NORTHERN IRELAND ASSEMBLY

Monday 24 September 2007

The Assembly met at 12.00 noon (Mr Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

ASSEMBLY BUSINESS

Retirement of the Clerk to the Assembly

Mr Speaker: On behalf of the Assembly Commission, I inform the House that, since we last met, I have received a letter from the Clerk to the Assembly, Mr Arthur Moir, in which he conveyed his decision to retire from his position and return to a legal consultancy role in the Northern Ireland Civil Service.

Arthur has served in the position of Clerk and Chief Executive since 2001. For much of that time, he was tasked with maintaining the Assembly secretariat and our facilities in a state of readiness for restoration. The challenges of doing so over such a prolonged period were considerable, and Members must be grateful to him for ensuring that we were able to resume full business immediately on restoration.

Members will be aware that a review of the Assembly secretariat is under way. In his letter to me, Arthur has anticipated that the review is likely to recommend a significant programme of reform and restructuring that will last several years. Mindful that he had not intended to serve in his current position for such a period, it was his view that retiring from his post at this time would allow the Assembly Commission to appoint a new Clerk and Chief Executive to oversee through to fruition the full programme of change.

In my own opinion, such concern for the best interests of the Assembly and its secretariat is typical of our Clerk, whose service to the House has been marked at all times by commitment, loyalty and integrity. I know that Members will wish to express their gratitude to him and will have an opportunity to do so at a later date.

Looking ahead, the Commission is taking firm steps to ensure continuity of service to the Assembly while the process of appointing a new Clerk is undertaken, and I will write to Members once appropriate arrangements have been put in place.

Members' Participation in Debates / Ministerial Statements

Mr Speaker: During the business of this House on 18 September 2007, Mr Dominic Bradley raised a point of order. He referred to the involvement of Members in a debate when those Members had not been present for all of that debate. Mr Bradley thought that that was inconsistent with his not being called to ask a question following a ministerial statement, after he had missed the start of that statement.

At this stage, I want to point out that the regular business of the House is different to that of ministerial statements. I would not expect any Member to sit through the entire day's business — I understand that Members have other work to do. There will be a ministerial statement later this morning, so, once again I must emphasise the principle and the convention to be observed with regard to ministerial statements.

If Members who have been present in the Chamber to hear all of the statement wish to ask questions, I will seek to ensure that they can do so. If Members have been in the Chamber for part of the statement, and if there is sufficient time left, I shall allow them to put their questions. However, those Members will not be called before the Members who have been present for the entire statement. The Chair will try to accommodate as many Members as possible.

It is attendance in the Chamber that counts; it does not matter that Members may have been listening to the statement elsewhere. Some Members have indicated that they have heard a ministerial statement in their rooms and that that should be enough to allow them to rush to the House to ask questions. That will not happen. If Members wish to ask questions, they must be present in the Chamber to hear the full statement.

I hope that I have made clear the difference between the day-to-day business of the House and ministerial statements.

Workplace 2010

Mr Speaker: I have received notice from the Minister of Finance and Personnel that he wishes to make a statement on Workplace 2010 and the location of public-sector jobs.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel (Mr P Robinson): I want to make a statement on a couple of issues of interest that were considered at the last Executive meeting. The first of those is the Workplace 2010 contract, which, because of its nature, has courted some controversy, and I shall come on to that shortly. The second issue, and one that is in some ways linked, is the ongoing debate on the location of public-sector jobs. Both of those matters, certainly during my time as Minister of Finance and Personnel, have generated intense interest and speculation about how and where we accommodate civil servants.

Members could be forgiven for thinking that something as dry as Civil Service accommodation would hardly be the stuff that headlines are made of and would not make for particularly riveting reading. However, those projects have grabbed the attention of many people for a whole host of reasons.

I am pleased to report that, on what have been very difficult issues for all the parties on the Executive Committee, we have fashioned the way forward in such a way that the Executive have agreed unanimously that both projects should proceed to the next stage.

The Executive's ability to agree on the handling of Workplace 2010 and job dispersal demonstrates the foolishness of claims that the Executive are avoiding taking difficult decisions.

I wish to address some concerns directly. First, the fact that we are proposing to deliver Workplace 2010 through PFI procurement has caused considerable debate. Secondly, there is concern that the PFI contract will in some way consolidate the Civil Service in Belfast and thus restrict any future movement of business. Thirdly, concerns have been raised about what will happen to the 500 civil servants who are employed in estate and property-related work.

Those are the matters that have been at the heart of the debate, rather than the estate itself, so it was important, when coming to conclusions, that Ministers, including myself, were able to consider them before making decisions to proceed, and it was for that reason that I submitted papers to the Executive seeking their approval.

Towards the end of the next stage, I intend to bring the details of the contract back to Ministers for further consideration, but I firmly believe that this is a good example of how, as an Executive, we have demonstrated that we are prepared to take on, and come to consensus on, the big issues.

I shall start with Workplace 2010, which, for Members who are less familiar with the detail, is a proposed PFI contract that would enable some 77 Civil Service office buildings to be transferred to a private sector partner who would be responsible for upgrading about 15 of the core properties at a cost of about £100 million. In taking over the buildings, the private sector would also be responsible for maintaining and servicing them during the period of the contract.

When I became Minister of Finance and Personnel, the competitive process to find the most suitable private-sector partner was well advanced — the Department had already shortlisted Land Securities Trillium and Telereal from four bidders who had initially submitted proposals.

The question for the Executive and for me was whether the procurement, which is worth about £1.5 billion, should proceed. Is it right for Northern Ireland? Is it right for the Government?

Some commentators who take a very superficial view of matters have, for example, suggested that we are selling off the family silver. Well, some of that is very tarnished silver. We are not talking about buildings of great historical or cultural interest. We are talking about office blocks and Portakabins, some of which are well past their sell-by dates and in urgent need of attention.

In the greater Belfast area, for example, we are dealing with 18 buildings that are owned by the Government, and, of those, 14 will be either demolished or vacated once the refurbishment programme is complete. That gives some idea of the state of the buildings that we are talking about, and that situation is not sustainable for reasons of efficiency and the conditions in which some people are working.

Ironically, the best of the accommodation is already leased, so the idea of the Civil Service renting from the private sector is by no means new. Seventeen leaseholds will transfer in Belfast, and we will continue to occupy most of them for the lifetime of the contract.

In summary, we have an estate that needs major investment to bring it up to scratch and provide better working conditions that will drive improvements in the delivery of services, which, ultimately, is what the public sector is in business to do.

Since doing nothing is not an option, we have had to consider how those improvements should be funded, and the amount of money that we need is simply not available to us. Having looked at various procurement options, we have concluded that the financial case for PFI gives us best value for money. To put it simply, the 77 buildings cost us about £70 million each year, and that allows us only to tread water.

The Workplace 2010 contract will see the successful private sector partner investing about £100 million in improving the accommodation. We will have a contractual guarantee that the estate will be maintained and serviced to a good standard for the next 20 years or so, and all that will be done for broadly the same amount of money that we are spending at present.

As things stand, we can also expect to get a capital payment in the region of £200 million to help fund other projects such as roads, hospitals and schools during the comprehensive spending review period.

Therefore, by selling the “tarnished silver”, we will be provided with quality, polished silver to use and the money to buy new, valuable and urgently needed assets. It is a very attractive deal, and it is absolutely essential if we are serious about proceeding with the priorities in our investment strategy. That said, we nonetheless need to be assured that the contract represents value for money. The financial case shows that, as things stand, the PFI contract is hundreds of millions of pounds cheaper than traditional procurement, but it is important that appropriate safeguards be put in place.

On that subject, the Committee for Finance and Personnel has been particularly helpful. The Committee has produced a report that majors on value for money, based on the experience and evidence of other PFI projects. It has, quite rightly, subjected the project to a rigorous examination and proposed a number of recommendations, which I have accepted and which will provide the necessary assurances to my ministerial colleagues, and to the Assembly, that value for money is being delivered.

Related to the subject of value for money is the issue of the value of the estate, and the concern that the Government could have their eye wiped by a private-sector partner intent on making excessive profits at our expense. I have been able to say to other Ministers and to the Committee that the Department has looked in some detail at the structure of other deals. It has also looked at what the Public Accounts Committee and the Northern Ireland Audit Office have had to say about other deals, and a commercial approach has been developed that will ensure that Civil Service interests are protected. The approach that we are taking will realise best value as and when sites are released and will optimise the share of any profits. We have also assured the Committee that the outcome of an independent valuation exercise will be taken into account in the final contract.

As I have already said, a key concern for staff and the unions is the impact of that contract on the people who are employed in estate- and property-related work.

If we are to transfer the estate and all the associated functions, the question arises about what happens to the staff, many of whom are messengers and support-grade staff who want to remain in the Civil Service. Therefore, although we are clear that the transfer of functions such as reception and security services makes good financial sense, we are determined to ensure that any staff who want to remain in the Civil Service have the opportunity to do so.

We have done that by introducing a process whereby messengers and support staff can, for the first time, transfer to mainstream Civil Service jobs, with the opportunity to follow a career path that previously was not available to them. Over three quarters of the 300 staff involved have applied to transfer to administrative jobs, and the feedback to date has been very positive. As a result, I have been able to assure Ministers that there will be no compulsory transfers to the private sector, and the Executive have unanimously agreed that that should indeed be the case.

In my opening remarks, I said that concerns had been raised that the contract would restrict our capacity to relocate jobs in future. In the context of Workplace 2010, the Department is working on the basis that the contract must be flexible enough to accommodate future movement of business, whether that be for political or operational reasons. This is where we start to stray into the wider issue of the location of public-sector jobs, so, at this stage, I should perhaps move on to address that particular piece of work.

As I have said before, our public sector is too large, given the overall size of the economy in Northern Ireland. We must build the private sector. However, at the same time, I recognise the critical role played by public servants. I also recognise that decisions around the future location of public-sector jobs could have important implications for communities throughout Northern Ireland. Decisions will have to be taken about where the new bodies created as a result of the review of public administration (RPA) will be based. We also need to think about the longer term.

I, therefore, asked the Executive on 13 September to agree to a two-pronged approach. First, we shall develop a framework that will provide a robust process for decision-making on the location of RPA-related bodies. Secondly, we will undertake a time-bound review of policy on the location of public-sector jobs in Northern Ireland. Again, I am pleased to say that the Executive have agreed to that approach.

There is a need to create a coherent and integrated framework to underpin decisions on the location of RPA-related bodies. I am talking about the decisions on the permanent location of bodies such as the new Northern Ireland library authority and the education and skills authority. The framework will help to ensure that the decisions that are made about the location of those new bodies will be well informed and soundly based.

In the spring, the Department of Finance and Personnel consulted on the proposed framework. It invited views on the proposed guiding principles in order that decisions that result from the RPA on the location of public-sector jobs could be underpinned. Not surprisingly, the consultation attracted strong interest, and there were many helpful responses.

As I mentioned earlier, since then the Committee for Finance and Personnel has published the document 'First Report on Workplace 2010 and Location of Public Sector Jobs'. That report included several constructive recommendations on the proposed framework. The framework will broadly follow the approach that the consultation document proposed, with amendments to reflect both the Committee's report and consultees' responses.

Alongside the guiding principles, there will be a detailed methodology as to how the principles should be applied to help to ensure openness and robustness throughout the decision-making process. Given that the Executive have now agreed the framework, we will work towards publishing it later in the autumn. Although the framework will provide a robust methodology for making decisions on the location of the RPA-related bodies, we will also need to think about the longer term.

There is no extant proactive dispersal policy in Northern Ireland. To date, dispersal has relied on taking advantage of opportunities as they arose in cases in which value for money could be demonstrated. In an Adjournment debate in the summer, I quoted figures on the location of public-sector jobs. As those figures illustrated, the picture on the location of those jobs is complex, as are the issues on the costs and benefits of dispersal.

The wide spectrum of opinion and the complexity of location were also reflected in the responses to the consultation. For example, as expected, dispersal was one of the key themes to emerge in the analysis of the consultation responses. Several respondents favoured a proactive policy of dispersal of public-sector jobs from the Belfast area. Other respondents, although they acknowledged that a well-managed relocation policy could bring a more even spread of benefits of public-sector employment opportunities across Northern Ireland, also emphasised the critical role that Belfast plays in driving the Northern Ireland economy. They also pointed to the many areas of deprivation in Belfast. Overall, however, most respondents expressed a desire for greater clarity and openness on the policy of the location of public-sector jobs.

The Committee for Finance and Personnel's report called for an affirmative policy on the dispersal of public-sector jobs. It stated that that policy should be complemented by a cross-cutting strategy on job location, covering the Northern Ireland Civil Service, local government, and the wider public sector. Taking all that into account, I, therefore, believe that it is important that the location of public-sector jobs receives proper, detailed consideration. For that reason, I proposed initiating a time-bound review of policy on the location of public-sector jobs in Northern Ireland to enable the Executive to come to an agreed approach on location policy.

Ministers have supported that review, and I have agreed shortly to introduce to the Executive further detailed proposals on the terms of reference for the review and who might undertake it. Although the details of the review require further consideration, it is important that it be independent and chaired by someone who is experienced in the public sector and respected in the community. The review would be time-bound and would also include a detailed cost-benefit analysis of the dispersal of public-sector jobs in Northern Ireland. The review would also examine decentralisation policies and their implementation in other jurisdictions.

Initiating a detailed, time-bound review on location policy, alongside introducing a robust framework to facilitate location decisions for RPA-related bodies, provides a practical way forward. In the context of Workplace 2010, I am content that the final contract should reflect any decision on a dispersal policy that the Executive might make following the review.

I need to bring to Members' attention one final point on Workplace 2010. The Executive have agreed that the procurement of the contract should now proceed to best-and-final-offer stage. However, that is subject to a court injunction on the procurement being lifted. Unfortunately, during the summer, one of the unsuccessful bidders filed a legal challenge on the basis of belief that his or her bid was evaluated unfairly and irrationally. Given that the Department believes that there is no case to answer on the fairness and integrity of the process, suffice it for me to say that it does not accept that claim and will vigorously defend itself.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Dallat] in the Chair)

As things stand, an injunction is in place that prohibits the Department from inviting best and final offers from the two remaining bidders. That injunction is due to be reviewed at a hearing on 11 October, when I can assure Members that the Department will be strongly opposing any extension on the grounds that any further delay will substantially prejudice the project. There is, therefore, likely to be a bit of a hiatus until the injunction issue can be resolved and, as yet, I cannot give any guarantees as to how long that will take.

In the meantime, I am grateful to Ministers from all parties for their support and I will, naturally, update the Assembly on progress in due course.

The Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel (Mr Storey): On behalf of the Committee for Finance and Personnel, I thank the Minister for his statement. I welcome the Department's positive response to the Committee's report on Workplace 2010 and the location of public-sector jobs. The Committee has proposed a take-note debate on its report and the Department's response. That debate will provide a further opportunity for the House to consider the matters that have been set out today.

In that context, I ask the Minister when further information on the proposed review of policy on jobs location will be available to the Committee. I refer, in particular, to the scope, terms of reference and timetable for the review. Is the Minister minded to bring that information to the Committee before its presentation to the Executive?

Mr P Robinson: I thank the Committee for its work on its report on Workplace 2010, and for the views that it has expressed on job location. I welcome the take-note debate that the Committee hopes to propose.

As for the Member's question on the timetable for the review, the Department is currently considering a number of matters, including which person or persons should carry out the review. As I indicated in my statement, we are looking for someone who will be respected in the community and who has some considerable experience in the relevant area of activity. I imagine — if I have to make a fist of it — that we will probably bring those recommendations to the Executive in the next four to six weeks.

Of course, I will ensure, before going to the Executive, that I have the advantage of hearing the views of the Committee. That will be important and beneficial. The Committee will be part of the process.

Ms J McCann: I thank the Minister for his detailed statement. I too welcome the review. Given the concerns that the Minister outlined about the implications for the long-term equitable dispersal of public-sector jobs across the Six Counties, will the flexibility of the Civil Service estate be restricted by long-term contracts with the private sector?

Given the direct linkage between Workplace 2010 and the relocation of public-sector jobs, will the Minister guarantee that there will be a clear and direct link between Workplace 2010 and the equitable dispersal of public sector and Civil Service jobs?

Mr P Robinson: I am aware of the concerns that many people have expressed. I have managed to travel around the country and hear people's views on the matter. People who live west of the Bann will, I hope, see that, in the past, I have always encouraged development in that region. I did that in the Department for Regional Development, and I can assure the Member that, when it comes to the dispersal of public-sector jobs, I will do the same in the Department of Finance and Personnel. However, the final contract will be sufficiently flexible to allow us room to manoeuvre, whatever the Executive might decide on dispersal policy. Indeed, that contract will come to the Executive before they sign off on the final private-sector partner.

As for linkages, the Member will already be aware that I have made it very clear in my remarks today, and in the way that they were presented to the Executive, that the matters are linked. For legal reasons, the only contractual similarity between the two is that flexibility on job dispersal will be built into the contract, which will allow the Executive to make decisions based on the new policy.

Mr Beggs: The Minister spoke of selling tarnished silver. Does he acknowledge that there is some sparkling silver among the 77 buildings proposed for the sell-off — I am thinking, in particular, about the jobs and benefits offices that have been modernised at a cost of tens of millions of pounds in recent years?

Does he also acknowledge that, contrary to public opinion, there are constituencies in the east of Northern Ireland, such as my East Antrim constituency, which have the lowest number of Civil Service jobs? Will he ensure that the lack of significant numbers of Civil Service jobs in eastern constituencies will be taken into account in any policy to disperse those jobs?

Mr P Robinson: I am aware that some offices have been refurbished and that approximately £50 million has been spent on that refurbishment. However, we need to be very clear that the proposed contract will ensure that those offices stay in that state for the next 20 years. The requirements are very clear.

It is not simply a case of sale and lease-back — whereby one finds oneself in the position of selling property and leasing it back again from a private-sector landlord. In this case, we will have a contract, which will require the private-sector landlord to keep those properties, and the management of those properties, at the highest of standards.

As far as Civil Service jobs in East Antrim are concerned, I made the point that that issue is complicated. I remember teasing one of the Members for West Tyrone during an adjournment debate that in examining travel-to-work areas in relation to public-sector jobs — and comparing the jobs of 100 economically active people in an area — Omagh was the highest in Northern Ireland, and Larne was probably the worst.

It is not just as simple as dispersing all the jobs to the west. Areas inside the Belfast travel-to-work area, but outside the heart of Belfast, can, in many ways, be seen to be in more difficulty than those west of the Bann.

Mr O’Loan: I welcome the review of Civil Service jobs and the fact that the Minister has said in his statement, and in an earlier answer, that the outcome of the policy will be reflected in the final contract. Elsewhere, I believe the Minister, in making his decision on the matter, referred to it as a “no-brainer”. That is a rather risky phrase to use in view of a previous decision, which another Minister also referred to as a “no-brainer”. I hope that for the Minister’s sake, and ours, the phrase does not come back to haunt him.

There are legitimate concerns about PFI contracts because there have been situations here and in Great Britain in which, in the end, the public interest has not been served well by PFI contracts and private contractors have done extremely well.

What real assurances can the Minister offer the Assembly and the public that this PFI contract will work in the public interest?

Mr P Robinson: I am grateful to the Member for his earlier remarks. Although there are examples such as Balmoral High School — which comes into the conversation each time someone talks about PFI — to some extent it is those examples that will help us in relation to this contract, because we have learned from all experiences, good and bad, elsewhere in Northern Ireland and throughout the United Kingdom.

The Department has taken all those good and bad experiences on board; and the Committee for Finance and Personnel particularly noted that valuation and value-for-money issues should be considered carefully during this exercise. That has been done.

All I can say is that we have learned from the experiences of others, and, on the basis of the changes that we have made, and throughout the process, we have considerably improved the contract. If it were simply a case of our going for the greatest possible amount of capital, the contract would be very different to the one that we have, which builds in flexibility and safeguards to ensure that public interest will be taken into account.

Dr Farry: Like others, I thank the Minister for his statement. Is there any logic in deferring the final contract for Workplace 2010 so that the more cost-effective and efficient results of the dispersal strategy will be in place, rather than seeking contract variations down the line?

With respect to dispersal, does the Minister recognise that, at the moment, Bangor is the only town that will lose jobs? Does he recognise that that negative dispersal will impact on the local economy’s sustainability and is opposed by the local workforce? What are the current plans for the Rathgael House site?

Mr P Robinson: I have attempted to bring forward two sets of proposals in parallel — Workplace 2010 and the location of Civil Service jobs. The dispersal policy will proceed, and I have outlined the timescale, so I imagine that the Executive will have a clear picture of that policy. Therefore, a backcloth will be in place when Workplace 2010 contracts are signed.

As far as Bangor is concerned, I have met the Member for North Down and the previous Mayor of North Down, his predecessor. The Department of Finance and Personnel wishes to be located in the Stormont estate — at the moment, our staff are located in approximately 20 buildings around Northern Ireland, which is not an efficient or effective way to operate. The Department is continuing to seek the views of the Department of Education about remaining in Bangor or moving. Therefore, no final decision has been made on the issue. I am aware of the impact that job losses will have to North Down and of the views of those currently employed in Rathgael House.

Mr Weir: I thank the Minister for his statement. I am sure that a common-sense solution will be found with regard to Rathgael House.

It is particularly welcome that the debate has not descended into parochialism. Indeed, I commend the selfless attitude of the Member for West Belfast opposite, who seemed keen on maximum dispersal, taking jobs out of her own constituency and dispersing them to the west of the Province.

Does the Minister believe that the legal challenge to Workplace 2010 from the unsuccessful bidder will cause any delay to its implementation?

Mr P Robinson: I hope that when we — eventually — announce the policy on Rathgael House, Mr Weir will agree that it is a common-sense approach.
[Laughter.]

One argument for the importance of Belfast is not simply that it is the capital — and there is a view that the main headquarters should be in the Belfast area — but that the many areas of deprivation in the Belfast area must be taken into account in the dispersal policy, just as the Member for East Antrim pointed out the needs of the travel-to-work area outside Belfast.

With regard to the legal challenge, I can honestly say to the Member that the courts did not choose to deal with the matter; it was brought to the courts. Therefore, the courts are in no way to blame. There is a case before the courts, so I shall be very careful of what I say; however, it is right to point out that we are already being held back. At their meeting on 13 September, the Executive took the decision to go to the best-and-final-offer stage.

The Department could have come to the Assembly immediately after that, but held off because the court was hearing the case last week. Therefore, the Department is already being held back, which has implications for resources and capital under the CSR. That is one of the difficulties that the Department faces in introducing the Investment Strategy for Northern Ireland 2 and Budget proposals. We need to know the amount of funding that will be available during the course of the CSR. Such a large sum of money will have serious implications for the number of roads, hospitals and educational buildings that can be constructed. All those issues must be dealt with in a short period. Therefore, the court case is preventing the Department from taking such decisions and introducing its Budget.

Mr O'Dowd: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I welcome the Minister's statement, in which he pre-empted a question that I had tabled to ask him later during Question Time.

The Minister acknowledged deep political and social concerns about PFI. His statement went some way to attempt to alleviate some of those concerns. I note that the Executive have agreed to move on the next stage of the process by deciding that the final contracts be presented for approval. I assume that those contracts will guarantee to protect the public purse and expenditure.

To be fair, the recent Committee for Finance and Personnel and Public Accounts Committee reports pointed out where past mistakes were made; and the Minister highlighted the example of Balmoral High School, which the Public Accounts Committee is examining. Recently, the Minister made a speech about the Public Accounts Committee. I take the opportunity to assure the Minister that the Public Accounts Committee exists not only to shine the light on mistakes, but to show the way forward to Departments or the private sector, so that they can avoid repeating those mistakes. Can the Minister assure me that, when the final contracts are produced, lessons will have been learned from all past mistakes to ensure that Members who stand in the Assembly 10 years from now are not talking about another PFI disaster?

Mr P Robinson: I am not sure how many Members will still be here in 10 years. However, we must learn from past mistakes and avoid making new ones. All that the Executive can do is give their best effort, using their skills, expertise and the experiences of others, to take the correct decisions, and I am confident that we will do that.

The Member mentioned that I had pre-empted a question that he intended to ask me later during Question Time. I am sure that that will not deter him from thinking up a new question on the same subject. It is important to remember that the contract is a substantial one worth some £1.5 billion and the Department must get it right. We are seized of that importance and have half a notion of things that have gone wrong in the past. We must ensure that we will not be in a future position of having to explain why we did not act as we should have. We are aware of all the future implications and impact of Workplace 2010.

