is quite an agenda to get through between now and the week after next, and unless we are going to get something dramatic from a Minister, why are inviting one to attend at this stage?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mrs Foster raised that issue after the Secretary of State's Glenties speech, in which he outlined what the DUP considered to be new material on devolution, policing and justice, and the DUP wanted to question him on that.

Mrs Foster: Indeed.

Mr McFarland: I understood that we had agreed that that would be left until our last meeting, so that we could pile in all our unanswered questions. There are several substantive issues that we have not gone into, and we may have questions about those.

Next week, we may have questions to ask about community restorative justice. I understood that we were to leave questions for the Secretary of State or the Minister until the final meeting. We would do a wrap-up at that meeting when we would know exactly what we wanted them to talk about. Indeed, I share Mrs —

Mrs Foster: Arlene.

Mr McFarland: Pardon?

Mrs Foster: Arlene.

Mr McFarland: Mrs Foster.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Your colleague got into trouble for that last week.

Mr McFarland: I have the same trouble.

Mrs Foster: I am going to wear a name tag.

Mr McFarland: I am suddenly reminded of Dermot Nesbitt doing the same thing last week. I hope that I am not in for a similar week of battling.

Mr Kennedy: You need to watch yourself; the meeting is being recorded.

Mr McFarland: Yes, it is.

I understood that we were going to wrap up the meetings with a visit from a Minister. However, next week is quite soon for a ministerial visit.

Mrs Foster: Chairman, you are correct. Alex Attwood and I had raised the issue of a visit from the Secretary of State in light of his speech at Glenties. In view of that speech, I find his letter somewhat puzzling. It suggests that he does not know why he was invited to the Committee. Had he read Hansard, he would have known why.

I agree with Alan McFarland — there is no point inviting Maria Eagle, Paul Goggins or another Minister to next week's meeting. If there is any need to speak to a Minister at the end of our deliberations, so be it. The Secretary of State was, however, specifically invited to discuss the comments that he made about the constitutional and practical aspects of policing — as he called them — in his speech at Glenties. His letter now says that he does not want to come here to be "quizzed".

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I believe that he is not coming because he is on holiday.

Mrs Foster: It would have been more helpful if he had said that.

Mr Weir: Correct me if I am wrong, Mr Chairman, but my understanding is that we did not specify a date for the Secretary of State's visit; the invitation was open-ended. Can he not, because of his busy schedule, find the time to visit the Committee at any stage before it completes its work? I take it fairly thick that the Secretary of State constantly lectures us about getting things sorted out. There is a degree of urgency to our task, yet when he is asked to give evidence to the Committee, he deigns not to because he might get "quizzed". That is fundamentally wrong.

With regard to your initial question on the research material, although some of it has been useful, I am a little concerned that some of what we were given was not precise enough. However, that may be our fault for not explaining clearly what we wanted. The research paper contains tables, and the appendices reproduce schedules 2 and 3 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998. However, it is noted that schedule 2 of the 1998 Act, as reproduced in the paper, has not been updated to include amendments that result from the Northern Ireland (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 2006. It would have been helpful if any changes that that Act had brought about had been included. Perhaps there was none, but I want to be able to see that information.

Mr T Moore: The changes are listed in paragraphs 17 and 21 of my research paper.

Mr Weir: That is all very well. However, the complication is that we may have too much material. One section contains lists, and paragraphs 17 and 21 cite references. However, the paper does not seem comprehensive.

I was specifically trying to establish whether there had been a shift on the reserved, excepted and devolved nature of each of the issues. Those who were involved in the talks will remember that the Ulster Unionist Party, DUP, SDLP positions and so on were clearly laid out in columns on our documentation. I am sure that they found that helpful when we debated matters such as Standing Orders.

Ideally, I would have liked to see details on whether each matter was reserved, excepted or devolved in 1921, 1973, 1998 and 2006. That could help to narrow the scope of the discussion. In light of last week's discussion, more examination is necessary; for example, if a matter was in one category in 1998 and was shifted for some reason in 2006.

Frankly, it strikes me as futile to try to bag issues that will never be devolved, have not been devolved since the beginning of the state, and in 1973, 1998 and 2006 were treated consistently as —

Mr Cobain: This is not a state.

11.30 am

Mr Weir: I do not want to get involved in semantics, so I will change that remark to "since the creation of Northern Ireland".

My point is that it would take an extremely strong argument to convert a matter that had been reserved consistently — one that was reserved in 1998 and remains reserved in 2006 — to a devolved matter. I thought that a historical perspective would help to achieve clarity on that.

I know that there are references to the Northern Ireland Constitution Act 1973 and the Northern Ireland Act 1998 in Mr Moore's paper, but I want to see what the position is —

Mr S Wilson: Are we to take it that paragraphs 17 and 21 contain only the changes under the Northern Ireland (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 2006?

Mr T Moore: I will try to explain appendices 1 and 2, which set out schedules 2 and 3 to the Northern Ireland Act 1998. Schedule 2 deals with excepted matters, and schedule 3 with reserved matters. Perhaps the way that it has been presented was not explained properly, but, in schedule 2, appendix 1, anything in square brackets indicates an amendment to the original Northern Ireland Act 1998. All the amendments are listed after the schedules.

Mr Weir: Yes, but the point is that at the top of the opening page of appendices 1 and 2, that paper states that:

"The schedule provided below is not updated to include amendments resulting from the Northern Ireland (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 2006."

Perhaps I misunderstood, but my interpretation was that the square brackets contained changes that happened between 1998 and 2006, but did not include changes made in the Northern Ireland (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 2006.

Mr T Moore: That is because there is no available version of the revised 1998 Act. As the Northern Ireland (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 2006 is so recent, as far as I can find, no amended version of the 1998 Act has been produced. Members will notice that the NIO's paper has made the amendments and provides updated legislation.

Paragraphs 17 and 21 of my paper highlight and detail the two changes to schedule 2 and the three changes to schedule 3 that will occur due to the 2006 Act. Outside of that, appendices 1 and 2 contain the schedules as amended.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Moore will be with us throughout the discussions. It may help to call upon him to clarify any difficulties that arise as we discuss the papers.

Mr Attwood: I want to return to the issue of the Minister coming to the Committee next week. Frankly, I have some sympathy with Alan McFarland's view that if the Minister is coming merely to exchange factual information, it may help a bit, but not as much as members thought. I would much rather the Secretary of State came, because his letter of 9 August 2006 is intellectually and politically dubious.

Mrs Foster: Hear hear.

Mr Attwood: The point is not that he does not feel that the PFG should be, as he states in his letter:

"quizzing ministers on views they may have expressed."

The key line is:

"I hope instead that the PFG will focus on issues that the parties agree need to be resolved between themselves in preparation for government."

We know that the policing issue must be resolved, either through the PFG Committee, once devolution is restored, or whenever. Policing issues appear on every agenda, but the Secretary of State will not come here to discuss what he may, or may not, do to resolve the policing and preparation for Government issues between the parties and himself. That is an intellectually and politically dubious approach. Given that we are trying to resolve the policing issue as part of the preparation for Government, the Secretary of State should share what he is doing to resolve that issue with us. The Committee should reply to the Secretary of State and make that point.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): As far as short-term availability is concerned, either Paul Goggins or David Hanson could come on Wednesday 23 August 2006. However, if members want to invite the Secretary of State at a later stage, I doubt that that will happen in August.

Mr Cobain: I am becoming slightly concerned about where we are going with this. The Committee on the Preparation for Government (PFG) was set up to consider the devolution of policing and justice and to produce a report. That is its role, yet we are wandering all over the place. If the Secretary of State discusses policing and justice with individual parties, there is no way that he will tell the Committee what he is talking about or reveal his relationships with other parties on the matter.

Mr Weir: The Committee's remit is wider than the devolution of policing and justice. That is just one item on the Committee's agenda, which is why we are looking at, for example, the Police Ombudsman and community restorative justice. The PFG Committee has been tasked with overcoming obstacles to the devolution of policing and justice. Devolution of policing and justice forms a significant part of our deliberations but not the whole.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We need to decide today whether we wish to have a junior Minister in attendance next Wednesday. It would be either Mr Goggins or Mr Hanson, whose responsibilities overlap. If we want the Secretary of State instead, we must alert him that we want him to attend at a future date.

Mrs Long: I am fairly indifferent, because it matters very little who attends. We will not obtain any more information, regardless. If we continue to discuss whom we should invite, it may descend into a battle over something that will not really add to our work. Therefore, I am flexible.

Alan suggested that we try to complete as much of the work as we can, in order to identify those issues that we want to raise. We should forward those to the Secretary of State and request that if he does not come himself, he sends a Minister in his place. If we simply set ourselves up to do battle with the Secretary of State, because he has refused to attend the Committee — despite it being the preference of most members that he should — I cannot see where that would get us. We could spend the next hour discussing this, and we could be no closer to getting him into the room.

Mr McFarland: Why would we have a Minister here next week? What would that add to our deliberations? We have a substantial agenda and lots of paperwork to get through. Questions may be raised that only Ministers can answer, but I recall that, at one of our first meetings, we decided that we would only get the Secretary of State to attend once. Therefore, in the meantime, it would be worthwhile to store up questions and do as much work as possible. After that, we could have a proper, serious discussion on issues about which we need to speak with the Secretary of State. It is right that he, rather than a Minister, should discuss those issues with the Committee. The Secretary of State has gone on and on about this Committee, and, in the end, for him not to appear before the Committee would be slightly strange, given the importance that he has attached to it.

Mr S Wilson: My understanding is that we want the Secretary of State to attend because he has declared publicly his parameters for policing. Those parameters will impact on our decisions. It is important, therefore, that he comes along to justify and clarify his position.

Last week, and presumably the week before when I was not here, we scoped the issues that we believe need to be addressed. As Alan said, we do not want to discuss any secret talks that he may be having with individual parties, rather his publicly stated position on what he believes parties must do to show acceptance of policing. His position seems at variance with that of many of the parties around this table.

We should have a discussion with him. We have scoped certain issues, and the Secretary of State has said publicly that he disagrees with how far some of us believe parties should go on policing. Therefore, he should be here to talk to us about policing. Otherwise, we are wasting our time. If he sets a completely different threshold from that set by the majority of parties, we will not get anywhere.

Mrs Foster: The DUP sees no need to invite a junior Minister; it would be a waste of time.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We must get a view on this from the Committee. Clearly, the DUP wants the Secretary of State to attend.

Mr McFarland: I propose that we do not invite the junior Minister next week, but that we invite — and, perhaps, expect — the Secretary of State to appear, probably in two or three weeks' time, when we will have a substantial list of issues to raise with him.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are there any other proposals? Does anyone have problems with that suggestion? Everyone seems happy not to invite the junior Minister next week, but to invite the Secretary of State to attend in a fortnight's time.

Mr McFarland: Perhaps "encourage" him to attend?

Mr S Wilson: Or cajole?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is the Committee happy to invite the Secretary of State to attend and to see how he reacts to the invitation?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will now discuss the issues in the papers and research documents.

Table 1 in the NIO paper, which deals with reserved matters and their implications, helpfully sets out the relevant provisions of the Northern Ireland Act 1998; the issues that will, and will not, be devolved; and any outstanding issues. It is a useful basis for discussion, as, last week, there was cloudiness about matters that will, and will not, be devolved, and what matters should be devolved. Alban Maginness raised several important issues. It is unfortunate that he is not present, as his input would have been useful.

Is everyone happy to use the NIO paper as a basis for discussion?

Mr G Kelly: I have no difficulty with it, as it is a replication of schedule 3 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The NIO paper presents it in a different format.

Mr G Kelly: In some ways, it is a clearer format. The NIO paper does not define national security, which gives it carte blanche on that issue. That makes the Sinn Féin position very difficult as regards input from MI5 and whoever defines national security. It impinges massively on the policing issue.

Moreover, no protocols are mentioned in the paper. Sinn Féin wants neither MI5 nor MI6 anywhere in Ireland. The fact that there are no protocols deepens the worry that nationalists have — and, I argue, everyone should have — about MI5 interference. The issue, and the role of MI5, should be depoliticised, not extended.

I am happy to go through the list, but I wanted to state Sinn Féin's approach to it.

Mrs Long: Last week, the Alliance Party raised a concern about how differing views on what constitutes a threat to national security can impact on how loyalist and republican paramilitarism are dealt with and any potential inequality. The paragraph in the NIO paper that contains the legal definition of national security states:

"actions intended to overthrow or undermine parliamentary democracy by political, industrial or violent means."

That seems to cover all paramilitary activity, regardless of from which section of the community it comes. That explanation should be further explored, as the Alliance Party would be unhappy if acts of republican terrorism were treated as matters issue of national security and acts of loyalist terrorism were treated simply as criminal offences. That would not be proper and fair. A clear definition of what constitutes a threat to national security might allow a more detailed examination. We wish to reiterate that concern.

11.45 am

Mr McFarland: Following Gerry Kelly's statement, does Sinn Féin accept that, under the Belfast Agreement, Northern Ireland remains part of the United Kingdom until the people of Northern Ireland vote otherwise? If so, the Parliament of the United Kingdom is sovereign and will, therefore, decide — until Northern Ireland is part of the Irish Republic — what constitutes national security.

The NIO letter explains that the Security Service Act 1989 defines the protection of national security as:

"protection against threats from espionage, terrorism and sabotage, from the activities of agents of foreign powers and from actions intended to overthrow or undermine parliamentary democracy by political, industrial or violent means."

It seems fairly clear that that means threats to the state. We know from Sinn Féin's statement that the Provisional IRA is no longer a threat to the state — it remains for the Independent Monitoring Commission (IMC) to confirm whether that is the case. We are dealing presumably with a residual grouping of dissident republicans; it does not affect Sinn Féin and the main republican movement since they tell us that they have stopped all that. Does Sinn Féin accept that someone must have responsibility for national security and that every country's security services run agents in organisations that pose a threat to it? The Irish Government are no different, and I have no doubt that if Sinn Féin were in Government in the Republic of Ireland, its Ministers would be happy with that. If we accept that that is the norm throughout the world, why should it not be the norm here? I am confused by the suggestion that no one should investigate threats to the country or place agents inside organisations that are opposed to the Government.

Mr G Kelly: Alan should not be confused. It is about accountability. We want anything that involves the island of Ireland to be subject to proper accountability mechanisms. We had a long-drawn-out debate and agreement on what those mechanisms should be, followed by a statement. There is no legal definition of national security. We asked for one, but we got this long, rambling paragraph instead.

If we look at the political policing that has occurred in recent years — we do not have to go back 20, 15 or even five years — we can see that there has been political interference. We want to subordinate all that to the accountability mechanisms. MI5 is outside those mechanisms. It is said also that MI5 will consider serious and organised crime. From the list to which you referred, Chairman, it is obvious that that will happen. Where is the demarcation line? Even if I were to take the unionist point of view, which I do not, I would want to know where the line is between what is a policing and justice matter and what is “national security”.

Alan asked what Sinn Féin would do if it were in Government in the South and had responsibility for justice. We would be glad to have that power, and we would also like to have it in the North, so that there could be an all-Ireland approach. I do not know what Mr McFarland is confused about; what confuses me is that absolutely no definition of national security is provided. Unionism, in fairness, has always accepted the British state and almost anything that it does. We have an opposite point of view, and we want accountability. MI5's interference will not help. We do not want MI5 here.

Mr Attwood: There is no definition of national security to enable MI5 to define it in whatever terms it wants. Therein lies the problem. Whether here or in Britain, MI5, now or later, can define any matter as being one of national security. It will take the lead on that and have exclusive responsibility for it, whatever any policing organisation might think. That is the problem.

We should try to look at it more positively. It is right that questions should be asked of Sinn Féin, but questions should be asked of the unionist parties also. If there were devolution and an Executive, including a ministry of justice, functioning as we hope that it might, what would be the consequences of a MI5 operation in the North, which either led to the arrests or deaths of innocent civilians, or to a community's feeling that its rights had not been properly protected? Considering the continuing national and international security threats, such an operation is possible. People would be entitled to ask the Executive for an explanation, and the Ministers would be unable to give one; they would have to say that those issues were beyond their remits. That shows a conflict between having the institutions working stably in the future and people's sense of who is in control and who has responsibility for certain key matters in the management of life in the North.

All parties — not only Sinn Féin — have to face up to what might happen over the two, four, six, or eight years of MI5 primacy in the North. For that reason, if there were a preferred outcome from these discussions, it would be to go for one of the Patten options. He offered two options for national security: first, MI5 primacy; and, secondly, the retention of the current accountability of national security through the Chief Constable. We should bear in mind what Mrs Long said about the possibility of MI5's differentiating between republican and loyalist threats. If, as Sinn Féin claim, Patten is the threshold, and if we are living within the constraints of Patten, would there not be some point in getting members around this table to move to an understanding that the best way to manage this, given the potential fallout for all of us, would be to go with the second Patten option? That is not the perfect model — far from it — and it is not what I would argue for if we had a clean piece of paper. However, that is the argument that Patten makes, and Patten, according to some members, is the threshold for policing in the future. Maybe we should have a conversation around that.

The Committee should discuss also the protocols and accountability measures that need to be in place between MI5 and organisations, such as the PSNI, with which it will interface. PSNI officers will be working at MI5 desks, and we must know whether the Police Ombudsman will have the same authority over them as that office has over every other police officer in the PSNI.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We seem to have moved into a full-blooded discussion on the intelligence services. I am happy to do that, so long as members realise where we are on the agenda.

Mr McFarland: This format allows us to explore things; we may have to revisit them, but we have a flow going on this.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I am happy to let the discussions continue, but I want to alert members to where we are on the agenda. There seems to be the start of a proposal coming from Alex on how to deal with this issue — we must get some structure.

Mr McFarland: Part of the reason that this has arisen is that the SDLP complained bitterly about Special Branch. The Government always listen to the SDLP, so they transferred the responsibility for Special Branch to MI5 at its behest. Now the SDLP is being hoisted by its own petard, and it is trying to backtrack.

MI5 is an intelligence-gathering organisation. It does not rush around carrying out armed operations and shooting people. Alex's vision of what happens in Northern Ireland is not correct. As I understand it, in the rest of the United Kingdom, MI5 gathers intelligence, and, traditionally, its executive or operational wing is its special branch. In Scotland or England, the special branches arrest people on behalf of MI5. Logically, the same system would operate here; therefore, MI5 would not carry out ambush operations. Of course, that scenario would arise only if the DUP and Sinn Féin bury their hatchets, smoke pipes of peace, and make the world lovely.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): You keep reminding us of that.

Mrs Foster: I do not smoke.

Mr McFarland: That scene must be set before any arrangements will be established. We are not discussing a scenario from 10 years ago, when the SAS rushed around on operations and others carried out anti-terrorist activity. This year, the focus is on al-Qaeda and residual republicans in Northern Ireland who feel that they cannot give up and who are busy trying to place bombs in London, Belfast and Newry or at Eddie Haughey's house or wherever. Therefore, that scenario is for down the line, and it will not be the lurid picture that Alex painted.

As Alex mentioned, accountability is a major issue. It would be a disaster if, in order to not destabilise the political situation, the Government influenced MI5 to withhold from the Chief Constable information that showed that a senior member of the Provisional IRA was still active in paramilitarism while Sinn Féin was in the Executive. Therefore, the protocols between the PSNI and MI5 must be extremely robust. I argue that that is the responsibility of Parliament — it is a reserved matter that should be discussed at Westminster. I have had discussions with MPs from a number of parties, and I know that that they are very interested in how the arrangements with MI5 will work out here. The House of Commons Intelligence and Security Committee is particularly interested, as I suspect we all are, in how we can ensure no interference with the normal rule of law.

A number of issues are important. Westminster will be interested, so logically, its Intelligence and Security Committee should beef itself up. To ensure that the accountability mechanisms are robust, the protocols should be as foolproof as possible.

Mr S Wilson: Alan's first point is correct. The folks from Sinn are jumping up and down about the security issue, discussions on which were provoked — at least partly — by their incessant demands for Special Branch and “a force within a force” to be closed down. They now have a force outside a force, and they do not like that either. There is not really a great deal that they can do now — it is a bit late for them to start crying about it.

The issue of whether this matter should be devolved was raised a long time ago: even in the Patten Report, which nationalists frequently cite. The Patten Report said — and this is mentioned at paragraph 7 of the research paper — that all functions, except for matters of national security, should be devolved. That was highlighted a long time ago and is now being embedded. Alex would know from his involvement with the Policing Board that it is now so embedded that the police have made great advances in setting protocols to allow any intelligence that is gathered to be transferred, when relevant, to police criminal investigations into individuals who might be involved in organisations that present a threat to national security.

The police have made it clear that the transfer of national security to MI5 will not be an impediment to the PSNI doing its job. The Chief Constable is on record as saying that if the protocols are not right, he will be the first to complain. Therefore, there are safeguards.

12.00 noon

Parliament is accountable, as Mr McFarland said. Therefore, if a matter is reserved to Westminster, that is where accountability for that matter should rest. Are we going to have the same argument about the Serious Organised Crime Agency (SOCA), which is a national body that deals with serious organised crime? Are we saying that SOCA's role in policing should also be devolved? Are we saying that SOCA and MI5 should be subject to the same accountability mechanism, which can happen only through the devolution of the oversight of their powers?

We have not heard a word about that matter, yet SOCA has made it clear that it will be just as involved in dealing with organised crime in Northern Ireland — at national and international level — as MI5 is in intelligence gathering. Where we are going with this issue?

Given the parameters that were set down in the past, mostly by nationalists, the Government have taken the view that one way to avoid charges being made against the PSNI is to take functions out of its hands. That makes sense, because we are talking about a national threat. That is in keeping with other parts of the United Kingdom, because no other police service or devolved institution would be handed control of the body that gathers national intelligence. Therefore, this is a sterile argument, and we could spend the rest of the day talking about it.

Mr G Kelly: This is not a sterile argument. It is condescending of the British Government to refuse to devolve or transfer that power. As members of other parties have said, this is an issue of accountability. We must not be naïve. It has been said that Special Branch is an arresting arm of MI5, and that is quite true. However, MI5 and the SAS were involved in killings. MI5 is not accountable. Members have talked about national security, and, from a unionist point of view, that is fine. However, no one has stated what is meant by national security, except that MI5 will take that decision. Therefore, MI5 is self-accountable.

We have not seen any protocols. We are asked to put faith, which I do not have, in MI5's saying that it will introduce robust protocols, or in members saying that there must be robust protocols.

We can be cynical about the effectiveness of MI6 and the intelligence agencies if we consider the solutions that they came up with to deal with the situation in Iraq, and the damage that that caused. That elective accountability ended up in a massive war over false information, which involved intelligence agencies, not only in Britain, but in America. Those are the fundamentals of this matter. That is how intelligence organisations operate. If there are no accountability mechanisms, any party will abuse that power, no matter who they are. The island of Ireland, including the North, should have accountability mechanisms, regardless of what happens elsewhere.

Sammy Wilson referred to SOCA and the Assets Recovery Agency (ARA). He said that those bodies had not been mentioned. However, I will mention them, as we continue our discussions. Responsibility for those bodies should be devolved, and there should be accountability mechanisms. To this day, MI5 informers are being allowed to carry out crime.

They work for MI5 and other intelligence agencies. Informers are allowed to commit crimes that have, in the past, resulted in deaths.

If I may make this criticism: Sinn Féin — and probably the SDLP — took up the cases of people from the unionist community who suffered at the hands of informers and were ignored by the other political parties. The other parties took the blind view that everything in the garden was OK, thinking that MI5 would not use informers against unionists, as they were used to gather information only on republicans. In fact, members of the unionist community were killed, and unionists who went to the unionist parties for help had to approach the nationalist parties because only they would give them the necessary help.

Robust protocols are one thing, but in order for what happened in the past, and for what continues to happen, to stop, the maximum number of those powers must be transferred.

Mrs Long: Although we were not given a legal definition, because none exists, the NIO paper does provide a generally accepted working definition of national security. Last week, my party highlighted — and I reiterate — that we accept that, because each can be used to support the other, it is difficult to separate terrorism from organised crime. Their links are such that it is difficult to find a clear dividing line. We accept that it is a grey area: one impacts on the other.

As we expressed last week, there is some concern about the lack of accountability in the UK-wide structures and the way in which they relate to the situation in Northern Ireland. Part of the solution to that lies with a more generalised reform of the UK structures and accountability for matters such as terrorism, defending national security and dealing with organised crime. However, although we believe that reform is necessary, it is not within our remit to address that. It may be that the Committee will want to draw that to the Secretary of State's attention, because it is a matter that he can examine.

I am not trying to stifle the discussion, but I want to highlight that the Secretary of State makes clear his opinion of the Committee's role clear in his letter of 9 August 2006. He said that:

"I do not see the role of the PFG as scrutinising Government policy on reserved or excepted matters".

The Committee is discussing at length those matters that parties think should be reserved or excepted, but the Secretary of State makes clear in his letter that although the Committee may get consensus about changes to those matters — though I doubt it — he does not accept that as part of its role. I have flagged that up because, although we are discussing what should be reserved or excepted, there is no guarantee that the Secretary of State will have any interest in addressing those issues.

Mrs Foster: Naomi has made a good point.

Sinn Féin raised a concern about an accountability mechanism for national security. It is not the role of a regional devolved institution to scrutinise issues of national security. That goes to the core of the consent principle, which Alan mentioned earlier. Does Sinn Féin accept that Northern Ireland is part of the United Kingdom? That is the issue. If it does accept that, its members must accept that Northern Ireland will have a regional Assembly, and, as such, national security will remain an excepted matter. That is, and will remain, the position of the DUP.

The protocols for accountability, which are outlined in the Assembly research paper, are not yet in place, but that work is ongoing. In Enniskillen recently, Assistant Chief Constable Sheridan gave a good presentation on the primacy of MI5 and its relationship with the PSNI. I understand that his presentation was made during a public session; I am sure that the Committee could get copies of his slides, which could prove to be useful and instructive.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will return to that suggestion.

Mr Cobain: Everyone accepts that terrorism is an international phenomenon and that much of it is linked to criminality. Naomi is right in that respect. Police officers find it difficult to divide terrorism from criminality because that is how it works. The two are interlinked, and it would therefore be impossible to divide the remit, whereby MI5 would tackle terrorism and ordinary police officers criminality. During an MI5 operation, its officers may gather information on criminality that should be passed on to the police. Hopefully, the protocols that will be agreed between the Chief Constable and MI5 will allow for such arrangements.

We have been discussing this for almost an hour. There is no possibility of national security being devolved to the Administration — none. The best that we can do is to ensure that the agreed protocols are as robust as possible, so that information will be shared between the police and MI5, and that that information will solely concern criminality, not national security. I am disappointed that we must continue to make that point.

We can continue to discuss this matter, but there is no possibility that national security will be devolved. I understand that members have political positions on security. However, the only way in which MI5 will be accountable is through the protocols. Whether Sinn Féin or Alex has a problem with MI5 makes no difference. We should deal with matters over which we are entitled to have some influence, of which the protocols are one.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We are not making a great deal of progress.

Mr Cobain: We are not making any progress.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The only proposal seems to be Alex's suggestion to adopt the Patten model. I am not sure whether it is a proposal.

Mr Cobain: Alex and Gerry Kelly spoke about MI5. Are their parties saying that the devolved Administration should be in charge of national security?

Mr Attwood: I am prepared to answer that question. If we had a blank piece of paper, there are ways that that could be the outcome. However, we do not have a blank piece of paper. We have the Patten Report.

Mr Cobain: Would we be in charge of running agents?

Mr Attwood: If you would listen, Fred —

Mr Cobain: I am listening; sorry.

Mr Attwood: I know that you do not like the Patten Report.

Mr Cobain: At times, you do not like it either.

Mr Attwood: The Patten Report recommended either that MI5 had primacy over national security or that the current approach be retained, where the Chief Constable is responsible for, and accountable to the British Government in respect of national security.

I wish that the Patten Report had outlined a third option that would have kept accountability within the North for the activities of any and all intelligence services. You might think that that is poppycock; it is not. That approach was adopted in Canada. Following a crisis in its national security functions about 20 years ago, Canada developed a range of levels of accountability within and outside of Parliament for the intelligence services.

However, that is not where we are. We are where Patten put us, and Patten said that the Chief Constable could retain responsibility for national security. I believe that that option is in the best interest of everybody around the table. Perhaps some will not agree and will prefer the other Patten option of MI5 primacy. If so, we should take up a few of the suggestions put forward.

First, we should ask the British Government to clarify the protocols that will be in place at the interface between MI5 and other agencies. MI5 deals with revenue and customs matters, SOCA, the Organised Crime Task Force, the Police Ombudsman, the PSNI and so on. We must gather further information on the protocols.

Secondly, irrespective of what I think, we need to know what the accountability measures will be with regard to MI5 primacy in the North. We may get an insufficient or neutral answer or, more likely, be told that it is a work in progress. Nevertheless, it will give us a better understanding.

I want to correct a point made by my unionist colleagues — it was probably more mischievous than genuine. Patten recommended that there be a Special Branch. The reason that so much time was spent getting Special Branch right was that, if it complies with best international practice on the recruitment of agents and the gathering and distribution of intelligence, the police service will have the ability to access intelligence in the community in a manner consistent with all proper standards. As we know from the Bishopsgate incident, intelligence-led policing is crucial to being able to, on one hand, deal with the terror threat, and, on the other, maintain public confidence.

12.15 pm

Ensuring that Special Branch reached the point at which it began to comply with best international practice, which the Oversight Commissioner has said it does, enabled it to access more and better intelligence, meaning it can inform the police about all levels of threat in the North, including that from international terror. That is why all that work was done, as well as to create greater confidence in policing — a confidence that was lacking for generations. That is why the PSNI is now best placed and fit for purpose to be the primary agency responsible for gathering intelligence in the North. The new standards and procedures mean that it can gain much more intelligence.

To conclude, if someone from the police intelligence community were here now, I guess that they might suggest that the police were getting backed-up with intelligence. As confidence in policing grows, the flow of information increases, and with that comes the ability of the police to counter any threat, from wherever it comes in this part of Ireland.

Mr G Kelly: I do not think that we will come to a conclusion on this. The argument appears to be at cross-purposes. Unionist members arrived wanting to talk about national security, which has not been defined.

Our purpose is to find an accountability mechanism. The lack of a division between crime and terrorism has been mentioned. Who decides where the demarcation line lies? How can that demarcation line be drawn, and where is the accountability mechanism?

As an example, I will take a different point of view. A member of the PSNI is under the control of various accountability mechanisms, which include the Chief Constable and, depending on the issue, the Police Ombudsman and others. If MI5 decides to use that member of the PSNI in an operation, he is no longer accountable, and any arguments about accountability go straight out the window.

The worst part of that scenario is that MI5 decides on which matters it will act. For instance, MI5 might decide that the recent incident in Derry is its responsibility, dispense with all the normal mechanisms, and go completely over the top in trying to deal with it. There is significant evidence that it has done so previously.

Sinn Féin wants accountability mechanisms. The maximum amount of accountability should remain in the North through a new justice Ministry. That is the best way forward until the interlocking institutions, as mentioned in the Good Friday Agreement, are established. Thereafter, there would be an all-island approach to any actions, policing or otherwise, taken on the island of Ireland.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There is a series of proposals. We will start with the easy one and work our way up. Mrs Foster suggests that it may be useful to request DCI Sheridan's briefing material on the linkages between MI5 and the police.

Mr McFarland: It is ACC Sheridan; he would be most annoyed to be described as a deputy chief inspector.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I do not know the gentleman.

Mr McFarland: He is an Assistant Chief Constable.

Mrs Foster: He is a Fermanagh man; he will be all right about it.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Now that I have given him his proper title, would it be useful to request that information from the PSNI?

Mrs Foster: It would come from the Policing Board.

Mr G Kelly: Does that mean that we will receive documentation?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There is no commitment; the documentation will be requested out of interest to see if it will help with our deliberations. Are members content to ask for that information?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The next issue for consideration is Alex's proposal that we support the Patten model, which states that the Chief Constable should continue to have ultimate responsibility for matters here that involve national security. You may want to put what I have said into your own words, Alex, because your proposal has changed slightly. To be honest, I am not even sure whether you made a proposal.

Mr Attwood: I will leave my proposal on the table, because if we adopt my other proposal and ask at what stage the protocols are and what the accountability mechanisms will be, the answers will be that we have neither the robust safeguards nor the accountability that we require, and, as a consequence, the Chief Constable of the PSNI must retain responsibility for matters that involve national security. My proposal would be better tabled when people hear what I suspect will be inadequate answers to those two questions.

Mr McFarland: Alex knows that I have not been a member of the Policing Board since 1 April. He is still on the Policing Board, so he knows fine well that it is updated regularly on the protocols. It was my understanding, as at April 2006, that the protocols were to be produced in November 2006 and are still under development. Therefore, people will not be able to tell us anything other than that until November, no matter whom we call or how much we grill them. Those protocols will go the Policing Board for discussion, but that will not happen before this Committee is due to report.

We should not get excited at not being able to see or amend protocols. Sammy or one of the other MPs may be able to find this out, but I believe that MPs at Westminster, particularly those who are on the Intelligence and Security Committee, are also considering whether protocols between MI5 and the police are necessary in Great Britain as a result of the al-Qaeda threat. As I have said, those issues are under development, so we will not get an answer, no matter whom we call.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Alex's proposal is that we ask for them. Are you saying that we should not?

Mr McFarland: He is a member of the Policing Board, so he knows the answer. Indeed, colleagues on the Policing Board who attended last week's briefing will be able to tell us that answer without the staff having to go off, ask the police and come back to us. The answer would be the same as the one that ACC Sheridan no doubt gave to the Policing Board last week. I was not there, but someone will be able to tell me.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Alex, in view of that, do you wish to continue with your first proposal?

Mr Attwood: I do. We receive quite useful information in those papers, because some issues are developed within them. The papers refer to protocols. It may be that we are told that the protocols are a work in progress; however, given the live nature of the issue, it is incumbent upon us to ask. Let us see whether we get something more substantial back. For example, somebody will report to the Policing Board with something more in September, not in November. Therefore, it may be timely to ask.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Lunch is imminent, so this may be an appropriate time at which to break.

Alex has insisted that he wants to make this a proposal, so we are duty bound to table it. Do we have consensus that we request that information from the Policing Board? Is everyone happy that we ask for it, even though Alan believes that we will not get it?

Mr McFarland: Our colleagues who are on the Policing Board will tell us that they had a briefing last week. From their most recent meeting, do they think that we will learn anything new?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It may make an exception for as important a body as ours. Are members content?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We shall reconvene at 12.45 pm.

The Committee was suspended at 12.24 pm.

On resuming —

12.48 pm

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Could we return to table 1 on the NIO paper, which deals with reserved matters and their implications for devolution? As Mr Kelly said, the table repeats what has already appeared in earlier papers, but it is in a format that is much easier to follow.

Given the complexity of the matters at hand, perhaps the best way to proceed is simply to go through the table. I am sure that Mr Moore will be delighted to help us with any technical questions. I am also conscious that we have a plethora of experts in the form of Northern Ireland Policing Board members and those who are involved in district policing partnerships (DPPs). I shall just let the conversation flow.

We agreed to start the discussion with schedule 3 to the Northern Ireland Act 1998. We are trying to tease out whether parties are content with what has been suggested for devolution, or whether they wish to add to the list of powers and functions to be devolved to Ministers for policing and justice.

Mr Weir: I am not suggesting that it will be the case, but we may not be happy with what we get.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Several parties have stated that there should be maximum devolution, and I detect that most of the discussion will be at that end of the scale.

Since parties have not had a chance to prepare submissions, I suggest that we go down the list, one by one, and that parties give their views accordingly. If there are no views, we shall accept that parties are happy with the level at which a power has been pitched.

Paragraphs 9(a) and 9(b) of schedule 3 deal with criminal law and the creation of offences and penalties. According to the table, it appears that everything will be devolved, with no issues remaining. If the table states that there is nothing more to devolve, we must accept that we have considered 100% of those matters. Does anyone have any comments on paragraphs 9(a) and (b)?

Mr G Kelly: The paper does not cover the law governing treason or terrorist offences. Our earlier conversation referred to those matters. What is listed for devolution is OK up to a point. The paper mentions only a “devolved category”, and Sinn Féin supports the maximum transfer of powers. What are “terrorist offences”? I note that the discussion on Diplock courts will be over shortly. I accept that part of the paper up to a point.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are you happy that treason remains a central Government responsibility?

Mr G Kelly: I do not know. Can one define treason? We have not formed a view on that.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Kelly has proposed that terrorist offences should be the responsibility of a devolved Assembly. Is there any view on that matter?

Mr S Wilson: As many terrorist offences will be matters of national security, I would not expect responsibility to be devolved.

Mrs D Kelly: The difficulty lies in national security and the lack of a definition. Even in its broadest context — such as in the earlier paper, which mentioned industrial acts — it could be concluded that industrial strike action, for example, was a terrorist act and a threat to national security, given the very woolly definition and the understanding that was articulated earlier. It is very difficult to agree to this without a clear definition of terrorist offences.

Mr McFarland: Fred Cobain said earlier that matters are as they are, and that this Committee will not be able to persuade the Government to change their mind — unless particular parties wish to make matters a deal-breaker in negotiations. In that case, I do not doubt that those issues may resurface. We have no remit to demand the devolution of matters that the Government have deemed excepted. We must agree to disagree.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is important in all of our discussions that parties indicate whether they simply have a problem with certain issues or whether they perceive them as major impediments to devolution. We must test the strength of opposition.

Mr G Kelly: If Alan is anticipating that, as we go through table 1 unionism will take one view and nationalism another. I do not know whether we can test the strength of opposition, to be honest.

Mr McFarland: In December 2004, the comprehensive agreement allowed a time frame of two months for all this to be completed. It set out what policing and justice powers would and would not to be devolved at that stage. Presumably, the DUP and Sinn Féin accepted that.

This information has been available for a chunk of the year in the NIO discussion paper. We have known since 1998 that certain matters would be excepted and that other matters would be reserved but devolved in due course, so none of this should come as a surprise to any of the parties. We can discuss whether some reserved matters should be transferred; for practical reasons, it might be better if some of those were dealt with at Westminster. Excepted matters such as national security are not going anywhere, no matter how long any party howls and shouts. We shall not solve that issue in Committee.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I think that Mr Kelly would disagree.

Mr G Kelly: Sinn Féin has a very strong view on who has responsibility for the Assets Recovery Agency (ARA) and the Serious Organised Crime Agency (SOCA), but I am willing to go through all the matters in table 1. The British Secretary of State and the British Prime Minister have said many times that certain matters are not up for negotiation, only to change their mind. If we do not get consensus here — and I sense that we will not — we will take it up with the British Government, because we hold strong views on the issue of MI5, and its powers and role in protecting national security here. Not all its powers are to do with national security; that is someone else's interpretation.

Mr Cobain: May I make a relevant point? These are all nationwide issues. The ARA is a nationwide issue —

Mr G Kelly: Do you mean that is an all-Ireland issue?

Mr Cobain: In this context, it is not all-Ireland. The Irish Republic has its own version of the Assets Recovery Agency. We are talking specifically about matters to be devolved to an Executive. We need to be clear that some of the issues lend themselves to nationwide agencies and cannot be dealt with only in Northern Ireland. We cannot separate serious crime here from serious crime in England, Scotland and Wales.

Everything is becoming more centralised in order to improve the exchange of information. Therefore, it makes no sense to devolve responsibility for those agencies. If that happened, we would be out of the loop. We need to consider it in the context of policing. It is much easier for police services throughout the United Kingdom to work together centrally. Some people are trying to lift Northern Ireland out of the UK when it comes to crime prevention and detection. However, some powers do not lend themselves to being devolved, such as the devolution of responsibility for those two agencies.

Mr McFarland: It would make much more sense for the Republic of Ireland to rejoin the United Kingdom on those issues and have an island-wide —

Mr G Kelly: You should try for consensus on that one.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I do not think that we will get consensus on that. It was a good try.

Mr Attwood: We have long argued that there should be an all-Ireland agency.

Mr McFarland: A United Kingdom and Republic of Ireland-wide agency?

1.00 pm

Mr Attwood: There should be appropriate relationships with the agency in Britain. Some matters can be dealt with on an all-Ireland and an inter-Ireland basis.

That is consistent with the Good Friday Agreement, and it is in the interests of all the people of these islands.

Secondly, it may be useful to enquire about certain aspects of the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000 (RIPA). On one hand, we are being told about everything that will be reserved, excepted or transferred; on the other hand, we are being told to reach decisions about what aspects of RIPA must remain reserved. I want to know precisely what is being asked of us. I presume that that distinction is due to the cross-cutting national security issue, but I would like confirmation that that is what is meant.

Thirdly, regardless of the previous understandings that were reached as part of the comprehensive agreement, SOCA is a new development, and it is one of the most anonymous new public bodies that has been created in recent times. It is very difficult to arrange a meeting with that body, which is still trying to work out what accommodation and full role it will have in the North. We know that an agency exists, but no one knows much beyond that. Regardless of whatever may have been agreed already, we must get a detailed briefing on SOCA because it is new and is in the process of being defined.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Alex, are you proposing that we seek information about the role of SOCA?

Mr Attwood: I am seeking A, B, C stuff, not just about SOCA per se, but particularly about SOCA in the North.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): About its role in Northern Ireland?

Mr Attwood: Yes.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That seems to be a reasonable proposal.

Mr McFarland: Colleagues on the Policing Board have had a detailed briefing on this matter. In some respects, SOCA is the British equivalent of the FBI. It is a UK-wide, multi-agency body, and naturally enough, it exists in Northern Ireland because it is part of the United Kingdom. What is strange about that?

Mr Attwood: There is nothing strange about that logic. The question is: what is that agency actually going to do? That has not yet been confirmed. The Policing Board has been seeking a meeting with SOCA, which has not yet been granted because that agency is still getting up and running in the North.

Mr Cobain: Could we try to resolve the two issues at hand before we —

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We have drifted from the first issue to the second.

Mr Cobain: We can talk about SOCA, but can we try to get through the first issue so that we can get to the next page before 4.00 pm?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Before I call Mr Kelly, are there any proposals on schedule 3(9)(a) and (9)(b) or should we just accept it as it is, and move on?

Mr G Kelly: I do not accept it as it is.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): You do not accept it, but do you have a proposal?

Mr G Kelly: As we have already discussed, the document lacks definition. I do not wish to rehearse this morning's conversation, but the document has an impact on this matter. The table in the NIO paper pushes the point that matters are excepted, and, therefore, they will not be devolved. I do not accept that. We must look at those matters one at a time. I was going to talk about the second aspect of the matter, but I have said all that I need to on the first aspect of it.

Mr S Wilson: I am seeking clarification, so that we do not waste time. I get the feeling that we are moving to a situation where — regardless of which area we discuss — if matters are reserved or excepted, Sinn Féin will not be happy. Let us just cut to the chase and agree that as long as there is something on that list that will not be devolved to a Northern Ireland Administration, Sinn Féin will have reservations. That means that we need not go through the farce of discussing each matter in turn and seeking consensus. That might save us about four hours.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There will be matters that members may agree should eventually be devolved.

Mr S Wilson: I get the impression from what has been said — and perhaps this can be clarified — that there is nothing that Sinn Féin will accept should remain with, or be reserved to, Westminster.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is that your view, Mr Kelly?

Mr G Kelly: I thank Sammy for interpreting my view. Could I ask whether that means that the DUP's view is that everything set down by the NIO is acceptable?

Mrs Foster: There are a couple of matters that are intended to be reserved that we believe should be devolved. However, I agree with Sammy that there is no point in going through each of those points if we are not going to reach consensus on anything. The ultimate conclusion will be that this is a matter for negotiation in October and November.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It strikes me that there will be issues on which everyone is happy with the status quo. There will be matters that the DUP believe should be transferred, and there might be agreement on that. This matter is not quite as black and white or as stark as it may seem.

Mr McFarland: Sinn Féin is not comfortable with fundamental issues around national security, and that impinges on our discussion of such issues. Clearly, we will not change Sinn Féin's view. Notwithstanding that, I suggest that the Committee considers the remaining issues, because we shall not solve the question of whether we should have responsibility for national security. We should look at "Issues remaining" — those on which a decision on whether they are to be devolved has yet to be taken. It might be worth hearing some thoughts on them. That may be the best that we can achieve today, given the stances that have been taken.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are folk willing to work down the column of issues remaining and see whether we can agree some of them?

Mr G Kelly: In case there is some confusion here, Sinn Féin is in favour of all these powers being devolved. I left the meeting last week at lunchtime, but it says in the minutes:

"It was agreed that the powers listed at paragraph 3.2 of the NIO discussion paper should be devolved within policing and justice."

That means that there was consensus. What we are dealing with now appears to be a list of NIO exceptions. Therefore, we seem to be being told that, although everyone agreed that the maximum number of powers should be devolved, here are a number of issues that refer back to everything in paragraph 3.2, which we have already agreed should be devolved. There is probably no other way to do this other than to go through them.

Sinn Féin has strong views on ARA and SOCA. It is not contradictory to have a flow of information between North and South, between the two islands, and, indeed, between the two islands and the EU. However, that does not preclude our having an accountability mechanism — and that is what devolution would involve — that deals with the all-Ireland aspect of the powers contained in paragraph 9(c) of schedule 3 to the 1998 Act. We would still take an all-Ireland approach, but we want the maximum amount of power to be devolved. As we work down the column of issues remaining, Sinn Féin will argue that. Arlene Foster said that the DUP wants to see several powers devolved. Let us hear what those are, and then we can go back over the list.

Mr McFarland: There is no point in Gerry having that view. We have a Government plan in front of us. Parties will take up with the Government the matter of whether they agree with that plan. There are issues that have not yet been resolved. Notwithstanding any party's objection to the plan, it would seem to be profitable to discuss the issues that the Government have not yet finalised, as they may listen to the parties' views on them.

To continue an argument about whether the Government plan should be followed, or about who agrees with the plan, will not solve anything in Committee.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There certainly will be issues about which members will not feel particularly strongly; we might reach agreement on those.

Mr Weir: To pick up Alan's point, it would be helpful to concentrate our efforts on the "Issues remaining" column. If parties wish to state their case as to what should move from the "What won't devolve" to the "What will devolve" column, I do not mind. Ninety-nine times out of 100, we will not reach consensus on the issues, so, in those cases, there is no point in a great deal of debate.

"Issues remaining" seems to fall into the category of issues in which there is a grey area. In some cases, the power was going to be devolved, but it was unclear as to which Department it would go. It strikes me that that is where the margin of opportunity for a degree of discussion lies. We may reach consensus on some of the issues; on a lot of them, we probably will not. That is where the discussion should be concentrated. However, that does not preclude, for example, Sinn Féin calling for responsibility for ARA to be devolved.

I have no problem with Sinn Féin's saying that; however, there will be no consensus on that issue because we will oppose it. The Committee should not waste an enormous amount of time discussing issues that will run into the sand very quickly.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Kelly, is that a way forward?

Mr G Kelly: It is helpful. It is set out quite well in the column, so we have agreed what will be devolved. However, I am looking through the document now, and we have general difficulties with what will not be devolved. The column that lists what will not be devolved simply takes parts of the previous column, which lists what will be devolved, and infers that these aspects of those matters will not be devolved. Therefore, the assessment is right, and if you want to hone the conversation, I have no difficulty with that.

Mr McFarland: Topics for a major discussion on the relationship between the police, the Policing Board and the Assembly are listed in the NIO discussion document. This will probably be the most vital discussion that we will have on policing, so it would be useful if we could move the conversation towards that.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Parties can use a single-transferable objection to keep the discussion moving forward if they do or do not want a matter to be devolved.

It is quite clear that we will not reach agreement on ARA or SOCA.

Mr McFarland: The third column shows what will not be devolved. Obviously, parties will want to lodge their fiver's worth, which is fine, but Alex asked what we are talking about in relation to the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000 (RIPA). It is necessary to discuss vetting, criminal records and disclosures and so forth and how they are handled. Those are sensitive issues.

Mr Weir: I agree with Alex's suggestion. Some aspects of RIPA are referred to, but it would be helpful if we had clarification on precisely what is meant by that section.

Mr McFarland: With regard to criminal records and checks and disclosures, as members probably know, the new paedophile laws mean that we are moving to a centralised system for checking people. It is correct to say that there have been recent developments between the Republic of Ireland and the UK to put a better system in place so that people who have molested children cannot flee one or other of those jurisdictions.

The increased threat from al-Qaeda and international terrorism may mean that such records will go to a much more centralised database. Again, it is probably not at all sensible to divide that into little bits, depending on where you are in the country. Therefore, my sense is that this will go to some sort of central agency into which the police services, either in the UK or the Republic, can tap to find out whether person A, B or C is fleeing justice or has a record of abusing children or whatever. That is how that process seems to be going, and to suggest that it should all chalk down here, and that we should have a little computer in Belfast that stands alone, is not the way that this is going.

Mr G Kelly: The last column asks whether some: "aspects of RIPA that are currently reserved will need to remain so."

Let us find out what those are.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is there consensus on that?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are we agreed on Alex's proposal to seek clarification from the Northern Ireland Office on the role of RIPA and SOCA in Northern Ireland —

Mr Attwood: I was referring just to SOCA.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Just to SOCA. Are members agreed?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Good. We can get that sorted out.

Is there anything else that members feel that we can usefully discuss?

Mr Attwood: Although this is not a matter for discussion, members might have some comments to make. I invite the unionist parties to consider accepting the principle of making arrangements, which would be regulated on a Northern Ireland, UK-wide or island basis, to deal with criminal records. The Attracta Harron case is an example. She had gone to church in the Irish Republic and, obviously, was abducted thereafter.

The risk from offenders does not respect borders. Therefore, our thinking should be broadened from a Northern Ireland-wide basis to a UK-and-Ireland-wide basis.

1.15 pm

Mr G Kelly: It has recently become clear that the South does not have great child protection controls in place, and they do not hold comprehensive sex offender lists, etc. Therefore, our discussions here, and what we decide, will have an impact in the South also.

Mr Weir: The DUP believes that the list, should it be produced, should be on a British Isles or European-wide basis. The Attracta Harron case was mentioned; the media covered a case in my constituency also. The person committed offences in Northern Ireland, and then in the Republic of Ireland. The person was jailed initially in the Republic of Ireland, but was moved to a prison in Northern Ireland where he was entitled to benefit from the remission rates. When the person left prison, he immediately went to England where he committed more offences, for which he has been convicted.

Far be it from me to promote Europe, but this subject should be looked at on a more international basis. Many people have second homes abroad or are retiring to places such as France or Spain. We must ensure that people are not able to slip between jurisdictions to avoid being tried for offences: child protection is the most obvious reason, but the need applies to other matters as well. People should not be able to move about without the local police being at least aware of the threat that they pose. This problem is not confined to geography.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It seems that we agree that there should be clear co-operation between all states on this important issue.

We will proceed to paragraph 9(d) of Schedule 3 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998, which deals with prosecutions, where there is already a wide degree of devolution. This subject — including the role of the Advocate General for Northern Ireland — is one that is close to Alban's heart, but he is not here.

Mrs D Kelly: Given that we will be discussing justice next week, could it not be deferred until then in order that Alban could participate?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will do that.

Paragraph 9(e) of Schedule 3 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 deals with the treatment of offenders, including children and young persons. Does anybody have any views on that?

Mr G Kelly: There is no reason why that provision should not be devolved. The theme running through this paper is one that suggests a lack of trust in the Assembly and other interdependent institutions. Why should responsibility for sentence review commissioners and the remission of sentences not be devolved?

Mr Attwood: In the negotiations up to and since the Good Friday Agreement, the SDLP has expressed its belief that many areas retained by the British, should be devolved. I will not go through it all; it is recorded elsewhere. I presume that the British Government feel that the release of prisoners is an emotive subject. For instance, the release of prisoners could end up being a divisive area that is difficult to manage, and a situation might arise where there would be some perversity with respect to what the Sentence Review Commissioners might or might not do. I am sure that informs the British Government's thinking on this.

The principle should be accepted that hard issues, such as the Sentence Review Commissioners, the renewal of fifty-fifty recruitment, the Parades Commission, including the Chief Constable's right to appeal to the Secretary of State in respect of any determination, should be devolved, subject to agreement on all appropriate community safeguards, which would legislate against any group in the Assembly or any party from any background imposing its views in ways that would be against the public interests.

Similarly, we believe that that matter should be devolved, but it requires some safeguards that might govern many other matters outlined later in the schedule.

Mr G Kelly: I do not disagree with any of that. One of the biggest arguments about policing involves the protocols and demarcation lines that must exist between a justice Minister, the Policing Board, a scrutiny Committee, the Sentence Review Commissioners and so on. That argument is part of the wider discussion on the devolution and transfer of those issues, but we are dealing, in principle, with their devolution.

Mr McFarland: The powers within the Northern Ireland (Sentences) Act 1998 and the Northern Ireland (Remission of Sentences) Act 1995 will not be devolved. It is correct that matters connected with terrorism or residual matters remain excepted.

Presumably, they have been held back because the Government wish to have a broad UK-wide policy on sentencing, remission, and so on. It may be possible to re-examine those issues further down the road, but it makes sense to let them sit for the moment.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is there consensus on paragraph 9(e)?

Members indicated dissent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The pattern will be to do a quick poll round the table, and, if there is no consensus, we will have to move on.

Paragraph 9(f) is repealed, so we move on to paragraph 9(g) of Schedule 3.

Mr Neeson: What did paragraph 9(f) concern?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I will just check in case something significant has been missed.

Mr T Moore: Paragraph 9(f) deals with the surrender of fugitive offenders between Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Paragraph 9(g) deals with compensation. The compensation scheme provided for in the Terrorism Act 2000, which is due to end in 2007, will not be devolved.

Do members have any views on that?

Mr G Kelly: This is an equality issue. That part of the Act has been abused. Sinn Féin believes that the compensation scheme should be transferred.

Mrs Foster: The compensation scheme should remain an excepted matter.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do we have consensus?

Members indicated dissent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The next matter is community safety partnerships (CSPs). This matter will be devolved in its entirety, with no issues remaining. Many of us are involved with CSPs at council level and have experience of them. What is the view on the present situation?

Mr McFarland: There are issues around CSPs, of which colleagues in the Policing Board will be aware. There has been a long-standing row about CSPs since their inception, as the Criminal Justice Review recommended that CSPs and DPPs should become a type of conglomerate that would give a much better service. For reasons that no one can figure out, the NIO has resolutely held its face against this. Originally, we thought that that was because of some deal between the NIO and Sinn Féin. However, if control of CSPs is devolved, the Assembly can perhaps take a more sensible view.

Mrs Foster: In relation to the Review of Public Administration, the Policing Board is considering how CSPs and DPPs can have a more effective relationship with local communities.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will just leave that as it is, noting the suggestions, unless somebody wants to make a proposal.

Paragraph 9A of schedule 3 provides for a chief inspector of criminal justice for Northern Ireland. All related powers are to be devolved. Are members happy with the status quo?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Public order is a more complicated matter. Remaining issues include certain aspects of parades.

Mr Attwood: At least three issues remain. First, we do not accept the note in the schedule that states where responsibility lies for determining which weapons may be used in public order situations. There is a legal argument that responsibility resides with the Policing Board, in spite of the assertion to the contrary therein.

Secondly, we need clarification from the Secretary of State or the MOD about how future powers will develop to enable the Army to operate in support of the police. One interpretation is that there will be garrison strength, and that that will be it. The note asserts that there will be garrison strength with Army powers, in support of civil power. I would like to know more about that. I can imagine what that would mean for public order issues and for providing a technical capacity to policing. There may be other issues, but a note needs to be added to detail the broad ground rules, and that is without prejudice to the SDLP's view that the Army should have no role whatsoever.

Thirdly, I mentioned the principles that should govern sensitive powers being devolved to the Assembly, including the power of the Chief Constable on determinations of the Parades Commission. He has not used that power to date, but he may wish to do so in the future. Nonetheless, if that matter is devolved, there must be community safeguards, because a Minister for justice cannot be given a unilateral power to decide on appeals from the Chief Constable. That is not an acceptable outcome. Appropriate safeguards must be built in to ensure that, if a situation were to arise, a decision would be made that would reflect not just one party or one community interest.

Mr Neeson: The operational independence of the Chief Constable is important. During my days on the board of the Police Authority, decisions were taken by the then Chief Constable that I did not agree with. However, by the same token, when we deal with such sensitive issues as parades, the operational independence of the Chief Constable is vital.

Mr Weir: The DUP believes that the power to appoint members to the Parades Commission should be devolved. The detail is vague, because certain aspects of appointments to the Parades Commission and its operation could remain reserved, if that were the wish of the Assembly. The default position is that all aspects of the Parades Commission would be devolved, unless the Assembly decided to the contrary. Is that the case? Is that in legislation?

Mr T Moore: As far as I know, that is not in legislation, but again, clarification is probably required.

Mr Weir: Did that statement come from the NIO?

Mr T Moore: That comes from the NIO discussion document.

Mr Weir: Our view is that appointments should be devolved in that regard, but we would like clarification on that matter. The example of appointments to the Parades Commission comes back to the earlier point about “certain aspects of parades”. We should seek clarification on what that means.

Mr McFarland: The PFG Committee dealing with rights, safeguards, equality issues and victims has been discussing parading, and the DUP submitted a detailed document on the make-up of the Parades Commission.

It would make some sense if the detail of that were allowed to run as a major issue with the PFG Committee dealing with equality, rights and safeguards, which meets on Friday — as has been happening — and we can agree or disagree with it here.

My understanding is that that entire issue will be devolved, unless we think that it is of such concern that it should remain an excepted matter. However, the Friday team can discuss that.

1.30 pm

On the military side, we will end up with a garrison here, where families live while the soldiers are in Afghanistan or Iraq. The soldiers will return only occasionally and then return to their posts. At any one time, a battalion’s-worth of soldiers would be here, and that is exactly what happens in other parts of the UK. It would be useful to get the protocols that govern that.

It would also be useful to examine the protocols: first, in respect of Military Aid to the Civil Power (MACP), which deals with riot situations and assists Ministries with events such as the BSE crisis; and secondly, in respect of Military Aid to the Civil Community (MACC), which is used, for example, when a helicopter has to help a farmer lift a cow out of a bog.

Defence is, of course, an excepted matter. Three of the excepted functions that will remain at Westminster are defence, foreign affairs and Treasury matters. If defence became devolved, the Government here would have to ask the Ministry of Defence for military aid, for which it would be expected to pay as part of the Budget. It would be useful to get all that clarified, but the well tried and trusted protocols that exist in the rest of the UK can assist in that.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are we agreed that we will pursue Alex’s request for information? Without prejudice, we can look at that information and decide whether it is useful.

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There is a proposal that we defer to the PFG Committee dealing with equality, rights and safeguards in respect of the reference to the Parades Commission contained in the NIO paper on national security. That Committee has had quite a long discussion on parades but has failed to reach a consensus. However, we agreed to consider further the DUP’s proposals for changes to the Parades Commission, and those proposals might fit neatly into that discussion. There is a fair degree of overlap between the two groups, so I am not trying to hide anything from anyone. Are members happy that we do that?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): OK. We are making some progress.

Mr G Kelly: We are giving work to somebody else.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We have parked less today than we parked on Monday. I do not know whether that is a victory.

Mr G Kelly: With regard to the Parades Commission, the community safeguards are clearly important, but we are passing the issue to the PFG Committee dealing with equality, rights and safeguards, so I will leave it at that. We believe that it should be transferred.

You will not be surprised to hear that we are against the British Army backing up the police. We went through a long period in which that was a common occurrence, and we do not want to go back to that. Hopefully, we are entering the final stages of demilitarisation. We are opposed to British Army involvement, and we believe that that remaining issue should be transferred.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): If that was a proposal, I do not think that we will get consensus on it.
[Laughter.]

We will note that and move on to the policing accountability framework. There is quite a bit to this matter. As it is so important, I will ask each party to have its say. I suspect that there will be a divergence of opinion.

Mr Neeson: As you say, Mr Chairman, this issue is very important, particularly where fifty-fifty recruitment is concerned. My party has always believed that that would not solve the problem and has always felt that through time, and when there was confidence in the institutions, a police force comprising all races and religions would develop naturally. However, my party strongly believes that, although this remains a reserved matter, it should be devolved.

Mr McFarland: We are on record as saying that fifty-fifty recruitment should be removed pronto, so we will not get into a discussion on it.

However, I want to talk briefly about the point that is under the issues remaining column that concerns paragraph 11 of schedule 3 to the 1998 Act. It discusses:

“The detail of the relationship between the Policing Board, the Northern Ireland Minister for policing and an Assembly policing committee.”

If this Committee does nothing else, it should determine how that relationship will come about.

The Policing Board was set up as a result of the Patten Report. Alex Attwood has described how inviolate that report is — except, of course, if the Secretary of State decided, with the click of a finger, to abolish the provision to have 10 elected members. It seems that one can move away from Patten if one so wishes.

Patten set up the Policing Board to deal with a particular set of circumstances. However, if we end up with a Minister and an Assembly Committee for policing and justice, we will be in difficulty. Ten Assembly Members who were elected by d’Hondt would sit on the Policing Board, and the Assembly Committee would have 11 members who were also elected by d’Hondt. That means that 21 MLAs would be committed to policing. Colleagues will be aware from previous discussions that it can be difficult to fill Committees. A few weeks ago, we had an energetic discussion with Naomi Long about the difficulty of securing Committee quorums when the Assembly was up and running. It is obviously silly to tie up 21 elected representatives with policing.

How do we deal with that? The Policing Board has many roles. For example, it secures money for policing from the NIO. Presumably, that money would come first to the Minister, who would then pass it to the Policing Board to dole out. The board is also responsible for the police’s manpower and equipment. Therefore, it has operational, hands-on concerns. It is also charged with holding the Chief Constable to account.

There is confusion in that the board does not simply have a watchdog role; that would be the role of the Assembly Committee. The board has a combined role. Therefore, how would the Policing Board, with its many functions, operate, yet have a useful, supervisory relationship with the Committee?

One option is to use d’Hondt to replace elected representatives on the board with party nominees. Those who are chosen to serve on the board would, therefore, be non-elected representatives, and the essential political input that the Patten Report requires would be retained. The Assembly Committee could then operate properly.

It is uncertain whether the Assembly Committee would, under normal circumstances, call the chief executive of the Policing Board to appear before it. The Policing Board would hold the Chief Constable to account, and the Assembly Committee would hold the Policing Board to account through its chief executive. I am sure, however, that the Committee would want to reserve the right to call the Chief Constable if circumstances dictated, given that it has the power to summon people and papers.

The Committee would oversee the Minister’s work. Matters that concern justice and prisons would be much more straightforward if the Committee had direct access to the relevant agencies.

The issues are complicated and impinge on all kinds of areas and sensitivities. However, if we achieve nothing else, I hope that we at least have clarity of thought about how to proceed.

Mr Attwood: I agree with Alan that the Committee’s work on the Policing Board could be some of the most useful that it addresses. However, the basis on which we progress must be that, although it is accepted that the Assembly and Minister would like to have as big a role as possible — since that is the nature of Parliaments and Ministers — all of the institutions established by Patten need to be ring-fenced and their independence protected to the highest possible degree. If we work from that principle, I believe that our efforts will be successful.

Parliamentarians and Ministers may not end up with the authority and role that they want, but given the nature of the policing issue, it is the best way to proceed.

Therefore, save as is outlined in Patten, the role of an Assembly and any Minister or Ministers should not extend beyond what I have outlined. Ministers would have responsibility for setting long-term objectives, deemed to be three to five years. Working from that basis, the principle of maximum dependence of the policing structures can be established.

I am concerned about some members’ views on this. Perhaps some still yearn for a return of the days when there was a Minister of Home Affairs with far-reaching powers.

Mr Kennedy: Hear, hear.

Mrs Foster: Bring back John Taylor. [Laughter.]

Mr Attwood: On the other hand, other parties feel that it has taken so long for us to get our hands on policing that now we are close we must grab it all. Perhaps I am over-characterising one or two parties round the table, but we must be mindful of such tendencies.

In principle, the Policing Board, the PSNI, the District Policing Partnerships (DPPs) and the Police Ombudsman should be ring-fenced; as far as possible they should not be encroached upon.

As a consequence, an Assembly Committee or Minister will feel that their function in relation to policing matters is not what they would like it to be, but that is definitely the best approach. Views on some elements of that may converge over the next two or three weeks.

The SDLP supports the devolution of fifty-fifty recruitment, but it must be subject to safeguards. Given the likelihood, or otherwise, of the Assembly being restored by November 2006 or May 2007, the subject of its being devolved may become academic, as the British Government are about to go out to consultation on the renewal of fifty-fifty recruitment because its three-year provision runs out next April.

I remind members that Patten said that there should be fifty-fifty recruitment for at least 10 years. The SDLP is working from the basis that the recommendation of 10 years is a minimum and argues that it should extend beyond that.

Mr Cobain: Do you think that there will be a Prod in the police force if fifty-fifty recruitment runs for 10 years?

Mr Attwood: By the time fifty-fifty recruitment has run for 14 years, the police force will probably be about 55% Protestant — or non-Catholic, to give the proper legal definition.

Finally, I put down a marker about the appointment of a new Police Ombudsman in September or October of next year, when Nuala O'Loan's seven-year tenure ends.

Mr S Wilson: Are any more of your councillors' wives looking for a job?

Mr Attwood: I understand why Ian Paisley Jnr comes out with that kind of comment, but Sammy should know better.

Mr Cobain: You are right.

Mr Kennedy: There is no point appealing to his better nature.

Mr Weir: What better nature?

Mr Kennedy: Exactly.

Mr Attwood: Sammy should be mindful of the company that he keeps.

Mrs Foster: Sammy, I would leave now if I were you.

Mr Attwood: The SDLP also wants the appointment of a new Police Ombudsman to be devolved. However, I am worried that, given the time frame, offering advice to the Prime Minister on the appointment of a new Police Ombudsman is a heavy power to give to OFMDFM.

Mr G Kelly: If the SDLP had had that job in OFMDFM, I wonder whether it would have had the same opinion.

Sinn Féin supports the transfer of fifty-fifty recruitment, but with community safeguards. There is almost paranoia about what will happen to the Policing Board in those circumstances, so let us try to balance it out. The Policing Board has powers that should be protected. However, we are not talking about a Minister or Ministers with no powers at all. Some of the ambience of the conversation suggests that there will be a lame duck Minister; that would assist no one.