I acknowledge the valuable work of the Public Accounts Committee, and I am glad that the Member follows so avidly the speeches that I make around the country. However, during the speech to which he referred, to the Confederation of British Industry, I simply pointed out that the innovation and new thinking of civil servants should not be curtailed by pillorying them every time they get something wrong. To ensure that innovation is not stifled, there must be some balance in the consideration of such matters.

Mr McQuillan: I thank the Minister for his statement. If Workplace 2010 were not to proceed in line with the current timescale, what would be the implications for the capital budget of Northern Ireland?

Mr P Robinson: That would depend on the extent to which Workplace 2010 does not meet the timetable. The Executive will bring forward a draft Budget during October/November. A sum of £200 million would leave a sizeable hole in the capital spend if it were not available to us. If that sum is not available when we bring forward the three-year comprehensive spending review, but becomes available after that, the Executive could make speedy adjustments. However, that would affect the planning for our investment strategy.

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Minister confirm that all parties in the Executive agree on the principle of PFI? I welcome the Minister's comments on concerns about staff. Will he assure the Assembly that those staff who have not yet transferred to the Civil Service will be treated fairly and equitably, and that any of those who transfer to the private sector will have their terms and conditions protected? Will he further assure the Assembly that the private contractors who provide services on behalf of Departments, such as security and reception, will be made fully aware of their statutory obligations under section 75 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998?

Mr P Robinson: I doubt whether any parties in the Executive agree to the principle of PFI. All the parties in the Executive were prepared to consider, on a case-by-case basis, whether that form of procurement made sense in the circumstances. A range of procurement methods were considered, and it was clear from studies that were carried out that PFI was the best method for the project. I will not commit any political party to having bought into PFI, but my party has concerns about it. I told the Executive that I would not be found among the cheerleaders for PFI, but, if it makes sense for a particular project, I am happy to recommend it, and it makes sense for Workplace 2010.

We have a clear responsibility to our staff. I am glad that there has been such a large uptake in staff wishing to transfer to the Civil Service. In fact, I wonder why such an option was not available in the past so that those people could have an extended career path. There is no compulsory transfer to the private sector, but if anyone chooses to transfer to the private sector, their conditions will fall under The Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 2006.

Mr McHugh: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I welcome the Minister's statement, which allows Members an opportunity to raise issues relating to Workplace 2010. On the equitability of job dispersal or decentralisation not only to rural areas, but west of the Bann, the Minister mentioned that Omagh did well in comparison to other towns. However, in my experience, Enniskillen seems to have lost many jobs to Omagh, and that is the wrong direction, as far those in Enniskillen are concerned.

Did the Minister take into account any criteria when considering the equitability of jobs dispersal? An attempt was made to relocate public-sector jobs in the pensions branch to Fermanagh, but Civil Service officials admitted that they did not have enough staff at grade 3 to even consider bidding for such dispersal of jobs. Does that leave rural areas, such as Fermanagh, unable to bid for such dispersal of jobs?

Mr P Robinson: The answer to that depends on the size of the office in question. Obviously, there would be no point in placing a large office — holding hundreds, if not thousands, of people — in an area that is incapable of providing that number of employees. I noted the eyes that were piercing into the Member's back when he expressed his unhappiness about Omagh taking jobs away from Enniskillen. [Laughter.]

That is part of the difficulty in focusing on individual areas in Northern Ireland; all those issues come into play. Even if the Executive had the wisdom of Solomon — and I suspect that they do not — it would be very difficult to find a policy that would keep everyone happy, and through which jobs would go to every area in Northern Ireland. The Executive just cannot do that. The policy has to be open, fair and must be one that people — considering the overall picture — can support. Members must bear in mind that the rate of unemployment in Northern Ireland is 3·4%, which is the lowest ever. There are still jobs available, so there is an issue around the number of people who will be available for jobs.

In an earlier debate, I mentioned that there are considerable advantages, other than employment, in stopping people coming into Belfast from outlying areas. One such advantage is reducing congestion. The Executive will consider their policy over the coming weeks and months, and I hope that Members, when determining how good that policy is, will not just think about their home towns, but the whole of Northern Ireland.

Mr Hamilton: The Minister has outlined some implications for the capital budget if the project is delayed: what are the implications for the resources budget and for the conditions that civil servants have to work in?

Mr P Robinson: As I indicated, we are treading water, and that puts the matter at the highest level of importance. Although £70 million each year is being spent on the present estate, millions of pounds worth of work should be done annually to improve and upgrade the estate. If we are not going to follow the Workplace 2010 route, using a PFI initiative, we are going to have to invest more in the general repair and maintenance of the buildings.

One factor that has not been touched on is the overall reform of the Civil Service. If our reform project is to deliver the efficiencies that we want it to, we must be able to move the Civil Service to office conditions that will enable staff to work more effectively and efficiently. There will be a considerable loss in that respect.

Some time ago, I asked my Department about the resource implications of a project delay. Over the period of the comprehensive spending review, there will probably be tens of millions of pounds in additional costs to the resource budget. Therefore, there are resource and capital implications.

Mr Irwin: I add my thanks to the Minister for his statement.

In the past five years, what was the shortfall between what should have been spent on Civil Service buildings and what was actually spent?

Mr P Robinson: Over the past five years the shortfall has been about £20 million.

Mr Shannon: I thank the Minister for his statement, which was timely and appropriate. There has been much concern expressed to me and many others in the Chamber, and further afield, about the sale of land here — particularly parkland and perhaps even this Building. Will the Minister assure Members and their constituents that land, which many people feel was bequeathed to the people of the Province, will not be sold? Will the Minister also confirm what buildings, if any, will be sold, or be considered for sale, in the Stormont estate?

Mr P Robinson: I thought at first that the Member was going to test my Ulster Scots, but he let me down. In the context of the debate, I assume that his use of the word “here” refers to the Stormont estate and not to Northern Ireland. I assure the Member that Parliament Buildings is not included in any planned schemes that will become the subjects of PFI. We are talking about buildings such as Castle Buildings, Craigantlet House — where I am currently based — and Dundonald House, and there will be clear criteria laid down in the contract to ensure that neither McDonald's nor Burger King opens up in place of those buildings.

Mr S Wilson: Why not?

Mr P Robinson: I am sorry to disappoint the Member for East Antrim. The Stormont estate is magnificent, and no one in the Executive will put their hand to its destruction: no one has any notion of including Parliament Buildings in such a contract.

COMMITTEE BUSINESS

Libraries Bill: Extension of Committee Stage

The Chairperson of the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure (Mr McElduff): I beg to move

That, in accordance with Standing Order 31(4), the period referred to in Standing Order 31(2) be extended to 25 February 2008, in relation to the Committee Stage of the Libraries Bill (NIA Bill 5/07).

Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. The Libraries Bill passed its Second Stage on 19 June 2007, and it was referred to the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure on the same day. The Bill is an important piece of legislation, which seeks to create a new library authority to replace the functions of five education and library board areas, in respect of libraries. The Committee is anxious to ensure that it carries out its responsibilities and conducts a rigorous scrutiny of the legislation, and towards that end, the Committee agreed that it needed to call a range of witnesses. It is, therefore, important that the Committee has sufficient time to consider that forthcoming evidence. That will ensure that the Assembly receives a well-balanced, informed report from the Committee.

The Committee is seeking an extension to 25 February 2008 with a view to getting the Committee Stage of this important piece of legislation absolutely right. However, we will endeavour to complete the Committee Stage as soon as possible — hopefully short of 25 February. I ask Members for their support.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That, in accordance with Standing Order 31(4), the period referred to in Standing Order 31(2) be extended to 25 February 2008, in relation to the Committee Stage of the Libraries Bill (NIA Bill 5/07).

ASSEMBLY BUSINESS

Administrative Support for Party Whips

Mr A Maginness: I beg to move

That, as set out in section 2(4) of the Financial Assistance for Political Parties Act (Northern Ireland) 2000, this Assembly approves the revised scheme (NIA 26/07-08) laid before the Assembly on 20 September 2007, for payments to political parties for the purpose of assisting Members of the Northern Ireland Assembly who are connected with such parties to perform their Assembly duties.

I move the motion on behalf of the Assembly Commission. Members will be aware that the Financial Assistance for Political Parties Act (Northern Ireland) 2000 provides for payment to political parties for the purpose of assisting Members to perform their duties. It does not provide payments to individual Members. In tabling the motion, it is proposed that a revised scheme will be put in place to provide additional financial assistance to political parties to help offset the costs incurred solely in running their Whips' offices.

It is important to bear in mind that the funding will be ring-fenced and will only be made available for costs incurred in support of the administration of Whips' offices. Independent audited verification will be sought from each party in respect of any expenditure incurred under the proposed scheme.

1.00 pm

Members will be aware that Whips act as their parties' business managers. They help to determine the business to be conducted by the Assembly, and they keep Members informed of forthcoming Assembly business. Whips provide advice and guidance to Members on procedural matters and liaise with Whips of other parties to ensure that all Members perform their duties in a co-ordinated and organised manner. They also act as facilitators for Members by liaising with the Speaker and the Assembly staff on Members' accommodation requirements, IT services, and other matters. All that work allows Members of the Assembly to concentrate on the effective performance of their Assembly duties.

It is with that in mind that the Commission has produced this scheme, with all-party support.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That, as set out in section 2(4) of the Financial Assistance for Political Parties Act (Northern Ireland) 2000, this Assembly approves the revised scheme (NIA 26/07-08) laid before the Assembly on 20 September 2007, for payments to political parties for the purpose of assisting Members of the Northern Ireland Assembly who are connected with such parties to perform their Assembly duties.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

Classroom Assistants

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one and a half hours for this debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes to propose and 10 minutes to wind up. All other speakers will have five minutes. Two amendments have been received and published on the Marshalled List. The proposer of each amendment will have 10 minutes to propose and five minutes to wind up.

Mr B McCrea: I beg to move

That this Assembly calls upon the Minister of Education to intervene immediately in the classroom assistants' dispute, in recognition of the vital role of classroom assistants, and to prevent disruption to children's education.

Recently, the Assembly discussed the matter of classroom assistants and called on the Minister to intervene directly to resolve a very serious situation. I am disappointed that the Minister is not here to talk about the issue.

At the time, the Minister said she did not have a problem and that she thought that she had already complied with —

Ms S Ramsey: Will the Member give way?

Mr B McCrea: I will give way, but —

Ms S Ramsey: It is just a point of information.

Mr B McCrea: I will give way, although the Member will get her chance to speak, if it is a point of information.

Ms S Ramsey: I thank the Member for that.

The Minister is on her way down. The debate was not due to start for another 10 minutes.

Mr B McCrea: I appreciate that information, and that is fair enough.

I hope that when I get to the summation she will be able to understand what I am going to say.

Mr Paisley Jnr: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. Will you make a very clear ruling that the House determines its business? It is not set by some timetable that is out of our control, and Members should be in their places when debates start.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The timings are just indicative.

Mr B McCrea: Given that the clock has now started again, and the Minister has arrived, I will try again.

The Assembly discussed the matter of classroom assistants not so long ago, and Members urged the Minister to get involved directly. In response to that motion, tabled by Mr Dominic Bradley, the Minister said that she did not think that she had to do any more than had been done already. The Minister felt that she had brought in an equitable solution. At that time she clearly did not think there was a problem.

Now the Assembly is faced with a botched negotiation, a strike, and entrenched positions that will be extremely difficult to resolve.

When her colleague the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development was faced with the foot-and-mouth disease crisis she moved with considerable alacrity, consulted widely with all of the stakeholders, and was commended by the Executive for the speed at which she dealt with the situation. I wonder if the Minister of Education will respond in a similar manner to the grave situation that we now face, or will she continue to focus her attention elsewhere? Will she stop considering ideological hobby horses and start dealing with matters in hand? When will the Minister realise that photo opportunities are all well and good, but that there are some tough issues to be dealt with?

The previous debate on this subject was extremely useful, and I do not intend to go over the core issues that were raised. However, I bring to the attention of the House some important matters of detail that explain the problems we face. It is important that the Minister gets involved, because the matter is serious and is escalating out of control. Now is the time to intervene decisively, to show leadership and to take control. The Minister must tell us exactly how she will resolve the situation — a final offer has been made and rejected, a ballot has been taken, and people are now on strike.

Classroom assistants feel that they are being asked to take a pay cut, and they cannot understand why. Members agree that they do a good job. However, classroom assistants feel that they are the scapegoats for failures elsewhere. While I deal with the situation of misunderstandings, will the Minister clarify exactly how many classroom assistants will need pay protection to avoid a reduction in pay? There appears to be a misunderstanding whether that is an issue.

The Minister's Department presented the Committee for Education with a briefing note. It used the words:

"Not all posts were expected to increase in grade as a result of evaluation."

and,

"The results of the classroom assistants' evaluation also show that many are in fact already correctly graded."

Finally, the briefing note says that:

"It is therefore a considerable cause for concern that non union members are being denied the arrears due to them."

That may all be true. However, it does not suggest that they will have to take a pay cut. That seems to be the crux of the issue. Some people are being asked to take a pay cut, but everyone else says that they do rather well.

I have heard it said on several occasions — usually by people on £60,000 a year — that there are probably too many classroom assistants and that they are probably overpaid. Does the Minister think that classroom assistants are overpaid? Could she clarify that point?

I acknowledge that, for some time, the Minister's Department has been working hard on those issues. However, does the Minister know how hard and for how long? Does she know, for example, that, in November 2005, the South Eastern Education and Library Board reported to the Department that it would have a deficit of £600,000 after repaying £3.5 million to the Department for a previous problem? However, six weeks later, the board said that it was sorry and that it had made a mistake: the calculation was £2 million out because it had forgotten to include the thirteenth lunar month for the pay for classroom assistants, and it had forgotten to include in the budget that there might be a job evaluation and pay review. Suddenly there was a big problem.

There are other issues. Is the Minister aware of KPMG's final report, which shows that the number of special educational needs (SEN) applications had doubled from one year to the next? The report comes up with cryptic words and suggests that we should:

"Focus medical input on relevant issues".

What does that mean? It means that we want fewer SENs. There should be fewer statements, not because they are not needed, but because we cannot afford them. Furthermore, the report refers to "adult/general assistants", rather than specialist assistants.

Therefore, classroom assistants must be downgraded. We should:

"Revisit and implement recommendations of Internal Audit report on Classroom Assistants (June 2004)

— Some management responses require challenge."

In other words, go back and think again. Finally:

"Revise policy decisions

— Employment of over-qualified classroom assistants

— Non-legislative employment of nursery classroom assistants."

Taken in the round, it means that while trying to carry out a fair and equitable job evaluation, a decision was also taken to reduce the number of classroom assistants and the amount of pay that they receive.

Is the Minister aware that the Department, when it was doing those things, was acting in opposition to the strategic direction of the rest of the United Kingdom?

'Raising standards and tackling workload: a national agreement' was a unique agreement between Government, unions and teachers, which attempted to tackle stress levels and overwork in schools. Key to that strategy was increasing the number of classroom assistants and improving the training they received. Therefore at a time when the Department of Education was seeking to reduce numbers in Northern Ireland, other areas were increasing them. Given that this situation has come to a head, I am interested in what the Minister of Education has to say about that.

Other Members will speak of pay cuts, NVQ level 3 and other matters that have been raised. I do not know what is to blame for this situation, but I know the effect — morale has plummeted. Good, decent people are leaving the jobs they love.

In addition, we now have a situation in which children who were getting one-to-one care are now being bussed to other schools. The result is that children with behavioural problems are being grouped together with children with autism. That is not efficient, effective or humane, because the first group know exactly which buttons to press to annoy the children with autism. That is not the right way forward.

Classroom assistants need this dispute to be resolved. The debate has gone on for far too long, and everyone now wants to know what is going to be done to resolve the situation. The time for prevarication, dithering and concentrating on issues such as Irish-medium education is over. These issues are more pressing. Mr Speaker, I ask the Minister to put forward some way to resolve the situation or schools will close.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Thank you, Mr McCrea; I was not expecting the promotion to Speaker so soon.
[Laughter.]

Ms Purvis: I beg to move amendment No 1: Leave out all after “Education” and insert

“to implement the recommendations put forward by the trade unions in the dispute over classroom assistants’ pay evaluation, and to liaise with the Minister of Finance and Personnel to ensure that funds are made available in order to resolve the situation and avert strike action.”

I have listened carefully to Basil McCrea’s comments. Some time ago, the Assembly debated the issue of classroom assistants. I have tabled the amendment in order to ask Members whether they care about children, their education and who looks after them. Do Members care if the people who look after their children are skilled and educated to the required level? Do they feel it safe to allow their children to be left in such care? Members must consider those questions whenever classroom assistants are discussed.

Members will talk about pay evaluation, special-needs allowances, the need to have qualifications to NVQ level 3, the hourly pay divisor, 32·5-hour week, and pay protection. However, that does not take away from the fact that this debate is about children, some of whom are the most vulnerable in society.

It is easy to talk about money and pay; it is easy to get bogged down in discussing how much more per hour a person earns and how we protect the 32·5-hour week.

1.15 pm

However, children are at the heart of the debate, especially the most vulnerable children, such as those from disadvantaged backgrounds, those suffering from autistic spectrum disorder, those with behavioural difficulties or attention deficit hyperactivity disorder, and those who have been traumatised by domestic violence or psychological abuse. Children can be affected by a wide range of issues, such as poverty, the environment and poor housing. Classroom assistants tend to work in schools in disadvantaged areas and with the most vulnerable children.

I would like to ask the Minister a direct question. I do not support the second amendment, because the Minister has met the trade unions, management side and the boards. The issues of special needs, NVQ level 3, the hourly pay divisor and pay protection have all been discussed at those meetings. They are continually being discussed. I asked the Minister the other day how the dispute could be resolved. She replied that all she could tell me was that negotiations were ongoing.

I can tell the Minister that negotiations are not ongoing. Representatives of the management side have met trade unions in the last few months and they have not negotiated; they set down the final offer that was discussed in the last debate, and they have not moved one millimetre, never mind one inch, on the issue. No negotiation is taking place.

The simple reason for that is that there is no money. The Minister should stand up and say that there is no money. It is great to see the co-operation of the Executive and the collective decision-making when it comes to money. However, Members are on their own when it comes to asking for new money. The sides split; nobody walks across the Floor when it comes to new money. The co-operation will probably end today because of this issue.

Members must stand up and be counted. Do we care about the children and the people who look after them? When the parent of a child with special needs goes to work, he or she leaves with the knowledge that the child is being looked after to the best standard available because of the classroom assistant’s skills. How can a parent leave with confidence, unless he or she knows that the child will be well looked after?

If assistants are expected to take a cut in pay or if they do not have to be qualified to NVQ level 3, will the parent have the confidence to leave his or her child in the classroom?

Mr S Wilson: I am worried about the line that the Member is taking. The implication is that classroom assistants — who do a superb job — will do that job only if they are given the right amount of money, and, if not given that money, will do a second-class job.

I would like the Member to clarify that, regardless of this pay dispute, classroom assistants do not have to be bribed to give the care and attention that they give to youngsters. They give it very well.

Ms Purvis: The Member is absolutely right. I apologise if I gave the impression that classroom assistants will not do their jobs properly if they are not given the level of pay that they want. As I said, this dispute is also about skills and qualifications and the special-needs allowance. It is about people who can care for children to a certain standard. We have that standard, and classroom assistants do a tremendous job, which is why the Assembly and the Minister must take the issue so seriously. We will see standards sliding if the requirement that assistants have an NVQ level 3 is not retained.

The issue boils down to how women and how disadvantaged and vulnerable children are valued and respected in this society. It is time that Members stood up — rather than hide behind their party policy or the co-operativeness of the Executive — and told the Executive to put their money where their collective mouth is. Do they support those people or not?

Mr Donaldson: I beg to move amendment No 2: Leave out all after the second “assistants” and insert

“by convening an urgent meeting of the Department, employers and Trade Union side in the dispute, with an agreed agenda to include (a) retention of the Special Needs Allowance; (b) retention of the 32.5 hourly pay divisor; (c) NVQ III and the job evaluation exercise; and (d) adequate pay protection arrangements, in order to prevent disruption to children’s education.”

I declare an interest as a governor of Parkview Special School in Lisburn. I echo the comments of the Member for East Belfast Ms Purvis in respect of the excellent work carried out by classroom assistants — particularly in special schools. Ms Purvis mentioned children on the autistic spectrum. I have had the privilege of witnessing at first hand — in Parkview Special School in Lisburn; in Beechlawn Special School in Hillsborough; and in Brookfield Special School in Moira — the excellent work that is done by classroom assistants in special education. There is no doubt in my mind that they are essential and that they provide an excellent support service to teaching staff in those special schools.

Owing to the Government’s policy of integrating children with special needs into mainstream education — through the Special Educational Needs and Disability (Northern Ireland) Order 2005 — there are now many classroom assistants working in mainstream schools across Northern Ireland. They provide support to those pupils with special needs who have, and are being, integrated into those schools, and they do very important work. Classroom assistants also work in the pre-school, nursery and the early-years sectors in Northern Ireland.

No Member would dissent from the view that we have the highest regard for classroom assistants. That was also indicated by the Member for Lagan Valley Basil McCrea when he proposed the motion.

There needs to be a resolution to the dispute. Urgency is required because, on Wednesday 26 September 2007, if there is no progress in the discussions, there is the prospect of industrial action, which will result in classroom assistants withdrawing their services for the day. For the special schools, that probably means having to close for the day because they cannot manage without the support provided by the classroom assistants. I have already had — as, I am sure, have other Members — calls from worried parents who are concerned about what they will do if those schools have to close.

Some parents are in a situation where both of them work, and they depend on their children going to school to be able to get their domestic affairs in order. They are also concerned about what will happen if industrial action intensifies. There is the possibility of a three-day closure, then progressively increasing the number of days on which schools are closed. I believe that all Members take the view that it is in everyone’s best interest — particularly the children and their parents — if industrial action can be avoided.

I, in common with many Members, have received correspondence from classroom assistants outlining their case.

I will quote from two such letters. The first is from Mrs Heather McCann, who lives in my own constituency. Heather is one of 16 classroom assistants in Beechlawn Special School in Hillsborough. She wrote:

“The Education Board feel that we should be brought into line with clerical staff i.e. a 36 hour week and the same pay scales, but we are classroom based, not office based. We work hand in hand with the teachers — for and on behalf of the children. The Education Board seem to feel this role has very little value at all. Their proposals have made us feel demoralised, devalued and degraded.”

I met Heather and some of her colleagues from Beechlawn Special School. The classroom assistants feel strongly about the manner in which they are being dealt. They feel particularly strongly about the hourly divisor that will be used to calculate their pay. Although they do not claim to be teaching staff, they work similar hours to teachers and are classroom-based. They consider that the 32-hour divisor that was used hitherto ought to be retained for the calculation of their pay. Some will lose out financially if the Department and the boards proceed with current proposals.

I feel strongly that that would be unfair, particularly for those classroom assistants who have been in their jobs for many years and who are being told that their existing contracts will be linked to the children that they support. Therefore, if a classroom assistant supports a child who is reaching their final years of education, the assistant's contract may have only one or two years to go before they have to begin again. I understand why they would feel aggrieved about that.

Mr S Wilson: I thank the Member for giving way. Does the Member accept that, given that classroom assistants' hours are linked to those of children, it is impossible for an assistant to work a full week? Classroom assistants can work only 32·5 hours a week. Therefore, it is unfair to equate them with clerical staff, who may continue working after school hours. Working longer hours would mean that they would be penalised. If classroom assistants cannot work a full week, how can they acquire a full pension entitlement?

Mr Donaldson: I thank my hon Friend for his intervention. He is absolutely right. The unfairness of what is proposed for classroom assistants is at the heart of the dispute. I understand why classroom assistants feel so strongly and why they are prepared to take industrial action.

I will quote from a letter that Mrs Lorraine Kelly wrote. She is a classroom assistant in the Minister's constituency, and she works in St Colmcille's High School in Crossgar. She wrote:

"I do what I consider to be very important and rewarding work as a classroom assistant, helping children with physical or learning difficulties to access the school curriculum, but my sense of self-worth has been eroded by a long-standing failure of government (from 1995) to settle a pay dispute and award a fair wage to myself and my colleagues."

She has a valid point.

That brings me to ask what the Assembly can do to assist in the resolution of the dispute. I share the concerns raised by Mr McCrea, a Member for Lagan Valley. With the greatest respect, I say to the Minister that the Department is not giving this issue the priority attention that it deserves. When the Minister spoke in the previous Assembly debate on the matter, she said "This matter is urgent" — [Official Report, Vol 22, No 13, p559, col 1].