The Policing Board does not legislate — the Minister may. A Department for policing and justice must have a scrutiny Committee. Other Departments will have a scrutiny Committee with powers or limitations, so why would a policing and justice Committee not operate on the same basis? That Committee might not have the power to legislate, but it would certainly have the power to offer assistance in creating helpful legislation.

1.45 pm

Bearing in mind that even this Committee has almost accepted that policing and justice matters would not be covered by two separate Departments, it is crucial to remember that discussion of a single Department for policing and justice involves more than policing and the Policing Board.

We are talking about the entire policing and justice issue, which is much more wide ranging; that should be reflected in the power that a Minister or Ministers would have. Some of the powers are already ring-fenced, and I have heard no one argue that the Policing Board's powers should diminish. That said, a scrutiny Committee is essential.

I have not yet given any thought to what Alan has said about political parties replacing their elected representatives on the Policing Board with party appointees, but I suppose that it is worth looking at, given that the board might have problems getting a quorum.

There is also an all-Ireland dimension to policing and justice, and I would like that dimension to be very robust, whether that be achieved through one or more implementation bodies or areas of co-operation. That would help to strengthen some policing and justice issues on which we have already had some sort of agreement. That is all that I have to say on that matter at present. I think that we can go some distance with it.

Table 1 on reserved matters and their implications for devolution states in relation to paragraph 11 of schedule 3 to the Northern Ireland Act 1998:

“The Secretary of State would retain power to issue statutory guidance to the Ombudsman (the Minister for policing would also have this power).”

I am not sure what that means exactly. Would the Secretary of State and the Minister both have power or would it transfer from the Secretary of State to the Minister?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Moore will seek clarification on that. After Sammy has spoken, our round-robin contributions will be complete. I shall then seek proposals.

Mr S Wilson: Like the Ulster Unionist Party, the DUP believes that fifty-fifty recruitment has been discriminatory and has damaged the police’s credibility in the unionist community. It has also been damaging to individual police officers, because they are considered to have been selected on the basis of their religion, not on the basis of their ability to do the job. Therefore, fifty-fifty recruitment should be ended as quickly as possible. I hope that that happens before policing and justice powers are devolved.

I suspect that those who want fifty-fifty recruitment to be devolved to Northern Ireland want it so that they can use their veto powers to ensure that discrimination exists for a considerable number of years. That worries me. Alex has talked about fifty-fifty recruitment lasting for 14 years or more. That in itself is a warning sign for people from the unionist community. They would simply see the devolution of policing and justice as a means of institutionalising discrimination, because nationalists could use their veto to prevent any change to the fifty-fifty provisions.

The relationship between the Policing Board and the Assembly is not such a big issue. Any MLA who has been involved in the Policing Board will know that a policing and justice Committee that would have other policing and justice responsibilities could not possibly do the job of the Policing Board, or, indeed, supersede it. The Policing Board’s job is more to do with the minutiae of policing.

It is best to see the Committee’s role as an overarching one, perhaps in relation to legislation and long-term strategic issues, with the Policing Board micro-scrutinising policing. If much of the Policing Board’s scrutiny role were passed to an Assembly Committee, there would be meetings two days’ a week on that one issue. That would not work.

I am not sure about Alan McFarland’s suggestion that political parties’ representatives on the Policing Board would cease to be elected members and instead be party appointees. That would probably lead to a reduction in the number of Policing Board members. The board might well end up with 22 members. Politicians will be involved in scrutinising policing at some level, whether at a micro level for the Board, or at a macro level for the Assembly Committee. This is not a big issue — in fact, the more people involved, the greater understanding there might be among public representatives of the issues and complexities of policing.

I am not sure that we are in a position to start divvying up roles between the Policing Board and an Assembly Committee; however, it might be a natural division for one to have a strategic role — with all of the potential policing, justice and legislative scrutiny responsibilities — while the other takes responsibility for micro scrutiny.

One matter concerns me. If the Assembly wanted to be involved in the minutiae of policing, it could be seen as taking some political control of that matter. That would be a retrograde step.

As for the appointment of the Police Ombudsman, the DUP would be happy to see greater responsibility for at least advising as to who should be appointed. That is an important position, which requires a great deal of confidence from the police and from the community. The more that the person appointed is seen as having emerged from political consensus in Northern Ireland, the better.

We should learn from the present Police Ombudsman’s standing that, if the person in the post is perceived to have been elected in a partisan manner, and there is no consensus for that name, that is detrimental to the office itself. The position is important, and the police regard it as important to have independent scrutiny of complaints. Nevertheless, the office-holder must be seen to be independent and without a political agenda, hence the need for consensus and an input from the Assembly.

Mr McFarland: One of the most exciting things about the Assembly is that it has no equivalent of the House of Lords — its only balance is the Committee system, which is very powerful. In fact, Westminster’s scrutiny Committees are now similarly powerful.

A policing Department and its scrutiny Committee would allocate the money, establish the legislation and would be ultimately responsible for holding the Minister to account. I cannot see a Committee fettering itself by agreeing to take a watching brief at a macro level.

Secondly, Sammy cannot have forgotten, because we spent four years on it, that the Policing Board takes up an enormous amount of time, although it is supposed to be only two days a month. From a practical point of view, I cannot see how Assembly Members, who are taking part in plenary sittings on Mondays and Tuesdays, attending Committees on Wednesdays and Thursdays and working in their constituencies on Fridays, would be able to put in the time that the Policing Board, with its subcommittees and so on, requires, if they are to do their jobs properly. There is a major issue here about the Committee's power and about the time required for Policing Board and Assembly work. The logical option would be to opt for a Policing Board equivalent to those in the rest of the UK with a number of independent members — that is the way that the old authorities worked. What I suggest is something of a halfway house.

The key to the Policing Board's success has been the political input; it brought a bite and a drive that it would not have had with independent members. This is vital work, but it means that 10 MLAs are tied up for great chunks of time. I have attempted to find a solution whereby the political input is retained, which has been important during the first four years, while taking the burden off the shoulders of the MLAs. If this place were functioning properly — and it never really got up to speed the last time — Members would need to be here full time. This suggestion is an effort to keep the political input on the Policing Board, which is healthy, while at the same time freeing up MLAs to do what they are paid to do.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Let us start at the bottom. Do we have agreement that the Assembly should have the responsibility to advise — note that the word is “advise”, not “appoint” — the Crown on the appointment of the Police Ombudsman? Are we happy to take on that power? Is there any dissension on that?

Mr G Kelly: Is that the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes; the Assembly, through its Ministers.

I presume that a cross-community vote could come into this, or a petition of concern could be used, if members were unhappy. There would be some safeguards — the word “safeguards” was mentioned a couple of times. What do members think of this suggestion? Of course, the Assembly's advice could be ignored.

Mr Neeson: What do you mean by “could be”?

Mr McFarland: It depends on the mechanism. Will the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister decide over a cup of coffee in the morning that Mr Jones or Mrs Smith would be suitable for appointment? Will it go before the Assembly for a cross-community vote? How will this operate?

Mr S Wilson: This would be one way of ensuring that there is some confidence in the person who takes on the role.

Mr McFarland: So it would come through the Assembly on a cross-community vote?

Mr S Wilson: It would go through the Assembly.

Mr McFarland: That is not perhaps as it is envisaged here, with the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister having a cup of coffee. It would be quite healthy if the appointment were agreed in the Assembly.

Mr Attwood: Sammy's outline is a dangerous precedent, if the appointment of a person to head a senior public body, had to go through the Assembly and be subject to a cross-community vote.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I hope that that is not what Sammy is saying. I think that he means that if there were dissension by a significant group of MLAs —

Mr Attwood: If there were dissension, would the appointment be subject to a cross-community vote? That is not where we are heading with this or other significant appointments. That is a power of veto that people from one, other or both communities would exercise.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): At the last PFG Committee we considered the issue of making public appointments more accountable to the Assembly, so there is consistency in having what is one of the most important —

Mr S Wilson: The post of Police Ombudsman is uniquely different from any other public post. I believe that there is a requirement for cross-community confidence in the person who takes that role. It may well be that, if the name suggested causes no concern, there will be no need for a vote. However, if there were, Members could lay a petition of concern that would require Assembly assent. Of course, that happens in other parts of the world; for example, for appointments of Supreme Court Justices in America.

2.00 pm

The Chairman (Mr Wells): This is a finely balanced argument, and we are hearing both points of view. Could we accept the principle that there should be some mechanism so that the Assembly could have an advisory input? Rather than deciding that there must be an affirmative vote in the Assembly or a Committee, we could agree on the principle that the Assembly take some role.

Mr Cobain: It would be a bit silly if we had devolved policing and justice powers, but did not take a view, as an Assembly, on who would be appointed Police Ombudsman. Alex Attwood has given the impression that perhaps the Assembly is not mature enough to do that or that the Assembly is so discriminatory that it could not be trusted. Assembly Members have put themselves forward for election, and they represent the people. It is absurd for the Assembly to take no view on the matters on the list that Alex read out.

Mr G Kelly: A simple proposition has been made complicated. The Assembly can decide to voice an opinion on any matter. However, it is not up to this Committee to stipulate that the Assembly must take a view. That is the difference. If we stipulate that the Assembly must have a say in the appointment of the Police Ombudsman, we will be in a situation in which everything will be run entirely by the Assembly; that leads to institutional arguments about corporate Executives and so on. The simple solution is to shift the responsibility for the decision from a single person — the Secretary of State — and to give it to OFMDFM. I am not saying that the decision should be made over a cup of tea.

That is a simple proposition, and we should keep it so, instead of trying to prescribe whether that decision is made over a cup of tea, whether the Assembly has its say, or whatever. We should be careful. If we stipulate that the Assembly must give an opinion, the Assembly will have to give an opinion on every single thing. Who are we to tell the Assembly what to do? No one will stop the Assembly from voicing an opinion. If a Member rises in the House and says, “I disagree with this appointment. I want a debate in the Chamber”, we may or may not have a debate. That is the way it goes. Let us not start stipulating that that must happen.

Mr Attwood: Earlier, we were told that the dangers of an Assembly Committee exercising political interference on policing matters would not arise because, logistically, that burden already falls to the Policing Board. However, 10 minutes later, there is an attempt to politically interfere with the independence of the policing structures in the North, namely the Police Ombudsman’s office. The very fear that I outlined earlier has been confirmed half an hour later. The proposal would represent political interference in public appointments in an area of great sensitivity where public confidence is essential. If we start with the Police Ombudsman, there is no doubt that we would have to do exactly the same for the Victims’ Commissioner, the Chief Commissioner of the Human Rights Commission —

Mr McFarland: The Chief Constable, perhaps?

Mr Attwood: Even the Chief Constable — thank you. Once that gate is opened, people will charge through it. Members know the nature of this place; from the past six or eight months, or the past year, we know how members from all parties had heightened sensitivities about who was appointed to an interim post or a full-time post in another public body. We cannot open that gate.

We are fundamentally opposed to that. Of course, we can raise things in the Assembly; that is the nature of politics. However, to give the Assembly any power on this matter would be a recipe for a return to the past.

Mr Cobain: The Chief Constable is appointed by the Policing Board, which is run by politicians.

Mrs D Kelly: And independent members.

Mr Cobain: Alex, in his capacity as a politician, sat on the interview panel for the post of Chief Constable.

Mr Attwood: Was there a cross-community vote?

Mr Cobain: No. There was no cross-community vote.

Mr Attwood: Sammy is proposing that the Police Ombudsman be subject to a cross-community vote in the Assembly.

Mr Cobain: Alex sat on —

Mr Attwood: I did not; Joe Byrne did.

Mr Cobain: A member of the SDLP, along with members of other political parties, sat on a panel and interviewed the candidates for the position of Chief Constable.

Mr Attwood: There were independent people as well.

Mr Cobain: Members of political parties sat on the interviewing panel and then voted —

Mr S Wilson: The majority were politicians.

Mr Cobain: Yes, the majority were politicians. They voted on the appointment of the Chief Constable. What is the difference in politicians sitting on the Policing Board? Do they leave their police hats outside that day and come in as independents?

Mr Attwood: You cannot see the difference between a mixed panel appointing the Chief Constable and an exclusive body of politicians taking part in a cross-community vote?

Mr Cobain: Alex, it is the same with Patten. When it suits you, you need Patten; when it does not suit you, you do not need Patten. It is the same with us.

We are appointed by the people; we put our names forward and are democratically elected. This is nonsense. It is like saying that Parliament should not have any say in this or in that.

Mrs D Kelly: It is one of the confidence measures that the nationalist community requires.

Mr S Wilson: The current Police Ombudsman was a political appointment —

Mrs D Kelly: Nonsense.

Mr S Wilson: The Secretary of State appointed her, at the behest of the SDLP, and she is from an SDLP background. Do not be getting precious now about political appointments to the Police Ombudsman’s Office.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Kelly will speak next, and that is it.

Mr Cobain: Sinn Féin always has the last word.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Sorry, Mr Kennedy will speak next, then Mr Kelly, and then that is it.

Mr Cobain: You Sinn Féin Chairmen are desperate.

Mr Kennedy: I fail to understand what virtues so-called independent members have. All of us are from Northern Ireland, with a Northern Ireland background. Clearly, all of us are capable of holding particular views. I do not understand the logic of relying on and making a virtue out of having independent members, as opposed to people who have sought the vote of the electorate.

I do not see how the decisions taken by those who are supposedly independent can be defended; if the surfaces of all members were scraped, certain views would be found. Those who are democratically elected have put themselves forward and received the mandate to do it. It is astonishing.

Mr G Kelly: The DUP should not get too precious when we are talking about the Parades Commission and the Victims' Commissioner, whom they appointed. We could argue about this all day.

I was hoping for a short adjournment, as I have a couple of important phone calls to make.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There will be a coffee break at 3.00 pm.

Mr McFarland: Perhaps we could have a comfort break, Chairman?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes, the policy is that each party should be represented at meetings at all times. May I presume that we have consensus on the 10-minute coffee break?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is another one chalked up. [Laughter.]

Does the Committee accept that OFMDFM has the power to advise the Crown on the appointment of the Police Ombudsman?

Mr McFarland: Without being prescriptive as to how it is exercised?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes. It refers to general powers. What is the view on that?

Mrs D Kelly: There is no definition of "advise".

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I am getting the clear impression from Alex that there is no consensus on this. Let us not flog it; it is not going to happen — at least not through the work of this Committee.

Let us break for 10 minutes, and I mean 10 minutes, folks. Coffee will arrive at 3.00 pm, but we will have to continue working; we cannot have three breaks in two hours.

The Committee was suspended at 2.09 pm.

On resuming —

2.20 pm

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We have a quorum again, so we are back on air. As we did not reach consensus on advising the Crown on the appointment of the Police Ombudsman, we will move to the next suggestion, which is that the Assembly considers whether to seek devolution on fifty-fifty temporary recruitment provisions. There seems to be some support for that, so I shall throw it out for discussion. We do not want to get into a debate about the merits, or otherwise, of that provision because we could spend several days on it. I will formally put the suggestion: do we have consensus on the Assembly having a role in the temporary fifty-fifty recruitment provision?

Members indicated dissent.

Mr Weir: We are opposed to that, as we are concerned that it would be used as a device to enshrine fifty-fifty recruitment.

Mr Attwood: We are in favour of it, subject to appropriate community safeguards.

Mr McFarland: The problem is that, at the moment, the Government have the power to change the provision. If that suggestion were approved, community agreement would be necessary to change it, so it would never be changed. An entire political issue would ensue around those who moved away from the suggestion or tried to change it.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): For the sake of completeness, Sean, what is your position?

Mr Neeson: We are in favour for it.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): As we do not have consensus, the matter will be dropped. We will move on to new paragraph 11A of schedule 3 to the 1998 Act, which deals with co-operation between the PSNI and the guards.

Mr Weir: I am sorry, Chairman; was any level of consensus reached on the Policing Board? If I understood it correctly, there probably was consensus that a policing board should remain and that an Assembly scrutiny Committee should scrutinise the work of a policing Department. I know that that may be straightforward and obvious, but —

Mr McFarland: We need to discuss further the interaction between those bodies. At some stage, the parties will have to discuss how those arrangements will actually work, the make-up of the scrutiny Committee and whether the make-up of the board should change. Those arrangements are such a fundamental part of the devolution of policing that they should be agreed before we can implement it.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is there any chance of a low-level consensus on that issue?

Mrs D Kelly: Three of the political parties are represented on the Policing Board. Last week, Prof Sir Desmond Rea wrote to the Committee on behalf of all board members, suggesting that the status quo in the relationship with the Policing Board be maintained and that the Policing Board and its functions be protected.

Mr Kennedy: He would say that, would he not?

Mrs D Kelly: You are a member of the Policing Board, and he wrote on behalf of that board.

Mr Kennedy: I know that, but the politicians must sort out the prevailing arguments. We need not run to the Secretary of State, the security Minister, or Prof Sir Desmond Rea. There are issues to be resolved, and this is the place in which to do that, rather than hiding under other people's skirts.

Mr Weir: I hope that you are not accusing anyone of cross-dressing.

Mrs D Kelly: No one has any intention of hiding behind anyone's skirts, regardless of who chairs the Policing Board. It is a matter of record that Prof Sir Desmond Rea has written to the Committee in his capacity as chairman of the board, and one can only assume that he has done that with the blessing of that board, of which Mr Kennedy is a member.

Mr G Kelly: There are three aspects to the issue. Everyone agrees that the Policing Board should maintain its powers under Patten and should remain extant. Whether one or two Ministers are responsible for a Department for policing, they should have the same powers as any other Minister under the Good Friday Agreement. There would be a scrutiny Committee, but it would only have powers to scrutinise the Department, like any other scrutiny Committee. In that way, it is quite straightforward.

Mr Attwood: Except for the second point. A Minister for policing would not have the same powers as any other Minister under the Good Friday Agreement, because those powers were defined and constrained by the Patten Report. The Patten Report said that the Secretary of State's powers, for example, were limited and primarily included the setting of long-term objectives. That is somewhat less than the routine powers of any other Minister. So, subject to that —

Mr Weir: Three propositions were effectively put forward. I shall leave aside the second proposition, as there will clearly not be consensus on it, from what Alex has said. I have no problems with the first two points: the retention of the Policing Board's current powers and the setting-up of an Assembly scrutiny Committee; I am happy to agree to those.

Mr McFarland: Assembly Committees have legal powers to call people and papers. When people appear before a Committee, they can stay quiet or tell lies, but Committees have the ability to call them. One does not want to interfere with the successful working of the Policing Board because, by and large, it is the one organisation that has worked over the past while. My point was that there are serious practical difficulties with 21 Assembly Members being involved in the Policing Board.

The PFG Committee dealing with institutional matters has been discussing whether the membership of the Assembly should be reduced to 90 Members or 72 Members. If, for example, Assembly membership dropped to 72, 21 Members will be pootling around in policing, if we stick with Patten and 10 politicians serve on the Policing Board.

There are real practical problems with giving full service to the Policing Board. Alex knows perfectly well how much time that takes; we have spent weeks, in some cases, at meetings of the Policing Board. Colleagues who served in the first mandate know well that, when the Assembly is fully operational, we can spend nearly all week here, including some Fridays, when we should be in our constituencies.

Therefore, we need to review the elected membership of the Policing Board to see whether there is another way to maintain the same political input and balance that would allow the Policing Board to do its business and allow a scrutiny Committee to operate in the proper way. It is a circle that cannot be easily squared.

Mr Weir: Two issues should be separated: the membership of the Policing Board, and the powers of the Board. For the moment, the Policing Board should retain its role and powers. We might achieve consensus on that.

As regards the elected membership, I am not quite convinced that the practical difficulties are insurmountable. However, if the Policing Board were reconstituted under some sort of devolved justice system, which is what we are talking about, with the Assembly up and running, it should retain the current 10 elected Assembly Members and nine independent members.

If, a year or two down the line, that arrangement were found not to be working because of time constraints, I would certainly be open to some degree of review. My general preference is to retain politicians on the Policing Board, who should be elected Assembly Members. I am not comfortable with moving away from that. If it were shown from a practical point of view that it simply could not be done, I would consider changes at that stage.

2.30 pm

Mr McFarland: Are we saying that an Assembly scrutiny Committee on policing and justice would examine the Minister? Nobody else is looking at the Prison Service, so no doubt we will have the head of the Prison Service in every so often to find out what he is doing. The Committee could call the head of the judiciary to find out what is going on with regard to sentencing, bail and everything that relates to the courts.

Are we saying that the 11 members of that Committee would not be allowed to interfere with their 10 colleagues, from the same parties, who oversee the Policing Board? I cannot imagine the 11 good and true members of the Committee saying that the Policing Board is sacrosanct; that they have full confidence in their colleagues who sit on it; and that they will not examine policing, because that is the job of the Policing Board.

Mr Attwood: That may be the political imperative, as you see it.

Mr McFarland: That is the reality of it.

Mr Attwood: If the Assembly is restored, it will be subject to two police Acts, which will define the roles and responsibilities of the Policing Board and the PSNI. They will define them internally and externally, and, whatever role a scrutiny Committee or Minister may have will be subject to every section of those two pieces of legislation. A Minister, or an Assembly scrutiny Committee, may want to ride roughshod over that, but they would not have the legal authority to do so.

Mr McFarland: The Committee would. If an Assembly Committee produces money for policing and justice, which it would, it would have the ability to supervise the Minister and any agencies or organisations within its remit, and that would include policing and justice. Although it could not interfere with the operational activities of the Chief Constable, because that is sacrosanct, if there was a bog-up over baton rounds, I am sure that the Committee would wish to hear evidence from the chairman of the Policing Board or the Chief Constable about what went wrong. I cannot imagine any Assembly Committee forfeiting that right.

Mr Attwood: I did not say that they would not try to go in various directions — they will.

Mr McFarland: Would they have a legal right to do so?

Mr Attwood: As tends to happen, hopefully, equilibrium would be reached, whereby the Committee and the Policing Board would recognise their limits. That is how it would work in practice. With regard to the technical position, the law will govern who has real authority when it comes to any one issue.

In respect of any part of Government policy in the North, the paymaster can try to jump in on the conduct of any public body, agency or Department.

Mr McFarland: In my view, there is a conflict that is not resolvable by having two sets of politicians in the same mix, from the same party, scrutinising the same thing.

Mr Attwood: I will give you an example. Representatives from all the Northern Ireland parties at Westminster sit on the Northern Ireland Select Committee, and it reviews the Policing Board.

Mr McFarland: That is only because it is still a reserved matter.

Mr Attwood: Taking a hard parliamentary model, that Committee in Westminster reviews aspects of a Government body or Government policy.

Mr McFarland: No, it does not.

Mr Attwood: Yes, it does.

Mr McFarland: When the Assembly is sitting, the Northern Ireland Select Committee can only consider defence, foreign affairs or Treasury impacts on Northern Ireland issues. However, when policing and justice are devolved here, the Northern Ireland Select Committee will no longer be able to posture on policing and justice, except with regard to the Budget.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): This is an interesting academic argument between two experienced Policing Board members, but we are dancing on a pinhead, because the two proposals are: the Policing Board retains its current powers — and I think that everyone is agreed on that — and, the Assembly should have a scrutiny Committee on policing. The issue of who serves on it, and do we need to change —

Mr Weir: Sorry to interrupt, but it would be a scrutiny Committee on policing and justice — it would go wider than policing.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): If we agree that, at a later date — and it will be at a much later date at the rate that we are going — we can discuss whether it is better to have MPs, councillors, etc. on the Policing Board.

Mr McFarland: This Committee's remit is to prepare for Government. One area that requires preparation is policing, and I appreciate that it is academic until we solve the other outstanding issues that have been well rehearsed here. We can stop discussing the issue now, but we will have to sit down and discuss it again before a deal is made in the autumn. We can discuss it as part of the talks, or the five parties who have to decide how it will work could discuss it. It must be agreed before we get devolution of policing and justice.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The only issue that we are falling out about, Alan, is the actual bodies that are on each Committee; that is all.

Mr McFarland: No. We are talking about the modalities of who has the authority to do what, and to call whom, when the devolution of policing and justice occurs. This is the most fundamental issue. The Policing Board — of which I am a former member — has discussed it endlessly, and Sammy will know that the interface between who has the authority has become the most major problem in policing. Following the restoration of devolution, justice and the Prison Service will be fairly easy to deal with, but policing will not, because policing is run by a load of politicians already.

We must make a key detailed decision before a deal is made in November — if that is where we are heading. Imagine if the deal is struck, the Executive fires up, and there are shortened timescales. Imagine if the DUP and Sinn Féin iron out their differences, and then the question is asked about having to wait for two years before policing and justice are devolved — as it was asked here last Wednesday. If the differences have been ironed out, why should the issue be raised again then? We could reach a stage where there is a shortened timescale.

The moment that the Assembly fires up again, the Policing Board membership will change. However, when that happens, will Sinn Féin be represented on the Policing Board? Soon, we will have to discuss, in detail, the interface between the Policing Board, the Assembly Committee, and the Chief Constable and how policing is going to be implemented — that is the whole idea behind the Committee. We can park it for now; that is not a problem.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We could agree by consensus that the issue requires further consideration.

Mr McFarland: The issue cannot be left for discussion by a review Committee or by the Assembly, as many others can; this is a fundamental issue.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): No party is flagging up the issue as being a major impediment to them going into an Executive, as far as I can see. It is a difficult issue, but it is not an impediment.

Mr McFarland: When policing is resolved, this matter will become a major impediment. It should be dealt with to coincide with that point — unless we are going to delay it further down the line for discussion within the Committee. It must be dealt with, and it is fundamental to the core of policing. If we are putting it off, there is no problem.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I cannot see how we will solve it by 4.00 pm.

Mr McFarland: I am not saying that. You suggested that we agree two issues and park this. That is OK.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Good.

Mr McFarland: However, colleagues will have to think about the matter and come back to it. Devolution of policing will not go anywhere until this issue is dealt with.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Would parties consider the interface between the Policing Board and an Assembly Committee on policing and justice and the powers involved? Would parties come back to the Committee at a later stage? It is not something, I am sure, to which some parties have given a lot of thought.

Mr McFarland: The Policing Board will have had some discussion on it, but it is a fundamental issue that must be resolved.

Mr Weir: I do not agree with Alan that this obstacle is on the same scale as some of the others, but I am happy to come back to it at some point.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are we happy to agree that?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We move on to something less controversial: co-operation between the PSNI and the Garda Síochána.

2.45 pm

Mr G Kelly: As the NIO document states, the Inter-Governmental Agreement on Policing Co-operation is an international treaty. However, it is stated in the column on issues remaining that:

“The Assembly will wish to consider whether, with the UK Government’s agreement, they wish in the future to negotiate replacement arrangements with the Irish government.”

Sinn Féin is all for strengthening the all-Ireland structures and for the Assembly to deal with the Irish Government in doing so. That is fine by us.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do you have any thoughts on that point, Alex?

Mr Attwood: The Inter-Governmental Agreement on Policing Co-operation is a moderate agreement that needs to be enhanced for many good reasons. We want a very early conversation to take place about how that could be done in such a way that threatens nobody and assists everybody on a North/South and east-west basis. To confirm: the Assembly should enter into ever-deeper arrangements with the rest of the people on this island.

Mr S Wilson: Considerable co-operation occurs between the police and the gardaí, and, through our positions on the Policing Board, some of us have become aware of how much co-operation there is.

There is no resistance to co-operation at that level where it is seen that it occurs for good operational reasons and produces practical results. However, unionists get nervous when the political structure is then imposed on that arrangement. As police officers will tirelessly tell you, that political structure is by and large unnecessary. The same police officers will also endlessly tell you that good relations exist in liaisons between senior police and gardaí officers and even at lower levels.

We would not be happy if the arrangements with the Irish Government were enhanced or replaced. We believe that what currently exists does so probably more for political reasons rather than good, practical policing reasons. When unnecessary political structures are added to those arrangements, people only become suspicious of what should be natural co-operation between police forces on the island.

Mr G Kelly: I am not sure what Sammy is saying. Surely he wants enhancement; he said that he is worried about enhancing the arrangements, but his whole discussion was about how those arrangements were very good and that they should improve. Therefore, he is as much for enhancement as he is opposed to it.

Mr S Wilson: I was discussing practical arrangements and how practising police officers see where co-operation and liaison are necessary. There is no need to put a political structure on to that. Policemen know what co-operation is required, how that can occur, and that, by and large, it works.

Mrs D Kelly: I would have thought that, as in any public authority, structures and frameworks that state what individual employees of such bodies can do must be agreed at a strategic level. Surely Sammy is not advocating that a garda in one area and a PSNI officer in the other make up the rules as they go along. Operational directions and arrangements must surely be in place.

Mr S Wilson: I thought that the idea was that politicians did not involve themselves in operational police matters. It is dangerous to advocate that, because it will start interference on how the police forces operate with each other.

Mrs D Kelly: That is what those intergovernmental arrangements are for.

Mr G Kelly: There will be North/South Ministerial Council input into any of the Departments or structures that will be set up. A justice and policing Department should not be any different to any other Department. I return to the fact that all of the DUP's arguments are, actually, in favour of enhancement. A formal North/South footing allows for — as the column on devolution states — lateral entry, secondments and exchanges, training of officers, etc. Implementation bodies and/or areas of co-operation would clearly enhance that.

Mr McFarland: That proposal falls firmly into the category of “North/Southerly”, and the rules on that are quite clear. Everyone is more than happy with co-operation that helps in operational matters. That is correct, and Sammy has covered that matter in some detail.

However, there have been attempts to build an empire around this issue before it even reaches the Assembly. There are teams of civil servants who are all dreaming up new ideas. If measures are practical and sensible, there is no problem. However, for example, there were suggestions that all police training on the island should be carried out at a single police college where the gardaí and the PSNI would train together.

There are two different jurisdictions with different legal systems and rules, and some people are trying to make proposals for political reasons. I have no doubt that my party and the DUP will block those proposals, as we have on other matters. No one has a problem with ideas that are introduced for good practical reasons, but if a measure is solely political and an attempt to bring in all-Ireland harmonisation etc, I am afraid that we will not agree to that.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There seem to be slight diversions on this matter. I assume that we shall not reach consensus on this issue. The remaining matter is a bit weaker than what is being proposed, however, and concerns replacement arrangements with the Irish Government.

Mr McFarland: It would make more sense if that matter were moved to North/South discussions. The Assembly and the parties have negotiated changes before and it is fair enough that we negotiate. If improvements are to be made in policing — structural or otherwise — those should be decided through normal Assembly inter-party and cross-community agreement. There is no problem if an issue is non-threatening. If one side or the other tries to steal a march on this matter, no doubt the other side will object.

Mr G Kelly: Consensus with caveats?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Consensus on what is listed as —

Mr Weir: Generally, even when there are negotiations, other matters will fall outside the terms of a relationship with the gardaí at a governmental level and will fall outside Northern Ireland's jurisdiction. Some matters will be decided on a UK-wide basis and that also needs to be taken into account.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Right; we are happy enough. We now move on to firearms.

Mr Kennedy: What have we actually agreed on that last matter? [Laughter.]

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We have agreed that we are happy to try to make progress on the remaining issue, which is that there should be future renegotiations to replace the present arrangements. With the safeguards that Mr McFarland has outlined, that would be done by agreement.

Mr S Wilson: I am not so sure that I would be happy with that. The SDLP and Sinn Féin have already indicated how they interpret any replacement of the present arrangements, and I suspect that the same goes for the Government. However, my understanding is that measures are intended to strengthen and deepen the political structures that have been put in place under the current inter-governmental agreement. I have made it quite clear on our part that that is not how we see the way forward for co-operation between police forces on the island, so I would not be happy to let that one through.

Mr McFarland: There are two different issues. One is on the operational side, where the police deal with the gardaí, which is ongoing anyway.

Mr S Wilson: That is fine.

Mr McFarland: To date, the two Governments have been cooking up proposals in the background with teams of civil servants, totally outside the control of any political advice.

Mr G Kelly: Set up the Assembly and we will be fine.

Mr McFarland: That is the point that I was making. As Peter has said, there are national issues that will be dealt with by the two Governments. There are other proposals that the Governments are currently cooking up on cross-border co-operation that would be better dealt with by the Assembly insofar as they deal with increased co-operation on transport or whatever else. I am talking about the operational side. I am asking whether setting up structures, increasing trade, etc, would be better dealt with in a place where unionists, in particular, had some say in what was going on.

Aside from the operational area — which will go on between the police services anyway — and the national issue, where, clearly, London will have to negotiate with Dublin over matters such as international treaties and the exchange of prisoners, other areas that might be up for increased cross-border co-operation really should be under some Assembly control, as are all the other elements of North/South co-operation. Does that make sense?

Mrs D Kelly: That is what that says.

Mr McFarland: I am trying to persuade Sammy that it might be worth considering an objection to this, here and now, provided that it is clear what we are talking about. We are neither talking about the inter-governmental stuff nor about the operational stuff between the Garda Síochána and the PSNI; we are talking about other areas that would benefit from coming before the Assembly and being dealt with by the Assembly, in keeping with normal North/South practices. Sammy, as I understood it, was about to object to all of that. I was trying to persuade him that some of it might make sense.

Mr Neeson: There could be well be an issue with regard to the Irish Constitution, as to whether a Government body in Northern Ireland could directly interfere with such an important issue as security and the gardaí. Although we all welcome the maximum co-operation with the gardaí, given the nature of modern crime, it is a sensitive constitutional issue.

Mr S Wilson: Despite Alan's attempts to reassure me about this, when I look at the remaining issues, my interpretation is that we look for a deepening and a strengthening of the current arrangements between the Irish and Westminster Governments, involving the Assembly. That is not the way for future co-operation. That, to me, is really done at police level, not at Assembly level; not through political structures, but through normal co-operation among policemen on the ground. There it can be seen to have real practical benefits and not to have some kind of political agenda. I am still not happy.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is clear that there is still no consensus. We are going to have to leave that and move on to the topic of firearms and explosives.

Should legislation governing automatic and semi-automatic weapons remain reserved, as in Scotland?

Mr S Wilson: When we talk about automatic and semi-automatic weapons are we talking about shotguns, for example? Those are quite common, especially among the farming community. What exactly is the definition? Are we talking about weapons such as machine guns?

Mr McFarland: It is rifles and machine guns.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Any experts in this field?

Mr G Kelly: That depends how many rabbits you have on your farm.

Mr Kennedy: Has this anything to do with the aftermath of Dunblane? It might be useful to get an explanation of the Scottish legislation in respect of this.

Mr Weir: The Dunblane situation might also explain why there might be particular sensitivities in Scotland and why it may be a reserved matter there. I just do not know.

I appreciate what others have said in relation to that and I think it may be helpful to get some clarification.

Mr Attwood: That is right, Chairman. It depends on how the drafting is interpreted, but it might be implicit — or hinted — that it can be transferred, even though Scotland has chosen not to have it devolved. In any case, it is one of those matters about which people over here might have heightened sensitivities. We would favour devolution nonetheless.

Mr G Kelly: Whatever is the interpretation of what weapons are involved, it is named in the devolved column, but we are told to see the "Issues Remaining" column. That suggests that we might want to reserve it, but there is no reason for that. If it comes down to whether we are capable of dealing with it as a transferred matter, I think we are capable, so it should be transferred.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is proposed that legislation governing automatic and semi-automatic weapons be transferred.

Mr Weir: Given what I have heard so far, my inclination is that that legislation should be transferred. However, before we take a final decision, I want to be absolutely clear as to which weapons we are talking about. If we could get clarity on precisely what it would be involved, it might provide us with a degree of reassurance.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): So, we shall wait to see the note from the research team.

The next issue is the transfer of responsibility for explosives. Does anybody know anything about this?

Mrs D Kelly: I suspect it refers to fireworks regulations.

Mr McFarland: It applies to fireworks and explosives used in quarries. Of course, when explosives are mentioned, everybody has visions of the past 30 years. Presumably, this legislation refers to normal explosives that are used for quarrying, road building and fireworks.

The situation in Northern Ireland is strange, and, certainly, it caused some confusion on the Health Committee. In Northern Ireland, the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (DHSSPS) issues directions to the Northern Ireland Fire and Rescue Service (NIFRS), and the issue is whether the Health Minister should regulate for fireworks and explosives or should that responsibility be placed elsewhere. The debate is whether NIFRS should be grouped with the PSNI and the Northern Ireland Ambulance Service or should it remain as an agency of DHSSPS, which would keep health and safety issues within Government.

Mr Weir: I do not want to complicate this matter further, and correct me if I am wrong, but is it not intended that as part of the Review of Public Administration (RPA), NIFRS would come under local government control?

Mrs D Kelly: That is so that our rates can pay for it.

Mr Weir: Yes, it is to ensure that local government picks up the tab. If I am correct, does that add another degree of confusion? However, it would apply more to fireworks than to explosives.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): A helpful note has been handed to me. In 'Devolving Policing and Justice in Northern Ireland: A Discussion Document' it states that:

"14.6 The Secretary of State is also responsible for policy and legislation on explosives, including the substances which are controlled as if they were explosives, such as ammonium nitrate. His statutory functions include the licensing of controlled substances, factories, magazines and stores, shot firers, fireworks and the registration of premises. These functions are carried out on his behalf within the Policing and Security Directorate of the Northern Ireland Office."

"14.7 The Secretary of State's responsibilities for explosives will be devolved to Northern Ireland Ministers. Thought will need to be given as to whether these responsibilities would best sit with the Minister for policing or the Minister for public safety."

That is the context in which the proposal has been flagged up. Compared to responsibility for illegal explosives — which is, of course, a security matter — it is a relatively non-controversial proposal. Does that help members? It is a tactical issue to which the Committee might need to give a wee bit more thought. It is not an issue that we would have expected to discuss today.

3.00 pm

Mr McFarland: The discussion is straying into the territory of the PFG Committee dealing with institutional issues, which meets on Mondays. That Committee discusses such matters as the realignment of Departments; the headings under which topics lie; the reduction of Departments from 10 to seven; and the removal of issues from Departments as recommended in the RPA. There is still a question of whether public safety should stay within the remit of the Health Minister or if it should go elsewhere. In a future without today's security connotations, the question is whether it should go to the Department of Health or be left with the police.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I cannot see how this is an impediment to devolution.

Mr McFarland: It is not, but the PFG Committee dealing with institutional issues could discuss it.

Mr Weir: I am happy for that PFG Committee to discuss it. I might be wrong, but I suspect that there are probably not strong views around the table as to which one of the two Departments should have responsibility for explosives regulations. However, we should not use guesswork to decide which Department should take responsibility for it. The PFG Committee dealing with institutional issues will perhaps know if there are experts in the field and find out their opinion as to the appropriate Department. I am reluctant for us to impose a solution without having any knowledge. However, most of the parties do not have a particularly strong view on it.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Can we take the view that there is no strong view on this matter; which Department control of firearms and explosives is neither here nor there. They all come from Carrickfergus anyhow; it is all centralised and strictly controlled. Therefore, there is no need to get worked up about it.

Mr Kennedy: It should be referred to the PFG Committee dealing with institutional issues.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I do not think that they will be remotely interested.

Mr Kennedy: I do not think they will be, but they will be more fascinated than we are. [Laughter.]

Mr McFarland: The PFG Committee dealing with institutional issues should consider whether public safety should remain with the Department of Health. However, we need to flag up the explosives issue for future consideration.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do we have consensus on that?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We move to paragraph 15 of schedule 3 to the Act, which deals with the courts. This is another difficult issue, and there are several items, such as judicial salaries, functions of the Lord Chancellor and the appointment and rule of the Lord Chief Justice, which will not be devolved as things stand. Do Members feel that it is important that the power to remove the Lord Chief Justice or to decide on the salaries of the judiciary be devolved?

Mr G Kelly: I have often wished for that power.

Mr Kennedy: Several attempts were made, but they were all illegal.

Mr Attwood: The matters under “What won’t devolve” were negotiated to exhaustion in Hillsborough, and the British would not concede any further ground on the appointment and removal of the Lord Chief Justice and the Lords Justice of Appeal. I wish that it were different, and I would like discussions on that to be re-opened, but it does not look likely. However, we could argue for it, and if there was devolution we would argue for it again when things were up and running.

The concordat may well be in the consultation document, but I have not picked up on it. Can our advisor advise us on what that was meant to cover?

Mr McFarland: Under “What will devolve” it says: “governing the independence of the judiciary”.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is worth saying that this should be read in conjunction with paper on the role of the Lord Chancellor. Some of the material in that is relevant to this debate. Alban flagged up this matter because he could see that it might cause a problem.

Mr Attwood: Is the concordat a post-restoration agreement?

Mr McFarland: The concordat is with the Assembly, but presumably before the devolution of policing and justice.

The Committee Clerk: The concordat is between the UK Government and the Northern Ireland Administration governing the independence of the judiciary, because it is part of the guarantee of the independence of the judiciary.

Mr McFarland: Presumably that concordat is drawn up when the Assembly is up and running — because the Assembly cannot agree it before then — but before the devolution of policing and justice. It is difficult to imagine policing and justice being devolved without a guarantee or concordat on the independence of the judiciary.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is it not the case that one group will advocate that most, if not all, these matters, should be devolved; a second group will say that there is no chance of that happening; and a third group will say that some matters should be devolved?

Mr McFarland: The Committee agreed that to acknowledge the fact that parties wished to register issues, but that remaining issues were being considered. Unless we can change the plan, we will have problems in agreeing the concordat. We talked about registering our objections to the plan.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I take it the standard response on this —

Mr G Kelly: As Alex Attwood pointed out, we have been through lengthy negotiations. Sinn Féin is in favour of the transfer of all these matters. The paper entitled ‘The Role of the Lord Chancellor’ states:

“The Lord Chancellor’s role in making judicial appointments has been devolved to an independent Judicial Appointments Commission”.

However, that will not happen until the institutions are up and running and policing and justice have been transferred. Judicial appointments will automatically revert to that commission. That is straightforward; they will become the responsibility of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. Sinn Féin’s position is that those matters should be transferred.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Alex Attwood said that it was flogged to death at Hillsborough and that it will not be transferred.

Mr Attwood: The Lord Chief Justice will not agree to it, and people here have responsibility for his —

The Chairman (Mr Wells): May I have the views of the parties on my right about these proposals? Do you agree that the Lord Chancellor's functions and judicial salaries should be transferred also?

Mr Kennedy: No, the UUP is content that the Lord Chancellor is an appointment of the sovereign Government and they, therefore, have arrangements for salaries, and so on.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is what we would have expected. Do members agree that it is not worth taking that any further?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The next item is the Northern Ireland Law Commission. Everything in respect of that will be devolved. According to the list, no issues remain. Is everyone happy with that?

Mr Attwood: The commission should have been set up pre-restoration.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are you content with the powers that it will have?

Mr Attwood: No, the SDLP is not content with them, but that goes back to pre-Hillsborough.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We do not want to stir up a hornets' nest.

We will move on to excepted matters. Alan McFarland summed them up to some extent: international relations; extradition; treason — we keep coming back to that; the defence of the realm; remuneration of judges; national security; and the Official Secrets Act. All the issues that would be expected to appear in that table are there.

Mr Weir: The Committee is covering all these issues to some extent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I am merely tabulating them for ease of reference.

The Committee Clerk: The Chairman is specifying that those matters appear in the excepted list.

Mr Weir: Presumably, the views of the parties on these issues are the same, regardless of whether they are excepted or reserved.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Sinn Féin wants all these matters transferred, the SDLP says that will not happen, and the Unionists are against any transfer of powers.

Mr Weir: The Alliance Party seems to get ignored.

Mr Attwood: The SDLP is making the case that these matters should be transferred; every day we make that case.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Alex, you made the point that excepted matters had come up time and again, but were met each time with a blanket no.

Mr Attwood: Yes, on some matters. However, national security issues are separate from, say, the pre-Hillsborough issues, on which the British would not give any ground. The MI5 stuff is still a live issue.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Sean, does the Alliance Party believe that any excepted matters should become reserved or be devolved?

Mr Neeson: We are still considering that, but, like others, we believe that the maximum amount of power should be devolved.

Mr Kennedy: What part of the word "no" do you not understand? [Laughter.]

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There are excepted matters such as international relations.

Mr Attwood: Chair, may I ask a question? Arlene mentioned two issues.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I have not yet discovered what they are.

Mr Weir: There may be a slight degree of misunderstanding. The issues that Arlene raised probably concern the Police Ombudsman and the Parades Commission.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Does the DUP, therefore, have no issues to raise about table 2, which concerns excepted matters?

Mr Weir: Anything that we have wanted to raise, we have dealt with, but those issues are not extraneous to table 2.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Sinn Féin proposes that we have power over acts of treason, the defence of the realm and the remuneration of judges.

Mr G Kelly: I did not think that there was any such offence as treason. [Laughter.]

Mrs D Kelly: Well, now.

Mr Weir: You would not win with that defence in court. [Laughter.]

Mr G Kelly: It did not work the last time.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are you saying that excepted matters to do with policing and justice should be transferred to a devolved Assembly?

Mr G Kelly: Our position is that the maximum number of powers should be transferred. As somebody has pointed out, we are going through the same list as we have gone through before. I think that Sinn Féin has made its position clear. There is no definition of national security. Come to that, there is no definition of treason. Therefore, our position on table 2 remains the same as that on table 1. That is the only way I can answer your question, Chairman.

Mr McFarland: There is a definition of national security; it is just that there is no legal definition of national security. I read out the definition this morning. It is contained in section 1(2) of the Security Service Act 1989, as the letter from the NIO's devolution and legislation division states. However, that letter confirms also that there is no legal definition of national security.

Mrs D Kelly: According to that definition, Chairman, the Ulster Workers' Council (UWC) strike in 1974 would have been a threat to national security, would it not?

Mr Kennedy: How far do you want to go back?

Mrs D Kelly: It was industrial action.

Mr Kennedy: What about the attempt that was made at the General Post Office (GPO) in 1916? [Laughter.]

Mrs D Kelly: I was merely asking whether the UWC strike would have come under that definition.

Mr G Kelly: What was your point? [Laughter.]

Mr Kennedy: What about the actions of King James's army in 1689? [Laughter.]

Mr Weir: I would point out that the reference to:

"by political, industrial or violent means"

relates to:

"actions intended to overthrow or undermine parliamentary democracy", which obviously — [Interruption.]

Some Members: Refers to the 1974 workers' strike. [Laughter.]

Mr Weir: That was trying democracy, rather than trying to overthrow it.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I think that we are straying.

We have covered policing and intelligence services issues. We have discussed the Police Ombudsman on several occasions. Are we content that we have looked at policing issues sufficiently, or do we want to continue to discuss table 2, and leave the issue of the Police Ombudsman? We have covered the whole issue of devolution of policing and justice.

Mr McFarland: Chairman, we have covered devolution of policing and justice insofar as we have covered the NIO discussion paper. In the process, we have managed to cover intelligence services.

What policing issues were raised initially? We specifically included policing issues when we drew up a list a few weeks ago, and I think that a number of sub-headings were added. Can we be reminded of the issues that went under the heading of "Policing issues", as my addled brain cannot remember what they were?

The Committee Clerk: It probably would have been at the very start. The DUP and Sinn Féin asked for the heading to go in. We do not have the issues at our fingertips, but they would have been those identified in the original papers submitted by parties at the very beginning.

3.15 pm

Mr S Wilson: Attitudes towards policing.

Mr Weir: I do not know whether it came under that category or not but support for the rule of law and support for —

Mr McFarland: That came under category 4 — rule of law — which is our last item — and criminality — but there were other issues that went into that, and I just cannot remember them.

The Committee Clerk: At the outset, the parties presented five-minute position papers on what they saw as the big issues. We included policing because a couple of the parties mentioned it. Underneath that, different parties raised different matters.

Mr McFarland: Can we take a rain check? Parties may want to come back to this later, in case something was slotted in here that we just cannot remember now.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes, we can return to this. Alan has a point, because we have concentrated entirely on the devolution of policing and justice, rather than overall policing issues. Of course, there have been numerous opportunities to raise general policing issues.

If we parked that, would we have time to consider the issue of the Police Ombudsman's Office? It has come up in discussion several times. Policing comes under three headings: intelligence services, policing issues, and the Police Ombudsman. It would have been nice to try to get to the bottom of that list.

Mr McFarland: That would catch us up and put us well ahead for next week.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It would, provided that the debate on the Police Ombudsman was not too long, and we did not have to carry it forward.

I detect that there is no objection to the principle of a Police Ombudsman and the powers that the Office has. There has, however, been some discussion about the holder of the post and some of the actions taken.

Mrs D Kelly: Surely that is about the appointment, as opposed to the holder of the post. I have not heard any discussion about the holder of the post or how she has performed.

Mr McFarland: Hansard will show that there were several discussions about that matter in the first two months of the Committee.

Mr S Wilson: I hope that I have made it clear today that one of the reservations about the way in which the post holder was selected was due to her performance, and the lack of trust that there now is in the Police Ombudsman's Office as a result of that.

The recent disgraceful actions of the Police Ombudsman have raised the whole issue of its accountability. She trailed the news media around people's homes while high-profile arrests of former policemen were being made.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): So, issues of concern do exist. It is hardly fair, but we would normally begin with each party giving a five-minute résumé of its position. However, we did not do that for the previous heading. Is any party in a position to give its initial comments on the Police Ombudsman's Office?

Mr Attwood: Sure.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): If Alex is ready to go, that will give other folk time to make notes.

Mr Attwood: There are several matters to consider. First, though I have no doubt that Sammy and his party have a certain view in respect of confidence in the Police Ombudsman, it is not reflected in survey after survey of public attitudes. It is now confirmed that confidence among the Catholic and Protestant communities, as they are defined in the attitude survey, expressed as a percentage, is now in the high 70s and low 80s, and if they go to the Police Ombudsman's Office with a complaint, people believe that they will be treated impartially. That is a very high level of public satisfaction. It is based on empirical fact and not on what any party might state in a partial manner. We need to remember that.

Secondly, we are fundamentally opposed to what Sammy is hinting at in respect of the accountability of the Police Ombudsman's Office. The Police Ombudsman reports annually to Parliament, and is subject to legal challenge through the courts. Its decisions, whatever they might be, are referred elsewhere for action. For example, prosecutions are determined independently by the Public Prosecution Service (PPS). Disciplinary action taken against any officer is referred to the Chief Constable for police disciplinary procedures.

The Police Ombudsman's Office is subject to much public and political scrutiny, and is subject to legal challenge. When it makes judgements in respect of individual cases, a determination is made elsewhere on whether any action should be taken. All of that, in my view, represents significant levels of accountability. Any argument for further accountability would be in conflict with any other ombudsman's office, where it is accepted best practice that the levels of accountability that I have outlined are appropriate. In fact, if a further level of accountability were introduced for the Police Ombudsman's Office, by which its judgements were appealed to some other body, the first principles of an independent complaints system would be contradicted.

Thirdly, analysis of what the Police Ombudsman's Office says and determines, shows that police officers who have nothing to fear will be exonerated. That happens on a consistent basis. However, those officers who stray beyond the requirements of public service will be held to account. Although that is painful and difficult, it is pivotal to growing confidence in the general administration of policing.

The Police Ombudsman's Office needs more help. In the initiative taken by the Policing Board and the Chief Constable to review all past murders, it has responsibility only for those instances that involved the police; however, it needs further assistance. It has been given some level of funding — I think it is £275,000 — to get that work done, but that project is important enough for overtime and additional funds to be made available both to the Police Ombudsman's Office and the Historical Enquiries Team (HET).

We must support the Police Ombudsman's Office's recent recommendations on informal resolution of disputes between citizens and police officers. As a community, we are indebted to it for the very brave investigations that it has launched into the past because, while there should be accountability for all those who have been involved in serious conflict in the past — just as individual officers may be held to account for past actions — those who perpetrated violence in our country should be personally held to account for what they did, whether they were in illegal organisations or in state agencies.

The Police Ombudsman's Office's work on the Raymond McCord case, the Samuel Devenney case, the Sean Brown case — or on any other past cases — is a very important contribution to what John Hume would refer to as the "healing process". That work will certainly help all of us to deal more wholesomely with all that happened during the past three or four decades.

Mr Neeson: I well remember how the former police oversight complaints body operated. It was noticeable that a very small number of complaints were made at that time, despite its being a time of some of the worst violence in Northern Ireland. When one contrasts that with the Police Ombudsman's Office today, the number of complaints from right across the community shows clearly that the public at large have confidence in its role. It is important that we focus on the Police Ombudsman's Office and not on the individual in post, and that we do not focus on individual cases.

The Police Service of Northern Ireland is probably the most accountable policing body in the world at present. I regret that the police service in the Republic of Ireland does not have the same facility and that it is not subject to the same level of oversight as the PSNI is from the Police Ombudsman's Office and the Policing Board.

The Police Ombudsman's Office has made a major contribution since it was established. Not only has it dealt with recent cases, but, as Alex pointed out, it has dealt with cases that happened some time ago. Although I said I would not mention individual cases, I particularly welcome the Police Ombudsman's Office's involvement in the Raymond McCord murder case. It is important that the Police Ombudsman's Office is allowed to be independent. That is vital to further progress.

Mr S Wilson: The discussion is fairly predictable. The SDLP supports the spouse of one of its councillors. Nationalists, generally, support a body that is still perceived as partisan and that is not, I believe, particularly effective.

The SDLP's claim that there must be public confidence in the Police Ombudsman's Office because 60% to 70% of people support it does not rest easily with its denigration of the RUC, which consistently recorded a higher level of public support in surveys. The SDLP's view is inconsistent. If the RUC could be regarded as a partisan and discredited force, even when it had the support of 70%-plus of people, how can the Police Ombudsman's Office be considered a model organisation if it has the support of only 60% to 70% of people?

The real measure of support for the Police Ombudsman's Office is how the people who come under scrutiny view it. Do they feel that they get a fair deal? Significantly, I tried for a year and a half to get the Police Ombudsman's Office to publish the results of a survey of the attitudes of serving police officers towards it. It refused point-blank to publish those results. As it turned out, about 40% of police officers believed that they would get a fair deal from the Police Ombudsman's Office. I believe that that is a better measure of the standing in which it is held.

There are fundamental problems with the perception of the Police Ombudsman's Office, which is why it is important that any appointment to that body should be done through the Assembly. If a large number of MLAs have concerns about the appointment, it would be subject to a vote in the Assembly. The Police Ombudsman's Office is starting off from a low base; there is significant distrust. If a new chief executive were to be appointed, there would have to be an indication of widespread support for that appointment.

Accountability is, of course, another issue that must be addressed.

This morning's long debate on MI5, the security services and the need for accountability was significant. During that debate, it was stressed that accountability must be to Northern Ireland bodies, and that the Assembly must have powers of scrutiny. However, I quote Alex Attwood, who said that, of course, the Police Ombudsman is accountable because:

"The Police Ombudsman reports annually to Parliament."

If the accountability of the Police Ombudsman's Office can be measured in terms of its reporting to Parliament, it seems a bit odd that an entirely different standard is applied to the security services. Both Alan McFarland and I pointed out that, of course, MI5 is subject to parliamentary scrutiny — and to much greater parliamentary scrutiny than any report that the Police Ombudsman will ever send to Westminster. However, that was not regarded as a sufficient level of accountability.

3.30 pm

Many police officers do not have confidence in the Police Ombudsman's Office and do not feel that they get a fair deal. It has been said that many, who are now ex-police officers, can achieve remedy through the courts, but, in practice, that often means that there is no remedy at all. Going to court requires them to bring expensive cases off their own bats. Having left the police service, they are unlikely to have the support of their federation. Therefore, that aspect of accountability is not open to all those who have a grievance against the way in which the Police Ombudsman's Office has handled cases.

No one can deny that when the Police Ombudsman's Office decides to take on a high-profile case, it ensures that the case is drawn to public attention, right down to notifying journalists that six or seven carloads of officers are going to arrest a former Special Branch officer. Cameras are in tow and the newspapers are notified well in advance so that media deadlines can be met. The most recent example, and I could cite many others, was last week's case involving Mr McIlrath. The Police Ombudsman's Office should be held accountable for publicising such cases. Therefore, the way in which we appoint a new Police Ombudsman is important.

I have heard the special plea for more resources. The coffers of HET have already been raided to the tune of over £250,000 to finance the Police Ombudsman's Office. That will severely curtail HET's ability to carry out its work. The Police Ombudsman's Office already employs 140 people. I cannot remember the last figure that I got from Parliament, but it costs more than £9 million. When compared to any other equivalent police service complaints procedure in the United Kingdom, that figure represents mega money and mega resources. The DUP is totally opposed to any further use of police resources to finance the burgeoning empire that has grown up around the Police Ombudsman's Office.

I have three suggestions to improve the image of the Police Ombudsman's Office. The first is to carry out authorised attitude surveys of serving police officers. The Police Ombudsman's Office should not be afraid to publish those results. At least that would provide a degree of transparency on how police officers view it.

Secondly, there must be a layer of accountability, whereby there is redress for officers who feel that they have not been fairly treated during the Police Ombudsman's investigations.

Do not forget that if the Police Ombudsman finds a police officer guilty, the case will not be returned to the police for decision on the sanction. It is often decided that the trauma and the horror that that police officer has been through is sanction enough, and no action is taken at the end of it all and there is no access to redress for the officer, who is left feeling unfairly treated by the investigation.

Thirdly, we accept the need for independent scrutiny of complaints against the police. However, to ensure that the Police Ombudsman's Office has public confidence, the appointment should be more open to debate in the Assembly.

Mr G Kelly: The Police Ombudsman's Office was created to take complaints and to make sure that there is no abuse of power, and it has a scrutiny role. Its establishment was crucial. When talking about this, we cannot ignore the history of the police force here or, indeed, the whole conflict.

Sammy Wilson said that some scrutiny is necessary, but I am not sure whether he is opposed to the current Police Ombudsman in particular or to the Police Ombudsman's Office in general. However, we fought very hard to get the Police Ombudsman's Office.

Sammy mentioned resources also. The Police Ombudsman's Office is massively under-, not over-, resourced. I do not care whether those resources do not come out of the police budget; HET receives £30 million, yet Sammy is complaining about the Police Ombudsman's getting £250,000 at a time when the number of past murder cases that it is examining increases daily. In fact, the PSNI hands such cases over to the Police Ombudsman.

The argument about scrutiny is circular: somebody scrutinises something, somebody then scrutinises the scrutiniser, and somebody else then scrutinises them. There was a fierce argument about the Police Ombudsman's Office, as I remember it, after its first major case, which was the Omagh investigation. It made six recommendations, but the only one that was implemented was that the Police Ombudsman should come under the ambit of the Criminal Justice Inspectorate. Since then, the Criminal Justice Inspectorate has carried out work on the Police Ombudsman's Office several times.

The Police Ombudsman's Office is crucial, and, as Sean pointed out, it has far more power than its equivalent in the South, which, as anyone would tell you, is a toothless tiger. Therefore, the Police Ombudsman, whether Nuala O'Loan or someone else, should have that scrutiny power, and needs resources to carry it out.

Earlier, we got into an almost institutional argument about whether the Assembly has a veto over the Police Ombudsman's Office. Sinn Féin wanted that particular power to be devolved so that its credibility would increase. Why is anybody surprised that the police do not like the Police Ombudsman's Office? It is there to take complaints against the PSNI. As cops are very insular, it would be impossible to find one who supports the Police Ombudsman's Office, and no cop will praise an organisation that exists to keep them right. Therefore, we are a bit naïve to think that we would find such a person.

We need an independent complaints system. Given that there is a great distrust of nearly anything that the NIO pays for, the Police Ombudsman began working from a very low base. I lodged a complaint or two, and on many occasions, the Police Ombudsman found against me. However, we must move on. We either need an office to do this job or we do not.

If the unionists are arguing against the Police Ombudsman's Office, let them do so. However, we should not make this a personal argument about Nuala O'Loan or anybody else. Let us continue to have somebody in the post who is independent, and let us, above all, keep the Police Ombudsman's Office independent. It was established to scrutinise the police. It has a very clear purpose, because there was an abuse of powers in the past. With all due respect, without that scrutiny function, any organisation would abuse power. Therefore, the Police Ombudsman's Office is very necessary.

Mr McFarland: We support the concept of a Police Ombudsman; it is an extremely healthy one. On a personal level, Mrs O'Loan is a very nice lady, and I like her. But can you imagine the chaos that there would have been if Eileen Paisley, wife of the Rev Dr Ian Paisley, had been nominated as Police Ombudsman? [Interruption.]

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Baroness Paisley.

Mr McFarland: I look to Sinn Féin and the SDLP to tell me of the wailing and gnashing of teeth that would have occurred at the injustice of the Rev Dr Ian Paisley's wife being made Police Ombudsman. You can just imagine it — I can hear it now. So can nationalists and republicans not understand that this was not perceived by unionists as playing the game?

I will leave it at that. It is not a personal issue; it is one of perception. Had it been the other way round, there would have been chaos. People would have been throwing themselves off cliffs because of it.

I remind Members — and Patten was quite clear about this — that the deal was that the Police Ombudsman would look at issues post-1998. The Office was to be allowed to go back before April 1998. If a police officer came into her sights, she was permitted to examine whether that officer had been guilty of previous activities similar to those for which they now stood accused. That was the deal.

No sooner was the SDLP in than it got at the Ombudsman's Office as some sort of deal-breaker and, suddenly, it was a one-sided truth commission. It went straight back to 1972, to the Devenney case in Derry. That was not the deal, and it is grossly unfair. That is not what the Police Ombudsman's Office was supposed to be about. It was political, and it was used for political reasons, and that was not right.

The issue is one of fairness. Sammy spoke about that. Despite what people say, there is no oversight of policies, or of what the Ombudsman's Office is doing and why. There is oversight on the money side, and reports are produced; but, with regard to pre-1998 matters, the Ombudsman's Office is not questioned on what it is up to and why.

I have no problem with chasing police officers who are up to no good, but why are we going back through the past 30 years without bringing any terrorists to book, while the Ombudsman's Office is after police officers who may or may not have done something in the past?

If we want to visit the past or have some sort of truth commission, then let us have one. Let us put our colleagues around this table into the dock to question them about what they did in the past. Let us have all those politicians out. I have no problem with that. If we spend 50 years raking over old wounds, we will never heal this community; but the idea that a Police Ombudsman can thrash around in the past, trashing members of the security forces, is grossly unfair. No one can say: "Why are you doing this?" or "What are you at?"

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I am having difficulty spotting the consensus here. [Laughter.]

Mr Attwood: I do not want to lengthen the debate, but there are a few things it might be useful to mention.

Mr Kennedy: Are we going to go round the block again? We can do that, but what we are not going to do is allow people to have the final say.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Each group normally gets its five minutes on the issue, and then there is an opportunity for Members to question presentations. We can then move towards some proposal where we can reach consensus. I am having difficulty in seeing that, but Alex, this is your question on one of the presentations.

Mr Attwood: I have a few questions and comments, although it is odd that at 3.45 pm someone has begun to question how the meeting is being conducted when a fair bit of latitude has been given by each party to every other party.

Mr Kennedy: Get on with it and we will see what you think.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): And you will get that latitude.

3.45 pm

Mr Attwood: I do not often comment about the current Police Ombudsman. However, I advise people to look at what the SDLP said when Mrs O'Loan was appointed, rather than rush to embrace the portrayal of her as being in one particular camp. We laid down very clear requirements in respect of her conduct, as we would in respect of the conduct of any Police Ombudsman. We were informed that the current Police Ombudsman had previously sat on the Police Authority for Northern Ireland at a time when it was our view that Police Authority was not a forum in which people should participate. Sean will know that better than anybody else.

This portrayal of the current Police Ombudsman as somehow being in somebody's camp is mischievous, dangerous and personally disrespectful to her. I suggest that you look at both her personal history and at the SDLP response to her appointment. We laid down very strong criteria, saying that we would judge Mrs O'Loan by what she did. You can come back on that.

Secondly, if you want to look for something positive, I find it very encouraging that Sammy Wilson is now so protective of the HET, even to the point that he says that a small sum of money was taken from its budget to give to the Police Ombudsman. That is actually not true. The NIO found a separate budget line to fund Nuala O'Loan's part of the HET inquiries. However, his endorsement of the HET and his concern that it might lose some money is reassuring and very welcome.

When it comes to parliamentary accountability, I hope that Sammy is now suggesting that MI5 should be subject to a level of accountability at least equal to that of the Police Ombudsman. If he is suggesting that, we are making some progress on a very hard issue that we tackled earlier. It would mean that there would be public hearings in respect of MI5, as there have been for the Police Ombudsman; reports would be published and laid before Parliament, as happens in respect of the Police Ombudsman; a parliamentary Committee could compel witnesses and call documents in respect of MI5 matters, as is the practice in respect of the Police Ombudsman. If that is the model that Sammy is promoting in respect of MI5 because it is equal to that of the Police Ombudsman, as a starting point, I strongly welcome it.

I do not want to talk about the current investigation in respect of Raymond McCord, save to say that any citizen — whether an ex-police officer or not — who fails to co-operate with a proper and serious inquiry into serious wrongdoing should be compelled to participate in the inquiry rather than keep silent or walk away.

Finally, police officers are concerned about what the Police Ombudsman does; that is probably inevitable. I prefer to draw conclusions from the public approval rates of 70% to 80%, not from the 60% to 70% that Sammy mentioned. Furthermore, the police leadership says that the Police Ombudsman is part of the essential architecture of the new beginning to policing. When the police leadership is allied with the wider public sentiment, the conclusion can be drawn that, on this issue, police officers' concerns are often self-serving.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Thank you, Alex. I am a wee bit uneasy about people actually naming cases. It has happened from both the DUP side and your party. I will stop that from now on because both cases are under investigation and are a legal matter.

Mr Kennedy: I think that Alex misses the point to a certain extent. Most of us have tried not to personalise the Police Ombudsman in terms of the present occupant, but, whether we like it or not, there is a perception — certainly in the unionist community — that she is in some way aligned to, associated with, or sponsored by the SDLP.

Certainly when it comes to defending her, Alex has been in that vanguard. We want more objectivity in the performance and, particularly, the role of the Police Ombudsman. We must also ensure that the empire building that has undoubtedly been a feature of the current term is at least controlled and curtailed into a meaningful and useful role, rather than a role that is designed to cause major problems that, in themselves, are not easily solved.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We have heard varying views on the Police Ombudsman and her role.
[Laughter.]

Interestingly, the discussion has homed in on the person and her policies rather, than the actual legislation on, and function and powers of, the Ombudsman's Office as an institution. There seems to be consensus that a group, body or individual must scrutinise the police.

I am at a loss as to how we can proceed. Apart from the fact that we have agreed to discuss the issue in the Preparation for Government Committee on devolution of policing and justice, which meets on Wednesdays, I cannot envisage there being any consensus on it. There will be a Police Ombudsman regardless of whether there is devolution. It will not, therefore, be an impediment to ongoing discussions on devolution.

As there is no proposal, how do members wish to proceed?

Mr McFarland: Chairman, you may be aware that for several years, those issues have been aired in the Policing Board, and they have been aired here today. Like you, I cannot envisage a solution. This issue may park and resolve itself eventually.

Mr Kennedy: It is all happening in the car park.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes, it is about seven storeys high at this stage.

Are members content to move on?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There are some practical issues that I hope will short and sharp to deal with.

First, I am conscious that the Committee has been meeting for the past two months; members have given up their holidays, and some individuals, whom I will not name — there are certainly half a dozen — have been extremely faithful and have been here at practically every meeting. Despite that, there does not seem to be any perception of that in the media. I am talking not about our discussions or disagreements, but the fact that the meetings have taken place. The Subgroup on the Economic Challenges facing Northern Ireland has issued press releases to keep the media updated, and I am conscious that the Committee has not done that.

I have had a brief discussion with the Committee Clerks, and we have scribbled out a draft press release for your approval. You will be glad to hear that it is not too controversial. To be honest, I have been disappointed that there has been so little media coverage on the effort that members have made.

Mr McFarland: Chairman, one of my colleagues raised the issue with a senior journalist. He enquired why that was the case, given that Hansard is available on the web and that anyone who is interested in politics could find some of the issues that the Committee has discussed during the past two months very fascinating.

Mr Kennedy: Steady on.

Mr McFarland: The word was that they were not getting press releases and could not be bothered to read Hansard. I thought to myself, wow — that says a great deal about the level of journalism that exists in Northern Ireland.

Mr Weir: I do not know who that journalist was. However, I suggest that he was being slightly economical with the truth. I have been to several meetings of the economic subgroup. A press release that roughly outlines the evidence that was presented has been issued after almost every one of those meetings. That information is in digestible form and tends to be a page or so in length. However, those press releases have been completely ignored.

According to one newspaper, Committee meetings supposedly occur only when the trustees of the Assembly Members' Pension Scheme (Northern Ireland) 2000 meet, despite the fact that either the Preparation for Government Committee or its subgroup meets every day.

Sometimes, the media will run the stories that it wants to, irrespective of the information that it has been given. It is essential that the Committee issues press releases in the interests of openness and transparency and keeps the public informed of the facts.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Admittedly, the draft press release is somewhat bland. It states that the Preparation for Government Committee has continued to meet over the summer recess and will continue to make efforts to scope the issues that are to be resolved prior to devolution. It goes on to say that, in addition to the meetings of the economic challenges subgroup, which will report to the Committee on 25 August, the Committee has been meeting three days per week. Members have been discussing institutional issues, law and order issues, and equality and shared future issues. Today, the Committee discussed devolution of policing and justice, and policing issues generally.

There is not much to the press release: it is simply to show that we are working away and doing something.

Mr McFarland: Is it worth sending a copy of Hansard to each of the major media outlets? I wonder whether a political editor would be more inclined to have a quick glance through Hansard if there was a copy on his or her desk. It is more difficult to go on the Internet, scroll through it, print it all out etc. Do members see any merit in that? A copy costs about £8.

The Committee Clerk: It costs £5.

Mr McFarland: Perhaps the budget would not stretch to that.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is a big undertaking. We need to speak to the Assembly press office about that and also ask that at least a press release is sent to advise editors where to find the Hansard on the Assembly website. I spoke to the editor of one of our biggest newspapers yesterday who was totally unaware that it was available.

Mr McFarland: The Hansard reports would need to be sent to the 'Belfast Telegraph', the 'News Letter', 'The Irish News' and 'Daily Ireland'. They could also be sent to the BBC and UTV, and perhaps to the 'Daily Mirror' or whatever else is in circulation.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Can we agree to send a copy of the most up-to-date Hansard to alert the media? Are members happy with the standard press release?

Mr McFarland: Alerting the media on how to find Hansard may help to some extent, but journalists are just idle.

Mr Kennedy: Normally, when a press release is issued to attract wider attention, it includes a point of contact for further comment. Have you given any thought to that or does modesty forbid you?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Molloy and I can handle any procedural queries on what the Committee is doing. Beyond that, questions must be referred to the lead spokesman from each party.

Mr Kennedy: Will you and Mr Molloy be in the same radio car this time?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is unlikely.

Mr Weir: I have a small point on the accuracy of press releases. When referring to a discussion on policing and justice issues and, strictly speaking, our remit is identifying obstacles to devolution on those issues, what would be the title of the press release?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We could amend that accordingly.

Mr Weir: The real remit is looking at the impediments.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I assume that we have consensus on issuing 10 copies of Hansard to the media and on releasing the press release. Are members content?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Clerk has asked whether members want to autograph the issues before they are sent out.

A communication from the economic challenges subgroup, in Alan Patterson's name, has been handed to each member. As you can see, members of the subgroup are keen to hear the views of Maria Eagle, but she is on leave until the end of August. Apparently, MPs do not work at all during August.

Mr Kennedy: How do you solve a problem like Maria?

Mr Weir: By not making jokes about it.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The subgroup wants to schedule a meeting with the Minister and the Northern Ireland Youth Forum on 5 September 2006. Technically, that would mean taking evidence after the event. However, because of the importance of getting the Minister's involvement, it is worth consideration. Are members content to allow the economic subgroup to do that?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The other issue, which we have touched upon several times, relates to the letter from the Secretary of State dated 9 August 2006. Several members have indicated that they are not particularly happy with his response.

Mr S Wilson: Have we not already dealt with that?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I was going to ask whether members want to raise any other issues in relation to the letter.

Mr McFarland: I thought that we had agreed to write to Secretary of State to invite him to our final meeting, perhaps saying that we expect him to be available, given the importance that he has attached to this Committee.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The issue was whether we were prepared to give him advance notice of our questions.

Mr McFarland: It seems to make sense to give him notice of the questions that we will be putting to him, provided that he will come. Members may wish to raise other issues with him on the day, and we must allow for that.

Mr S Wilson: Some questions are technical, so we want him to have advance notice so that we get full answers. If it entices him to come along, there is no reason not to give the Secretary of State the questions in advance. There will be supplementary questions anyway.

Mr Kennedy: Chairman, wherever the Secretary of State is with his bucket and spade, he has access to the Hansard reports of this Committee.

Mr S Wilson: I am sure that he is not reading them.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I am sure that his officials, at least, are reading them on his behalf.

The Committee Clerk: They will have only read the Hansard reports that have been agreed. The Secretary of State does not receive draft copies, so he will be a bit behind.

Mr S Wilson: He is probably awaiting the next episode with bated breath.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The next meeting, to discuss rights, safeguards and equality issues etc. will be on 18 August 2006 at 10.00 am in room 144. The format is the same: an all-day meeting day starting at 10.00 am and ending at 4.00 pm, with lunch at 12.20 pm.

Mr McFarland: Sadly, Chairman, I will miss the next three meetings of the Committee, as I propose to take a week off.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): You have been a faithful attendee, Mr McFarland. I think that you have been at every meeting so far. You deserve your week off.

The Committee Clerk: Have you got a contact number? [Laughter.]

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is there any other business?

Mr Kennedy: We could sing the national anthem.

Adjourned at 4.00 pm.

COMMITTEE ON THE PREPARATION FOR GOVERNMENT

Friday 18 August 2006

Members in attendance for all or part of proceedings:

The Chairman, Mr Francie Molloy
Mr Dominic Bradley
Mr Francie Brolly
Mr Gregory Campbell
Mr Derek Hussey
Mr Danny Kennedy
Ms Patricia Lewsley
Mrs Naomi Long
Mr Kieran McCarthy
Mr Dermot Nesbitt
Mr John O'Dowd
Mrs Patricia O'Rawe
Mr Ian Paisley Jnr
Mr Edwin Poots
Observing: Mr Jim Wells

The Committee met at 10.01 am.

(The Chairman (Mr Molloy) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): You are welcome to the meeting. I remind members to switch off their mobile phones, because dialogue has been lost from almost every meeting due to interference. It is possible that we may lose a contribution that a member wants to be recorded — or, perhaps, something that he or she does not want to be recorded — so it is important that mobile phones be switched off completely to ensure an accurate Hansard report.

We will break for lunch at 12.20 pm, and I hope that the meeting will finish by 4.00 pm. If members want home earlier, talk quicker. Are there any apologies?

Mr O'Dowd: Francie Brolly, Pat O'Rawe and I are replacing our usual team.

Ms Lewsley: I am here on behalf of Mark Durkan.

Mr D Bradley: I am here on behalf of Alasdair McDonnell.

Mr McCarthy: I am here on behalf of David Ford.

Mr Kennedy: I am here on behalf of Alan McFarland.

Mr Nesbitt: I am here on behalf of one of the other two who normally attend.

Mr Campbell: Edwin Poots, Ian Paisley Jnr and I are here in place of our normal team; that does not mean that we are abnormal or subnormal.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are members content with the draft minutes of the meeting that was held on 11 August?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The research paper on the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) and domestic legislation in the Republic of Ireland appears in the agenda under "Matters Arising".

Mr Nesbitt: I would like some clarity on the agenda now that the minutes have been agreed. I do not wish to be awkward, but it is important that the procedure is clear. Last week, we agreed — on Naomi's recommendation — that a research paper on ECHR in the Republic of Ireland be commissioned, but we did not agree that it be taken as item 2 on today's agenda. I am not saying that it should not be discussed, but we did not agree that it be item 2 on the agenda.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): It is not item 2 but appears under "Matters Arising", which is item 2.

Mr Nesbitt: That is correct, but it is down as an item on the agenda, and if the agenda is accepted, that could lead to our discussing it now.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Or we could avoid a discussion on it.

Mr Nesbitt: I repeat that I am not opposed to its being discussed, but last week we agreed that research be undertaken. In agreeing that it be undertaken, I did not assume that it would appear as a quasi-substantive item in today's agenda ahead of item 4, which is "Discussion on Equality and Shared Future Issues" — if that is the implication of its being placed there.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): That is not the intention.

Mr Nesbitt: The "Formation of a Round Table Forum on a Bill of Rights" is a matter arising, as is "Parades". Those two issues should come under "Matters Arising" and not be listed as separate items under "Rights and Safeguards". We must ensure that the procedure is clear. Item 4, "Discussion on Equality and Shared Future Issues", is the first substantive item on today's agenda.

Mrs Long: My understanding was that any issues in the minutes on which further information would be forthcoming would come under "Matters Arising". That has been the procedure in all meetings of the Committee on the Preparation for Government (PCG) that I have attended to date. It is simply a courtesy to list the research in "Matters Arising" and inform members that it is included in our papers. That is the standard practice in all PCG Committee meetings, so I do not see a difficulty.

I do not envisage a lengthy discussion on the research, because we have not had an opportunity to consider it in detail. In all PFG Committee agendas, “Matters Arising” includes additional reports and information requests.

Mr Nesbitt: Although our meetings will not be too numerous, it might be better to list such items under “Matters Arising”, and if members have matters that they wish to raise, they can raise them. For example, item 2 of the agreed minutes of the meeting of 11 August states that:

“The Chairman agreed to seek a response from the Editor of Debates on this matter.”

That could be a matter arising that I could follow up, but it is not specifically listed as such. A little clarity is needed. When my party advisers mentioned what was on today’s agenda, the implication was that the discussion on equality might be way down the agenda. Therefore I sought a little clarity. I stress that I did not do so to be awkward; it was to ensure that we know under which procedure we are operating.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): On that point, Dermot asked whether Hansard could report members’ comings and goings. The Editor of Debates has said that it is not the role of the Official Report to record when members enter and leave the Committee Room; the role of the Office of the Official Report is to produce a report of the meeting. As much as possible, the minutes of Committee meetings record members’ comings and goings. If someone wanted to know which members were present at a particular time, they could look at the minutes in tandem with the Official Report.

The next issue for discussion comes under “Rights and Safeguards”, and it is the establishment of a round-table forum on a bill of rights. As is mentioned in the minutes, the DUP sought time to confirm its position on the establishment of a round-table forum. Any proposals did not go to a vote last week because of that. The DUP may wish to respond.

Mr Poots: After discussions with party officers, the DUP’s position is to seek the establishment of a round-table forum under the Committee of the Centre, which is an all-party Committee, once an Assembly has been formed.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): May I take it that the DUP is happy with the proposal?

Mr Poots: No. There are two proposals: one is to establish a round-table forum; the other is to establish it by a particular date. The Committee of the Centre in the Assembly should establish the round-table forum.

Ms Lewsley: My proposal was to support the basic principle of a round-table forum. Mr Poots says that the DUP now supports that, but only when the Assembly is up and running. That places a timescale on the establishment of a round-table forum. If the DUP agrees in principle with a round-table forum, I cannot understand why it does not support my proposal.

Mr Campbell: As Patricia has outlined, the issue is one of principle, so it should not pose a problem. It does not pose the DUP a problem. However, the Committee of the Centre was, and hopefully will be again, the conduit in the Assembly that would deal with such issues. We consider the Committee of the Centre to be the most appropriate forum in which any round-table discussions should be held. That is our reason for our position.

Ms Lewsley: The original proposal encapsulated the principle of a round-table forum and a date by when it would be established. That proposal was divided in two, much like the proposal concerning the bill of rights and the round-table forum was divided into two proposals.

Can we determine whether there is consensus to establish a round-table forum in the first instance? After that, proposals can be made on the timescale, whether they come from the DUP or Sinn Féin. A timescale for the forum is totally different to the principle of establishing it. I want to agree the first proposal on the round-table forum.

Mr O’Dowd: If the SDLP wants to put that proposal, I am more than happy for it to be put before the Committee, and I will speak afterwards.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The original proposal was that the Committee should support the formation of a round-table forum to help create a bill of rights for Northern Ireland. Is there consensus?

Members indicated dissent.

Mr Campbell: There is not consensus on that wording.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Is there an alternative wording?

Mr Nesbitt: To reiterate the Ulster Unionist Party’s position, we do not advocate a round-table forum. However, in the event of the Minister calling for a round-table forum to be established, we will participate in it. The primary reason for not supporting the round-table forum is that there has been a six-year delay in creating a bill of rights. If anything, the round-table forum will elongate the process without any guarantee at all that it will contribute to a solution.

Mr O’Dowd: I am disappointed that the Committee cannot even accept the principle of a round-table forum on a bill of rights. This Committee has deliberated over a wide range of equality issues, and the only way that we are going to get anything going is through the establishment of a bill of rights. The two Governments have caused unacceptable delay in that process.

Neither will we accept a consensus on a round-table forum on a bill of rights being tied to the establishment of an Assembly, because we are not going to allow the DUP to have a veto on a bill of rights or on an Assembly.

Mr Nesbitt: I am glad that Sinn Féin made that point, because I emphasised again last week that the Ulster Unionist Party supports a bill of rights. I wrote an article nine years ago advocating a bill of rights; that is on the record. There is no way that the UUP does not support a bill of rights. The problem for the UUP is the process by which a bill of rights is obtained. We believe that a round-table forum would elongate the process, making more distant the outcome that members here wish for. Back in January the Minister said that he would not have the round-table forum until September.

Ms Lewsley: May I ask for clarity from the DUP? Which part of the proposal do you have a problem with?

Mr Campbell: I would have thought that it was fairly clear. The Committee of the Centre is the forum in the Assembly that would deal with matters such as this. That was the case in the old Assembly. Because of the importance that we attach to these issues, we have recently proposed to this Committee that it ensure an even more fundamental role for the Committee of the Centre. It must be central to the development of issues around safeguard, equality and related matters. The round-table forum should be tied intrinsically to the establishment of the Assembly and the Committee of the Centre.

There is an idea abroad that equality issues can be resolved through parties sitting down and discussing matters involving equality on its own, as a stand-alone topic. We believe that they are fundamental to the future of our community as well as the other community. But the Committee of the Centre is the body in the Assembly that establishes that issue. To have a forum in the absence of any Assembly, never mind a Committee of the Centre, would be a waste of time. It would not take the issue forward; it certainly would not solve the long-standing issues that we believe need solving. The Committee of the Centre would be a better conduit for the resolution of those issues.

Ms Lewsley: The issue here is about supporting the proposal that was put forward, which is the basic principle of supporting a round-table forum.

I take on board what Gregory Campbell has said, but I am attempting to get consensus — around this oblong table — for a round table on a bill of rights. If that consensus is achieved, it will be up to the parties to propose who will sit on it; how many members should sit on it; where it should sit; and how it should progress. That is where the confusion lies. I do not expect to decide on all those things today, although we could agree on a timescale and decide on who will be responsible for it and who will sit on it. I understand that the DUP is in favour of having a round-table forum on a bill of rights, and I would like that proposal in principle to be agreed today.

10.15 am

Mr Campbell: Without an Executive or any method of delivery, what would be the point of a round-table forum? In the absence of an Assembly and a Committee of the Centre, a round-table forum would enable the parties around that table to give their views. I am sure that the Secretary of State would thank us very much, and he would be appreciative; but then he would go off and do whatever he wanted.

To establish a round-table forum in the absence of any move would be to avoid the issue. I keep on hearing from other parties that we need to move in a direction that helps resolve these matters. A round-table forum would not do that; it would allow parties to air their grievances on a subject, as we will today. If anybody can convince the DUP that a round-table forum would be a positive way to take the issue forward, we might be prepared to listen. However, we have not seen or heard anything that would convince us that that forum — in the absence of any practical proposals to take the issue forward — would do anything to achieve that.

Mrs Long: Whether there is devolution or not, the bill of rights issue still needs to be progressed. The round-table forum will not produce the bill of rights; that is the responsibility of the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission (NIHRC). The forum would be an opportunity for the ideas and proposals of all interested parties — not only those around this table — to be market tested. Therefore the round-table forum is key to getting a wide breadth of opinion fed into the process of producing a bill of rights.

Whether there is devolution or not — and the Alliance Party prefers that this would happen in the context of devolution — the bill of rights needs to be developed. On that basis it would be beneficial to have the round-table forum established so that, as these talks progress, a wider cross section of the community could be consulted and informed about what is happening, and participate in the process. I suspect that Gregory Campbell is right: if direct rule continues, the Secretary of State will make the final decisions on a bill of rights. In that case, I would prefer that there was some type of forum in place to feed into that process, rather than none. If the Secretary of State chooses to ignore the forum's opinions, we can take that up with him. However, if he does not have the benefit of hearing the opinions first, we can hardly criticise him for not listening.

Ms Lewsley: We do not know what the future holds, but we have agreed that we need a bill of rights. The best way to achieve that is through a round-table forum to include all the people that Naomi has mentioned.

That will send the strong message to the wider community that we support a round-table forum and a bill of rights and, therefore, the opportunity for them to have a voice.

Mr Brolly: The DUP's position on this contradicts their normal position on talking shops. Gregory Campbell has said that the bill of rights should not be discussed outside of a re-established Assembly, because — even though members will be talking about it — we will have no authority or power to take it anywhere, and a decision on it will be made by the direct rule governors. That is the position that Sinn Féin took about the talking shops that were previously held on other issues in the Assembly.

Mr Campbell: I still have not heard any further declaration or improvement on this issue. I do not see how a round-table forum will be radically different to the present approach.

This Committee is a forum of sorts, which thus far has not made as much progress as it would like. Would a round-table forum on a bill of rights be a replica of this, and would it make any more progress than we have made? Is anybody suggesting seriously that the Committee of the Centre would not deal with these important issues? There has been broad acceptance that that would be the case.

It seems that there has been a role reversal. Some members appear to be saying that there is no prospect of the IRA's going out of business in the next five years, and, consequently, no prospect of the restoration of a functioning Assembly, which includes, obviously, the Committee of the Centre and the Executive. According to that logic, as the restoration of the Assembly will not be permitted, the issue will not be dealt with, and a round-table forum will have to be established to fill the vacuum. It appears that certain members of the PFG Committee are close to taking that approach. However, the DUP is not prepared to accept that defeatist attitude.

We have to move forward in the expectation that people will move with us. People have been moving; let us keep them moving. We must work towards resolving these very important issues in the way in which they ought to be resolved. They will not be resolved by establishing a forum that goes nowhere, and which sets no date and makes no progress towards establishing a proper forum that can really deliver, discuss the issues, make proposals and question Ministers. That would enable us to make progress on this issue, rather than simply having a discussion that does not go anywhere.

Patricia Lewsley mentioned that the Secretary of State could take account of the views of a round-table forum. Yes, he could — just as he could have taken account of the views of the South Eastern Education and Library Board. Unfortunately, he did not: he chose instead to send in commissioners. Are members really going to choose to go down the route of asking for more consultation, more round tables and more hot air? Are they going to allow Ministers to thank them for their views, but do as they please? Or will members decide that they can nail this down, tell the Ministers what issues must be resolved, and how they should be resolved, which is through the proper mechanisms of the Committee of the Centre and the Assembly Executive?

Mr Kennedy: It is clear that there is not going to be consensus. My party said earlier that it is also against the establishment of a round-table forum because it would serve no useful purpose. The discussion on this matter has been good and useful, but, given the absence of consensus, we should move on.

Ms Lewsley: Danny is right; we are not going to reach consensus. It is sad because, last week, my understanding of the DUP's position was that it was, and still is, in favour of a round-table forum. However, the party has added the caveat that such a forum cannot be agreed unless it is given some structure. That sends a very clear message to the public.

We had the opportunity to debate this matter last week, but the SDLP had hoped that some of the detail would have been ironed out at the round-table forum and in other forums that would give civic society the opportunity to voice its opinion. I am saddened that we could not reach consensus on the very basic principle of setting up a round-table forum.

Mr Paisley Jnr: We should make it clear for the record that it is not a matter of finding consensus on the basic principle; it is a matter of finding consensus on the trigger mechanism for its establishment. That is where the problem lies. You may not see that, but everyone who reads Hansard will see clearly that the trigger mechanism is the problem, not the issue of whether, in principle, any future Assembly Committee decides or does not decide to implement such a process.

Ms Lewsley: Sorry, but I think that you are wrong. If you look at the minutes, you will see that I said at the beginning that the proposal should be separated into two proposals. The first proposal was that consensus should be reached on the basic principle of establishing a round-table forum, and the second was that other parties would be entitled to make proposals on the trigger mechanism and the detail.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Again, if you read the proposal that you put to the meeting, you will see that it would not allow that to happen.

Mrs Long: I do not want to prolong the discussion. Regardless of whether other members agree on the principle, the Ulster Unionist Party has said that it does not agree. As one party will not consent to even the principle, we are just talking around the houses.

Gregory said that the proposal for the establishment of round-table forum on a bill of rights was designed to fill a vacuum. That is not how I view the matter. Should devolution be restored, the Human Rights Commission would bring its firm proposals to the round-table forum, consult on them and then consult the Northern Ireland Executive, which would bring them to the Assembly.

If that were not the case, they would advise the Secretary of State. I cannot accept that the proposal was designed simply to be taken forward in a vacuum. If devolution is restored, the value of civic society's continuing to be engaged in the process will remain valid.

In addition, I am not sure that we can say that the PFG Committee does not operate as a round-table forum. It is "a" round-table forum. The difference is that it is not "the" round-table forum that members envisage. For example, the Human Rights Commission has not attended the PFG Committee to consult members on detailed proposals, which is what members would expect of it at the round-table forum. We will not get consensus on the proposal, but it was valid. If we cannot establish consensus, even at that level, we will send out a disturbing message about the issues involved in the formulation of a bill of rights.

Mr Poots: Consensus could be formed, but it has to be achieved on the basis of the first principle, which is that, whatever happens, the support of both communities can be commanded. The only available way to do that would be a cross-community vote in the Assembly. Establishing round-table forums to drive particular agendas and to which interest groups would come to give their points of view would not achieve that consensus. Ultimately, if we want a bill of rights that will work and will be supported by the community, we must establish cross-community support in the Assembly.

If the SDLP is minded to establish a forum under the Committee of the Centre, consensus could be achieved on that. However, the proposal is fairly vague and could not achieve that.

Mr Nesbitt: Naomi said that we might send out a disturbing message. I do not concur with that. My party advocates a bill of rights. However, after six years of an elongated process that is going nowhere, and after much consultation with the previous Human Rights Commission, along with the forums that we have had, a round-table forum would, if anything, slow down the process. Our position might not be disturbing; it might actually help to secure a bill of rights for Northern Ireland, which I advocate strongly.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We are not going to make much progress on this matter. May I take it that there are no other proposals on this issue?

Mr Paisley Jnr: Correct.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We shall move on. I am not opening this up for discussion, but do members have any further comments to make on the Parades Commission? Do members have copies of the DUP paper?

The Committee Clerk: Members have been given copies of the DUP paper, and more copies are being made.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): If there are no comments, we will move on to the main items for discussion.

Mr Kennedy: May I place on record a few observations that my party has made on parades?

The Ulster Unionist Party agrees that the creation of the parades "controversy" was and remains a strategy used by some in society to carry on the war by another means. We believe also that the Parades Commission should be abolished. It has not aided the resolution of the politically motivated controversy surrounding parades in Northern Ireland.

Our submission to the Quigley Review is broadly in line with that which the DUP has suggested, and we believe that mediation and decisions should be separated. The current designation of a parade as contentious — and we use that word advisedly — must be re-examined, as single objections currently have the potential to create problems. We question also the assertion that:

"any process must be open and transparent and should allow for public scrutiny".

We need more detail on that.

It is our clear view that, in all determinations, there should be a presumption to allow a parade, and a presumption to allow a counter-protest, as long as it is peaceful. The organisers of any parade should be responsible only for those on parade and should not be held responsible for those who are not under their control. The Ulster Unionist Party Assembly Group believes also that all main thoroughfares should be open to everyone, and that no group has the right to withhold permission from passing along a thoroughfare.

10.30 am

In our view, no one should have to ask the permission of a residents' group, or any other group, to walk along a road or pass through an area. That could lead to a serious situation, whereby self-appointed groups withhold permission from other groups and organisations, such as the police, the Post Office and other service providers.

That would be a recipe for a serious situation. Therefore, we must overcome the obstacles that are preventing the correct circumstances for the formation of a Government, and any outstanding controversies around parades must be well on their way to being resolved before devolution is restored.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The PFG Committee dealing with law and order issues, which meets on Wednesdays, agreed that this Committee, which is tasked with dealing with rights, equality issues, safeguards and victims, should discuss whether the Assembly might wish to have appointments to the Parades Commission devolved with justice and policing. An attached table from an NIO letter of 15 August on that subject will be circulated. Paragraph 10 of schedule 3 to the 1998 Act deals with public order, and reference is made to the Parades Commission in the “Issues remaining” column.

Mr O’Dowd: Considering that members have just been presented with this, could discussions be deferred to allow us a chance to look at it and to discuss it with our colleagues?

Mr Paisley Jnr: This has been available since February of this year in the Government’s discussion paper, so it should not come as a surprise to anyone.

Mr O’Dowd: I did not say that it was a surprise, and I am not surprised by it. I asked whether it could be deferred to a future discussion, as it had just been presented to the Committee.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Does anyone wish to comment on the table today, even though it is not a substantive issue on the agenda?

Mr Poots: It is more fundamental than appointments to a flawed body; it is about the process under which the running of parades would be conducted. We have made clear proposals on the separation of the mediation role and the determination role. If that matter is not dealt with, regardless of who is appointed to that body, which has not operated or functioned properly in the past, he or she will not change it, because it is impossible to act both as an impartial mediator and as a determiner.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are there any other comments at this stage?

Mrs Long: The context for the devolution of policing and justice is one in which a triple lock should be in place to ensure that it is done under the correct conditions. The proposed target date for the devolution of policing and justice was two years from the restoration of devolution — a period that covers two marching seasons. That would have given us the opportunity to test the stability of the Executive, and it would have given us the chance to see how matters moved during a two-year political cycle. Considering the sensitivity of many of the matters that would be devolved under policing and justice, I am not sure that appointments to the Parades Commission would rank among the most sensitive.

I am not sure whether there are strong arguments for appointments to the Parades Commission being retained as a reserved matter, but we are not particularly concerned about that issue and would be flexible. Other more sensitive policing and justice matters would be transferred at the same time to the Northern Ireland Assembly.

Mr Kennedy: This matter has been referred from the Preparation for Government Committee that deals with law and order issues in order that we might examine whether it is an issue of public order or law and order. My party’s view is that the Parades Commission should be abolished, which rather deals with the issue of appointing anybody to it. There are other issues, such as who might be appointed to adjudicate at tribunals. “Parades” cannot be separated from “Good relations” and “Shared future”, given that main roads presumably constitute a shared space. There are interesting aspects that must be examined in some shape or form.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We will not reach consensus on this issue today. One party has asked for some additional time to discuss the matter, so we should park it for now and return to it later. At Wednesday’s meeting of the Committee, we sought opinions, but we but did not take any decisions. Can we agree to set this issue aside and move on to the next item?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We will now deal with issues under the sub-headings “Equality”, “Good relations” and “Shared future”. We should try to discuss each issue separately, although there will be overlaps. Can I ask members to keep their contributions as short as possible? The DUP has referred to its submission in relation to the “Equality” sub-heading, so perhaps the DUP could open the discussion.

Mr Kennedy: Can you tell us the rules of the game, Mr Chairman? You have asked for short presentations, but we have a detailed presentation. If it is helpful, we will submit a paper in conjunction with that presentation. How long are you allowing for each presentation?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We suggest a five-minute opening presentation, which will be followed by a general discussion. Do you wish to circulate your paper today?

Mr Kennedy: We will consider that suggestion.

Mrs Long: May I have some clarification? In previous meetings of the Committee, each party gave its presentation in alphabetical rather than a particular party that had expressed an interest go first. You have identified the DUP as having expressed an interest, but members may feel that they have to respond to the DUP’s presentation rather than give their party presentation, followed by a discussion. Are we still simply giving our presentations, albeit in a different format and order?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We have used both mechanisms. If we go around each party, sometimes parties feel compelled to make a submission. However, if we start with the party that raised the issue, we can short-circuit the process and proceed to a discussion.

Mr Nesbitt: I agree with Naomi. This is my second week of attending the Committee, and there appears to be some volatility in relation to procedure. If there is a lack of clarity, and procedure is inconsistent, we do not know where we are. Each party should give a two- or three-minute introduction, followed by a substantive discussion. I have a fairly lengthy presentation that I wish to give. I agree with the way in which the other Chairman operated last week, when each party made an introductory presentation. You have said that the DUP will be the first party to make a presentation because it has expressed a particular interest in the issue. From a unionist perspective, having an interest in equality is not the sole preserve of the DUP. I support Naomi's view that we stick to procedure.

Mr Paisley Jnr: If Dermot is itching to go, he can go first.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I did not express a preference for any party.

Mr Nesbitt: Chairman, there were certain implications in what you said.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): They were not intentional.

Mr Poots: We are happy to go with the normal protocol. Mr Nesbitt said that he wanted to know where he was, and that this is his second week at the Committee — it is actually his third. I do not want to confuse him any further.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We do not need to get into the nitty-gritty.

Mr Nesbitt: This is the second week of considering issues that were agreed at the first meeting, at which I was not present for the full time. I am normally in control of what I say.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Let us begin with the Alliance Party.

Mr McCarthy: I am itching to start.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Good. You have five minutes.

Mr McCarthy: First, there are differences between equality matters, a shared future and good relations. Equality and shared future are fundamentally different concepts. Equality is about ensuring fair treatment, access and opportunity for all people, while community relations — or “Good relations” or “Shared future” — are about the quality and nature of the relationship between people, notably in a divided society. There is also, however, a clear relationship between the concepts. The Alliance Party argues that a cohesive and integrated society provides a better environment for promoting equality, and that equality is crucial to building good relations.

In no sense should a lack of sufficient progress on either equality or a shared future be portrayed or regarded as a barrier to making progress on the other. It is possible to progress equality issues in the context of a divided society, through the provision of separate goods, facilities and services. To date, in many respects, that has been the practice in Northern Ireland. A critical mass of people have now realised that “separate but equal” is not sustainable. Equally, it is possible to promote integration in society, even in the absence of sufficient equality. Arguably, that is the case in the USA.

On equality, the Alliance Party is committed to protecting the rights and ensuring the opportunities of every individual. Equality is essential in order to give everyone a stake in society. For the Alliance Party, that means equality of opportunity; equality of access; equality of treatment; equality under the law; and equal citizenship. It is not about forcing an equality of outcome, but if that can occur through recognition of the former, it is welcome.

Those principles govern the Alliance Party's approach to equality, which is: the individual is the foundation stone of society; all individuals are of equal worth and should be treated as equal citizens; individuals are also members of religious, ethnic, cultural and regional communities; those identities are open and fluid — people can hold a range of identities and loyalties to different structures and levels of Government; citizens have different needs, and equal treatment requires that full account be taken of those differences; and when equality ignores difference, uniformity of treatment leads to injustice and inequality.

For society to be cohesive, as well as respectful of diversity, it must nurture diversity, while fostering a common sense of belonging and shared identity among its members. The Alliance Party does not believe that there should be a hierarchy in equality. Equality issues in Northern Ireland are overly associated with issues relating to religion and/or political identity. Discrimination or other inequalities on the grounds of gender, race, disability and sexual orientation should be of equal concern. Opportunity, a sense of belonging, and fair treatment do not exist evenly and consistently across society. Some individuals are more marginalised than others, due to historical inequalities, discrimination, geography or other obstacles to participation. As a result, it may not be sufficient to apply good public policy generally and hope that all sections of the community will benefit appropriately. The use of neutral policies does not necessarily produce neutral actions or outcomes.

10.45 am

There is, therefore, a case for positive or affirmative action, but we remain opposed to positive discrimination or the use of quotas. We support the targeting of resources towards particular disadvantaged and under-represented sections of the community and certain localities. That is the essence of targeting social need. It is important that vacancies be filled and resources distributed on the basis of the merits of applications. Alliance opposes, however, the use of quotas to fill vacancies or allocate resources, as that inevitably leads to individual cases of greater merit being passed over in order to address the need of someone identified with a disadvantaged group.

With respect to how equality is handled in relation to religion and identity, Alliance is concerned that the overemphasis on groups further institutionalises divisions. Alliance believes in treating all persons as equal citizens but is opposed to institutionalising a false parity of esteem between groups. Furthermore, the assumption of a majority/minority problem is not only simplistic in that it ignores existing diversity, but in that it assumes that discrimination is unidirectional.

The Alliance Party has been a long-standing advocate of fair employment legislation and monitoring in order to ensure equality of opportunities and non-discrimination in the workplace. Fair employment legislation has been very successful in removing discrimination from employment in Northern Ireland and in moving towards a workforce that is more representative of the entire community.

That legislation has been generally successful in creating integrated workforces. The employment sphere is now one of the most integrated aspects of Northern Irish society. That stands in stark contrast to matters such as housing. However, workplace integration has been from the top down — something imposed through regulation rather than having developed organically.

Alliance recognises and understands the need for monitoring of workforces. However, we have concerns about the methodology used to categorise people in pursuit of those objectives. Alliance looks forward to the creation of a single equality Act that would standardise and harmonise upwards the equality protection on all existing grounds.

Finally, all outstanding equality issues can be addressed through public policy; therefore, the Committee has no need to address equality as a barrier to the restoration of devolution. That concludes our submission on equality. We have a further paper on a shared future.

Mr Campbell: For us, this issue is central and goes to the core. It could decide whether progress is made over the next five or 10 years or regress sets in. In the DUP's view, part of the problem in Northern Ireland has been that equality is a concept that is quite often measured in terms of the past, and because of that we have opposed much of what the Equality Commission has done. We will reserve our opinion until we see how the new Chief Commissioner, the new commissioners and the newly reinstated commissioners perform in practice.

At the moment, the Equality Commission appears to analyse equality in terms of the Northern Ireland of 30 or 40 years ago. Unfortunately, that concept appears to permeate much of society. Our view is that, in devising policies for a shared future, we must look to the twenty-first century and what is likely to happen over the next generation.

A number of facets have to be addressed. One that goes to the core of the community that we represent is the blatantly discriminatory approach that the Equality Commission and the Government have taken to police recruitment. A discriminatory recruitment policy says to the community against whom it discriminates that it is less valued and less respected. It says that, because of denominational background, irrespective of qualifications, members of that community are not welcome to join our Police Service. That is what our society has done. The Equality Commission — a misnomer if ever there was one — should not endorse discrimination, yet that is what it has done. We must try to move away from that. That is why our view of the Equality Commission is as it is, on the basis not just of police recruitment but of much of its work.

We support the concept of dealing with equality issues — whether they be gender, disability, age or religion — in a holistic way. That is a good way in which to make progress, not least from the perspective of reducing the amount of bureaucracy. It has to be said, whether people like it or not, that most of the other issues, such as age, disability and gender, tend to be more individualistic approaches, whereas the religious issue tends to attract a communal approach. The religious breakdown of the community presents the issue of “Shared future” with a huge problem.

That is why we have made a major case consistently and repeatedly, year on year, to the Equality Commission and its predecessors, on, for example, the public sector. The public sector is the largest employer in Northern Ireland. The under-representation of people from the Catholic community applying to the police is less than that for people from the Protestant community applying to the Housing Executive, yet there is a fifty-fifty recruitment requirement placed on one but not the other. Our view is that a fifty-fifty recruitment requirement should be placed on neither, nor on any other body. We agree with the Alliance Party in that respect. We do not believe that quotas are the answer. The merit principle should be applied. Whether it is a Housing Executive applicant or a police applicant, a Civil Service applicant or a private-sector applicant, everyone should be treated on merit. That is a huge issue that will increasingly be central to our concern.

The other, wider issue in looking at a shared future is the criminal and paramilitary activity that prevents better relations evolving among the two main communities and other communities in Northern Ireland. If paramilitary groups control areas, and if political parties recommend to communities that they should not give information to the police when a young female is raped in their community, that is an appalling indictment of those passing for politicians who go down that route. That in itself creates further division and diminishes any hope of good relationships being built for the future.

Mrs O’Rawe: Paragraph 3 on page 16 of the Good Friday Agreement sets out the nature of the statutory equality obligations on public authorities in the North:

“to carry out all their functions with due regard to the need to promote equality of opportunity” across nine grounds, and:

“to draw up statutory schemes showing how they would implement this obligation.”

Paragraph 6 on page 17 refers to the establishment of:

“a new statutory Equality Commission to ... advise on, validate and monitor the statutory obligation and ... investigate complaints of default.”

Paragraph 7 leaves the choice of whether to establish a dedicated Department of equality up to the Assembly.

The statutory equality duty under section 75 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 has not been embraced or used in a consistent way by most public bodies, resulting in failed opportunities to mainstream properly the duty to the degree to which it could have been used to advance equality of opportunity and outcome.

It has, therefore, become a cosmetic, tick-box exercise that many public bodies consider a burden rather than a duty to adhere to a maximum sway. The Equality Commission has the power to investigate public bodies where a potential breach has occurred in equality schemes. However, that power has rarely been used.

Likewise, the commission has supported few investigations brought by directly affected parties. On the rare occasion that the commission initiates an investigation and finds a public body to be in breach of its equality scheme, it has limited powers to compel the public body to comply. It can only refer the matter to the British Secretary of State.

Sinn Féin believes that the Equality Commission must use its powers of investigation and enforcement to greater effect. Therefore, consideration must be given to amending the Northern Ireland Act 1998 in order to provide the commission with the power to compel public bodies to comply. That would give the commission more teeth.

Sinn Féin wants to see further designations of public bodies such as the BBC, the DPP, the Treasury, the Ministry of Defence (MOD) and the British Secretary of State. The British Government must establish an independent recruitment and selection panel when making appointments to the Equality Commission. The commission should be representative and balanced in its composition.

The commission must be resourced in order to provide legal assistance, where appropriate, in discrimination cases. Alternatively, legal aid should be provided in such cases.

I want to raise some points under the sub-headings “Good relations” and “Shared future” later in the meeting. Thank you, Chairman.

Ms Lewsley: I want to raise three points about equality. The first is the issue of need. The agreement makes it clear that need must be targeted objectively. If real need is targeted, all communities — whether they are Catholic, Protestant, unionist, nationalist or from any other background — will be enhanced. Perceived need can also be dealt with. There is underachievement in educational attainment in Protestant communities. The SDLP believes that, by tackling need, that issue will be addressed. However, the proportion of Catholics who leave school with no qualifications is higher overall and is, of course, a fast track to unemployment. It is important that that problem is also tackled.

Secondly, there can be no regression in equality laws; those laws are a given. The SDLP will consider the opportunities to enhance the laws. However, it will not support any dilution of them.

An integrated equality agenda is needed. That should be brought about through a single equality Bill that harmonises our laws upwards as far as is practicable. During the lifetime of the previous Assembly, its two junior Ministers had hoped to take Northern Ireland into the lead with the single equality Bill. Unfortunately, because of EU regulations on age and sexual orientation, the Assembly decided to defer the Bill. I hope that it can be moved on.

Equality of opportunity can be created through the realisation of the promise of section 75. In order to do that, the standard of equality impact assessments must be improved. Often, they lack statistics and rigour; they should focus more on key policies. A strategy for the implementation of section 75 would help.

Thirdly, the commitment to eradicate unemployment differentials referred to in the agreement must be realised. The unemployment differential in 1971 was 2·5; it has now been brought down to 1·8. I want any differential to be eradicated. Likewise, there are differentials in economic inactivity. There are many high-unemployment black spots. A process to deal with those problems must be introduced. The Government must also take responsibility centrally to ensure that differentials in housing allocation are dealt with.

Progress has been made. However, there is more to do. Equality of opportunity is not only a right in principle but will help to build a more harmonious and cohesive community.

Mr Nesbitt: As Danny mentioned, our paper will be circulated before any substantive discussions. I want to make a few introductory comments.

I agree entirely with Kieran in the sense that equality is viewed primarily as a religious domain. It is much more pervasive than that. It also covers race, gender, and so on.

11.00 am

Having said that, however, I want to make the point that a religious dimension has permeated relationships in Northern Ireland. One side of the community feels that it has been, and still is, unfairly treated — if not discriminated against — in the jobs market, as Michael Ferguson's comments evidenced last week. I have no doubt that Michael Ferguson holds his views sincerely, but they were a reflection of Sinn Féin comments that are often repeated. Sinn Féin wants that issue to be dealt with, and I will come to how it could be addressed in a moment.

Equally, unionism has concerns, which Gregory has mentioned and with which I agree. Two key employment concerns must be addressed, and those tie in with 'A Shared Future: Policy and Strategic Framework for Good Relations in Northern Ireland'.

Last week, I mentioned Darby and Knox, the authors of the consultation paper on 'A Shared Future'. Without resolving what is or is not the labour market's real position, it is difficult to move to a shared future and a society at ease with itself.

Moreover, there has been a "grammar creep". Words such as "neutrality" have crept into the equality debate, although not in a legal sense. That said, the word has been absorbed into the lexicon — people talk about it. I am not the sort of loyalist who rams his loyalty down another person's throat. I am not one to wear flags or badges. I am a citizen of the United Kingdom. I do not have to flaunt my citizenship or be triumphalist. The reality is that we are in the United Kingdom; that is the legal position. It is not a neutral position. The United Kingdom is a legal entity, and respect should be given to that.

Little words are important. I noted that Pat used the phrase "in the North". That may be a euphemism, but it has a political overtone. Whether people recognise that Northern Ireland is or is not a region of the United Kingdom, it is in law.

Those aspects are relevant to notions of equality and parity of esteem. We must subscribe to section 75(1) of the Northern Ireland Act 1998. That is the law. We must:

"have due regard to the need to promote equality of opportunity".

The law is important. The word "need" is included in subsection (1). It does not say that we "have to do it always and every time". The law says "need". Therefore, before we do something, we must establish the "need".

Finally, more often than not, I find that commentary on equality is based more on emotion than on evidence. As adults in the political process, we must use evidence to judge positions on equality. We must determine, by correctly interpreting evidence, who is hard done by or disadvantaged. Emotion must be taken out and evidence used.

Chairman, those are just a few opening comments to start the debate. I will return to the issue shortly.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are there any proposals or any issues that members want to question?

Ms Lewsley: I would like to propose that we agree that need should be targeted objectively.

Mr Nesbitt: I have no problem with those two words — "need" and "objectively".

Mr Paisley Jnr: What about "targeted"?

Mr Nesbitt: And, of course, "targeted".

[Laughter.]

Mr Campbell: I do not have a problem with that, but could we have it explained a little more? It is a nice cliché; it sounds OK, and I am sure that it will read fine in Hansard, but what does it actually mean?

Ms Lewsley: For a long time in Northern Ireland we have addressed need on the basis that if one side gets something, the other side gets it too. I agree that there is an issue with the educational underachievement of young Protestants in working-class areas, but, on the other hand, educational underachievement is also an issue for young Catholic people, who are leaving school with fewer qualifications, or none at all. Those two areas of need must be addressed objectively. It should not simply be the case that because underachievement has been identified in a Protestant area, the Department of Education gives out money across the board. Need must be targeted objectively.

Mr Paisley Jnr: If we agree to equality, does delivery not then become the issue? The concept of targeting need objectively then becomes, as Gregory says, more of a cliché than a mechanism. We should have delivery mechanisms to ensure that equality exists and is delivered.

Mrs O’Rawe: If we are to have equality, we must have strong legislation and enforcement. I have three proposals, which I mentioned earlier. First, the Northern Ireland Act 1998 must be amended to provide the Equality Commission with the power to compel public bodies to comply with their statutory duties. Furthermore, the British Secretary of State and public bodies such as the BBC, the DPP, the Treasury and the Ministry of Defence should be designated under the 1998 Act and subject to those statutory duties. Thirdly, the British Government must establish an independent recruitment and selection panel for making appointments to the Equality Commission, and the commission should be representative and balanced in its composition.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Any comments on those three proposals?

Mr Paisley Jnr: I think that Dermot mentioned offensive —

Mr Nesbitt: Sorry, but could you speak up?

Mr Paisley Jnr: It is not often I am asked to speak up, but I will.

Mr Kennedy: It is not often that a Paisley is asked to speak up. [Laughter.]

Mr Poots: He is not the man his father is.

Mr Nesbitt: It was a genuine request.

Mr Kennedy: Your father would be ashamed of you for talking quietly.

Mr Paisley Jnr: He would be ashamed of you as well. At least I know who my da is.

Mr Campbell: That was a joke.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I am not going to talk about inflammatory language. To move to a point on which I would like some clarification: I assume that references to the DPP should really be references to the Public Prosecution Service, as the DPP no longer exists here.

Mr O’Dowd: We accept the clarification.

Mr Nesbitt: When a phrase is spoken quickly, one often hears words that one empathises with. However, on reading the same phrase in Hansard, one can find that it contains little words with which one does not totally agree. Ms Lewsley was very clear in asking for “need” and “objectivity”. That was all she was asking for. Before I can agree or disagree, I would like to hear precisely what I am being asked to agree to, and it would be good if I could have the written words in front of me as well. That is a serious question; I am not trying to be trite.

Mrs O’Rawe: All public bodies should be designated to comply with section 75. They are spending public money, have a workforce, and are operating outside the framework, so they need to come within the guidelines. It is as simple as that.

Mr Nesbitt: I have a slight difficulty with a blanket designation of “all public bodies”, because “public bodies” is very general, and perhaps some should not be designated. I also have a stronger underlying problem. Sinn Féin said that we need “strong legislation”. Section 75 states that we must:

“have due regard to the need”.

When I hear someone say that something is needed, I say: “For what purpose?” Not a simple process — we must have something. What is the problem that has been identified that needs to be addressed? Has the problem been identified? Patricia Lewsley said “objectivity”, which means evidence. Where is the evidence of the need? If clear evidence of need is objectively established, we implement either primary legislation or statutory instruments. To a blanket “all public bodies” and “we need strong legislation”, I say: “Hold on. Let’s see first of all whether the need has been established.”

Mr O’Dowd: If Dermot wishes to identify public bodies that he believes should not be included in equality legislation, perhaps that is where the debate should start. Any public body that is spending public money and implementing policies that affect the public should surely be affected by equality legislation. To me, that is a basic principle of equality. If any public body is allowed to opt out of equality legislation, surely that is a flaw in itself.

If a body receives money, and that body is making decisions that affect people’s everyday lives, those decisions need to be made on an equitable basis. Equality is a double-edged sword. Equality legislation is there to protect the rights of the unionist community and the nationalist community, the rights of those from a different racial group or of a different sexual orientation, the rights of people with a disability, etc. All those sections of the community need to be protected, so if a public body is spending public money, I do not see any reason — and my party does not see any reason — why it should not be governed by equality legislation.

Mr Poots: We had this discussion last week when we were talking about appointments to the Human Rights Commission. Others shot down my suggestion that a deputy chief commissioner should be appointed. We have bodies that are supposed to be dealing with equality, and, from where we stand, we feel that our point of view is not expressed by any of the commissioners on the Equality Commission. Others could probably say the same.

How can we have an Equality Commission that is not reflective of the views of the people of Northern Ireland? It simply cannot command the support of the people of Northern Ireland if its body of commissioners is not at all reflective of the community.

Mr O'Dowd: Mr Poots makes a fair enough point, and there are concerns around that. Our third proposal of the morning is that the British Government need to establish an independent recruitment and selection panel when making appointments to the Equality Commission, and that the commission should be representative and balanced in its composition. I hope that that covers the concerns that have been raised.

Mr Campbell: There are a number of related but slightly separate issues here. The composition of the Equality Commission and other public bodies sends out a signal. When it is the wrong signal, that creates the wrong context, and it is then difficult to return to some sort of parity. That needs to be rectified, and it has been an ongoing sore. Let us be clear about this, however: if we rectify that sore — if the composition of the Equality Commission is remedied in such a way that 98% of the community says that it is reasonably reflective of the wider community — but the Equality Commission still implements policies that go in the wrong direction, that is not the answer.

Over the past 10 to 15 years, section 75 has not provided safeguards to a section of the community in Northern Ireland. In my opening remarks I referred to the public sector, where the situation has become worse rather than better, in spite of section 75. The intrinsic equality legislation should have made things better, but in some cases it has made the situation worse.

11.15 am

I want to make a proposal that, I hope, can achieve some form of consensus: equality measures must be implemented in a manner that addresses current trends in order to avert future problems. We must try to distance ourselves from what happened 40, 50, 60 or 70 years ago. We must work on what is happening now so that the future will not be worse.

I refer again to the fifty-fifty recruitment policy in the Police Service. If it is harder to recruit Protestants to the Housing Executive than it is to recruit Catholics to the Police Service, why is there a quota system for one organisation but not the other? The DUP argues that there should be no quota system for anyone, anywhere, but that is an intrinsic problem. The policing issue, set beside other sections of the public sector, has not been addressed by section 75. If we simply say that section 75 should be implemented more rigorously, the logical outcome for my delegation and for my party is that in five years' time, the situation will be even worse than it is now — and it is bad enough now. We must address the current problem to try to prevent the situation becoming even worse in the future.

Mr Brolly: We are in danger of sectarianising equality. Equality is an objective concept that includes everybody. It is not about equality for Catholics but not for Protestants, or equality for unionists but not for nationalists. We want an equality mechanism, and we want people who understand, and are passionate about, equality to man that mechanism. We do not represent the Catholic community — we do not have a mandate from the Vatican to do that. We want to talk objectively about equality for everybody. I would be equally annoyed at members of the Protestant community being discriminated against as at members of the Catholic community being discriminated against.

Unfortunately, we cannot ignore history in relation to the policing issue. Séamus Mallon described the membership of the RUC as being 92% Protestant and 100% unionist. I am not terribly happy about fifty-fifty recruitment or interfering with recruitment, but we must find some way of creating, in the not too distant future, a police force that will command everybody's respect. I am not saying that Protestant members of the police force should not be respected, or are not respectable, but in relation to equality, it is the two major communities that are involved. Historically, it is about the disadvantages of Catholics as opposed to Protestants, and it would have been impossible for the situation to have been otherwise since this state was set up to be a Protestant state for a Protestant people.

I agree with Mr Campbell that we are a long way down the line compared to 40 or 50 years ago, when Protestant businesses were entitled to put notices in their windows saying: "Help needed. Catholics need not apply". We have come a long way since those times. The wheel may be turning quite quickly in the other direction, and in the next 10, 15 or 20 years, we may have to deal with more cases of discrimination against the Protestant community than against the Catholic community. In our discussions, we should stick with the objective concept of equality.

Mrs Long: Sometimes when members discuss equality issues, the language used can create a permanency to the divisions in society. For example, there have been several references to the "Catholic community" and the "Protestant community". I am not aware that those are two mutually exclusive communities. Certainly, the community to which I belong includes Protestants, Catholics, and people of many other religions and of none. The notion of a "Catholic community" and a "Protestant community" is bizarre.

Such references are often used as shorthand for some kind of political aspiration that people may hold. The figures show that a significant number of people who are Protestant — around 27% — do not consider themselves to be unionist; a higher percentage of Catholics consider themselves not to be nationalist. People's identities are fluid, and that must be reflected in our discussions.

Issues of discrimination, balance and trying to achieve a reflective workforce are also more complicated than simply considering two identities, Protestant and Catholic, and trying to balance them. A significant number of people do not subscribe to either definition. Those people must also be treated equally when applying for jobs and must not suffer from discrimination, either deliberately or simply by being overlooked in the statistics.

We must also look at what those definitions are taken as shorthand for. As I said, Protestant and Catholic will often be taken as shorthand for unionist and nationalist or loyalist and republican. Fifty-fifty recruitment, for example, has been successful in recruiting more Catholics to the Police Service, but I question how successful it has been in reflecting the balance across the entire community — from loyalism, through unionism, those who choose not to be part of either bloc, and nationalism to republicanism. It has probably not achieved that at all. If we are going to have monitoring, it must be based on something substantive; not on identities imposed on individuals but on identities that people choose for themselves.

There has also been an issue of group rights and protecting sections of the community. We had this discussion last week in relation to human rights and the right of an individual to not be treated as part of a minority group. That is an important right. Therefore, group rights are an anathema as far as the Alliance Party is concerned.

Our view is that, as with human rights, equality is concerned with the treatment of the individual. A workforce can be monitored to ensure that it is representative, but there should not be this process, which unfortunately still exists, of pigeonholing people in order to fit what is really a binary system of monitoring equality.

Mr Campbell said that, even if the Equality Commission were more reflective than he considers it to be at present, it would still not be acceptable if it took the wrong decisions. Who is the arbiter of what are the right and wrong decisions?

Mr Campbell: I do not think that I mentioned decisions. I said that the policies of the Equality Commission are wrong, as well as its composition. By policies, I mean, for example, the policy of fifty-fifty recruitment for the police. The under-representation of Catholic recruits to the police is “less worse” than that of Protestant recruits to the Housing Executive, yet the commission says nothing about the Housing Executive. We want to see the commission's double standards on such policies changed, as well as its composition.

Mr D Bradley: I want to comment on the fifty-fifty recruitment policy in the Police Service. The Patten Report recognised the under-representation of Catholics in the police, for which there were various reasons, not least the targeting by paramilitary groups of Catholics who were members of the police force.

Mr Campbell: Killing them; not just targeting them.

Mr D Bradley: And the murdering of them, yes. The ethos of the police at the time, to which many nationalists felt that they could not subscribe, was also an issue. Indeed, in itself the low representation of Catholics in the police discouraged other Catholics from joining. We all recognise that society needs a police force that has the support of all sections of the community and in which all sections of the community are represented in proportion.

The Patten proposals attempted to address all the aspects of the policing service that were in need of reform, including the under-representation of Catholics in the service, so that all sections of the community could give their support to the police. The fifty-fifty recruitment policy was the key element of the proposals. It was aimed at creating a proportionate representation of all sections of the community. I believe that a key element for the future of any society is that all sections of the community are represented in the police in proportion, and that all sections give their support to the police. That goes to the very heart of the future stability of society, and justifies the fifty-fifty recruitment policy.

The policy has been successful. The application rate for Catholics has been between 35% and 38%, and there have always been enough suitably qualified Catholics to fill the quota. The percentage of Catholics joining has increased from 8.3% to over 20%, and by the year 2010 will have reached 30%. Fifty-fifty recruitment is only a temporary measure to alleviate a particular situation. It is operating successfully, and it will come to an end.

Mrs Long: Only history will be able to judge — if even it can — whether it was fifty-fifty recruitment or the removal of threat that led to the increase in applications from the Catholic section of our population.

Mr Bradley says that all sections are represented. Does he accept the point I made earlier: that republicans, for example, are still under-represented, if represented at all, in the Police Service? Ethnic minorities are collected in with “Protestant and other”, and therefore are discriminated against in the recruitment process.

Mr Paisley Jnr: There is no such thing as “Protestant and other”.

Mrs Long: They are grouped together, so the issue there is that ethnic minorities are not treated in the same way and are not promoted. The policy has addressed only one part of the imbalance in the police. The Alliance Party has been opposed to it from the outset. There remains a question as to whether it has addressed imbalance. Mr Bradley referred to “all” sections of the community; I am not sure that the policy has addressed that at all.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I remind members that the Committee is dealing with policing and justice matters in another format. We do not want to get too deep in discussion about it.

Ms Lewsley: I am a bit confused. You asked for proposals, and we have now discussed three or four separate proposals. I agree with Mr Campbell about addressing current trends. He referred to the problem with recruitment to the Housing Executive; I hope that he would agree that it is not just about under-representation in the workforce of the Housing Executive. It is a much wider question of the whole Civil Service, even the Equality Commission itself. The issue is one of under-representation in the workforce across the board.

As for the Alliance Party’s stance on group rights, I believe that to ignore groups is to ignore the patterns and trends about which Mr Campbell talked, and which can help address some of the inequalities and injustices.

11.30 am

Looking at all of the issues that have been raised, I think that the overarching proposal that I put in the first place would address much of the need objectively. That is what the SDLP wants. Rather than have a divisive climate of lobbying and to seek support for particular communities, we want to develop common ground and an approach based on evidence of need and the implementation of policies across the board.

If we could reach consensus on the basic principle of targeting need objectively, we could address many of the issues that we have talked about around this table.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Perhaps members would address that issue. We have five proposals in front of us now.

Mr Nesbitt: At this stage, I should table my proposal. I welcome Sinn Féin’s talk of speaking objectively about matters. It rightly talks about the danger of sectarianising issues. However, we do monitor the employment patterns of Protestants and Catholics. I also agree with Patricia that it goes much wider than the Housing Executive. We should have a common ground for evidence. I have genuinely tried to approach the issue in that way.

I have a dilemma. Equality is a very important and emotive subject for all of us around this table. More often than not we have tried to address it by way of the megaphone; this is the first time that we have sat around a table discussing it, and that is good. My dilemma is that, in being objective, we cannot at the same time be brief, because we need evidence to consider.

Language can create division, and I will give you an example. Mr Brolly used the phrase:

“a Protestant state for a Protestant people.”

The Prime Minister actually said:

“a Protestant Parliament and a Protestant people.”

Language is important. The context was that his counterpart in Dublin had referred to a Catholic Parliament and a Catholic people. It must all be put in context.

I shall ask the officials to circulate a paper. I do not want members to grimace and grunt, because I am not going to speak to the paper at length. I will go through it quickly and highlight some points. My aim is to put the paper on the table for the parties to note. I am not asking for discussion or agreement. I would welcome a bilateral meeting with any party, subsequent to this meeting, to discuss the content of the paper.

I wish to talk objectively — words that have been used by Sinn Féin. I wish to reach a common understanding of the problem on the basis of evidence, from which we can derive mechanisms to go forward. I will leave the paper with the parties and go through it quickly. I hope that, in noting the paper under the auspices of this meeting, parties will come back to me and seek a bilateral to discuss it.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are members content for the paper to be circulated?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do you wish to talk to the paper now?

Mr Nesbitt: Yes.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I want to make some points.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I shall bring in Mr Paisley now.

Mr Paisley Jnr: First, for the purposes of Hansard, I want to say that my earlier comments were, of course, in jest. I am sure that people will understand that.

People have talked today about institutionalising sectarianism. It is a fact that the current process, since the Belfast Agreement, has certainly institutionalised and copper-fastened sectarianism in a number of the issues on which we have already touched.

We have an institution here that relies on sectarianism. For example, we have to have a First Minister and a Deputy First Minister who must be drawn from particular communities, which, of course, is short for saying that we must have a Protestant and a Catholic in office. Whether we like it or not, that is what the legislation allows for.

The Assembly relies on cross-community votes — so many Catholics and so many Prods must vote for something in order for it to be agreed. Even the process of appointments in the Assembly relies on sectarianism. If we are really going to drill down into the issue of equality, some people may have some real soul-searching to do. Our form of Assembly, our form of government, and our institutions and the legislation governing them really should be changed if we are to move away from the institutionalisation of a sectarian regime.

There has been some comment about public appointments. Gregory Campbell made a proposal about how we should deal with public appointments. It is important to put on record that the current process of many public appointments deliberately discriminates against the unionist community. Mr Poots mentioned the Equality Commission — we would be hard-pressed to identify anyone on that body who could truly be described as representing the community from which I come. The Human Rights Commission has a number of unionist members of various types, but, again, its overall balance could not be described as reflecting the unionist community.

Take other public appointments such as the Police Ombudsman. I remember when that legislation was going through Westminster. The Hayes Report proposed that a senior or retired High Court judge with a significant level of experience could be regarded as neutral enough to be in charge of Police Ombudsman work. The appointment went to someone who, irrespective of her ability, is the wife of a prominent member of a political party. That does not augur well for people's confidence in independent, impartial, equal and fair appointments. It has been said before, but I cannot imagine a situation in which there would not be a hue and cry if the Police Ombudsman happened to be the wife of a DUP member. I think that people would be going mad about that.

We have the reverse of that situation when unionists are appointed to bodies. People from the republican community are inspired by Sinn Féin to oppose those appointments. If orangemen are appointed to bodies, they are opposed because they are orangemen. If, for example, a victim of an IRA atrocity is appointed to a body — think of the interim Commissioner for Victims and Survivors of the Troubles — Sinn Féin opposes that too. There has to be some balance in equality when it comes to public appointments.

Quite a lot has been said about police appointments and the issue of equality. We should identify the fact that the discrimination clauses in the Police (Northern Ireland) Act 2000 — they are not fifty-fifty clauses, they are discrimination clauses; that is what they are called in the legislation — cause long-term damage to both sections of the community. For example, they cause significant upset to people who get into the merit pool, know that they are qualified and know that their scores put them higher up their section of the merit pool, but who do not get appointed because of their religion. I know of over 1,000 Protestants who have been turned down for employment in the Police Service of Northern Ireland (PSNI) only because they are Protestant, yet they were higher up the merit pool than others who were appointed. I know of 230 Roman Catholics who are in the same position.

Therefore the discrimination clauses cause significant, deep-seated resentment in the community and in those people who want to be police officers. They do not want to be Catholic or Protestant police officers; they want to be police officers, and it causes resentment and affects the morale of the Police Service.

If a person gets into the PSNI as a result of fifty-fifty recruitment — I will use that misnomer for the example — there is a chance that his or her promotion could also be decided on that basis. There is now an expectation that an officer's promotion prospects in the Police Service should reflect the community's demographics, or be based on what church the officer attends on Sunday, rather than on his or her skill, ability or length of service. That would be disastrous, and we must pull back from a policy that is affecting morale and that has a long-term and deep-seated effect on police officers.

Police officers in California were in a similar situation when equality legislation stipulated racial equality of appointments to the police force there. Both black officers and white officers will say that the long-term effect of any sort of discrimination is resented within the service; therefore we should move away from that.

People may claim that 50:50 recruitment is a principle, but it is not. If it were, it would have to be applied to every appointment in the organisation. However, parties here that claim that it is a principle voted for the Police (Northern Ireland) Act 2000, which allowed for the recruitment of 1,000 part-time reservists on the merit principle alone. If fifty-fifty recruitment is not a principle for appointing part-time reservists, why is it a principle for appointing regular officers? That must be addressed, because under the current legislation all future part-time reservists could end up being drawn from one section of the community because its applicants were better qualified. Alternatively, recruits could end up being drawn from a mixed section of the community, which would more than likely be the case. However, they will be recruited on one basis — merit — and there will be no question about their appointment because of that.

There is also a significant depletion of detective ranks in Northern Ireland, but the principle is not that all detectives should be recruited on the basis of their religion. They will be recruited on merit. On that basis, all the parties on the Policing Board — even those that claim that fifty-fifty recruitment is a principle — voted to ensure that the lateral entry of detectives from England, Scotland and Wales into the PSNI should be on merit. They agreed that those appointments should not be influenced by religion or identity. Therefore the fifty-fifty recruitment principle appears to be flexible: one that must be observed for the big stage, but not for other important appointments. One should recognise that it is not a principle; rather it is something that is causing significant damage.

Reference has been made to the past and the part played by the Royal Ulster Constabulary George Cross (RUC GC). Significant numbers of people from the Roman Catholic community have played a large part in the PSNI and in the Royal Ulster Constabulary. The father of the current leader of the SDLP — a Roman Catholic — played a significant role in the Police Service, and did not mind that it was the RUC. In the past, there has been a Roman Catholic Chief Constable of the RUC, and that is often brushed over. Many officers from different sections of the community have played a significant role in the RUC. The hurt around the RUC is a straw man that is used for political purposes, and it has done much to damage community relations in Northern Ireland.

I remember watching the SDLP conference — I think that it was last year's — and an invited guest called for fifty-fifty recruitment to be scrapped. I doubt whether the SDLP would have given a person a platform to go against its policy.

Nonetheless, I do not believe that the people who declared fifty-fifty recruitment to be the great totem think that the underlying principle is to protect a certain community; it exists for political reasons. The issue affects the mindset of Protestants, who feel that their noses are being rubbed in it. That should not be so. Nationalists should recognise that fact and start to disengage themselves from the notion that they need fifty-fifty recruitment.

11.45 am

It is important to clarify that fifty-fifty recruitment does not mean 50% Protestant and 50% Roman Catholic appointments. In the Police (Northern Ireland) Act 2000, the sections that deal with discrimination allow, and guarantee, that 50% of regular officer appointments be given to Roman Catholics. The 2000 Act gives no such guarantee to any other section of the community; it simply states that the appointments are for others. Therefore, the Protestant community feels doubly outdone on that issue.