However, we are no further on. One has no sense that the Department is trying urgently to resolve the matter. Echoing Mr McCrea's words, I am saying to the Minister that I want to hear more about the Department's prioritising this sort of issue and spending less time on smaller issues such as Irish-medium education. In the overall scheme of things, Irish-medium education affects a small number of pupils, whereas this affects large numbers of pupils and staff. Therefore, it deserves greater priority than the Minister gives it. I hope that she will assure us that, when she says that a matter is urgent, she will act with the urgency that it deserves.

1.30 pm

I commend to the House the amendment that my hon Friend Miss McIlveen and I tabled. I cannot support the amendment that the Member for East Belfast Ms Purvis tabled, because it is not for the Assembly to determine the outcome of the classroom assistants' dispute. It is a matter for the employer, the classroom assistants, the trade unions and the Department of Education to resolve.

The DUP amendment urges those involved to resolve the dispute immediately, in terms that are beneficial to classroom assistants, and to address adequately the agenda items, as listed in our amendment, that should be at the heart of any meeting. Our amendment outlines the appropriate role for the Assembly to take. I urge the Department to sort out the matter, avert strike action and give the classroom assistants a decent and fair deal.

Mr Butler: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Ar dtús, ba mhaith liom a rá go bhfuil Sinn Féin ag tabhairt tacaíochta do na cúntóirí ranga ina bhfeachtas ar son páighe agus coinníollacha le roinnt blianta anuas. Over many years, Sinn Féin has given full backing to classroom assistants in their campaign for better pay and conditions. Sinn Féin MLAs and councillors have stood on picket lines alongside classroom assistants. Sinn Féin's elected representatives have publicly raised the issue and backed classroom assistants. Others in the Chamber, including some from the parties that tabled the motion and amendments, have not been as proactive as they would have us believe.

Since the debate on the classroom assistants' dispute in June, much criticism has been levelled at the Minister of Education, Caitríona Ruane. What have those who tabled the motion and the amendments, and who lined up in June to criticise Caitríona Ruane, done in the intervening period to achieve a resolution, except to bring the matter to the Assembly at the eleventh hour?

There has been an ongoing campaign against the Minister of Education —

Mr B McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Mr Butler: No.

The classroom assistants' dispute is the latest in a host of issues in that campaign.

Sinn Féin fully recognises the pivotal role that classroom assistants play in the education system. They deserve, and should be entitled to, pay and work conditions that reflect their important role in education. Many industrial disputes are settled in a matter of months, so it is unfortunate that the dispute in question has continued for 11 years. It is legitimate to ask why it has taken 11 years for the dispute to reach the point at which industrial action will be taken on Wednesday.

I hope that we can avert the imminent industrial action at this late hour.

Sinn Féin supports the motion, which calls on the Minister to intervene in the dispute. However, we cannot support the proposed amendments. They would place restrictions on all sides involved. They would also put the Minister in a difficult position should she intervene, since she would have to get agreement from all sides. All parties that are involved in the dispute must get around the table to try to reach agreement, and the amendments, if accepted, would not assist that outcome.

The dispute has been going on for far too long. The employers, the education and library boards and the unions that represent the classroom assistants must redouble their efforts to bring the dispute to an end. Classroom assistants have been left behind by a job-evaluation exercise that dates from 1995. That exercise has been completed for other sections of the education and library boards' workforce but has left classroom assistants in an unfortunate situation.

Despite having protested and gone on strike, classroom assistants are still involved in a protracted industrial dispute over their pay and conditions. Tuigean Sinn Féin ról lárnach tábhachtach cúntóirí ranga, agus ba chóir cothrom na Féinne a thabhairt dóibh.

The Assembly must acknowledge that, as another Member said, 99% of classroom assistants are female. Those women are reluctant to go down the road of strike action: it does not come easily to them, given that they work with children, many of whom have special needs. The Assembly must also acknowledge the help and support that classroom assistants have provided to children with special needs and learning difficulties. The classroom assistant's role is often to help children who would otherwise fall behind the rest of the class.

Caitríona Ruane has met all the parties involved in negotiations and has made resources available to resolve the dispute. Unfortunately, her efforts have not been able to end it, and industrial action is due to take place on 26 September. The priority is to resolve the dispute.

Mrs M Bradley: In today's politically correct society, equality plays a major part in any employment scenario. Therefore, it is disturbing when a group of people in education, who play a major part in children's school days, have largely been ignored and undervalued for the past 12 years.

Next to the home, parents expect schools to be places of contentment and learning for their children and grandchildren. Five days a week, parents entrust their children to the safe haven of school, where they will learn and play their way through a curriculum that expands year after year and demands more and more from teachers and classroom assistants. Yet, classroom assistants must fight to get what is rightfully theirs.

It is unbelievable and disgraceful that classroom assistants must fight to have 12 years of wrongful grading corrected and face the prospect that their hourly rate will also be devalued. The outlook is even bleaker for those who work with children who have statements of special educational need: they stand to lose their special-needs allowance. Why should that happen when the payment will remain untouched for teachers in Northern Ireland and classroom assistants in the UK?

That is only one of the many symptoms of the vile disease of cuts in the education system. However, who decided that the lower-paid worker should suffer? My colleague, Dominic Bradley, and I met classroom assistants and their representatives. Their frustration was palpable. Indeed, there was anger, because some of their colleagues have died — one in May 2007, for example — without having received what was due to them. There is much bad feeling about that.

However, the dedication of the workers continues. They have tried desperately to resolve the situation and have not once allowed it to interfere in the education of Northern Ireland's children. All they have received in return for their loyalty and dedication are additional problems to overcome, such as their payment divisor being amended in order that the education and library boards could save money. In this day and age, how could an employer allocate set working hours, yet use a divisor of 3.5 hours when working out salary increases just to ease the burden on their budget? It is criminal and disgraceful, and a private organisation would have been in court quicker than one could say "compensation".

Mr Gardiner: Does the hon Member agree that classroom assistants are more than just that? Under child protection law, they are also the eyes and ears of those in more senior positions in the school; for example, when people are patrolling around a school in order to prey on young children — totally unacceptable behaviour that should result in such people being put behind bars immediately.

Mrs M Bradley: I thank the Member for his intervention. I certainly agree with him. Put all of that — and the wrangling over the NVQ level 3, which, despite being essential for employment as a classroom assistant, will go unrecognised — into a large melting pot, and the result is 7,000 classroom assistants who are sick, sore and tired of being booted between the five education and library boards and the Department. They are sick of being given excuse after excuse. The result is that 93% have had enough and have spoken by ballot.

Apart from the workers, the other losers are the children who depend daily on the extra help that is given so carefully by classroom assistants.

Therefore, I can see no reason why every Assembly Member should not — or could not — make an effort to resolve that scandalous situation. We face a real threat of strike action, which we have been informed about this week. Therefore, I urge the Minister of Education — as I did on 19 June 2007 — to do all in her power to help resolve this matter, rather than delaying the game any further. Otherwise, the ball will be lifted and the players will leave the pitch.

Spending £30 million was never going to make the problem go away. What is different now? I am interested to know whether the Minister saw the press coverage at the weekend of how her colleagues, at last — at least those in Derry — are supporting the classroom assistants: or was that just a case of jumping on the bandwagon to grab a headline?

Mr P J Bradley: I apologise for taking up my colleague's time. I recall a morning, outside St Mark's High School in Warrenpoint, when the Minister — then an ordinary Assembly Member — stood with protesting classroom assistants and offered them 100% support. I am concerned that that support has now been retracted, and I ask the Minister whether those classroom assistants are entitled to equality in the workplace.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I remind the House that when Members give way, they are entitled to an extra minute.

Mrs M Bradley: As I said, I asked the Minister, on 19 June 2007, to do something about the classroom assistants' situation. I felt passionately about the issue then, as I continue to do. I remind the Minister that she has children who attend school and, therefore, will recognise the worth of classroom assistants. We all know their worth. End the current situation in which those classroom assistants find themselves, and end it now.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Lunn: It is unfortunate that, yet again, we are debating the same issue that was debated — and on which a motion was passed — on 19 June 2007. Given the threat of industrial action, and the potentially devastating effect of that on the education of our children, it is entirely appropriate that we revisit the matter. I hope that the Minister gets the message this time.

The Alliance Party is sympathetic to the unions in as far as the current problem represents the last outstanding dispute. Nevertheless, we cannot simply agree to the unions' recommendations without taking into account the financial reality faced by the Department and the education and library boards. The amendment tabled by Dawn Purvis takes no account of financial reality; it merely asks the Minister of Finance and Personnel to bankroll the settlement of an industrial dispute. That is ridiculous.

There is a significant gap between the funds that are available and the funds that are required to meet the trade unions' recommendations. If that gap were bridged, money would have to be taken from elsewhere in the education budget.

I point out the cost of segregation, as highlighted by Deloitte, and its effect on the education budget in particular. If we did not have so much duplication of expenditure in Northern Ireland, there would be more money available to do the work that really matters. My colleagues and I have received significant levels of correspondence from classroom assistants, as has, I am sure, every Member. I can tell Ms Purvis that the correspondence was not solely from females. I detected a hint of sexism in Ms Purvis's approach to the issue. It is not a gender issue.

Ms Purvis: I call Members' attention to my contribution to the debate on 19 June 2007. I said quite clearly during that debate that the majority of classroom assistants were women. I apologise if I gave the impression that I was talking only about women. However, the majority of classroom assistants are women and, therefore, the majority of classroom assistants affected by that decision are women.

Mr Lunn: Fair enough. I thank the Member for clarifying that point. However, I know how her remarks sounded. The issue of classroom assistants' remuneration is extremely complex. Like so many issues, it can only be resolved through dialogue. Complications include the details of re-evaluation; the requirement of the boards, which are currently underfunded, to provide the money; and the need to channel appropriate money to the boards.

There is no easy solution and there is no point in pretending otherwise. The implication of Ms Purvis's amendment is that the wage increase should be paid. Last week in the Chamber I said that parents, teaching professionals and everyone else with a stake in education are becoming increasingly concerned by the Minister's lack of action in a range of areas.

It is my view that urgent action by the Minister — starting a dialogue with the unions, at least — could still help to avert strike action. We must not restrict the Minister's actions unnecessarily. That said, it is really hard not to sympathise with the unions' views, particularly as regards the special-needs allowance, the requirement for NVQ level 3 — now discarded by the boards — and the 32·5-hour/36-hour pay divisor.

However, it is up to the Minister to judge how best to take this matter forward, and it is up to Members to urge her and encourage her to do so. I trust that she will move the process on as quickly as possible. The Alliance Party intends to support the motion and amendment No 2.

Miss McIlveen: In June, the Assembly called on the Minister of Education to take immediate action to settle the issue of job evaluation for classroom assistants. It is now September, and we face the prospect of industrial action in two days' time by one of the unions. I understand that it is only a matter of time before other unions ballot their members on the issue.

The Minister has been charged to act and has failed to deliver the goods. I am not surprised by that failure. It is just one in a string of failures: there has been a failure to decide on the issue of academic selection; a failure to provide a clear policy on the implementation of the Bain Report; and a failure to account to the Assembly for her exorbitance in her announcements on the opening of wasteful Irish-medium schools and on unnecessary amalgamations. No doubt the longer she remains in her present post, the longer the failures will continue to mount.

She is the second Sinn Féin Education Minister to have failed to deal with this pay dispute, which is now the longest-running pay dispute ever in Northern Ireland. I am beginning to wonder whether a Sinn Féin Education Minister will ever do anything constructive while holding the ministerial portfolio. Do destructive habits die hard?

I am not surprised that the situation has reached the point where classroom assistants have resolved to strike. In fact, I applaud the classroom assistants for their patience. It has been a long 12 years. They play a valued role in the education of our children but remain some of the lowest-paid workers in the public sector. The facts and figures surrounding this dispute have been detailed not only in this debate, but in the debate in June. I do not intend to rehearse them. Suffice it to say, we are no further forward now than we were back then.

It is time that the Minister and the Department sat down with the education boards and the unions, and they must not leave until this matter is resolved. Amendment No 2 calls for an appropriate agenda for those talks. It does not call for capitulation, but for discussion and negotiation. If such discussions are to take place — and I sincerely hope that they will — I will ask for all parties to approach the matter with mature, open minds to come to an equitable settlement. Unfortunately, I am unable to support amendment No 1, tabled by the Member for East Belfast. That amendment shifts the blame to the Minister of Finance and Personnel. This matter clearly falls within the remit of the Minister of Education and her Department, and it is up to her and her Department to sort it out once and for all.

One union has voted for strike action, but let us not permit the current situation to deteriorate any further. I echo UNISON's call for eleventh-hour talks to resolve the dispute. We must remember that it will be the children who will suffer from the disruption of their education. Working parents will face additional expense as a result of additional childminding costs, and all parents will face upheaval as they may be forced to collect their children halfway through a school day because of insufficient staffing. Even if this week's strike action is not avoided, I call on the Minister and the Department not to rest until a resolution is found — before further days are lost.

Ms S Ramsey: Go raibh maith agat. I think that the Member has let the cat out of the bag on the Department of Finance and Personnel issue. She said that discussions to resolve this dispute should be supported by all parties, and I agree with her. However, making cheap jibes at the Minister of Education does not show a desire to encourage all parties to support those efforts. In my view, getting rid of the 11-plus was good work carried out by a Sinn Féin Education Minister, as was increasing the amount of money spent on special education. If this is about collective decision-making and responsibility —

Mr Storey: Will the Member give way?

Ms S Ramsey: No, I will not give way.

If the Member is serious about getting all-party support on this matter, she should stay away from the cheap jibes.

I support Basil McCrea's motion, which calls on the Minister to intervene in the classroom assistants' pay dispute. I fully accept — as did Jeffrey Donaldson — that the matter is complex and that we all want to see it resolved.

Mary Bradley is right; this does not just have a negative impact on us as Assembly Members or on communities in general. It has a negative impact on our children and on the work that classroom assistants do every day. They are not there just to assist. They are there to play a positive role in the lives of the children they work with. In fairness, every Member who has contributed to this debate has recognised the positive work that is done by classroom assistants. There is no dispute about the contribution that they make to our schools, especially in relation to children with special educational needs — that has also been mentioned in the debate.

Classroom assistants make up one of the most highly professional sectors of the educational workforce, providing learning support to the most vulnerable people in society. Several debates over the past few weeks in the Assembly have mentioned young people with special needs and those who live in poverty. It is important to recognise that when we — or the Executive, collectively — talk about the most vulnerable people in society. The Minister has a measure of responsibility, but so does the Executive. If this is solely a matter of funding — and I know that it is not — the Executive, through the Department of Finance and Personnel, the Minister of Education and her Department, must sort it out now.

There is no doubt in the Chamber about the role of classroom assistants. No one would challenge the value of their contribution. This dispute has gone on for 10 or 11 years, and, in fairness to Mary Bradley, I do not think that any of my colleagues in Derry has taken cheap publicity shots on this. I have been on the picket line over the years. If we are being honest, and saying that we all support the motion for whatever reason, and want it resolved once and for all, we should not take cheap shots. The Minister has children of her own, and in the previous debate on 19 June committed herself to resolving the situation. I support her in her efforts. Go raibh maith agat.

Mr Shannon: I support the DUP amendment. The Assembly discussed this not so long ago and made a strong case for equality, fairness and justice for the 7,000 classroom assistants in the workforce.

I am sure that Members are familiar with the film 'Groundhog Day', in which Bill Murray's alarm clock wakes him every day at 6.00 am to the sound of Cher's singing, and his day repeats over and over again. We have an equivalent in the Chamber and the Province: Caitríona Ruane is the actress starring in 'Groundhog Day'. She wakes up every day at 6.00 am, the alarm goes off, Cher is singing, and the same thing happens for the classroom assistants — nothing.

The classroom assistants have had the same problem for the past 12 years. They have been waking up to the same thing over and over again. The time has come for the Minister to accept her responsibility and decide that it is time to move on.

In a rare feat for the Assembly some time back in June, there was little disagreement about the fact that the situation is unfair. However, there was a not-so-rare attempt by the Shinnars to twist words to protect their Minister and say that she is doing all she can. The fact of the matter is —

Mr Brady: Will the Member give way?

Mr Shannon: No, I will not. One might safely say that we are in a worse situation, as the classroom assistants' union have decided that they have no option but to strike. That is not a decision that the members of the union have taken lightly. Indeed, it is all that is left to them to do after 12 years of patience, talking, and waiting for the Government, our Assembly and our Minister to do something. They have no desire whatsoever to stand outside the schools on Wednesday and watch the children whom they love and help walk past them into the classrooms without them.

For the record, members of my party and I have stood on the picket line with the classroom assistants. I did it in Portavogie and in Newtownards, and I am sure that other Members will say that they have done so elsewhere.

Classroom assistants do not wish to leave the teachers, whose workload is incredibly high due to the amount of paperwork and red tape that they must wade through in addition to teaching 30 children, without help. For 12 years, classroom assistants have allowed their thoughts of the children and their respect for their teacher colleagues to stop them taking the strike action that has often been the port of call for so many other employment issues. However, enough is enough: we can no longer blame the indifference of the direct rule Minister. We must look closer to home to see why our classroom assistants are left with nothing else to do other than wait for justice for another 12 years. Such a wait cannot be expected.

I could mention in detail, as other Members have done, the special-needs allowance, the change in the salaries for classroom assistants, and that their pay is based on a 36-hour week despite the fact that most of them work only 10 to 12 hours a week. Instead, I will put on record the concerns of my constituents, who have repeatedly and forcefully reiterated the need for classroom assistants in the schools in my constituency of Strangford. Parents have acknowledged the vital role played by classroom assistants in the education of their children. As other Members have said, children who are young, were premature or have slight learning difficulties are still able to excel and fulfil their potential given the opportunity offered by the support and commitment from classroom assistants. Teachers have explained to me how overwhelming their job is and that it would be impossible to meet the criteria and allow each child to find his or her individual place in the classroom without the aid of a classroom assistant. They would find it next to impossible to do it all by themselves, and they rely on the presence of the assistant, not only for learning resources but for help with behavioural issues.

It has been found that children are better behaved in classrooms that have classroom assistants. They give the teachers eyes in the back of their head to see what is going on in the classroom. I have also been told of one school, where the cleaner can potentially earn more than the classroom assistants. Where is the equality and fairness in that?

Classroom assistants have done their job faithfully year after year, supporting the teacher, loving the children and pouring immeasurable worth into their lives, and it galls them to consider strike action. When 93% of classroom assistants voted for strike action, they did so out of desperation. I ask the Minister to consider that and to do the right thing: release the money and ensure that equality and fairness prevail, beginning in our schools where the future of our children is at stake, and do it now. Let us not see this matter before the House in another few months. Members must demand a difference and teach the learning authority a lesson on fairness, which it has consistently failed to heed for the past 12 years.

As 'Groundhog Day' finished on a happy note, I urge the Minister to conclude this issue on a happy note for classroom assistants.

Mr K Robinson: As a governor of two primary schools in Newtownabbey, I declare an interest in the matter. It is a hard act to follow our film critic, Mr Shannon, but at least he did not burst into song as some of his colleagues are apt to do. [Interruption.] Please no, please no.

Along with other Members, I have a sense of déjà vu as we again debate the issue of classroom assistants. The long-running dispute is in danger of finding a slot in 'Guinness World Records' if it continues to bounce along with no satisfactory outcome in sight.

One of the major bones of contention is the requirement to offer a level 3 NVQ when applying for the position of a classroom assistant. That is a perfectly reasonable requirement as we seek to improve the qualification levels of all of those working in schools and strive to increase the standards of literacy and numeracy. However, the failure to recognise such a vital qualification during the negotiations around the job evaluation is puzzling to say the least and is clearly an unsustainable situation.

In 2003, the Government produced a key document entitled 'Raising Standards and Tackling Workload'. While clearly differentiating between the roles of teachers and assistants, it stated:

"The remuneration of support staff, including high level teaching assistants, will need to reflect their level of training, skills and responsibilities"

Surely, that suggests that the boards should now take into account the qualifications of classroom assistants, namely, the NVQs. However, there appears to have been a last-minute "moving of the waters", which might allow some common sense to reign at last.

2.00 pm

Mr Kennedy: Does the Member welcome the fact that it appears that, as a consequence of today's motion, which stands in the name of the Ulster Unionist Party, progress has — at long last — been made on the dispute? Does he agree that such progress will be very welcome?

Mr K Robinson: I am glad that the Member has intervened, even if he has stolen my thunder. I have in my hand a fax that suggests that there has been some movement between the employers and the unions. I think that a meeting took place between them on Friday afternoon, at which an offer was proposed. That offer was to be made known today. Whether that has happened, I cannot comment, but I hope that the Minister will confirm that that is the situation.

The union side has apparently met the chief executives of the five boards, and, although that is not the usual negotiating position, it at least represents forward movement. Those emergency talks appear to have led to an offer's being made this morning. Whether that offer is acceptable and meaningful, we wait for the Minister to tell us. I hope that the offer will be meaningful. I hope that it will protect the historical contractual rights and include a framework that will enable the service to meet not only its current needs but its future needs.

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Member give way?

Mr K Robinson: I am sorry; I am running out of time.

However, the Department and the Minister must come clean. The Minister must assure the House that they are not rigidly instructing the employers to remain within some predetermined financial allocation, thereby delaying any potential settlement.

Given that the Minister has some difficulty in grasping the serious roadblock that such a stance may be causing when the problem is expressed to her in plain English, I put it to her in a language that she promotes ad nauseam? Fág an bealach. Minister. Clear the way, and settle the issue now.

The Minister of Education (Ms Ruane): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I say immediately that I find myself very much in sympathy with the motion. I regret that the dispute has continued for so long, and I do not want to see any disruption caused to our children's education. I recognise fully the vital role that classroom assistants perform, and I take this opportunity to express my gratitude and appreciation to them once again.

I have visited many schools since my appointment and have seen at first hand the commitment that so many dedicated individuals in our education system show. Classroom assistants play an invaluable role. They are a hugely positive force in the lives of the children whom they serve. They work with some of our most-vulnerable young people, including those who have a range of special needs. They provide much-needed general support in every primary 1 class, and in those primary 2 classes in areas where attainment is low and social deprivation far too high.

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Minister give way?

Ms Ruane: I will not, no.

For me, there is absolutely no doubt about the value of the role that classroom assistants play in the education of our children and young people. It was only right, therefore, that a proper mechanism be put in place to ensure that the work that classroom assistants carry out was evaluated fairly and consistently, and to ensure that jobs of equal value received equal pay. That was the purpose of the job evaluation scheme.

Nuair a phléigh muid an t-ábhar seo an uair dheireanach ar 19 Meitheamh, ghlac mé leis go raibh an scéal ag dul ar aghaidh ar feadh ró-fhada agus gur gá é a réiteach gan mhoill. Rinne mé amach labhairt leis na boird agus leis na ceardchumann faoin ábhar.

When we last debated the issue of classroom assistants, on 19 June 2007, I accepted that the dispute had gone on far too long. I undertook to speak to the boards and the trade unions to urge them to reach a speedy resolution to the dispute. After that debate, I met the boards on 21 June and the unions on 29 June. I made it absolutely clear to both sides that, in the interests of the classroom assistants and the children with whom they work, they needed to redouble their efforts in order to reach a fair and equitable settlement. I told them that that had to be done quickly, in order to enable the funding to be released into people's pay packets as soon as possible. In the period since, I have kept abreast of the situation, through briefings from my officials and through a substantial volume of correspondence, some from classroom assistants who are caught up in the dispute. Negotiations between the boards and the unions continued, with numerous meetings being held between the management side and union joint secretaries. Board chief executives and senior union officials have met to discuss the issue.

More recently, the boards have written to all classroom assistants to explain the current position on the evaluation of their posts.

A LeasCheann Comhairle, during the debate on 19 June 2007, both Members in whose name the motion stands rose to speak. Hansard records that, with reference to the funding that has been made available to the boards to resolve the dispute, Mr Basil McCrea said:

"I support the motion, because it is not for me to say what is equitable and what is not." — [Official Report, Vol 22, No 13, p553, col 1].

Really, does anyone know what that means? I do not, and, after listening to the Member today, I am fairly certain that he does not know either. It seems to me that, on 19 June, the Member had no understanding of the dispute and no idea how to resolve it. Judging from his contribution today, I believe that he still has no idea.

I welcome the opportunity to shine a light on the dispute. It is great to have the concerns of a group of working-class women debated in the Assembly. One might think that they will have been greatly heartened to witness Members almost trip over themselves to express their support and solidarity for those poor women. They could be forgiven a little scepticism, because, in June, those very same Members, with a few notable exceptions, did the same, but when the press had packed up and gone home, those Members did nothing.

I have laid out for the Assembly what I have done. The classroom assistants should know, however, if they do not know already, that, with the exception of people such as Paul Butler of Sinn Féin, Dawn Purvis of the PUP and one or two Members from the DUP and from the SDLP, not one of the other Members who spoke so passionately today, or on 19 June, has approached me on behalf of the classroom assistants. Not one. I have received scores of letters and questions for written and oral answer on every other issue.

Members have shown their prejudice against the Irish language; I have heard the comments. Shame on you. Do you not understand that classroom assistants work in all schools, including Irish-language schools? What you need to do is to forget the prejudice against the Irish language, stop all that nonsense and start dealing with equality. We have heard about equality in this House. Sammy Wilson — [Interruption.] You never miss an opportunity to show prejudice and bias against the Irish language. Your concern about gender equality is touching. Every time that I rise in the House, I am attacked, and other women who are Members are treated very badly when they rise to speak. Therefore, I hope that the classroom assistants understand how important gender equality is to your party.

Sammy Wilson, the Chairperson of the Committee for Education, is present today. What has that Committee actually done? How many times has it met with the classroom assistants? It will meet with them soon, we are told. It is only three and a half months since it saddled that particular high horse, so the Committee should be given a bit of time. Sammy's concern for the working class is touching. Sammy, if you really want to deal with working-class issues and disadvantage, you need to open your eyes and look at the debate on academic selection.

Sammy, you are sitting back to front, looking back to the good old days, while everyone else looks towards the future. Those are the same people who, unlike their Conservative counterparts in Britain or even their friends in the Flat Earth Society, would like to retain the 11-plus for the benefit of the working class. That is what Sammy Wilson tells us. Members should check out the percentage of free school meals in grammar schools compared to that in secondary schools — [Interruption.]

Mr K Robinson: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker.

Ms Ruane: No. You will see where the working class —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Point of order.

Mr K Robinson: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. Is it not incumbent on the Minister, when replying in a debate, to stick to the points covered during that debate rather than comment on other issues?

Mr Deputy Speaker: That is a matter for the Minister. However, I ask the Minister to make her remarks through the Chair, please.

Ms Ruane: Certainly, Mr Deputy Speaker.

The issues are linked; they are the same issues. They concern working-class children and those with special needs. Sammy Wilson tells us that if he does not get his way, a breakaway education system for those grammar schools that cannot contemplate change will be set up. Again, he is obviously concerned about the working class.

Will working-class people be able to afford the fees? I will not allow children's education to become a political football. If any Member wishes, they can work with me on devising and implementing the programme for change that is needed if we are to create a modern, fit-for-purpose and world-class education system. I will not stint on my endeavours to facilitate those Members. If, on the other hand, I see Members posturing week after week, grandstanding for the media and trying to score cheap political points, regardless of the damage that that would do to the morale or well-being of children, parents and staff, I would not hesitate to expose them.

Having said that, I am concerned that since June's debate on the matter, and, despite my meetings with management and unions, there has been no real progress in finding a resolution. [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order.

Ms Ruane: I was asked about the meetings that have occurred. Meetings between chief executives, board and union officials took place on Friday, and there was a further meeting with management representatives this morning. Having listened to what has been said today, I plan to intervene. I am now calling on the employing authorities to implement the new grades as swiftly as possible in order that, as a result of the systematic job evaluation process that was carried out, those valuable members of staff receive the rates of pay to which they are entitled. Classroom assistants have already had to wait an unacceptable length of time. We must get the money to them that they deserve.

Equally, there is nothing to be gained from the proposed industrial action. That can only disrupt children's education and result in loss of income for the staff concerned. I urge classroom assistants to call off the proposed strike.

Mrs M Bradley: Will the Minister give way?

Ms Ruane: No. I do not have time, and I have a lot more to say.

I am also calling on the employers and the unions to meet today to resolve equitably the remaining differences. Although that would conclude the matter, which is essential, not least because of the interests of the staff concerned, I do not regard it as the ultimate solution. The issues that have arisen are part of a bigger picture.

We need to take a wider and more fundamental look at our approach to the planning and management of our schools' education workforce. We should examine the roles and responsibilities of all the main groups and maximise the contributions of each so that pupils get the benefit of the skills and expertise that all teaching staff bring. I have asked officials to draw up the terms of reference for such a review, with the aim of making progress as soon as is practicable. Go raibh maith agat.

Mr S Wilson: It is nice to see that the Minister, who did not have any time to accept interventions from the SDLP or anyone else, was able to spend 30% of her time attacking me about my attitude to, among other matters, academic selection, the working class, the Irish language, equality and the treatment of women.

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Member give way?

Mr S Wilson: No; I only have five minutes. I will not give way, nor will I attack the Member, so she need not worry.

The Minister says that she wants to deal seriously with this issue, yet she spends 30% of her speech addressing her comments to another Member on subjects that are not being discussed. If I were as paranoid as Mr Butler, I would think that she were carrying out a witch hunt. However, I am not paranoid. I am quite happy for her to make those sorts of comments. That is what we expect to happen here. However, I will not take lectures from the Minister that Members on this side of the House are not concerned, or are expressing only pseudoconcern, about the matter.

Mr McCrea, a Member for Lagan Valley, tabled the motion because, in spite of the promise that the Minister made on 19 June — which was over three months ago — when she thought that the matter was urgent, it has dragged on and has still not been resolved. She cannot point the finger at the Committee for Education and the Assembly and ask what they have done.

We are not the employers. We are not even the paymasters. The Minister is the Minister — she is the one who is responsible. We have no role in the negotiations.

2.15 pm

That is one of the reasons why I do not accept the amendment tabled by the Member for East Belfast Dawn Purvis. It is not the job of this Assembly or of its individual Members to get involved in the minutiae of negotiations between employers and employees. To go down that route would drag us into almost every trade union dispute in the public sector, and perhaps even the private sector as well. That is not our role. Our role is to ensure that, where an issue is important, the Minister gives it appropriate priority in her Department, in her dealings, and in her allocation of the finances that are available to her.

Clearly, this Minister has not done that. Since 19 June, on something that we were told was urgent, she has had two meetings, one with each side. She has clearly not given the matter any priority in her financial dealings. As far as I know, the £30 million that was available has not been upped. In the meantime — true to form, I am going to mention it — she has found plenty of money to hand out for her favourite project, the promotion of the Irish language. Mainstream education and the concerns of youngsters with special needs across Northern Ireland, and of those who deal with them, take second place in this Minister's priorities behind the promotion of her own political ideology and the things that she wants to promote.

That is why the motion is appropriate, and those who proposed it should not be ashamed of doing so. It is the job of this House to ensure that the Minister, who is responsible for the education budget and who can — and who promised to — intervene between the boards and the trade unions does so. She has not done that, and that is why the dispute has dragged on. The amendment tabled by my colleague from Lagan Valley Jeffrey Donaldson seeks to give some direction to the talks among the boards, the trade unions and the Minister. At the end of the day, I am not ashamed to say that I brought this issue up on a number of occasions before devolution in the House of Commons. Here in the Assembly, I have done what I can. Through the Education Committee, I have pushed the Minister. Let no one run away with the idea —

Mr B McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Mr S Wilson: I have only got —

Mr B McCrea: You will get an extra minute.

Mr S Wilson: Yes; I will give way.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Sorry, your time is up.

Ms Purvis: I have listened to all the contributions today, and one thing is clear: everyone cares about the classroom assistants, the valuable job that they do in the education system, and the care and attention that they lavish on our children.

I was very disappointed by some of the contributions, which amounted to point-scoring. I was somewhat disappointed by Mr Butler's claim that Members are coming to this matter late; that was disingenuous. My predecessor, David Ervine, stood on picket lines at Tor Bank School, and other Members, such as Mrs Iris Robinson, have campaigned for that school. Whether or not Members come to this issue late, they are still coming to it. That is a sign of the lobbying power of the classroom assistants and the trade unions in recent months. Even if we come late, it is important that we come and lend our support. It was disingenuous of Mr Butler to say that.

I want to reflect on what Mr Shannon said. People do not take strike action lightly — they come to it as a last resort. Parents, classroom assistants and principals do not want a strike. I discussed classroom assistants with a principal last week, and she said that they cannot be blamed for wanting to strike. They are crucial to the system, but they are not valued accordingly. That is what the debate is about.

For obvious reasons, I cannot support the motion: it is too weak; it does not do anything; and it does not move the issue forward. That is why Sinn Féin supports the motion. During the debate in June, the Minister was asked to intervene. However, no progress has been made since then.

I cannot support the DUP amendment, because it does not do anything more to progress the issue. The four items that it lists have been discussed at length. They have been on the agenda at every negotiation that has taken place between management and trade unions, but we have not got anywhere. No one wants to strike; strike action is a last resort. The classroom assistants do not want to strike, but their hand has been forced. Some people really do not get it.

Mrs D Kelly: I have been trying to make an intervention; this is third time lucky for me.

None of us was comforted by the Minister's promise in her lecture to the House that she would instruct her officials to implement the grades that are currently on offer. Therefore, we are no further forward.

Ms Purvis: I thank the Member for her intervention. Really, the Minister has said that she will forge ahead anyway and introduce management's pay evaluation whether classroom assistants like it or not. That is not the way forward; it does not let people know that they and their contributions are valued. The matter will not be resolved until the Minister directs management to enter into negotiations with the trade unions to come up with an equitable, fair and just settlement and pay evaluation for classroom assistants, to use the Minister's own words and those of other Members here today. We need to get people talking, but we also need to get them negotiating a fair deal for classroom assistants.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Members will know that business must be suspended for Question Time, which begins at 2.30 pm. Therefore, this debate will resume at 4.10 pm.

The debate stood suspended.

ORAL ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister

Lifetime Opportunities

1. Mrs McGill asked the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to outline the status of ‘Lifetime Opportunities: Government’s Anti-Poverty and Social Inclusion Strategy for Northern Ireland’; and to give a timescale within which it will be presented to the Executive for consideration. (AQO 167/08)

The Deputy First Minister (Mr M McGuinness): Section 16 of the Northern Ireland (St Andrew’s Agreement) Act 2006 places a statutory obligation on the Executive Committee to adopt a strategy setting out how they propose to tackle poverty, social exclusion and patterns of deprivation based on objective need. The process to obtain Executive Committee agreement on an anti-poverty strategy has begun, and Ministers are examining the lifetime opportunities strategy and hope to bring a revised paper to the Executive later this year.

Mrs McGill: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Given that the eradication of poverty is a well-documented and agreed priority for Government, how will resources be earmarked and channelled proactively in pursuance of this priority?

The Deputy First Minister: The skewing of resources and efforts towards those in greatest objective need by Departments is seen as an effective way of ensuring that measures to combat poverty and social exclusion are implemented and, ultimately, mainstreamed within public expenditure, planning and resource allocations.

Mr Elliott: What measures has the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister put in place, through its challenge function, to ensure that all Departments allocate appropriate resources towards addressing rural poverty and disadvantage, particularly as those issues should be dealt with by all Departments, not just the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development?

The Deputy First Minister: Section 16 of the Northern Ireland (St Andrew’s Agreement) Act 2006 places a statutory obligation on the Executive to adopt a strategy on how the matter should be taken forward. While poverty and multiple-deprivation tend to be concentrated in urban areas, rural communities are also at risk, with high levels of deprivation in less accessible rural areas. To that end, the Executive are committed to ensuring that the adopted strategy will address the poverty and social exclusion encountered in urban and rural areas.

The Department of Agriculture and Rural Development’s vision of a thriving and sustainable rural community and environment means that, effectively, it has engaged in many activities that will directly and indirectly tackle rural poverty.

As the Member is a farmer, he will be aware that agriculture continues to play an important economic role in the rural economy. The Department of Agriculture and Rural Development will strive to increase the economic sustainability of all farm businesses and will work in conjunction with other Departments towards the elimination of poverty in rural areas. The Department of Agriculture and Rural Development obtained EU approval for its 2007-2013 rural development programme on 24 July. That programme will put more than £500 million into rural areas over the next six years, with a focus on improving the competitiveness of the farming industry, the environment and the quality of life in rural areas.

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Deputy First Minister assure the House that the strategy will be supported by a dedicated budget? Will he give us an assessment of the North’s progress towards the targets contained in the lifetime opportunities document, which was released by the then Secretary of State in November 2006?

The Deputy First Minister: As the Member rightly said, ‘Lifetime Opportunities: Government’s Anti-Poverty and Social Inclusion Strategy for Northern Ireland’ was launched by the then Secretary of State, Peter Hain, in November 2006. The strategy replaced New TSN, which was the Government’s formal high-level policy for tackling poverty and social exclusion in the North. All those issues are under discussion.

The Executive, and the respective Ministers, are giving much consideration to those issues. The process to obtain the Executive Committee’s agreement on the strategy has begun; proposals are currently being cleared at an official level, with a view that the Executive Committee will consider all of them at a meeting in October. When the outcome of that becomes clear, I will be able to give more comprehensive answers.

Honours List: Local Alternative

2. Mr Dallat asked the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to detail plans for a local alternative to the Honours List for recognising people who, at work or in a voluntary capacity, have made an outstanding contribution to society in general, or individuals in particular. (AQO 144/08)

The Deputy First Minister: Honours are an excepted matter, and are not within the competence of the Assembly. The introduction of a local civic-award system, in addition to the honours process, is something that the Assembly may wish to consider further at a later date.

Mr Dallat: I thank the Deputy First Minister for his answer. If the Assembly does consider an alternative to the honours system, will it recognise people from the South who have made outstanding achievements in the North? Also, will it be transparent and accountable?

The Deputy First Minister: The honest answer is that it is too soon to tell. A local alternative to the honours system is not a high priority for the Assembly at present, given all the other pressing measures to be dealt with between now and Christmas — particularly budgetary considerations, investment strategies and the priorities that the Executive and the Assembly will want to concentrate on.

There has been widespread recognition by the Assembly of the achievements of cricketers; Gaelic footballers; the Derry camógs, who won the all-Ireland junior championship two weeks ago; Rory McIlroy, who performed well in the British Open golf championship, and Pádraig Harrington from the South, who won that same championship. All those types of achievement will be discussed in detail if the Assembly has a real debate on the issue.

Were we to reach a point of considering a local alternative to the honours system, it would have validity only if it ensured recognition of the unsung heroes of our process, governmental structures and system — such as teachers and nurses — who perhaps contribute in a more meaningful way than the stars of our society.

Mr Kennedy: Given that the existing honours list retains widespread support from all communities in Northern Ireland, and that the issue strikes at the heart of the debate over national sovereignty, will the Deputy First Minister clarify his view on the current political status of Northern Ireland in the United Kingdom? [Laughter.]

The Deputy First Minister: That is a cracker. The Member is to be admired for asking a question about the honours list, avoiding the issue and turning it into a wholly political question about the constitutional position of the North. The Good Friday Agreement and the St Andrews Agreement both exist, and many matters have been settled by debate, without prejudice to the political aspirations of any Member. Rather than become embroiled in a controversial debate with the Member, I will leave the matter at that.

Mr I McCrea: Can the Deputy First Minister confirm that awards are made by Her Majesty the Queen to people from all sectors in society? Can he also tell the House what percentage of those awards go to people in the community, voluntary and local-services sectors?

The Deputy First Minister: As I said in my previous answer, although awards are not in the competence of the Assembly, or indeed the Executive, they are made to all sectors of society, covering business, sport, arts, media, health, education, public service and the voluntary and community sectors.

Approximately 60% of awards here go to people in the community, voluntary and local-services sectors, and any member of the public may nominate someone for an award. Some 50% of awards are made to people who have been publicly nominated.

Rights of Older People

3. Mr Brady asked the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister how it will ensure that the rights of older people are effectively protected and promoted. (AQO 159/08)

The Deputy First Minister: The Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister is fully committed to protecting and promoting the rights of all citizens — including older people. To that end, the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister introduced regulations last October, which prohibit discrimination in employment on grounds of age.

The Equality Commission has played a vital role in promoting awareness of the new legislation and has produced guidance designed to help employers and employees understand their rights and responsibilities. We are also examining whether the establishment of a dedicated commissioner post will add to protecting and promoting the rights of older people. Conclusions on that matter will be put to the Executive as soon as possible.

Mr Brady: I thank the Deputy First Minister for his answer. Go raibh maith agat. Will there be an independent element to the deliberations on the rights of older people?

The Deputy First Minister: An independent organisation, or individual, will be appointed to assist in the work, and Members will recognise that that is an important dimension as we move forward with what is, undoubtedly, an area of tremendous concern in the Assembly.

Mr Ross: The Deputy First Minister said that conclusions regarding the commissioner will be brought to the Executive in due course. When will proposals be brought to the Executive?

The Deputy First Minister: Our consideration will be completed by the end of the year, and a report will be submitted to Ministers for consideration. A decision will be made by the Executive early in the new year.

Mrs M Bradley: Will the Deputy First Minister outline the distinctions between the Executive's approach to protecting the rights of older people and that of the previous direct rule Administration?

The Deputy First Minister: Recently, the First Minister and I have often gone on public record and criticised various aspects of direct rule and direct rule Ministers. There is no doubt that the Executive are determined to do things differently to ensure that we — as locally accountable Ministers and MLAs — are totally responsive to the needs of our older citizens. As we move forward with this process, we will be conscious of our responsibilities in this area and to the older generation.

Equality Impact Assessments

4. Ms Anderson asked the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to outline its position in relation to equality impact assessments for all 'high-level' policies. (AQO 166/08)

The Deputy First Minister: Equality considerations must be mainstreamed into all decisions, including high-level or over-arching policies and strategies. As the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister is the Department with co-ordinating responsibility for equality, its policy is to subject all high-level policy emanating from Departments, in which equality issues have been identified via the screening stage, to a full equality impact assessment in line with section 75 responsibilities.

The Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister continues to offer advice to Departments on all aspects of the implementation of section 75. Departments are responsible for ensuring that equality of opportunity has been properly mainstreamed and for providing such assurances to Ministers.

Ms Anderson: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Will the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister be developing a transparent process for equality impact assessments for high-level policies and strategies?

The Deputy First Minister: The Equality Commission will be working with officials in the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister and the other Departments in the coming months to develop an agreed approach — [Interruption.]

Mr McNarry: On a point of order, Mr Speaker.

Mr Speaker: The Member should know that points of order are not taken during Question Time, but I will be happy to take points of order after Question Time.

The Deputy First Minister: I will start again. The Equality Commission will be working with officials in the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister and the other Departments in the coming months to develop an agreed process for equality-impact assessing all high-level policies and strategies.

2.45 pm

Mrs Long: Will the Minister outline the position of the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister on screening all policies for their impact on good relations, and will he also confirm that equality and the creation of a shared future do not threaten, but actually reinforce, each other?

The Deputy First Minister: Members can be assured that all such matters, including those raised by Naomi Long, will be subject to the agreed approaches and mechanisms. It is clear that the section 75 obligations are bearing down on all Departments.

Mr Donaldson: Surely, one of the high-level policies and priorities for the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister is adequate funding and support for the victims of violence in Northern Ireland. Will the Minister agree with me that the more equality impact assessments we have, the more resources have to be diverted to them? Would it not be better to give the money to those who deserve it — the innocent victims of terrorist violence in Northern Ireland, who have suffered for too long?

The Deputy First Minister: The First Minister and I have made it clear on countless occasions that victims are a top priority for the Executive. I do not know how it can be said that we are not diligent enough when we carry out equality impact assessments on a wide range of issues. Given the nature of our Government, the processes that all parties have signed up to, and the St Andrews Agreement, there is a responsibility on all of us in the way ahead to ensure fairness in Government.

North/South Ministerial Council: Secretariat Accommodation

5. Mr McElduff asked the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister what action is being taken to provide accommodation that is fit for purpose for the secretariat of the North/South Ministerial Council. (AQO 154/08)

The Deputy First Minister: A business case and economic appraisal that was completed in 2006 confirmed that the present North/South Ministerial Council joint-secretariat accommodation does not meet the operational requirements of the secretariat, and it recommended that suitable alternative accommodation in the Armagh area be identified. Earlier this year, expressions of interest were sought from those willing to provide accommodation for the secretariat. Several tenders were received and have been evaluated. A full report will be provided to the Council later in the year, when it may be asked to approve the preferred bidder and agree that contractual arrangements should be made.

Mr McElduff: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. The Deputy First Minister is aware that as well as tabling a question for oral answer a fortnight ago, I pressed him on the issue last week following his statement on the North/South Ministerial Council. Will the Deputy First Minister be more precise, if possible, about the timing for the completion of the project, because the North/South Ministerial Council's secretariat needs every encouragement and every facility to carry out its important work?

The Deputy First Minister: I agree that the Council's work is very important, and those of us who have visited its headquarters in Armagh over the past six or seven years are aware that it is based in totally unsuitable accommodation.

Later this year, the North/South Ministerial Council may be asked to approve the preferred bidder and agree that contractual agreements should be made. Following the award of a contract, construction and fitting out will take approximately two years with the aim of having accommodation late in 2009.

Mr Attwood: Does the Deputy First Minister agree that, although accommodation for the secretariat is very important, the substance of North/South co-operation is even more important? Can he now, unlike last week, tell the House who the two independent, external people to be appointed by the Executive as part of the efficiency review of the North/South implementation bodies will be? Does he know who the two individuals to be appointed by the Irish Government are? Will the Deputy First Minister give the House a cast-iron guarantee that this so-called efficiency review will complete its work within six months, as indicated last week in his statement to the House? Given the concern about whether the review will be completed within six months, is the Deputy First Minister not concerned that the review will slow down North/South co-operation and ultimately suffocate North/South developments on the island?

The Deputy First Minister: In my statement last week on the North/South Ministerial Council meeting in which we participated earlier this year in Armagh, I made it clear that the efficiency review was a work in progress. The First Minister and I — and the Executive — have not yet decided on the individuals who will take that matter forward. However, I expect that that will happen in due course.

Mr Attwood's question became a speech. He needs to recognise that other Members have tabled questions, and I am trying to get through as many as I can.

EU Regional Development Committee

6. Mr McCartney asked the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to give an assessment of the recent meeting with the European Union Regional Development Committee; and the importance of ongoing contact with the European Union. (AQO 165/08)

The Deputy First Minister: I, along with the Minister of Finance and Personnel, and my Department's junior Ministers, were delighted to welcome such an influential European Parliament Committee to the House. That visit was another indication of the interest shown by the European institutions in our work to create a more peaceful and prosperous society.

The EU Regional Development Committee has played a significant role, and we have received substantial funds to build a better future for all. I thank that Committee and our MEPs for their past and continued support in securing structural funds for this region, particularly the Peace programmes and Europe's contribution to the International Fund for Ireland. The meeting was a good opportunity to tell the Committee that we intend to participate fully as an EU region, and that the funding available under our EU rural development programme for 2007-13 would contribute to the creation of a dynamic, enterprising and innovative economy here.

The work of the European Commission Task Force announced by President Barroso on 1 May 2007 is also important. That will help to redefine our relationship with Europe as funding levels to the more-established member states reduce following the enlargement of the European Union.

The First Minister and I welcome wider political involvement with Europe through the Barroso task force, and it will be important for the Executive to maintain its visibility in Brussels. To that end, we hope to undertake a joint visit to Brussels to meet with President Barroso and other influential figures later in the year.

Mr McCartney: Go raibh maith agat. Will the Deputy First Minister provide us with progress on the Barroso task force?

The Deputy First Minister: The task force comprises a team of senior officials from relevant EU Commission Directorates General and has met on four occasions to identify key representatives and to develop a work plan. The rural development programme has been finalised and the structural fund programme will be agreed by the end of September.

In July, I led a ministerial delegation comprising myself and junior Ministers Gerry Kelly and Ian Paisley Jnr to meet Mr Nicholas Van der Pas, Director General for Employment and Social Affairs and Equal Opportunities in the European Commission. We discussed with him and his team the various policy strands relevant to the work of the task force. We also met Bobby McDonagh, head of the Irish permanent representation and Kim Darroch, head of the UK permanent representation, both of whom pledged their full and active support for the Barroso task force.

The Minister for Social Development, Margaret Ritchie, will be visiting Brussels in October in support of our participation in the European week of regions and cities open days, and she will also take the opportunity to meet with Danuta Hübner, Commissioner for Regional Policy. Commissioner Hübner and other members of the task force hope to visit us during the autumn. A progress report of the work plan will be prepared by the Commission towards the end of this year, and the Minister of Finance and Personnel will share that plan with his Executive colleagues in due course.