Sinn Féin has stated today that it does not speak on behalf the Roman Catholic community and does not wish to discriminate. Its members wish to discuss equality. Certainly, when the IRA bombed factories, it did not discriminate against workers. IRA activity did not discriminate — it injured everyone in Northern Ireland. Sinn Féin's talk about equality is simply talk. It is important to put that on the record.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We must move on because several members wish to speak — John O'Dowd, Naomi Long and Derek Hussey.

Mr Nesbitt: I thought that I was about to start.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I thought that Dermot was going to go next. I am just the warm-up act.

Mr O'Dowd: I had indicated before the paper was distributed —

Mr Nesbitt: I thought that I had said that I would make my presentation next, Mr Chairman. You said that Ian could make his presentation while the paper was being distributed. The paper has now been distributed.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Go ahead.

Mr Nesbitt: I am simply following procedure.

Ian said that we should drill down into the issue of equality, which was a good introduction. I shall be very brief. I will leave the paper with members, because it will be easier to comment if they have the paper in front of them. I will speak to the paper, and it would be helpful if members could follow the pages as I refer to them.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Mr Nesbitt indicated earlier that he intended to make a proposal. Will he make the proposal before he speaks to the paper or afterwards?

Mr Nesbitt: I am not asking for agreement on the paper, but I will make the proposal, which contains nothing sinister, later.

Page 3 of the paper states that we must demonstrate the effectiveness of the equality policy. It is also stated that, no later than February 2006, the British-Irish Intergovernmental Conference was discussing the unemployment differential.

On page 4, a table is reproduced from David J Smith and Gerald Chambers's 'Inequality in Northern Ireland (Oxford 1991)', which states that 27% of Catholics and 21% of Protestants viewed discrimination/rights as one of the causes of the troubles. That is a clear identification that it is perceived that discrimination/rights was one of the causes of the problems.

On page 5 there are quotations from: a Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights (SACHR) report, 'Religious and Political Discrimination and Equality of Opportunity in Northern Ireland: Report on Fair Employment (October 1987)'; a Government White Paper, published in March 1998; a Northern Ireland Affairs Committee Special Report, 'The Operation of the Fair Employment (Northern Ireland) Act 1989: Ten Years On'; and the 'Report of the Taskforce on Employability and Long-Term Unemployment', published in December 2002. All those quotations point up equality of opportunity and how that will improve community relations.

I want to highlight a quotation on page 6, to which I referred last week. In John Darby and Colin Knox's 'A Shared Future (Consultation Responses)', it is stated:

"there cannot be good relations until there is equality of opportunity".

"Good relations" deals with a shared future.

I want to mention a few political quotations. On page 6, a quote from Caitríona Ruane states that discrimination is "rife" and that Catholics are twice as likely to be unemployed as Protestants. A quotation from Gregory Campbell states:

"22,000 more Roman Catholics and 5,000 fewer Protestants in work ... discrimination against our people has to stop."

Those are genuine views held by both those people. The two sides of the community say that discrimination exists. We must examine the evidence.

Mr Campbell: Will Mr Nesbitt take a point of information?

Mr Nesbitt: Yes; no problem.

Mr Campbell: That quotation is accurate, but the figures come from the Equality Commission rather than it being my view.

Mr Nesbitt: I do not doubt that. My point is that we are taking data, whether those are unemployment differentials in Sinn Féin's case or employment trends in unionism's case, to point up discrimination claims on both sides. Something must be done. This is a problem that we need help with if we are to solve it.

On page 7 of the paper, the 1987 SACHR report is again cited, recommending targets for the reduction of the unemployment differential. There is another SACHR reference on page 8. This time it is a quotation from a 1997 report:

"Government should publicly adopt realistic targets for the reduction of ... unemployment differentials".

There are two quotations on page 8 that I thought would show up a dichotomy. On the one hand,

UNISON, the public-sector-workers' organisation, said in 1997 that Government policy:

"failed to remove ... unemployment differentials and discrimination".

Against that, as an antithesis, the Queen's Speech of 14 May 1997 said that the Government would:

"combat discrimination in the workplace".

Inez McCormack of UNISON might not view the latter as an antithetical source, but they are different ends of the spectrum. Both quotations flag up the question of discrimination.

What was the Government's response to the comments? On page 9 of my paper, the Government said in the introduction to their response to the 1997 SACHR report that they were going to introduce policies:

"centring on jobs and employment".

They saw that as the problem and planned to:

"put in place a new statutory framework requiring the public sector to promote equality of opportunity", namely the law that Pat O'Rawe referred to earlier, which was section 75 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998.

The Government also said that they were going to recruit directly from the unemployed. They were hoping that that would reduce the unemployment differential, and indeed, that they were going to have:

"benchmark measures for the future reduction of the unemployment differential."

Let us look briefly at some evidence, and then I will leave the paper for members to reflect on. A problem has been identified by a wide range of sources with varied views, and the Government have implemented policies to try to alleviate the perceived problem.

The Northern Ireland Affairs Committee heard evidence in 1999 on that important issue. It also concluded that benchmark measures should be in place. Indeed, its report said that its next review in five years' time would consider any deviation between the benchmarks established and the available data. However, the Committee has never looked at it again. The benchmark measures for the unemployment differential have never been established, despite a commitment to do just that.

On page 11 of the paper, a Northern Ireland Statistics and Research Agency (NISRA) briefing note is quoted. NISRA raised much wider issues than discrimination, talking of:

"personal characteristics such as age, marital status, number of children, family experience of unemployment, housing tenure and educational qualifications".

In other words, it identifies the background that can influence whether a person gets a job. The briefing note concluded that there were no specific actions that Government could take to address the unemployment differential, and that it was:

“not actually a valid measure of ... discrimination in employment”.

The Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister (OFMDFM) had research conducted by Tony Dignan. On page 13 of his research he concurred with NISRA's view on the impact of Government policy on the unemployment differential measured as a ratio.

On page 14 of the paper, I reference the 2004 book, 'Fair Employment in Northern Ireland: A Generation On'. It was sponsored by the Equality Commission and was written by a wide-ranging group of academics, which the Equality Commission described as a “distinguished panel”. An important element of its remit was social mobility. That dimension led to what was described as:

“perhaps one of the most significant conclusions for this book as a whole”.

That is the authors of the book talking; it is not unionism or nationalism.

Social mobility means how well one can move through the social classes. On page 14, under 'Social Mobility', there is a quotation from 'Fair Employment in Northern Ireland: A Generation On'. It reads:

“Much of the claims of discrimination being voiced by the Northern Ireland Civil Rights Association could be seen as claims of adverse social mobility”; in other words, people cannot move up through the classes.

Mr O'Dowd: Does the fact that one cannot move upward not prove discrimination?

Mr Nesbitt: No. The book is saying —

Mr O'Dowd: Dermot is saying that those who were being discriminated against were unable to move upward because they were socially dysfunctional, or whatever. What is he trying to say?

Mr Nesbitt: All I am doing is establishing a measure of objectivity as to whether there is discrimination. The book was saying that if one cannot move up the social ladder, one is probably being discriminated against.

Mr O'Dowd: That proves discrimination.

Mr Nesbitt: No. If one cannot move up the social ladder, that proves discrimination.

Mr O'Dowd: Then the question is why one cannot move up the ladder.

Mr Nesbitt: We have to see whether or not one can move up socially. That is the point that I am making. I am establishing the measurement criterion.

The answer is given in the diagram on page 15 of my paper. Without going into detail, present occupation is determined more by first job and educational qualifications than by anything else. A first job is determined by years of education, by qualifications and, to a much lesser extent, by age. Age has a value of 0.089 as opposed to 0.390 for years of education and 0.219 for educational qualifications.

Religion can be tracked on the diagram by moving left from first job to years of education. The number of years of education available is determined by the father's occupation, which can depend on his education, which, in turn, depended on his religion. I am not saying that religion is not a factor.

Mr Poots: Thank you for explaining that, Dermot.

Mr Paisley Jnr: It is a two-generational thing as well?

Mr Nesbitt: It is at least two-generational.

The book concluded:

“religion ceased in the 1990s to have a direct independent effect upon an individual's social position.”

The significance of that conclusion was that it was based on data collected in 1996 and 1997, at a time when SACHR, the Government, the Queen in her speech and others, were committing themselves to combating discrimination. The evidence shows that social mobility, as a measure of the presence of discrimination, is not directly linked to religion. There is, perhaps, an indirect link, back down the generations, but whether a person gets a job and moves up the social ladder is not now affected by religion. The evidence shows that.

I shall not look at the worked examples; they are there for members to examine in detail on pages 16 to 19. However, at the bottom of page 20, there is an important point, which highlights the problem between Gregory on my side of the House and Sinn Féin's side of the House.

I am not going to look at pages 22-24 in detail. They simply show, from an evidential point of view, that if the proportion of Catholics who are unemployed is twice the proportion of Protestants who are unemployed, it does not mean that Catholics are twice as likely to be unemployed as Protestants. The absolute number of people who are unemployed does not have a bearing on likelihood of being unemployed. The likelihood of a person getting or not getting a job depends on the person who applies and whether he or she is appointed. It is probability analysis.

12.00 noon

At the bottom of page 24 I have the heading "Poverty and Disadvantage". The latest Government report shows that poverty and disadvantage are manifested in large measure by being unemployed. Unemployment is one of the single most important measures of disadvantage; my party accepts that. We accept that there is more disadvantage where there is a greater proportion of unemployment. The question is whether it is discrimination and how to deal with it, which is a different matter.

I am not saying that there is unfair discrimination. I am only pointing out what the data says. Look at pages 25 and 26. Do not go into the data, but if you read it you can follow it. Go straight through to page 28 — there are only 30 pages.

Mr Campbell: There are 31 pages in my copy.

Mr Nesbitt: Yes, well, OK.

Mr O'Dowd: That is not the only inaccuracy in it.

Mr Nesbitt: The first page is just the title.

I will leave you with the table on page 28. Logically, if 40% of applicants are from one denomination you would probably expect 40% of the appointments to be from that denomination — if there is equality of opportunity, and if they have equal education and equal experience, you would expect the grouping selected to be reflective of the grouping who apply. In the case of appointments to the public sector, in six of the last eight years the proportion of Catholics appointed has been statistically significant in comparison with the proportion who have applied. It is out of kilter. I am not saying that Protestants are being discriminated against. The evidence cannot point that up. All that the evidence can point to, on a basic statistical analysis, is that in six of the last eight years more Catholics have been appointed than the proportion of applicants would suggest should have been appointed. That is a question to be addressed. That is the minimum that we can say about it: the question needs to be addressed.

Before I come to the conclusion, a little anecdote. As I say at the bottom of page 29, it was pointed out in the DTZ report that members of the Church of Ireland have a greater unemployment differential than Presbyterians. Also, look at the statistics for Monaghan, where there is an unemployment differential against Catholics of 3·1. In Cavan it is 2·7. Are we saying that Catholics are discriminated against in the South compared to Protestants? Dare I ask, as a member of the Church of Ireland: are Church of Ireland members being discriminated against as compared with Presbyterians? That is what the data might say. Never mind Free Presbyterians; we will leave them for the moment.

Mr Poots: Presbyterians have a stronger work ethos than members of the Church of Ireland.

Mr Paisley Jnr: To compare page 31 and page 14, are you actually saying that —

Mr Nesbitt: Can I finish this, and then come to questions?

Mr Paisley Jnr: I want you to address this in your conclusion.

Are you saying that Government policies are better addressed if they target need and tackle disadvantage, rather than relying on general equality legislation to tackle disadvantage and need?

Mr Nesbitt: I am saying that TSN and New TSN target need objectively — that is what they are meant to do. Need is where there is disadvantage and unemployment, and therefore the policy might be to recruit from among the unemployed. I am saying that that policy did not affect the unemployment differential as people thought it would. People are still seeing the unemployment differential. While someone said earlier that it was down to 1·8 from 2·4, it had actually been down to 1·6 earlier. It oscillates. It is there: it is a structural dimension that needs to be addressed. We should not confuse disadvantage with discrimination.

Let me move to my conclusion. The process of accurate, clear and simple representation by Government is essential. There are issues around this table, and members will disagree with what I have said. You hold your views with clarity and I do not disrespect your views, but Government needs to make an assessment of this. We cannot do it.

As the Government have the resources, the wherewithal and the data, the Committee should tell them to explain this matter in clear and simple terms so that the Ulsterman or Ulsterwoman in the street can understand it. For example, is the unemployment differential caused by discrimination or not? Does the unemployment differential show equality of opportunity or not? I have listed the questions. Government should also initiate, as a matter of urgency, the appointments procedure.

The Ulster Unionist Party strongly supports fairness for all. It is realised that equality is a sensitive issue and disadvantage must be addressed by Government and by others who have such responsibility. I do not deny that.

The challenge to Government is to fully address the issues of equality that are of concern to the people in Northern Ireland. Until then, it will be difficult to turn away from past perceptions and look to a different future — a future beneficial to both Catholics and Protestants.

I ask members to note that. I do not ask them to return to this issue next week unless they wish to do so, but I have no problems with answering any questions that may arise. However, I would prefer to have bilateral discussions with parties on this. Given that there have been disagreements, the Committee should ask the Government to tell us where we stand on equality issues — they have the responsibility, the authority and the knowledge to do so.

Mr O'Dowd: Sinn Féin will take up Mr Nesbitt's offer to have a bilateral discussion on the Ulster Unionist Party's document. Certain parts of the document brought to mind the Flat Earth Society's very good website, which can convince a person that the earth is flat, if they wish to be so convinced. However, other evidence shows that the earth is not flat, and I am inclined to believe that. Mr Nesbitt can produce as many statistics and documents as he wishes, but if they ignore the reality of our lives, it is a pointless exercise.

Mr Nesbitt: I would like it noted that I mentioned community differentials, which include healthcare and so forth, as distinct from the unemployment differential. I have never denied that there is disadvantage in this community. However, I do question whether that disadvantage arises from discrimination. There is a distinct difference between disadvantage that must be addressed by Government and unlawful discrimination, which section 75 prohibits. If Mr O'Dowd disagrees with me — flat-earthers versus round-earthers, in a sense — perhaps this is something for the Government.

Mr O'Dowd: I will come to that point.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Three members have yet to speak, and five proposals are to be put to the Committee. We need to move quickly if we are to get this matter half sewn-up by lunchtime.

Mr O'Dowd: My comments will be very brief. We gave Mr Nesbitt a long time to go through his document. Discrimination causes disadvantage, and it has done so over the years.

Mr Nesbitt suggested that this Committee should ask the Government; the parties around this table should be the Government. We should not be running, cap in hand, to ask a party that has no votes here, and that does not understand the thinking of this place, to solve our problems. We are all more than capable of solving our own problems, including discrimination and equality issues. We can do it on our own; we do not have to ask Peter Hain or whoever else is sent to this place next time around.

Unionism has built a state on the belief that equality and civil rights are not needed, and that there is no discrimination. The communities that the unionist parties represent now believe that they are being discriminated against, but the mindset that they have been given is such that they believe that there is no mechanism to remedy that discrimination. On the other hand, all the other parties spent decades campaigning for such mechanisms to be put in place, and Sinn Féin still believes that those mechanisms should be strengthened.

If there is discrimination in the Housing Executive — and I would like to see the figures to which the DUP refers — it is wrong. The DUP must ensure that mechanisms are put in place to protect the rights of the individual and of the community being discriminated against. If applicants for jobs in the Housing Executive have been discriminated against because they are Protestants, they should have access to the Equality Commission. That body should be properly funded so that cases can be progressed. If discrimination is proven, the Equality Commission should have the power to ensure that it does not happen again. That is Sinn Féin's argument.

Mrs Long: I want to address some of Mr O'Dowd's comments. I accept the truth of what he says, but it is a half-truth: discrimination can cause disadvantage, but not all disadvantage comes from discrimination. There is a difference there. If Mr O'Dowd believes that disadvantage in the Catholic community results solely from unionist discrimination, how does he explain disadvantage in the unionist community?

Mr O'Dowd: I did not say that.

Mrs Long: You said that discrimination caused disadvantage, but that is only part of the picture. There is a bigger picture.

Last week, we discussed at length the issue of public appointments, specifically in relation to the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission. We discussed how people viewed those appointments, whether they were broadly representative of the community, and what exactly that meant. We discussed the fact that unionists panned the previous Human Rights Commission as being too nationalist because its Protestant members were not perceived as being unionist enough. Nationalists also panned the commission because they felt that there were too many Protestant members, even though unionists did not accept that those members were unionists. There is a whole complexity there that we need to look at. We have talked about public appointments being broadly reflective of our communities, but we have not reached a consensus as to what that means.

I want to reiterate the Alliance Party's position: appointments and offers of employment should be based on merit. Merit should be the primary driver. That leads on to Ms Lewsley's proposal. If we are going to appoint on merit, then unless the issues of disadvantage and need are addressed, there will be imbalance in the workforce because one section of the community will be better educated, better qualified and better prepared. If the issues of disadvantage and need are addressed, based on objective criteria, people can approach the employment market — whether public appointments or direct employment — on a level playing field. It is at that point that appointments are made on merit.

I also want to talk about differentials. The Ulster Unionist Party made a long presentation that was quite important because we all tend to lift figures that represent a window in time. For example, one could look at the figures from one round of recruitment in a particular organisation to see how many Protestants and Catholics have been offered jobs. If there are too many of one or the other, one might think that there must have been discrimination, but that is not true. There can be a differential at any point in time if people are appointed on merit without any discrimination. You may find that the majority of appointees will be Protestant in one case or Catholic in another. The question is whether there is a trend over a period to suggest that the organisation is skewing the figures deliberately in one direction or another. A differential does not prove discrimination. In order to prove discrimination, it has to be shown that an organisation is actively skewing the figures. We must be very careful. I am not arguing the case for differentials. I am simply saying that trends, not windows, must be examined. Otherwise, you get an unfair picture of what is happening.

The Alliance Party is in favour of affirmative action. It is fine, based on need, to go out and take affirmative action in advance of the recruitment and selection process, but it has to be distinct from that process, not least because it is being done in the context of Catholic and Protestant, unionist and nationalist. Many other members of society need to enter the employment process knowing that their applications will be treated fairly, whether those people are disabled, are of a different gender or have a different sexual orientation. They need to know that their rights are protected, and the only way to do that is to encourage all to apply, to establish what needs to be done to raise people up to a certain standard and then to appoint on the basis of merit. That is how a healthy society ought to function.

Ian Paisley Jnr mentioned fifty-fifty recruitment and the notion of positive discrimination. There is no such thing as positive discrimination — discrimination against one person in favour of somebody else is not a positive thing. It may appear positive to the individual who benefits — although I would question that — but it is certainly not positive to those who are being discriminated against. I am not even sure whether it is a good thing for the people whom the discrimination favours.

I have argued against positive discrimination and quotas that favour women, because people should be appointed on merit, and I am confident that there are women of merit who can be appointed to posts without having to rely on quotas or positive discrimination. That same argument can be applied for any other section of society. The issue of need must be dealt with. Therefore the Alliance Party supports Patricia Lewsley's proposal because it would lead to there being fully merit-based appointments.

12.15 pm

Mr Hussey: I am glad that Francie Brolly mentioned the potential for turnaround. People in my neck of the woods — and I am thinking of an east-west divide rather than a religious divide — must be made aware of that. The Committee has concentrated on labour-market issues and employment issues, and rightly so. It is something about which people feel strongly. However, I hope that, as the debate on equality issues opens up, we shall be discussing more than the labour market. For example, where I live, I have exactly the same access to public transport as my Catholic neighbour does. Therefore there are more issues around equality than simply those in the employment market.

Naomi mentioned consideration of the individual. I hope that we are working towards establishing principles that can create a climate of equality, as opposed to our having to enforce legislation. Equality must be objective, and in order to achieve that, we must look at opportunity, access, needs and merit. We can find a way forward for our society if we adhere to those principles.

Mr Poots: I note what Sinn Féin said about proper funding for the Fair Employment Commission and the Equality Commission. The Fair Employment Commission ceased to exist a number of years ago, so why one would put public money into a body that does not exist is beyond me.

The composition of the RUC was mentioned earlier, yet the Equality Commission could be described as being two thirds Catholic and 100% non-unionist. Although the Equality Commission has acted on behalf of individuals, it has never acted for the entire unionist community in any case in which that community has identified a problem with equality.

As an example of a high-profile case, pressure was put on Shorts to ensure that more Catholics were employed there. However, we have not seen the same pressure being applied to such groups as the Quinn Group. There is a huge chill factor against the unionist community at Queen's University, particularly in its school of law. It is worrying that that is from where our future barristers, solicitors and judges will come. The huge inequality that exists there will feed through to those who operate our judiciary. However, in spite of the fact that those issues have been brought to its attention time and again, the Equality Commission has refused to take any of them on board.

Reference was made to the Housing Executive, for example. Last year, 32% of job applications to the Housing Executive came from the Protestant community; that figure should have been 52%.

Why does such a chill factor exist in the Housing Executive? Why does the Equality Commission do nothing about it? The Equality Commission does nothing because it is not interested in tackling unionist concerns. Whenever unionist politicians raise such issues, they are not dealt with. The unionist community has no confidence whatsoever that the current Equality Commission will carry out its duties impartially.

Another aspect of that lack of confidence is that the Equality Commission appears to deem the national flag as potentially creating a chill factor for the nationalist community. That criterion does not appear to be applied to the Irish language. At least two councils in Northern Ireland erect exclusively Irish language signs in some areas — not dual language signs; exclusively Irish signs. The Equality Commission has made no attempt to move against those councils for doing that.

All the evidence is that the Equality Commission is non-unionist, anti-unionist and will do nothing to address concerns raised by unionists. The unionist community has no confidence whatsoever in the Equality Commission. Unless those issues are addressed — and addressed at commissioner level — that will continue.

Ms Lewsley: The SDLP does not claim that the differential proves ongoing discrimination. However, we are focused on reducing the differentials; the elimination of such differentials is already stated in the Good Friday Agreement.

Differentials can be tackled by wider action on disadvantage, unemployment black spots, and even under-representation in the workforce, whatever that may be. There are also issues of addressing trends and, of course, investment west of the Bann or elsewhere. All the issues that have been raised are encompassed in my proposal about targeting need objectively.

Mr Campbell: I will speak about Patricia's proposal at the end. I shall try to make a composite proposal, although it might be difficult. There are elements that are complementary rather than contradictory.

Dermot kindly quoted me in his document. As I said in my intervention, that quote is from the Equality Commission. It took considerable time, a number of parliamentary questions, and several letters and phone calls to the Equality Commission to establish that figure. If the Equality Commission were performing its function adequately, it should have undertaken that research and published that figure in the public domain to demonstrate the type of problem that the commission currently faces, rather than creating the appearance that the Equality Commission operates on the basis on which its predecessor was established. That is, to try to understand or rationalise why Catholics are more likely to be unemployed than Protestants.

It is a ludicrous, but logical, conclusion that figures show that Protestants are, to some degree, under-represented in relation to the number of jobs that have been available on the job market in recent years. If Catholics got 100% of the jobs, they would still be more likely to be unemployed than Protestants. What is the next logical step for anyone who believes that the unemployment ratio must be fixed — as Dominic said, bringing the ratio down from 2.5 to 1?

Anyone who accepts the premise that the unemployment differential must be eliminated, and that that is the holy grail, is up against the logic that even if, the Catholics get all the jobs available, they are still more likely to be unemployed. What do you do then? There is nowhere to go.

Difficult as it may be, the unemployment differential must be set aside. Both Dermot and I have referred to the fact that Catholics are more likely to be unemployed in parts of the Republic.

Mr Nesbitt: I do not want to get into an argument with Gregory, but the point is that unemployment differential says nothing about the likelihood of being unemployed. Unemployment data does not show that Catholics are more likely to be unemployed.

Mr Campbell: I was speaking statistically. I am in danger of getting a sore head, and I want to avoid that.

There is a perception — and I heard it from Sinn Féin today — that unionist representatives take a particular view now because of the evolution of problems facing the unionist community. The Fair Employment Agency was established in 1976 and released its first report in late 1977. I was on its doorstep within 24 hours of that report being issued, nearly 29 years ago. My party has not been raising those issues because of a latter evolution since the late 1990s or early 2000s; we have been tackling them for over a quarter of a century. Unfortunately, the passage of time is proving that what we have been saying is true.

I do not want to reiterate that; it is a matter of record. I want to move to what will hopefully be an amalgam of proposals. Equality measures must be targeted objectively and have to be implemented to address current trends in order that future problems can be averted.

Ms Lewsley: Can that last bit be repeated? Equality measures must be targeted objectively and have to be —

Mr Murphy: Implemented.

Mr Campbell: They must be implemented to address current trends in order that future problems can be averted.

Mr Nesbitt: I want to add something to try to get a real composite motion, if that is possible. I take John O'Dowd's point that it is for Members to be in Government and to take action.

Ms Lewsley: You said John Dallat; do you not mean John O'Dowd?

Mr Nesbitt: I did not; I said John O'Dowd.

Mr O'Dowd: That is all right; I have been called many things.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): It is getting close to lunchtime.

Mr Nesbitt: I may have inadvertently called you Carmel, Patricia. A few weeks ago, I forgot Arlene's name and did not call her anything and she chided me.

Ms Lewsley: I am sorry.

Mr Kennedy: It was in the papers, I think.

Mr Nesbitt: Was it? [Laughter.]

Although John O'Dowd said that it is for Members, not the Government, to take action, I still think that it will be at least three months before there is an Assembly here. The Government can help by notifying us of their position on this matter. Words to that effect should be added if we are seeking a composite motion. There is nothing to preclude that happening in the next three months.

Although we want equality to be objectively targeted, adverse trends to be addressed and objectively implemented, we also want to know what we are dealing with. Government should be able to bring that forward. I have not found the form of words yet, Chairman, but that should be reflected in the proposal.

Mr O'Dowd: I have a question. The Housing Executive has been batted back and forth across the table today. Gregory made the point that the DUP has been using mechanisms — with which we may not agree — to resolve discrimination. Has the DUP, or anyone else, lodged a complaint with the Equality Commission about the Housing Executive's employment practices?

Mr Poots: We have lodged a complaint about the Equality Commission itself, which has not been taken up.

Mr Campbell: To be fair, I have been working with the Housing Executive on affirmative action measures, and I have met Paddy McIntyre on a number of occasions. The Housing Executive has adopted a number of measures, but they have not worked, which the Housing Executive freely admits. We have lodged numerous complaints.

I do not want to single out the Housing Executive; it has been mentioned several times — indeed, I have done so. The Housing Executive is an example of the problem rather than the exclusive preserve of the problem.

The public sector comprises much more than the Housing Executive. It includes the Child Support Agency (CSA) and the general service grades of the Civil Service. It employs 30,000 people, not just the 3,000 who work for the Housing Executive.

12.30 pm

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Can we try to tie down the wording of the proposal?

Ms Lewsley: May I table an amendment to the proposal?

Mr Nesbitt: It is 12.30 pm; we normally break for lunch at this time. The officials have heard our discussion, so it would be good if, after lunch, they could present members with a nicely phrased composite of all the views that have been heard rather than have members rush to draft something now.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Good idea. How about 15 minutes for lunch?

Mr Nesbitt: Note that I said that the officials should summarise our discussions to help us. I always believe that officials are here to help us.

Mr O'Dowd: The officials are not getting any lunch.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We will reconvene at 12.50 pm.

The Committee was suspended at 12.31 pm.

On resuming —

12.54 pm

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I will put the first proposal.

The Committee Clerk: The proposal is that equality measures need to be implemented to address objective need and current trends to avert future problems; and all interested parties, including Government, should be fully committed to addressing this issue.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Is there consensus on that?

Mr O'Dowd: To clarify, that motion covers a number of areas that we have discussed, but it does not cover Sinn Féin proposals. Is that agreed?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Yes.

The proposal is mainly a mixture of Patricia's and Gregory's proposals.

Is there consensus?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We move now to Pat O'Rawe's proposals.

The Committee Clerk: The first proposal is that the Northern Ireland Act 1998 be amended to give the Equality Commission enforcement powers.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do we have consensus?

Members indicated dissent.

The Committee Clerk: The second proposal is that all public bodies should be designated to comply with section 75.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do we have consensus?

Members indicated dissent.

The Committee Clerk: The third proposal is that the British Government need to establish an independent recruitment and selection panel for the Equality Commission to ensure that the commission is representative and balanced in its composition.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do we have consensus?

Members indicated dissent.

Ms Lewsley: I accept that we are discussing equality, but the issue involves more than the Equality Commission. The composition of the Human Rights Commission, and appointments to it, were mentioned at our previous meeting, as were other bodies.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The proposal deals with the section on equality that we have been discussing.

Mr O'Dowd: I wish to clarify a point, without re-opening the debate: Sinn Féin made those proposals, as it wants to ensure that a strong mechanism exists to enforce equality. That is why the party concentrated on those issues.

Mrs Long: The Alliance Party does not see the need for a separate procedure for either the Equality Commission or the Human Rights Commission. We believe that there should be a standard procedure for public appointments.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We do not have consensus on those proposals.

The next issue is "Good relations". The Alliance Party will begin the debate.

Mr McCarthy: The Alliance Party believes that addressing our deep communal divisions is critical to placing the restored institutions on a durable and sustainable basis. Until very recently, community-relations problems have not been addressed in any serious manner. Community relations was a marginal issue in the Good Friday Agreement. Furthermore, it was, at best, a marginal issue in all the various plans, declarations and agreements that have been devised in attempts to implement the Good Friday Agreement.

Despite — or perhaps because of — the agreement, Northern Ireland remains a deeply divided society. Unfortunately, in many respects, divisions have become even more entrenched. Strong sectarian and racist attitudes remain prevalent, and there is a deeply ingrained pattern of segregation. Often, territory and public space are marked out through the use of exclusive communal symbols. Although separation is generally not the formal policy of the state, there is substantial duplication in the provision of goods, facilities and services by both the public and private sectors.

In the field of education, 95% of Northern Ireland's schoolchildren attend what is, in effect, a segregated school system. More peace walls, which are built to keep people apart, have been erected since the 1994 ceasefires than were ever erected before.

However, there are also many positive trends. Significant elements of civil society are organised on a cross-community basis. The workplace is integrated, largely through top-down regulation. There is evidence of substantial public support for shared education, housing and leisure pursuits, but that aspiration for shared provision is often frustrated, sometimes because of the lack of facilities, but mainly because of fears over security — both physical and cultural.

More and more people are casting off traditional identity labels and challenging the notion that Protestant equals British equals unionist or that Catholic equals Irish equals nationalist. A growing number of new immigrants is coming to Northern Ireland to live and work, and that is an encouraging sign of globalisation in the economy. Their welcome presence poses a challenge to the traditional conceptions of identity. Furthermore, it is increasingly recognised that the economic, financial and personal cost of managing a divided society is unsustainable.

The them-versus-us competition for control over resources and territory is a continued source of communal tensions that sometimes flares into violence or, indeed, mass public disorder.

1.00 pm

The Alliance Party warmly embraces the concept of a shared future. The term can refer to the commitment of a divided community to overcome barriers and work together for a better future. However, it more properly refers to a set of policy principles and specific policy commitments. My party welcomes the framework document, 'A Shared Future', published in March 2005, and also the first of the triennial action plans that was published in April 2006. "Shared future" is not simply another label for repackaging community-relations policies of old. It is not primarily about looking at the funding of projects. Rather, it must be seen as a challenge to the range of policies and practices in Northern Ireland.

The Alliance Party regrets that most of those developments have occurred under the watch of direct rule Ministers rather than devolved or local Ministers. It is notable that the Government have finally accepted that the division of Northern Ireland into two communities that, they assume, are impossible to reconcile, and, at best, trying to manage those divisions, is not a sustainable or acceptable strategy. Instead, the Government now accept that the only credible way forward lies in a shared and integrated society, in which people can live, learn, work and play together in safety. The 'A Shared Future' action plan puts forward a commitment to mainstream such thinking throughout public policy and in the delivery of goods, facilities and services.

In conclusion, the Alliance Party believes that the details of building a shared future can be left to the normal public-policy mechanisms. However, a commitment to a shared future is essential to advance the political process. I propose that all parties endorse the framework document, 'A Shared Future', and the action plan; and that they regard their implementation as critical to political progress.

Mr Paisley Jnr: When people talk about good relations, they say that it is a good idea and that they want some of it. They then try to build on that. It is difficult to nail down exactly what "Good relations" involves. How can good relations be implemented? Policies or strategies for building good community relations should not be based on an attack on the education structure, but that is a debate for another day. The pursuit of good community relations should not bring about a leap towards integrated education. Intolerant people can be found in various schools, including schools in the integrated sector. It must be recognised that integrated education is not a panacea.

We must try to put together the building blocks for good relations. Those building blocks have already been discussed with regard to equality. If people believe that they have equality in law, they will believe that they have a shared future. If people perceive that equality exists, good relations will develop and grow. If people believe in the services of the state — the legitimacy of law and order, in particular — suspicions will decrease and the opportunity to build a shared future will increase.

There are examples of the private sector, as well as the public sector, trying to generate the notion that Ulster is everybody's. Linfield Football Club has recently upgraded and increased its activities to combat sectarianism with its commitment to the Irish Football Association's (IFA) 'Kick it Out' campaign. That follows the Football Association (FA) in England's campaign, 'Let's Kick Racism Out of Football'. That demonstrates a positive activity of people trying to show, on a practical, day-to-day basis, how we should try to share this piece of the world and live together in peace and harmony.

Most people want to live together in peace and harmony. However, those who have wrecked the peace and harmony for the past 30 years — the paramilitary gangs, thugs, and gangsters on all sides — have brought us to this point at which we are discussing ways of overcoming that. Most people want to live together and share this piece of turf, but, unfortunately, the legacy of the past causes suspicions, and those suspicions must be addressed. People will find that they are addressed in different ways to their satisfaction.

It is difficult to pin down specific ways in which to legislate for good relations; a lot of it needs to be done by example. What seem like good relations to one person may not be comfortable for someone else. We should not challenge what people ultimately believe. Some people have the notion that achieving good relations means that they set aside what they believe in, and that strong views — religious, cultural or political — must have the rough edges taken off. However, that sours the notion of true relations, because a person should be able to respect another's beliefs, whatever those beliefs are.

We have seen that people in Northern Ireland cannot respect those who are different. Every year, the orange community is reminded that it is not respected. Most people would be happy if nationalists said that they are not offended by it, because they are not interested in it. I am not offended when I go to England and see Morris dancing, because I am not interested in it. If we could get to that point, we might start to see a practical and pragmatic good-relations strategy develop.

Mrs O’Rawe: I will cover “Shared future” as well as “Good relations. Paragraph 13 on page 18, paragraph 13 of the Good Friday Agreement pledges:

“The participants recognise and value the work being done ... to develop reconciliation ... understanding and respect between and within communities and traditions, in Northern Ireland and between North and South, and they see such work as having a vital role in consolidating peace and political agreement.”

The British Government subsequently produced ‘A Shared Future: A Consultation Paper on Improving Relations in Northern Ireland’. That document, like its predecessor, shied away from any analysis of the causes of division, inequality and structured discrimination and sectarianism that the British Government fostered and nurtured.

‘A Shared Future’ is fundamentally flawed in many ways, not least because it places the burden of blame for community conflict on people’s lack of trust. It also shows the classic and insulting “two tribes” approach shown by British Ministers and policy-makers that provides a smokescreen for the divisive role they played in failing to honestly tackle the causes of community conflict.

The document acknowledges that disadvantage and community conflict are related, but the major flaw is that there is no recommendation to amend the Northern Ireland Act 1998 to allow the Equality Commission to assume the statutory responsibility for good relations that would provide the oversight for monitoring the mainstreaming of good relations across public bodies. Instead, a significantly enhanced role is to be undertaken by the existing Community Relations Council (CRC), with ministerial oversight.

‘A Shared Future’ fails to acknowledge the divisive role that the state played in contributing to deeply rooted mistrust and suspicion between communities, which extended into the core patterns and structures of relationships at all levels in the North. It fails to provide any clear definition of sectarianism or, in its section on fundamental principles, a commitment to measures to eradicate it.

The Equality Commission — not the CRC — should be the clearly identified public authority responsible for promoting good relations. The Equality Commission is already responsible for promoting good race relations. In order that there be no dilution of existing equality laws, and that there be clarity on whether the CRC or the commission should be given the additional responsibilities to promote good relations between people of different religious beliefs and political opinions, the commission must have the leadership role.

In England, the Commission for Equality and Human Rights (CEHR) is responsible for promoting good relations on six grounds: faith; age; disability; gender; race; and sexual orientation. The Equality Commission’s position on the single equality Bill, which is stalled at present, is that it is seeking to have similar powers extended here.

A commission on national reconciliation should be established under the aegis of the North/South Ministerial Council. The commission would report to the Executive and Dáil Éireann and would instigate participative consultation, research and inclusive discussion. It would also ensure that any good-relations strategy would be built primarily on mainstreaming of the equality agenda.

Ms Lewsley: I would also like to cover “Shared future” and “Good relations”, because they overlap. We are supposed to be talking about good relations, yet we have had a proposal on a shared future.

To create a shared future is the purpose of any peace process. It is about equal citizenship and human rights for all. All public goods, services and facilities should be open and accessible to everyone. A shared future should be about living, working and playing together. Policy-making in any new Executive must take account of a shared future, and give it its full support.

As things stand, those who are intimidated, rather than the perpetrators, are moved on. It matters that people are frightened when going through our cities and town centres at night and that people are intimidated by flags, murals and, more recently, football regalia. Such attacks cannot be justified, and the failure to reach political agreement cannot be justified either.

A shared future cannot be seen as a small side-policy — it must be a major structure of government. It means opposing all forms of sectarianism and taking a firm stand on all that is said and done in a sectarian nature, rather than explaining, minimising or making excuses for it. It means taking down all flags down public property.

The Committee has heard talk about the building blocks of a shared future. I believe that there are many of them, and that good relations is one building block. Good relations must be the mainstay of central Government and their Departments, as must be our councils, or the new councils that the Review of Public Administration (RPA) will create. Good relations should be implemented as a key part of section 75 alongside the new power-sharing arrangements that will promote working partnerships when we see the RPA put in place.

Good-relations committees have been set up in most councils — a few have still to be established. Some are working, many are not, and some are paying lip service. We need to reach a standard across the board. In particular, it is important that political parties on all councils sign up to the concept of good relations and try to ensure the delivery of good relations in their councils and communities.

As Ian Paisley Jnr said, good relations are often seen as good for one person but bad for another. In trying to reach a compromise, we need an understanding of respect and diversity. Good relations are a building block to help that.

We have talked for a long time about a shared future, and it is time we made that talk a reality. I support the Alliance Party's proposal.

1.15 pm

Mr Kennedy: The Ulster Unionist Party believes that the overall aim of any community relations policy must be to work for a pluralist society in which views and opinions, consistent with democratic values, co-exist and are respected. Only in such a context can a truly modern and cosmopolitan society develop.

While — realistically — the main relations at issue are between the Protestant and Roman Catholic communities, a community relations policy must be able to embrace and promote other communities, such as other faiths, ethnic groups, and those who are less able.

The objective of having a shared society is important. However, it is essential that policy makers accept that due to the legacy of the conflict, the violence and the continued political uncertainty, many in our society, at this point, are unable to endorse such an aspiration. Those views must be respected; but equally, they must not constrain others who are able and willing to develop a more shared society.

In essence, the policy objective must be to develop a society in which the main drivers are tolerance and mutual respect. Progress would be much quicker and easier if violence and paramilitarism would end; however, it is probably unrealistic to set that as a precondition. The development of a pluralist society is regarded as part of the process of hastening the end of those negative influences, but it will not be nearly enough on its own. Nonetheless, communities need to have confidence that the forces of law and order are serious about getting to grips with paramilitarism.

The overall aim of any community relations policy in a modern society must be to develop tolerance and respect. The acceptance and promotion of diversity as an asset must be developed, as opposed to the current pervasive attitude, which suppresses expressions of difference and sees diversity in the workplace, school or society as a cause of conflict.

A community relations policy must strive to develop respect so that different cultures and traditions can be celebrated in a way that adds to society, rather than being seen as a cause of offence. In many areas, cohesion has broken down and the community often feels isolated, embattled and belittled. A community relations policy must seek to develop structures in communities to raise confidence and community self-esteem. In many cases, there is a need to break the dominance of paramilitaries so that genuine leadership and community structures can emerge. Apathy and the general malaise towards building improved relationships must be removed. Throwing money at the problem has manifestly proven not to be the solution.

New policies to develop community cohesion must recognise that the two main communities approach community relations in very different ways. Consequently, the same model will not fit — nor must it be made to fit — both communities. The outcome of such policies must be confidence in communities and societies so that individuals will have the freedom to choose where to work and live, unrestricted by fear.

Furthermore, individuals and groups should be able to express and promote their views and beliefs in a climate of respect and tolerance. Under a community relations policy that promotes diversity and respect, it is essential that civic society and Government be proactive in the promotion of cultural diversity. Tolerance and respect must replace the current policies of neutrality and avoidance.

Finally, new community structures need to be developed to replace the paramilitaries. Those structures must show that problems within and between communities can be addressed through routes other than violence. The relative calm of the summer sets a precedent, but it certainly should not be regarded as evidence that any underlying problems have been solved.

Increasing neutrality has led to increased intolerance, as evidenced by the extension of the classification of offensive items, such as political emblems, to include sporting emblems etc. Such a lack of tolerance breeds intolerance.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Does the Alliance Party or DUP want to add anything on shared future issues? All parties seem to have taken equality and shared issues together.

Mrs Long: We took the two together, although we did not preface that in our remarks.

Mr Campbell: I want the SDLP to elaborate on the view that Patricia expressed on the councils. I understand the ramifications of the RPA, because the SDLP, the DUP and others have spelt them out.

Patricia's comments suggested that, however the RPA develops, the SDLP wants particular good relations issues to be resolved in advance of the RPA. Good relations could, therefore, be established on the back of the allocation of positions, power-sharing or whatever else being statutorily enshrined.

Ms Lewsley: Yes, that is right.

Mr Campbell: That is what I understood from your comments. Do you equally accept that that is one side of the coin, which I presume also applies to many in the nationalist community? The unionist community wants similar assurances to be statutorily enshrined in relation to any prospect of nationalist-controlled councils proceeding on a North/South basis, establishing North/South bodies or establishing matters in relation to a power-sharing Administration between Northern Ireland and the Republic.

Do you accept that that should be similarly enshrined? In the same way that nationalists seek comfort and reassurance in the way that you have described, unionists seek reassurance on the other side of the coin on North/South issues.

Ms Lewsley: I understand that. Both sides have a number of issues that must be resolved in any future Government here. I have no problem with that.

Mr Campbell: Do you accept that the concerns of each side of the community are equally valid?

Ms Lewsley: Yes.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Gregory, do you have anything to add on shared future issues or did you take the equality and shared future issues together?

Mr Campbell: We took them together.

Mr Nesbitt: Pat O'Rawe said that the failure to tackle the causes of the conflict was part of the community relations problem. Some of those causes have been stated to such an extent that they are not soluble.

I choose my words carefully: the paramilitary wing of the republican movement has strongly stated that one cause of the conflict is the British presence in Ireland. I accept that removing that cause has been taken forward in peaceful terms since July 2005, as distinct from removing it by other means. However, if a peaceable removal of the causes of the conflict remains an agent provocateur within the structures of government, that does not help community relations.

A recently published work by Peter Shirlow states that the 35% increase in communal violence was partly due to constitutional and political uncertainty.

I wish to see a stable, functioning Northern Ireland accepting the position as it is, and that we thus proceed. Therefore, when we talk about failing to tackle the causes of community conflict, I wonder whether some of those causes can be removed.

Mr Brolly: We have an even split between those who describe themselves as British and those who do not. That does not necessarily have to be a cause of conflict; in many countries in the world people of different ethnic origins live together peacefully and get on with the practical business of living.

People on the other side are not going to stop being British just because I ask them to stop, and I am not going to be British because someone asks me to be. I resent people insisting that I am British just because I live in Dungiven, County Derry, rather than somewhere in Munster.

Rather than tackle something that, at this point, is insoluble, I prefer to discuss some of the positive things that we can do, such as accepting each other as we are — you British, me Irish.

Let us return to the question of education as a platform for shared experience and shared territory. Integrated education, as is now described and espoused so enthusiastically by the Alliance Party, does not make a useful contribution at all. It adds a third tier of schooling that takes away the very people that should be using their influence in the main school population to take the rough edges off this idea of Protestant versus Catholic schoolchildren.

I am a firm believer in integrated education, but I mean total integration — not some people being drawn off certain communities, usually middle-class. All youngsters, Protestant and Catholic, from whatever community, should be educated together. There should not be state schools, as our friends across the table prefer to call them — we call them Protestant schools and Catholic schools. There is a good practical reason for my preference, just as there is a good reason for not having integrated education as a third tier, and that is that there need only be one school instead of two, and one set of staff instead of two.

Ideologically, the consequence is that children grow up together, get used to their difference, and do not mind if the lad sitting on one side calls himself British, or if the lad sitting on the other side calls himself Irish, plays Gaelic football or puts Irish language signs up on his desk. We should discuss seriously that area of education.

Education is about more than a curriculum or what is read in text books; it is about making an impression on young people at the right time. We should not wait until they are educated together at university. There are some very good secondary schools, such as Limavady Grammar School in my constituency, in which the population is very well mixed. However, we should start at the beginning, in prep schools and primary schools, with all the children together.

Mrs Long: I want to go back to a couple of things. The issue of integrated education has been raised, and we referred to it in our document. I am not sure where Mr Brolly is coming from, because what he says seems to be at odds with itself.

It has never been our view that integrated education should be a third option in a multiplicity of systems, and we have never promoted that. There are almost five systems running side by side, not three. However, the status quo that confronts parents is one in which schools are largely divided on religious grounds, some by choice and some by default.

In reality, if parents want their children to have an integrated education, their only options have been either to transform the schools that their children attend or to remove their children from their current schools and start them afresh at schools that have an integrated ethos. You mentioned, for example, that there may be mixing within existing schools — we accept that. The difficulty is that if mixing extends only to the religious denomination of the pupil base, and does not extend to the management structures and ethos and the curriculum and extra-curricular activities, it is not a fully integrated system.

1.30 pm

There is an argument. The economic arguments are clear as regards shared facilities, particularly given declining attendance rolls, and we accept that. However, there is the issue of parental choice also. The Alliance Party has not argued for a multiplicity of systems; the argument has come from parents who choose other forms of education and parents who choose integrated education. We must respect the parents who make those decisions for their children.

This is not solely a middle-class issue. If that is the perception that members have, I suggest that many integrated schools would be happy to invite them along to speak to their pupils who largely come from working-class backgrounds.

Mr Brolly: I would be the last person in the world to deny parents the right to have their children educated where they wish. I agree that the only way that parents can have integrated schools is through the third tier. I am suggesting that we get to a point where that tier is not needed and all children can be educated together.

Mrs Long: You would have the Alliance Party's support on that.

Mr Brolly: As well as integrated schools, as they are called, I would get rid of Catholic schools and the so-called state Protestant schools: my remarks are not discriminatory towards the integrated sector.

Mr Hussey: Is Sinn Féin proposing controlled-integrated schools, as opposed to the current system, and that any parents who sought to go beyond that arrangement would have to finance the venture themselves?

Mr Brolly: My point is that if parents wanted their children to attend Catholic schools, they should be private schools. If parents wanted their children to attend Protestant schools, or Church of Ireland schools, that would be up to them. Those parents would face the same circumstances as those who want integrated schools do now. I do not know whether the state would be expected to help religious-based schools. I would probably oppose that.

Mr Poots: It is interesting that Sinn Féin is adopting a policy that was voted for by the first Government in Northern Ireland in 1921: a single state education sector, where all children were educated together. The local Catholic Church decided to opt out of the state school system. State schools have never been Protestant schools; they have always been schools that everyone was welcome to attend. The maintained sector contained schools with a Roman Catholic ethos, and that is a significant difference. There are no Protestant schools; there are schools, which are attended predominately by members of the Protestant community, because Roman Catholics were discouraged from attending them.

Mrs Long: Edwin, could you provide us with some information? If you are saying that there is no such thing as a Protestant or unionist school, could you explain the following situation? I accept your point that some of this situation happened by default, but it is established in law that members of the Protestant churches have the right to sit on the boards of governors of transferred schools. Also, children at state schools do not have the same access to culture. For example, the majority of state schools do not teach the Irish language or include Gaelic games in the sports curriculum. Therefore, state schools have an ethos problem, in that young Catholics or nationalists, when considering prospective schools, may feel that all their cultural issues would not be addressed by schools in the state sector.

I accept your point about the evolution process. However, do you accept that there may be barriers, either real or perceived, to children's feeling comfortable attending predominately Protestant schools, albeit that that is not how they are classified?

Mr Poots: I take a number of those points. Nominees from Protestant churches are in the minority on boards of governors. Their presence has a lot to do with history and the fact that the churches helped to establish those schools.

Mrs Long: All of this is about history though.

Mr Poots: Those churches funded schools late in the nineteenth century and early in the twentieth century.

Roman Catholic attendance at many state schools has increased significantly in the past 10 years. Many parents have voted with their feet and sent their children to the schools that provide the best education in their area. Many Roman Catholics have decided that the state sector is the best sector for them, which means that integration has already taken place. I understand that Methodist College has a mix of pupils; about 30% of whom are Roman Catholic and 70% of whom are Protestant. That is a fairly high level of integration. Quite a number of so-called integrated schools have not achieved that level of integration.

Mrs Long: Who is the head of the school's Gaelic football team at the minute?

Mr Poots: I have no idea who is the head of its rugby team, never mind its Gaelic team.

Mr D Bradley: I would like to clarify a point with Francie Brolly. Are the views on education that he expressed today his personal views or are they simply party policy?

Mr Brolly: My party is in favour of integrated education. I am simply taking it to its logical conclusion.

Mr D Bradley: I was under the impression that Sinn Féin was in favour of choice in education and that, like the SDLP, it believed that parents should have the right to choose the type of school that they send their children to, be it controlled, maintained, integrated or Irish-medium. Perhaps I have misunderstood Sinn Féin's party policy.

Mr Brolly: It depends on whether we are considering education in the short-, medium- or long-term. The ultimate objective would be for all children to be educated together and taught a curriculum that fulfils every need, whatever the religious divide. It may well be the case in future that immigrants here who are not Protestant, Catholic or Irish-speaking will be helped to establish their own schools so that they can maintain their own ethnic culture and language. All that is possible. However, the ultimate dream for education, and, beyond that, the ultimate dream for this part of Ireland, is that everybody will live together and that we will stop remembering whether people are Protestant, Catholic or Irish-speaking, or whether they play on a Gaelic football team or a rugby team. I imagine us heading in that direction.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We must remember that this is not about education; it is about a shared future.

Mr Brolly: That is a good example of a platform.

Mr Nesbitt: Education is highly important as schools provide an informative environment for children and can impact on their views as they grow up. Like others sitting around this table, I found Sinn Féin's contribution interesting, given the historical context and where the party is today. For example, Mr Brolly talked about the possibility of Catholic schools becoming private and funding themselves, if they so wished. I am not sure how the Council for Catholic Maintained Schools would view that, but it is an interesting point.

Mr Kennedy: Without even asking the council, I can confirm that it would certainly be horrified.

Mrs Long: That is an understatement.

Mr Brolly: Is it not a factor that the CCMS, as it currently stands, will no longer exist?

Mr Nesbitt: I did not collude with my colleague who made that witty comment. Mine was a very serious comment.

I wish to return to Mr Brolly's comments on so-called state schools and Catholic schools. Catholic schools were part of the controlled state system, which was set up for all. However, as Edwin said, the Catholic Church opted out of that system. Similarly, at the time of the formation of the state, a quota of 30% was set for Catholic provision in the RUC, but that did not happen. We are where we are.

Naomi spoke about barriers, and she asked, jokingly, who the captain of the Gaelic team is in Methodist College. However, such barriers exist not only between the Irish and the British. George Best passed the 11-plus and went to the rugby-playing Grosvenor Grammar School. However, he wanted to play soccer so he transferred to Lisnasharragh High School; he was looking for a school that played soccer, not a school that played rugby. Therefore, to an extent, schools meet the clientele's expectations.

Francie Brolly said that in many places throughout the world, people simply get on with their lives. I wish that we could do that in Northern Ireland. At a previous meeting of the Committee, I referred to international legal principles for governing democratic societies, where a person's identity is established by his or her culture, language, education and religion. Unfortunately, in Northern Ireland, a political overtone is attached to that. I wish that people could feel very Irish, and speak Irish, but at the same time be British citizens. It should not be mutually exclusive to have an affinity with Irishness and Britishness. More Welsh is spoken in Wales than Irish is spoken in Ireland, yet people can feel strongly about their Welsh identity but also be British. Those positions are not mutually exclusive.

Citizenship and cultural aspiration and identity are different, but they are not mutually exclusive. In a normal society, they should complement one another — as Francie rightly said — as they do elsewhere in the world. Russians live in Estonia, where they remain Russian but play a part in Estonian life; the same applies to Hungarians living in Transylvania. In many countries, culture is seen as being different from citizenship. Unfortunately, in Northern Ireland, culture and citizenship overlap, which has led to disharmonious community relations and a divided society. That has had a knock-on effect in schools and the wider environment.

Ms Lewsley: Gregory asked me a question about power sharing and North/South issues. The SDLP wants power sharing to be a requirement and wants opportunities for North/South development based on mutual agreement and mutual benefits. The SDLP does not support prohibitions or restrictions being placed on councils that work on that basis. However, the party will address any concerns. Although power sharing, and checks and balances in the RPA, are important issues for the SDLP, it is not a problem for the party that the DUP has major concerns about North/South issues.

Mr Campbell: I accept Patricia's clarification, although I am slightly confused because she spoke about the SDLP wanting power sharing to be a requirement — in other words, power sharing is essential. Equally, unionists state that their support of any North/South developments is a requirement and essential. One community's requirements do not supersede the requirements of the other community.

Ms Lewsley: I said that if North/South developments were a big issue for the DUP, that posed no problem for the SDLP.

Mr Campbell: It is good that we have some measure of consensus.

I want to respond to a comment that Naomi made about education. The DUP view is that we should work toward a single education sector. Since 1948, there has been an uneven playing field in relation to education. We must move on from that position.

At the moment, my community, my family and my children have a straight option: I can send my children to a public sector, controlled state school — that does not mean a Protestant school; or I can pay for a private education, which creates many difficulties. There really is no option available. The Catholic community has a choice: it can send its children to a fully funded Catholic school or to a fully funded state school. I do not have that choice. That has been the situation for almost 60 years.

That must be ironed out in a way that is acceptable to every community.

1.45 pm

The first option is a level playing field with a single education sector for everyone. The second option is that the Protestant community is given what the Catholic community has now — an education sector funded by the taxpayer, with all the benefits that, as Naomi pointed out, currently apply to the Catholic sector. The latter option may not be everyone's cup of tea, and it would not represent progress towards trying to build good relations.

Protestant children are not educated in Ulster-Scots history. They should be educated in that subject to the same extent that Catholic pupils are educated in Irish history. For the most part, Catholic children leave school fully conversant with their Irish history and background, but Protestant children are not similarly conversant with their Ulster-Scots history and background. If Protestants want to be educated in those subjects, they must go to the Ulster-Scots Agency or other funded bodies.

That, and so many other imbalances that flow from issues that do not come directly from the common curriculum, must be ironed out, one way or the other. Do we move towards a single education sector? If we do move in that direction, that is good, but the question is: how long will it take to get there? In the interim, how do we create a level playing field?

Mrs Long: I want to come back on a couple of points.

First, Francie Brolly referred to British and Irish ethnic identities. I do not accept the fact that they exist. The British and the Irish are not ethnically different. I have made that point previously when members complained that certain comments were racist. The differences between British and Irish people are of nationality, not ethnicity.

Mr Brolly: If I may intervene, I would never have used the term "British" in an ethnic sense.

Mrs Long: Hansard will reflect what he said.

Mr Brolly: "British" is a political term.

Mrs Long: It is, and "Irish" is also a political term and a nationality. The terms "British" and "Irish" may be used to refer to cultures, and so on, but largely when talking about national, not ethnic, identities.

Mr Brolly: People talk about Irish games and the Irish language.

Mrs Long: My second point concerns integrated education. Gregory referred to a single system of education. He spoke about the right, for example, of children from the unionist community to be educated in Ulster-Scots history in the same way in which children from the nationalist community are educated in Irish history. Perhaps it would be a real education for the entire community if all children were educated in both histories. That might open up opportunities for pupils to leave school with a more comprehensive view of history and the society in which they live than is currently the case.

I am not arguing against people being educated. My argument is against unionists having sole access to Ulster-Scots education. It would be useful for the entire community to be properly educated on all scores.

Mr Campbell: I fully accept what Naomi says and have no difficulty with it. The only problem is that it is likely to take a considerable time, whether it be one or two generations, to reach that goal. I want to know what we do in the interim.

Mrs Long: That was my next point, because Gregory talked about transformation. The Alliance Party has made clear its consistently held position — and it seems to be the position of other parties around the table — that the default arrangement should be that all children are educated together in a single system. In supporting the integrated-education movement, the Alliance Party has tried to focus on a transition to such a situation.

We are not interested in creating an extra tier of education. We want to know how to transform the current divided and divisive system into something that moves us forward towards a level playing field with which all parties, to varying degrees, are comfortable — the default position, which is that all children be educated together. Therefore, the debate is on the transformation process, not its outcome.

Mr Paisley Jnr: In that case, how do we get over the issue of choice?

Mrs Long: The issue of choice is not about the right to an integrated education. It comes down to Francie's point about the right to have it funded by the state. As this process moves on, the debate will focus on that.

In any other society in which there has been community division — and one need only look at the US to see the usefulness of integrating education — education can be a tool to unite or divide people. Where it is used to unite, it is an effective mechanism, although it is not the only one. This should not be about putting all our eggs in one basket, but it is a mechanism.

For that reason, for example, under the principle of a shared future, Alliance supports a raft of policies across Departments. From the point of parental choice, we want to move in that direction. It is a transformation process. Ultimately, however, the momentum must be created. Schools must be provided in line with demand, thereby creating a system in which integrated education is an option.

Currently, the only people who are denied the right to attend a school that reflects their ethos are those for whom no integrated school is available. Surplus places are never used. If Catholic parents wish to send their child to a Catholic school, or Protestant parents wish to send their child to a state school, they are never referred to a Protestant school or a Catholic school down the road if surplus places are available. That does not happen.

Mr Paisley Jnr: It does.

Mrs Long: It does not.

Mr Paisley Jnr: It has happened to my children.

Mrs Long: It only happens where parents choose integrated education. If we are talking about a process to move towards a default situation in which children are educated together, something must kick-start it. The integrated education movement has been part of that.

Mr Hussey: I was interested in Francie's comment about an education system in this part of Ireland. My understanding was that Sinn Féin's policy was an all-Ireland one.

Surely to goodness the major issue in education is the quality of provision, not where it is delivered. In strongly nationalist constituencies, such as mine, controlled grammar schools have a large number of nationalist kids who have chosen to go to those schools. We should examine the matter of choice.

Reference has been made to historical backgrounds. A major problem for unionism has been that many historical facts have been airbrushed out of history by nationalism/republicanism — the 16th Irish Division has more or less been ignored by the nationalist community. Moreover, the unionist community has withdrawn from its part in the 1798 rebellion. Each side of the community has ignored that cultural background.

I firmly believe that a different ethos exists in the Protestant community to that in the nationalist community. A parish structure exists in the nationalist community, whereas there is a more independent structure in the Protestant community. That, shall we say, community weakness has meant that unionists have been accused for a long time by nationalists/republicans of not having a culture. In fact, our culture is degraded at times.

Where unionists are a minority in strongly nationalist areas, the community lacks the capacity to advance. Therefore, in any shared future, the capacity to advance must be built within the weaker community. A community can only move forward to a shared future from a base of self-esteem.

Mr D Bradley: My impression from some of Gregory's remarks was that he believed that maintained schools have taught their own brand of Irish history from within their walls.

A common history curriculum that is available to all schools is formulated by the Council for the Curriculum, Examinations and Assessment (CCEA), which welcomes consultation. At the moment, CCEA is reviewing the GCSE syllabuses, and anyone is welcome to express his or her ideas regarding the content of the curriculum. Generally speaking, the syllabus content for GCSEs is decided by a range of teachers, covering the various types of schools that there are in Northern Ireland, in conjunction with third-level experts from Queen's University and the University of Ulster.

If it were felt that there is not enough emphasis on the Ulster-Scots contribution to Irish or Northern Irish history, CCEA would welcome views on that.

Mr Campbell: I do not know whether I have spelled it out explicitly, but it is our view that part of the problem flows from the fact that young people in the Protestant community lack identity, a concept of who and what they are, and knowledge of their tradition, history, values, culture and ethos. The Catholic community, however, through its education system, raises those ideologies and issues daily from four to 17 years of age, and beyond if pupils decide to go on to higher education.

Could CCEA encapsulate those values in a single education sector? That would be fine, and we would have no difficulty with that. However, we are not going to get to that point in the next five, 10 or probably 25 years. We may make progress in that direction, but we shall certainly not arrive at it.

It comes back to the issue that I raised with Naomi — what do we do in the interim? At present, nobody whom I have met from the nationalist community identifies flaws in the Catholic education system regarding the type and quality of education. When Catholic young people leave the system, they know about their history and culture, know clearly who they are and where they are going, and know the nature of their identity, ethos and background.

That cultural education is not shared to the same degree in the Protestant school-leaving population, and that is where, we believe, some of the problems are. Do we allow that to continue? That is the analogy that we make. The anomalies that exist between the two sectors must be ironed out.

Mr D Bradley: I do not believe for one minute that those who are in charge of Catholic education aim to create a neat, individual package out of each pupil. Their aim is to develop well-rounded individuals who are able to think for themselves, and who, from the Catholic point of view, are well grounded in their faith, since their schools are faith schools.

On the other hand, I do not accept that people coming from controlled schools are in some way confused about who they are and have no concept of their historical, cultural or sporting background. I do not believe that.

Mr Campbell: I did not say that they do not have a concept. If we took a survey of 1,000 school leavers from the maintained sector, it is our view that there would be a higher degree of consciousness of their Irish history, tradition, background and culture than there would be in a similar survey of 1,000 school leavers from the controlled system of their history, tradition, background and culture. The reason for that is the different emphasis in the two school traditions, both of which are paid for out of the public purse. That anomaly has to be ironed out.

Mr D Bradley: That is Gregory's perception of the current situation. Gregory's survey has not yet been carried out, so his views are based on his own perceptions, not on evidence. If such a survey could be designed, I would be interested to see its results. They might be surprising.

Mr Campbell: The evidence is in some of the election results. Those are the views that we put before the people, and they endorse them.

Mr D Bradley: Elections are not sociological, sensitive surveys.

2.00 pm

Mr Nesbitt: I wish to return to a couple of Naomi's points. I empathise a lot with the distinction that she drew between the words "ethnic" and "national", as the UK Government would with ethnic minorities and national minorities. The term "ethnic minorities" would, for example, relate to south-east-Asian émigrés who come to live in the United Kingdom. Although they would be diverse geographically, they might not necessarily feel that they have to be south-east Asian, as regards citizenship. The term "national minorities" would, in the UK sense, be more akin to the Scottish, Welsh and Irish.

Would Naomi take the logic to its conclusion and agree that there is a difference between nationality and citizenship? In Northern Ireland, the problem has not been that there are national minorities; rather, the problem has been one of secession. I stress that the word "minority" does not mean inferior: it means fewer in number, and it is most important that I repeat that on every occasion. Sections of the people of Northern Ireland wish to secede from the state in which they live. It has been quite a violent form of secession, which is not acceptable in international legal terms. Therefore, people can have British citizenship and consider their nationality to be Irish.

Naomi came across quite strongly about integrated education. The leader of the Alliance Party calls it the preferred choice rather than the third choice. Naomi was quite assertive about the denial of rights. In my community, there are three sectors: the controlled primary sector, the maintained primary sector and the integrated primary sector. We are back to the concept of rights, and to the discussion on the bill of rights that we had at the last meeting. The allocation of resources is finite. It is one thing to have a right; it is another thing to have the necessary economic rationing of resources to exercise that right.

The community has gone down the road of maintained and controlled education sectors. However, the same dispensation has been given to the formation of integrated schools, as has been given to the formation of Irish-medium education: before a school can be opened, there does not have to be a minimum number of pupils. That is not the case for the controlled sector, which must be able to show a greater number of potential pupils before a school can be opened. Parents may wish to have educational rights, but those rights must be tempered by financial constraint.

Mr Long: Dermot raised two issues. First, a person can be a British citizen but consider himself or herself to be Irish. That is not a conflict. Others at the table may see that as a conflict, but I do not.

When I referred to rights, it was not in the context that every child who wished to have a place in an integrated school should have that right funded by the state.

Mr Nesbitt: Sorry, you said: “were denied the right”.

Mrs Long: Yes. Integrated education is underfunded, and, therefore, children do not always have the opportunity to exercise that right. My point was how the other two sectors are treated when compared with the integrated sector. I was not saying that every child who wishes to should be able to have an integrated education, although the Alliance Party wants to see the time when that will be the case.

I realise that the discussion has become very focused on education. The Alliance Party submitted a proposal under the “Shared future” sub-heading. The discussion has been very informative, because there has been some agreement about the outcome — albeit that members have not agreed on the mechanism needed to achieve that outcome. There seems to have been some agreement, however, among the parties on the aspiration for a single, shared education system.

I propose that all parties endorse the aspiration of having a single, shared education system in Northern Ireland. We are not arguing about its mechanisms at this stage but about the aspiration.

Mr Poots: We seem to have become bogged down in education, and it has had a reasonable airing here. I expect that most people agree with what Naomi said, but I am not sure about the SDLP. Is it still looking for an opt-out for faith schools? If there were an opt-out for faith schools, it would have to go beyond the Roman Catholic sector as it is now.

Other issues must be addressed. Paramilitaries are viewed as an answer to problems in some local communities, but they are working to ensure that a shared future does not exist in many communities. They ensure that people from other faiths do not go into certain areas or are made to feel uncomfortable when there. If we are not prepared to address paramilitarism, and if paramilitary organisations are not prepared to disappear, it will be difficult — particularly in working-class areas — to deal with issues relating to a shared future.

The Housing Executive is supposed to be signed up to a shared future, yet it is proposing to erect Irish-language signage in an area before anybody moves in. That indicates that the area is a nationalist or republican area, and not one in which unionists would feel comfortable. The Housing Executive — a state body — is adopting policies that fly in the face of the so-called commitment to a shared future. Therefore there are matters other than education to address.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): To conclude on education, Naomi proposed that all parties endorse the aspiration of having a single, shared education system in Northern Ireland. Is there consensus on that?

Members indicated dissent.

Mr Kennedy: The issue of education is complex and detailed, and we could not expect a recommendation to gain consensus after such a brief discussion. It did go on for a while, but in itself it is a brief discussion that we have had today. It would not be sensible or useful to make recommendations on such a weighty subject at this early stage.

Mr Long: It has never been my approach to this Committee to try to be unhelpful; I have always tried to be helpful. I simply noted that there appeared to be consensus around the aspiration of a single, shared education system. That does not, in any way, tie it down; it leaves it open. I would have thought that there would be very little valid reason, regardless of the complexities of the education system, to find fear hidden in that proposal. It was not my intention to back people into corners.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We do not have consensus, so we will set it aside for the moment.

Mr Kennedy: I have listened carefully to the debate, and I have identified in some of the statements the premise that the controlled sector and the maintained sector have somehow been fostering some degree of sectarianism and bigotry in their education systems. I strongly refute that, and I defend both systems from that. If the curriculum needs to be extended to educate better our children in Irish history, British history, Northern Ireland culture or anything else, the current systems can address that.

I am a strong admirer of the Catholic form of education and the ethos that is attached to it. I do not subscribe to it, but I can easily recognise its importance within the Roman Catholic community, not only in Northern Ireland, or in Ireland, but throughout the world. To raise expectations that we could somehow find an easy solution to a complex problem would create as many problems as it is likely to solve.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We do not have consensus.

Mrs Long: With regard to any implied criticism of the current school system, it is worth putting on record that, from my perspective, the current system is a product of the difficulties in our society. It is not the architect of those problems. It is not my party's position to infer that the schools are the problem. That is not the case. The separation of children at an early age contributes to the problem, notwithstanding that the schools themselves have done a significant amount of work to try to overcome that separation and to increase cross-community contact. It is not a reflection on the schools, because they did not create our problems. My comments, and my party's stance, should not be interpreted in a way that would suggest that that was our position.

Mr Paisley Jnr: We are in real danger of talking in circles and navel-gazing here. If Mr Hain picks up Hansard from this meeting, he will rush forward to 24 November. This debate is going absolutely nowhere. We are now in an apologetic mood: "Hang on, we might have offended some school systems. We had better clarify our position for Hansard's sake, and protect ourselves in case schoolteachers say that they will not vote for us next time."

Mrs Long: I hope that that is not an interpretation of my making my position clear.

Mr Paisley Jnr: This qualifying, re-qualifying and protecting our backsides in case something has been said that should not have been said is a nonsense. Schools are not a product of the problem here. Schools have been here. We are all clear that the problem has been years of terrorism and abuse that has gone on in this society.

We are trying to move away from that, and we should move away from talking in circles. We have decided to spend the lion's share of today's meeting on this matter, so everyone who has spoken obviously thinks that it important enough. As I said earlier, to siphon off education as the one issue that will resolve good relations and our shared future is just wrong.

For a start, we will not resolve the education problem here. Secondly, and more importantly, neither integrated education nor changing the education system will address the big problems that have led to a divided society and to the bad relations and mistrust that exist. Yes, there is a layer of it in there, but it is not the lion's share of the problem. Much of what we have been talking about is "mom and apple pie" stuff: it would be great if we could all just sit down and have a collective societal hug, and we will all get on better if it happens at school.

We need to get back to basics on why there have been bad relations in this society and why we need a good-relations strategy. That returns us to the fact that we are trying to rebuild a society that has been at war. That war has had nothing whatsoever to do with the education system, and we should stop indirectly knocking the schools, which we have been doing, and start to address the issue that has led to the division, and that is terrorism. We have been dancing around that elephant in the room all day, and we should start facing up to that.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Let us not return to the issue of education.

Mr Brolly: I just want to apologise for starting all this. I wish to make some reference to culture. A Protestant does not have to have a Catholic licence to speak Irish or to enjoy the wide variety of cultures that are available on the whole island. Many Protestant unionists do love the island.

I have a particular liking for what is now described as Ulster-Scots music. There is a terrific affinity between traditional Irish and Scots cultures. Everybody should accept that culture belongs to them and that there are no doors barred to people who get involved in cultural Irish activities. I can play any game that I like, whether it be cricket or Gaelic football.

2.15 pm

Mrs Long: I distance myself from the view that the only problem in our society is terrorism. It is certainly a significant problem; however, the divisions that exist in our society, when terrorism is removed, must be dealt with in order for there to be good relations.

The reason that we must keep qualifying our remarks is because other people wilfully misrepresent what we have said. At the outset, I said that education was only one layer of a multi-faceted problem, yet, because a full discussion on education has ensued, it is being talked about as though it were the only important issue. It certainly is not.

For example, the promotion and maintenance of mixed housing, and how housing is managed within society, were raised. I would be quite happy to explore those issues. However, one must go with the flow of the discussion. At that point, the discussion was about education. If members want to proceed to issues such as the 'A Shared Future' action plan, or, indeed, other issues that they want to raise, that would be helpful. We have to recognise that terrorism has been, and still is, a huge problem for our community. However, good relations, and the interplay between people who are not terrorists, still needs to be addressed.

Mr Poots: Terrorism is the big issue, and it affects the outworking of many issues relating to a shared future and good relations.

Paramilitary organisations are the biggest problem that we have, because they still retain a grip over their communities. They are still recruiting, still engaging in criminal activity, and still involved in low-grade intimidation if not the more severe kind that took place over many years.

Ultimately, people want the Assembly to be up and running. We are saying that particular paramilitary groups have political representation and that there is no mission whatsoever of an Assembly getting up and running while those paramilitary groups exist. We must get those groups off our backs before there can be progress on a shared future. Other matters will fall into place when the paramilitaries are taken out of the system.

Mrs Long: With regard to paramilitarism, people's understanding of the rule of law is being addressed in the PFG Committee dealing with law and order issues. The discussion that I believed we were to have today was on good community relations.

If the DUP wants to frame the discussion around terrorism, and make proposals as to how it thinks it should be dealt with, I am sure that everyone would be keen to address them. As I have already said, there is more to community relations than paramilitarism, albeit that that is part and parcel of it. However, if the DUP simply wants to hijack the discussion on community relations, it seems that we will be simply replaying discussions on the rule of law, which are being addressed in a different strand of this Committee.

Mr Poots: We have discussed education for an hour.

Mrs Long: Education is not being discussed by the PFG Committee in any of its other formats.

Mr Poots: I do not believe that by focusing on paramilitarism for five minutes, we are hijacking the discussion.

Ms Lewsley: As Ian Paisley Jnr mentioned, we have gone around in circles for an hour and a half, and now we are going around in circles again. Members know that parties will differ on various issues within "Shared future". I hoped that the Committee could agree some basic principles. That was demonstrated in some of the proposals that were put forward earlier. I suggest that we proceed and consider some of the proposals that have been made.

Mr Kennedy: I largely subscribe to that. We have given it a good flogging all afternoon. I suggest that the other parts of the agenda — the past and its legacy, culture and confidence building — should be referred to another session. They are deserving of proper concentration and a proper detailed response. We should wrap up "Shared future" and "Good relations" and leave ourselves fresh for another sitting.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I think that that was the intention. We can take on the entire agenda if people are happy. [Laughter.]

Have we any proposals at this stage?

Mr McCarthy: Alliance proposes that all parties endorse the 'A Shared Future' framework document of March 2005 and its first triennial action plan of April 2006, and regard their implementation as critical to political progress.

Mr Paisley Jnr: There is not enough "mom and apple pie" in there; it is very specific.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do we have consensus on that proposal?

Members indicated dissent.

Mr Paisley Jnr: It is far too specific.

Mrs Long: That being the case, Alliance further proposes that all parties stress their commitment to building a shared future.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do we have consensus on that?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): There is a proposal that the Equality Commission should be identified as the primary body responsible for promoting good relations. Have we consensus on that?

Members indicated dissent.

Mr Poots: I proposed that all parties call for the immediate stand-down of all paramilitary organisations as the best contribution towards a shared future.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do we have consensus?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do we have any other proposals?

Is there any other business? Mr Nesbitt asked whether he could put his document from this morning on the website as part of this meeting. Is there agreement on that?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The date of the next meeting of the PFG Committee is 21 August; it will deal with the institutional issues.

Mr Kennedy: Given the deadlines that have now been created, are the outstanding issues the only ones to be dealt with by the Committee? Are our officials confident that we are on course to complete our remaining deliberations?

The Committee Clerk: Yes, according to the schedule, we are on track.

Adjourned at 2.24 pm.

COMMITTEE ON THE PREPARATION FOR GOVERNMENT

Monday 21 August 2006

Members in attendance for all or part of proceedings:

The Chairmen, Mr Francie Molloy and Mr Jim Wells
Mr P J Bradley
Mr Gregory Campbell
Dr Seán Farren
Mr David Ford
Mrs Naomi Long
Mr Michael McGimpsey
Mr David McNarry
Mr John O'Dowd
Mrs Patricia O'Rawe
Mr Ian Paisley Jnr
Mr Peter Robinson

The Committee met at 10.03 am.

(The Chairman (Mr Wells) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The meeting is scheduled to last until 4.00 pm, and lunch will be provided at 12.20 pm, when we will have a short break. I have read the Hansard reports of the last few meetings, and I was quite disturbed to note that Hansard had had to include the line “Inaudible due to mobile phone interference” on several occasions. There were at least three interruptions in the last report. Clearly the message has not got through to everyone that such interference will result in some of what you say simply being obliterated from the record. It is important that we do not allow that to happen. I ask everyone in the room, including research staff, to please try to make Mr Burrowes's life as easy as possible.

Have we any apologies and deputies?

Mr O'Dowd: Mrs O'Rawe and I are deputising for Mr Murphy and Ms Gildernew.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Will there be a third member?

Mr O'Dowd: No, it will be just the two of us today.

Dr Farren: Mr Bradley is here for Dr McDonnell or Mr Durkan.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Will you have a third member?

Dr Farren: No, I do not anticipate that there will be.

Mr Ford: I am here, and Mrs Long will be here shortly.

Mr McGimpsey: I am substituting for Mr McFarland, who is unavailable. Mr McNarry will be here shortly.

Mr P Robinson: Mr Campbell and I are substituting for anybody but Mr Paisley Jnr, who is expected to arrive later.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I remind members that the quorum is seven. We need to watch that carefully, as we do not have much leeway today. Members should do a head count before leaving the room. I think that you all have been here before. Mr Bradley, have you sat on this Committee before?

Mr P J Bradley: Yes.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There are no further declarations of interest, so we can pass over that.

Members should have received the minutes from the meeting of 14 August. Does anyone have any additions or corrections? Do members agree that they are a true and accurate record?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The next item on the agenda is the draft ministerial code. It sets out in detail the ground rules and procedures for the exercise of the duties and responsibilities of Ministers of the Assembly as set out in the Belfast Agreement and the Northern Ireland Act 1998. It applies to Ministers of the Executive Committee and junior Ministers.

At the last meeting, Mr Peter Robinson asked two important questions: first, whether any legislation applies to decision-making by the Executive; and secondly, to what extent Executive decision-making is governed by custom and practice. It is a complex matter, and the Committee staff have investigated it. I will read their advice for the record:

“The code makes reference to parts of the 1998 Act but it appears that there is no other relevant legislative provision in this respect.”

That relates to Mr Robinson's first question about legislation. I will read the rest, as it is quite complicated:

“Section 3.19 of the draft code covers decision-making by the Executive Committee. The Code was drafted prior to the first meeting of the Executive in 1999 and was adopted by the Executive Committee in February 2000 (specifically the Executive “adopted” Para 4.4 (notifications to the Assembly) of the draft Code at its meeting on 14 December 1999; “agreed” at the meeting on 18 January 2000 that Section 3 (Executive Committee) should come into immediate effect; and “endorsed” the remainder of the draft Ministerial Code, subject to review within 6 months ... The review never happened. I am advised by officials that custom and practice did not apply because the Ministerial Code was used and that it was treated as binding by participants.

The Ministerial Code's requirements are not set down in legislation. While Ministers are expected to observe its provisions, they have no statutory backing.

At last week's meeting the Committee agreed to request a copy of the draft Ministerial Code with a view to reaching an agreed position that can be put in legislation."

That is the situation so far regarding the draft ministerial code and its present status. We will return to this issue, though members may wish to comment now on that specific information. We do not know why the review did not occur, unless Mr McGimpsey or Dr Farren can remember something from February 2000.

Mr McGimpsey: In relation to this? It was to be reviewed in six months; then, obviously, the Executive fell.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): This was not carried forward, then?

Mr McGimpsey: We had several discussions about the ministerial code. I assume that what we are looking at now is the ministerial code that we drew up at that stage, but we never got as far as adopting it.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): And when the Executive was re-formed in — was it February 2000?

Mr McGimpsey: The Executive was re-formed in June 2000.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): This was not brought forward as an issue for review?

Mr McGimpsey: My memory is that by and large we followed the provisions of this ministerial code. I have had a quick run through it and it is all familiar. That is what we followed and it is what we built up into the ministerial code. I could be wrong; I have not read this page by page, but it looks very familiar.

Mr P Robinson: At the previous meeting of the Committee we discussed whether the ministerial code had any statutory effect. It does not; there was a general view in the Committee that it should. However, on looking at the weight of the document, it is probably unreasonable to expect the whole of that ministerial code to become a schedule to legislation. Important elements of it — a core code, if you like — could become part of a legislative statutory code.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I detect from the minutes of the previous meeting that there seemed to be agreement on that. The question is, do we want to get into that issue now or do we want to come back to it?

Mr P Robinson: Please not.

Dr Farren: No, no.

Mr McGimpsey: As you are aware, part of the Pledge of Office is to comply with the ministerial code. Once the ministerial code is adopted, the Pledge of Office requires you to comply with it. The question of whether legislation is drafted around that, and what the consequences of breaking the Pledge of Office might be, takes us back to discussions we had at previous meetings about other issues.

Dr Farren: While there is probably a great deal in it that remains uncontroversial, it needs a more considered examination than we are able to give it at this time. Parties may want to submit more considered views on those aspects that definitely have to go into legislation and be underwritten in some kind of statutory way, and also whether, in the light of our discussions, any changes and additions need to be made. There is a responsibility on the parties to make their submissions on matters that they consider important over the next few weeks.

Mr O'Dowd: Without wishing to annoy Mr Ford first thing on a Monday morning, I think that we agreed during the earlier discussions of this Committee that the ministerial code would be a matter for discussion for the parties in the Executive. It should be one of the first tasks of any new Executive to discuss the ministerial code and put it onto a statutory footing.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Members will remember the letter we got from the Secretary of State outlining the work programme from now to 24 November. We have to deal with this in October, because it is in that schedule.

Mr Ford: I want to briefly respond to Mr O'Dowd, who I am sure was not trying to be disagreeable quite so early on a Monday morning. It may well be that it should be Ministers who address the ministerial code in the first instance, but it is surely something that would require the approval of the full Assembly if it were to be adopted into legislation. So, all Members of the Assembly, including those who might or might not be in an Executive formed on whatever basis an Executive might be formed on, would have a say at that point.

Mr O'Dowd: Most certainly.

Mr P Robinson: We may be getting slightly confused about the ministerial code and its statutory effect. There is a code of conduct provision in schedule 4 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998; it has the core principles of a ministerial code in it. I would take it that insofar as the Pledge of Office requires Ministers to comply with the ministerial code of conduct, it is referring to the statutory code of conduct in schedule 4, which is framed in very broad, general terms. I assume that the issue then is whether the code of conduct is what we are describing as a ministerial code, or whether it is this code of conduct that we want to either elaborate on or add to.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There are other issues. The Freedom of Information Act 2000 was unheard of at that stage, and it might now have to be included in the code of conduct. No matter what happens, some updating will be necessary.

10.15 am

Mr P Robinson: I am not sure about that. Compliance with the 2000 Act is a legislative requirement. It is not up to Ministers to choose whether to obey it or not; they are legally required to do so — although there is probably wriggle room.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There are 23 exemptions in the 2000 Act.

Mr P Robinson: Yes, but they are statutory exemptions. By law, Ministers do not have a choice; they must operate in accordance with the 2000 Act.

The purpose of the ministerial code is not to duplicate what exists in law, but to set standards for ministerial behaviour. The code of conduct has some very broad-brush requirements. Having looked at the detailed ministerial code, I assume that it is simply a more precise version of that general code of conduct. The bulk of the ministerial code is common sense.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It was unanimously agreed at the last meeting that the ministerial code should be put on a statutory footing. Perhaps we can leave that issue at this stage and move on to strand two of the agreement. Parties can discuss their positions at a later stage, although the content of the code does not seem to have generated much controversy. Are members happy enough to do that?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That being the case, I will adopt our usual policy of asking each party to give a short presentation on strand two and the North/South implementation bodies. There was a wee bit of debate on Friday because Mr Nesbitt objected to the DUP being asked to speak first. To avoid any further complaints, I will go back to calling each party in alphabetical order. I will stick religiously to that format from now until the end of the hearings. Unfortunately, that means that the Alliance Party will always be called first.

Mr Ford: The party could always use its formal name, “The Alliance Party of Northern Ireland”, if that would be of any help.

Mr P Robinson: The DUP could be the Ulster Democratic Party. [Laughter.]

Mr McGimpsey: I could agree not to object.

Mr Ford: My contribution on strand two will be fairly brief. The practical outworking of many of the North/South issues has been much less controversial than it was expected to be in the early days. Therefore, we have relatively few suggestions about the structures.

I will not go through everything in detail. We highlighted the issue of the accountability of the North/South Ministerial Council (NSMC). We saw virtue not only in individual Ministers reporting on individual meetings, but in an annual report, perhaps prepared by the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister jointly with the Taoiseach and Tánaiste. Some questioning in the Assembly and the Oireachtas might also be involved, to enable everyone to get an overview of the NSMC’s work. In the past, individual meetings of individual strands have been examined in great detail, but little has been reported back on the overall structures.

The Alliance Party tabled a motion in the Assembly proposing the establishment of a North/South parliamentary tier, which would bring together members of the Assembly and the Oireachtas. Provision for such a parliamentary forum is mentioned in paragraph 18 of strand two of the agreement. Mr Chairman, you will recall that motion because you were one of the members who voted against it. Creating an opportunity for Back-Bench members of the two Parliaments to meet regularly to exchange information would undoubtedly bring benefits. It would allow us to move forward, and it would be of benefit to the many MLAs and TDs to encounter each other at that level.

The number of implementation bodies is fairly arbitrary. The agreement refers to 12 areas of co-operation and six implementation bodies. We are not fans of creating bodies for the sake of it. The task should be to identify areas where practical North/South co-operation would be of mutual benefit and to assess the best way of achieving that, which might or might not be through a further implementation body.

I am reminded of my experience as a member of the Agriculture and Rural Development Committee, when I kept a close eye on the operations of Ms Rodgers as Minister of Agriculture during the foot-and-mouth outbreak. I have no doubt that the greatest degree of North/South co-operation was shown at that time, when there were no institutional linkages at all, merely a telephone line between Brid Rodgers and Joe Walsh. The Alliance Party seeks to encourage that spirit of co-operation, rather than creating structures purely for the sake of it.

That is all I wish to say at this point, although I may respond to members’ detailed comments.

Mr P Robinson: I will not immediately engage in considering the headings and the order in which they appear as a backcloth to our discussions.

The DUP’s view is that the two sections of this community look in different directions. The nationalist community clearly has a common culture — one might even say identity — with the Irish Republic. The unionist community has shared issues with the rest of the United Kingdom.

There is a clear advantage in recognising the value to Northern Ireland society of people's ability to feel at ease within Northern Ireland and to feel that they have some relationship with the larger allegiances that they hold. In that context, a British Isles template that embraces both cultures and identities should be used. Within that, there can be compartments, whether east-west or North/South, but the overarching body should be a British Isles body within which both our traditions are fully embraced. That is how we can reach out beyond the boundaries of Northern Ireland. The DUP, therefore, argues for a central structure — a British Isles council with east-west and North/South compartments — rather than for separate corridors.

Several issues immediately come to mind concerning the North/South relationship. They are similar to those that we have already dealt with concerning the accountability of the decision-making process within that relationship. The existing arrangements leave much to be desired. There may have been a satisfactory working operation in practice, but the DUP requires more than custom and practice: we need a legal requirement for people to act in a certain way in relation to the decisions. Preferably — almost essentially — there must be a requirement for decisions to be agreed before Ministers take part in North/South structures.

Mr Ford's first point was on the implementation bodies. The DUP strongly believes that many were set up solely for a political purpose as part of a process towards a united Ireland. The DUP does not share that goal. Pragmatism should be the governing feature of the North/South relationship. Quite frankly, some of those implementation bodies are not doing a full day's work. They are very much for dress and show. Some of the personnel of those implementation bodies have approached the DUP and indicated how hard it is for them to find sufficient work to do.

There is a drive to increase the number of North/South bodies. The burden of our argument is that the number should be reduced, and that they should exist for real and practical purposes rather than to bolster the political ideology of one section of the community.

However, the DUP wants to have the kind of working relationships that ensure that common interests are pursued through co-operation and on a mutually satisfactory basis, so that people can feel comfortable that they are not being sucked towards a political end and that there are benefits for the community of which they are a part.

Mr O'Dowd: Clearly, the North/South bodies are an important facet of the agreement for the nationalist and republican community; they acknowledge, as Mr Robinson says, the Irish identity of a large section of our society and its wish to work on an all-Ireland basis with its neighbours.

Unionists have often said that they are comfortable with North/South bodies so long as they are practical. We have yet to find any facet of life on this island on which it is not practical to co-operate on an all-Ireland basis. All aspects of life can be covered within the remit of "North/Southism" or "all-Irelandism" — whatever you want to call it.

Clearly, Sinn Féin wants to increase, rather than restrict, the role of the bodies. If people within any of the implementation bodies find their role difficult, or do not have work to do, they are clearly not being motivated properly. They are not being given direction. That is partly due to this establishment being closed; there is no ministerial governance of the process. We must ensure that when the Executive is up and running, all facets of life are governed as efficiently as possible.

Sinn Féin calls for greater co-operation in areas such as community development, arts and heritage, economic co-operation and public investment, for example. With regard to the Review of Public Administration, council structures and community development are clearly areas that could be covered by North/South bodies.

Sinn Féin also wants expansion of the implementation bodies to cover issues such as justice, policing, social economy and energy, to name but a few. The ruling factor for Sinn Féin is practicality. No one has yet identified an area in which it is not practical for the people of the island to work in co-operation with each other.

Dr Farren: I listen with a degree of scepticism to assertions that we should address the whole North/South issue purely on the basis of pragmatism. We are in the business of politics. Whether we like it or not, there will be an ideological underpinning to our actions, attitudes and proposals on all issues. That is our approach, whether we admit it or not.

Therefore, while some people may say that they will only address certain issues because of their pragmatic value, for others the same issues will have much stronger ideological values associated with them. Indeed, a particular ideological outlook motivates those who claim that pragmatism should govern.

10.30 am

I have no trouble acknowledging that the SDLP's views on North/South bodies have always had a particular ideological underpinning, but not in a narrow sense. We want to strengthen relationships on the island because we believe that that will begin to create conditions in which people can be brought ever closer together and, ultimately, will lead to unification. I make no bones about that; I do not believe that I have to apologise for it in any way.

I know that others will be wary that the SDLP has proposed strengthening North/South relations, perhaps because they want things to go in a different direction. Notwithstanding those two opposing, almost exclusive views — though today we cannot see these things in quite the same exclusive way that people several generations ago might have seen them — there is plenty of scope for co-operation and improvement of relations; all of which will contribute to the political stability that we need.

I want to examine a more precise issue: our experience — short though it was — of the North/South aspects of the Good Friday Agreement. There are matters that are worth highlighting as a result of that experience, under several headings. One of the headings I would choose would be “Operational Matters”, and that would comprise the process of nominating Ministers to attend; the responsibilities on Ministers for attendance; the consequences of refusal to attend; and accountability issues, such as accountability before and after meetings.

The claim was often made that there was not enough accountability. I feel that there was quite an amount of accountability. The extent to which matters were dealt with might not always have been to everyone’s satisfaction, but nonetheless every meeting was reported upon to the Assembly, and the Ministers who attended were there to be questioned on what they reported to the Assembly. The Assembly had plenty of scope to discuss North/South matters, and to make its views known on particular issues.

The manner in which the North/South Ministerial Council meetings were conducted would also come under the heading of “Operational Matters”. Having been involved in quite a number of the meetings, I can say that there was an element of pre-cooking of agendas to the point where free-flowing discussion that might have benefited the development of the subject being discussed was absent. Perhaps that was the inevitable consequence of trying to make sure that things moved ahead and that something concrete came out of the meetings, and I certainly endorse that.

Then there are the “Structural Matters” themselves, particularly the provision in the agreement for the establishment of a parliamentary forum — that has already been referred to — and a consultative forum. We need to look at how we could move ahead with the structures of both of those institutions, if I can call them that, so that they enhance the whole set of relationships and help to achieve the objectives set for the North/South dimension of the agreement.

The third heading would be “Areas for Co-operation”, and there are 12 of those. In all agreements similar to the Good Friday Agreement, there is an element of compromise, which is a product of the political discussions that take place. We all recognise that we cannot always get all that we would want. There are areas that the SDLP would have liked to have had included that are not there. We would like to be able to review the list and make sure that it is as comprehensive as possible.

I frequently hear the claim — and I think we discussed it in earlier sessions of the PFG Committee — that the structural bodies are a product of political requirements. That may be true in one sense, but if the test of a body’s usefulness is not always met, practical measures should be applied. If some bodies have shortcomings or have outlived their purpose — and we can convince each other that that is the case — then they should be replaced. If other bodies are required to meet other purposes, then create them. I am prepared to examine the existing bodies using that criterion. However, most of the bodies have been doing a worthwhile job.

There is, of course, the question of the Foyle, Carlingford and Irish Lights Commission. Because of the legislative basis upon which Irish Lights are established, that was not the most appropriate set of functions to have been included among the North/South implementation bodies. Certainly, that gap needs to be filled. There are other areas for which we might well consider the creation of additional bodies.

I caution against Mr Ford’s view that phone calls are enough: they may well be enough to get some things moving, but the benefit of creating formal structures in some areas is that Ministers become more accountable. For instance, Ministers must have clear agendas when they go to the meetings of the North/South Ministerial Council, and they have to account for how they have conducted themselves with respect to those agendas. Suggesting that we promote North/South relations based on the informality of phone calls or other types of contacts does not meet the criteria that I often hear described as being necessary — sometimes from the same people.

The SDLP does not promote North/South co-operation from an exclusive, inward-looking, Irish-only perspective. We have always been foremost in promoting a much wider perspective on relationships within these islands, Europe, in particular, and elsewhere. Therefore, I reject the claim that “North/Southerly” is a product of an inward-looking perspective, and I welcome the discussions that will take place later on how we might develop the British-Irish Council, because I recognise from experience that it has had a weaker and, probably, less effective structure.

In examining those areas, we should ensure that we are aware of what has happened and what is happening. We should get copies of North/South Ministerial Council and British-Irish Council reports to find out what has been happening. In that way, any claims that we make regarding the effectiveness of such bodies will be based on evidence.

Mr McGimpsey: This is an area of ideological division. It is a particularly sensitive issue for unionism because of the 1937 Irish Constitution that contained de Valera's articles 2 and 3 and their legal claim and constitutional imperative in relation to Northern Ireland. Many unionists viewed the IRA as fulfilling the drive of that constitution to bring about a united Ireland. The IRA sought to do that through violent means because it could not persuade a majority of people in Northern Ireland to support its political objective.

For decades, articles 2 and 3 dogged discussions with the Irish Government. At one stage, the Irish Government claimed that articles 2 and 3 did not constitute a legal claim or a constitutional imperative, and were merely aspirational. During the Brooke/Mayhew talks in the early 1990s, unionists brought this important issue to the table, but at that time it was left unresolved.

That issue has now been resolved, in so far as articles 2 and 3 have been converted from a legal claim to an aspiration. The Irish Republic is entitled to that aspiration, whereby it wants a united Ireland by consent, and so forth. By definition, Northern Ireland is no longer part of the Irish Republic. The inhabitants of the island of Ireland are no longer a nation, in the political sense. Dublin and the SDLP have accepted that position, and, most pointedly of all, Sinn Féin has accepted that position. The only way to achieve a united Ireland is for the people of Northern Ireland to vote for it in a referendum.

Once changes had been made to articles 2 and 3, unionists felt that they could proceed with a North/South agenda. Dr Farren and Mr O'Dowd would probably argue that that was a modest step, but it was a major step for unionism. Unionists regarded certain principles and safeguards as being crucial, based on the Belfast Agreement. In strand one, it is stated that:

"The Assembly will exercise full legislative and executive authority ... [it] will be the prime source of authority in respect of all devolved responsibilities ... Executive authority to be discharged on behalf of the Assembly."

There were several checks and balances. Dr Farren has already referred to some of them. For example, a Minister could not attend a North/South Ministerial Council meeting without prior approval from the First Minister, the Deputy First Minister and the Executive Committee. At least one unionist had to be present at all meetings, and he or she could veto any decision. Those were essential checks and balances. Attendees at those meetings had to report back to the Executive Committee.

My party is more than happy to examine ways in which to make the implementation bodies more accountable. That could be done through the Northern Ireland Audit Office, and the UUP has proposed that the financial constraints and safeguards of those bodies should be examined. The chairmen and chief executives of the implementation bodies could also report to the relevant Assembly Committees.

Mr O'Dowd's agenda concerns a greater level of North/South co-operation and an increase in the number of implementation bodies. There is a whole raft of stuff in the comprehensive agreement about efficiency and value for money. At present, my party does not agree with the case for the creation of additional bodies. In addition, my party would have some difficulty with the idea of a North/South parliamentary forum or a North/South consultative forum. However, we worked in the existing North/South bodies as best we could, and we worked as equals. They were there for our mutual benefit.

Mr Robinson said that some of those bodies were not doing a full day's work.

10.45 am

Mr P Robinson: Neither are we at the moment.

Mr McGimpsey: Indeed.

We can certainly consider how to make those bodies more robust. That was our approach then, and it remains our approach now. We have no problem with Assembly scrutiny.

Dr Farren mentioned the Foyle, Carlingford and Irish Lights Commission and operational efficiency. Six implementation bodies were set up and six areas of co-operation were identified; we should first try to get those right before discussing the establishment of additional bodies and the practicalities of identifying further areas of co-operation.

The key, of course, is the interdependency of the institutions. It is also essential that the British-Irish Council operate as energetically as did the North/South Ministerial Council. The big problem with the British-Irish Council was primarily inefficiency in London, not in any of the regional Assemblies or in Belfast. That needs to be examined.

Mr Campbell: Mr McGimpsey has mentioned the problems with the strand two issues. How they manifest themselves — and how the outworking of any proposals are viewed by the various communities — are central and acute concerns. The demographics of the past 30 years show that the terror campaign has been the principal — though not exclusive — reason for unionists drifting away from the border areas.

That is not to say that unionists who live in border areas are any better disposed towards “North/Southerly” than those who live far from the border. As the unionist MP who lives closest to the border, I am not exactly in favour of creating North/South links just for the sake of it.

As unionist communities have moved further away from the border in the past 35 years, in many respects they do not consider that North/South issues will directly affect or benefit them. That is an unfortunate reality, but a reality nonetheless, which has been brought about principally because of the IRA terror campaign. I have not heard anyone say that that is likely to be reversed in the next decade or so, so we must deal with the issue.

Some four years ago in my neck of the woods, a tourist campaign was launched to promote the new ferry crossing between Magilligan in County Londonderry, which is in my constituency, and Greencastle in County Donegal. It has been a fantastic success, with four or five times the number of vehicles using the service than was originally envisaged. However, the irony is that the reason for its popularity is the change in fuel duties — people are using it mainly because of the cheaper fuel available in the Republic.

That is the irony. There is greater North/South co-operation precisely because there are two countries on this island. If there were not, there would be nothing like that degree of support for a ferry service. I just picked that one out, and I am sure that there are other examples.

Dr Farren said that he looks forward to moving on to strand three — we do too. On almost every occasion there will be, unfortunately, an issue about “North/Southerly”, which unionist eyes will view as having a political slant. It was a fault in the previous system. With Northern Ireland’s de facto position in the UK and its relationships with the Republic and with the rest of the UK, unionism will be looking for a similar degree of co-operation, business links, intensity and practicality of co-operation in all areas, whether it be transport, tourism, marine, heritage, or sporting issues.

Part of the problem was that, even though neither Mr Robinson nor I, nor any of our Ministers, was involved in North/South meetings, we were able to put down questions shortly afterwards to discover the degree of imbalance that existed — the weight of business on North/South issues was many times more than in relation to east-west issues. That clearly is untenable. It is not the case that for every North/South meeting there must be an east-west meeting, but there has to be a balance with regard to the intensity of interest and the degree of business that is undertaken in strands two and three.

That is our approach. I think Mr Robinson mentioned efficiency. We will not put forward areas of efficiency in relation to strand one without applying the same criteria, principles, logic, and reasoning to strand two. If bureaucracy can be cut back in relation to the internal workings of Northern Ireland, it can certainly be cut back in relation to the workings between Northern Ireland and the Republic, and between Northern Ireland and the rest of the UK. It cuts every way. If we are going to try to curtail Government, we will not do it only in the Assembly or through the Review of Public Administration. It has to be much more widespread than that.

Mr O’Dowd: First, I want to refer to Mr McGimpsey’s comment — and I think I am quoting him directly — that Sinn Féin has accepted that the Irish nation, in a political sense, no longer exists. Apart from the obvious difficulty of partition, I do not agree with that statement, and I am surprised that Mr McGimpsey thinks that that would be a Sinn Féin belief. Sinn Féin campaigned vigorously against the removal of articles 2 and 3. We saw those as important, even though no Irish Government had ever implemented them to protect the rights of an individual nationalist or the nationalist community in the North. However, their removal was voted on, and they are no longer part of the Irish Constitution.

Secondly, in relation to unionist misgivings around North/South co-operation or “all-Irelandism”, reading the Hansard report of the economic subgroup, which meets on Tuesdays and Thursdays, shows that the unionist business community, for instance, has embraced cross-border activity and has moved it forward. Indeed, its members are leading lights in it, have seen the opportunities for increasing business on an all-Ireland basis, and have used those opportunities very well. The unionist business community has not seen it as a problem. I accept, however, that it is a difficult matter for political unionism.

I return to the issue of practicality. No one has yet identified an area of existing, or future, co-operation that would be impractical on a cross-border basis. As Mr Campbell said, if we ask for one thing, then inevitably unionism will ask for something in terms of east-west co-operation with Britain. If it is of a practical nature, Sinn Féin will not stand in the way. We will examine its practical value and say: “Yes, if that makes sense then let us do that.”

Clearly, political ideology is a factor for republicans, as it is for unionists. We see North/South co-operation as one part of going down the road to a reunified state, but again, as Dr Farren said, there is no need to apologise for that or to hide our light under a bushel. That is part of our agenda; we have never denied that.

Does it make sense to run two health services back-to-back on an island of five million people? No, it does not. Does it make sense to run two education services back-to-back on an island of five million people? No, it does not. Does it make sense that the work of civil servants in Dublin or Belfast on transport or spatial planning stops at the border? It makes no sense whatsoever.

In respect of efficiency, if Departments worked more closely together it would save the island as a whole millions of pounds a year, which could be reinvested in services. The practical benefits of co-operation and all-Ireland activity are there to be seen. They have been grasped, as I said at the beginning, by the unionist business community.

Mr P Robinson: If sharing a piece of turf makes so much more sense when everyone belongs to one country, I would suggest that it does not look too good for the future of Portugal, Luxembourg and a number of other countries. Indeed, thousands of peoples around the world would find themselves absorbed in those circumstances.

I find refreshing, at least, the honesty from both of the nationalist parties that their views on North/South issues are underpinned by the ideology that they share. To some extent, therefore, it is clear that for them — whatever the reasons of practical benefit, co-operation, mutual understanding and common interest they may put forward — the real underlying issue is political: they want to advance their political goal of a united Ireland.

The same honesty comes from unionists: that is the reason that there is resistance to this. If the reasons were practical, they could be justified and people would not be concerned. Mr O'Dowd says that the business community does not have these difficulties. The business community does not have difficulties in doing business with Russia, Iraq or Iran, but that does not mean that, politically, we should join up with any of them; nor should there be institutions of a political nature to assist in that.

The references in the comprehensive agreement, which Mr McGimpsey mentioned, are actually contradictory. One talks about the efficiency of the implementation bodies, and the other talks about their expansion. Very clearly, unionists are saying that there should be fewer and nationalists are saying that there should be more. Dr Farren seems to have a block on this matter — he said that there might not be a day's work for some people, and that if the implementation bodies were not doing the job they should be replaced. If they are not doing the job, the answer is to remove them. Why would you need another body? That does not give you an argument for having another body — if they are not doing the job, then they are not needed. The political view is that they are there for a purpose and their number cannot be reduced. Even if there is no practical reason for them to be there, they have to be replaced with something else just for the sake of being replaced. On efficiency grounds, that could not be justified. It could be justified only on political grounds, and no unionist is going to attempt to justify it on that basis.

Like Mr Campbell I think that, from a unionist perspective, there should be a very significant dynamic on the east-west front, and it will have to be beefed up and have more emphasis put on it. I suggest that we take up Dr Farren's proposal.

I want to see the reports and minutes of all the formal meetings, both North/South and east-west. That would give us some idea of the scope and nature of the work. I am sure that similar reports exist on the implementation bodies' work, and it might be worth seeing just how much work they did.

11.00 am

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will take that as a formal proposal and return to it later to see whether we can reach consensus — unless you are willing to second that proposal, Dr Farren?

Dr Farren: I might do that.

Mr P Robinson: I was seconding his proposal.

[Laughter.]

Mr McNarry: Rather than interfere with cross-community enterprise, I will not second it; I will leave that to Seán.

Dr Farren: I proposed it first, actually.

Mr McNarry: I suggest that we try to reach consensus on that proposal as it would be useful to have an analysis and summary of those reports.

I am rather taken with John O'Dowd's reference to the unionist business community. Republicans have a way of filtering unionism into phrases — they now talk about "unionist paramilitaries" as well. Surely it must be accepted that the Northern Ireland business community has long embraced doing business across the border. The major change has been the reception in the Republic; people there are now willing to do business with people in Northern Ireland.

However, unionist businessmen feel discriminated against by republican businesses; I will put that another way — by businesses domiciled in the Republic of Ireland. Businessmen here will say that that situation continues. Perhaps we all can deal with that issue; after all, it is business, and, as has probably been mentioned, where opportunities exist to do business, they will be taken. It is two-way traffic. The figures also show that Northern Ireland is doing remarkably well; the traffic is flowing better in our direction than it is in the other direction.

We should not become terribly set on the idea of a unionist business community. Is there a nationalist business community? Is there a republican business community? Such terms are divisive. There is only a Northern Ireland business community. Although people are entitled to their own individual political views, representatives of the business community do not present themselves as anything other than representatives of a business alliance or whatever. Therefore, I would not put much stock in John O'Dowd's comment; there is not really a unionist business community in Northern Ireland. That term can misrepresent unionists who are to the fore in business and who would work with anybody.

Finally, mention has been made of the RPA. I apologise for being late this morning, and this point may have been mentioned already. Unionists are concerned that the outworkings of the RPA will open the door to North/South bodies being formed by "super councils" along the border areas. The Northern Ireland Assembly would have to keep a check on that situation, should it develop. Indeed, the entire remit of the North/South bodies should perhaps be a matter for the Assembly at some stage.

Unionists see dangers in the greening of border areas.

Mr Campbell: On a point of information, that was dealt with at Friday's meeting of this Committee. I raised that very issue with Patricia Lewsley, who represented the SDLP. There did not appear to be any resistance to my proposition that the concern of nationalists about the RPA in relation to power sharing within the councils was matched by the equal concern of unionists concerning "North/Southery". She accepted, I presume on behalf of the SDLP, that one concern was no bigger an obstacle than the other.

Mr McNarry: I appreciate that information, Gregory. I have not had time to read Hansard and was not here on Friday, so your point is well made.

Mr P Robinson: I have a further point of information. At another level in local government, the Department of the Environment has set up a Local Government Reform Taskforce, which comprises a political panel, a working group and nine subgroups. The governance subgroup, which has been considering how decisions would be taken, also has proposals to deal with the kind of issue that David raised. That is not to say that the Government will accept those proposals, but all parties generally agreed them.

Mr McNarry: I find that comforting as well, so I appreciate that point of information.

I am glad that the concerns surrounding "North/Southery" have been aired. It is a sensitive subject for unionists, and therefore I am sure that members will appreciate my raising it again on behalf of the Ulster Unionists. However, I also raised the issue in response to what John O'Dowd said. He talked, rather flippantly in my opinion, about whether there is a need for an education authority in Northern Ireland and one in Southern Ireland, and whether Northern Ireland needed a health board and this, that and the other. He said that surely those could be combined.

Given the uncertain future, unionists fear what will happen if the Assembly is not restored. If Northern Ireland is left to the devices of that type of opinion that holds sway and is the majority opinion in the border areas, what effect would that have on our education and health services here?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Before I go to Dr Farren, Mr Ford and O'Dowd, there seems to be consensus on the request for information. I do not know whether Mr Robinson or Dr Farren made that request.

Mr Ford: I think that it was a joint request: give them both credit.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The request was that we seek further information on the work of the implementation bodies. I do not know how much is involved in that. Either Mr McGimpsey or Mr McNarry had the idea that we request a summary that may be useful while the researchers carry out further work. Is there consensus that we request information on the work of the implementation bodies?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): OK. Having achieved our first consensus of the morning, let us move on to Dr Farren.

Mr Campbell: Perhaps we will get carried away now.

Dr Farren: First, I feel that I am in a state of déjà vu. Perhaps it is inevitable, but some of the remarks being made around the table have the flavour of the discussions that preceded the agreement in 1998. Some of the fears and apprehensions about North/South relationships are again being reflected, although perhaps in a milder tone than they were then.

Perhaps due to the DUP's absence from the Executive and from the final stages of those negotiations, some of the subtleties and flavour of the general thrust of North/South matters is absent from its experience and therefore from its thinking on those issues. However much we engage in revisiting earlier discussions, if it helps to allay fears and apprehensions, that would be a helpful outcome.

We must address the more practical lessons that can be learned from the experience. I have attempted to outline what I believe those to be. I am not going to repeat them.

The agreement settled the constitutional issues and created a fixed framework in which we were to operate for the foreseeable future. I only attended North/South Ministerial Council meetings as a kind of supporting Minister. Mr McGimpsey was in the lead on inland waterways and the languages body; Reg Empey was the lead Minister on cross-border trade and enterprise. InterTradeIreland now has responsibility for those issues. With regard to the fears and apprehensions that have been mentioned, my experience — I am not sure whether Mr McGimpsey would back me up — was that my unionist colleagues were at ease in those meetings. Indeed, there was an appetite for more rather than less.

At one meeting we dealt with InterTradeIreland's setting up of programmes for information exchange and the development of co-operation in marketing, which would involve graduates from both sides of the border working with businesses in the North and in the South. Those programmes continue to provide expertise to small and medium-sized businesses, in particular, that could not otherwise afford it. I cannot remember the precise figure that was initially proposed. For illustration purposes, let us say that the suggestion was that there should be 20 participants in each of the programmes. Ministers had no difficulty in saying: "That figure is far too modest to achieve anything in the short term. Why not double it?" That was achieved. There was no threat. The programmes were recognised to be of mutual benefit to businesses on both sides of the border. The new scale was considered to be far more appropriate than that originally suggested by the civil servants. Significant progress was achieved. The programmes continue to flourish.

Since I had more involvement with that implementation body than any of the others, I was able to witness its growth during the short period in which the North/South Ministerial Council was in operation. The business world in both parts of the country responded enthusiastically. Trade shows were mounted North and South. Work was done to help companies on both sides of the border to tender for contracts. People say that some of that could happen spontaneously; it was not happening. Companies were not becoming involved in the procurement process on the opposite side of the border, which they are now. They are trading with each other much more. Networks are being created that are bringing companies, north and south, together for joint enterprises overseas.

Surprisingly, some of today's remarks have suggested that those who are most critical of the bodies have not read the evidence that they have produced over the years. That is implied in some of the comments that have accompanied the requests that those reports be made available to us. I am happy to see whatever information can be made available — whatever has already been published, and more about the way that the bodies operate, the scope of their work, and indeed other areas of co-operation — brought to the Committee, so that we will be better informed to make appropriate plans for the future.

Finally, I want to comment on Mr Campbell's proposal that every North/South plan must be accompanied by an equal and parallel east-west plan. I would have thought that if it was to the benefit of his constituents for co-operation between Altnagelvin and Letterkenny General Hospital, for example, to be enhanced, it should not have to await some form of co-operation between a hospital here and a hospital in Scotland in order to demonstrate that the North/South development was being accompanied by an equal and parallel east-west approach. That would be nonsensical.

11.15 am

I agree that there is, of course, an ideological thrust — in the sense that I have attempted to illustrate — to North/South aspirations, as there is to east-west aspirations. Is the DUP prepared to accept that the yardstick of practicality and "mutual benefit" to communities North and South — those are the words that are used in the Good Friday Agreement — can be applied equally to east-west matters? The party that prides itself on its pragmatism must learn to adhere to its own principles.

Mr Ford: I want to respond to the criticism that I received from Dr Farren earlier. The Alliance Party has always recognised the political significance for nationalists of North/South co-operation. However, that does not contradict the notion that the specific structures under which co-operation takes place should be based on the need of particular areas. In many cases, informality may be a better approach.

I said that there might be a case for further implementation bodies. The arbitrary number of six should be regarded as just that: it was arrived at during the last few hours of the negotiations that led to the Good Friday Agreement. We should not be bound by it in future. While the SDLP might wish to stick to every dot and comma of the Good Friday Agreement and have precisely six implementation bodies, that is not the view of my party.

Take the issue of tourism. In the colour supplements of London's Saturday broadsheets — or what used to be broadsheets — you can see the advertising that is being done to promote this island. One week, it might be Cork and Kerry. The next week, in a similar style, it will tell us the benefits of coming to Belfast for a stag weekend. Clearly, the practical reality for most people outside the island, except those who have close family relationships here, is that we are one tourist market. That sort of work must be encouraged. The structures that exist are doing a reasonable job. However, we would need to examine detailed figures over a number of years in order to fully assess its value.

My illustration of the response to foot-and-mouth disease was to show that most cross-border co-operation is informal and does not work through specific implementation bodies. We should not restrict that co-operation by the imposition of new bodies; we should seek to encourage it in whatever form it takes. The focus should be on practical outcomes and outworking. If nationalists see the practical outworkings of cross-border co-operation to be much better than each end of the island merely doing its own thing, then that should be the bonus to nationalists, not the setting up of institutions without there being any certainty that they will be beneficial.

The unionist references to the British-Irish Council have been interesting. It parallels a discussion that we have had in the economic subgroup on the relative size of the public and private sectors in Northern Ireland. The issue is not whether there is too much North/South co-operation, but whether there is too little British-Irish co-operation and a need to build up the structures to maximise the benefits of that. Undoubtedly, the island is too small to deal with many of the matters that have been discussed.

We must work to achieve a balance between those areas. Mention has been made of the RPA and the greening across the border. If co-operation is to be developed between Altnagelvin Hospital and Letterkenny General Hospital — that is east-west rather than North/South co-operation — we should also examine the benefits of, for instance, cross-border A&E services, where there are real needs. In the past, the Alliance Party has asked for an examination of issues such as specialist training at the higher levels of psychiatry where, at either end of the island, the market is inadequate for that discipline to stand on its own. We need to build up those institutions together. East-west co-operation must also be considered in that regard.

The needs of people living in particular areas must be examined, and if that shows that people in Sligo, Monaghan and Fermanagh should avail of the same A&E services, North/South co-operation in that regard will benefit people from all those areas. However, that does not require an all-Ireland health body; it requires co-operation between the existing institutions.

Mr O'Dowd: I am not sure about David's last point. There is a political, rather than a practical, argument against setting up an all-Ireland health body. David used the example of co-operation between Health Departments that I intended to use. When we talk about all-Ireland healthcare, we really mean planning health on an all-Ireland basis. It has taken many years for the two Departments to co-operate to set up a cross-border GP service. Many obstacles have been thrown in the way, and only now are we seeing some practical movement. If there had been ministerial co-operation on that matter, the cross-border service might have been in place many years ago, benefiting the people living in those areas.

The island of Ireland has a population of 5.5 million, and a population of that size can be serviced by one children's cardiology consultant: the recognised ratio is one consultant to 5 million people. Therefore, there could be effective co-operation in that area.

EU legislation instructs councils on different sides of a border — for instance, in Luxembourg, Germany or Holland — to work closely together. The biggest difficulty facing councils on this island is waste management. Councils in the Six Counties should work together — as they do with the Southern Waste Management Partnership and arc21 — and on a cross-border basis to deal with waste management. I seriously doubt that any unionist ratepayer would object to their bin being lifted by a particular council worker because the rubbish may end up in a plant in Monaghan. Likewise, ratepayers in Monaghan would not object to their rubbish being treated in a unionist council plant. No one — regardless of his or her political opinion — would object to practical measures that would save the ratepayer and the council money and which would allow money to be invested elsewhere.

Mr McGimpsey: As Seán Farren says, there is an element of déjà vu about this; it is something of a Pandora's box. I was not involved in any of the discussions on the agreement, but it was clear that nationalism required some recognition of its Irishness in the form of North/South co-operation and that unionism required Stormont and the British-Irish Council, which reflects the common polity that is the British Isles. That is where the deal fell: if unionists tried to boycott the North/South bodies, that would have an effect on Stormont; and if nationalists did the same with Stormont, that would affect the North/South Ministerial Council. In other words, the institutions were interdependent.

There is a fine balance, and we have ended up with six implementation bodies and six co-operation areas. They worked well, and we progressed on the basis of doing practical business for the mutual benefit of everyone on both sides of the border. That was what the North/South Ministerial Council was about, and members worked by unanimous agreement.

There was an element of pre-cooking the agendas, because things were sorted out before we got down to the formal business of having the North/South Ministerial Council meeting. The North/South bodies are currently being kept on a care-and-maintenance basis because Stormont is in cold storage. If Stormont is not restored, the deal is that those North/South bodies fall and the staff go back to their parent Departments.

The British-Irish Council, in purely practical terms, suffered from the lack of a secretariat. It was not due to a lack of will; the regional Assemblies were very keen on the British-Irish Council, but the slowness of the secretariat support hurt us badly. That needs to be brought up to a much more robust standard.

There is a deal there; we could start tinkering with it and pulling it apart but, for the sake of practical politics, making it work as it stands is more important, as David Ford and John O'Dowd said, than thinking about extra elements, because there will not be agreement. We have to try to make the deal work and if we cannot do that, we are not going anywhere at all.

I am intrigued by John's constant referral to unionist businessmen. If somebody comes in to sell you a car or a van how do you know he is a unionist?

Mr McNarry: They know every unionist in the country.

Mr O'Dowd: I will come back to you on that point if you so wish.

Mr McGimpsey: Business is business. I was in business all my life; it is all about turning a profit. I presume that John meant that there are Protestants who will sell to anybody. Businessmen will cross borders; of course they will. John talks about an island of five million people; we think in terms of a Kingdom of 60 million people, and business does the same. Why stop there when you have got a European community of over 400 million people? That is the way business approaches it.

There has always been business activity between North and South, and good luck to everybody engaged in it. However, there is bigger business to be done with the mainland and, ultimately, much more business to be done in Europe and further afield. It intrigues me when John talks about business because every year, for example, the Chancellor sends us a cheque to the tune of about £11 billion and Sinn Féin are dedicated to stopping the cheque. That has always been one of the queries I have had about North/South co-operation, "Ourselves Alone", and the idea that the Chancellor can keep his cheque. What would we do without the £11 billion? That gets us into a whole different area.

We have six implementation bodies and six co-operation bodies. They were working well for practical benefits and they threatened no one. That is where the deal stands; trying to expand them is not going to take us anywhere.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I want to bring PJ in here. We have given this —

Mr P Robinson: You do not have my name down. I put my hand up about 10 minutes ago.

Mr O'Dowd: I would also like to respond to a few points made by Michael.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I am going to call it a day at that. We have given it a good airing and I do not detect much in the way of a proposal.

Mr Campbell: I thought you were going to say that you did not detect a consensus there.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Well, it was not too acrimonious, but there does not seem to be any suggestion as to how to take this forward, and far be it for me to try to suggest one. Therefore, after Mr P J Bradley, Mr P Robinson and Mr O'Dowd have spoken, I will say that we have had a discussion on this. If a proposal was forthcoming I would be very pleased to see it in order to bring this discussion to a conclusion.

Mr P J Bradley: Perhaps I will get some consensus on behalf of the farming community. We have talked about health, education and business right around the table but agriculture on an all-island basis was not really touched on. An all-island agricultural programme can easily be defended by all sections of the North/South arrangements, especially in animal health and the important issue of marketing. Unionist fears would be set aside if the farming community were given an opportunity to recover and to see their farms leading the way again as the largest industry in the North, which it had been for generations.

11.30 am

In agricultural terms, we pay a high price for our attachment to the UK. For example, since the ban on live exports was lifted, Dutch, French and Italian buyers are now in every sales yard in the Republic of Ireland where cattle can be purchased, but they are not coming North. One wonders why they do not come North, where prices are lower. The UK baggage that is attached to stock in the North means that farmers here do not attract European buyers. That is why no farmer would resent a policy that joined up the marketing of all-island products but kept the politics of North and South separate.

I am conscious that when making a political speech there is a suspicion of some hidden agenda. I have no such agenda: I speak for the benefit of farmers North and South, and particularly in the North where I live and work. They would welcome the extra £100-per-animal profit from an all-island marketing programme.

Mr Campbell: I follow the logic of your argument. However, do you accept that if positions were reversed in the future, and farmers in the Republic found that UK prices were better, they would want to rejoin the UK?

Mr P J Bradley: Not necessarily. Unlike here, farmers in the Republic can turn to their Government. Even now, they are saying to the Government that the price that they are receiving is too low. The North does not have a Minister of Agriculture.

Mr Campbell: I thought that your point was that there would not be much resistance to joint marketing because farmers in the North would see the benefit of a higher pricing structure in the Republic, whose connection with the EU is better for sales and export. If your proposals were totally reversed, would that not result in a political reverse? Would farmers in the Republic see the sense in, and possibilities offered by, rejoining the UK for precisely the same reason?

Mr P J Bradley: Try to think like a farmer, who would probably look to wherever the profits are highest. The name of the game is that farmers need profits. Again, I point to the ability of farmers in the Republic to turn to their Government for assistance: farmers here cannot do that. Mr Campbell will be aware that the UK does not even have a Minister of Agriculture — it has a Minister for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs.

Dr Farren: Mr Campbell has extrapolated way beyond Mr Bradley's argument. Why is Irish linen that is manufactured in Northern Ireland marketed abroad as Irish linen? Does that cause a problem to members of the DUP?

Mr Campbell: That has been the case for over 100 years.

Dr Farren: I know, but there is some benefit in marketing.

Mr Campbell: It has been happening since before 1920.

Dr Farren: The events of 1922 did not change the way in which linen manufactured in Northern Ireland was marketed abroad.

Mr P Robinson: The Republic does not have ownership of Irish linen. It was around before the Republic removed itself from the United Kingdom. Why should the Irish Republic have ownership?

Dr Farren: Linen is generic; it is not a specific brand.

Mr P J Bradley: Members of the Agriculture and Rural Development Committee always agreed on animal health issues. Animal health was never seen as a political issue and was a prime example of the co-operation that was demanded across the frontier. Importantly, neither animals nor diseases knew about the border. I consider marketing in the same way.

Mr P Robinson: I want to deal first with Dr Farren's patronising claim to be experiencing a feeling of déjà vu. He said that he had heard all the arguments before; that perhaps because the DUP was not part of previous negotiations, it needed to be brought up to speed; and that if doing so helped to allay fears it might be worth it.

Let me tell him, I have heard no argument in this room today that I have not heard many times before — there is nothing new under the sun. Sinn Féin has advanced no new argument today that it has not already advanced publicly. Indeed, the party would not be doing its duty if it had not publicly put forward the arguments that it is privately putting forward today. Therefore, there is nothing new, no new nuance. The DUP has heard it all before.

As for allaying unionist fears, he has given an honest interpretation of his party's views. His remark that his party's attitude to "North/Southery" is effectively underpinned by ideology leading to unification will be in Hansard. Those are his words. How will that allay the fears of unionists? It alerts unionists to the real purpose and intent of "North/Southery". Mr McGimpsey is right; there is no scope for extending the nationalist community's ideology, even if it is under the pretence that there is a pragmatic reason for doing so.

Dr Farren attempted to build straw men with his attack on Mr Campbell. Mr Campbell did not advance the proposal of point-for-point balance on North/South and east-west issues — indeed, he specifically said that it was not realistic to expect that. It is fairly clear that the DUP is warning that the effort and enthusiasm of unionism towards practical North/South co-operation will be commensurate with the effort and enthusiasm of nationalists towards east-west co-operation. Identity issues should be considered on that basis. Just as Dr Farren indicates his political intent that "North/Southery" might be a move towards the goal of unification, I hope that at some stage the people in the Republic will have the good sense to return to the fold as part of the United Kingdom. It would make a lot of sense. After all, based on Sinn Féin's argument, it must make sense for a small group of islands to be part of one political unit.

Mr O'Dowd: By the same logic, one could argue that the Republic should take over the whole group of islands and become one massive united Ireland. It does not really make sense in practical terms. However, I take the comment in the humour in which it was made.

Mr McGimpsey and Mr McNarry have come back at me about the term "unionist business community". One would think that I was the first person to come up with the term. I do not consider it to be an insulting term, and I hope that my use of it has not been taken in that way. Mr McGimpsey and Mr McNarry cannot seriously be telling me that they have never heard it before.

The Ulster Unionist Party was built by unionist businessmen — and I deliberately use the word “men” — so it is not the first time that the phrase has been used. There is a unionist business sector, just as there is a nationalist business sector, but they do not compete against each other. Wherever there is a political philosophy, whether it is that of the British Labour Party, the Conservative Party, Fine Gael, Fianna Fáil or whatever, there is always a business sector floating about behind it. That is nothing new, and it is certainly not something to get flabbergasted about.

It is not true to say, as Mr McGimpsey did earlier, that if the DUP decides to take the Assembly down before or after 24 November, the North/South bodies will go into cold storage. They will not. The Good Friday Agreement recognises that it is best for the bodies to be interdependent. However, Sinn Féin will argue strongly with the two Governments that even if one political party chooses to veto the Assembly, the rest of the agreement should still move on — and that will include all aspects of “North/Southerly”. No civil servants will be traveling back to their former Departments. In fact, more civil servants will be moving into that field of work. If the DUP chooses to bring down the Assembly, the rest of the agreement will not go with it.

As for Mr Ford’s comments about the number of North/South implementation bodies, there are mandates for at least six bodies, as the Good Friday Agreement allows for the setting up of at least six bodies to work on areas of co-operation. Therefore, there is room for expansion.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We have had a full and frank discussion on the issue. Mr Robinson said there was nothing new under the sun, and I suspect that we could agree on that. Is there any way of moving this forward, or will we just simply leave it? I am thinking of the dilemma that the report-writers will face. This is a very important issue.

Mr McGimpsey: Did we not previously agree that the chairpersons and chief executive officers of the North/South bodies would be subject to Assembly scrutiny Committees?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We did. However, today we are discussing the number of bodies and their roles, and we are clearly not going to reach agreement on that.

Are members content that, notwithstanding the lack of agreement, we should request the extra material? We have no idea of the quantity involved; it may be colossal.

Mr P Robinson: If it turns out to be a colossal amount, a summary would be sufficient.

The Committee Clerk: We are looking at the websites to see what is available. There are joint communiqués from every meeting, which are just like the minutes of this Committee. However, we can find nothing that tells us how they worked or how matters were discussed. We are trying to work out the best way to present the information to members.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There must have been minutes of every meeting.

Dr Farren: Yes, there were.

The Committee Clerk: There were annual reports as well.

Mr Campbell: Some minutes may have been shorter than others.

Dr Farren: The implementation bodies and the North/South Ministerial Council published annual reports, and they are still available. We would not need each year’s report; the most recent one would give us a flavour of what is happening now, if that is what members feel is necessary.

In addition to the areas of co-operation, I spoke about institutional matters under three headings; operational matters, structural matters and the areas of co-operation. I said that there were issues arising out of our experience that would need to be addressed. Are they not part of our agenda?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We can discuss those issues. That is not a problem. The commitment has been given that if anybody raises related issues they will be dealt with.

Mr P Robinson: Presumably Dr Farren will want to talk about the efficiency of reducing the number of implementation bodies as well?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I am absolutely certain that the DUP group does.

Dr Farren: Whatever the outcome is, I presume that the DUP will prejudice it.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Has the issue been aired adequately, or do members want to speak on it? I got the impression during the various contributions that that point was well made.

Mr P Robinson: The whole issue has been sufficiently aired.

Mr Campbell: It would be difficult to say that this issue has not had sufficient airing this morning.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That would be my view, but I have to take the view of the members. I propose that we move on to discuss the North/South Ministerial Council, unless anyone has any objections.

Mr P Robinson: My view is the same as Mr McGimpsey’s. If Sinn Féin brings down the Assembly by not ending its paramilitary and criminal activity, then clearly the implementation bodies and “North/Southerly” will come to a standstill. It would be absurd to suggest that one part of the agreement can move ahead without the other. An agreement is an agreement among all of the signatory parties, and if the Ulster Unionist Party, a signatory party, has not signed up to the element that Sinn Féin is suggesting, then it is not an agreement.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are there any proposals?

Dr Farren: I want to make a final comment on the matter. The responsibility for taking matters forward would fall to the two Governments. They have made it clear that they are prepared to accept that responsibility, and that they will deal with North/South arrangements as well as other matters. It is not for us to dictate to them. We may want to air our views on what they should or should not do, but they have made it clear that North/South matters will move ahead. There will be a momentum maintained, and developments are not going to be artificially constrained by our views on these matters.

Mr Campbell: Of course, should things happen as Dr Farren suggests, opposition from the unionist community is guaranteed.

Dr Farren: Well, it is up to the Government. It depends on what happens, of course, and on whether or not you make the judgment that those things are not in your best interest. I am just saying that the responsibility will fall to the two Governments; it is not for us to dictate. No doubt we will have our views on what they should and should not do.

11.45 am

Mr P Robinson: But you are wrong, Seán — you cannot argue that. Responsibility falls to the Government of the United Kingdom as to what they do in Northern Ireland. They can operate themselves by the decisions that they take, but they cannot decide to take an agreement that does not exist, somehow skew it, and then have a meeting that they did not originally intend to have. They can take a new decision that there should be some arrangement, but they cannot unilaterally take a decision that was multilaterally agreed and then tell us what is going to happen.

Dr Farren: I will not speculate as to how the two Governments will operate. However, they have a responsibility, and they have made it clear that they will exercise that responsibility and maintain a momentum in North/South relationships, because they believe that that is necessary for the greater good.

Mr P Robinson: Except that that is absurd.

Dr Farren: Pardon me?

Mr P Robinson: East and west Governments cannot produce momentum on a North/South basis.

Dr Farren: That is not part of today’s argument.

Mr O’Dowd: None of this should come as a surprise to the DUP. The comments of the two Governments were made public months ago. With regard to the opposition from unionism, any political body has the right to oppose, so long as it is done in a peaceful and democratic manner and not that of the UVF. [Laughter.]

Mr McGimpsey: Chairman, the deal is clear. Strands one, two and three are interdependent and interlocking, and without one the other two fall. That is made clear in strand two, paragraph 13 of the Belfast Agreement.

There is no point in asking “what if?” The British Government have said a number of things over recent years — some of them have been kosher and some have not. It may be that they are giving certain guarantees in some directions that they are not giving in others; I do not know what is going on. I hear Mr Hain talking, but he is merely making statements.

Mr O’Dowd: Can I assure you that —

Mr McGimpsey: The agreement is clear. It cannot be argued that if Sinn Féin busts the Assembly it will still get its North/South bodies, because that “ain’t gonna happen”. It is not the deal. I believe that neither the British nor Irish Governments are looking to push that through.

Mr O’Dowd: Sinn Féin has no attention of busting the Assembly. Our plan A is the implementation of the Good Friday Agreement, including the Assembly. With regard to assurances from the British Government, we do not accept those unless they are written down and implemented.

Mr P Robinson: May I reassure everyone that I do not envisage that the unionist community’s opposition and reaction will be anything other than the peaceful kind that Sinn Féin has advised us we should take. The unionist community would find it difficult to take a lecture from Sinn Féin about acting peacefully and within the law.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr McNarry will speak next and, in the absence of any proposals, I will then move to the next item on the agenda.

Mr McNarry: Comments about the interlocking aspects of the strands have been well made, and they should be considered. Sinn Féin has said that its intentions are clear, but it would be great to hear its representatives say that they intend to help the rest of us to put a devolved democracy back in place. That is absent from their argument.

Mr O’Dowd: You have not been listening.

Mr McNarry: I have listened to what you have said in this past five minutes.

Mr O'Dowd: Sinn Féin's plan A is to fully implement the Good Friday Agreement, including the Assembly. What is not clear about that?

Mr McNarry: You did not participate when the rest of us were attempting to work through plan A.

Mr O'Dowd: That is your opinion.

Mr McNarry: Everybody's opinion is worth something here.

Mr O'Dowd: Correct.

Mr McNarry: Unfortunately, you dismiss everyone else's opinion except your own: that is how you operate.

I cannot go along with the idea that if we cannot reach agreement, the responsibility for the North/South bodies will be handed over. It has been made clear that that will not happen. I hope that progress will be made by this Committee working through the remit of making preparations for Government.