Lord Browne: In light of the task force announcement, what outcomes does the Deputy First Minister hope to achieve by the end of the year?

The Deputy First Minister: It is hard to say at this stage. However, we had a very constructive meeting with President Barroso when he came here. It was obvious that he was very anxious to help in whatever way he could.

At their meeting on 8 June, Commissioner for Regional Policy Danuta Hübner, the Minister of Finance Mr Robinson and the First Minister discussed the reasons for the task force's work. The main outcomes were that, by the end of the year, we hope to have completed a stocktaking study of the available EU initiatives; understand how those initiatives could meet key economic requirements; seek to finalise the rural development, fisheries and structural fund programmes; make arrangements to extend the exchange of officials programme; and initiate a programme of meetings with Commissioners and senior Commission officials in order to build relationships.

Mr A Maginness: I thank the Deputy First Minister for his reply. I note the good and important work of the task force and that the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister have shed their opposition to the European Union and are embracing it enthusiastically. I commend that.

Will they now consider working with the Republic's Government to get even greater funding for Northern Ireland? If united, the Government in the Republic of Ireland and the Executive will be able to achieve greater leverage, funding and support for Northern Ireland.

The Deputy First Minister: Obviously. The Assembly must have as much support and as many friends as possible. The First Minister has said that on several occasions. President Barroso's visit to this Building occurred chiefly as a result of the Taoiseach's encouragement. To gain the greatest advantage for the people we represent, we must use all the resources and good will that are available to us. I have no doubt that the people we work with in the Irish Government will be our friends at court.

Children and Young People

7. Ms S Ramsey asked the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to outline how the junior Ministers will address the issue of children and young people. (AQO 161/08)

The Deputy First Minister: The junior Ministers are assisting the First Minister and me to take forward our important commitments and priorities with regard to children and young people. They will have a key role in driving the 10-year strategy for children and young people and in setting in place the most appropriate arrangements for its delivery.

Along with the First Minister and me, the junior Ministers have already met with the Commissioner for Children and Young People and have begun a series of meetings with non-governmental organisations. A further schedule of visits, to take place in the autumn, is being arranged with organisations that work with children and young people. That will help to inform us of the key issues that face children and young people.

I also wish to place on record my thanks to Ms Ramsey and other representatives of the all-party group on children and young people for their positive contribution to this agenda. It is important that we find an appropriate way for that role and engagement to continue.

Ms S Ramsey: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I thank the Deputy First Minister for his answer. I wish to place on record my thanks for his personal commitment to children and young people, ensuring that they remain centre stage, and also for the commitment of the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister and the junior Ministers.

Will the Deputy First Minister highlight the key priorities that will emerge from the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister?

The Deputy First Minister: Our key priorities are: eradicating poverty and closing the gap between those who do well in life and those who do not; safeguarding and protecting children and young people; developing their full potential; fulfilling our commitments under the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child; improving the health and well-being of children and young people; developing mechanisms to allow for meaningful participation of children and young people; and providing future generations with a safe and pleasant environment in which to grow.

3.00 pm

Environment

Mr Speaker: As Mr Boylan is not in the Chamber, we will move on to question 2.

Giant's Causeway Visitors' Centre

2. Mr McGlone asked the Minister of the Environment what discussions she has had with her colleagues in the Executive concerning the proposed Giant's Causeway Visitors' Centre; and whether there are future plans to hold such discussions. (AQO 180/08)

The Minister of the Environment (Mrs Foster): As I informed the Environment Committee last Thursday, I have had two meetings with Minister Dodds, at which proposals for new visitor facilities at the Giant's Causeway were discussed. There are no immediate plans for further discussions. I have not yet brought the only planning application before me — from Seaport Investments Ltd — formally to the attention of the Executive Committee, because I have not yet finalised my decision on the application.

I have indicated that I see considerable merit in the application before me, and I am minded to approve it. However, I have asked officials to do further work on issues relating to the proposal, which will involve discussions with the applicant and with the key stakeholders, namely Moyle District Council and the National Trust.

I hope that my announcement will facilitate a mature debate between the interested parties and that the outcome will be a visitors' centre that we can all be proud of. When I make my final decision, I will bring it to the attention of the Assembly.

Mr McGlone: Just for the public record, has the junior Minister Mr Paisley Jnr, or his office or advisers, discussed the matter with your Department?

Mrs Foster: I am happy to answer that question from the Chairman of the Environment Committee. As he knows, I said clearly at last Thursday's Committee meeting that I have had absolutely no representation from the junior Minister, or anybody else, for or against the application. I am happy to put that on the record.

Mr Neeson: Given the strong objections that have already emerged from Moyle and Coleraine councils, the National Trust and other stakeholders, and bearing in mind the political sensitivities in the Chamber, there is a chance that the application might go to the Planning Appeals Commission. If that happens, will the Minister abide by the commission's decision?

Mrs Foster: First, I have heard a lot of discussion about what I, as the Minister responsible for planning, should or should not take into consideration in my determination of the matter. Many of the matters that have been mentioned are absolutely not matters that I should take into consideration when determining a planning application. I want to make that very clear. I am very clear about my ministerial role in planning.

Mr Storey: As there have been many reports in the local press over the last few weeks, will the Minister clarify why she said that she was minded to approve the proposal?

Mrs Foster: I said that I was minded to approve the application because I see considerable merit in it. It is the only application before me. The proposal, which is still at outline stage, attempts to minimise the visual intrusiveness of the proposed centre by covering roofs and exposed surfaces with grass and locating part of the car park underground. It has an imaginative design, which provides for extensive facilities, including an auditorium, cafe and library, and it attempts to resolve the access issues with new road arrangements.

That said, I have not made a firm decision, because aspects of the proposals must be given further consideration, including the impact on the world heritage site and the centre's relationship to other development in the area and to the existing visitors' centre. Those are proper planning matters that I have to deal with, and they will be taken into account when I reach my final decision.

Road Safety Strategy

3. Mr Hamilton asked the Minister of the Environment to give an assessment of the Northern Ireland Audit Office's report on Northern Ireland's Road Safety Strategy. (AQO 156/08)

Mrs Foster: I welcome the report and I am pleased that it acknowledges the significant progress made to date. There is always more that could be done, and I am pleased that the report has identified some important issues for further consideration. The report was considered by the Public Accounts Committee on 13 September 2007, and, following the Committee's report, the Department of the Environment and the Department of Finance and Personnel will prepare a response that will be provided to the Assembly. It would be inappropriate for me to comment further until the response has been made available.

Mr Hamilton: I thank the Minister for her reply on what is an important issue. We were reminded of such tragedies overnight, with a fatal road accident on the Ballygowan Road outside Comber, in my own Strangford constituency.

Members welcomed the fact that the Minister made road safety one of her top priorities when she first entered office. Will she provide an update on the progress of the review of road safety strategy that she initiated?

Mrs Foster: I offer my condolences in respect of the latest tragedy on our roads just last night. There have been 79 deaths on our roads to date; which compares favourably with last year, when there had been 89 deaths on our roads at this stage. However, that does not take away from the human tragedy involved in any individual road death.

My officials have commenced a full review of the road safety strategy, and a number of my staff have been committed to the review on a full-time basis. Significant progress has been made, but much more can be done.

An initial meeting has taken place with counterparts in the Department for Regional Development and the Police Service of Northern Ireland to discuss the way forward. Unfortunately, it is too early to indicate when the review will be completed. However, the Department continues to make this a priority, and that is reflected in all of my public announcements.

Mr Speaker: I call Mr John Dallat for a supplementary question.

Mr Dallat: Mr Speaker, I do not have a supplementary question.

Listed Buildings

4. Mr A Maskey asked the Minister of the Environment to detail the number of listed buildings that have been destroyed in the past five years; and what penalties and prosecutions have resulted in relation to these offences. (AQO 172/08)

Mrs Foster: Over the past five years, 12 listed buildings have been destroyed without the appropriate listed building consent. In three cases no action was taken as the buildings were destroyed accidentally by fire. In another three cases no action was taken as the developer produced police reports to confirm that the buildings were in a dangerous condition. Those buildings were demolished and subsequently de-listed. In one instance a building was lost as a result of the roof falling in, and prosecution was not pursued. In another instance a developer was prosecuted for the demolition of two listed buildings in Portstewart and was fined the princely sum of £250 for each building. There is ongoing enforcement action in respect of the remaining three cases, one of which has been scheduled for a court hearing in November.

Mr A Maskey: Go raibh maith agat. I thank the Minister for her response. I know that she has taken an interest in this issue in the past. Will she acknowledge that the demolition of buildings without the appropriate listed building consent is an ongoing problem — certainly in my constituency of South Belfast — and that there have been quite a number of cases in which the Planning Service has given approval for the demolition of listed buildings? Will she also ensure that more stringent measures are included in any future planning legislation proposals to deal with listed buildings and provide enforcement measures in the event of such buildings being demolished without the appropriate permission?

Mrs Foster: The Member is aware that I know of the difficulties in his constituency, especially in relation to the Malone conservation area. There have also been problems in North Belfast — one of the Members for North Belfast, I think it was Mr Maginness, raised an issue in relation to the Cavehill Road during my previous Question Time.

Changes to the legislation were made in 2003 and 2006, which brought enforcement powers in Northern Ireland planning law largely into line with those in Great Britain. The changes included increasing the level of fines for offences, and the possibility of imprisonment. The legislation exists: the issue is whether the judiciary will follow through as regards the level of fines — unfortunately I have no control over that matter.

Mr Elliott: Assuming the Minister's distaste at the possibility of a shrine at the Maze/Long Kesh site, does she have any plans to de-list the buildings on that site that are currently listed?

Mrs Foster: I thank the Member for his question. He, and several members of his party, wrote to me in relation to that matter. I will be responding in due course, and the responses will be with them in the near future.

Mr Spratt: The Minister is aware that, in some areas of Northern Ireland, traditional residential areas are being destroyed by apartment development. My South Belfast constituency has suffered probably more than others. Does the Minister agree that the spread of apartment development threatens the character of some traditional residential areas?

Mrs Foster: I am aware of increasing public concern about apartment development and its effect on the character of long-established residential areas arising from policies in the regional development strategy and the Department for Regional Development's policy for housing and settlements.

The demand for apartment living reflects ongoing changes in society, including the trend towards smaller households. As the Department that is responsible for planning, my Department must cater for that trend. My Department has published Planning Policy Statement 7 and Development Control Advice Note 8 to assist in controlling that type of development.

I am not sure whether the Member is aware that, on my instruction, the Planning Service recently issued a circular to all its professional planners in order to raise their awareness of the issue and particularly that of the cumulative impact of apartment developments. My officials are also liaising with Department for Regional Development officials about the build-up of developments in existing residential areas.

Carbon Emissions

5. Mr Ford asked the Minister of the Environment what is her assessment of the need to reduce carbon emissions in Northern Ireland, given the announcement by her Scottish colleagues on the need for an 80% reduction in carbon emissions by 2050. (AQO 183/08)

Mrs Foster: Although Northern Ireland's emissions are minute in global terms, it is important that we play our part in reducing them. That is why I sought, and received, agreement at last week's Executive Committee meeting for the provisions of the United Kingdom Climate Change (Effects) Bill to be extended to Northern Ireland. That Bill provides for an overall United Kingdom emissions reduction target of at least 60% by 2050.

I am aware that, in addition to opting into the UK Bill, the Scottish Executive intend to produce a separate climate change Bill that has a higher reduction target of 80%. There is no simple relationship between long-term stabilisation and the pathways that are required to reach that point. The UK target of at least 60% reduction in carbon dioxide emissions is consistent with that approach. However, it is recognised that there is a need to keep targets under review in the light of emerging scientific evidence and other developments. The Climate Change (Effects) Bill will provide for that.

Mr Ford: I thank the Minister for her reply, although it is a little disappointing. Given the growing body of opinion that states that the UK needs to reduce carbon emissions by at least 80% by 2050 and the fact that Northern Ireland, along with Scotland, has huge potential to generate power from wind, waves and biomass, is it not time that she ensured that Northern Ireland took a lead in the battle against climate change and ceased to be a reluctant conscript?

Mrs Foster: I do not accept that Northern Ireland is a reluctant conscript; the opposite is the case. The 60% target was recommended by the independent Royal Commission on Environmental Pollution and cited in the 2003 White Paper on energy. There has been considerable stakeholder consensus that that figure represents an ambitious commitment for the UK; however, there is no similar consensus on any other figure.

In evidence to the joint committee that scrutinised the Bill in May, Professor Sir David King, the Government's scientific adviser, recognised that 60% is the correct target at this stage. I want the Member to reflect on that. Two weeks ago I had the opportunity to speak with Jonathon Porritt, the chairman of the Sustainable Development Commission. I asked him about the 60% target, because I knew it to be an issue for some here. Mr Porritt is of the opinion that 60% is the correct target at this point; however, he said that it should be left to the Committee on Climate Change to revisit targets. Revisiting targets is built into the Bill, which states that the target is at least 60%. However, the Committee on Climate Change could raise that target if the need arises.

Mr P Ramsey: Will the Minister tell us what cross-departmental meetings have taken place on the reduction of carbon emissions and what action has been taken as a result?

Mrs Foster: The Member knows that sustainable development lies in the remit of OFMDFM, which is taking the lead on the matter. It will also lead on reducing carbon emissions across the Government estate.

My own Department is leading the way, and I hope that it will be carbon-neutral by 2010. I also hope that other Departments follow its example.

Mr Ross: Will the Minister advise Members how Scotland arrived at the proposal of a reduction of 80% for carbon emissions? Is there any merit in having specific reductions for Northern Ireland in the proposed climate change Bill?

Mrs Foster: Hopefully, I have partly answered that when replying to Mr Ford's supplementary question. Targets have no value unless they are realistic and achievable. Scotland has agreed to the target of 60% set by the UK climate change Bill. The Scots feel that they can go further and aim for a target of 80% in the Scottish climate change Bill. The reason that Scotland, above other UK Administrations, can do that is that there is a better provision of natural resources, as well as carbon-dioxide-absorbing forests and heathlands, and an abundant water supply for the production of hydroelectricity.

3.15 pm

The Scottish Administration believes that a higher domestic target is achievable. The target in the UK climate change Bill is 60%, but that may not be the ultimate target, and if the Joint Committee on Draft Climate Change Bill decides that the target should be raised, then the Northern Ireland Administration will take advice on that matter.

Built Heritage

6. Mr T Clarke asked the Minister of the Environment what steps she is taking to support built heritage in Northern Ireland. (AQO 191/08)

Mrs Foster: I am determined to protect and promote the built heritage. Raising awareness, managing state-care monuments, saving buildings at risk and paying grants to owners of listed buildings are all important.

Recently, I launched the tenth anniversary of the increasingly popular European heritage open day, an event designed to promote our rich built heritage. The Proms in the Park event at Carrickfergus Castle highlighted Northern Ireland's important heritage to a wider audience. I have launched a conservation plan for Derry's walls. That initiative will strengthen the exemplary way that we seek to maintain the monument, and its guardianship, and indicates how the Department of the Environment intends to manage the other 183 monuments in state care.

The Environment and Heritage Service (EHS) has a database — Register of Buildings at Risk in Northern Ireland — the aim of which is to save 200 buildings by 2016. Last year, 32 buildings were removed from the register, including buildings such as Brownlow House in Lurgan, and the Irish Society's Primary School in Coleraine.

The Department of the Environment, through EHS, offers grant aid to owners of listed buildings. The budget is £2.2 million, and we are reviewing that policy and hope to make funding more widely available. That includes the proposal for a new funding stream that will specifically target building preservation trusts. The proposals are subject to scrutiny by the Department of Finance and Personnel and to the views of the Committee for the Environment. In addition, during the last 12 months, 88 buildings have been added to the list of buildings of special architectural and historical interest.

Finally, since I took office, two preservation notices have been issued, and two others confirmed. That process is sometimes known as spot-listing and enables potentially list-worthy buildings to be protected from alteration or demolition for up to six months, to allow time for detailed research before a final decision is taken on whether to list them.

Mr T Clarke: Will the Department of the Environment continue to delist buildings as part of the second survey of historic buildings?

Mrs Foster: The short answer is yes. To be listed, buildings must pass the statutory test as set down in legislation — that is, they must be of special historical or architectural interest. Those buildings that no longer meet the legislative requirements must be delisted. However, as I have already said, over the last 12 months 88 buildings have been added to the list, and only 10 have been removed. Many buildings have been added to the list as a result of the second survey of historic buildings. Industrial buildings, vernacular houses and other structures such as pumps, which were less valued in the first survey conducted during the 1970s, are now better represented on the list.

Waste Processing

7. Mr Molloy asked the Minister of the Environment what progress is being made in relation to the integration of the process for dealing with farm waste and municipal waste. (AQO 192/08)

Mrs Foster: The Northern Ireland waste management strategy is for all controlled waste, and, together with the Department of the Environment's guidance on the best practical environmental options for Northern Ireland, forms a robust framework from which the three district council waste partnerships have developed waste management plans.

Those plans specifically provide for the management of all waste streams, whether municipal, commercial or farm waste. The waste strategy notes the value of exploiting any opportunities for the sharing of facilities to deal with both farm and municipal waste. The waste management groups will consider possible synergies when they procure facilities or services in relation to all controlled waste in their area.

Mr Molloy: Does the Minister agree that with the correct safeguards in place, an energy fuel could be produced, either from gasification or solid fuel, to help to deal with the wastes by bringing them together, while benefiting the community?

Mrs Foster: I am aware of the Member's involvement with one of the waste management bodies, the Southern Waste Management Partnership, and with its proposals on those issues. In the first instance, the selection of appropriate technology on waste streams is a matter for the waste-management groups, which have come forward with particular plans for dealing with that. It is then a matter for the market, on a competitive basis, to determine a package of facilities that will provide the waste-management groups with an affordable solution. It is unlikely that a best-value solution will be able to depend on a single waste stream; therefore, agricultural, commercial and industrial wastes are likely to be treated along with municipal waste.

Mr Irwin: Can the Minister tell the House whether district councils accept and collect agricultural waste in the same way that they collect municipal waste?

Mrs Foster: Yes, they do. Agricultural waste falls under the classification of industrial waste in Northern Ireland. The Waste and Contaminated Land (Northern Ireland) Order 1997 allows district councils, if requested, to collect commercial and industrial waste on payment of charges. Civic amenity sites may also accept agricultural waste, and may charge for doing so.

Mr P J Bradley: I almost got the answer to my question in the Minister's last response. However, is the Minister satisfied that all local authorities act according to the same criteria when collecting waste or having waste disposed of at landfill sites? I refer to the materials that they are allowed to dump and the charges that they can make.

Mrs Foster: All local authorities must comply with the requirements of The Waste Management Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2006 when dealing with agricultural waste that they have been requested to collect for treatment or disposal. However, if the Member is aware of any local government organisation that does not comply with those regulations, I am willing to talk to him about that.

Mr Speaker: Question 8 has been withdrawn.

Recycling Levels

9. Mr P Maskey asked the Minister of the Environment to detail the quantity of glass, paper and card, and plastics that have been recycled in each of the past two years. (AQO 169/08)

Mrs Foster: At present, the Department has no statutory obligation to collect figures. However, I receive returns from district councils on that matter. During 2004-05, the quantities of those materials that were recycled were as follows: glass, 10,258 tonnes; paper and card, 23,906 tonnes, and plastic, 1,712 tonnes. In 2005-06, those quantities increased to the following: glass, 13,107 tonnes; paper and card, 65,568 tonnes, and plastic, 7,666 tonnes. I am delighted to note the significant increase in the amounts that were recycled in 2005-06 compared with the previous year. That reflects well on the commitment of councils, the private and voluntary sectors and individual householders to increase the amount of waste that is recycled and thereby reduce the amount that goes to landfill.

Mr P Maskey: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. What efforts will the Minister make to enhance those figures and ensure long-term sustainability?

Mrs Foster: I am sure that the Member is aware of the Northern Ireland waste management strategy, which contains the following recycling targets: 60% of commercial and industrial waste to be recycled by 2020; 75% of construction, demolition and excavation waste to be recycled or reused by 2020; recycling and composting of household waste should be at 35% by 2010; 40% by 2015 and 45% by 2020. It is necessary to maximise recycling and composting practice in order to reduce the amount of waste that is sent to landfill and, with regard to biodegradable municipal waste, also to meet the challenging landfill directive targets.

Mr Newton: The Minister has provided impressive figures, which the House and the district councils will welcome. However, can the Minister tell the House how those figures will be monitored on a daily, weekly and monthly basis, so that the Assembly is confident that those targets are being achieved?

Mrs Foster: As I have already indicated, the Department does not have a statutory obligation to collect those figures. However, that may change in the future. The district councils submit their recycling data via the waste data flow database system on a quarterly basis, two months after the end of each quarter.

The data are collected from bring sites, civic amenity sites and kerbside collections. Information is gathered on 30 waste streams. The Environment and Heritage Service audits and validates the data through visits to district councils, 13 of which, to date, have been carried out this year.

Mr Speaker: Question 10 has been withdrawn.

Planning Policy Statement 14 (PPS 14)

11. Mr McElduff asked the Minister of the Environment if she will make a statement on planning applications refused under Planning Policy Statement 14: Sustainable Development in the Countryside. (AQO 148/08)

18. Mr Gardiner asked the Minister of the Environment what discussions she has had with the Minister for Regional Development regarding the establishment of new rural planning guidelines, in the light of Mr Justice Gillen's ruling on Planning Policy Statement 14: Sustainable Development in the Countryside. (AQO 150/08)

Mrs Foster: Mr Speaker, with your permission, I shall answer question 11 and question 18, which is Mr Gardiner's question, together.

Although the High Court has decided that the Department for Regional Development does not have the power to prepare it to draft PPS 14, the planning policy statement has not been formally quashed. A remedies hearing will take place on 27 September 2007. The Planning Service currently holds all planning applications that fall to be determined under PPS 14. The implications for applications that have been refused, wholly or partly on the basis of PPS 14, will be considered in the light of the final court judgement. There are about 600 such cases.

I will now answer Mr Gardner's question. In light of the High Court's recent judgment on the judicial review of PPS 14, I met Conor Murphy, the Minister for Regional Development, on 10 September 2007 to discuss the way forward. It was agreed that we would seek to place further evidence in front of the court on the issue of remedies. That matter was heard before Mr Justice Gillen on Friday 14 September 2007, when the Department for Regional Development was afforded a further week in which to submit additional evidence. As I have already stated, a further hearing on the issue of remedies is scheduled for 27 September 2007.

Mr McElduff: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Does the Minister accept that PPS 14, which is effectively a blanket ban on building in the countryside, has proven to be totally disastrous for the entire rural community? Does she also accept that refusals that were issued after 16 March 2006, on the basis of PPS 14 criteria, are now unlawful and invalid? How are those applications to be reviewed, and does PPS 14 still pertain?

Mrs Foster: I thought that I had made it clear — perhaps I did not — in my answer to the Member that applications that came before the Planning Service to be determined between March 2006 and the present still stand. At present, that is our legal advice, and I have no reason to demur. I am sure that the Member has read the judgement from Mr Justice Gillen in full. It is interesting that Mr Justice Gillen made no comment on the content of PPS 14. The crux of the judgement related to which Department made PPS 14, not to the content of the policy.

Mr Gardiner: I thank the Minister for her response. Does the Minister accept that considerations of sustainability, rural economy, family cohesion, social need, affordability and landscape compatibility should all be good reasons, either separately or in various combinations, for permitting development in the countryside, and that that rationale approach would be preferable to the mindless activity of PPS 14 and the chaos that has followed its demise?

Mrs Foster: I am sure that the Member is aware that a ministerial subgroup was set up to deal with the whole issue of PPS 14. Before the new devolved Administration took power on 8 May 2007, there had been a number of discussions in the House on what should be in a new PPS 14, both in the Committee on the Programme for Government and in the House. All those matters will be taken into consideration when the ministerial subgroup convenes. We have not proceeded with a ministerial subgroup meeting, but work has been done in the background with which we shall not proceed until the outcome of the appeal on Thursday 27 September 2007.

Mr Wells: I am sure that the Minister is aware that if the courts finally quash PPS 14, that will put enormous strains on the Planning Service. Is the Minister minded to put in place contingency plans, ready to be used, should that eventually happen?

Mrs Foster: Yes, I am minded to do so. Thank you very much for that wording, Mr Wells. Enormous strain will be placed on the operational side of Planning Service, as and when that decision is made.

Approximately 4,500 PPS 14 applications were received after 16 March 2006, up to early September 2007 —

Mr Speaker: I must interrupt the Minister as Question Time is now over for her.