On hearing some of Sinn Féin's rhetoric in discussions such as this, it is clear that we must also prepare ourselves for not being in Government. That possibility must be aired at this table, because leadership will be required and may need to be shown in the future.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That is the end of the discussion on the North/South implementation bodies. Some of the discussion will be relevant to our next subject, which is the North/South Ministerial Council (NSMC), and some of the principles that have been articulated will also apply.

The usual format will apply: each party will make a short contribution. I am extremely grateful to those who have been so succinct throughout the last two months, and I hope that that trend will continue.

Mr Ford: Does that include me?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Alliance Party has always been very brief. Contributions will be made in alphabetical order, so Mr Ford will lead off.

Mr Ford: In my opening remarks this morning, I made some reference to the Alliance Party's view on the NSMC. Therefore, I will confine myself now to making a suggestion for consideration, and perhaps a formal proposal.

I am interested in hearing responses to the suggestion that the Alliance Party made in the Chamber on establishing the North/South parliamentary tier, although there may not be unanimity on that today.

On a more serious point, the Alliance Party's formal proposal is that the annual report of the NSMC should not be in the form of a document. A formal report should be presented in the Assembly and in the Oireachtas by the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, the Taoiseach and the Tánaiste. There is considerable merit in opening up the general operation of the NSMC, rather than individual aspects of it. I want to put that forward as a proposal and hear responses from other parties.

Mr Campbell: As you rightly indicated, Mr Chairman, there is quite an overlap between our previous discussion and this one.

Mr P Robinson: That will not stop us from saying it again.

Mr Campbell: I will try to phrase my comments in a slightly different way.

In all seriousness, the major issue for the DUP is the difficulty relating to the practicalities of the 1998 system, of which I will give an example. Mr McGimpsey went to some length to outline how the NSMC operated in a practical sense. However, those of us who were on the outside can testify that, whatever the workings of the NSMC itself, when proposals came to the Assembly for discussion, it appeared that it was simply a case of a Minister coming back with NSMC-agreed proposals. MLAs may have been able to discuss them, but that was all. It was almost like an Order in Council: a proposal could be discussed but could not be changed, vetoed, added to or diminished. The DUP strongly believes that that should change.

The business of nominations was fraught with difficulty in the past. Mr Robinson, Nigel Dodds, Maurice Morrow — now Lord Morrow — and I were all caught in the same position. On account of our views on the Executive and the workings of the NSMC, whose meetings we did not want to attend, we were prevented from attending the British-Irish Council (BIC). However, we got round that by engaging in informal discussions. I hope that that answers Dr Farren's point — he said that the SDLP did not deem a phone call between a Northern Ireland Minister and a Republic of Ireland Minister to be sufficient. I found that a phone call and an informal meeting were sufficient, particularly given that I had been blocked from attending BIC meetings.

It is more a case of the practicalities of working these issues out. It almost reinforces our concern that the entire issue of North/South co-operation — whether it be the implementation bodies or the NSMC — causes the unionist community in particular to view it with some suspicion because of its political undertones. However, if it is built on a practical relationship from which benefits flow, then both communities can see it in a relaxed and positive way, and will not view it as a threat or as political leverage to take things off in one direction only. That is our concern.

I am not sure that we can arrive at a more acceptable implementation of NSMC accountability, how it carries out its work and how it reports back to the Assembly. However, if we could, it would be a positive thing, not just for unionism but for nationalists as well.

Mr Ford: Mr Campbell referred to informal meetings with Southern Ministers. My definition of an informal meeting is standing around with a coffee cup in your hand. Do I take it that what he actually means is a formal meeting, but outside the scope of the NSMC?

Mr Campbell: Yes.

Mr Ford: So, not actually an informal chat but a formally structured meeting?

Mr Campbell: It can mean that. For example, in the context that Dr Farren mentioned — two hospitals in Dundalk and Newry, or Altnagelvin and Letterkenny, or Larne and Stranraer on an east-west basis — if a health matter required immediate attention and had to be resolved within 24 hours, and so could not await the formal requisition of a NSMC meeting, I would regard that as an informal meeting.

Mr Ford: Did Mr Campbell have informal meetings as a Minister on that basis?

Mr Campbell: Yes, on the basis that I have just described.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Before we get to Sinn Féin's presentation, Mr Ford, you made a suggestion about a North/South parliamentary tier. Was that a proposal, or did you just want to raise it as an idea?

Mr Ford: I threw it out as idea rather than as a formal proposal at this point. I thought that the idea of greater openness and accountability might be more likely to achieve consensus.

Mr O'Dowd: It is difficult to review the past workings of the NSMC, because it operated for only a limited time. It may be opportunistic of some people to say that there was not enough accountability to the Assembly. The fact of the matter is that none of those arrangements were bedded in long enough to see how they worked.

Our general view is that during its limited lifespan, the NSMC was accountable to the two bodies that it reported back to. Obviously, one of the difficulties that arose, and Mr Campbell has given his perspective on it, was the right of Ministers to attend. For a time, David Trimble used a veto against Sinn Féin Ministers' attendance. That example has shown us that Ministers should have an automatic right to attend NSMC meetings. That would clearly require new legislation.

It is also important that Ministers fulfil their duties within the NSMC and the BIC. Sinn Féin will be looking at several factors with a view to making changes to that. With regard to the mechanisms of reporting back and forth, we have not had the practice for long enough to see where the weaknesses or opportunities are.

Dr Farren: The Good Friday Agreement, in paragraph 6 of the section dealing with strand two, states:

"Each side to remain accountable to the Assembly and Oireachtas respectively, whose approval, through the arrangements in place on either side, would be required for decisions beyond the defined authority of those attending."

12.00 noon

The SDLP has no difficulty with trying to maximize, and make as comprehensive as is reasonably possible, the various forms of accountability. If we can be precise about those, and agree on how to improve accountability, I do not have any problem. Some 60 meetings of the North/South Ministerial Council were held in various formats, mainly in the formats related to the workings of the implementation bodies. That is a sizeable number of meetings to have taken place during the short time that the Council operated. There was a report on every meeting, apart from those that took place immediately preceding the suspension of the Assembly. No plenaries were held after suspension, so it was impossible to report on those final meetings.

The Assembly was not so overburdened with business that there was no chance to propose motions for Ministers to be made more accountable on North/South matters. The same applies to east-west issues. The Assembly was experienced enough to do that. I hope — although I am not sure that the record will show this — that the informal meetings that Gregory claims he took part in were as fully reported to the Assembly as all the formal meetings that Ministers attended.

Most decisions are not instantaneous. During a crisis such as the foot-and-mouth-disease outbreak, decisions had to be taken when the Assembly was unable to meet to consider them due to time constraints and priority pressures. Matters to do with hospitals, schools, universities and the infrastructure have been given much airing lately. Decisions must be made on policies to deal with those medium- to long-term issues. Forms of co-operation must be developed, considered and accepted. On such matters, the North/South Ministerial Council can take a longer-term perspective than some suggestions would indicate. The SDLP is open to improving accountability as much as possible.

Mr McGimpsey: The North/South Ministerial Council is conditional on there being an Assembly. The agreement states:

“It is understood that the North/South Ministerial Council and the Northern Ireland Assembly are mutually inter-dependent, and that one cannot successfully function without the other.”

As Paul Murphy told the House of Commons on 8 March 1999:

“The North/South Ministerial Council, to which the bodies are accountable, would disappear if there were no Assembly. Similarly, the bodies envisaged in the agreement would disappear.”

That is the current situation. The Assembly must function. From May 2000 to October 2002, my experience of the North/South Ministerial Council is that it undertook its work well and threatened no one.

Unanimity was required; if one Minister disagreed, a proposal fell. That veto gave unionists comfort, because major ideological divisions in the NSMC made it a sensitive area for them. It also got mixed up with other political issues; for example, the one that John O'Dowd referred to as the automatic right to attend.

The Ulster Unionists exercised a veto over Sinn Féin because, when the Executive first started up, and although it was against the odds, Sinn Féin failed to provide what was expected and the Executive collapsed. That was in February 2000. Therefore, next time round, there was an effort to ensure that those responsible for the collapse would be punished, not everybody else. That was the thinking behind David Trimble's refusal, as First Minister, to approve the attendance of Sinn Féin Ministers at North/South Ministerial Council meetings, and that gave unionists a degree of comfort. It worked, but it took some time.

We assume that that no longer applies, but the Ulster Unionist Party would still regard the attendance of Ministers as being determined by a joint signature of First Minister and Deputy First Minister. However, the automatic right to attend will give us some problems.

With regard to the practical steps for the accountability of North/South bodies, Gregory Campbell talked about informal meetings. Before the agreement was set up, something in the region of 105 meetings of North/South bodies or committees — call them what you want — were held between the Northern Ireland Government under direct rule and the Dublin Government. We ended up with a formalised structure under the NSMC with six implementation bodies and six consultative areas. Concerns were expressed that they were not fully accountable to the Assembly. Therefore, there is scope for better reporting and accountability in finance; that is a key issue. The Northern Ireland Assembly and Executive remain fully in charge of the powers on this side of the border, and the Ulster Unionist Party is content to look at any practical measures or steps that will increase scrutiny or accountability.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): David, was your point properly covered by the intervention?

Mr Ford: Yes.

Mr P Robinson: The SDLP and the DUP differ on the definition of accountability, and that became obvious at several private meetings. The SDLP's definition of accountability was the entitlement of Assembly Members to ask Ministers questions, and to ask them for an account of what they had done. The DUP considered that accountability was calling a Minister to account, with the right to decide whether what they had done was proper. That distinction caused difficulty for a long time in our understanding each other's position.

Accountability to the Assembly means that Ministers must act within the scope of the Assembly's view of the issue. Section 52(3) of the 1998 Act states that there is a legal requirement for Ministers attending North/South meetings to act in accordance with any decision taken — past tense — but there is no legal requirement on them to come into line with decisions that the Assembly might take after the event.

So many of the North/South arrangements came down to custom and practice. I will put this as delicately as I can: there is no guarantee that the custom and practices that existed during the previous Executive would be adopted by a future Executive with a different composition. That is why it is essential to have clear statutory rules and why the comprehensive agreement proposes the introduction of a statutory ministerial code, which would increase accountability requirements. That safeguards everybody; previous custom and practice would effectively be replaced by a statutory ministerial code and the statutory requirements contained therein. That is the way forward; it would give everybody the comfort of knowing that their position is safeguarded.

Dr Farren: Peter, is this discussion not similar to last week's discussion on ministerial accountability with respect to departmental portfolios? We discussed whether Ministers are working within the defined authority given to them and the decisions that they take within that defined authority. Such accountability pertains as much to their behaviour in the NSMC as it does to their behaviour in the Executive. I have no difficulty with that. Paragraph 6 of strand two of the agreement makes that very clear:

“Each side to remain accountable to the Assembly... whose approval, through the arrangements in place on either side, would be required for decisions beyond the defined authority of those attending.”

Therefore, I assume that the defined authority has already been defined and that if a Minister acts outside that defined authority the Assembly would have some authority to sanction them. However, when I think about accountability, I think about Ministers who are acting within their defined authority, not outside it.

Mr P Robinson: Seán is quoting the agreement, but it has no legal or statutory authority. He may be able to score political points if a Minister breaches it, but that ministerial decision cannot be stopped or nullified. Under existing law, there is no sanction for breaching it. Therefore, it is the law that we seek to change.

Dr Farren: I apologise if I am jumping in in front of another member, but I will be brief.

I certainly agree with Peter's remarks, and I have no difficulty with considering the necessary legislative provisions to remedy that here. However, I wish to attach a rider, which I have mentioned several times before. Since another Government are involved in North/South matters, we cannot exclusively define the legislative requirements here. Peter, you may well respond that this is Northern Irish legislation, but we must consider the wider setting before we can make any definitive decisions.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Unusually, no one has indicated that they wish to speak on this issue.

Mr Campbell: I would bank that, if I were you, Chairman.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Ford made a proposal that the NSMC annual report should be presented in person by the First Minister and Deputy First Minister in the Assembly and by the Taoiseach and the Tánaiste in the Oireachtas.

Mr Ford: Chair, that is not strictly correct. I suggested a joint presentation in both Parliaments. Therefore, the Taoiseach and Tánaiste, alongside the First Minister and Deputy First Minister, would answer questions in the Assembly.

Mr McNarry: No one picked that up.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is that a serious proposal, David?

Mr Ford: It absolutely is a serious proposal. It has been in the Alliance party's documentation for two years.

Mr Campbell: He was going well up until that point. [Laughter.]

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I did not pick that up when you first raised that.

Mr Ford: I apologise. I had no doubt that you had been reading up on the Alliance Party's paperwork from 7 January 2004 and would have realised what the proposal meant.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): David, I suspect that there may have been a greater reaction to the initial proposal had anybody picked up on the import of what you are saying. Take us through the mechanics of your proposal: the Taoiseach would come to this Assembly to —

Mr Ford: As the report is from the North/South Ministerial Council, the leaders of the Governments of both parts of the island would attend both Parliaments to present, and be questioned on, the report.

Mr P Robinson: Why would the leaders of the Irish Government come to the Assembly? They are not accountable to the Assembly, and the Assembly cannot sanction them. Is David proposing an information session?

Mr Ford: I thought that you wanted to increase accountability.

12.15 pm

Mr P Robinson: There is no accountability: they are not accountable to the Assembly.

Mr McNarry: Chairman, I do not think that there is consensus.

Mr P Robinson: How does presenting a report make them accountable —unless you share the SDLP's view that accountability means being asked to give an account as opposed to being called to account?

Mr Ford: The accountability measures differ between those Ministers who are accountable, in your terms, to the Assembly and those who are, by virtue of the joint operation of the North/South Ministerial Council, accountable in SDLP terms. I thought that even the DUP would perceive the SDLP's version of the accountability of the Southern wing of the North/South Ministerial Council to be of benefit.

Mr McNarry: If it is the same report, that does not matter.

Mr P Robinson: The proposal may breach so many other principles that its benefit would be somewhat diluted.

Mr McNarry: The Alliance Party will be inviting P O'Neill next to report to the Assembly.

Mr Campbell: Much of what we are considering is an attempt to build on international best practice. I know of no other two adjoining countries where a Minister, Tánaiste, or whatever the equivalent would be in Luxembourg or Portugal or wherever else, reports to the adjacent country's Parliament.

Dr Farren: Let us be pioneers.

Mr Campbell: The proposal is that the leaders of both Governments attend the Parliament in each jurisdiction to present the report. That has no international precedent.

Mr Ford: I am quite sure that there is little in the way of international precedents for much that is contained in the Good Friday Agreement.

Mr Campbell: Are we reaching consensus now?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We were on a roll, but —

Mr Ford: I am interested in any amendments that other parties may have to my proposal.

Mr P Robinson: The position that the DUP previously outlined was that those who are responsible to the Assembly should be accountable to the Assembly. I do not mind whether that is done through a full Assembly meeting or through the Committee of the Centre, where the First Minister and Deputy First Minister are collectively called to account, but they must be accountable for their actions.

Mr McGimpsey: May I also suggest, in relation to the previous section, that the Northern Ireland Audit Office (NIAO) examines the workings of the North/South bodies in order to reassure us. They are, after all, spending money that comes straight out of the Northern Ireland block grant.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): David, do you want me to put your proposal to the Committee and then move to a discussion of those suggestions?

Mr Ford: I sensed that there was not full consensus on my original proposal. That was why I sought any amendments that might attract more support.

Mr McNarry: What you have said is that you have put another bummer in front of us. You have then said that you think that you will get more support for this proposal. I assure you that I did not hear the original proposal that way.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I must be honest, David, neither I, nor any staff, heard it that way the first time round. However, you have clarified the proposal. I assume that there is no consensus.

Mr Campbell: I think that you can take the silence to mean that there is no consensus.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We move on to the DUP proposal, which is that the relevant Minister brings the report to the Committee of the Centre or to the Assembly. Is that acceptable?

Dr Farren: Can you read that again?

Mr P Robinson: The DUP's proposal is that in the same way that chief executives and chairs of implementation bodies would report to Committees, the First Minister and Deputy First Minister should report either to the Assembly or to the Committee of the Centre. We can consider which is the better mechanism annually. It would be a poor Committee of the Centre that did not call for —

Dr Farren: I am in favour of as much discussion of North/South issues in the Assembly as possible.

Mr P Robinson: I am in favour of as much exposure of what goes on as possible too.

Mr Ford: That is consensus.

Mr O'Dowd: There was not sufficient opportunity for the procedures to bed in to see what worked. Therefore, to make changes at this stage is, in Sinn Féin's view, unnecessary.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): My understanding is simply that the report would be brought to —

Mr O'Dowd: I understand perfectly. I do not need to have it explained again.

Mr Campbell: Seán, you said that there were over 60 meetings. Is that right?

Dr Farren: There were 60 meetings of the North/South Ministerial Council.

Mr P Robinson: There have not been 60 formal meetings of the British-Irish Council, which is what you indicated earlier.

Dr Farren: No, I was talking about the North/South Ministerial Council. I did not refer to the British-Irish Council.

Mr P Robinson: How many British-Irish Council meetings have there been?

Mr Campbell: Considerably fewer.

Dr Farren: I cannot recall. I am prepared to acknowledge that there were far fewer. I never attended a British-Irish Council meeting. Like Gregory, I was not nominated to attend those meetings.

Mr McGimpsey: There is a difference between meetings of the North/South Ministerial Council involving all Ministers and meetings of the North/South implementation bodies. The latter falls under the auspices of the North/South Ministerial Council. That accounts for the total figure of 60 meetings.

Mr McNarry: How many meetings, Chairman, would the —

Mr McGimpsey: Two Ministers went to meetings of the implementation bodies that were set up.

Mr McNarry: How many practical meetings would it take to bed in, in Sinn Féin's view?

Mr O'Dowd: How long is a piece of string?

Mr McNarry: But you cannot operate —

Mr O'Dowd: You are asking me an impossible question.

Mr McNarry: Your opinion is that they have not had enough meetings to bed in. So you must have an idea of many meetings they may require before they can bed in.

Mr O'Dowd: But they have not. Does anybody believe that any of the institutions set up under the Good Friday Agreement have had a chance to bed in? They have not. If parties can present practical alternatives or proposals, Sinn Féin will examine them; however, that is difficult in the current uncertain climate. Seán has suggested that there were 60 meetings. I do not believe that. I do not know whether he is saying that there were 60 meetings of actual Ministers across the table from each other. Is he saying that?

Dr Farren: Yes, there were. I have that information from the General Secretary of the North/South Ministerial Council.

Mr P Robinson: Given the time it took for the implementation bodies to bed in, there could not possibly be an argument to extend the number of implementation bodies.

Mr McNarry: That goes right down the line. Mr O'Dowd is saying that he would not agree to an annual report of the meetings that have taken place.

Mr O'Dowd: I am not saying that I disagree with it. I am not saying that it is a bad proposal. The institutions have not had the chance to bed in. If a proposal comes forward in a working environment, it would be worth looking at. But to do that in the absence of a working environment is impractical.

Dr Farren: The North/South Ministerial Council publishes an annual report. For the life of me I cannot see why we should object to an annual report being tabled by the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister and discussed in the Assembly. It is a sensible proposal, even if we were only starting from scratch.

Mr McNarry: Indeed.

Mr O'Dowd: We are making a mountain out of a molehill. I have already said that if it was presented in a working environment it would be worth looking at.

Mr McNarry: But you are saying the answer is slumberland as well.

Mr O'Dowd: Saying what?

Mr Campbell: Let us be clear about this mountain out of a molehill. Four out of the five parties have agreed its size, whether or not it is a mountain or a molehill. We need the fifth party to agree.

Mr O'Dowd: I have given my answer.

Mr Campbell: If that is the case then there is consensus and if not, there is not.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is clear that we do not have consensus. Mr O'Dowd has said that he is not happy with that proposal.

That moves us on to Mr McNarry's proposal about the Northern Ireland Audit Office.

Mr McGimpsey: It is that the Northern Ireland Audit Office examine the workings of the North/South bodies.

Mr P Robinson: Are they prohibited at the present time from doing so?

Mr McGimpsey: I only know by my own experience. I believe that they are just not doing it and should be, because public money is being spent. I know from my own experience that when we had concerns or wanted to do a check we had to call the Audit Office.

Mr P Robinson: I am quite content with that. It is a sensible thing. Could we ask officials to find out whether the Audit Office believes that it has any role at present?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do members want to defer a decision on that matter?

Mr McNarry: Subject to an answer from the Audit Office.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Can I put that proposal regarding the Northern Ireland Audit Office. Have we consensus?

Mr O'Dowd: No.

Dr Farren: Let us find out what the current practice is. I cannot imagine that public money is being spent without some form of accountability.

Mr P Robinson: It would be absurd not to have it.

Dr Farren: That is why I believe that there must be form of accountability. Let us find out what exists and then perhaps come back to the proposal.

Mr P Robinson: To suggest that that was not a sensible proposal would be saying that it is right to watch how money is spent in Northern Ireland, but we can do whatever we want and throw millions away without any scrutiny.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are we happy to accept Séan's suggestion to defer a decision until we find out where we stand?

Dr Farren: It may be that there is accountability that meets our needs. I do not wish to be doctrinaire about this.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is lunchtime. I suggest that we adjourn. Mr Molloy will take the Chair at 2.00 pm.

Mr P Robinson: Do you want us to adjourn until 2.00 pm?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): No. We will be back in 15 minutes to resume business. Mr Molloy will take over at 2.00 pm.

The Committee was suspended at 12.25 pm.

On resuming —

12.52 pm

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We now have a quorum, and all parties are represented. Before lunch, we failed to reach consensus on one proposal. The second proposal concerned the role of the Northern Ireland Audit Office. Secretariat staff are liaising on that issue, and we may have a decision before the end of the day. Therefore, we will park the issue until we hear something further.

Are members content that North/South Ministerial Council issues have been adequately discussed? Are there any burning issues that we have failed to cover?

Dr Farren: I have misunderstood the procedures that we are following. When we were discussing what lessons could be learned from experiences of the North/South Ministerial Council, I mentioned only accountability and the need for Ministers to report back in detail.

The SDLP urges that an obligation for Ministers to attend meetings of the North/South Ministerial Council, the British-Irish Council and the Executive be included in the Pledge of Office. Other parties hold similar views, but I want to ensure that the SDLP view is on the record.

The operation of the North/South Ministerial Council was mentioned earlier, and I said that there was room for more free-flowing exchanges in the meetings. That did happen from time to time, but many of the meetings were formal because of the nature of the business that was being conducted. There has to be a certain level of formality, as proposals and propositions are brought to the meetings by those who are charged with advising the Ministers through the secretariat. The formality or informality of the meetings is a minor matter in the scale of issues that are being discussed. However, we need to examine how the business is allowed to be structured and to flow.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The proposal is that Ministers would be required to attend North/South Ministerial Council meetings.

Dr Farren: Yes.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will take that to a vote. Do any members wish to comment further on the North/South Ministerial Council?

Mr Campbell: Is Dr Farren's proposal based on the premise that all the Ministers who are appointed to the Executive and who are carrying out their functions — including participation in the North/South Ministerial Council — agree to do so at the outset?

Dr Farren: Is Mr Campbell talking now about how we choose Ministers? That is agreed first. I am saying that it would not just be in respect of the North/South Ministerial Council. The Ministers' duties should be made explicit in the Pledge of Office, not covered by "Ministers must attend all meetings". It should state that Ministers are expected to attend meetings of the Executive, the North/South Ministerial Council and the British-Irish Council. Is that sufficient?

Mr Campbell: Therefore, what Dr Farren is proposing now is not what happened in the 1998 era.

Dr Farren: That is correct.

Mr Campbell: I presume that it takes account of what happened in the 1998 era.

Dr Farren: Yes. It is based on the experience of some Ministers. Let me put it another way; it is necessary —

Mr Campbell: Dr Farren is not normally so shy and retiring.

Dr Farren: It is necessary that there be an explicit duty on Ministers to attend all meetings of the Executive, the North/South Ministerial Council and the British-Irish Council. There were two Ministers at any one time from Mr Campbell's party, and they did not attend any Executive meetings; Mr Campbell was complaining earlier that he did not get the opportunity to attend the British-Irish Council. If you are in for one, you are in for them all, and that must be made explicit. The SDLP is urging that the Pledge of Office contain a commitment for Ministers to attend all the meetings that they are required to attend.

Mr Campbell: I was not complaining about not getting the opportunity to attend the British-Irish Council; I was stating a fact and explaining how I got round it. I was not complaining that I was excluded; I was saying that an informal meeting took place after I had been excluded. I was not making a complaint that I had been excluded; it was simply a statement of fact.

Is it the underlying premise of Dr Farren's proposal that there is all-party agreement on how the Executive is appointed and its functions — including ministerial involvement in the North/South Ministerial Council — and that the proposal flows from that, or is it irrespective of whether there is agreement?

Dr Farren: That would not apply if there were no agreement. Perhaps I am being thick, but I cannot follow that logic. If we have agreed on how the Ministers are appointed, and so on, it is when they are appointed that their Pledge of Office contains a commitment to attend those meetings. I am not referring to the manner of their appointment.

1.00 pm

Mr Campbell: Under the former system there was no agreement. If Dr Farren's proposal were transposed back in time to 1998, it might have been the case that Ministers who chose not to attend the Executive would have had no choice but to attend the North/South Ministerial Council. Is that correct?

Dr Farren: I can see what Mr Campbell is getting at now. My proposal would require Ministers to attend all meetings; there would be no opt-out clause. Is that correct?

Mr Campbell: Yes.

Dr Farren: Is there any objection to that?

Mr Campbell: If Ministers disagreed with the underlying rationale for the Executive being established and the appointment of Ministers to carry out certain functions, they would not have a choice.

Dr Farren: Rather than talk about what has happened since 1998, we should learn from experience. I assume that the next Executive will be established according to what we have agreed to be the basis of its formation and whether we have agreed to change the basis of its formation.

Mr P Robinson: That is why Dr Farren's proposal is not necessary. The only justification for it is what has happened in the past. Those circumstances would not happen in the future — at least, not in the foreseeable future. Twenty years down the road, perhaps, a party might not accept it.

Dr Farren: What is wrong with Ministers being required to commit themselves to attend —

Mr P Robinson: That is like saying: "What would be wrong with a Member of Parliament who has been elected being required to attend Westminster?" Is that what Dr Farren means?

Dr Farren: Not quite. I refer to Ministers.

Mr P Robinson: What about the responsibility of elected representatives?

Mr Ford: There may not be a valid comparison between people who stand for election to Westminster on an abstentionist platform, and Ministers. I have a sense of déjà vu from the discussion that we had on strand one matters. Why would a Minister want to be part of an Executive if he or she did not have confidence in it, or if he or she were not prepared to play a full role in it? It seems that positions have been reversed on opposite sides of the table.

Mr P Robinson: The answer is: to stop somebody else from having it.

Mr Ford: That is not necessarily a good argument for the construction of an Executive. Although one might make that case to prevent somebody else from occupying a parliamentary seat, an Executive has other responsibilities.

Dr Farren: The proposal simply provides added reassurance that Ministers will discharge their duties.

Mr Campbell: I certainly do not have a problem with the proposal, provided that it is based on that premise.

Dr Farren: How the premise relates to the formation of the Executive is not the topic of discussion: it is what will happen when several Ministers have been nominated and, in accepting their nominations, have committed themselves, through the Pledge of Office, to attend meetings of the Executive, the North/South Ministerial Council and the British-Irish Council.

If it were assured that we would all be good boys and girls, perhaps rules and regulations would not be needed. Unfortunately, however, they are needed because we are not always good boys and girls.

Mr Campbell: The proposal would not have to stop there.

Dr Farren: I know that.

Mr Campbell: Other conditions could be included, such as Ministers having to do x, y and z, and we must find out, in advance, whether each and every one of them fulfils those obligations.

Mr P Robinson: Perhaps that is the issue. It is more a matter for the ministerial code.

Dr Farren: The DUP pushes for that kind of approach from time to time.

Mr P Robinson: It is absurd. If there were an agreement to form an Executive, it is unconscionable that those who form that Executive and who want it to be formed would not attend whatever meetings were required.

Dr Farren: I would like to think that that would be the case.

Mr McNarry: To cut to the chase, are we saying that the assurance is that the precedent created and operated by the DUP in the previous Executive would not be followed by others in any newly formed Executive? Is that a restraining order? Are we looking for that assurance? That precedent worked, and the fact is — I will choose my words carefully — that the DUP got away with it. DUP Ministers saw everything to do with the Executive and the cross-border bodies. They were familiar with all those issues; the Ministers rotated, but they stayed outside the room and did not participate in Executive decisions. Is that what we want to curtail, so that no one else can do it?

Dr Farren: The DUP seeks reassurance from others on various matters, which, in a restoration situation, could be assumed in any case. In our view the DUP sinned on previous occasions — it may not be willing to accept that fact. The SDLP wants a reassurance that all key duties will be fully respected and acted upon. That is the point that I am making.

Mr P Robinson: Let us make it clear. During the course of the previous Assembly and Executive, the DUP was not simply in opposition to those who were in the Executive; it was in opposition to the whole process. It sought to oppose and expose that process, which is why it took the position that it did. Because of the strength of the party, we have to assume that if a new Executive were formed, it would be with the consent of the DUP, so the issue would not arise. However, that matter should be included in the ministerial code.

Other matters flow directly from that issue, such as the right of Ministers who have a prime responsibility for a subject to be the chosen Minister. Those issues must be addressed. If the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister decide that someone other than the Minister of Education should speak about an education issue, Members may feel aggrieved. There are issues surrounding who should be the Minister.

In normal circumstances, the appropriate Minister would be selected, but there might be circumstances in which that might not happen. If the Minister of Education held a peculiar view on a particular education issue that was inconsistent with the Executive's position, it might be deemed appropriate to select somebody else. Those issues could be discussed in the context of the ministerial code.

Mr Campbell: In which case Dr Farren would be the sinner.

Dr Farren: I am often the sinner.

Mr Campbell: That is the first step.

Dr Farren: Without prejudice to the reference to the Pledge of Office, I accept what Mr Robinson says about the ministerial code being an appropriate place in which to include a commitment to the responsibilities that I outlined. If that is a first step on the issue, let us ensure —

Mr P Robinson: I have no difficulty with that, because I am not in any way embarrassed by past practice. I always thought that the people who devised the system that allowed “Ministers of Opposition” needed their heads felt in the first place. It was their system, not mine.

Mr Ford: I am delighted that Mr Robinson feels that he is in a position to give guarantees of good behaviour in the future.

Mr P Robinson: The DUP is always well behaved, but I cannot guarantee that for anybody else.

Mr Ford: Mr Robinson seemed to be guaranteeing that there was no need to include responsibilities for attending meetings in the Pledge of Office or in the ministerial code because the DUP intended to behave itself in the future. The implicit assumption was that everybody else was guaranteed to behave themselves anyway.

There is a valid point —

Mr P Robinson: I am glad that Mr Ford recognises that that was not a valid point.

Mr Ford: There is a further valid point: if an issue has arisen about the duty of Ministers to attend meetings, an issue will almost certainly arise about the right of Ministers who have a particular interest to attend. The Alliance Party has concerns about the sectarianism of nominating Ministers to North/South Ministerial Council meetings, whereby no unionist Minister can attend without a nationalist Minister also having to attend to keep an eye on him or her, and vice versa. That would be rendered completely unnecessary if the Executive operated on the basis of collective responsibility, in the expectation that Ministers could agree not only on attendance of meetings but on what the Executive policy should be in the first instance.

Mr P Robinson: It would certainly be less of an issue, but it would not prevent an item being included on the agenda that had not perhaps been considered by the Executive — or, for that matter, an issue that arose during a discussion on an agenda item. Those circumstances would have to be considered.

Mr McNarry: It is an interesting discussion, but I do not know where it is going.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That had occurred to me.

Mr McNarry: As far as I can tell, Mr Robinson has given us an assurance that the DUP will participate. As to behaviour, there can be no assurances on that. Dr Farren's proposal seems to be looking for assurances along the lines that he has teased out. That is either sufficient or it is not; I hope that it is and that we can move on.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The proposal is that the nominations to attend North/South Ministerial Council meetings, and the requirement to attend, be incorporated into the ministerial code. Is that acceptable?

Mr P Robinson: Some other issues probably need to be incorporated as well, such as who should attend.

Dr Farren: Can I take it that whatever else Mr Robinson is hinting at would be —

Mr P Robinson: I am talking about ensuring that the appropriate Minister attends — for example, if his or her departmental issues are to be addressed.

Dr Farren: In so far as was possible, that was attempted during the previous Assembly, but it is a separate issue.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Would the inclusion of the word “nominations” in the proposal cover that concern as to who attends? Is it wide enough? We will return to the ministerial code at a later stage, and we will not preclude any debate on these issues.

Mr O'Dowd: Can I suggest that the matter be left until then? I have no difficulty with the proposal as it currently stands, but I am concerned by Peter Robinson's remark about the "appropriate Minister". For instance, if a Minister holds a peculiar view on, for example, education, I see a line for exclusion in that. It would be more useful to return to this matter during the debate on the ministerial code.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do members have any problems with the general proposal?

Mr O'Dowd: Can you read it out again, please?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The proposal is that nominations to the North/South Ministerial Council meetings, and a requirement to attend, be incorporated into the ministerial code.

Dr Farren: My final point is that that duty in the ministerial code would probably include the British-Irish Council and the Executive.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): By putting that comment in Hansard, you have achieved that. There will be a wide-ranging discussion on the ministerial code, so you can be guaranteed that those issues will be raised again.

Can we take it that there are no other burning issues on the North/South Ministerial Council? Are members content?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are members happy enough to move on? That being the case, we can move on to the other issues that arose from the various submissions and the Hansard report.

We will follow the usual format, and members should speak for a maximum of five minutes on one or all of the issues — not that anyone has taken the full time so far this morning. Members can then indicate to me if they wish to ask questions or raise a subject matter.

Mr Ford: I must confess that I am not sure what the first point means:

"Assembly decision for issues outside departmental responsibilities".

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That came from the DUP.

Mr Ford: I am not sure what that means in this context. I shall await with interest what the DUP has to say on that. We have already tossed around the matter of the interdependency of the institutions.

1.15 pm

The establishment of a North/South consultative forum is part of the agreement and must be considered, although I suspect that I will probably apply the O'Dowd argument to that, if John does not mind my misquoting him. I agree that as there was so much difficulty in establishing a role for the Civic Forum, it would be better to have the institutions up and running before we attempt to make further progress.

I have already made clear my position on the North/South parliamentary forum and on developing other cross-border bodies as appropriate.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The point:

"Assembly decision for issues outside departmental responsibilities"

was taken from the DUP's written submission. No doubt Mr Robinson will take the opportunity to explain that in his contribution.

Mr P Robinson: You may not doubt it, but I need someone to indicate what that is shorthand for in our proposals.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I have a copy here:

"NSMC/BIC agendas. The relevant legislation would be amended as necessary to make clear that where a matter on the agenda for a meeting of the NSMC or BIC was one outside the responsibilities of a Minister due to attend, because it was outside his or her departmental responsibilities and not covered by a transfer of authority from another Minister it would be subject to a decision of the Assembly."

Mr Ford: That is clear now.

Mr P Robinson: You have clarified that, so I do not now need to speak about it.

I will start by addressing the point on the status of the North/South bodies and whether they should stand alone or be part of the British-Irish Council. The DUP believes that the British Isles as a whole should be the axis on which we should compartmentalise. Therefore, North/South bodies should not stand alone. Rather than having a separate relationship, they should form part of the overall relationships within these islands, and there should be a British-Irish axis.

The DUP has said publicly on several occasions that it will consider the establishment of a North/South parliamentary forum in the context of an overall agreement. We have misgivings about the type of forum that is being suggested. The DUP believes in a parliamentary "association" as opposed to what is being defined as a parliamentary "forum". Any Member of Parliament can join and take part in the proceedings of the parliamentary associations at Westminster. The North/South parliamentary forum would be restricted. Only a percentage of people — in accordance with party strengths, and so forth — would be entitled to attend. It would not be an inclusive body. Therefore, it might be set up for purposes other than parliamentarians getting to know each other and share views on issues.

The North/South consultative forum would probably have as much value as the Civic Forum — and everyone knows my view on that from previous discussions. There are enough areas in the labyrinth of structures that we have been considering to allow for consultation with civic society. We do not need to construct or, more importantly, pay for another one. I am not a great supporter of that proposal.

The DUP believes that the British-Irish Council should have a secretariat. The secretariat of the North/South Ministerial Council has provided much of the drive that led to the multiplicity of North/South meetings. The lack of a similar secretariat on the British-Irish Council, or east-west front, is probably one reason that it has a much lower profile. If the intention is to have equivalence between the two bodies, that will happen only if a secretariat drives forward the British-Irish Council.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is that a formal proposal?

Mr P Robinson: Yes.

Mr O'Dowd: We need to discuss further what the DUP means by:

“Assembly decision for issues outside departmental responsibilities”.

Sinn Féin has already commented on the interdependency of the institutions. We are in favour of establishing a North/South consultative forum, a North/South parliamentary forum and other cross-border bodies.

The status of North/South bodies is legislated for under the 1998 Act and the Good Friday Agreement, and we see no need to change that.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Does the SDLP wish to comment?

Dr Farren: Since the DUP raised the first point:

“Assembly decision for issues outside departmental responsibilities”

I am wondering whether it is related to paragraph 3(iii) of strand two of the Good Friday Agreement:

“The Council to meet in different formats: in an appropriate format to consider institution or cross-sectoral matters (including in relation to the EU) and to resolve disagreement.”

There was discussion during some of the general plenary meetings of the North/South Ministerial Council of how we might meet in cross-sectoral format. I wonder whether that was in the minds of the DUP with respect to matters outside departmental responsibilities.

I am in favour of what the NSMC was proposing to do, although we never got round to meeting in cross-sectoral format. Alongside the meetings that were held in the specific sectoral formats, Ministers with appropriate responsibilities could have met to address issues that crossed their departmental boundaries. Given that there is no immediate congruence between all the portfolios, North and South, it might be necessary for more than one Minister from either side to attend as the lead Minister on occasions where such matters were being addressed. That requires consideration.

We have already heard quite a bit about the interdependence of the institutions. I accept the principle.

I would not reject the notion of a North/South consultative forum as easily as Mr Robinson seems to. The agreement makes provision for consideration to be given to the establishment of an independent consultative forum and the bringing together of representatives from leading sections of civic society North and South, perhaps twice a year. That would be a helpful source of advice from the perspective of those particular sectors. We should consider the establishment of such an independent consultative forum. I believe that initial ideas on this were being put together by the North/South secretariat before suspension.

As for the parliamentary forum, it would be useful to have that in the more structured way that is suggested in the agreement. It would be a forum in which matters of mutual interest and concern would be discussed, and it would provide an opportunity for people to get to know one other, and for the type of informal contacts that are often wanting in North/South relationships at political and, in particular, parliamentary level, to be positively developed.

I have not spoken specifically about the need for other cross-border implementation bodies. However, the SDLP has a number of proposals that would enhance the range and work of the existing bodies and which would allow us to consider other areas that could be included in their remits. The Assembly would have to agree to any further development of the North/South areas of co-operation and the North/South implementation bodies. We should not shy from such a discussion. However, we must always bear in mind that whatever our ideological approaches, the key test is whether those bodies are of practical benefit to people, North and South.

Finally, we do not accept the arguments for the DUP's inclusive approach on this matter. The intensity and need of North/South relationships are such that they could not be addressed effectively in a council, as the DUP has proposed. North/South relationships are different, so that proposal does not commend itself to us in any way.

Mr McGimpsey: I will deal with the issues in no particular order, as we have already drifted across several of them this morning.

The Belfast Agreement clearly states that the institutions are mutually interdependent and that one cannot successfully function without the other. As I said this morning, on 8 March 1999 Paul Murphy said in the House of Commons:

“The North/South Ministerial Council, to which the bodies are accountable, would disappear if there were no Assembly. Similarly, the bodies envisaged in the agreement would disappear.”

That is the deal.

The North/South consultative forum is a little offering straight out of the comprehensive agreement, which arose from discussions that the two Governments had with the DUP and Sinn Féin. We are just lifting bits out of it. The Belfast Agreement states:

“Consideration to be given to the establishment of an independent consultative forum.”

The UUP has not been persuaded of the need for a North/South consultative forum. It does not even believe that the Civic Forum for Northern Ireland has fully vindicated itself. As the party considers the Civic Forum to be redundant, it would therefore not want to see the creation of an even bigger, full-blown forum.

I now turn to the North/South parliamentary forum. The comprehensive agreement states:

“The Northern Ireland Executive would encourage the parties in the Assembly to establish a North-South parliamentary forum bringing together equal numbers from the Oireachtas and the Assembly, and operating on an inclusive basis.”

As matters stand, that would be premature. I do not see how the establishment of such a forum would make a difference, as far as reaching agreement is concerned. Mechanisms already exist to facilitate North/South discussions, if they are to be entered into. The establishment of a parliamentary forum would thus be unnecessary, given the number of other North/South bodies that are already floating about.

To discuss the creation of more cross-border bodies is pretty much to open a Pandora’s box. The agreement was “six-six” — that six implementation bodies would be set up and six further areas of co-operation would be identified — and one was a quid pro quo for strands one, two and three, which are each mutually interdependent. When one element of a quid pro quo agreement is altered, it is very difficult to maintain that agreement. It seems that there will be no agreement on the proposal to increase the number of cross-border bodies. However, the comprehensive agreement proposes the establishment of a review group to examine objectively the case for additional bodies and areas of co-operation. Again, as matters currently stand, that is a long shot. It would be a step too far.

Are there any issues that I have missed? As regards:

“Status of North South Bodies (stand-alone or part of the British Irish Council)”, our problem with the British-Irish Council was that it did not have a satisfactory secretariat and, therefore, functioned poorly. I would be concerned if that were reinforced. The British-Irish Council must work and operate properly. That requires a three-strand approach, with each strand dependent on the others. If one does not work, the others do not work: that was the deal. I am not clear how that would operate under a British-Irish Council. My party sees the British-Irish Council as being important because it recognises the common polity of the British Isles, North/South bodies and strand one as part of the quid pro quo.

1.30 pm

As regards:

“Assembly decision for issues outside departmental responsibilities”, that has been washed around today. However, nobody has defined what the issues are. It seems to me that the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, with its cross-cutting and co-ordinating role, would have a responsibility to bring matters that are outside departmental remits to the Assembly for decision.

Mr P Robinson: The establishment of an independent North/South consultative forum was not part of the comprehensive agreement. Annex B, paragraph 8 of the proposals for changes in strand two and strand three institutions contains carefully formulated terminology suggesting that the establishment of a North/South consultative forum would be a matter for the Northern Ireland Executive to determine.

There is a conflict with regard to the review of the implementation bodies that is proposed in the comprehensive agreement. The unionist view is that the number of implementation bodies should be reduced; the nationalist view is that there should be additional ones. All that shows is that there was no agreement on the issue. The Governments took that into account.

“Assembly decision for issues outside departmental responsibilities”, it appears, refers to paragraph 4 of the proposals on strands two and three in the comprehensive agreement, which states that when a topic arises that does not fit neatly into a departmental portfolio, then rather than have a random Minister take responsibility for it, the Assembly would take a view. I am not sure that that is likely to occur often. I suppose that it will depend on how many Departments there are. There is already conflict within some of them. For instance, the Department for Regional Development (DRD) is responsible for energy policy. In my view, energy is better dealt with by the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment (DETI), though one could argue that it is the responsibility of DRD. If an energy policy issue arises, therefore, it could be decided upon by the Assembly.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do you intend to make a proposal on matters that fall outside the remit of a specific Minister? Does the party feel particularly strongly about that?

Mr P Robinson: There are two ways to deal with that. One is for the Executive to agree on which Minister should deal with the subject. If there were conflict with regard to joint ownership of it, it would, presumably, be the role of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to determine which Minister would speak on behalf of the Executive. As we discussed earlier with regard to the ministerial code, it is difficult to determine which Minister is responsible for an area where there is conflict or an overlap.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): So you are just putting it on the record, as it were.

There was one suggestion that seemed non-controversial, which was that the British-Irish Council should have its own secretariat — in the same way that the North/South Ministerial Council has its own secretariat. There did not seem to be any great opposition to that. May I put that to the meeting to get it out of the way?

Mr McGimpsey: A standing secretariat.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are there any problems with that?

Mr O'Dowd: I will be the fly in the ointment again. We will have no consensus on that matter.

Mr P Robinson: I assume that Sinn Féin is moving back from its 2004 position on that issue.

Mr O'Dowd: As Mr Robinson is aware, the comprehensive agreement was not implemented. His party walked away from it.

Mr P Robinson: There are two issues that flow from that. First, it is clear that Sinn Féin walked away. They took cold feet and held a press conference before the discussions had even concluded. Secondly, whether the agreement was proceeded with or not, I do not recall that Sinn Féin had any difficulty with this issue back in 2004, and I wonder, irrespective of what happened to the overall agreement, why it is a problem now.

Are we saying that there should not be a secretariat — that there is some point in principle why we should not have a secretariat for east-west matters? What is the point of principle?

Mr O'Dowd: I am not saying that it is a point of principle. I said that we are not going to get consensus on it today. Mr Robinson said earlier that there might be matters that would be raised at future engagements; this may be a matter for a future engagement.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We do not have consensus on that.

Dr Farren, did you want to make a proposal for a North/South consultative forum? You seemed quite keen on that idea.

Dr Farren: There is provision for consideration of the establishment of an independent consultative forum, although the comprehensive agreement does not explain by whom the consideration should be given. Is it solely the responsibility of the two Administrations — the Executive, and the Cabinet in the South? Leaving that aside, we would certainly propose in the course of any consideration that there be an independent consultative forum.

Mr McGimpsey: May I offer some clarification on this issue? Mr Robinson appeared to say that it was not agreed in the comprehensive agreement. In annex B it is quite clear that:

“The Northern Ireland Executive would support the establishment of an independent North/South consultative forum appointed by the two Administrations”.

Not “could” but “would”. There is clearly an imperative there.

“The Northern Ireland Executive would encourage the parties in the Assembly to establish a North-South parliamentary forum”.

The point of the latter is that the parties in this deal, as part of the Northern Ireland Executive, “would encourage” the parties in the Assembly. We can take it as read that the two parties involved with the two Governments would be in there as part of that.

We had a little exchange there in which Mr O'Dowd said that the comprehensive agreement was not implemented and that the DUP walked away; and Mr Robinson said that Sinn Féin walked away. Clearly, there was some form of pre-agreement agreement between the two Governments, Sinn Féin and the DUP that they:

“would support the establishment of an independent North/South consultative forum”

and

“would encourage the parties in the Assembly to establish a North-South parliamentary forum”.

I am concerned about those side deals and where the real discussion is going on. Dr Farren can make his proposal. I am already on record as saying that the Northern Ireland Civic Forum is redundant. I do not see why we need another one. There are enough bodies floating around for co-operation without yet another — this North/South parliamentary forum.

I am concerned that we will go through this dance, and then at the end of it all, when Sinn Féin, the DUP and the two Governments get together for discussion as they inevitably will during the autumn, this is all going to cough out.

John says that the comprehensive agreement was not implemented and that the DUP walked away; Peter says that it was Sinn Féin that walked away from it. Therefore, I wonder about the point of much of this discussion.

Mr P Robinson: What happened is public knowledge. We were in the final days of negotiations when Mr Adams called a press conference and took his ball home with him. That was the end of that process. That annoyed the Government so much that they came over here and announced proposals that they had been considering anyway.

It is very clear that the DUP did not, at any stage, agree to the establishment of an independent consultative forum. The two Governments put forward the proposal, but the proposal required that its establishment be an action of the Northern Ireland Executive. Therefore, it did not have our support. It would not have happened under present circumstances.

Mrs Long: Whatever else might be said about the comprehensive agreement, we can at least agree that it was not agreed.

I want clarification of Seán’s proposal. Does he propose that consideration be given to a consultative forum being set up or that the forum be set up? Those two proposals differ slightly. We would be happy with one, but probably not with the other.

Dr Farren: I am following the proposal in the Good Friday Agreement, which states:

“Consideration to be given to the establishment of an independent consultative forum appointed by the two Administrations.”

The SDLP certainly believes that a consultative forum should be established, not because it wants a plethora of bodies, but because such a forum would make a useful contribution and would enable leading representatives from key sectors of civic society — and not always the same key sectors — to engage in consultation. We must consider how that kind of advice can be best provided. A consultative forum would enable the future development of North/South relations in general and, in particular, of those areas for which the North/South Ministerial Council has responsibility. My proposal is that consideration should be given to a consultative forum. Have we moved on to considering its formal establishment?

Mrs Long: That was what I want to be clarified. I want to know whether your proposal was that we should consider the establishment of a forum or agree to its establishment.

Dr Farren: I am saying that we should consider it. I do not believe that today’s discussion amounts to a comprehensive consideration of the matter. The discussion has been on the general concept of a forum.

Mr P Robinson: Neither do I. No one has yet put a case for a consultative forum, other than to say that the agreement provides for it. Nobody has told me why it would be a good thing, why it is necessary or why the money to be spent on it would not be better spent elsewhere. What is the value of it?

Dr Farren: I tried to explain that a few moments ago.

Mr P Robinson: The only thing that you said was that it was part of the Belfast Agreement.

Dr Farren: I said that it would be useful for representatives from key sectors of civic society to meet. I support the case for a consultative forum in the same way that I support the case for the Civic Forum. If the Committee wants serious consideration of the proposition, I am prepared to bring more detailed proposals.

Mr P Robinson: The general view of the Civic Forum was that, as a limited number of people were involved, a limited part of civic society was represented. There are many other ways in which representatives of civic society can give their views to Government.

Exactly the same applies to a North/South consultative forum to which there are alternatives that do not involve further expenditure. There is no constitutional issue: it is just a waste of money.

1.45 pm

Dr Farren: We will need evidence of what you referred to as the “general view”. I do not include myself in the “general view” that the Civic Forum was a waste of time and money and was unrepresentative. I do not accept those judgements. We must not be so dismissive. Quite a number of highly respected people participated in the Civic Forum. There were frustrations but those were a result of the frustrations that affected the general political situation. We should give serious consideration to the retention of the Civic Forum and the creation of a North/South consultative forum, as proposed in the Good Friday Agreement.

Mr McGimpsey: A North/South consultative forum is mentioned in the agreement. However the agreement states only that parties should give it their “consideration”. The UUP has considered it and was not convinced. That remains our position on an interparliamentary forum and the Civic Forum.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Unless I hear otherwise, it is clear that the UUP and DUP do not agree to either the consideration or establishment of a North/South consultative forum. As there is no consensus, Seán’s proposal falls.

We have examined the catch-all “Other Issues” category. Should any other points have been raised during that discussion?

Mr Ford: Yes. When we were discussing an interparliamentary forum, Peter talked about an interparliamentary association.

Mr P Robinson: Instead of a forum.

Mr Ford: Is that a formal proposal?

Mr P Robinson: I do not think that it would achieve consensus.

Mr Ford: You are not normally so reticent.

Mr Campbell: It is catching.

Mr P Robinson: I do not see the benefit of putting forward a proposal that I know will not run.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are there any other points?

Mr D Bradley: The only time that we reached consensus all day was at the break for lunch, since when there has been none. Sinn Féin objected to the annual presentations being made in the Assembly on behalf of the North/South Ministerial Council and also to the east-west body having a secretariat. Those minor proposals are not high on the Richter scale. Nevertheless, they should have been agreed today and they were not.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We have not made as much progress on reaching agreement as we did on Friday. However, the Committee operates under the rule of consensus.

Mr P Robinson: Is a change in personnel needed to reach consensus?

Mr Campbell: Might the two things be linked?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I do not know, but it is disappointing that we have not made much progress today. However, as we are bound by the rule of consensus, we must proceed on that basis.

The Committee Clerk has just made an important point. Normally, when the Committee has not reached consensus, those who objected have been asked to indicate whether they merely disagree with certain proposals or consider them to be major impediments to devolution. When the reports are being written, it is important to distinguish between the issues that are major obstacles over which parties will die in a ditch and those on which there is merely disagreement.

Does Sinn Féin consider anything to which it has objected to be an impediment to devolution?

Mr O’Dowd: No. I was about to make that point when I noticed that the Committee Clerk was speaking to you. None of the issues to which Sinn Féin has objected today are deal breakers. We may reach agreement on some after further discussion and debate, but we will simply not reach consensus on others today. That is normally how politics works.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There is still no decision on the Northern Ireland Audit Office issue, but I will let members know when I receive it.

Is that as far as we can take the other issues?

Mr O’Dowd: Did the DUP and the Ulster Unionist Party not withdraw consensus from a few matters as well?

Mr P Robinson: I want to make it clear that some issues are deal breakers. The accountability of the North/South Ministerial Council to the Assembly in strand two is a vital issue for the DUP.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): What about the Ulster Unionists?

Mr McGimpsey: Nothing that we have discussed today is of strategic importance. Everything can be talked through.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Alliance did not break any consensus today.

Dr Farren: We will come back to the issues on which we have not reached agreement. We will then weigh up what has and has not been agreed.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are there any other issues that members feel have not been adequately dealt with? If I do not hear from anybody, we will move on to strand three.

There are some housekeeping and procedural issues to deal with. Members will recall that the Secretary of State referred a work programme to the Committee on 3 July 2006. Under “October” it states:

“Parties conclude discussions and finalise draft Programme for Government and draft Ministerial Code.”

We need to decide how to proceed. Members have spoken at length this morning about the ministerial code, and it has come up several times in deliberations during the past few weeks. What do members feel is the best way of taking the issue forward so that we have something for October?

Mr P Robinson: On the basis of our discussion earlier, we first need to clarify whether we are talking about the code of conduct in schedule 4 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998; the ministerial code drafted by the previous Executive; an amendment to the code of conduct; or a new ministerial code to be put in legislation with key elements of the existing draft ministerial code. The draft code ran to about 50 pages. Perhaps it would be too chunky to go into a schedule to the legislation.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is important that we clarify the issue. I assume that no member has the answer to those questions this afternoon.

Mr P Robinson: We generally agree that the ministerial code should be put on a statutory basis. Could we provide a paper, for the next meeting or the one after that, on what we see as the key elements that should be in a ministerial code or in the statutory element of a ministerial code? Presumably the Executive could produce, and the Assembly could agree, the full ministerial code when an Executive is up and running.

As regards legislation, and the elements to be legislated for, we have talked about support for the institutions of law. It could well be that we would have some unanimity on that point, and that that should be included in statute.

Dr Farren: It is sensible to ask parties for their views on what they regard as essential elements to be included in statute and what else is needed. I think that that proposal was made earlier this morning.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Would the Committee prefer the parties to do that, rather than asking the Clerks to go through the various documents and trawl out the views? Is it simply that a fresh paper from each party is required?

Dr Farren: Obviously, parties are going to have their own views anyway. Could the secretariat do what you are suggesting?

Mr P Robinson: We could amend it, so it does not matter which way we choose to go.

Dr Farren: It would not preclude parties from preparing their own papers. If the secretariat would like to be helpful in trying to identify the common areas then that would be a useful contribution.

Mr P Robinson: Are we asking them to produce a paper with common issues, or the issues that have been raised by one or more parties?

Dr Farren: Could they do both?

The Committee Clerk: We can study Hansard to see what views have been expressed, and those that have not, and we will be able to see where there has been diversity among parties. We can highlight those issues and circulate them to members if they so wish. That could be a useful starting point.

Mr P Robinson: One difficulty will be that we agreed in general terms that the ministerial code should be used to provide greater accountability. However, specific proposals will be needed when producing the code itself.

Mr McGimpsey: There is also the matter of the draft document's status — I am still not certain about that. Part of it is marked "agreed version". However, the rest is not marked.

The Committee Clerk: The Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister said that that device is used to differentiate that part from earlier drafts.

Mr McGimpsey: Is this draft code just one of many that have been sent back and forth?

The Committee Clerk: The one that you are using is the final draft.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Perhaps it would be better that the parties draw up their views on this important issue. Do we have a time span for the next meeting? Presumably, it will be next Monday.

Dr Farren: Would it be helpful if the parties submitted their papers to the secretariat before the next meeting, so that Committee staff could identify the common areas?

Mr P Robinson: Is it necessary to have this before the next meeting?

Dr Farren: No; perhaps the one in a fortnight's time.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): That date will be 4 September 2006. Is it possible to submit papers to the Clerks in time for the next meeting? That will give them a week to go through the papers. A brief list of options is all that is required.

Having considered the code of conduct, what shall we do about the Programme for Government?

Mr P Robinson: We have a long road to travel before we reach that stage.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Secretary of State is expecting us to conclude discussions and finalise the draft Programme of Government by the end of October.

Mr O'Dowd: Has the Committee formally agreed the work plan?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It has been laid down as a Holy Writ from the Secretary of State. The Committee did not agree to any of it.

Mr O'Dowd: In the past, certain members always noted reference to it. I have no problem with it.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We want to make members aware of those two issues.

Dr Farren: If there is a reasonable level of agreement on the report from the Subgroup on the Economic Challenges facing Northern Ireland, that would form a significant part of a provisional — if I can use the word “provisional” — Programme for Government. Any Programme for Government would have to be endorsed by the Government — those who are going to participate in it — and that would go beyond this Committee.

Mr P Robinson: With respect, not all of the parties here would be involved in drafting a Programme for Government.

Dr Farren: That is why I used the word “provisional”.

Mrs Long: That issue was raised when the timetable was put in front of us. Although the Alliance Party would be content to contribute ideas, it would most likely be in opposition —

Dr Farren: Do not count yourselves out.

Mr Ford: Everybody else seems to.

Dr Farren: We do not.

Mrs Long: My party would, perhaps, not be welcome in those discussions.

Mr P Robinson: Unless there is a voluntary coalition.

Mrs Long: Of course.

Mr Ford: The tenor of discussions in recent weeks would suggest that a voluntary coalition is unlikely to attract consensus.

Mrs Long: There is certainly no consensus on that matter.

Mr Ford: I want to give a serious response to Dr Farren’s point, which others may or may not choose to take any notice of. I have no doubt that the work of the Subgroup on the Economic Challenges facing Northern Ireland will be of some use to those who are working on a Programme for Government, but it does not cover that much ground. Its focus is more on private-sector growth than the responsibilities across the full range of Government Departments.

Dr Farren: I appreciate that.

Mr Ford: It would be interesting if somebody could produce the previous Programmes for Government, the most recent of which was being debated in the Assembly just before suspension. It would be useful to ascertain how much of those programmes has been carried out thus far. That might expose a few gaps and enable members to discuss possibilities for the next Programme for Government.

2.00 pm

Mr P Robinson: Mr Chairman, you seem to be labouring under the misapprehension that the Secretary of State’s edict contains the work plan for this Committee, but, of course, it does not. It is his timetable, which takes us through to November. It includes items that have nothing whatsoever to do with this Committee, one of which is probably the Programme for Government.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The Committee could decide that it would —

Mr P Robinson: It could not.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Well, it could, but perhaps it will not.

Mr P Robinson: It could not. It is for the Executive to determine the Programme for Government. This Committee will not be the Executive, so what possible benefit can be gained from its discussing the draft Programme for Government?

Mrs Long: The Programme for Government is included in the Committee’s terms of reference. During the Committee’s first few weeks, there was much discussion on the terms of reference and the chairmanship — there were also many other belaboured and fruitless debates. There was a long debate on whether it was appropriate for the Committee to discuss the Programme for Government, and I commented that I was not sure that it was, given that the Alliance Party was at the table and expected to be in opposition. As far as I can recall, the Preparation for Government Committee was not only to consider barriers to restoration, but also to prepare a programme of work. Thus, it was part of the Committee’s original terms of reference, in accordance with the Secretary of State’s direct correspondence to the Committee.

Mr P Robinson: The Secretary of State is fairly clear on this: it is the parties’ responsibility, not a Committee’s.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): If the consensus is that we do not deal with this matter, that is fine, but we must make a decision one way or the other. What are members’ views? Dr Farren, have you any comments?

Dr Farren: No.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): There seems to be consensus that we should not take the issue any further.

Mr Campbell: The Northern Ireland political process work plan specifically states that, in October, parties — rather than the Committee — are to conclude discussions and finalise a draft Programme for Government.

Mr McGimpsey: We must be realistic; any Programme of Government is a matter for an Executive, not a Committee.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Right, that is fair enough. We will move on.

The issue of explosives was raised at the meeting of 16 August 2006. I must emphasise that we were discussing explosives that are used for legitimate purposes such as quarrying, road laying and so forth. There was a question as to whether that should be the responsibility of the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety or a new policing and justice Minister. We asked for some material on the issue, and I have received a letter dated 15 August 2006. Have members had a chance to read it?

Mr P Robinson: What kind of material?

Mr Campbell: Material for explosives.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Have we got the material?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Any thoughts on the issue? Dare I ask if there are any experts on explosives in the room?

Mr P Robinson: Why is everybody looking in one direction? [Laughter.]

Mr O'Dowd: Sorry, Chairman, I am just checking my diary. I take it that the matter was raised at the PFG Committee dealing with law and order?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes, the question was asked as to whether the legitimate use of explosives should fall under the remit of the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety or of a new policing and justice Minister, whenever he or she is appointed. We asked for a note on the matter.

Mr O'Dowd: Did the PFG Committee dealing with law and order ask this Committee, which deals with institutional issues, to deal with it?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Yes, it did.

Mr O'Dowd: Passing the buck, I think.

Mr Paisley Jnr: We will advise our members on the PFG Committee dealing with law and order where that issue would be most effectively placed.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are we to pass the issue back to the PFG Committee dealing with law and order, which meets on Wednesday?

Mr Paisley Jnr: Some members here will be at that meeting.

Mr P Robinson: Further consideration should be given to it, and it could be raised on Wednesday.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We have made a lot of progress today, have we not? I have to go, folks.

(The Chairman (Mr Molloy) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Members are advised that we have finished our discussions on strand two issues. Do members wish to begin to discuss strand three issues, or to leave that until the next meeting? Monday is a bank holiday, so it has been suggested that we have our next meeting on Tuesday 29 August, unless members want to come in on the bank holiday.

Mr McGimpsey: That suggestion would have little support.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Is there no consensus on that?

The Committee Clerk: We would have to arrange doorkeepers and open the Building. It would be very difficult.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do members want to continue with other issues in relation to strand three?

Mr P Robinson: Is there anything in that that we have not discussed?

Dr Farren: The British-Irish Council?

Mr P Robinson: I was referring to strand three issues.

Mrs Long: In our discussion on the third part of strand two, we strayed into some strand three items such as the British-Irish Council and a possible secretariat. Much of this has already been discussed.

Mr Campbell: It is equally true that many strand one issues spilt over onto strand two.

Mr McGimpsey: Strand three issues are important. I suggest that we return to that discussion on Tuesday 29 August.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): It may take only one meeting, but there are several different issues for consideration.

Dr Farren: We spoke earlier about familiarising ourselves with the work of the British-Irish Council. We should take that issue seriously between now and then.

Mr P Robinson: That material could be sent out to us before our next meeting.

Dr Farren: There is a great deal of information about the work of the British-Irish Council on its website. I am sure that you have visited it frequently.

Mr P Robinson: It is on my "Favourites" list.

Dr Farren: Good. [Laughter.]

Mr Campbell: He will not tell you what else is on his "Favourites" list.

Mr Ford: Is this private banter, or can anybody join in?

Dr Farren: You might be surprised about what goes on there.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Can information be circulated before the next meeting, so that members are up to date and have something to read on the bank holiday?

Mr P Robinson: We said earlier that we should be provided with reports of meetings of the North/South Ministerial Council and the British-Irish Council.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The report of the Subgroup on the Economic Challenges facing Northern Ireland is to be presented for consideration at next week's meeting, so that will have to be factored into our work programme. We will also have to discuss motions for the plenary debates on 11 and 12 September, which could concern the work of the subgroup or other issues. The report will be available for members of the subgroup before those dates.

Mr P Robinson: May I ask whether officials are drafting reports in parallel to these meetings?

The Committee Clerk: There are separate Committee Clerks for each of the three meetings. We are starting to pull together the reports on the institutional issues, the law-and-order issues, and rights, safeguards, equality issues and victims.

Mr P Robinson: You will be working overtime.
[Laughter.]

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): It is difficult for the staff to facilitate these meetings and also to draw up reports. After today's meeting, the report will start to gel. Much work will be needed to gel everything together.

Mr O'Dowd: At this stage, the only group to confirm that it will present a report to this Committee is the Subgroup on the Economic Challenges facing Northern Ireland.

The Committee Clerk: The subgroup meets tomorrow and on Thursday to agree a report, which it will table before this Committee. If the Committee accepts the report, it will be ordered to be published. At next Tuesday's meeting, members will consider whether they have a motion on the report to submit to the Business Committee, which hopes to meet on 5 September.

We will discuss the code of conduct on 4 September and try to finalise a report on the institutions after that. The report on law-and-order issues will be discussed at the following meeting. The final report on rights, safeguards, equality issues and victims will be discussed at the meeting after that. A timetable is available.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We have parked many issues; the car park has been filling up, and it must now be emptied. We will have to revisit all those issues.

The Committee Clerk: The two Chairmen have discussed the format of the report. All Hansard reports and any papers that the parties have submitted will be included, and the Committee staff will produce a summary. The report will begin with the proposals and issues on which the Committee has agreed, as well as the issues that parties have identified as deal-breakers — we could find another form of words for that, if members prefer — and those that have been parked for further discussion.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The Committee may also wish to consider having a closed meeting, with no Hansard report, to discuss particular issues in detail at some stage.

Mrs Long: Chairman, is that not the normal procedure when a draft report is being discussed, and may that be the appropriate time for a closed meeting?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Yes. If members feel that there would be benefits in having a meeting, or part of a meeting, without Hansard, that can be done at any stage. It only requires parties to agree, and it may give the Committee an opportunity to go into more detail on some of the issues that have been set aside.

Adjourned at 2.13 pm.

COMMITTEE ON THE PREPARATION FOR GOVERNMENT

Wednesday 23 August 2006

Members in attendance for all or part of proceedings:

The Chairman, Mr Francie Molloy
Mr Alex Attwood
Mr Fred Cobain
Mr Danny Kennedy
Mr Fra McCann
Mr Raymond McCartney
Mr Alban Maginness
Mr Sean Neeson
Mr Peter Weir
Mr Sammy Wilson

Witness:

Mr Tim Moore (Senior Research Officer,
Northern Ireland Assembly)

The Committee met at 10.05 am.