Finance and Personnel

Local and Regional Rates

1. Mr K Robinson asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel to detail the total amount raised in local and regional rates, both household and industrial, by (a) council area; and (b) parliamentary constituency, in the past five years; and to detail the amount of rebate paid out on the same basis. (AQO 151/08)

The Minister of Finance and Personnel (Mr P Robinson): I would have been happy to spend the next 30 minutes answering this question, but instead I placed tables in the Library showing the detailed information requested. The Land and Property Services Agency does not hold these figures by parliamentary constituency, so I provided the information on the basis of council area.

The Member for East Antrim asked for figures for household and industrial rates. We have taken that to mean domestic and non-domestic rates, as the category of industrial rates is only a small percentage of all non-domestic properties, and figures are not readily available for that subset.

The Member will be interested to note the following from the figures for 2006-07: in the Carrickfergus Borough council area, £7.7 million was raised in local rates, and some £10 million in regional rates. Over £1 million was refunded by way of rate rebate. In the Larne Borough Council area, £7.4 million was raised in local rates, and some £9.2 million in regional rates, with some £1.2 million being refunded by way of rate rebate. In Newtownabbey Borough Council area, in the other part of his constituency, £18.7 million was raised in local rates, and some £24.6 million in regional rates. Some £2.6 million was refunded by way of rate rebate.

Mr K Robinson: I thank the Minister for his full reply, and I look forward to reading the documents that he placed in the Library. Does the Minister agree that a significant proportion of the regional rates for a local government area should be spent in that area, as local rates currently are? Will he indicate what he considers to be a reasonable proportion?

Mr P Robinson: The regional rate is not a hypotheated rate. I can understand, arising out of contributions by his friend in the Workplace 2010 debate, the concern that is being expressed, particularly by those in East Antrim. Off the top of my head this morning, I said that my understanding was that Larne, which is in the East Antrim constituency, came out lowest in the indices for public-sector jobs. I checked those figures — I was right, as usual. [Laughter.]

The figures for public-sector jobs per 100 economically active people ranged from Larne at 10·4 to Belfast at 53·2. Again, the figures that were originally given show that the Belfast travel-to-work area had 28·1 public-sector jobs per 100 economically active people. It disguises the fact that the whole of East Antrim is at 10·1, Ards is at 11·1, Newtownabbey is at 13·1 and North Down is at 13·6. The low level in those areas — not surprisingly — means that Belfast is at 53·2. Again, the disparity is evident, particularly in the outlying areas of the Belfast travel-to-work area, which makes more complex the kind of decisions that we have to take with regard to job dispersal.

Mr O'Loan: How much of the domestic rate currently goes towards paying for water? If the Minister does not have that information at this point, can he confirm that he will bring that information to the Assembly and say when he will do so?

Mr P Robinson: Again, people are testing me — I am giving these figures off the top of my head. The answer at the moment is, of course, none — because at the time of the last Executive, his colleague Mark Durkan decided to break the link between water and the regional rate. I believe that the present-day equivalent of the figure at that time would be, on average, about £160.

Mr Hamilton: Can the Minister set out the percentage increase in the domestic regional rate over that period, the reasons for that increase, and whether he believes that such increases are sustainable.

Mr P Robinson: My colleagues are supposed to ask me easy questions, not hard ones. The percentage increases to which the Members referred occurred over a five-year period. For the past three years I calculate a 37% increase, which is a sizeable figure. Over five years the increase is approximately 60%, largely brought about by the negotiations of those involved in the Belfast Agreement with the reinvestment and reform initiative, which tied rate increases in Northern Ireland to the level of increases in Great Britain. That made for substantial increases; thankfully, we managed to break that link during the St Andrews Agreement negotiations, and are, therefore, no longer tied to the increases in Great Britain. The Executive can now make more reasonable decisions on rates.

Lifetime Opportunities

2. Mr Ford asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel to detail the resources he has allocated to tackle rural poverty across Northern Ireland, and to meet the targets set out in 'Lifetime Opportunities: Government's Anti-Poverty and Social Inclusion Strategy', given the ongoing comprehensive spending review. (AQO 184/08)

Mr P Robinson: The UK comprehensive spending review is due to conclude in October, and will have important implications for us in determining the share of UK public expenditure to be allocated over the next three years to the Executive and Assembly for those public services for which we are responsible.

I have not yet made any resource allocations for consideration by the Executive. Draft spending proposals put forward by Departments as part of the 2007 Budget process were informed by a broad range of issues, including the need to address social exclusion and poverty. I held bilateral meetings with Ministers last week in order to develop a Budget position. That will provide me with a basis to produce spending proposals for individual Departments for discussion and agreement at a subsequent Executive meeting.

Mr Ford: I thank the Minister for his response, although I had hoped for a little more detail. Given that many groups that tackle rural poverty depend on EU peace funding for some of their core activities, does the Minister have any plans to assist those groups in dealing with the reduction in funding from that source?

Mr P Robinson: It is worrying that there are a number of difficulties. Money from Europe will be about half of what it has been in previous years, and the future of a number of worthy projects will have to be considered. However, they must be considered by the Departments taking the respective lead responsibilities; they rank the priority of those projects as against departmental commitments, and I, in turn, when examining spending allocations, take account of all of the competitive pressures across all Departments. That is a matter that will be informed both by the Programme for Government and the amounts available to us through the three-year comprehensive spending review period.

The Member heard the Deputy First Minister state his and the First Minister's priority. Poverty must be addressed, and rural poverty is just as real as urban poverty. If we are to mean anything when we say that we want devolution to work, we have to make it work for people in that position.

Mr Storey: Will the Minister set out the total Northern Ireland resource element of the departmental expenditure limit for 2006-07, compared to 1998-99, in real terms? What does the Minister expect the increase to be over the comprehensive spending review period, and how does he expect the Departments to address their priorities in that period?

Mr P Robinson: There has been a massive increase in public spending in Northern Ireland over those years, and, although we expect to be operating within a tight fiscal framework, we are still talking about economic growth; that is, economic growth upon what has been substantial economic growth up until now.

In the period to which the Member refers, the increase has been around 24%. Therefore, much more money is available to us today than there was in years past, and there has been, year-on-year, around 1% real growth over the period of the comprehensive spending review. We are still talking about more being available, but with a new Assembly and a new Executive in place, there is an ambitious programme, which can only be curtailed by the amount of spending available to us.

Mr P J Bradley: I was not in the Chamber earlier when the ministerial statement was made, so my question may have been asked already. Does the Minister agree that rural areas must be included in any future decentralisation programmes?

Mr P Robinson: I assume that the Member is referring to the decentralisation of public-sector jobs, particularly in the Northern Ireland Civil Service. Earlier, I said that the Executive has agreed a review of public-sector jobs, and I will be bringing the terms of reference to the Committee for Finance and Personnel and to the Executive so that we can have a robust policy to ensure that there is a fair spread, taking into account all of the factors, not least of which is the importance of Belfast as our capital city. However, the need to have a fair distribution around the country was also mentioned earlier and, as he was not present, I can tell the Member that a series of bids was made during the course of the morning, stretching from Larne through to Enniskillen and Omagh.

Review of Rating

3. Mr Weir asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel to give a timescale within which he intends to bring proposals to the Executive in relation to the review of rating. (AQO 137/08)

Mr P Robinson: The public consultation finished on 31 August, and the consultation report will be published shortly. That report will be sent to the DFP Committee for it to scrutinise and, if it wishes, to take further evidence. Following that, I will bring proposals to the Executive. I hope that that will take place in early November to allow changes to be made for next April's rates bills. More fundamental changes cannot be implemented as easily because that would require primary legislation. In that context, it will take longer to develop firm proposals. The Executive and the Assembly will wish to examine any long-term options for change in more detail. Therefore, it may be that all we can decide on this year is a shortlist of realistic, long-term options for future and further consideration.

Mr Weir: The Minister recently indicated that he was considering increasing the savings limit for pensioners beyond which they are not entitled to certain benefits. Can the Minister give more detail about that, and could such a proposal be in place by next April?

Mr P Robinson: The answer to the latter part of the question is yes. Those types of changes can be made within the existing legislative framework. I do not wish to indicate what I believe the outcome of the review of rating should be; I think that it is important that the Committee for Finance and Personnel have the opportunity to examine the responses that the Department has received from consultation and give its considered opinion. I want to be able to take the Committee's opinion into account, as well as the responses from the consultation, but I can tell the Member, as I said to a rating conference last week, that the type of proposal that he has mentioned has attractions and I am sure that the Executive will want to consider that carefully.

Mr Burns: Will the Minister confirm that the ability to pay will be a factor in any new rating scheme?

Mr P Robinson: I can confirm that. There are always difficulties with what might be regarded as a property tax, and the issue that is most at stake is that of the ability to pay. In the initial phase of the Department's consideration, we can only consider ability to pay in the context of the existing legislation. That means that we have to consider the types of reliefs that are available and also issues such as how they affect senior citizens, vacant properties and the issue of the capping of rates. The ability-to-pay issue is at the heart of the matter, but it is not easy to fashion that within a capital-based rates system.

Mr McClarty: Does the Minister acknowledge that increasing industrial rates from the present 30% would have a significant detrimental impact on job opportunities, not only in my constituency of East Londonderry, but in the Minister's constituency of East Belfast? Is the Minister aware that Northern Ireland manufacturers already experience the disadvantages of additional gas, electricity and transport costs?

3.45 pm

Furthermore, is he also aware that several manufacturers have indicated that such an increase would result in the reduction of research and development budgets and medium-term investment, thus leading to significant job losses in the private sector that will be difficult to replace?

Mr P Robinson: The Member will be aware that the Economic Research Institute of Northern Ireland is carrying out work for the Department on that issue and, therefore, I should mark time until I receive its report. However, I was sufficiently indiscreet at a recent Confederation of British Industry conference to indicate that if the focus and centrepiece of Government policy is economic growth, it would be inconsistent to make life more difficult for businesses. The Member can extrapolate my view on the subject from that.

Childcare Voucher Scheme

4. Mr McFarland asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel to advise on the estimated savings which could result to the Northern Ireland Civil Service through the implementation of a childcare voucher scheme, such as that provided by Employers for Childcare.

(AQO 210/08)

Mr P Robinson: The Northern Ireland Civil Service is committed to introducing a salary-sacrifice childcare voucher scheme when the new electronic human resource (e-HR) payroll system is introduced in 2008. Savings to the Northern Ireland Civil Service will result from a reduction in employer's National Insurance contributions in proportion to the salary that staff will be sacrificing in return for childcare vouchers.

It is difficult to estimate how much will be saved as it will depend entirely on the number of staff who join the scheme and the value of the childcare vouchers they choose to take. However, projections based on a 3% uptake by civil servants estimate the total annual savings to be about £78,000.

Mr McFarland: I thank the Minister for his answer. Does he acknowledge that the childcare voucher system results in savings for employers and employees? Will he tell me why it has taken so long for the Civil Service to offer tax advantages that employees in progressive companies, such as Bombardier Shorts, currently enjoy? For the benefit of Northern Ireland employers and employees, will he encourage his Executive colleagues to promote childcare voucher systems in their Departments where appropriate?

Mr P Robinson: I accept that the scheme has great advantages. Incidentally, my Department will be introducing the scheme throughout the Civil Service, and therefore all of my colleagues' Departments will be included. There have been difficulties in introducing the scheme, not because of lack of enthusiasm but due to a lack of manpower.

To introduce the scheme, the manual input of computer programmes is required. The programmes are adequate for the scheme, but staff pay rises, and so forth, were being implemented at the same time, and given the choices that the Department had to make, the introduction of the childcare voucher scheme had to be postponed. However, it is only delayed, not cancelled. The Department intends to proceed with the scheme, which will be of value.

Mrs M Bradley: Will the Minister update the House on any interdepartmental work that has been carried out to deliver an affordable childcare policy?

Mr P Robinson: Childcare policy is my responsibility insofar as it applies to the Civil Service. The scheme, as the Member for North Down Mr McFarland indicated, benefits individual employees and employers. The Civil Service will want to take up the scheme and the workforce in all Departments will benefit from that.

Mr Donaldson: As the Minister knows, I have corresponded with him on the issue and, therefore, I understand the reasons for the delay in implementing the scheme. However, will he confirm his support for the principles behind the childcare voucher scheme, and will compensation be made available to staff and the company involved for the delay in implementation?

Mr P Robinson: The Member is never slow at coming forward on such issues. I support the scheme absolutely and I want it to be up and running as quickly as possible. As there is no statutory requirement to introduce the scheme, the question of compensation does not arise. However, the Department is talking to the company that was going to run the scheme because it will have incurred some costs due to the withdrawal.

However, the scheme is voluntary. The company cannot be certain whether anyone will take it up, but, obviously, people will join. We will talk to the company in order to achieve a sensible outcome.

5. Mr O'Dowd asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel to outline the time frame for bringing forward the Workplace 2010 strategy. (AQO 176/08)

Mr P Robinson: I am more interested in hearing the Member's supplementary question considering that he said that I had answered his main question this morning. As I announced earlier, the Executive approved a recommendation that Workplace 2010 should proceed to the next stage of procurement. Subject to the injunction that was imposed as a result of the legal challenge being lifted, I expect an invitation to submit best and final offers to be issued to the two final bidders during October 2007. Based on current projections, it is, therefore, likely that the contract will be awarded by autumn 2008. Workplace 2010 would then be phased in across all Departments over five to seven years.

Mr O'Dowd: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. The Minister gave a comprehensive report this morning during his ministerial statement, so I have been puzzling over my supplementary question. Will the Minister outline what further role the Assembly will have in the process? Will there be regular reports to the Assembly on the contracts, etc?

Mr P Robinson: In the first instance, I am keen to keep the Committee for Finance and Personnel informed of issues that arise. I have promised to meet with the Committee to discuss Workplace 2010 and the job locations issue, and officials will keep in touch with the Committee about the terms of reference for such issues. Before the matter is decided, the Committee will be informed of the up-to-date position, and the Executive will want to see the contract to ensure that we have the best possible deal for the people of Northern Ireland. I will return to the House with a statement at the appropriate time.

Mr McQuillan: What will happen at the end of the contracts?

Mr P Robinson: The contracts will last for 20 years. I am almost tempted to say that it will be someone else's problem, but if there is any difficulty, it will be my problem. We have built a requirement into the draft contract whereby the estate can be put out for public sale again if the Department is not satisfied with the new option at the end of 20 years. That will provide a further safeguard to ensure that public interest is the priority.

Varney Review

6. Mr Kennedy asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel to indicate when the Varney Review of tax policy in Northern Ireland was likely to bring in its findings; and what was the scope of the representations he has made to the review. (AQO 178/08)

Mr P Robinson: On 19 July 2007, the Executive issued their formal response to the Varney Review's call for evidence. I have no further insight into Sir David Varney's intentions, but he will present his final report to the Chancellor of the Exchequer in early October. In the light of that, I will press for a meeting before the publication of Sir David's final report.

Mr Kennedy: In a recent statement to the Assembly, the Minister stated that it was premature to call for tax-varying powers, and said that he did not believe that the timing was right. In his responses to the Varney Review, will the Minister confirm whether he may consider tax-raising powers in the future? Do the Minister and the Department of Finance and Personnel and, indeed, the Executive have a plan B to put to the Treasury on other tax-varying measures?

Mr P Robinson: Sir David Varney's request to receive evidence resulted in a report which was unanimously agreed by the Executive with all parties, including that of the Member, signing up to that submission.

The Member will not be surprised to hear that back-up positions are not offered in those types of submissions. We made Northern Ireland's special circumstances very clear: that we have a land frontier with a state that has a more competitive corporation tax rate; that we are emerging from years of conflict and instability; that we need to grow the economy, and that we need a new instrument to allow us to do that. That case was put forward by the Executive, and universally by the business community in Northern Ireland and was supported in evidence that Sir David received in the Republic of Ireland. At this stage I do not want to look at any plan B. I am looking to Sir David to do what is right and to give Northern Ireland the new fiscal instrument that will provide it with the step change it needs to get real economic growth.

Mr Neeson: Does the Minister believe that the Assembly's recent refusal to endorse the need for tax-varying powers has damaged our case — if not the process — for achieving lower corporation tax in Northern Ireland?

Mr P Robinson: No. That is not the case, and no reasonable argument can be made to support that view. During the debate on tax-varying powers, I made it clear that HM Treasury would probably be happy for us to have them, but that when a calamity would occur — as difficulties undoubtedly do happen — we would be left on our own to deal with it.

We do have a level of tax-varying powers in the regional rate, which is an instrument that we could use to vary the income we would require to fulfil spending needs. We will make our submission to Sir David available so that Members may see it, although it may also be made available at the foot of his report.

Mr Ross: Apart from any recommendations that may come from Sir David Varney, will the Minister indicate how the Executive can make a difference to our economic performance?

Mr P Robinson: The one concern that I have from all discussions about the Varney Review is that we foster the belief that the only way we can better ourselves is through the outcome of that review, and that unless we get a variation in the rate of corporation tax we will be floundering where we are at present.

Ultimately, the difference will be in the time we take to get real economic growth. If we can achieve a step change by getting a proper fiscal instrument that meets the requirements of Northern Ireland in the present circumstances, a very expeditious change in the economic growth and prosperity of Northern Ireland will be seen. If that instrument is not given, then it will be up to the skill and ingenuity of the Executive and our officials to put in place whatever measures are possible. However, that will mean that it will take much longer to reach the same level of economic growth and prosperity.

Northern Ireland Audit Office: Earlier Intervention

7. Mr Dallat asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel what plans he had for earlier intervention by the Northern Ireland Audit Office in the financial affairs of governmental Departments and agencies.

Mr P Robinson: Section 65(3) of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 clearly states:

“The Comptroller and Auditor General for Northern Ireland shall not, in the exercise of any of his functions, be subject to the direction or control of any Minister or Northern Ireland department or of the Assembly”.

Therefore, I have no plans — or authority — to direct or encourage earlier intervention by the Comptroller and Auditor General or his staff in the Northern Ireland Audit Office in the financial affairs of Departments and agencies.

Mr Dallat: I find the Minister’s answer very disappointing. [Laughter.] I am glad that he can laugh at these matters. Millions of pounds have gone missing because there is no system of early intervention. If the Northern Ireland Audit Office cannot intervene, does the Minister intend to do so and thus save millions of pounds for the Assembly and prevent embarrassment when the Public Accounts Committee constantly unravels huge amounts of waste that could have been prevented?

Mr P Robinson: The Member should sit down in a dark room and think about what he is asking of us. He should consider the issue for one moment: the Comptroller and Auditor General will not want to get involved in a decision — [Interruption.]

4.00 pm

Mr Speaker: The time for questions to the Minister of Finance is up.

Mr P Robinson: The Comptroller and Auditor General will not want to get involved in a decision that he might have to revisit later.

Mr Speaker: That ends questions to the Minister of Finance and Personnel. We move to questions to the Assembly Commission. I ask Members to take their ease as we go into questions to the Commission.

Assembly Commission

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Molloy] in the Chair)

Mr Deputy Speaker: The next item on the Order Paper is questions to the Assembly Commission. Mr Paul Butler will answer question 1 and Mr Sean Neeson will answer question 2 on behalf of the Commission. Question 3 has been withdrawn.

Parliament Buildings: Recycling Levels

1. Mr McKay asked the Assembly Commission to give an assessment of the level of recycling in Parliament Buildings. (AQO 177/08)

Mr Butler: Maith thú. The Commission is keen to promote environmentally friendly waste-management and energy policies throughout the Assembly. Since 26 June 2006, Parliament Buildings and annexe C have been involved in an estate-wide recycling initiative to reduce the amount of waste sent to landfill. Estate maintenance collects waste from the entire estate, compacts all general waste on site and segregates all recyclable waste for onward processing. A recycling company has provided us with the receptacles for segregation, and that is collected daily. The average recycling level in the estate stands at 30%, and the average recycling level in Parliament Buildings is between 25% and 30%, which is comparable to Westminster. The Office of the Keeper, in discussions with estate maintenance and the recycling company, plans to add more streams to the recycling policy to improve our recycling figures.

The Assembly Commission and its staff are developing excellent links with other Parliaments and assemblies, which will provide a forum for sharing good practice on environmental best-practice initiatives.

Mr McKay: What energy-efficiency measures are the Commission taking?

Mr Butler: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. The Office of the Keeper works closely with the energy conservation branch and the Carbon Trust to improve the efficiency of the Building’s lighting and heating. We are introducing energy-saving bulbs, where feasible, in the Building. Several offices have powered lighting that turns off when there is no one in the office. Euresh has adopted the Assembly’s recycling policy, and, for example, all its used cooking oil is collected by the supplier and recycled. With regard to IT, there is a 60% reduction in the amount of energy absorbed by the display screens of the new computers, and there is a reduction in the heat produced by those machines. Printers go into low-power mode after approximately five minutes of inactivity, and that leads to an 80% reduction in the power used. Furthermore, the enhanced capabilities of the printers permit a reduction in the amount of paper used through double-sided printing and multiple-page presentations. A contract is in place for recycling all printer consumables from Parliament Buildings and constituency offices.

Mr McGlone: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. What renewable energy sources are used for Parliament Buildings?

Mr Butler: The Office of the Keeper and the Assembly's recycling policy is something that we need to consider. I will get back to the Member with a response.

Parliament Buildings: Artefacts

2. Mr Dallat asked the Assembly Commission if it will publish a list of all artefacts in Parliament Buildings, their value and proposals for their future.

Mr Neeson: There are approximately 60 items to be considered. A list of the artefacts has been prepared and will be provided to the Member. Copies can be provided to other Members on request.

A valuation of the artefacts was undertaken in 2001, and a further valuation took place in August 2007. The revised figures for that are not yet at hand, but will be provided to the Member when they become available.

A number of the most well-known artefacts are now being displayed in rooms in Parliament Buildings, with the remainder securely stored. The future use of the artefacts has yet to be decided, but it is intended that the Assembly Commission will consider options for their display in Parliament Buildings in the coming year.

Mr Dallat: I thank Mr Neeson for his answer.

There is a painting, currently hanging in the Speaker's office, of King William marching towards the Boyne with Pope Innocent VII hovering overhead, apparently giving his blessing. Does the Minister agree that having it in a public place to intrigue the visitors and put another slant on our beleaguered history would be an exciting venture?

Mr Neeson: I am well aware of that particular painting, and, in fact, during the summer a request was made for it to go on loan. The pictures that we do have are currently being displayed in the Members' Dining Room, the Speaker's office and the First Minister's office. Clearly, that is a significant painting, and where it should be is a consideration for the Commission in the future.

Mr Shannon: I understand that there are some artefacts of historical, and probably military, importance in the courthouse in Newtownards. Has an inventory been done on those and, if so, what is the intention for them?

Mr Neeson: A number of artefacts were put into very secure storage after the fire in the Building, which Members may remember. Over the coming year, the Commission will be looking at the whole question of the display of artefacts, and consideration will be given to those that the Member referred to.

The Deputy Speaker: Those are all the questions for the Assembly Commission.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

Classroom Assistants

Debate resumed on amendments to motion:

That this Assembly calls upon the Minister of Education to intervene immediately in the classroom assistants' dispute, in recognition of the vital role of classroom assistants, and to prevent disruption to children's education. — [Mr B McCrea.]

Which amendments were:

(1) Leave out all after "Education" and insert:

"to implement the recommendations put forward by the trade unions in the dispute over classroom assistants' pay evaluation, and to liaise with the Minister of Finance and Personnel to ensure that funds are made available in order to resolve the situation and avert strike action." — [Ms Purvis.]

(2) Leave out all after the second "assistants" and insert:

" , by convening an urgent meeting of the Department, employers and Trade Union side in the dispute, with an agenda to include (a) retention of the Special Needs Allowance; (b) retention of the 32.5 hourly pay divisor; (c) NVQ III and the job evaluation exercise; and (d) adequate pay protection arrangements, in order to prevent disruption to children's education." — [Mr Donaldson.]

Mr B McCrea: I am pleased that the Minister has given a clear commitment that she will intervene personally in that dispute. It is high time, and she should have done it before, but at least she is doing it now.

There were only a couple of points that came up in the debate, because she spent eight minutes attacking everyone else, about everything else, rather than talking about the issue. The Minister was asked a number of specific questions, and she did not answer any of them. That is not the way to go forward in this Assembly. For the Minister to fall out with just about everyone in the Assembly, including the entire Education Committee save Mr Butler, is not a clever, winning strategy.

The situation facing the classroom assistants is dire. Why should they suffer a cut in pay to finance financial mismanagement and inappropriate budgeting over a long period of time? The employers may feel that they have made a generous offer, but that is not for me to say, despite what the Minister said in her attack on me. Who is going to fix that problem? There is absolute consensus in the House that we should get the issue sorted.

My colleague Ken Robinson said, and research carried out by the Ulster Unionist Party shows, that other employers who employ a lot of teaching assistants, as they are called in England, say clearly that NVQ 2 is only for beginners and that established, professional people at the top of the scale should hold NVQ 3 qualifications.

That information comes from Government papers and statistics, and it should have been brought into play.

People do not understand the pay cuts. The language that we hear is that most of the jobs will be OK, and that not all of them will disappear. However, the people out there are being asked to do more work for less pay. People say that classroom assistants are wonderful and great, and that they could not be done without, but that is not the way to reward them.

The Minister seemed to suggest that she alone was the only person doing any work to resolve the dispute. However, when the Committee questioned her, it discovered that she had held only two meetings with the relevant parties. Had time permitted, I would have brought to the attention of the Chairperson of the Committee for Education that the Committee has brought the matter to the fore at every available opportunity. However, the Committee has only received research documents, which have been discussed. We then asked for a statement from the Minister's Department. Did that turn up? No. Did the Committee have to ask again? Yes. Eventually, the Committee received some information, but it amounted to nothing. The Department has taken a hands-off attitude, in case it would dirty itself with that type of problem. Somebody somewhere will have to take control of the situation.

Earlier, we thought that we might get a result. There were faxes going around to that effect. I have a statement from UNISON. I know that the Minister does not think that we speak to the unions, but today — one hour ago — a statement from UNISON stated that:

"We have been formally advised by the employers that no meeting will be convened today".

We thought that there was going to be a meeting. We were also advised that:

"No offer will be made. This is on foot of the attached from".

The statement goes on to name a permanent secretary.

The Committee talked to UNISON and to the Northern Ireland Public Service Alliance (NIPSA). It has been to the meetings in Ballynahinch. People come and talk to the Committee, and the Committee has tried to understand and resolve the problem at every single juncture. It is not acceptable for the situation to continue for 12 years, and that is the way that it is going.

Many Members have contributed to the debate. I am mindful of the positive contributions made by my friend Mr Donaldson in tabling his amendment, which we will support. There should be some way to give a bit of direction. We are not trying to be prescriptive. If there are other avenues, fair enough. We are not trying to constrain anybody's way forward.

I have explained the situation to Ms Purvis. I readily acknowledge that she has been at the forefront of the debate — I have been told so by the unions and the classroom assistants. However, although she spoke most eloquently, it is not right or proper that we should dictate a settlement; that is for others to do. Although I applaud the stance that she has taken — and I understand that it is personal, and she has my full support for that — I regret that I cannot support her amendment.

Ms Purvis: I thank the Member for giving way. Does he accept that his motion was somewhat weak in its substance, and therefore he has to support something stronger? Does the Member also accept that, although he does not want to be prescriptive on the issues relating to a deal, almost every Member in the Chamber has referred to NVQ level 3, the hourly pay divisor, and the unfair pay? While the Member does not want to be prescriptive on a deal, those are the issues that he has addressed during the debate.

Mr B McCrea: I will reiterate for the Member that I was most impressed by her eloquence and her point about us caring about the outcome and solving it. I agreed with all of those sentiments. However, as I made clear in the Chamber and outside, I do not think that her amendment would help, although that is only a difference of opinion.

I want to achieve unanimity. That is why I will accept the amendment tabled by Jeffrey Donaldson and Michelle McIlveen. I want Members to come together to assist the Minister of Education to resolve the issue. That is what this debate is about.

The Minister may feel that Members were making unwarranted attacks on her. She made accusations about gender and Irish-language bias. I am surprised that the Minister feels that she needs special attention. Every Member is equal and trying to do a job. Our job is to hold her to account. Her job is to sort this problem out.

Members have tried to be as constructive as possible. What we really want is action. We have deliberately not said that one side is better than the other. Ms Purvis stated that I could have been stronger. The trouble is that being stronger does not necessarily achieve consensus or a way forward. I plead with the Minister to stop talking about irrelevant matters such as Irish-medium schools and academic selection — tackle the issue at hand. Those issues are important and should be discussed, but there is another, more pressing, issue that must be dealt with now — the issue of classroom assistants.

If Members do not take action, we will face a strike on Wednesday. There will be a rally, which is unlikely to fix the problem, and that will result in another three days of strikes, which will not fix it either. The next strike will be for a week — or forever. That is not the way to solve the problem. There must be a better way.

The Minister confers with Paul Butler, but Members should be working together. The UUP motion is an attempt to bring all parties together. The general consensus in the Chamber is that all Members want classroom assistants to be looked after properly and fairly. Members are not pointing the finger of blame — we just want the problem sorted out.

It may sound strange, but Members understand that the Department of Education works within constraints. However, the Minister must realise that the Department — and only the Department — has the resources to resolve this. If she must put other questions to other people, let her come back and talk to the Education Committee after she has done so. Although it is for the Chairperson to say, I believe that she will find the Committee to be most accommodating.

I want the Chamber to unite to defeat, regrettably, Ms Purvis's amendment and give 100% support to the motion as amended by Jeffrey Donaldson and Michelle McIlveen.

Question, That amendment No 1 be made, put and negatived.

Question, That amendment No 2 be made, put and agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly calls upon the Minister of Education to intervene immediately in the classroom assistants' dispute, in recognition of the vital role of classroom assistants, by convening an urgent meeting of the Department, employers and Trade Union side in the dispute, with an agenda to include (a) retention of the Special Needs Allowance; (b) retention of the 32.5 hourly pay divisor; (c) NVQ III and the job evaluation exercise; and (d) adequate pay protection arrangements, in order to prevent disruption to children's education.

World Alzheimer's Day

The Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to 1 hour 30 minutes for this debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes to propose and 10 minutes for the winding-up speech. All other Members will have five minutes to speak.

Mrs Hanna: I beg to move

That this Assembly expresses support for world Alzheimer's day on 21 September 2007; acknowledges that over 15,000 local people are currently living with Alzheimer's, and that dementia is expected to rise by 27% over the next ten years, due to people living longer, which would result in 20,500 people in Northern Ireland living with dementia by 2017; and notes that maintaining current levels of service provision is not sufficient for such an increase, and that it is important for patients and their carers to receive the best care available and access to clinically effective drugs, when appropriate.

All around the world, Alzheimer's associations, individuals, people with dementia and carers came together on Friday 21 September to mark world Alzheimer's day, 2007. It is fitting that the Assembly acknowledges the attempts that are being made to raise awareness of an illness that affects millions of people.

The theme of this year's world Alzheimer's day was "No time to lose". I hope that the Assembly will express its support by agreeing with me that there is no time to lose in addressing this major health challenge.

Alzheimer's disease and dementia are such a challenge for us, as so many people are unaware of these serious illnesses or properly understand them. More must be done to promote awareness so that people recognise the first symptoms of dementia and seek early help. In turn, communities must be educated so that they can understand and accept people who suffer from dementia.

I am alarmed by recent figures published by the Alzheimer's Society that show that more than 15,000 people are already affected by Alzheimer's disease in Northern Ireland. Furthermore, the prevalence of dementia is expected to rise by 27% over the next 10 years.

No doubt the number of people affected by the illness is significantly higher when one considers its effect on partners, carers and family members as they struggle to meet the daily challenges of caring for someone with the disease. However, the figures demand more attention for the illness and better care for people suffering from dementia in our communities.

However, the statistics do not tell the whole story. They cannot convey the breakdown of relationships between relatives who care for a loved one or how that can result in the loss of a lifelong friend. I have met representatives of the Alzheimer's Society in Northern Ireland several times, who tell me that that is the case. The society provides a range of services and is committed, at all times, to promoting the autonomy and self-determination of people with dementia.

People who suffer from dementia and their carers need proper medical attention and care. The Alzheimer's Society's recent report from Dementia UK recommends the development and support of a whole range of services for people with dementia that responds to their specific care needs. Those services range from informal home care, day care and social care to specialist, residential and palliative care. It is clear that the capacity of health and social care services to meet the multiple needs of people with dementia and their families is a key policy issue for Northern Ireland. With demand for services growing, the issue is becoming ever more pressing.

Caring for people with dementia affects the quality of life of carers considerably. Many carers spend more than 10 hours a day caring for a person with dementia, so it is important that the Assembly recognises the burden on them and supports the development of adequate respite services.

The availability of adequate care services for people with dementia and of carer support poses a challenge. Many carers are unaware of services, or they feel that services are not available to them when and where they need them. There are also inequalities of access to treatment for Alzheimer's disease.

Members may be aware that the Alzheimer's Society took part in the first ever judicial review of guidance issued through the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence (NICE).

That challenge related to the guidance on the availability of Alzheimer's drugs on the Health Service. That landmark High Court decision ordered the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence to review and rewrite guidelines on access to Alzheimer's drugs. The court has ruled that the guidance is discriminatory, and therefore, must be reconsidered. However, the ruling upheld the guidance restricting Health Service availability of the only licensed drugs for the treatment of Alzheimer's disease in its very early stages. NICE accepts the clinical effectiveness of the drugs in question, which cost £2·50 a day. That acceptance of the effectiveness of those drugs is important.

The decision is now the responsibility of the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety. I urge the Minister to ensure that everyone, at any stage of Alzheimer's disease, has access to appropriate drugs when those drugs are clinically recommended — it is, however, clear that they are not recommended for everyone.

I appreciate that the Department and the Minister have to manage finite resources and choose priorities carefully. I believe that Alzheimer's patients and their carers are a priority. The Minister and the Department must look for savings — perhaps that could be done through the prescription of generic drugs, and making more appropriate use of acute hospital beds, among other savings. I appreciate that any extra cost is a cost to the taxpayer. However, it is important to realise that we are talking about a quality-of-life treatment for the patient, which reduces the burden experienced by carers and, therefore, reduces the cost to the taxpayer.

In the immediate future, the potential impact that dementia will have on the Health Service and on the quality of life in Northern Ireland is of serious concern. It is crucial that the Department gives dementia the priority it requires now — before the demand for services significantly increases. What is required is greater awareness and de-stigmatisation of dementia; the building of effective partnerships among policy-makers, clinicians, researchers, carers and people with dementia; and the development of care services that are responsive to the needs of people with dementia and their families.

Policy-makers need to be engaged in order to provide adequate resources for care and research, now and for the future. Care staff need to be trained, and the skills of healthcare professionals further developed to diagnose and manage dementia, as well as promoting research into developing better treatments for the future.

It is clear that the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety must develop plans to adequately respond to the challenges posed by the growing number of people with Alzheimer's disease and dementia.

Mr Buchanan: I support the motion, which concerns yet another health issue for the House to consider. I also welcome the Minister's presence.

Alzheimer's and other forms of dementia are devastating conditions that can take away people's capacity to remember; to make decisions and choices; to take responsibility; to communicate, and to undertake daily living activities including personal care, eating, and mobility, all of which leave the patient totally dependent on others for help.

Because people are living longer — and statistics reveal an expected increase of 27% of dementia patients over the next 10 years — it is inevitable that action must be taken to make provision for both patient and carers in order to ensure that they receive the best possible available care and clinically effective drugs in future months and years.

Over the past number of decades, a lack of attention from policy-makers and service-commissioners to the needs of people with dementia has led to treatment for dementia being delivered in a piecemeal and inefficient manner. Therefore, more investment, accompanied by careful planning, and a focus on quality outcomes for dementia patients will be required in future years in order to deliver a better quality of life for patients and their families in a more efficient manner, while using available resources.

4.30 pm

Improved home care support packages, including low-level support, are required to help patients retain independence and dignity. The Bamford Review of Mental Health and Learning Disability (Northern Ireland) highlights the value of early diagnosis and intervention, yet access to home care support is increasingly restricted to those with the highest levels of need, making it even more difficult for people not assessed as having substantial or critical levels of need to access those services.

Unless community support improves, the situation will be compounded as the population ages and the number of people with dementia increases. People with dementia can only remain at home with their family and friends if the right support is put in place. Family and friends who provide care must have guaranteed access to carer support of a quality and frequency that meets their needs. It should include practical support services, carer information, training and access to support groups, as well as emergency back-up support and quality respite care.

Having watched a loved-one deteriorate from the dreaded Alzheimer's disease, I know something of the stress, anxiety and burden that is placed on the family unit as it devotes itself to caring for that loved one. A recent report from the Alzheimer's Society includes the following quotation from a son caring for a father with dementia, which highlights the family's anxiety and the gap which exists within current care provision:

"I don't think anyone really understands how exhausting and distressing it is to care for the person you love most in the world as they deteriorate before your very eyes. Our family wants to continue to care for my father at home for as long as possible — but we really do need more help — reliable and well-trained people who understand dementia and have the time to develop a real relationship with my father."

The real challenge now, aside from providing quality care and care homes, is to support people with dementia in their own homes. More effort is required from the public, private and voluntary sectors to find good quality, cost-effective options to meet the needs of patients with dementia and their families in the years to come.

Mr Brady: Go raibh maith, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Sinn Féin supports world Alzheimer's day, and I welcome the motion.

Alzheimer's disease is the most common form of dementia and accounts for 62% of the population with dementia. As has been stated, there are possibly 16,000 people with dementia living in the North; and it is estimated that by 2051 that number will have increased to more than 47,000. Dementia largely affects people over 65, though 2% of sufferers are under 65.

I had a very good friend who died at the age of 48 from Alzheimer's disease. It took two years to diagnose his condition, and it is possible that, had the disease been diagnosed at a much earlier stage, his life could have been prolonged and its quality improved. Unfortunately, that did not happen.

There are almost 10,000 people in the North with Alzheimer's disease. Some 5,500 of them are in the early stage of the illness and 3,200 are in the moderate stage. The statistic that over 1,400 people develop Alzheimer's disease every year is frightening. Part of their problem is that it can be difficult to obtain a diagnosis. Only 40% of those with early-stage Alzheimer's disease are diagnosed as having the disease and can, therefore, be prescribed drug treatments.

Alzheimer's disease is more common in women than in men, even though women generally live longer. Alzheimer's disease and other forms of dementia present as one of the world's most significant emerging health and social care challenges. Unfortunately, there is lack of awareness about it among policy-makers, clinicians and the general public.

People affected by dementia do not seek health services, and even if they were to do so, health care services tend not to meet their needs. Dementia is a stigma, and people who suffer from it can be excluded, in some cases, from residential care.

As has been stated, families are the main carers. The emerging themes are lack of understanding, and how distressing it is to care for the person you love most in the world as they deteriorate before your very eyes.

On Friday, I spoke to a man whose wife was diagnosed with Alzheimer's disease in the past two years. Before she descended into the final stages of the disease she was able to articulate how she was affected. It struck me that he said that the person whom he had married 40 years before no longer existed; the body was there, but the spirit had gone.

Primary healthcare services play an essential role in the detection, management and prevention of dementia. The Bamford Review highlights a range of important issues that need to be addressed urgently. Those should include access to independent information and advocacy services for people with dementia and their carers. There must be a focus on early diagnosis, intervention and treatment and improved access to general health and social care intervention for people with dementia. However, community care services are only available to those who have complex needs, in situations in which carers are under so much stress that they are unable to cope.

Drug treatments for Alzheimer's disease are currently available on the NHS for all patients who are recommended by clinicians. I have spoken to carers who say that the drugs can be effective, but not necessarily in all cases. The National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence (NICE) recommends withdrawing access through the NHS for people in the early stages of Alzheimer's disease to the only drug treatments that are licensed and clinically effective, as they are deemed not to be cost effective by NICE. The drugs — Reminyl, Exelon and Aricept — cost approximately £2.50 per day. In October 2007, the Minister of Health Social Services and Public Safety, Mr McGimpsey, will make a decision about whether to keep drugs for Alzheimer's disease on the NHS.

The provision of nursing and residential homes is also in need of review. Groups such as the Alzheimer's Society, which is the leading research charity for people with dementia, their families and their carers, need all the support and funding available to enable them to carry on their important and valuable work. Local branches, such as the Newry branch in my constituency, do valuable and important work. Over the years I have had a close working relationship with the Newry branch of the Alzheimer's Society, the members of which deserve all the support and funding available to help them deal with approximately 584 cases of Alzheimer's disease in our area. By the year 2021, that number will have increased by an estimated 36%. Go raibh maith agat.

Mr B McCrea: I support the motion tabled by Carmel Hanna with pleasure. Only now is this issue coming to the fore: society is adapting to the fact that we are living longer, which is good and something that many Members are thankful for.

Society must learn to cope with that change, but for the individuals concerned, and their families, Alzheimer's disease is a tragedy. Members must ensure that we support those affected, their carers, healthcare professionals and voluntary organisations, like the Alzheimer's Society, which do sterling work.

The sad fact is that there is no cure for this disease. When looking at how one might help, the conclusion is that the only thing one can do is to try to ease the suffering. Society must do everything possible when it comes to drugs, respite or other interventions, and I am sure that the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety will address those matters later.

Many questions of a similar nature will continue to affect us and are probably part of a bigger problem that will become even bigger in the future. How will society cope with an aging population which has done its fair share of work and will require more medical intervention in the later years of life?

In an associative sense, that reminds me of when I tried to help people with severe learning disabilities. The same issues must be dealt with: the need for 24-hour care; the lack of breaks or respite, and the worries of carers about what will happen when they have passed away.

I will not labour that point because I am sure that — as with all such issues — there is general support from Members. In the fullness of time, and as soon as possible, the Minister must bring forward a strategic vision for Alzheimer's. There cannot be a quick fix. Long-term investment for the future must be examined. Members must take a long, hard look at that because the level of expenditure that is required is one that the Assembly is not used to having to deal with. There is no point in simply saying that the matter must be dealt with: money needs to be found in order to do that. That is what civilised people do. The Assembly must box clever in order to provide respite to the people who need it, and to be able to afford appropriate drugs.

The Assembly can be assured of my party's support for the motion. I look forward to the Minister's comments.

Dr Deeny: Having listened to other Members' contributions to the debate, perhaps I can add to it by speaking as someone who has worked with people before their being diagnosed with Alzheimer's, when they were fit and healthy, and, indeed, when they have reached the end stage of the disease, just prior to death. I am sure that Members are aware of how devastating the disease is, not only for the sufferer, but for his or her entire family circle.

I wish to outline some facts about Alzheimer's. It is a progressive, incurable and physical disease of the brain that results in ongoing deterioration of brain function. As has been stated, there are many types of dementia. Dementia simply means a lessening of brain function. The most common form is Alzheimer's, followed by vascular dementia, which is circulatory. There are other rarer forms.

Alzheimer's is a progressive disease, which means that, gradually, more parts of the brain are damaged. As that happens, the symptoms become more severe and distressing. They involve memory loss, confusion, and problems with speech and understanding, which progress until sufferers end up in a baby-like mental state. That is well known. However, it is extremely disturbing for family members and for those who have to care for Alzheimer's sufferers. Patients become completely disorientated in time, place and person.

As has been rightly pointed out, Alzheimer's sufferers are stigmatised, rejected, dismissed, shunned and ignored. It appals me to see that, but it happens. It is a major societal problem. Society must change its views to that most distressing disease. Having worked with people for years in general practice, I believe that we forget and ignore the older and much wiser generation at our peril.

There is no straightforward test for dementia. Doctors do not know why some people get Alzheimer's and others do not. It is known to be inherited in 5% to 10% of sufferers. Some statistics from the Alzheimer's Society have already been mentioned. I wish to recap on some of those: there are 700,000 sufferers of dementia in the UK, of whom 400,000 have Alzheimer's; there are 24 million sufferers of dementia worldwide; at present, as another Member mentioned, 15,000 younger people in the UK suffer from pre-senile dementia, and there will be more than 1 million sufferers of dementia in the UK by 2025. The Assembly must, therefore, consider future health provision.

Two thirds of dementia sufferers are women. The proportion of dementia sufferers doubles in every five-year age group: in other words, there are twice as many dementia sufferers among 70- to 75-year-olds as there are among 65- to 70-year-olds. It is estimated that delaying the onset of dementia by five years would reduce the number of deaths that are directly attributable to the disease by 30,000 a year. The financial cost of dementia in the UK is more than £17 billion each year. Some 64% of people who live in care homes suffer from a form of dementia. Two thirds of people who suffer from dementia live in the community and one third live in care homes.

As my colleague Basil McCrea mentioned, there is no cure for that dreadful disease. Therefore, the basis of treatment is to alleviate, as far as possible, some or all of the symptoms of the disease and to slow down its progression.

Some drugs, such as Aricept, Exelon and Reminyl, can do that. Of course, there is major controversy at the moment about Ebixa, which is said not to be clinically effective. That is why the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence has said that it should not be prescribed. However, if it is, subsequently, proven to be clinically effective, then it should be prescribed. That is my view, as a medical person.

It is believed that eating a healthy diet which includes omega-3 fatty acids, which are found in oily fish such as salmon and mackerel, and staying physically and mentally active are very important. Also, recreational activities that promote conversation and mental stimulation are very important in helping to prevent dementia, or at least in delaying its onset. It has also been proven that those activities can help to improve life for those who already have the disease.

World Alzheimer's day — held on 21 September each year — promotes awareness of the disease so that people can understand its early symptoms; provides support and accessible information to sufferers and their carers; trains staff and develops the skills of healthcare professionals; engages policy-makers to provide adequate resources; promotes research; and educates communities.

In my view, having been a doctor for 27 years, Alzheimer's disease, and dementia in general, presents one of the greatest health and social challenges of our time which, across the world, often goes unnoticed. We all need to play our part in improving the quality of life of all those who are unfortunate enough to suffer from dementia, and that of their families and carers. I support the motion.

Mr Easton: I am pleased to join with other Members to encourage the Assembly to express support for world Alzheimer's day, which was acknowledged across the world last Friday. An increasing number of people are suffering from dementia and Alzheimer's disease. I can see the significance of that as regards its impact on services and care provision, and the need for increased expenditure on appropriate drugs.

Resources are finite, and healthcare provision cannot command unlimited support. There are challenges to be faced by the Assembly as we consider the distribution of available resources. Those challenges will require all of us to have more realistic expectations and an understanding of the need to establish priorities. We must all recognise that dementia and Alzheimer's disease are conditions that can knock on any door. They are among the greatest challenges to be faced by health professionals, and communities, in the century that lies ahead.

These illnesses are often hidden from the public gaze, unnoticed, stigmatised, often dealt with by family members and carers who make the best of a very difficult situation — often with little help. They are increasing in frequency, with an estimated 24 million sufferers worldwide — though that statistic may only be the tip of the iceberg when compared to the real situation. It is incumbent on all of us to challenge the myths, remove the stigma and support the carers.

We can all contribute to improving the situation. It is clear that additional resources must be matched by specific actions. There is much that we can do to promote awareness, as we are doing by using the Assembly to educate the public about dementia and Alzheimer's disease. We need, in our health provision, to provide accessible information and support for carers and health staff. Training and education programmes for carers and health professionals will equip people with diagnostic skills so that treatment can be made available at an early stage of the disease.

Policy-makers must be encouraged to see the need for increased resources for care and research. Research is vital in helping us to understand the problem and give effective treatment. The education of the wider community is also a challenge that we can meet. We must encourage everyone to empathise with those who are ill and recognise the burden placed on their families.

I am sure that Members are keen to send a strong message of support from the Assembly to the 35,000 people in Northern Ireland who are directly affected by such illnesses, and to give an assurance to all those involved in caring for them that we understand their situation and will encourage the provision of appropriate support. I support the motion. Go raibh maith agat.

Ms Ní Chuilín: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I support the motion, and I thank Carmel Hanna and Tommy Gallagher for proposing it. Alex Easton mentioned 35,000 people — multiply that figure by three to give a conservative estimate of the number of people who are affected by Alzheimer's disease and other forms of dementia.

As a society, we are living longer and, therefore, we need to consider — as other Members have said — the impact of that on the Health Service. The costs need to be built into future budgets. Alzheimer's disease and other forms of dementia are devastating conditions.

They take away someone's capacity to remember, to make decisions and choices, take responsibility, communicate and do the everyday things that we take for granted. It is a devastating condition. The Alzheimer's Society sent me some information, and I will read out some comments from a woman who has recently been diagnosed at age 62. She says:

"The medication I take seems to be stopping me from getting worse at the moment. But I know that won't last forever — and I am so, so frightened. I live on my own; I have no relatives close by. What am I supposed to do, who am I going to be able to trust to keep me safe and help me lead as full a life as possible. I am just so frightened."