(The Chairman (Mr Molloy) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I remind members to switch off their mobile phones, as their signal interferes with the Hansard recording system and means that sections of the meeting can be lost.

Will members state any apologies and, if necessary, name those members for whom they are deputising?

Mr Raymond McCartney: I am standing in for Martin McGuinness.

Mr McCann: I am standing in for Conor Murphy.

Mr A Maginness: I am not sure for whom I am deputising: it is probably Mark Durkan.

Mr Attwood: I am standing in for Seán Farren.

Mr Neeson: I am standing in for David Ford.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are there any deputies from the Ulster Unionist Party?

Mr Kennedy: The poor are with you always.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): You are a permanent fixture.

Mr Weir: Ian Paisley Jnr is due later.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Does any member, who has not attended the Committee before, have any interests to declare?

I shall take that as a no.

Are members content with the minutes of the meeting held on 16 August 2006?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The next matter is our letter to the Secretary of State and his reply. They are fairly lengthy. Members may want, therefore, to take a few minutes to read them.

Do members have any comments?

Mr Neeson: The most important thing in respect of the Secretary of State's willingness to appear before the Committee is that, if he cannot fit in with the dates that we have provided, we should avail ourselves of whatever dates suit him. Hopefully, those dates will be sooner rather than later.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The proposed new date is 3 October 2006.

Mr Kennedy: It is nice of him to give us an early opportunity.

Mr Neeson: We should avail ourselves of that. I formally propose that we accept that date.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are members agreed?

Mr Kennedy: We have been expected to work through the summer at the behest of the Secretary of State, which, in large part, we have done. There has been a wee bit of toing and froing, but there has been a consistent level of attendance from all parties, and we have tried to take our work seriously. We are now heading into September, which was supposed to be the big date in the Secretary of State's mind, when the report of the Preparation for Government Committee would be ready and Members of the Assembly would potentially have the opportunity to debate it in the Chamber.

We have important issues to discuss with the Secretary of State, but he is saying that he is too busy and that it will be October before he can appear before the Committee.

10.15 am

Perhaps I am being overly critical and cynical, but, if this work is as important as the Secretary of State outlined to us at the outset, why is he not prepared to attach equal importance to it and appear before the Committee? A meeting would not be an interrogation of the Secretary of State; he is entitled not to expect that. However, we are entitled to some consideration of the work with which we have been tasked. An important aspect of that is for the Secretary of State to clarify his position, and that of the Government, on a range of issues. If we do not meet the Secretary of State sooner than early October, it could cause problems in preparing a full and final report for consideration by the Assembly.

Mr Weir: I agree with Mr Kennedy. If push came to shove, we would probably have to be ready to report before then anyway. However, it is very poor form that we are being told that 3 October is the earliest date. The importance of this work has been stressed to us, and many of us have given up a fair amount of time. If we were talking about a session with the Secretary of State that would last three or four hours, that would be a different kettle of fish. I assume that we are looking at a slot of about an hour to quiz the Secretary of State.

It also strikes me that, for the Secretary of State, Stormont should not prove to be too inconvenient a venue. We should write back to him, indicating that, in order for us to prepare a full report, we should ideally have a meeting as soon as possible. Faced with the choice of either meeting the Secretary of State at a very late stage or not meeting him at all, I would prefer to have the opportunity to quiz him, even if it were included as an addendum to our report. We should be pressing him. Delaying a meeting until 3 October is treating this Committee with contempt; if he is serious, it should be earlier.

The Committee's letter referred to, in particular, the political impact of his Glenties speech, which it was important to do. It is worthwhile to record that, if the Secretary of State is not available before our report must be produced, the report should indicate that we would have benefited from the chance to speak to him. However, we should not give up at this stage. The Secretary of State should realise that, if he does not make himself available, whatever report we produce will not be as advanced as we would have liked.

The Secretary of State is a great man for telling us that particular deadlines must be met. However, he is not facilitating anybody to meet deadlines, as he seems to be putting us very much on the long finger. I have a degree of incredulity that he cannot spare one hour between now and 3 October. We must tell him that, if he is not prepared to shift his position, while a report will be produced, the process will not be as advanced as we had hoped.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The proposal was that we would agree the report by 13 September.

Mr Attwood: I echo some earlier comments. I do not know whether it was pointed out to the Minister's private office that, thus far, and by agreement, the Secretary of State has been the only person whom the Committee has wanted to see.

The Secretary of State might be mindful that, in order to make the workings of the Committee tight and focused on outcomes, and, rather than have a long list of witnesses, members chose to invite only him. That reflects the serious intent around the table and the serious role that he has to play in assisting the Committee.

The Secretary of State must be mindful and respectful of the constraints that he placed on the Committee and on its ability to report back to the Assembly. He set those limits and constraints, and it would seem necessary, therefore, that he comply with his constraints on the time frame within which the Committee has to report. Given those two matters, and the fact that there will be a gaping hole in the report if we do not get a greater sense from the Secretary of State about where he sees the policing issue being played out over the next four months, we should go back to the Secretary of State. Certainly, we should accommodate his diary, but we must ask him to accommodate the time frame that he set by agreeing to see the Committee before the middle of September.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We will do that and see whether there is another date, which means that members have accepted Sean's proposal that we meet with the Secretary of State.

Mr Neeson: Yesterday, you chaired the subgroup on the economic challenges facing Northern Ireland, and you know that its report will be finalised tomorrow for presentation to this Committee. The subgroup agreed that, as it will meet the Minister, Maria Eagle, on 5 September, it would provide an addendum to its report. As Peter Weir suggested, that may well be the way forward for this Committee also.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The proposal is that we ask the Secretary of State to make himself available during early or mid-September at the latest. Failing that, the Committee will take up the offer of 3 October.

Mr Kennedy: If we are going to play poker with him, we might as well not show our hand at this stage. Let us reserve our position on the October date until we see whether he can better that offer.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are we agreed?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The Committee Clerk will write to the Secretary of State to try to negotiate a different date.

As regards the rest of the Secretary of State's letter, in relation to Assistant Chief Constable Sheridan, there has been no direct response to our request, but it seems that the information is not available.

Mr Attwood: What was that, Mr Chairman?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I am talking about the request for information from Assistant Chief Constable Sheridan and the response in the Secretary of State's letter. The letter does not provide any details: it says that the matter is outside the role of the Assembly.

Mr Attwood: There are two matters that the Committee should pursue. First, in relation to national security accountability, the Secretary of State's letter states:

"Developmental work is in hand in this area."

How are national security issues being handled in general terms, and what type of information could the Policing Board, the Minister and the Assembly expect to receive? The Committee should ask Clare Salters to advise when the NIO anticipates that the developmental work could be shared with the parties.

Secondly, under public order and the role of the army, the letter states:

“Consideration is currently being given to what powers the army may need post-normalisation.”

Two areas are then named: “public order” and “explosive ordinance disposal”. We should enquire whether those are the limit of the powers that the Army may need post-normalisation. Public order and explosive ordinance disposal powers are broadly consistent with the Patten Report.

However, we should enquire whether the Government believe that the Army may require other powers post-normalisation that go beyond those outlined by Patten. We should ask Clare Salters to provide an indicative list of all powers that the British Government anticipate that the Army will require post-normalisation in order to operate effectively. We may not get those answers between now and the end of the Committee’s duration. However, we should ask for that information to be provided as soon as possible.

Mr Kennedy: I suspect that “public order” and “explosive ordinance disposal” do not comprise an exhaustive list of the Army’s post-normalisation role. In the past, the Army has managed situations involving the emergency services such as during the strike by the Fire and Rescue Service, where the Army deployed “Green Goddesses”.

Mr Neeson: I would like a definition of “normalisation”; that has never been made clear. By the same token, there has never been a clear definition of “ceasefires”. What do “ceasefires”, whether they be loyalist or republican, mean? In order to make progress, it is important that we have clear definitions of those terms.

Mr Cobain: To reiterate what we said last week, we should not be bound by what the Patten Report does, or does not, say. That issue is gone. The SDLP can float in and out of the Patten Report whenever it suits. I hope that the Committee will not be held to the criteria that the Patten Report set for the future role of the Army, or for any other issue. As far as the UUP is concerned, the issue of the Patten Report is finished. It cannot be used in discussions as the criteria for the devolution of policing and justice.

Mr S Wilson: The SDLP continually harks back to the Patten Report, despite having already accepted that the Policing Board has torn up parts of that report. Recruitment of constables from outside Northern Ireland is not done on a fifty-fifty basis, which is contrary to the Patten Report. The SDLP was happy to sign up to that on the Policing Board. In fact, I do not believe that the SDLP made any complaints because it realised that the report disastrously denuded the police force of skilled detectives and that, therefore, those constables were needed.

Likewise, the SDLP accepted that the recruitment of part-time reserve officers was not on a fifty-fifty basis. The board is discussing the recruitment of police community support officers, which was not recommended by Patten — again, the SDLP has no difficulty with that. The SDLP has been quite happy to dispense with chunks of the Patten Report when it has suited them.

The Northern Ireland Office is considering a post-Patten Report period. The Police Service has applied for money under the Patten Report, but has been told that things have moved on and that it must fund various projects from its own budget. The latest example of that is the police college.

That is right — if we keep ourselves tied to arrangements that are now nearly 10 years old. Things have moved on, and we must move on from Patten.

10.30 am

At every meeting, we return to the issue of national security. To me, it is a dead issue. National security is controlled by central Government in other parts of the UK; it will not, therefore, be devolved. As the Northern Ireland Office pointed out in its letter, arrangements to establish the protocols will be made between the police and the security services. National security will not be included in the remit for this Committee or the Assembly. Alex Attwood has some sort of infatuation with national security, and, therefore, every week, we come back to it. At some stage, we really must stop indulging him and move on.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I know that there are issues around policing to be discussed, but can we concentrate on the Secretary of State’s letter?

Mr Kennedy: From the SDLP’s remarks, it could be interpreted that it expected Northern Ireland, at some point, to be an army-free zone. That is not a sensible assertion, neither is it very desirable. It bears no relation to reality: not least because of the significant military tradition in Northern Ireland, and the fact that a garrison will remain and, therefore, would be available in the event of any emergency, whether it concerns international terrorism or issues of national security.

Mr A Maginness: I take issue with the rather personalised criticism that was made, and it should be put on record that the SDLP’s concerns about national security and the security services are important issues, which this party will continue to pursue vigorously on the Policing Board and elsewhere. To characterise them as the personal obsession of a member of the Policing Board — or a member of the SDLP, namely Alex Attwood — is absolutely wrong. It is reflective of — [Interruption.]

Mr S Wilson: I could be much more offensive than that if you wanted.

Mr Kennedy: He is only warming up.

Mr S Wilson: Ask Fra McCann.

Mr A Maginness: I know well that Sammy Wilson can be extremely offensive. However, I am making a serious point: to characterise this as the personal obsession or hobby horse of an individual member of the SDLP is absolutely wrong. The SDLP is committed to pursuing those issues and will pursue them vigorously.

Mr Kennedy: Apologise, Mr Wilson.

Mr Raymond McCartney: The NIO's letter refers to the British Army's role in supporting policing and public order. The British Army's record in public order situations is not very good. Sinn Féin will oppose that strenuously and ensure that it is not one of the roads taken.

Mr Attwood: There could be consensus on this. I suggest that, in due course, the British Government might be asked to advise the parties, this Committee and the Assembly, of the developmental work on national security matters. My reason for suggesting that — contrary to what Sammy suggested — is that the letter from the British Government says:

“... those with responsibility for overseeing policing, including the Assembly in due course, will need to understand how national security issues are handled in general terms and what type of information they can expect to receive in relation to policing matters that bear on national security. Developmental work is in hand in this area.”

It is the British Government's intention that the parties around this table and the Assembly should receive and understand certain information and, at the moment, they are working to provide that information.

Perhaps Sammy should re-read the letter. The British Government are saying that the matter is not off-limits, the Assembly will have a role, and that they are developing an understanding of what that role might be. I suggest that there should be consensus, and that the developmental work that is in hand should, in due course, be communicated to the Committee and the Assembly.

I accept what the Patten Report said about the Army, whether I like it or not. I am surprised that Sinn Féin does not now accept that Patten provides the threshold in respect of the role of the Army in the North, having said previously that it did. However, that is for Sinn Féin to explain.

The SDLP accepts what Patten said and, therefore, accepts that the Army has a role. It is important to know every element of that role. Of course, the Army will have a role during strikes and similar emergencies. However, is that the height of the Army's power or, as I suspect, is there more?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Perhaps we can short-circuit the discussion by getting consensus on Alex's proposal to ask the Secretary of State to share with this Committee information on the developmental work on national security matters. I am sure that all members want to know that. Is there agreement?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Alex's second proposal is that the Secretary of State's office be requested to provide an indicative list of all powers that the Army may require post-normalisation. Are members agreed?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The other issue was the definition of normalisation and ceasefire. Whom do we ask for a definition of ceasefire?

Mr Cobain: Various Secretaries of State have reiterated their definition of ceasefire. They have said that they take ceasefires “in the round” — whatever that means.

Mr Weir: Basically, it means whatever suits them.

Mr S Wilson: It varies from one week to another.

Mr Neeson: Given ongoing paramilitary activities, it is important that we are clear in our own minds not only on our definition of a ceasefire but on the Government's definition. That also applies to normalisation. What is normalisation? For example, if the UDA and UVF declare a ceasefire, is that normalisation? Clear definitions are important to enable us to move forward.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We could discuss that with the Secretary of State, if he comes to the Committee.

Mr Neeson: I would like something before that.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do members agree that we write to the Secretary of State about that?

Members indicated assent.

Mr Kennedy: It will be November before he comes back to us on that. [Laughter.]

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): As there are no further issues arising from the Secretary of State's letter, we will discuss firearms and explosives. Mr Tim Moore will give us more detail on that.

Mr T Moore: There is a research paper in members' packs entitled ‘Firearms Devolution Scotland’. The NIO discussion document suggested that Northern Ireland might wish to follow the Scottish model of devolution in relation to firearms. The NIO characterised that model as one in which routine firearms regulation is a devolved matter but that the:

“business of regulating the use of prohibited weapons, such as automatic weapons ... remains reserved to Westminster.”

The Committee asked for further information on that.

The NIO characterisation is somewhat misleading and oversimplified. To explain my understanding of that, I draw members’ attention to paragraph 4 of my paper, which states that, under the Scotland Act 1998, firearms are a reserved matter. In effect, that means that it is the equivalent of an excepted matter in Northern Ireland.

However, paragraph 8 of my paper states that provisions in the Scotland Act 1998 have made it possible to devolve powers to Scottish Ministers in areas that are, in effect, reserved. An example of that applies to the Firearms Act 1968, which states that the Secretary of State can authorise:

“persons to possess prohibited weapons.”

It is important to add that the ability to change the list of prohibited weapons has not been devolved to Scottish Ministers. The Secretary of State’s power is to grant a certificate or to grant the authority to hold a prohibited weapon. That includes what may be termed “automatic weapons”, in that, with constant pressure on the trigger, they will release two or more bullets.

In Scotland, firearms matters are reserved, although certain functions have been devolved to Scottish Ministers. Today’s members’ pack includes a table that sets out the Secretary of State’s functions under Northern Ireland legislation. Presumably, if members were to choose to follow the Scottish model, those functions, rather than overarching control of the legislation, would be devolved.

By way of example, last year, a young child was killed by an air rifle in Scotland. Public concern was such that the Scottish Parliament debated the incident and considered whether they could legislate for future occurrences. They discovered that they could not. The designation of which types of weaponry are generally prohibited remains with Westminster. The ability to authorise someone to hold those weapons is devolved to Scottish Ministers. That is how the devolution settlement works for firearms in Scotland.

Mr Kennedy: I am reading the email from the Scottish Executive, and it is interesting to note that Ian Fleming now works there.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Is the Committee content to recommend that Northern Ireland goes down the same route as Scotland, or do members wish to opt for a different procedure?

Mr Raymond McCartney: Sinn Féin will argue for the maximum transfer.

Mr Attwood: Members have only just received the paper. Given that it covers such a significant area and must be read alongside the Firearms Order 2004, the SDLP will have to reserve judgement. We need to see the differences between what Northern Ireland and Scotland have at the moment, and what further differences there might be between what Northern Ireland should have and Scotland might have. We might indicate agreement at the next meeting but we need to analyse the matter more thoroughly.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are there any other views?

Mr Kennedy: The Ulster Unionist Party would be content to adopt the Scottish model.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Given that more information is required, we do not have consensus. We will put that issue in the car park with the others.

Mr S Wilson: What storey have we reached?
[Laughter.]

Mr Weir: We are queued outside, waiting for an issue to come out before we can put another one in.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): This Preparation for Government Committee, which is dealing with law and order, passed the parades issue to the Preparation for Government Committee dealing with equality, rights and safeguards. Although that Committee discussed parades, it left the subject for further consideration and did not define it in detail.

Mr S Wilson: How unusual! [Laughter.]

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Yes. Other than acknowledge the work of this Committee, it has not discussed the parades issue further. Do members wish to make any comments on those matters? Are you happy to leave parades with the Preparation for Government Committee dealing with equality, rights and safeguards?

Members indicated assent.

Mr Kennedy: Did this Preparation for Government Committee not resolve something similar?

Mr Attwood: That was about membership of the Parades Commission and appeals against Parades Commission determinations. There are two residual matters.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The appointment of members to the Parades Commission was passed to the Preparation for Government Committee dealing with equality, rights and safeguards for its consideration.

Mr Attwood: That is right, but we must still make a decision on appeals. The Secretary of State's letter indicates that the British Government think that appeals against Parades Commission determinations will be devolved to the Assembly and to the relevant Minister. That is noteworthy.

10.45 am

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Does the Committee wish to deal with that today?

Mr Kennedy: That is another issue that we would like to examine more closely with the Secretary of State. That is clearly the Government's initial view on the matter.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The Clerks will gather some more information on that. The problem with parking issues is that it will take a few long meetings to clear them up later. The more we can deal with today, the better.

We will move on to discuss the explosives issue.

The Committee Clerk: There was a question whether explosives should fall within the responsibility of the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety or the proposed Minister for policing and justice. This format of the Preparation for Government Committee, dealing with law and order, referred the matter to the Preparation for Government Committee dealing with institutional issues, which decided to refer it back to this Preparation for Committee. As well as a car park, we need bats. [Laughter.]

Mr Weir: It is like a hand grenade with the pin taken out.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): It is a good job that it is not cricket.

The First Minister and Deputy First Minister may have to decide on the matter when they determine which Departments should deal with which issues. Do members have any further comments?

Mr S Wilson: To refresh our memories, is the issue about which Department should deal with the legislation or monitoring or which Department should deal with transportation, storage, and so on?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): It is about which Department should deal with the legislation.

Mr S Wilson: If the departmental responsibility would involve the transportation and storage of explosives, the Health and Safety Executive for Northern Ireland would probably be better placed to deal with it. If it is a wee minor issue like that, can we not make some decision on it, rather than kick the issue back and forth?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Transportation may currently be a particular problem, but, in a normal situation, a company, under the supervision of the Health and Safety Executive, would undertake that. The issue concerns the management of explosives, dealing with legislation regarding permits, and so forth.

Mr Kennedy: It seems to be a public-safety issue more so than one of law and order.

Mr Neeson: As members know, explosives are manufactured in Carrick —

Mr Kennedy: Legally or illegally?

Mr S Wilson: Both, actually. [Laughter.]

Mr Neeson: The police always accompany the vehicles carrying explosives, so it could be a policing issue, although I also see the health-and-safety aspect.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): What do we do?

Mr Cobain: This is a health-and-safety issue, not a policing issue. It may be a policing issue because of the particular circumstances in Northern Ireland, but throughout the rest of the UK it is a health-and-safety issue. A home must be found for it somewhere, and it would sit more comfortably with the Health and Safety Executive than with the police.

Mr Weir: I agree with Fred's point; it would not be a unique situation for an agency outside the criminal justice field to deal with a matter that has policing implications and that involves liaising with the police. This is probably a health-and-safety issue. I suspect that it is not the most controversial issue in the world.

Mr S Wilson: Let us be bold and make a decision.

Mr Weir: We could perhaps bank the issue.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We consider explosives to be a health-and-safety issue and recommend that it be dealt with by the Health and Safety Executive. Is that agreed?

Members indicated assent.

Mr Weir: Should we contact the 'Belfast Telegraph' and tell them to hold the front page? [Laughter.]

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I am sure that they will have it.

We will move on to policing matters; some issues were dealt with, and there was the opportunity to come back to deal with some others. We did not resolve them all.

Mr Attwood: Policing or justice issues?

The Committee Clerk: Last week we had a list of three issues under the general heading of "Policing". Those were "Intelligence Services", "Policing issues" and "Police Ombudsman".

Mr Cobain: Score "Intelligence Services" off.

The Committee Clerk: "Intelligence Services" was completed. The "Police Ombudsman" discussion was completed, but the Committee agreed last week that it might want to return to general policing issues to raise any further points.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I think that we may have had that debate this morning.

Mr Raymond McCartney: Although we have had good, broad discussions on the issue, it would be a good sign of the real progress that we are making on this Committee if we could firm up the timescale for transfer.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): There was a proposal passed at one stage. Was it left that policing and justice would be transferred “as soon as possible”? Can someone remind me?

Mr Kennedy: The Alliance Party proposed that powers be devolved as soon as possible, but Sinn Féin objected to that.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Is there any further agreement regarding the earliest possible date, or any particular date?

Mr Kennedy: It is hard to improve on “as soon as possible”, I would have thought.

Mr Cobain: Mr Attwood is working on that now; he is trying to think that one out.

Mr Attwood: The SDLP’s view is quite simple. We believe that if the institutions of Government are restored, that will be on the basis that all parties have signed up to all the requirements for restoration and for the stability of the institutions thereafter. If that is the basis on which people are going into government — that there is a basis for sustainability and stability — devolution of justice and policing should happen without delay. If there is a basis for government, in our view, there is a basis for the transfer of policing and justice powers.

The British Government, as I understand it, will argue that there are requirements in respect of enabling secondary — not primary — legislation around some issues, and that it will take time to set that in motion before we get to the point of actual transfer. I want to have that conversation with the British Government to see whether that is just a delaying tactic or a genuine reason.

Subject to that proviso, the SDLP thinks that the devolution of policing and justice should happen without any further delay. We believe that if there is any delay, a shadow Ministry should be considered in the interim period, whether that be a month, two months or six months. In that short time frame prior to the devolution of policing and justice powers, there should be a shadow Ministry so that when power is formally devolved everybody, including the Minister or Ministers, hits the ground running. Furthermore, if in that short time there are any teething tensions between the British Government and the NIO about what should be devolved, it will give an opportunity for such issues to be worked through.

We are arguing that if there is restoration, there should be devolution of policing and justice. If the British Government present some technical reason to delay that, the time frame should be as short as possible, during which time we should have a shadow Ministry so that people know what the business is about, especially as some of it will be controversial.

I would like to think that there would be some consensus, because if we can go into government because we are confident that people will live up to their responsibilities in government, given the fact that we all want to govern and that in order to govern there must be the power to govern, why not have policing and justice devolved immediately or in the shortest possible time frame? Or is it that some parties will have restoration only on their terms rather than on fair and equal terms?

Mr Weir: I do not want to rehash this argument, because we have gone into detail already. I do not know if Mr Attwood is being slightly mischievous in the way that he has made his proposal. The DUP has been clear. The devolution of policing and justice has always been dealt with separately from the devolution of other Departments. It has been put at a different level, which is why it was not devolved in 1998. The Executive, during its existence between 1999 and 2002, did not have policing and justice powers devolved to it. Greater community confidence is required for the devolution of policing and justice than for the creation of an Executive.

That fact has been acknowledged by the Government. It would be useful, and we would all be keen, to tease out the Government’s position on this issue. The Government have made their position clear in Westminster about the various locks that would have to be opened before policing and justice could be devolved. If there is a strong desire, or an acceptance, that policing and justice should be devolved at a particular time, the Government are not going to stand in the way. It is not simply a matter of the Executive being set up and clearing aside the technical issues; it is a question of trying to gain that public community confidence that does not exist at present.

We want Northern Ireland to be stable and peaceful enough for confidence to be built up to the extent that people are keen to see the devolution of policing and justice. That is our aim, which is why we signed up to the formula of “as soon as possible”.

Completely wrong signals are being sent out if we start to chat about shadow Ministries. Leaving aside the extent to which people would be employed without having roles and responsibilities, it is not simply a question of getting the Assembly back and automatically starting a short countdown to the devolution of policing and justice. That will come with community confidence.

The DUP is prepared to back the formula of devolving policing and justice “as soon as possible”. We should not be tied into specific time frames or a process that automatically triggers devolution of those powers at some stage. A long open-ended process or shadow Ministries would be meaningless. Therefore, with respect to Mr Attwood, the DUP does not favour his suggestion.

Our position and, I suspect, the positions of the other parties, has not changed. We had a lengthy debate on this issue. Members can give their views, but it is not productive to revisit the issue.

Mr Neeson: This is a sensitive issue, and we have not even agreed on how the Minister would be elected or chosen. It is important that the institutions are working collectively and in good faith. A timetable of two years has been suggested. I agree with Mr Weir about policing and justice being devolved “as soon as possible”. The institutions must work and the public must have confidence in those institutions.

Mr Raymond McCartney: The issue of public confidence was discussed at an earlier meeting. The DUP argues that there must be public confidence before the institutions and the justice Ministry are set up. If an Assembly is up and running, there will already be primary legislation in Westminster that states that policing and justice will be devolved “as soon as is practicable” — which seems to be what the unionists are suggesting — but also within a time frame of 12 months. It would send out a positive signal to everybody if, when the institutions are restored, there is an indicative time frame for a justice Ministry to be set up.

11.00 am

Mr A Maginness: As time goes on, I am becoming more confused by the DUP position. The DUP seems to be saying that if people fulfil, and live up to, their responsibilities, all obstacles to the full devolution of policing and justice powers would disappear. The phrase “as soon as possible” seems to be an immediate consequence of that. If that is so, the DUP should have no reservations about a transfer of powers as quickly as possible.

The British Government have passed enabling legislation so that matters can be dealt with reasonably quickly. Some secondary legislation may be required; we can ask the Secretary of State about that issue and get a guarantee that it would be dealt with quickly. Custom-made secondary legislation would be needed to deal with all outstanding matters.

If the DUP wants the transfer of policing and justice to be delayed, that adds further conditions and is contrary to the spirit of what the DUP originally said, which was that if people fulfil their responsibilities, matters can be dealt with as soon as possible. I am really confused about the DUP position; it must be clarified.

In a shadow Ministry, a Department would be set up with a Minister, or Ministers, in place by whatever mechanism might be used to establish that; powers that can be transferred immediately are devolved to that Department so that the Minister, or Ministers, in charge can exercise them. There may be some delay in additional powers being transferred, but at that point the Minister, or Ministers, would be in place. In that sense, there is a shadow Department, but I would not get hung up on the word “shadow”.

Mr S Wilson: I am not sure where the confusion lies. Perhaps it lies within the SDLP, rather than between the SDLP and the DUP. All SDLP MPs voted for the Northern Ireland (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 2006. An important part of that legislation states that the devolution of policing would not automatically follow the devolution of other powers to Northern Ireland, but would be dealt with separately. The First Minister and the Deputy First Minister would first have to table a motion in the Assembly that would have to be carried by a cross-community vote, at which point Westminster would hand over the powers.

That was all subsequent to devolution. If there is confusion, it must be within the SDLP, or perhaps Alban is out of line with his three parliamentary colleagues.

Those are the facts. The reason that this issue is different from other matters to be devolved is quite clear, and was well articulated during the debate on the Bill: it is different because of the importance of public confidence. Policing and justice can be devolved only when people are satisfied that there is a willingness to work within the rule of law.

The entire tenor of that debate was that devolution of policing and justice could take some time. We have made no secret that it could take some considerable time for confidence to be built and that it would depend on how parties behaved in the Assembly and on what was happening outside it. That was all well articulated and clearly explained, yet the SDLP voted for it. This is not some new condition, but something that has been argued out. That is why the legislation was framed in that way.

Mr Attwood: The consequence of the Northern Ireland (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 2006 means that, on day one of the Assembly, the First Minister and Deputy First Minister can table a motion and that there can be a cross-community vote.

There is no confusion or inconsistency in the SDLP's position. Policing and justice can be devolved on day one or in week one or in month one. If sufficient confidence exists for a party to enter Government, sit in the Executive and participate in an Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister — whether it is a joint office, as prescribed by the SDLP, but from which the DUP and Sinn Féin have now backed away — the power and ability to devolve policing and justice exist on day one.

We argue that the required level of confidence can exist from day one because, by going into Government, a party accepts that it has a level of confidence. The only remaining issue thereafter would probably be some residual secondary legislation that might take a little more time to deal with.

The DUP is prescribing a veto, which was outlined in the comprehensive agreement, on when devolution of policing and justice happens. Had we negotiated that agreement, we would not have conceded that veto; nonetheless, the DUP has that veto. On a whim, elements in the DUP may want to use it.

For that reason, rather than let the Assembly be subject to that weapon, people should get their heads around the idea that, if the power exists on day one, it should be used on day one. Doing so will bind people much more closely to the institutions and to accepting their responsibilities. It will also prevent parties playing fast and loose with democracy and the institutions, which was one of the problems with the first Assembly.

Mr Kennedy: Let me helpfully add to everyone's confusion about a couple of the party positions. The leader of the DUP informed us at one stage that all the issues had been effectively resolved. The comprehensive agreement says, in annex A:

"Agreement reached on modalities for devolution of Criminal Justice and Policing".

In paragraph 8 of the Governments' own preamble to the agreement, it says that:

"the British Government will initiate discussions with the parties on the modalities of devolution as soon as the IICD has confirmed the completion of IRA decommissioning, with the aim of agreement by the time the Executive is established. On that basis the British Government will commit to introducing into Parliament by the summer of 2005 the legislation necessary to permit devolution to take place. Such legislation will come into force as soon as possible, once sufficient confidence exists across the community".

Annex F, the Sinn Féin statement on policing, says that:

"As a result of our discussions we now have a commitment from the British Government and the DUP to the transfer of powers on policing and justice to the Assembly as soon as possible".

Why Sinn Féin would now object to the phrase "as soon as possible" is beyond me.

I thought that would helpfully continue to confuse everyone. [Laughter.]

Mr Raymond McCartney: On the broader question, it is down to whether this Committee, when it makes its report, wants to put on record an indicative time frame. We should propose whatever we feel is the consensus view of the indicative time frame. Let us define "as soon as possible".

Mr S Wilson: A couple of meetings ago, I actually proposed what Mr Kennedy has read out from the comprehensive agreement. We want to see the devolution of policing and justice, but there is no point if the community has no confidence that those in charge will support the rule of law.

Mr A Maginness: May I make an intervention after Mr Wilson has finished?

Mr S Wilson: Yes, after I have finished.

We now have two or three pieces of evidence. First, we have the comprehensive agreement, in which the phrase "as soon as possible" provides the only indicative timetable. There is the legislation, referred to in that agreement, which again sees devolution of policing and justice as a separate step from the devolution of other functions to the Assembly. Furthermore, the Secretary of State, in the preamble to that agreement, as Mr Kennedy pointed out, accepted that the requirement for community confidence is a further step beyond what is required for devolution before we can have the devolution of policing and justice.

The Secretary of State is saying it. The legislation — supported by the SDLP MPs in Westminster — is saying it. Indeed, Sinn Féin almost appears to be accepting it. I used the phrase "as soon as possible" because one of the Sinn Féin representatives used it, echoing what was in the comprehensive agreement, so I felt that we would get consensus around that.

We are not going to set a date, because then that date becomes all-important and the conditions necessary to create community confidence fade into the background. Everybody works towards a date — two years, or six months, or whatever it happens to be — and we just sit back and wait for it to arrive, rather than work towards building that community confidence. That is why it is important not to set a deadline, but to simply say that we want it to happen and that there are certain things that have to take place before it can happen, and then to work towards ensuring that those things take place. That is the way of getting devolution as soon as possible — not by simply setting a time.

11.15 am

Mr A Maginness: The DUP's argument is that there must be sufficient confidence within the community to form an Executive and bring back the Assembly in its fullest form, and that there must be further confidence in the community in order to devolve policing and justice powers.

That is a contradictory position. If there is sufficient confidence within the community to form an Executive, which is exercising very substantial budgetary powers — £8 billion or more — then it is incredible to say that in relation to policing and justice, in which there are many safeguards, there needs to be further confidence.

Either you have community confidence or you have not. That confidence must cover all the functions of Government and cannot exclude one specific function of Government in Northern Ireland. If you use the phrase "as soon as possible" in its common parlance, it means that you do something immediately, provided —

Mr S Wilson: Provided that the conditions are met.

Mr A Maginness: No, provided that it is practical to do so in the sense that the legislation is in place, and it is simply a matter of practicalities. If not, the phrase "as soon as possible" is a bogus term being used by the DUP simply to put a good political gloss on its untenable political position.

Mr S Wilson: It is a phrase backed by the Secretary of State, legislation and Sinn Féin.

Mr A Maginness: Policing and justice powers should be devolved immediately on the formation of an Executive, or no more than six months later. That is the sort of approach we should be taking, rather than using a phrase that seems good but, when you parse and analyse the DUP's position, becomes meaningless.

Mr Raymond McCartney: "Public confidence" is like "British national security", which we discussed earlier — it cannot be legally defined. Who determines public confidence? We will end up with one party determining public confidence. If an indicative time frame is given — such as once the institutions are set up, as Mr Maginness suggested — then, even accepting that gauging public confidence is allowed to be in the gift of one party, at least we will have moved things on. If not, we will end up looking for a definition for "ball tampering", which nobody seems to be able to give this week either.

Mr Weir: I will not go too much into cricket analogies. To an extent, we are flogging a dead horse, because we have had this discussion already. The sensitivities around policing and justice are greater than around any other potential Government Department. That is why we are having a special Committee to deal with these matters. We are not having a special Committee to deal with the impediments to devolution because of regional development problems or social development problems.

Since devolution occurred in 1999, it has been accepted that policing and justice should be treated as a separate issue. That is why it is not simply the case that a few technical issues need to be sorted out. If that were so, policing and justice would have been devolved within a couple of months of devolution, or indeed at any stage during the lifetime of the Assembly. In any post-conflict situation around the world, policing and justice have proven to be more contentious than any other issues.

The DUP's position has been consistent. It is not a question of one party's having a veto. In many ways, the locks are in place: the devolution of policing and justice must have the approval of the Assembly and the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. The requirements go far beyond the will of the DUP. They are enshrined in legislation.

Danny's quote showed that the DUP's position has not changed. We want to reach a situation — hopefully, sooner rather than later — in which there is community confidence. We can play games with this issue as much as we like. However, it is unrealistic to think that community confidence would be there from day one. The DUP would like policing and justice to be devolved as soon as possible, but we must ensure that the necessary community confidence is there. Almost all the parties, including the SDLP, have accepted the Westminster legislation. Indeed, the SDLP has created a formula based on that legislation.

Ahead of devolution, members can suggest particular time frames or models to devolve policing and justice. However, beyond the acceptance that, when the conditions are right, the devolution of policing and justice must be achieved as soon as possible, it is a matter of community confidence. I doubt whether a proposal could be made that the DUP would support. I suspect that, without stealing their thunder, the Ulster Unionist Party would probably be in a similar position, as might be the Alliance Party. It is crucial that there is community confidence, and, therefore, it is a matter of "as soon as possible" rather a strict time frame.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We are going around the houses. Perhaps we need a couple of proposals to tie up the issue.

Mr Neeson: Everybody is talking about community confidence. The bedrock on which community confidence could be based would be the Executive's showing clearly that they are acting with collective responsibility. During devolution, despite the role of the DUP, nobody could say that Sinn Féin, the SDLP and the Ulster Unionists showed collective responsibility. It did not exist. The basis on which collective responsibility could be shown would be, for example, on whether the Executive could take a coherent view of public disorder and could they accept the operational independence of the Chief Constable?

The Alliance Party has said that, in line with legislation, devolution should be in place for two years before policing and justice are devolved. That is a two-year target: it does not mean that policing and justice could not be devolved sooner.

Once again, I stress that unless collective responsibility is shown to exist, it will be difficult to address the sensitive issue of the devolution of policing and justice.

Mr Kennedy: The comprehensive agreement suggests that, in shadow form, the Assembly would consider modalities for the devolution of criminal justice and policing, and that, if agreement were reached, the British Government would lift suspension and, presumably, provide the opportunity for more discussion on when the devolution of those matters would occur. The comprehensive agreement is silent on when that would happen, other than using the phrase “as soon as possible”. It is silent on the timescale.

Mr A Maginness: I have suggested a proposal.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do you want to put that proposal now and see whether we have consensus? I suspect that we will not, though.

Mr Weir: I would not race down to Eastwood’s bookmakers. [Laughter.]

Mr A Maginness: It is important that the proposal be made. Policing and justice should be devolved immediately following the formation of an Executive, and, if not, it should be devolved no later than six months from that formation.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do we have consensus?

Mr Kennedy: There was a wide-ranging discussion on the same issue, either at the last meeting or the one before. Time goes so quickly in the Committee that one loses track. I believe that there was a proposal in the name of the leader of the Alliance Party, David Ford. My memory of it was that it did not gain consensus. It was vetoed because of Sinn Féin’s objections, although it was supported by the SDLP.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): There were two proposals.

Mr Kennedy: It would be helpful to revisit that issue. Are we going to deal with different proposals on the same matter every week?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We are dealing with this issue because members requested that all matters with regard to policing be finalised. Policing and justice are the two main issues that are dealt with by the Committee. It is correct that the Committee returns to those issues when further developments have been made.

Mr Kennedy: There comes a time when it is appropriate to ask what part of “no” some people do not understand.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): OK. We will consider the two proposals that were made.

The Committee Clerk: On 9 August 2006, Mrs Long proposed that a target date for devolution of policing and justice should be set at two years after restoration of the Assembly. There was no consensus on that. Mr Wilson proposed that policing and justice should be devolved as soon as possible. There was also no consensus on that.

Mr Kennedy: Do the minutes indicate who objected?

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The minutes record that no consensus was reached.

Mr S Wilson: Danny is correct, although the record does not show that. All parties, except Sinn Féin, supported the proposal.

Mr Attwood: That is not the case.

Mr S Wilson: It was the case.

Mr Attwood: It was not the case.

Mr S Wilson: You were not here; I was.

Mr Attwood: I know that that was not the case.

Mr Kennedy: My daddy is bigger than your daddy.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Consensus may not have been reached due to the objections of more than one party. For the duration of this Committee, the minutes have not recorded which parties did not assent to a particular proposal.

Is there consensus on the current proposal?

Members indicated dissent.

Mr S Wilson: I propose that all parties support the transfer of police and justice powers as soon as confidence exists in the community.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Is there consensus on that proposal?

Members indicated dissent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Alex made a proposal earlier. Has that been superseded by Alban’s proposal?

Mr A Maginness: Yes.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We cannot proceed any further on that proposal at present.

Item 3 on the agenda is “Discussion on Prosecutions”. Alban, the SDLP requested that this discussion be held back until you were present.

Mr A Maginness: Why? [Laughter.]

Mr S Wilson: Because none of the rest of them knew anything about the issue. They said that you knew marginally more. [Laughter.]

Mr Cobain: Alban raised several points on that issue when he was last present at the Committee.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Discussion will focus on the NIO letter, dated 15 August 2006, which is at tab 4 of members' papers.

Mr A Maginness: I had sought information on judicial appointments. The information in the NIO letter is self-explanatory. The functions of the independent Northern Ireland Judicial Appointments Commission have been transferred to the Lord Chancellor's Office. Once devolution takes place, those functions will fall within the remit of the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister.

However, at the last meeting, the table was presented in such a way that it was unclear whether those functions would be properly devolved. It is now certain that they will.

"It is intended that, when responsibility for justice matters is devolved, these responsibilities would transfer back from the Lord Chancellor to the First and Deputy First Ministers. This would require a transfer Order under section 86 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998."

That clarifies the situation.

11.30 am

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We move on to community restorative justice (CRJ) and the residual justice issues that Alex wanted to be discussed. Traditionally, each party, in alphabetical order, gives a short presentation.

Mr Neeson: The Alliance Party recognises the contribution that CRJ can make as a complement to existing policing and criminal justice systems. Restorative justice has been used successfully in many jurisdictions, particularly the United States, Canada and New Zealand. It carries benefits for victim and offender alike. However, I must stress that it is suitable only for low-level, non-violent offences. Support for any restorative justice scheme must take into account the continued paramilitary grip on some communities, and the desire of some of those communities to bypass the PSNI and to maintain what are, in effect, local police forces.

The Alliance Party believes that the original draft guidelines were a move in the right direction, but that they must be substantially tightened in the following areas: all groups must work directly with the police and cannot be allowed to bypass them by working through intermediaries; training schemes must be approved upfront, rather than merely inspected after the fact; guidelines must extend to cover CRJ projects that deal with non-criminal and antisocial behaviour; a mechanism is needed to vet individuals who work on the schemes to ensure that they are not currently involved in criminal activity or associated with paramilitary organisations; finally, any CRJ scheme that does not adhere to any formal guidelines should be rigorously investigated.

The Northern Ireland Office does not seem to have any intention of regulating the involvement of CRJ schemes in addressing non-criminal antisocial behaviour. That remains a major problem, and the boundaries between such behaviour and criminal activity are blurred. There may be a danger that groups may label some actions as non-criminal behaviour, in which case NIO guidelines would not apply. How organisations address non-criminal issues will impact on their overall credibility.

Co-operation with the police is absolutely essential; that problem seems to have been significantly tightened in the new draft proposals. However, it must be clearly spelt out that any CRJ scheme can be used only where it has the green light from the police or the Public Prosecution Service (PPS). If either body fails to give direction, no scheme should be allowed to proceed by default.

Once again, I stress the importance of staff who work in CRJ schemes receiving accredited training that has been approved in advance.

In relation to the independent complaints procedures, there should be scope for a third party to make an appeal, rather than limiting the right of appeal to either the victim or the offender.

Vetting is likely to be the most difficult issue with respect to paramilitaries. We do not believe that because someone has a paramilitary past they cannot have a future. Under the draft revised guidelines, only those convicted of an offence after 10 April 1998 will be specifically excluded. We want to ensure that intelligence can be utilised so that those who may not have been formally convicted of any offence since 1998, but who are suspected of being actively involved in paramilitarism, can be excluded.

Mr S Wilson: The value of CRJ schemes in Northern Ireland has yet to be proven. The DUP does not take quite the same view as the Alliance Party that such schemes automatically benefit the community. We have reservations about CRJ as a tool within the criminal justice system.

The current schemes, whether on the loyalist side or the republican side, have associations with people who were involved in paramilitary activity and who are still associated with groups that would be regarded as paramilitary. The DUP sees the schemes as providing a way to impose a different form of policing on the communities in which they operate; hence the resistance to direct involvement with the police — especially on the republican side and perhaps not so much on the loyalist side.

I have reservations about how much of a contribution CRJ schemes can make to crime reduction. However, if schemes are to be authorised and eventually funded, the DUP wants to see the introduction of guidelines similar to those suggested by the Alliance Party. About 80% of the schemes' current workloads involve low-level, non-criminal, antisocial behaviour, which is totally outside the scope of the guidelines laid down by the Northern Ireland Office. That is a concern because it means that, by and large, those schemes will not have to abide by the guidelines.

However, the DUP wants four issues to be taken into account. First, the schemes should deal only with people who have been referred to them by the police or the PPS; they should not take on referrals or cases themselves. That, of course, involves direct interface with the police. Schemes must liaise directly with the police, not simply contact a third party or proxy, such as the Probation Board for Northern Ireland, as had been originally suggested. It is important that there is direct police involvement, otherwise schemes will be seen as an alternative to the current policing arrangements, which is why direct involvement was resisted.

Secondly, people who apply to work in the schemes should be subject to the same vetting procedures as those who apply to join, for example, the police or the police reserve. That would deal with Mr Neeson's concern that there should be access to police intelligence on individuals who may be currently involved in paramilitary activity, even though they may not have not been convicted of an offence since 1998. That is an important safeguard that would allow the public to have confidence that the schemes are not simply a front for paramilitary groups administering their own form of justice.

Thirdly, accredited training and accountability are important. Under the new proposals, a complaint can be dealt with initially by the scheme itself, which is not independent accountability at all. The DUP believes that, since most organisations and agencies in the criminal justice system are subject to independent scrutiny, the same should apply to community restorative justice schemes, given the issues that such groups would deal with. The only exception is the Police Ombudsman, and the DUP wants that situation to be remedied. The SDLP, if it wants to be consistent, will want that too.

Fourthly, it must first be proven that CRJ schemes have a role to play. If they have a role, it must be an integral part of the entire justice regime. CRJ schemes cannot set themselves up as an alternative to existing arrangements, and they must be subject to the same strictures, restraints and accountability as other elements of the criminal justice system.

Mr Raymond McCartney: Sinn Féin supports the concept of community restorative justice. Since its inception in 1999, it has played a meaningful and useful role in improving the quality of life in the communities in which the schemes are based.

CRJ is not an alternative to policing; indeed, community restorative justice, by its own definition, does not see itself as such. Sinn Féin agrees that groups must display the highest possible standards. There should be strict guidelines on accountability and on how groups deal with people. Participants should have accredited training.

In the context of this Committee and the work of any future Ministry, Sinn Féin believes that community restorative justice will play a crucial role in ensuring, and improving, the quality of life in our communities. Most of the schemes' work goes unannounced, and funding has only recently become an issue for them. Many of the people involved work on a voluntary basis; a cross-section of the community represents the community. People must be careful that CRJ is not used as a tool to make political points.

Mr Attwood: The SDLP supports the concept of restorative justice and community restorative justice. Restorative justice is being mainstreamed into the formal justice system, especially where juveniles are concerned.

Raymond said that the "highest possible standards" are required in restorative justice. In that case, and given what the other parties have said, we may be able to reach consensus. We should be able to reach agreement on what "highest possible standards" means when it comes to community restorative justice.

There should be an independent complaints system, which is not what the British Government have proposed. An independent complaints system must be established by statute, and the procedure must include the ability to compel witnesses to attend, to seize documents and to investigate fully any allegations. That is not what the British Government have proposed in their model, which gives the role of administering complaints to another public body.

If the threshold is highest possible standards, the SDLP agrees with the DUP that those standards must apply to all the work of community restorative justice schemes. Given that 80% to 95% of the work undertaken by schemes is non-criminal — and we must discuss what that means — all that work, as well as any criminal matters referred to the schemes by the state, must be governed by regulation.

11.45 am

Having the highest possible standards will require, as the Alliance Party said, a body dedicated to managing the schemes to ensure that they comply with all necessary financial management and human rights standards. A different body will be required to inspect the schemes to ensure that they continue to meet the highest possible standards. I hope that we can agree on that issue. There are other examples of how the highest possible standards might be fulfilled, but I do not have the time to elaborate. Perhaps some work could be done in order for us to reach consensus.

The relationship with the police is central. The British Government's protocol does not address the matter properly. Although they now accept, under the protocol, that there will be no third-party reporting of crime to the police, they have introduced the vague term "direct communication with the police". "Direct communication" could mean many things. If it does not mean a full relationship with the police whereby they are informed and assisted in the investigation of crime, it is a reworking of the failed approach that was adopted in the McCartney case; a third party was used to bring evidence to the police, and no evidence of any use was brought through that third party. Unless "direct communication" means full co-operation with an inquiry into a crime, we could end up with a sham that would legislate against the proper conduct of restorative schemes.

Unless there is an end to exiling, we could end up with restorative schemes where some people in the community are not signing up to proper practice in relation to how people are treated, including vulnerable young people.

Policing arrangements must be accepted in order for community-based restorative justice schemes to prosper properly. Unless all parties advise people to join, and assist, the police, North and South, restorative schemes may operate in a way that does not accept the rule of law, lawful authority and proper policing. Until a proper environment is created, there are real risks that some restorative justice schemes may create more problems than they solve.

Mr Kennedy: Members of the Policing Board have worked hard on this important subject. They have given a useful response to the Government's draft guidelines that is worthy of sensible consideration. The UUP strongly believes that the police, as the civil power, must retain prime responsibility for law and order. There is no doubt about that.

The UUP sees some value in the schemes' work. All schemes must work in conjunction with, and with the direct involvement of, the PSNI. There must be proper vetting. We want to reserve our position regarding the date that has been suggested for the involvement of people with pre-1998 paramilitary/criminal backgrounds. We have serious reservations about that.

We agree with the SDLP about the end of exiling. The police, as the civil power, must not be undermined or circumvented by the work of any community justice schemes.

Mr Neeson: I am interested in Mr Attwood's suggestion of an independent complaints system. Who would set that up, and what would its responsibilities be?

Mr Attwood: An independent complaints system would be set up by the British Government at Westminster, because it would have to be legislation-based. A complaints system based on statute would create certainty and avoid doubt.

The body would be dedicated to complaints and would have no other responsibilities. It would have the powers to compel witnesses, to search property and to seize documents. Unless the body had such powers, a complainant could allege that an alternative justice scheme did something in error, and the scheme could refuse to co-operate with the complaints body by saying that the body did not have the power to make it co-operate. The scheme could refuse to provide documents, saying that the complaints body did not have the power to seize those documents. The complaints system would fall into disrepute very quickly.

The British Government have suggested that people who have been convicted of serious criminal acts might be involved in restorative justice schemes. There is a community imperative that if people who are involved have had a criminal past but have moved on from that past, there must be a statute-based complaints system, with all necessary powers, to protect vulnerable people, especially young people. The probation model does not move us very far.

Mr Cobain: Mr Attwood is correct. We could reach consensus on the issue if all parties hold to what they have articulated this morning.

Restorative justice, as a concept, could be of tremendous assistance to the police in large working-class areas where antisocial behaviour restricts quality of life compared to middle-class areas. There is no doubt about that. In such areas, traditional policing simply does not work.

Mr Wilson said that CRJ has yet to be proven. I work with Greater Shankill Alternatives, which is a professional, open organisation that can verify that its scheme works; its records are open for anyone to examine. Members of the management committee come from a wide cross-section of the community. It is not a paramilitary-run organisation. I can speak only from the loyalist perspective; I cannot speak from the republican perspective. It is run by individuals who believe that restorative justice can deal with antisocial behaviour and low-level crime in working-class areas.

Mr S Wilson: How can the success of community restorative justice schemes be measured?

Mr Cobain: It can be measured in several ways. The schemes work independently on one-to-one programmes and processes with young people who have been involved in antisocial behaviour. Some of those young people become trainers for other kids. That is documented. I take Alex Attwood's point, and there are safeguards all the way through the procedures. The Northern Ireland Alternatives organisations keep records: outputs are checked independently and, if needed, can be verified.

We need to work on restorative justice. It has potential for people in working-class areas who engage in antisocial behaviour. Alex referred to an independent complaints procedure, which is essential, because these are vulnerable youths who have entered schemes voluntarily. That is an important point: people are not forced onto these schemes. Those who want to attend Alternatives can do so freely. An independent complaints procedure is a good idea, and all the strict guidelines that Alex articulated must be in place because these schemes deal with vulnerable youths.

Community restorative justice schemes are an essential extension to the criminal justice system. They alone cannot deal with antisocial behaviour; it does not work like that. Every participant in a restorative justice scheme must be referred by the PPS or the police. Individuals who have committed low-level offences, but do not have those referrals, should not get places on the schemes.

Accredited training should be mandatory for individuals on community restorative justice schemes. If individuals want to participate in the schemes, they would agree to follow a set training procedure, so that they are trained to do a particular type of work.

Up to now, the concept of community restorative justice has been a bit of a hotchpotch. It has not been organised and funded properly, because political tensions take away from what could be an important contribution to society.

Mr McCann: For many years, the area that I live in has had serious problems with antisocial activity. There is an active CRJ group in the area. It is recognised widely, and we have debated the issue at Belfast City Council, that the community, possibly more than any other measure, has the answer to dealing with antisocial activity. The members of the CRJ group come from the local communities and, as a non-violent organisation, it is trying to deal with antisocial behaviour. Believe it or not, I have been told that, on occasion, the PSNI has been encouraged privately to go to the CRJ group, as it is seen as the most effective way to deal with a complaint.

Many SDLP supporters in my constituency use CRJ regularly and are happy with the way in which their complaints are handled, which usually involves mediation between the person offended against and the offenders. Some areas have used CRJ to try to clear up antisocial activity, and their record is better than that of the PSNI.

12.00 noon

The majority of people in my constituency see the PSNI as being part of the problem. Many of those involved in antisocial activity are working as low-key agents for the PSNI and are therefore allowed a free hand.

There is a raft of issues to consider. A former SDLP councillor has had contact with CRJ, as have other groups that deal with, for example, neighbourhood watches. Although there may not be cross-party support, other parties have made use of CRJ.

Antisocial activity is a blight that has to be dealt with, and it can only be dealt with by the community itself. We should consider how we can support the community and its CRJ schemes, because they play an active role in trying to overcome the blight of antisocial activity.

Mr Weir: I want to pick up on Fred's point. Most of us are aware of CRJ groups, but no one has dealt with all 18 of them. However, we can draw a number of conclusions. Although we are not accusing any CRJ group of being run by paramilitaries, our experience is that it is difficult to find a scheme in which at least one person has not, at some stage, been involved with paramilitaries. That is why people are concerned about CRJ.

Some people involved with the schemes must have mixed motivations. Some may well be genuinely concerned about their community and tackling antisocial behaviour and crime in order to benefit their community, but others may want to help paramilitary groups to retain control in their areas. Everyone is not involved for the same reasons.

Although the jury is out as to why people are involved in CRJ schemes, an overall view must be taken. If we do not get this right, some groups may make a valuable contribution but many might make the situation worse by undermining the rule of law and by setting up CRJ as an alternative to the law.

The opportunity for restorative justice to make a valuable contribution hinges on the safeguards and protocols that are put in place. Alex made a reasonable suggestion that the way in which to progress is to take seven or eight different proposals — the Hansard report will detail them — on specific aspects, principally concerning the protocols, to see if there is consensus.

We could probably reach consensus on two or three proposals — for example, training. Although parties will have different views on the remaining proposals, it would still be useful to test them.

Alex's proposals tended to focus on areas where it was felt that there were deficiencies, for want of a better word, in the Secretary of State's or the Government's position. Therefore, it would be productive to bank something by way of consensus that would direct the Government. If there is disagreement on issues such as vetting or on the primacy of the police, the parties will have the opportunity to say where they stand. There may not be agreement, but at least there will be an opportunity for people to publicly express their opinions.

Mr A Maginness: Everybody accepts the value of restorative justice; it has been proved throughout the world. However, the real contentious issues concern community restorative justice.

There is a restorative justice system in the criminal justice system, through the very successful youth conference service, for which the Youth Justice Agency of Northern Ireland is responsible. That arose from the Criminal Justice Review and has been proved to work well. The system is not yet available throughout Northern Ireland, but that is work in progress, and the entire community will, at some stage, be able to access it.

It should be noted that the service has been independently evaluated. The high rate of victim participation is indicative of the fact that it is working well. There is a high rate of satisfaction among victims that the service has produced positive results for them. Equally, offenders have derived considerable satisfaction from the service because it has acted as a brake on further criminal and antisocial activity in the community.

The service has been very positive in trying to divert young people from criminal activity. The Probation Board for Northern Ireland (PBNI) also does good work on diversionary activities for young people. We must bear in mind that such work is also part of restorative justice. We are dealing with the discrete area of community restorative justice, which is contentious, but we should emphasise our support for restorative justice in the criminal justice system as it now evolves.

Going back to the main point, I endorse what Raymond has said. If we are to use community restorative justice, we should aspire to the highest possible standards. There should be a truly independent complaints system and proper, worthwhile and effective training for those involved in the schemes. There should be a proper vetting system for those running the schemes. It is crucial that the engagement between the schemes and the police is clearly seen to be good and positive.

Mr Attwood: I will fast-forward things and take up Peter's point. As there seems to be potential agreement on one aspect of the issue but not on the other, I have drafted two proposals.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Could I bring Raymond in on that point?

Mr Raymond McCartney: People generally feel that community restorative justice schemes are a good concept, although I accept that party political perspectives can influence opinions, as Peter mentioned. However, CRJ must be given space to allow it to work.

Fred mentioned referrals to CRJ schemes by the PPS. If someone wants a neighbourhood dispute to be resolved, the last thing that they want is to go to the PPS, which may take six months to act. We have all witnessed the work of the PPS in the Magistrates' Court and other places, and no one wants to wait six months for a resolution.

We must be careful, because in one breath we say that CRJ schemes are a good idea that should be supported, but in the next mention guidelines and procedures that will, by design, strangle them.

Recently, an 11-year-old girl in Derry who wrote on a wall ended up being fingerprinted and having a sample of her DNA taken. That situation would have been dealt with in a better way through community restorative justice.

We must be careful when using words and phrases such as "vetting" and "use of intelligence" to decide who can work in CRJ schemes, as they are designed to make it impossible for people to work unhindered. The same applies when talking about independent complaints procedures controlled by the British Government, as if, in the past, all independent complaints procedures were above and beyond reproach.

We must bear in mind that CRJ schemes have been running for over seven years in some areas. Despite all the nit-picking and scrutiny, it must be recognised that people have not come up with too many examples of where the schemes have got it wrong. I declare an interest, as my brother Noel, as Alex knows, heads one of the schemes in Derry. People may produce some examples of where schemes have gone wrong, but, in the main, they work well where I live.

Any degree of failure or breakdown would be constantly reported and magnified in the papers, and that is not happening. There must be recognition that the schemes work. We must give them space to work. There should be guidelines and training, and the highest possible standards should be set. However, standards should not prevent people involved in CRJ schemes doing their work.

Mr McCann: Following on from what Raymond said, Sinn Féin has no difficulty with the proper registration and oversight of CRJ schemes. However, one thing that is probably missing from this discussion is any input from the groups themselves. Perhaps representatives from Community Restorative Justice Ireland and other CRJ schemes could appear before the Committee to discuss the issue and submit themselves to our questioning and scrutiny. That may enlighten members on the excellent and, as Raymond said, hard and committed work of people who are involved in community restorative justice.

Mr Weir: Without wanting to pre-empt anything that Alex may propose, we have identified seven issues that could perhaps be considered as proposals. Two or three proposals may achieve some degree of consensus; I suspect that the others will not.

The first proposal is that all community restorative justice schemes should be accountable and subject to an independent complaints commission. The second is that training should be accredited and provided outside the scheme itself; there should not be self-training. The third proposal is that the vetting of anyone who wants to be involved with CRJ schemes should be of the same standard as applies to those applying to join the police force.

Fourthly, all protocols are to be equally applicable to all aspects of work, including antisocial behaviour, to remove the dichotomy between criminal and antisocial behaviour. The same standards should apply to both.

Fifthly, there should be direct contact with the police on all issues being referred to them.

Sixthly, the police should have the prime role within any of the schemes.

Seventhly, referrals should come from the Courts or the legal system — which gives a wee bit of flexibility as to whether referrals come from the police, if they feel that they are not criminal matters, or from the PPS.

12.15 pm

Mr Kennedy: It might be helpful if we could get a note of all of the proposals and then, after lunch, we could go through them and see if we could resolve any of the issues. It would give us a period for reflection over lunch to see if progress could be made.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Alex, do you want to say anything at this stage?

Mr Attwood: Yes. Just to simplify things. There are three areas — and I think we could reach consensus on one of them. We might reach consensus on the other two.

We could get consensus on a proposal — taking what Peter has said — that agrees that there should be the highest standards governing CRJ schemes. That would include an independent complaints system, training and outside accreditation of the work, referrals from the Courts and the inspection mechanism. We could get agreement on those because they are at the more functioning end of restorative justice schemes.

The second proposal, again, borrowing somewhat from Peter, would say that confidence in CRJ schemes requires acceptance of the rule of law and full co-operation with police and justice agencies. It would be a shortened form of what Peter said. I do not think we will get agreement, but the proposal needs to be tested.

The third proposal is on vetting — again, I do not think we will get agreement — nonetheless, a proposal might be framed.

However, by way of comment on what Peter has said on vetting, the SDLP has concerns about current vetting procedures. For example, we believe that the police occasionally rely on what they call intelligence traces and that those have become a mechanism whereby people do not get employment.

I know from hard evidence that so-called intelligence traces are spurious, inaccurate or mischievous. On one occasion, they amounted to somebody being seen in the company of somebody else in a bar. That is not an intelligence trace: that is tittle-tattle, and there is no basis for relying on it.

The above example shows that intelligence traces can impede somebody who is innocent in getting gainful employment in certain sensitive jobs.

I do not think we will agree on vetting. As Peter and Sammy know, the Policing Board kept its options open on the subject because there was not going to be consensus on it. The same will happen here — over and above the much more fundamental issue of who should, or should not, be involved in the schemes. In any case, legislation due to come onto the books next year will mean that people with certain backgrounds before or after 1998, whether in Northern Ireland or in Britain, will not be able to work in a relationship involving children, because the law is being toughened up significantly. Anybody in any part of the North, or in Britain, who may want to work with children and who has a criminal record will not be allowed under the law here or there to work with vulnerable people.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do you have a particular proposal on vetting so that members can think about it over lunch?

Mr Attwood: I will come back to you with the wording, Mr Chairman. I have the wording for the other two proposals but not for this proposal yet. I need to work on that.

Mr Raymond McCartney: I also suggested the possibility that consideration be given to inviting CRJ groups along.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Does anyone have any other proposals?

Mr Kennedy: The UUP will consider all of the proposals, but it wants to add a further proposal that this Committee should condemn the practice of exiling and demand that it be stopped forthwith.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We now have four proposals.

Mr Raymond McCartney: On a point of information, Chairman. What is the link between community restorative justice and exiling? If exiling could be discussed in the context of residual justice issues, then I would agree to it. However, we must be careful that, on reading Hansard, it does not appear that members implied that some sort of relationship exists between community restorative justice and exiling.

Mr Kennedy: If members wish to consider the matter separately as a residual justice issue, I am content with that.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We shall separate the two issues.

We will adjourn for lunch and return at 12.45 pm.

The Committee was suspended at 12.21 pm

On resuming —

12.46 pm

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We have four proposals. Sammy, do you want to open the discussion?

Mr S Wilson: A couple of composite proposals were to be put forward. Peter had about seven proposals, some of which can be encompassed in one proposal. We would be happy to support that.

Mr Attwood: I have drafted a proposal: “The Committee agrees that the full range of highest safeguards and standards should apply to community restorative justice schemes including: an independent statute-based complaints system; accreditation from, and training governed by, an independent dedicated agency; an independent oversight mechanism with all appropriate powers; referrals to the schemes by the justice system; and that a protocol should govern all the work of schemes.”

Mr McCann: I made a proposal regarding CRJ groups appearing before the Committee. Sinn Féin believes that they would provide valuable evidence that would otherwise be missing when the Committee makes decisions. We suggest that groups are asked to make written submissions. Sinn Féin feels that the Committee could not make decisions until there was evidence in the form of submissions from restorative justice groups.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are you saying that the Committee could not reach a conclusion on the proposal today?

Mr McCann: Yes.

Mr Kennedy: Minister of State David Hanson has completed the consultation on the draft protocol for community-based restorative justice schemes. There was considerable input into the consultation exercise, and all that information is already available. I do not see how this Committee, with time being against us, would have the wherewithal to pursue that proposal.

Mr S Wilson: I am at a bit of a loss to understand the purpose of Fra McCann’s proposal. The phrase that Alex Attwood used about the “highest possible standards” was actually Sinn Féin’s phrase. The rest of the proposal, as I understand it, is to flesh that out. Indeed, the proposal deliberately avoids some areas, which, I suspect, may have been contentious. I accept that Sinn Féin have difficulty with parts of what the DUP, the UUP, the Alliance Party and, perhaps, even the SDLP have said.

The highest possible standards means that there should be a complaints procedure for people who are unhappy with the service they received from a CRJ scheme. The staff should be trained to the highest possible standard, working to guidelines that covered all the schemes' work. I do not know why we need to bring groups here and take evidence from them.

Fra McCann said that he has considerable knowledge of the scheme in his constituency. I imagine that that would enable him to make a judgement on the contents of Alex Attwood's composite proposal, which includes several of Peter Weir's points. He should have no difficulty making a judgement without having to invite witnesses to give evidence.

Mr McCann: Having considerable knowledge of CRJ schemes and speaking on their behalf are two very different things. I have said that I am willing to drop my request that CRJ groups appear before the Committee, if submissions could be sent in instead. Sinn Féin cannot make up its mind, or take any decision, without that valuable input.

Danny Kennedy mentioned the draft protocol launched by David Hanson. Many CRJ groups are part of CRJ Ireland, and they have difficulties with the protocol, as does Sinn Féin. Therefore, the party will not be bounced into accepting any protocol without first hearing the voice of, or receiving written submissions from, CRJ Ireland or other CRJ groups.

Mr Attwood: I invite Fra to withdraw his proposal for the following reason. Unlike the Subgroup on the Economic Challenges Facing Northern Ireland, this Committee chose not to invite many witnesses and request submissions so that members' minds could be kept focused on the task at hand — dealing with barriers to the restoration of government. I had to swallow that decision, despite the fact that I was anxious to have MI5 representatives in the North and the Chief Constable appear before the Committee when it dealt with national security issues. I had to pull back because I recognised that in order to bore down into those issues and reach conclusions, the Committee had to work quickly and tightly.

If the Committee allowed a submission on CRJ issues, it would also have to be open to receiving submissions on other agenda items. Thus, the Committee's work would have to be reformulated in a way that would work against it.

Furthermore, community restorative justice has been one of the most high-profile issues of the past eight months and longer. My proposal is not suggesting that we sign up to the Hanson protocol; nobody is suggesting that. Everybody knows where the balls lies on this matter, and there is enough competence around the table — and certainly enough capacity in each party — to allow us to assess the situation and reach agreement.

Mr McCann: I am prepared to withdraw my proposal that the Committee should invite CRJ groups to give evidence in person, but I still believe that written submissions are necessary. The subgroup heard from witnesses and received submissions, and that helped members to form opinions on different matters. The problem with this issue is that we are making a decision based on other people's opinions, not on the opinions of the groups involved.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): One of the Committee's initial concerns was that if one party wanted to invite a witness to appear, another party might request the appearance of another witness to balance that presentation. That would involve many different groups being called as witnesses, and, given that some agencies would be slow to respond, the entire process would be delayed. For that reason, the Preparation for Government Committee adopted a different approach to the subgroup. How do we get round that? We wrote to the Secretary of State, and we received a response; we must now decide whether we want to write to some of the CRJ schemes.

Mr Kennedy: All political parties around the table are aware of the pluses and minuses of CRJ groups. We all have some knowledge and appreciation of how they are viewed and are aware of their strengths and failings. Political lines are being drawn on the issue.

It is a pity that Sinn Féin is using a basic holding tactic to stymie proper discussions. There is an opportunity to make progress on what ought to be a non-contentious issue.

Alex Attwood has produced a composite proposal that, in a true sense, makes an honest attempt to find common ground. Some aspects are missing that I, as an Ulster Unionist, would have liked to have seen included, but I am prepared to give it a fair wind to see if some level of agreement can be reached. By the use of a basic tactic, the issue is going to be kicked into touch and no progress will be possible.

Mr Neeson: Community restorative justice is not a new issue. Alex's proposal tries to include experience from other parts of the world where CRJ has proved to be valuable. I have difficulty in understanding why we cannot reach consensus. Although I raised issues during my presentation that were not included, Alex is trying to put forward the bare principles in order for CRJ to have the highest standards. The best thing to do is to find out whether there is consensus. If there is not, I will have great difficulty in understanding why.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Alex, will you read out the proposal? The Clerks were unable to write down the full details.

Mr Attwood: "The Committee agrees that the full range of highest safeguards and standards should apply to community restorative justice schemes including: an independent statute-based complaints system; accreditation from, and training governed by, an independent dedicated agency; an independent oversight mechanism with all appropriate powers; referrals to the schemes by the justice system; and that a protocol should govern all the work of schemes.”

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are there any issues that members would like to waive or withdraw from the proposal?

1.00 pm

Mr Raymond McCartney: Many issues will need to be clarified, and the projects themselves could clarify them. Is Alex suggesting that no person has the right to go to community restorative justice to seek mediation without first going to the justice system?

Mr Attwood: No, that is not what I am saying.

Mr Raymond McCartney: Your last point was: “referrals to the schemes by the justice system”.

Mr Attwood: I assume, from your experience in Derry, that you know how restorative justice schemes work, unless something is happening in Derry that I am unaware of. This is how it will work: somebody in Derry, for example, goes to the restorative justice scheme. If the matter is criminal, it should be referred to the police, or the restorative justice scheme should say that it cannot go near that matter because it is none of its business. I assume that that is what is happening in Derry because we are told that that is happening.

Mr Raymond McCartney: You said “referrals”. That is a broad term. Did you mean all referrals?

Mr Attwood: No. The justice system would refer matters that it believes are criminal in nature but that are best dealt with by community restorative justice schemes. It means that schemes themselves do not have the power to deal with a criminal matter. That should not be a threat to anybody —

Mr Raymond McCartney: I never said it was a threat; I just wanted it to be clear. I thought you meant that all matters should be referred downwards, and that people should not go directly to community restorative justice.

Mr Attwood: No; as I outlined in my statement —

Mr Raymond McCartney: Someone said earlier that they wanted that to happen, and I wanted to make sure that you were not agreeing with that.

Mr Cobain: We must be careful about this. Individuals cannot say, “I want to participate in the community restorative justice system because I have done x, y or z.” without going through the police or the PPS. That is not where the Unionist Party is coming from.

In our view there has to be a structure: everything has to go through the police or the PPS. No one should be able to go to a community restorative justice scheme without going through the proper channels. That is why I said that community restorative justice should not be something that hangs somewhere outside the criminal justice system. It should be an integral part of both the restorative justice system and the criminal justice system, and we have to get that into our heads.

Mr Attwood: Community restorative justice schemes deal with cases referred to them by the justice system, but referrals can be made in several ways. They can be made through the restorative justice scheme, an individual going directly to the police, or through some other mechanism. The point is that the authority to deal with the matter by the community restorative justice system is via referral of the matter from the justice system. Given that a criminal matter would be involved — however that is defined — that would be the right mechanism.

Mr Raymond McCartney: If I understand Fred correctly, were I to ask community restorative justice to intervene or mediate in a neighbourhood dispute tomorrow, his belief is that the matter should be passed on immediately to the justice system. Are you saying the same?

Mr Attwood: Any matter that can be defined as criminal under the legislation —

Mr Raymond McCartney: That is not the point.

Mr Attwood: Sorry, that is the point.

Mr Raymond McCartney: It is not the point. The point is that it may not concern a criminal offence.

Mr Attwood: The point is that, for example, if you have been assaulted in a dispute over a fence, and it is left up to you to define whether it is a criminal matter, we will end up with abuse of the system. For that reason any matter — any matter — that can be deemed to be criminal in nature has to be referred to the justice system before authority is given to a community restorative justice scheme to deal with it.

Mr McCann: Who defines what is criminal?

Mr Attwood: It is not going to be defined by community restorative justice schemes.

Mr McCann: You have answered the question.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We have probably reached a conclusion. Do we have consensus on the motion that Alex has moved?

Members indicated dissent.

Mr Attwood: The second proposal is that the Committee believes that acceptance of the rule of law and full co-operation with police and justice agencies are essential to the proper working of community restorative justice schemes and public confidence.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do we have consensus?

Mr McCann: Could we have copies of these proposals? Alex is reading something out.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): That is the way it has always been. Members give their statements verbally. We do not have the opportunity to circulate them at this stage.

Mr McCann: I appreciate that, but we are being asked to agree to something that Alex has just written down and has verbally given to this Committee. That makes it very difficult.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Would you repeat that, Alex?

Mr Attwood: I will — the Committee believes that the acceptance of the rule of law and full co-operation with police and justice agencies are essential to the proper working of community restorative justice schemes and public confidence.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do we have consensus?

Members indicated dissent.

Mr S Wilson: The DUP would like to make a further proposal — vetting for anyone who works in community restorative justice schemes should be carried out by the police.

Mr McCann: Sammy is a specialist at these wee late ones.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Did everybody hear that clearly?

Mr Cobain: The area of employability and human rights is a minefield, and we have to be absolutely clear about it. I accept what Sammy is saying, but for people to agree to the proposal they would have to be sure that it could be carried out.

Mr S Wilson: If people apply to join the police —

Mr Cobain: Vetting for employment in the security services is taken as read, but if everybody going for a job had to be vetted it would be a different story.

Mr S Wilson: There are certain jobs in the Civil Service that the same vetting would apply to. This is simply a way of getting around the issue that Danny raised — that if somebody had been guilty of a criminal offence before 1998 and was still involved in criminal and paramilitary activity for which they had not been convicted, and there was intelligence that they were still involved, then we obviously do not want them to be part of the community restorative justice scheme. The only way to assess them would be to use police intelligence when vetting takes place.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): We have a proposal. Do we have consensus?

Mr Attwood: No, because we do not believe the police want to have that job in the first place.

Members indicated dissent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Fra's proposal was that the Committee should request written evidence from community restorative justice groups.

Members indicated dissent.

Mr Kennedy: We do not have the time. It would create a precedent for the Committee. All parties are aware of their own views and the workings of those particular groups and I am not sure that anything new could be provided.

Mr McCann: Earlier, Danny mentioned the recent Hanson document. It is possible that if the groups read their submissions to the Committee that might change minds and influence the likes of David Hanson to deal with the matter in a different way.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): That would seem to be a debate for Belfast City Council. This Committee has a different role. There is no consensus on the issues. If there are no further proposals, we can move on.

Mr Kennedy: Chairman, I had one proposal at the end of the discussion.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Will that come under the next subject of residual justice issues?

Mr Kennedy: Yes.

Mr A Maginness: The SDLP is in favour of Danny's proposal on the practice of exiling.

Mr Kennedy: It was a straightforward proposal that the Committee condemns the practice of exiling and calls for it to be ceased forthwith.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Are there any other comments? Have we consensus?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do members want to raise any other justice issues at this stage?

Mr Attwood: I want to make two points on residual justice. Alban has a couple of points to raise too. I do not know if the Committee will agree on either, but consensus may be easier to achieve on one than on the other. It would be useful to tell the British Government whether there is an agreed view.

My first point is that there is confusion and, arguably, duplication of effort in the work of the district policing partnerships (DPPs) and community safety partnerships (CSPs). Members are aware that there can be tension between the two authorities and, at times, some confusion of roles. As the British Government are intent on re-organising local government in the North, this is the right moment to examine the tension between the two partnerships and consider ways of rationalising and streamlining them. It should be done in a way that makes more sense of their roles and, in particular, given the high profile of the policing issue, protects and enhances the authority of the DPPs.

My second point may be more controversial. In previous negotiations with the British Government, the SDLP, Sinn Féin, the Irish Government and others were concerned about the Public Prosecution Service (PPS) not giving enough reasons for the collapse of trials and for prosecutions not being brought or not being pursued. I raise the issue now for this reason: in light of recent cases, when limited information was given to the people in the North on prosecutions that collapsed, might the Committee suggest to the British Government that issues surrounding the provision of information be re-examined.

Sometimes the SDLP and others were voices in the wilderness when arguing with the British Government about providing information. However, I sense that because of the collapse of one recent trial, and the potential collapse of other trials involving the police, others may now share our concern. For example, Ian Paisley Snr met the Attorney General to express concern about what was happening in relation to one recent case and to discuss what further information should be placed in the public domain.

Perhaps the Committee would agree to a generic motion asking the British Government to review the issues around providing reasons for failures to prosecute or for collapses in prosecutions, in order to better inform the public. The SDLP has always thought that not correcting the failure to provide sufficient information would hamstring the justice system. Recent, and I suspect upcoming, events will demonstrate that this is a potential Achilles heel for confidence in the administration of justice.

1.15 pm

Mr Cobain: We are back to the issue of intelligence. Some of the cases that were not pursued had an intelligence background and we are back to what Sammy said — there are some issues that the Government, or our police service, are not going to divulge. We are just wasting our time. I am all for having as much transparency as possible, but it is just not possible where people are working for the security services, because people's lives are put at risk.

Mr S Wilson: I had not intended raising the second point, but the first point that Alex raised is an issue that the DUP also would be concerned about, regarding the efficiency of administration and the conflicts that can sometimes arise between DPPs and Community Safety Partnerships.

Policing is now regarded as more holistic; it is not just about looking at the policing aspect of a problem but also at what other agencies might do. For example, closing down a rat-run might have been a policing issue in the past, but now, another agency could deal with it.

The artificial distinction made between DPPs and Community Safety Partnerships — and I suspect the reason was political — really does not work. If money is available for safety issues, which can improve policing, make policing easier or help the police achieve targets or objectives set locally by DPPs, then we really have to get to a situation where we amalgamate the two bodies. The DUP would be very supportive of any proposal to reconsider the DPPs and Community Safety Partnerships with a view to merging them.

I would like more time to think about the PPS and reasons that cases collapse. I do not know if we are going to get anywhere on the matter because even the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee in the House of Commons could not get an answer — the Attorney General simply refused point blank to give reasons. The Assembly is unlikely to get reasons either.

I share Alex's concerns on the point. It does lead to a loss of confidence in the whole justice system when a case collapses, or is not proceeded with, and no indication is given as to the reason. If it is due to national security then you are never going to hear anything other than that it is a "security issue", and that would be the end of it. I cannot see any reason that there could not be transparency in cases that do not impinge on national security. National security is only one of the reasons that cases collapse. If a case collapses because of police incompetence then people should know about it. If we are going to come back to this, I would prefer to have a chat with some of my party colleagues before voting on a particular proposal, because it might well be that we can reach consensus.

Mr Raymond McCartney: Sinn Féin has no trouble supporting the second proposal. However, the Committee wants to return to it. My party wants to explore the first proposal further. Perhaps Alex would explain why he believes that the two proposals should be amalgamated.

Mr Neeson: I want to give the first proposal further consideration. However, there are issues with regard to the rule of law that I want to explore.

Mr Attwood: I shall leave the proposals on the table pending the parties' consideration of them.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Shall we proceed to discussion on justice issues?

Mr A Maginness: I referred to the work that has been done on conferencing by the Youth Justice Agency. It would be worthwhile if the Committee were to note the work and progress that it has made in that regard. The Committee must support and commend that work because it is an important development. Indeed, so is the work that the PBNI has done with offenders and ex-offenders.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do you want to make a proposal?

Mr A Maginness: I just want the Committee to note the work that has been done and the progress that has been made.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Is the Committee agreed?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The Committee will return to the proposals on community safety and district policing partnerships.

Sean, did you want to raise an issue?

Mr Neeson: There is ambiguity about what is required from Ministers in the Pledge of Office as regards the rule of law. The pledge requires commitment to the rule of law. My party believes that the wording should be stronger; instead of asking Ministers simply to commit to the rule of law, the Pledge of Office should be amended to contain a commitment to “uphold” the rule of law. There is a big difference.

The Alliance Party is also concerned about what the Government mean when they talk about signing up to policing. My party believes that in order to sign up to policing, people must accept the Police Service of Northern Ireland as a regular, consistent organisation. Support for it should be based locally and centrally.

It is important that parties recognise the Police Service of Northern Ireland as the sole and exclusive legitimate policing agency in Northern Ireland. It is important that, when Ministers take office, they sign up to our proposal that they must uphold the rule of law in Northern Ireland. Parties who take their seats in Government should also be prepared to become members, not only of the Policing Board, but also of district policing partnerships, and take up their quotas therein.

The Alliance Party considers those to be important benchmarks that are necessary for a return to Government.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): That item was under “Any other business”.

Mr S Wilson: Would Sean go beyond that definition? Upholding the rule of law, as he has described it, seems to mean simply supporting the institutions, district policing partnerships, the Policing Board, and so on. I believe that it must go much further than that. Public representatives must encourage people to join, give evidence to, and report crimes to, the police. They should be obliged to do more than just support institutions. They should, on a day-to-day basis, show that they recognise the police as a legitimate authority.

Mr Neeson: I do not disagree. Implicit in what I said is that if people are prepared to become members of the Policing Board and district policing partnerships, they are, by example, encouraging people to support the institutions.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): The issue was discussed at the meeting on 14 August 2006. However, it did not gain consensus. Can a proposal be made today with regard to the issue?

Mr Neeson: The Alliance Party believes that those are the benchmarks for parties taking part in the Government.

Mr S Wilson: Rather than leave it hanging, could we have a formal proposal that the Committee believes that for parties to be included in Government it is essential that they support the institutions of the police and give public encouragement to citizens to support the police and accept their authority.

Mr Neeson: The essential thing is that the word “commitment” is very loose. That is why we use the phrase “commitment to upholding the rule of law.”

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I have a funny feeling that the wording is not going to be the issue. I doubt if we are going to get consensus on this. We should just put it to the floor at an early stage rather than going round the houses.

Do we have consensus on that particular proposal?

Members indicated dissent.

Mr Kennedy: What a remarkable prophet you have become, Chairman. [Laughter.]

Mr Wilson: There was a momentary silence there. I thought, “We’ve got them.” [Laughter.]

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): I did not think it had moved that quickly.

OK. That brings us to the end of that particular issue. Do members want to continue with what is next week’s business with regard to criminality, decommissioning and paramilitarism?

Mr Kennedy: Can we do that next week? We can save ourselves for that.

The Chairman (Mr Molloy): Do members have any other business? No? Next week’s issues for discussion are criminality, decommissioning and paramilitarism.

Adjourned at 1.27 pm.

COMMITTEE ON THE PREPARATION FOR GOVERNMENT

Friday 25 August 2006

Members in attendance for all or part of proceedings:

The Chairman, Mr Jim Wells
Mr Alex Attwood
Mr David Ford
Mr Derek Hussey
Ms Patricia Lewsley
Mrs Naomi Long
Mr Nelson McCausland
Mr Alan McFarland
Mr Philip McGuigan
Mr Alban Maginness
Lord Morrow
Mr Dermot Nesbitt
Mr John O'Dowd
Mr Edwin Poots

The Committee met at 10.04 am.

(The Chairman (Mr Wells) in the Chair.)

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I ask members to switch off their mobile phones. Mobile phone interference has again blotted out vital parts of members' discussions at the previous meeting. We might get this right eventually.

We will go through the apologies and deputies, starting with the DUP.

Mr Poots: Mr McCausland and I are here on behalf of Lord Morrow and Dr McCrea.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Will there be a third Member?

Mr Poots: No.

Mr Nesbitt: Chairman, I am quite clear about the position this morning. I am representing Mr McNarry. When Mr Hussey arrives, he will represent one of the other three UUP members, whose name I do not recall.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr McFarland?

Mr Nesbitt: No.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr McGimpsey?
[Laughter.]

Mr Nesbitt: Mr McFarland will be arriving later; I am very clear that neither Mr Hussey nor I are representing him. I shall be leaving just after 11 o'clock this morning, so it will be your pleasure that I shall not be here.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): On a serious note —

Mr Nesbitt: I am being serious.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Is there a possibility that the UUP will not be represented at all?

Mr Nesbitt: I think that Mr Hussey is coming. I had expected him to be here now, because two UUP members are supposed to be here. I think that Mr McFarland is scheduled to arrive before I leave. However, I was given the clear instruction that neither Mr Hussey nor I are representing Mr McFarland.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): By a process of elimination, Mr Hussey must be Mr Kennedy.

Mr Nesbitt: That is it; Mr Hussey is Mr Kennedy.

Mr Ford: After that clear insight from the Ulster Unionist Party Assembly Group, I am delighted to confirm that Mrs Long and I are playing ourselves.

Ms Lewsley: I am here on behalf of Mr Durkan. Mr Maginness is here on behalf of Dr Farren, and Mr Attwood is here on behalf of Dr McDonnell.

Mr O'Dowd: Mr McGuigan and I are replacing Mr McGuinness and Mr Murphy, in whichever order.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Will there be a third Member?

Mr O'Dowd: Not today.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Are members content with the minutes of the meeting of 18 August 2006?

Members indicated assent.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Nesbitt requested that a copy of his paper, 'Equality (Labour Market Issues)', be placed on the Preparation for Government section of the Assembly website. That has been done, and the paper is now available for the public to read. That is entirely in order; the Subgroup on the Economic Challenges facing Northern Ireland yesterday agreed that various papers would be placed on the website. If other members wish to post papers on the website, they can do so.

Mr Nesbitt: Chairman, I did not anticipate that you would mention that, as it was agreed last week. All the same, I thank you for mentioning it.

I wish to record my disappointment on a couple of issues. The Committee has been discussing human rights and equality issues for the past two weeks. However, I am disappointed that there was no consensus to invite the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission (NIHRC) and the Equality Commission for Northern Ireland (ECNI) to appear before the Committee to speak and answer questions.

I am very conscious that all the Committee's meetings have finished approximately an hour and a half earlier than scheduled. Therefore, we could easily have made time to hear from both commissions. I strongly expressed my view that there is a difference between statutory bodies that deal with human rights and equality, such as the NIHRC and the ECNI, and non-statutory bodies, such as the Committee on the Administration of Justice (CAJ), the Northern Ireland Human Rights Consortium and Amnesty International.

I wish to record my disquiet about the fact that the Committee did not, in its wisdom, invite the two bodies to appear before it.

Ms Lewsley: Two weeks ago I proposed that we should not invite the NIHRC or the ECNI to appear before the Committee unless there was a need to do so. My understanding is that, to date, no one has made a proposal to invite them to give evidence or to answer questions.

Mr Nesbitt: At our first meeting on 4 August, when we were deciding on our modus operandi for these meetings, I expressed a preference to hear from those two bodies. I would be more than happy to hear from them. In fact, I mentioned the former SDLP member, Colin Harvey, who is professor of human rights law at Queen's University. I would be more than happy to hear his legal perspective on human rights.

I was not in any way being party political. However, I read the minutes, which said that there was a view not to have anyone from those bodies — as Ms Lewsley rightly says. Nevertheless, the Committee felt sometimes that it had much to do, and I still feel that we should have had them here. That is just a reservation, which I am asking to be noted.

Ms Lewsley: Is Mr Nesbitt proposing that the NIHRC and the EQNI appear before the Committee?

Mr Nesbitt: We are now in our third meeting, and there is one meeting left. The time has now passed; therefore I am just recording my position, as I initially did on 4 August. I was not indicating a preference for any group or party; I was just saying that counter to my wish, no consensus was achieved. That is the only point I want to make.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Nesbitt, you have clearly stated that for the record. If it arises in the plenary debate you can say that you articulated that concern. I am sure that members, from what I can hear, wish to maintain the stance they had.

Mr Nesbitt: We have moved away from human rights and equality. We are now on different dimensions. But those were the two central elements and I still think that they should have been here.

My second point is one of deep concern. Sinn Féin and the SDLP often engage in megaphone diplomacy with regard to my comments on equality. I note that Sinn Féin issued a statement in advance of our meeting last week saying that I was sectarian. I noted also that Sinn Féin said I have a “flat earth” approach to equality.

I am glad that there are a couple of lawyers opposite me in the SDLP.

Mr Ford: But they charge by the hour. [Laughter.]

Mr Nesbitt: They charge by the word, likely words as they have. [Laughter.]

I remember a couple of years ago or so a letter in ‘The Irish News’ with the heading “Have you read ‘How to Lie with Statistics’?” That was quite a strong heading. The first sentence in that letter — I can always remember it — was:

“I don’t know whether Dermot Nesbitt has read the best-selling book ‘How to Lie with Statistics’, but his recent publication that Catholics are not discriminated against is a sure rival.”

That was written by none other than John Dallat. Now of course, Declan O’Loan has challenged me on equality through the media.

I challenged Mr Dallat with several letters. Needless to say I got no answer. At the very least, when I put forward a 30-page document of my arguments on the internet web page, they can be read and understood by anyone. Last week I openly invited all of the parties to come and discuss it with me, but none did. I wished for genuine engagement, but if parties are not going to come and talk to me then they should refrain from such hostile megaphone diplomacy. To imply that I am a liar is not exactly the best method of political exchange.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr O’Dowd, do you wish to come in on this?

Mr O’Dowd: I was not one of the people who called Mr Nesbitt a liar, and in relation to the “flat earth” approach —

Mr Nesbitt: I choose all my words carefully. As I say, two lawyers are present, so I had better choose them carefully.

Mr O’Dowd: I am trying to bring humour into the debate.

I spoke to you across the table last week about the Flat Earth Society. I also told you that my party would meet yours in a bilateral to discuss your document and that that meeting would take place in the near future.

10.15 am

Mr Nesbitt: Well, I look forward to receiving a communication from you, because as yet there has been none.

Mr O’Dowd: Our equality gurus are on holiday, but they will be with you.

Mr Nesbitt: Ah, they are on holiday. I am glad that Sinn Féin has got “guros” for equality.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is probably the Irish for “gurus”. [Laughter.]

Mr Nesbitt: Whatever that is. [Laughter.]

Chairman, I have made my point. I did not say anything about the DUP, because I presume that that party will empathise with my comments. However, I do not wish to go there.

Mr Attwood: It is unfortunate that Mr Dallat is not present, as he is the person who is most qualified to defend himself. However, I do not believe that anybody would suggest that Mr Nesbitt is a liar. It would be inappropriate for Mr Nesbitt or anybody else to interpret literally the headline of that letter. I believe that Mr Dallat was illustrating a view of what you had said, rather than actually alleging that you are a liar. The tone of both the headline and the letter clearly conveys that, and any other interpretation is misguided. Mr Dallat, like other SDLP members, has fundamental problems with your analysis of human rights. I do not know whether that is a “flat earth” approach. However, it is a very narrow interpretation of what we believe is required, given the broad human rights requirements in the North.

Mr Nesbitt: The SDLP has difficulties with my approach. I have stated my approach in print, in public, for all to see and for all to read. I have invited the SDLP to discuss it; it has neither acknowledged that nor considered it. That party has difficulties with me. The SDLP says that it wants to have dialogue. However, it does not seem to want to discuss or exchange views, which is a little unhelpful.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Nesbitt, because you feel that a member of the Committee has impugned your integrity, it is entirely in order that you clarify the issue and state your point of view. The matter has been well aired. We will leave it at that.

Two procedural issues have arisen. First, according to my calculations, two Lord Morrows are attending the Committee today. I have heard that people double-vote. However, double-attendance is surprising.

Mr Poots: I have drawn the short straw; I am Ian Paisley Jnr. [Laughter.]

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Poots is Ian Paisley Jnr, and Lord Morrow is himself.

Secondly, I am aware that a member who is present at the Committee for the first time has not made a declaration of interest. Have you anything to declare, Mr McGuigan?

Mr McGuigan: No.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It is important that we keep tabs on that. I did not notice. I believe, Mr Hussey, that you have been present before and have made your declaration.

Mr Hussey: I was here last week, but I did not make a declaration.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): For example, with regard to the parades issue, several members have declared that they are members of the Orange Order. If any similar issues come up, please declare relevant interests.

We shall proceed to today’s business. I am sure that members are aware of the usual arrangements; discussion will go on until 12.20 pm and there will be a break of 15 minutes for lunch. I encourage members to bring their food back to the table.

The main items of discussion today are the disappeared, dealing with the past and its legacy, truth and reconciliation, and victims. Members are acquainted with the normal procedure, which is that each party will make a short presentation on each subject. That is done in alphabetical order. Therefore, the Alliance Party will start. Afterwards, members may ask questions. During the presentations, please let either me or the Clerks know if you wish to ask a question.

Mrs Long: The Alliance Party will cover all four areas of discussion on the past and its legacy in its opening statement, rather than deal separately with each area.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It would be helpful if each party made it clear whether they were doing this singly or as a group, and then we would know where we stand. Fire away.

Mrs Long: This is clearly a complicated and multi-faceted issue. It is also probably one of the most sensitive that we will be dealing with as a Committee, as it requires us to deal with a conflict around which there is no shared understanding. It is also incredibly personal to each individual who has been directly affected, and yet it has an impact on the wider public and on politics in Northern Ireland.

Some people may argue that focusing on the past is counterproductive and keeps wounds open, and that society should simply move on. Alliance disagrees strongly with that view. We believe that addressing the past and its legacy is fundamental to the process of reconciliation and to building a shared future. Failure to do this in a comprehensive and holistic manner is a barrier to political progress and future political stability.

Issues of how to handle the past have been allowed to become a source of division within society, and have created further divisions as a result. Alliance believes that only through the creation of a comprehensive approach can this tendency be countered.

It is the view of my party that efforts to deal with the past and its legacy have been handled on a very piecemeal basis to date. First of all, paramilitary prisoners were placed on a generous early release programme. That aspect of the agreement turned out to be the most controversial and the most painful one.

There was no requirement upon the organisations involved to engage in any wider process of revealing the details of their past actions. While the early release scheme approximated to a de facto amnesty for existing prisoners, the Police Service technically retained unsolved cases from the troubles as open case files. The special historical enquiries team has now been established for that purpose, but it faces an uphill struggle.

Related to this is the need to ensure that all past instances have been properly recorded and, indeed, investigated. This has been highlighted through a number of recent cases investigated by the Police Ombudsman. Amnesties were granted to paramilitaries in relation also to decommissioning, in that any evidence arising out of the handover of weapons could not be used in future prosecutions. Also, amnesties were created in relation to evidence given by paramilitaries in order to help the authorities locate the remains of the disappeared — those people kidnapped, murdered and buried in unmarked graves.

The British Government over-reached itself on the subject of the so-called “on the runs” (OTRs) as a key demand of republicans during the implementation phase. Initially, the British Government agreed to what was essentially an amnesty for the OTRs, as part of the July 2001 Weston Park proposals. That initiative was attacked for two principal reasons. The first was that there was no linkage sought between the fate of the OTRs and the exiles — people who had been either internally displaced within Northern Ireland or forced to leave under threat from paramilitaries. Some were suspected of being criminals; others had simply stood up to local paramilitary godfathers, but neither should have been subjected to this kind of intimidation. Several thousand exiles are still unable to return to their homes in safety.

The second problem was the absence of any judicial process for the returnees that would require them and their organisations to face up to their actions and to face their victims. This problem was, on the surface, apparently rectified within the proposals in the joint declaration of April 2003. It set out a quasi-judicial process whereby those seeking to benefit from the scheme would have had to be processed through a special tribunal. Those found guilty would have been placed on licence, like the early-release prisoners, but without serving any time in prison. However, a potentially fatal flaw was the absence of any requirement for the applicants to actually attend those hearings.

There have been some limited efforts to find the truth behind some selective incidents that occurred during the troubles, but those entirely relate to actions that were conducted by the forces of the state. The Bloody Sunday Inquiry, for example, was established in early 1998, pre-dating the agreement, to explore what was, perhaps, the greatest abuse of state forces during the troubles. Amazingly, it will not report until 2007.

There are now other demands for separate inquiries into a number of instances where the forces of the British and Irish Governments were alleged to be acting in collusion with republican and loyalist paramilitaries. A list of six of these was agreed by the British and Irish Governments at Weston Park. Those inquiries have not yet commenced, due to controversies relating to the British Government trying to limit their powers.

We believe that it is right that the state should be held to the highest of standards. However, while these inquiries hold out the prospect of some degree of truth emerging for the families of some victims, they leave many with the feeling that their experience is less important and that they are in some way not valued by society in the same light. Many victims and their families are not benefiting from any kind of process. They have a diminishing prospect of formal prosecutions being taken, and there is no indication of any truth and reconciliation process being established in the near future.

Victims are diverse and have a range of needs. Much formal public policy has focused on financial assistance and the provision of services for victims. Progress has been made, although there is room for improvement, as evidenced by the ongoing work of the Interim Commissioner for Victims and Survivors. Much more can be done, and the much wider issue must be addressed. The Alliance Party wants to outline some suggestions. However, we realise that political parties should not be overly prescriptive when proposing measures that could encourage the perception that victims' issues have become a political football. I hope that no party would want that to be the case.

Our first suggestion relates to memorialisation. Some kind of permanent memorial should be created — and there is room for considerable creativity in that regard. It may not have to be a traditional, physical memorial; there are other ways of recognising the loss of life and the cost of thirty years of violence. Consideration should also be given to holding a day of remembrance or reflection.

The option of storytelling has been explored. That would allow victims, as they define themselves, to place their testimony, positive and negative, on record, leading to some kind of permanent archive.

A wider truth recovery process would be a useful tool in resolving some issues. Although it might be appropriate to draw on international experience, the process must first and foremost be tailored to the evolving needs of Northern Ireland. To simply transplant a mechanism from elsewhere would be neither acceptable nor productive.

There has been much discussion on many of those areas in the past, but, unfortunately, little progress. The Alliance Party would be happy to endorse proposals for the creation of a victims' forum, which would allow victims to tell their stories in their terms, and the creation of an archive. The party proposes that the Committee should support such a proposal.

The Alliance Party wants to particularly mention the disappeared and their families. We reiterate our belief that primary responsibility for addressing this matter lies with those responsible for their disappearance. At the very least, those involved have a legal and moral obligation to allow families to bury their dead and to come to peace with the situation.

The legacy of paramilitarism must also be addressed. The Alliance Party did not want this section to be labelled "The Past", because that ongoing legacy is one with which communities continue to live.

The issue of exiles must be addressed. The practice of exiling is still going on in Northern Ireland, and externally. It is not simply enough to call for it to be stopped; the threats against people who have been exiled must be lifted so that they can return to their homes in safety, if they wish to do so.

It is also important to note that paramilitary organisations still exert a stranglehold over certain communities. It is often associated with the prevalence of organised crime and it breeds such a culture of lawlessness that people do not appreciate the value of a society based on the rule of law. Instead, it appears to be the law of the jungle and survival of the fittest. This situation carries huge social and economic costs, and huge personal costs for people in those communities.

In far too many ways, the state and its agencies contribute to the situation by accepting that the local strongmen are the legitimate voices of communities and by allowing them to broker what does or does not happen in certain areas. It often seems easier to cut deals and to accommodate this intimidation rather than tackle it head on. What may seem to be a short-term gain simply exacerbates the problem.

Those issues must be dealt with comprehensively, and the Government must take a consistent line across the board in dealing with the legacy of the past, ongoing paramilitarism and intimidation within communities. I have kept our comments brief, but we certainly wish to explore these issues in more detail later today.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): As Mrs Long dealt with all four subjects together, I allowed her to go well over the allocated five minutes. She was entitled to 20 minutes in total, comprising four five-minute slots. Her contribution lasted about 10 minutes, so that is fine. It is perfectly acceptable for parties to do that, and they will be allocated extra time.

10.30 am

As some parties may run the four subjects into one presentation, I should remind members, just in case, that, under those headings, issues of sub judice could arise and, of course, the precedent and ruling are very clear. If the matter is before the courts in any fashion then members cannot be specific and cannot name individuals. I remind members, even though they have qualified privilege in this room, of the need to be careful. I will intervene if someone names individuals involved in cases that have been referred to the courts.

Mr Poots: In dealing with the past and its legacy, our presentation will deal with all four issues together. First, we shall talk about victims and deal with the definition of "victims".

Our vision document states that there is a fundamental distinction between those who have suffered at the hands of terrorist gangs, and those terrorists and former terrorists who contributed to the terror campaign and wrought untold suffering throughout the troubles.

The DUP simply demands a fair and sensible recognition of the victims of terror. Clouding the issue or applying a one-size-fits-all definition merely concedes to the principle of political expediency. It is unhelpful and fails to contribute to achieving reconciliation. To argue that everyone is a victim facilitates those who would minimise their own role in contributing to the terror and to the consequences of their actions. That is skewed thinking, and it establishes a false foundation for a new beginning.

The rights of those who have suffered at the hands of the terror machine, and who continue to suffer, should not be pushed to the background in the false hope of achieving reconciliation. The pain and suffering that are a daily experience for many victims will not go away. Where there is no justice or reasonable recognition, there can be no healing. Many victims simply want to get on with life and leave behind what has happened to them. However, many others need the support and counsel of those who have come through similar circumstances.

With regard to victims' groups, many individuals often do not have a strong enough voice to raise the profile of their own case, or are not able to articulate their needs. It is vitally important that the support groups that have developed be supported and encouraged. Victims' groups have developed through the work of people who give their time voluntarily, and have become an important way for victims to express their needs. Furthermore, they offer much-needed services such as counselling, training and support. The needs of victims and the priorities of those groups must be highlighted, and those needs must be recognised by Government and form the cornerstone of their strategies for victims.

All too often in the past it has simply been what Government has assumed is important to victims, and not what really matters. Again, victim support groups can be key to this, as they represent their members' wishes. It is vital that these groups receive the funding that is crucial to their survival. It is also imperative that future funds be guaranteed, so that the threat of funding removal does not hang over their heads when planning for their future.

At present it is impossible — unless through private fund-raising — for these groups to improve their facilities. Victims' groups, and particularly smaller groups, also require funding to advertise their services. It is still a problem that many of those who most require help either do not know that it is available, or are reluctant to come forward. Funding that allows those groups to reach out to more people will increase their usefulness among the people who need the services most.

Compensation was not an issue when many of the killings took place in Northern Ireland, and many who have suffered have not received adequate recompense. Levels of compensation offered to those whose relatives were murdered were often minimal. In one particular case, a mother and daughter received £11,000 for watching their husband and father being gunned down. I compare that to the level of compensation received by a leading member of Sinn Féin/IRA when he was struck by an RUC truncheon and received compensation of £9,000. In a case relating to the family of one of the Loughgall terrorists, £40,000 was awarded in compensation.

Funding from Government must be directed so that it benefits directly those who are the victims of terrorism and is not spread across the "victims sector", as it is currently defined by Government. Funding that is supposed to help victims should not be siphoned off to help rehabilitate terrorists. Organisations claiming to be victims' organisations have been established and have, as members, many people who have engaged in the terrorist campaign. Those organisations are a complete contrivance, and cannot be accepted as bona fide victims' groups.

It is vital that those who are responsible for the fate of the disappeared come forward to help locate the bodies.

The Rev Dr Ian Paisley stated recently:

"I hope that these proposed measures will result in the remains of the 'Disappeared' being located, but the fact of the matter is that accurate information about the whereabouts of the bodies from those directly responsible for these horrific murders is the most likely way to bring about closure for the families."

The republican movement, as encapsulated by the IRA as the paramilitary wing and Sinn Féin as the political wing:

"must come forward with answers. They caused pain for the families in the first place by killing their loved ones. They have denied them a proper burial and have added insult to injury by sullyng the memories of their victims with scurrilous accusations. It is up to them to do what they have failed to do in the past and tell the truth about where their victims bodies lie. These people know where these bodies are. Why can't they hand them back and give their victims families some peace?"

With regard to unsolved crimes, it is important that all victims of terrorism are not forgotten. There are more than 2,000 unsolved murders in Northern Ireland; many victims still feel the pain because no one has been brought to justice for the murder of their loved ones. More resources should be given to the Historical Enquiries Team to help it to investigate many of those crimes.

There have been some suggestions that a truth commission would be a step forward for Northern Ireland. Some people think that it would bring closure to what has happened. In somewhere as small as Northern Ireland, that proposal is unlikely to be successful. Although the state would have to be fully accountable and would be required to co-operate fully and disclose all its information to such a commission, the terrorist groups would have full control over whether to participate and at what level. It is our view that a truth commission would not only be unworkable in Northern Ireland but would serve to hold accountable only those who served in the Crown forces, while terrorists could hide behind a cloak of anonymity.

We are glad that the proposed legislation for those on the runs did not proceed and that the Government backed off. We will continue to oppose the introduction of any legislation that would allow so-called on-the-run terrorists to walk freely the streets of Northern Ireland.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It would be helpful if Mrs Long and Mr Poots could give copies of their presentations to Hansard, simply to ensure that they are correctly reported. Perhaps they could see the Hansard staff at lunch time. The same goes for all the other parties.

Lord Morrow: Will we all get copies of those presentations?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): What do members feel about that suggestion?

Mr Poots: They will be in Hansard, anyway.

Lord Morrow: Are we not discussing them today?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Each party's submission is handed around the table.

Mr Poots: I am happy for our presentation to be circulated.

Mrs Long: We have not prepared a formal submission. I simply have notes from which I was speaking, but they are not comprehensive.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Your contribution seemed to be remarkably articulate to be taken from notes.

Mrs Long: Thank you for your flattery; nevertheless, they were only notes.

Lord Morrow: Was there not a clear understanding that each party was to present a paper to the Committee?

Mrs Long: No.

Lord Morrow: That was my understanding.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Parties have certainly volunteered that material in the past.

Lord Morrow: No, I do not think that that is right. In the past, parties were instructed or asked to prepare papers and bring them to the Committee.

Mrs Long: This issue has been discussed on several occasions, and the option for members to submit papers was left open. However, no one was required to submit a paper.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): It was voluntary, but is the DUP willing to make its paper available?

Lord Morrow: That was the understanding at the commencement of these Committee meetings. Indeed, Mr Deputy Speaker, you were in the Chair.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I remember that point. The DUP volunteered to make its paper available.

Mr Nesbitt: Let me try to end this minor internecine conflict in the DUP —

Lord Morrow: I do not think that it is minor.

Mr Nesbitt: At a previous meeting, the noble Lord read from a document that was reported in Hansard. Perhaps I am wrong, but did he make that available?

Lord Morrow: Yes, I did.

Mr Nesbitt: If he made that document available, the request seems laudable and easy to follow. I cannot understand what the discussion is about.

Lord Morrow: No disrespect to Mr Nesbitt, but he misses the point, and not for the first time. When the Committee first met, parties were asked to submit a paper to the Committee. It may be that others do not need to do that — Mrs Long has not submitted a paper, which is fair enough. However, that was the understanding from day one.

Mrs Long: It was certainly not our understanding that members had to submit papers. This issue has been discussed at almost every meeting of the Committee. Some members have offered to submit papers, and others have said that we should not submit papers. Last week, the DUP said that we should submit papers; the Ulster Unionist Party said that we should not. It was always open to us to submit papers, but we were not compelled to do so. We are happy to make a written submission to cover the points that I have raised, but we could not do it today.

Mr Nesbitt: I am agreeing with Mrs Long more often than not, which is worrying. She said that there is a difference between presenting a paper and submitting one, and that that distinction was being made. Presenting a paper does not necessarily mean that a written document is submitted. It can be an oral presentation. Mrs Long presented a paper; she did not submit a written document. Her party may or may not wish to do that. The DUP read, presented and submitted a paper for the benefit of Hansard.

Let us proceed, Mr Chairman. You have asked the DUP to submit its paper —

Ms Lewsley: I propose that if anyone wants to submit papers today, they have the opportunity to do so. If a member wants to submit a paper at a later stage, they also have the opportunity.

Mr Nesbitt: There is something important about submitting a paper at a later stage. Let us get this clear. I submitted a paper last week; I tabled the paper and it was published on the Assembly website. If a paper is submitted outside the curtilage of this Committee without it having been presented first, that would be a slightly different situation. Mr Chairman, are you giving carte blanche to members to submit whatever they like?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The problem is that at some meetings we agreed that papers would be submitted, presented and distributed. This morning, we did not do that. I simply asked members to present a paper, and they have done that.

Ms Lewsley: Many papers that parties submit will be much more detailed than our presentations. We have a detailed paper that we can submit, but our presentation will be much shorter. Like Mrs Long, I will read from notes. I do not have a prepared document. I can give what I have to Hansard, and I hope that they can make use of it.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): We will not reach agreement on this issue, and —

Mr Nesbitt: It is important that a submitted paper be placed on the table at some stage; in other words, it should not be submitted outside the ambit of this Committee.

Ms Lewsley: With the greatest respect to Mr Nesbitt, I mean that if the Alliance Party wanted to submit a paper, they could do it next week, because they are not prepared for it today. That is all I said. I did not say that the paper should be submitted somewhere in the ether between now and next week.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Supplying Hansard staff with documentation is a totally different issue. That will assist Hansard to report accurately what has been said at the meeting. The documentation could be notes or a fully typed submission. Do not feel that the two are linked.

Let us move on.

Mr McGuigan: For clarification, I will be speaking partly from a prepared paper and partly from handwritten notes.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Will you cover all four subjects together or each issue separately?

Mr McGuigan: I will deal with all four subjects together.

Like Mr Nesbitt, I am going to agree with Mrs Long: these are sensitive issues that should not be used as political footballs. Sinn Féin remains committed to the agreement's requirement that it is essential to acknowledge and address the suffering of victims and survivors of violence as necessary elements of reconciliation.

It is our view that the suffering of the victims and survivors has not been adequately acknowledged or addressed, and that international best practice is required to support the development of special community-based initiatives, including trauma and counselling services, with adequate resourcing and funding from both Governments to enable victims' groups to pursue their remits. That should be done in consultation with victims' groups. Too often in the past, Governments have imposed resources on victims' groups without consulting them.

10.45 am

Sinn Féin also demands equality of treatment for all victims and survivors and an end to the practices that discriminate against victims of state violence and collusion. That discrimination was evident in the politically expedient way in which the DUP's nominee was appointed as Interim Commissioner for Victims and Survivors. It is also evident in political parties' attempts to create a hierarchy of victims of conflict by demeaning some victims, as we heard in the DUP's presentation.

On the issue of truth and reconciliation and dealing with the past, Sinn Féin believes that there should be an end to political posturing, particularly by the British Government, as regards truth recovery. All relevant parties must engage in a genuine, focused debate on the timing and purpose of a comprehensive truth process to deal with the legacy of the past, underpinned by the following principles and values: that all processes should be victim centred; that victims and survivors have the right to acknowledgement and the right to contribute to a changing society; that full co-operation and disclosure is required; and that the British state should acknowledge its role as a primary protagonist in the conflict and clarify its actions throughout.

There should be no hierarchy of victims, and any panel or commission should be international and independent. There should be a desire to learn from the lessons of the past so that mistakes are not repeated. The process should not be restricted to combatant groups but should include the media, the judiciary, state institutions, civic society, and so forth.

In the past, Sinn Féin has asked for full co-operation and disclosure with regard to the disappeared, and its party president has recently reiterated that call. It is in the public domain that more information, including information from primary sources, has been given to the body responsible for the matter. That body should be left to get on with its work in trying to bring about a resolution to the issue.

Ms Lewsley: I will deal with the issues of victims, the disappeared and the past. My colleagues will also make short presentations.

The SDLP believes that, on a moral basis, we must leave the past behind. There is a danger to our society if we do not face up to the past. Moreover, it is deeply unfair to victims to deny them the truth, if that is what they seek. It is important that the language used be more sensitive to the needs of victims and survivors.

More can, and must, be done to address the needs of victims and survivors of conflict. As we try to rebuild our society, they struggle to rebuild their lives.

The very least that they should expect from us is the acknowledgement of their terrible loss and a commitment to ensuring that they do not carry the burden of remembering on their own.

The SDLP wants a greater platform for victims so that their needs can be articulated and their stories heard and acknowledged. It wants to ensure that any process for dealing with the past is victim centred, which is why the party supports the role of the Interim Commissioner for Victims and Survivors, although the manner in which that commissioner was appointed was unfortunate. The party also supports the establishment of a victims' and survivors' forum.

The SDLP believes that there should be no hierarchy of victims, and that victims of the state, or of republican or loyalist terror, should have the same rights. A devolved administration should make victims' needs a priority in the Programme for Government and address how services for victims can be improved and better compensation payments given to those who have received little or nothing.

The issue of funding was mentioned this morning. The entire sector is in great need of more focused funding. Funding should be more flexible, as some victims are now elderly and their needs may have changed. No flexibility exists in current funding arrangements to address issues that affect elderly victims, such as mental-health problems and dementia. A strong monitoring role is needed to oversee how money is spent and to assess its impact. That should be reviewed regularly to ensure that the funding targets those most in need.

Victims have told me that the restoration of the Assembly is important, as it would give victims the opportunity to talk more freely about the issues that concern them. Any future government should ensure that victims' needs are centred rather than policy driven, so that those needs are taken into consideration.

Services must be monitored and matched to need. The Interim Commissioner for Victims and Survivors could carry out that monitoring role. The interim commissioner should be a one-stop shop at which any victim can get direction on any matter. Services must be equitable across the board and across all age ranges.

I commend the interim commissioner on her latest report, 'A Forum for Victims and Survivors: Consultation Responses', which is a summary of the feedback from the consultation seminars on the role and purpose of a victims' and survivors' forum. That document represents the voice of victims and survivors, not that of the interim commissioner.

The British Government recently responded to a series of recommendations that the Independent Commission for the Location of Victims' Remains (ICLVR) made on the disappeared. Although that announcement is welcomed, it is long overdue. A forensic-science expert submitted a review last year, and the families of the disappeared had to wait a long time for the Governments' response. The SDLP had already expressed its concerns about that delay and is pleased to see commitments bring made at last. The challenge now is to translate those commitments into actions. Many families have been waiting for more than 30 years for the bodies of their loved ones, so bureaucracy must not make them wait any longer.

There must be a renewed will to find the bodies. Some people mistakenly believe that everything that can be done has been done, but that is simply not true. For example, French police dug for Seamus Ruddy's body for only six hours, which is clearly not sufficient to relieve the Ruddy family's lifetime of suffering. Much more must be done, and families must be kept informed every step of the way. The commitment to appoint a family liaison officer for the families of the disappeared is therefore crucial and welcome.

However, no amount of good work by the Governments will make up for the lack of co-operation shown by those in the IRA and the INLA who were involved in those terrible crimes in the first place. Members of the Provisional IRA and the INLA stole those people's lives and then stole their bodies. If they have any conscience at all, they must do everything that they can to ensure that they do not rob the families of any chance of a Christian burial.

We support the Alliance Party's proposal to establish a victims' forum in order to increase the voice for victims and survivors. The SDLP has two proposals, the first of which is that victims should be prioritised in the Programme for Government. The second proposal is that the Committee should agree the principle that a liaison officer for the families of the disappeared be appointed immediately.

Mr A Maginness: I will focus on the issues of truth and remembrance. The SDLP believes that it is imperative to vindicate victims' rights to truth and remembrance. Victims keenly feel and bear the pain and suffering of loss, but, at present, that loss and suffering is neither publicly nor officially acknowledged, as it should be. The very least that society can do is to recognise that burden and to ensure that victims' suffering is not in vain.

The SDLP believes that the full, independent, "Cory-compliant" public inquiries that were promised at Weston Park should be held. We welcome the opening of the inquiry into the death of Rosemary Nelson but urge that there be progress on all the other inquiries that Judge Cory recommended.

However, my party is implacably opposed to the Inquiries Act 2005, which threatens to endanger the effectiveness and the independence of public inquiries into cases of alleged collusion between state forces and paramilitary groups. That legislation is on the statute books, but it should not be used. Fully independent inquiries should be held.

The SDLP believes that the British Government will not have credibility on victims and survivors issues while the Prime Minister continues to renege on his clear commitment to the Finucane family about the inquiry into the murder of Pat Finucane. The Inquiries Act 2005 runs contrary to the provision of a full and independent inquiry into his murder.

The SDLP also advocates an officially designated day of remembrance across Northern Ireland and Ireland. It would act as a lasting reminder of the distance that our society has travelled in the past three decades, and of the distance that still has to be travelled.

The SDLP believes that, at present, there is no established body to deal directly with the process of truth recovery. The victims' and survivors' forum should consider the establishment of an independent international truth body to lead a truth process and to work on a North/South basis.

Such a truth body could perform a variety of functions, and we suggest the following: the compilation of a register of victims, to which any individual may submit their name for inclusion; and a truth-and-remembrance archive, which could be established and overseen by the truth body.

The archive would have state-of-the-art technology and would allow victims, survivors and their families to record their personal accounts, including, if they wish to do so, details of whom, or what organisation, they believe to be responsible for the death of their loved ones. It would be for them to determine whether they wanted the archive to be made public. The archive would have a twofold effect, giving an individual's description of what happened to them and a collective acknowledgement of the sufferings of victims and survivors.

The public part of the archive could be publicised, for example through an interactive video archive that could be displayed in town halls and other public buildings, listing the names of victims and giving an account of their truth on particular anniversaries. That would be a reasonably straightforward way to acknowledge the individual and collective suffering of victims.

The SDLP also welcomes the cold-case review and is pleased that it includes paramilitary and state killings. We believe that the Historical Enquiries Team should be given adequate resources to complete what is a difficult, onerous and voluminous task. We also believe that the Police Ombudsman should be given proper resources to deal with that aspect of truth recovery.

Victims must be put first, and truth recovery must be victims centred. To date, society has done too little for victims, and many feel that they carry a lonely burden. The SDLP offers proposals for a comprehensive strategy that puts the rights and needs of victims at the centre. Its proposals will allow society to acknowledge, and account for, the past in order to recognise the enduring pain and share the burden of remembrance.

These are not exhaustive proposals, but we put them into the public domain for further discussion and adaptation.

11.00 am

Mr Hussey: I shall make the Ulster Unionist Party's presentation. I have my notes, and, unlike Naomi, I will not use them but will read what I have prepared from them. I will present the text for Hansard's use, although there will be deviations as I go through the presentation. It is not a paper as such; it is a written version of what I intend to present to the Committee today.

This issue is a central precursor to moving forward. Our society has suffered enormously in the past three and a half decades from terrorism and the sectarianism and division associated with the conflict.

The community has had its basic foundations weakened and strained by indiscriminate murder and destruction to such an extent that we are left with a situation in which, some 37 years after the start of the so-called "troubles", we must decide when criminality is at a normal level. We do not yet live in a normal society; indeed, achieving such a society is one of the fundamental reasons for the establishment of the Committee on the Preparation for Government. However, a normal society may not emerge in our lifetime if we do not adequately deal with the past.

Comments in this paper are predicated on three issues. First, the Ulster Unionist Party does not equate victims with perpetrators. Secondly, we believe that every victim's situation is personal and specific and that the process must reflect that; victims must not be subject to a loose and generic system. Thirdly, we agree that there is no hierarchy of victimhood; it has a spectrum.

How one defines a policy on victims is dependent on certain agreed principles. We are focused primarily on the establishment of agreed principles in order to provide the necessary framework for victims' issues to be dealt with sensitively and fairly.

Sir Kenneth Bloomfield was appointed by the late Mo Mowlam, then Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, to examine the issue of remembrance. His report is entitled 'We Will Remember Them', a phrase taken from the fourth stanza of the poem 'For the Fallen'. Remembrance of those killed in war, or as a result of terrorist activity, is, sadly, something that we in Northern Ireland are well used to. It is not uncommon to hear references made on Remembrance Sunday to those servicemen and innocents who were murdered during the troubles. We support efforts to remember the sacrifice made in the troubles. Protestant, Catholic and Dissenter — all fell at the hands of terrorists, and we do not wish to see them forgotten.

In remembrance, however, we are aware of the efforts of perpetrators of violence to sanitise their respective murder campaigns. The efforts of terrorists to legitimise themselves create the problem that we have been unable to get around — how to remember and to reconcile.

We have conflicting views of the troubles: why they started, how both sides conducted the experience and who won or lost. The Ulster Unionist Party accepts that this is an enormously complex issue. We acknowledge that we do not have, and are highly unlikely ever to have, a single narrative of the troubles. That is why it may be unlikely that we will ever come up with a unanimous and mutually acceptable definition of who is, or is not, a victim.

Nevertheless, we believe that only those who have suffered at the hands of terrorists — and not the terrorists themselves — are the true victims of the troubles. In our view, perpetrators of violence are plainly not victims.

It is only right that account is taken of responsibility and criminal culpability in determining society's collective approach. Those people who operated outside the framework of civic society, who acted beyond law and order and acceptable civilised values, and who sought to remove from others the most fundamental of all rights — the right to life — cannot be classed as victims and survivors. Many people will ask whether to do so would be insensitive and gravely insulting to those who are blameless and innocent.

Paramilitaries kill other paramilitaries in internecine feuds. The figures might show that more republican militants were murdered by republican militants than by any other group. The Ulster Unionist Party is keen to stay inside the realms of responsible politics. Those include the condemnation of all illegal activity, all paramilitary crime and a completely different treatment of all illegal combatants of the troubles from that shown to genuine victims. Those who seek to justify and edify the victim maker add little to the process.

The nationalist and republican community appears to expect two standards in a truth and reconciliation process: full disclosure and accountability from the forces of law and order and, from terrorist organisations, codes of honour that allow for secrecy.

I do not expect more of the forces of the Crown than I do of criminals; however, to attempt a wholesale truth recovery process beyond the normal procedure for investigating alleged wrongdoing by police officers and soldiers would clearly be a one-sided farce. That situation will remain, unless and until the republican movement decides to be reasonable about its past crimes.

The Ulster Unionist Party is clear that the South African truth and reconciliation model is not transferable, in whole or in part, to meet the needs of Northern Ireland. However, we believe that the permanent establishment of a victims' commissioner is the way forward.

The state has a burden of responsibility to uphold law and order. When that, inevitably, fails, it has a further duty of care to the victims of crime. It must be made clear that that responsibility does not diminish if the crime is committed in pursuance of insurrection, insurgency or separatism. The Ulster Unionist Party believes that, in our situation, the state's burden is best carried by a commissioner for victims and survivors.

In broad terms, we welcome the draft Victims and Survivors (Northern Ireland) Order 2006, which is currently out for consultation. Nonetheless, the Ulster Unionist Party cannot agree to the definition of "victim" as offered in article 3 of the Order.

A victims' forum is suggested in the Order, and that is a positive step. Such a forum, adequately constituted, is the state's best method of moving our society away from its past. It would assist a victims' commissioner to co-ordinate financial, political and psychological help for victims of the troubles, and in the dispersal of information.

Many projects, such as the Healing Through Remembering story-telling project, provide an excellent means of helping victims and survivors to heal old wounds and achieve a sense of closure. A victims' forum could, and should, be the central focal point for such projects and make them accessible to those who wish to avail of them. That is important. There is, however, a concern that a victims' forum could become a quasi-judicial kangaroo court.

We can provide no other explanation for including a provision in the Order for absolute privilege for reports by the commissioner. This is most unusual, highly unnecessary and in all possibility dangerous.

We are opposed to any attempt to include victims and perpetrators within the same forum. It is grossly inappropriate.

The UUP has always advocated a value-added approach to the use of public funds. Any use of taxpayers' money must add to society. Perpetrators of violence must be dealt with in a manner conducive to normalising our society, but we must be very clear that this task is separate from helping victims to move on. The victims' forum must be for that purpose.

There must be clear balance in the commissioner's actions towards separate groups of victims. Victims' groups require funding, and it should be co-ordinated by the commissioner subject to what the funds will be achieving. Groups such as 'SAVER/NAVER' in Mid-Ulster/County Armagh and 'West Tyrone Voice' in my own area provide excellent care and respite for their members. For groups such as these, funding needs to be firmed up and instituted in the long term to allow them to deal with the needs of their client base for the foreseeable future. However, there are individuals who are not part of a victims' group. For example, many civilians are dealing with their own particular trauma, and it may be that they have not realised that they would have recourse to financial compensation and support.

At the beginning of the troubles, expertise and mechanisms in that area did not exist. Therefore, those individuals must be high on the commissioner's agenda. They can very often be left behind. To a large extent it is to those individuals that the commissioner must make himself or herself most accessible. As a result, we firmly believe that the intention that the commissioner will open one office in central Belfast is not sufficient to deal with Northern Ireland as a whole.

There are also victims who wish to be left alone to deal with the past in their own way. No one should infringe on their right to do so.

The needs of ex-servicemen and their families are the responsibility of the Ministry of Defence and the Policing Board. The commissioner must, however, champion the cause of servicemen in cases when the respective authorities fail in their duty of care.

The issue of a permanent memorial to victims must be left to the victims who suffered as a result of terrorist action. The Ulster Unionist Party does not seek to claim that it has all the answers, nor does it seek to hijack what is an important issue for political gain. A memorial must be dedicated to those who have suffered or died in our troubles.

In conclusion, constructive debate is vital to support the whole project. This process must be based on principles of fairness, equity and understanding. The apologists of violence may seek to sanitise the horrors that were perpetrated on people here. That must not be allowed to influence policy-making. The process must have moral authority to be fully effective.

Those who wish to move the debate forward constructively should not refrain from offering their views. We all know that this is a complex area, and I accept that some may disagree with my views. At this stage, if we are open-minded and constructive in our approach and truly wish to see Northern Ireland move forward, progress can be made.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Mr Nesbitt, you indicated earlier that you had to leave at 11 o'clock. If you wish to get in early in the discussion, that is fine.

Mr Nesbitt: I was just about to go, but I have one comment.

Sinn Féin, in its introduction, talked about international best practice. I am always conscious that Sinn Féin refers to international best practice and international norms, yet when I asked Michael Ferguson, on an aspect of human rights, if he would subscribe to international norms, his answer — in simple English — was yes and no. It is cherry picking, and that is my only comment.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I thank the five parties. Some groups have obviously taken a lot of time and care with their presentations, and that is appreciated. I allowed some parties a degree of latitude because they had rolled up their views under the four headings into one presentation. I am conscious that some parties did not take full use of their time so I will allow groups to come back in if they wish to add points.

As far as I can see there are three proposals: first, for a victims' forum, which I understand has the support of the Alliance Party, the SDLP and the UUPAG; secondly, there is a proposal from Patricia Lewsley that the issue of victims is identified as a priority in the Programme for Government; thirdly, Patricia proposed the appointment of a family liaison officer for victims.

11.15 am

Those are the only proposals that came out of that discussion.

Mr Hussey: The appointment of a family liaison officer was intended to be for the families of the "disappeared".

Ms Lewsley: Yes.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): The "disappeared" rather than victims.

I just want to ask Alban whether his contribution with regard to Cory-compliant inquiries was a follow-up proposal, a suggestion or an aspiration?

Mr Maginness: It is certainly a proposal from the SDLP. If it finds support around the table, we would welcome that.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): So we have four proposals then. No one has as yet indicated that he or she wishes to speak on any of those proposals or any of the evidence that has been heard.

Mr McGuigan: May I have clarification on the fourth proposal?

The Chairman (Mr Wells): I will seek guidance from members. Do we want to work our way through these? One or two of them might be fairly straightforward, and then we will come to the Cory-compliance issue.

Mr Attwood: May I ask a relevant question arising from the submissions?

The Ulster Unionists said that, for various reasons, they did not feel that a truth and reconciliation commission model is necessary for the like of the North. The DUP said that the North is too small on the one hand and that, on the other, it would be members of state organisations that would be made to participate and not members of paramilitary organisations.

Those are real concerns, but when Sinn Féin talked about the same issue in its submission, Mr McGuigan said that:

"one of the principles that should inform the work of such a commission was full co-operation and disclosure".

Given the DUP's view that paramilitary groups would not live up to the requirement for full co-operation and disclosure to a truth process, is it the view of Sinn Féin now that any member of a paramilitary organisation would be required to co-operate fully and disclose to a truth process that which was within its gift? If that is the case, to some degree that narrows the difference around the table on a very important matter. It certainly creates a tension between what might now be the case and what certainly was the case when Martin McGuinness appeared at the Bloody Sunday tribunal, where he chose not to co-operate fully or disclose what he knew.

If there has been some shift of policy — and that is implied by Sinn Féin's acceptance of the principle of full co-operation and disclosure — that would be very helpful.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Do Sinn Féin want to answer that?

Mr McGuigan: Mr Attwood quoted me correctly, but in the preface to some of the principles and values that I outlined, I said that we were calling for a genuine focused debate among all the relevant parties on how we could take the issue forward. We need that debate so that we can all work out together how a truth process can be taken forward.

Members will be aware that Sinn Féin produced a document on this matter several years ago, which is available on our website. In that document, we stated that for a truth process to work, all combatant groups and relevant organisations needed to take part.

Mr Attwood: Just to clarify, does that mean that all combatant groups — including illegal groups — and their members could co-operate fully and disclose to the process what they know? Is that the principle? That would be quite helpful to unionist concerns about a truth commission.

Mr McGuigan: It is difficult to talk now about something that may well happen in the future. The principles are those I have outlined, namely that there should be a focused debate among all groups, and that for a truth process to work, all groups who were involved in the conflict need to play their part.

Mr Attwood: Given that you advocate full disclosure and full co-operation in any truth process, does that extend to the role played by illegal groups? This is important because the main reason for the unionist parties' understandable concern about, and opposition to, a truth and reconciliation process — whatever form that might take — is that there would not be full co-operation and disclosure from paramilitary groups. If Sinn Féin has shifted ground on that, it opens up new possibilities as far as we are concerned.

Mr McGuigan: I do not think that my comments today represent a shift in ground. As I have already said, we produced a document a number of years ago that contained these very principles.

Mrs Long: I just want to clarify an issue to do with the victims' forum. The shape that the victims' forum would take has been changing. It was initially envisaged as an opportunity for people to put their stories on record and create an historical archive. Now the term is used to relate more to an advocacy body with a support role, which we believe is also vital.

The Alliance Party's proposal still stands, but we need some clarity about people's understanding of the role of the victims' forum. Such an advocacy and support role does not currently exist, but it is needed, and a forum would be a useful way of providing it. However, a forum is also needed to enable people to put their stories on record.

Alliance wants to highlight its views on the storytelling and archive aspect. The party sees that as distinct from a truth and recovery process, in that putting experiences on record will not tell the truth of how those experiences came about. There is a difference between people putting experiences on record for an archive and getting the truth about what happened in the circumstances. There is a distinction between the two, so I would just like some clarity about the victims' forum.

There is one other matter that we would like to formulate into a proposal if it were possible to get consensus on it: namely the idea of a day of remembrance and reflection. A number of parties have mentioned it and been supportive of it, and my party feels it is worth exploring further. I am not thinking about what that day would look like in detail; rather I am thinking about the principle that there ought to be a point where such reflection can take place.

The Chairman (Mr Wells): Edwin is next, but I think that Patricia wants to clarify that proposal.

Ms Lewsley: In her opening remarks Naomi talked about the format of the proposed victims' forum. I am worried that members around this table, rather than the victims themselves, might decide what it should look like. The victims' commissioner has told me that after the first piece of work that I mentioned, another piece of work is to be undertaken, and that is to look at different models. It is important that whatever model is chosen be led by victims and is for their benefit.

Mrs Long: I completely agree with what Patricia has said. I was just highlighting the fact that people may have different perceptions of what that may be, but we agree in principle with it being led by victims.

Mr Poots: Alex should not get too excited about Sinn Féin's having made a significant shift this morning.

There is the usual convoluted "Yes" from Sinn Féin, but there are more caveats in that than Henry VIII had wives. In essence, Sinn Féin is suggesting not full disclosure but a series of proposals that ensure that such disclosure will not occur. Mr McGuigan blew his cover significantly this morning when he stated that further evidence had been supplied on the “disappeared”. When the big searches were carried out, we were told that all the evidence had been supplied. However, why was the further evidence held back? Clearly, Sinn Féin held back evidence at that point, and that information is now being supplied.

The same thing happened with decommissioning: we were told that all the weaponry had been handed in, yet weapons have been found since. The information that Sinn Féin has given in the past has certainly fallen short, and Mr McGuigan confirmed that this morning by saying that further information has since been provided.

I would like to tease out the subject of the victims’ forum a little further. If we do not have a definition of “victim”, it will be difficult to establish a victims’ forum. Unless there is agreement on that definition, such a forum will probably be a non-runner. Some people perpetuate the nonsense of saying: “I was brought up in a certain area and ended up in a paramilitary organisation. I shot somebody in the back, so I am just as much a victim as the person who was shot.” That is a load of nonsense. It comes from the same school of thought as someone who says: “If someone has two cars and I have none, I can steal one of his because I am a victim, so the person who had the car stolen is no more a victim than the person who committed the crime.” The terrorist cannot be classified as a victim, and it would be a recipe for disaster to establish a forum in which people who claim to be victims but who are actually terrorists participate equally with victims. Unless we agree the definition of “victim”, proceeding with a victims’ forum will be very difficult.

Mr McGuigan: Having listened to the presentations from both unionist parties, I am even more concerned about how we make progress with a victims’ forum. Sinn Féin supports, in principle, the establishment of a victims’ forum, but none of the political expediency that I mentioned earlier that was employed in the appointment of the victims’ commissioner should be permitted. That is no slight against the individual who was appointed; rather, I am speaking against the process of that appointment.

There can be no hierarchy of victims. The DUP and the UUP may have their own interpretations of history, but the only way in which we can move this forward is by accepting that the grief and victimhood of all the people who suffered as a result of this conflict can be considered equally.