That is the fear that most sufferers have — that they will no longer be able to live the life that they lived previously.

I now turn to the implications for future public health policy in developing countries. We must look at possible means of prevention. Prevention should focus on targets suggested by current evidence: risk factors for vascular disease, including hypertension, smoking and type 2 diabetes. It is quite obvious that more research is needed to look at other risk factors in the developing world, and work in that area has already started.

We must make progress in dementia care in developing countries. There is a lack of awareness among policy-makers, clinicians and the general public, and I will outline the many consequences that that has. People affected by dementia do not seek health services — even if they do, healthcare services tend not to meet their needs. Sufferers are stigmatised, and they can be excluded from residential care. It is quite evident that there are no co-ordinated lobby groups to provide information or advice to Governments. Families are the main caregivers, and they lack support and understanding from others and can experience considerable strain and isolation.

Carmel Hanna and others mentioned the Bamford Review. The Bamford Review report on older people, mental health, and dementia, 'Living Fuller Lives', has not yet been costed, prioritised or implemented. We need to include access to independent information and advocacy services for people with dementia and their carers. We need to focus on earlier diagnosis, intervention and treatment, and we must look at improved access to general health and social care interventions for people with dementia.

Kieran Deeny and my colleague Micky Brady mentioned drug treatments for Alzheimer's that are currently available on the national health service. NICE recommends withdrawing from the NHS the only effective licensed clinical drug treatments for people with early stages of Alzheimer's. NICE has deemed that those drugs are not cost-effective. Kieran mentioned Exelon and Aricept, and they cost £2.50 a day. That matter will be considered by the Department of Health, Social Services and the Public Safety, the Minister and, I hope, the Committee, and a decision will be made sometime in October. We must look at that matter, too. If drugs are effective, they must be prescribed to people, as Kieran has said. If they are not effective, an effective alternative must be found. It is quite clear that people suffering from Alzheimer's and other forms of dementia are already excluded and stigmatised, and we must ensure that we do all that we can for them. It is with pleasure that I support the motion, which seems to have cross-party support. Go raibh maith agat.

Mr G Robinson: I am sure that the present Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety — who I am glad to see in the House today — and his successors will be keenly aware of the changing health priorities that increasing longevity brings. Although the motion gives a large projected number of future sufferers of Alzheimer's, the requirements for services and effective medication will, I am sure, be kept under review by the Department.

Changing demographics require that all public services need to be adaptable and proactive in planning for future requirements. It is also essential that the contribution that family members make in caring for those with Alzheimer's is not underestimated.

The Health Service saves a huge amount of capital expenditure on finding nursing beds or other suitable accommodation because many families keep their loved ones at home. Every Member will be happy to recognise and applaud the contribution of those families, who take such great care of their loved ones. Too often, the dedication and sacrifice of carers goes unnoticed and unrecognised by society in general, and everyone should remember that Alzheimer's disease, or any other form of dementia, affects the family circle and not just the individual.

It is hard to understand fully the dedication required of people caring for relatives with Alzheimer's disease, as they watch their loved ones become a shadow of their former selves. That only adds to the burden of care and is why provision for and access to the support services available for carers must be maintained. It is also why the best clinical treatments should be under constant review to ensure that quality of life for sufferers and carers is kept at the highest and best possible level.

I am more than happy to express my support for world Alzheimer's day and will certainly keep an interest in the provision of services and effective medication for sufferers. I support the motion.

Mr Kennedy: I add my support to the motion and thank those who proposed it. I am not a member of any health committee nor do I pretend to be an expert on health matters, least of all on Alzheimer's disease. In many ways, this is a personal statement, as I am a member of a family that recently lost a loved one to the disease. It has created enormously difficult family circumstances, as, over a six-year period, we have had to come to terms with each of the very trying, and, in many ways, cruel stages of the condition.

The disease began six years ago with ordinary, simple mistakes, such as overlooking minor matters, and as time wore on, those apparently simple mistakes multiplied and were amplified to the extent that we were able to identify the cause of something that had wrought enormous change in one whom we loved so deeply. It led a once very capable, cheerful, efficient, pleasant and outgoing person to retreat almost into a shell, which was enormously difficult for the family to come to terms with. A concerned and loving husband, children, grandchildren and the wider family circle knew that something was not right and that certain things were happening.

Medical help was, of course, made available but was always going to be limited, not least because there is no cure. There may even be issues in the medical profession about the condition. It is important that the medical profession does not write off people who suffer from Alzheimer's disease; finding that balance in the medical profession can sometimes be difficult. Medication is available but not always successful.

Care is available, and, like Mickey Brady, I pay tribute to the Newry branch of the Alzheimer's Society, which gave my family all the help and support that it could. However, as the years passed, it became inevitable that we as a family could no longer provide adequate nursing care for our loved one, and we were then so grateful to Avila nursing home in Bessbrook for taking on that care, attention and love, which was quite exceptional.

5.00 pm

However, that did not completely dispel the feelings of guilt or inadequacy that we, as a family, felt. Although the nursing care was excellent, we somehow felt that we were letting our relative down.

Alzheimer's is an illness that has not been treated with proper respect or recognition, largely because of ignorance. It has been a topic for rather poorly judged jokes, but there is nothing funny about Alzheimer's — ask any family that has been through it with a relative. I hope that, through debates of this nature, we can improve and increase the public understanding of the illness.

Our loved one passed away peacefully on 10 May, and we were gratified and comforted by the fact that she had strong personal faith. Her passing came in the middle of so-called huge, important political events, which were a reminder that there are some events over which we have little or no control. I support the motion.

Mr Gallagher: My contribution comes after a graphic account of another Member's personal experience. Mr Kennedy's speech has sent Members a clear message that our Health Service has a long way to go to meet its response to the needs of people with Alzheimer's.

Every year, there is a rise in the number of people who are identified as sufferers. With that increase, a growing number of families is brought into the net, and must face the challenges and responsibilities of caring for family members. Most of my comments will be directed towards carers, because families in my constituency of Fermanagh and South Tyrone do not understand the reason for the local health trust's many shortcomings. The carers have huge demands placed on their time and on their health. They pay a price with their well-being, yet they still save the Government millions of pounds every year.

There are ongoing serious problems with the level of support that is available to carers. The Western Health and Social Care Trust cannot meet the need of Alzheimer's patients because of budget constraints. Moreover, its care budget is in deficit. Some care packages are being cut, and the vulnerable people to whom the motion refers are being asked to use their pensions and benefits to pay for care packages.

Every week, my constituency office receives enquiries from families who are trying to cope with someone who has dementia. I am sure that other Members have the same experience. Those families are always distressed, particularly over the lack of support that they receive. Instead of being given support, they face cutbacks.

It is completely wrong that someone who is caring for a family member who has Alzheimer's should also have to fight a battle against cuts in their care package. I do not understand the situation. The families find it unsatisfactory and certainly do not understand the situation. In some areas of the west, facilities such as residential care, day care and respite care are either scarce or non-existent. Those areas must be examined urgently and further developed. There are often not enough places in those care homes that have the appropriate skills and facilities to deal with people who have Alzheimer's.

The assessment, around the time of the onset of the illness, should be based on need. My experience is that the assessment is based more on how much money is available in the budget than on the needs of patients — and I am afraid that that is increasingly the case. I am aware of several cases in which basic needs are not being met because of lack of money, and I referred to the extra stress that that puts on those involved with the patients, particularly those who cannot access respite care.

People suffering from Alzheimer's disease can sometimes deteriorate quickly, and that can result in major changes in their overall circumstances. When that happens, the Health Service is slow in providing the extra support needed.

As anyone in the west will know, the area has a poor occupational therapy service and suffers from a shortage of occupational therapists. Money is available for home adaptations and the provision of facilities in the home. However, although the money is available, an occupational therapist is not always available to come to the person's home to carry out the assessment.

Mr Shannon: This bes a topic fowk hae strang feelins aboot an hit's yin A hae spoke aboot monie tims afore es the figures ir vexin' an' far reachin'. I dinnae hae tae gae intae the nummer o' fowk smit wi' this disease i Norlin Airlan noo an in tims tae cum.

Alzheimer's disease is an emotive subject on which I have spoken many times, because the statistics are worrying and far-reaching. I do not need to talk about the number of sufferers that the disease has affected, and will affect, in Northern Ireland.

However, I am at pains to emphasise that the onset of severe dementia can be deferred for years by drug treatment. That sounds positive, but, as ever, life is not that simple. The National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence recommendations mean that in England and Wales, the provision of the drugs that can provide a better quality of life to early-stage sufferers of the disease, at a cost of £2·50 a day, is no longer an option for the NHS.

However, it is the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety who will be making the decision in Northern Ireland, and I take this opportunity to ask him to think long and hard about those drugs and whether he will blindly follow the mainland's lead.

I was greatly moved by Danny Kennedy's speech. His passion and compassion sums up for every Member how the disease affects people. Several people have come into my advice centre, and I remember some who were in the early stages of Alzheimer's disease and who have now passed away.

For a relatively small amount of money, drugs can, and do, make a positive difference to the lives of sufferers and carers. They enable sufferers to remain independent, which decreases the burden of cost for the state, as they are able to stay at home and be cared for by loved ones for longer. That reduces their reliance on the state for care provision.

The number of dementia sufferers is increasing, and it is projected that there will be a 200% increase by 2050. Members will not be here then, but that projection indicates the extent of the problem and how much it will grow. It does not take a mathematician to work out that the state cannot afford the £40,000 per annum needed to care for each person suffering from severe dementia.

It would be better to ensure that the development of the late stages of Alzheimer's disease is delayed for as long as possible, which is what the motion is all about. It is about providing drugs to the sufferers, delaying the onset of dementia and giving families confidence and support when they need it. To deny people in the early stages of Alzheimer's disease the only clinically-effective licensed drugs for their condition is cruel and unfair. Moreover, we must always remember the carers and families who, unashamedly, and without pay or financial assistance, care for their loved ones. They are the mainstay of dementia care in Northern Ireland. I ask Members to support the motion.

I do not pretend to be a statistician; however, the following figures have a purpose. A Dementia UK report states that people caring for dementia sufferers save the public purse over £6 billion a year, £141 million of which is attributable to Northern Ireland. I urge the Minister to look to the future and allow effective drugs to be used where appropriate, helping not only the dementia sufferers, but their families, so that the sufferers can have a few more years of freedom, independence and some semblance of normal life. I support the motion.

Mr McFarland: Alzheimer's disease is one of the most disturbing diseases. To watch a loved one progressively become a total, and sometimes hostile, stranger is devastating. My father suffered from vascular dementia after a series of strokes. The effect is similar to Alzheimer's disease, and my mother cared for him for 10 years before his death. The effect of the demolition process is profound on both sufferer and carer.

It is encouraging that the issue of Alzheimer's disease is now to the forefront. I commend the Alzheimer's Society for its efforts in supporting sufferers and carers. For the record, I commend to the Minister nine recommendations made in a recent 2007 Dementia UK report to the Alzheimer's Society.

Dementia must be made a publicly stated health and social care priority. That must be reflected in plans — something unusual in Northern Ireland — for service development and public spending.

There must be an urgent review of Northern Ireland medical research funding to establish current levels of dementia-focused research. An ambitious funding programme into the causes, prevention, cure and care of dementia sufferers must also be developed.

Dementia carer training should be made a core, and substantial, part of the training curriculum for nurses and social care staff. Standards must be developed in Northern Ireland to include dementia-specific requirements on dementia-care training.

People with dementia need improved home-care support packages, including low-level support to retain their independence and dignity.

Families and friends who provide care must have guaranteed access to carer support of a quality and frequency that meets carer needs. That must include practical support services, carer information, advocacy, training and access to support groups, as well as emergency backup and support and quality respite care for dementia sufferers and their carers.

We must have Government-backed debate on who pays for care to establish a clear and fair balance between the contributions made by the state and by the individual. We will not get into that debate today, but it would be helpful if the Minister were to address the issue with the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety.

5.15 pm

An integrated, comprehensive range of care models for dementia sufferers could be developed to bridge the gap between care at home and care in the care home. Dementia sufferers and their carers need guaranteed access to specialised health, social care and support services.

Finally, Northern Ireland politicians must ensure that dementia sufferers continue to benefit from clinically-effective drugs on the NHS.

That is from a recent academic study, given to the Alzheimer's Society. Those recommendations make sense to me. I commend them to the Minister, and I commend the motion to the House.

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (Mr McGimpsey): I, like all Members in the Chamber, am concerned about meeting the needs of those suffering from Alzheimer's — and other forms of dementia — and of their carers.

I have already stated my commitment to improving the services for people with mental-health problems or learning disabilities, regardless of age. Alzheimer's, and other forms of dementia, seriously impact upon the lives of the families and carers of sufferers.

All Members will be aware of the Bamford Review, which is central in providing us with a future strategy for mental-health and learning-disability services in Northern Ireland. The Bamford Review highlights that 16,000 people aged over 65 currently suffer from dementia in Northern Ireland. In 20 years that figure will have increased to 20,500, and by 2051 to 47,000, which represent increases of 30% and 200% respectively.

Dementia is essentially a disease of the elderly; 10% of people over 75 suffer from dementia, a rate which doubles every five years of increasing age, so that over 40% of people over the age of 85 are likely to be affected. There are also approximately two women for every man affected, which is due to the longer life expectancy of women.

Although dementia is predominantly a disease of the older generation, it can also affect younger people. The Bamford Review reveals that dementia in younger people is a significant problem, with an estimated 500 people affected — although the true figure could be much higher. Early-onset dementia is particularly common in people with Down's syndrome; 40% of those aged 50 with Down's syndrome have signs of dementia. There is no one cause for the early onset of dementia, although research shows that alcohol-related brain damage accounts for 10% of the overall dementia population and 12.5% of dementia in people under 65.

Alzheimer's disease is the most widely recognised form of dementia. The Alzheimer's Society estimates that, of the 16,000 dementia sufferers in Northern Ireland, 10,000 have Alzheimer's. It is a disease that is likely to have existed for a long time, but in the past it was simply accepted that people got confused and forgetful as they got older. Increasing recognition, and increasing lifespan of the population are probably the reasons why Alzheimer's is now more prevalent. However, the possibility that modern lifestyles and toxins could be making this disorder more widespread cannot be ruled out.

Researchers believe that for the majority of sufferers, Alzheimer's disease is due to a combination of different risk factors rather than a single cause. Such factors, which vary from person to person, may include age, genetic predisposition and other diseases or environmental agents. Alcohol can contribute to the onset of dementia, and smoking is now recognised as a possible contributory factor of the disease. It is not unreasonable to suggest that modern lifestyle may be having an impact on the growth of dementia.

Dementia is a cynical syndrome, characterised by the widespread loss of mental functions, such as memory loss, disorientation, changes in personality, self-neglect and uncharacteristic behaviour. It is also important to state that Alzheimer's is a progressive disease, for which there is no cure and from which sufferers will eventually die. Stages of the disease are often characterised as mild, moderate and severe, which require particular and appropriate treatments at each stage. That is why we must ensure that sufferers receive the best help available: services must be tailored towards the needs of the individual and must not be based on assumptions made about the disease. Alzheimer's affects each person in an individual way.

Several drugs for treating dementia are available on prescription in Northern Ireland. These include drugs to treat specific symptoms such as depression or aggression, and anti-dementia drugs, which can improve cognitive function in patients for a limited time by increasing the availability of neurotransmitters in the brain. However, they do not work for all patients, and indications are that they do not slow the progress of specific dementias such as Alzheimer's disease. Anti-dementia drugs are available on prescription in Northern Ireland, and treatment is initiated under the recommendation of a consultant. Any prescriptions can be subsequently repeated and monitored by a GP. Over 44,000 prescriptions are dispensed annually.

The Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety is currently reviewing the NICE guidance on Alzheimer's disease. Several Members mentioned that guidance. The Department is also reviewing a broader NICE clinical guideline on the management of dementia. That includes advice on the use of antipsychotic drugs in treating non-cognitive symptoms of dementia. Antidepressants are also used to treat associated depressive symptoms.

NICE has recommended the use of anti-dementia drugs to treat people who have moderate Alzheimer's disease. The institute is determined that the drugs can be clinically effective when the disease is at a moderate stage. NICE make its recommendations, and although the Government — or I, as Minister — will not question its decisions on the clinical effectiveness of a drug, I will question a drug's application and appropriate use. That is why I have not considered that matter. However, I will do so this autumn and will inform the House in due course.

Drugs are not the only available support for dementia sufferers. There is a unique integrated system of social care in Northern Ireland. That means that integrated care teams can take a holistic approach to assessing and meeting all health and social care needs. I know that there are differential applications of the service in Northern Ireland, but there is a strategy behind that. For instance, the 'Caring for Carers: Recognising, Valuing and Supporting the Caring Role' report, which was published in January 2006, is still a work in progress. When treating and supporting anyone who has dementia, our intent must be to allow those people to live as independent and fulfilled lives as possible. We intend to make the best use of their structural advantage by introducing a single care-assessment process. Work on that is already under way and is being led by a team from the University of Ulster. As well as improving and harmonising standards of assessment, it will reduce unnecessary duplication for users and professionals.

We already have some excellent examples of flexible and responsive community-care services both for people who have dementia and for their carers. In the Northern Health and Social Care Trust, for example, the Causeway Hospital is working in partnership with the Northern Ireland Housing Executive and the Fold Housing Association. They have developed residential, therapeutic and support services on a single site. Voluntary groups, such as the Alzheimer's Society, also have access to those facilities for the delivery of their services.

In 2007–08, an additional £4 million was invested in flexible and responsive community care services for older people, including those who have dementia. Families living with dementia should also have the opportunity to avail of direct payments in order that they can exercise choice and independence in assessing the services that they need. I am not suggesting that everything is perfect or that we have implemented all recommendations, but a strategy exists, and it is very much a work in progress.

As part of the Bamford Review, 'Living Fuller Lives', a consultation report into mental health and learning disabilities, was published. That report deals with future services for those who will develop dementia and/or mental-health issues in later life. The Department is leading on preparing the Government's response to the Bamford Review and is taking the recommendations of that report into consideration. Work has already begun on its implementation. For example, Bamford recommended the establishment of a policy- and practice-development centre for mental-health services for older people. Such a centre would provide information, training, consultation and research and would help to secure comprehensive and relevant dementia-service provision. In May 2007, a regional dementia services development centre for Northern Ireland was launched.

The service was funded for two years by the Atlantic Philanthropies organisation and will be supported by the team at Stirling University until March 2009. The purpose was to enhance the standard of care for people with dementia and their families through education, consultancy, research and development.

I also recently established the Mental Health and Learning Disability Board, and I expect that board to be a champion for people with mental-health and learning disabilities and one of the driving forces in delivering the Bamford reforms. The role of the board is also to advise and challenge me on the approach and pace of implementation of the recommendations.

I am on record as saying that I accept that there is a need to do more to develop mental-health services for the people of Northern Ireland. I am committed to building on what is currently in place and to improving services, in line with the recommendations in the Bamford Review, for sufferers and carers alike. That is increasingly important now that more of us are living longer.

Mrs M Bradley: I would keep the House here all night if I commented on everything that Members have said, but everyone who spoke touched on the same issue, which makes it plain that people do understand some of what dementia brings to a family. I nursed my father before he died of senile dementia, and it is very hard for any family that has to do that. You watch that family member fading away before your eyes, becoming a stranger to you as you become a stranger to him, and you wonder whether there is anything that you can do to stop him from doing some of the things that he does, but everyone is helpless in that situation. It is very, very difficult to cope with. I always respect people who care for those with dementia, because they can never get enough support.

I welcome the Minister to the House today and thank him for telling Members about the current position on treatment and support for sufferers of Alzheimer's disease, and the way forward, but I urge him to do everything in his power to relieve the situation for both the victims of dementia and, particularly, for the families and loved ones who have to live with them. I can say for sure, that it is not easy — it is very, very difficult.

It is good that the motion was brought to the House today. The wording of the information booklet on Alzheimer's disease 'No Time to Lose' is right — there is no time to lose when someone develops dementia. There is no time medically, or for the family, because early intervention is necessary to stop sufferers from being so badly affected that they do not know their family members and their family members do not know them. It is very bad for everyone.

With the help of the Minister, the Assembly is going in the right direction towards helping those affected by Alzheimer's disease.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly expresses support for world Alzheimer's day on 21 September 2007; acknowledges that over 15,000 local people are currently living with Alzheimer's, and that dementia is expected to rise by 27% over the next ten years, due to people living longer, which would result in 20,500 people in Northern Ireland living with dementia by 2017; and notes that maintaining current levels of service provision is not sufficient for such an increase, and that it is important for patients and their carers to receive the best care available and access to clinically effective drugs, when appropriate.

Adjourned at 5.28 pm.

Tuesday 25 September 2007

The Assembly met at 10.30 am (Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr McClarty] in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

Action on Child Poverty

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to two hours for this debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes to propose and 10 minutes to wind up. All other Members will have five minutes to speak.

One amendment has been selected and published on the Marshalled List. The proposer of the amendment will have 10 minutes to propose and five minutes to wind up.

Ms S Ramsey: I beg to move

That this Assembly regards as unacceptable the current level of child poverty; and calls on the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to confirm its commitment to the eradication of child poverty by 2020; and to provide an action plan with clear targets and measurable outcomes to ensure that all children are lifted out of poverty.

Go raibh maith agat. I welcome the opportunity to debate child poverty, as it is one of the most serious and pressing issues that our community and society face. I intend to ask the Deputy First Minister a range of questions, and I hope that he will answer them in the time available. If not, he will have a copy of the Hansard report and he or his officials can contact me either in person or by letter.

From the outset, I should say that I have no problem in accepting the SDLP amendment, and I hope that it and the motion will have clear support across the House.

At present, 124,000 children in the North live in poverty, and that figure is 3% higher than in 2006. Those children live in our communities and our neighbourhoods in families that are living on only 60% of the average family's income. They will go without many of the things that their friends take for granted, and they will experience the loss of dignity and choice that poverty too often brings. Moreover, those 124,000 children will do less well in school.

From their early years and through primary school, children who live in poverty are disadvantaged and do less well. Children who live in areas of high deprivation score less well on verbal skills and early number concepts. Moreover, at primary school, there are clear differentials in test scores between children who live in poverty and those from more affluent backgrounds. By the age of 11, almost 40% of pupils in deprived areas will have failed to reach level 4 at Key Stage 2, compared with 23% of pupils overall. Among children on free school meals, 30% get few or no GCSEs, compared with an average of 14% among all 16-year-olds. Even more concerning is the fact that, although that trend has continued for the past 10 years, little progress has been made on narrowing the gap.

Failure to help those children who live in poverty to do well in school has huge repercussions for their ability to find a route out of poverty. Those with few or no qualifications are twice as likely to be unemployed, and 50% of those who find work are in low-paid employment.

Living in poverty also affects children's health. Statistics produced by the Chief Medical Officer in June 2007 show that the infant mortality rate in the most deprived areas is 33% higher than the average in the North and that children born into poverty are four times more likely to die before the age of 20 than those born into more affluent families.

The rate of teenage pregnancy is much higher in areas of greatest social and economic deprivation. In the most deprived areas, seven out of every 1,000 girls aged 13 to 16 will give birth: in other areas, the figure will be two out of every 1,000. Teenage mothers and their babies face a much higher risk of infant mortality, low birth weight and post-natal depression.

The effects of poverty on individuals, families and communities make it essential for the Minister, on behalf of the Executive, to give a clear commitment to achieving the target of halving child poverty by 2010, on the way to eradicating it fully by 2020. Will the Minister provide that clear commitment?

Will he also confirm that children and poverty will be a priority in setting the public service agreements and funding allocations? In particular, can he assure us that the Executive will give the highest priority in their funding allocations to spending on various services for children and families? The amount that is spent on those services is directly related to poverty. That our child-poverty levels remain high is not unrelated to the fact that we spend a third less on children's services here than is spent in England and Wales.

Furthermore, will the Minister commit to reviewing the targets that are outlined in Lifetime Opportunities to address the needs of those children and families most in poverty and to putting in place the targets and funding that are required to make that commitment a reality? The current range of targets is too general and unfocused to address the needs of those children.

The Assembly must be seen to take effective action on addressing poverty. For that to happen, we need a clear strategy and plan. Will the Minister confirm when that plan will become available?

We know that particular groups of children and families are much more likely to be living in poverty. Children from families in which no adults work are at most risk of severe poverty. A family of two children and two adults currently receives £204 a week in benefits, and a lone parent with two children receives £170 a week. Those benefit levels fall below the Government's poverty line. About 44,000 children live in severe poverty in the North, and they require urgent help to address their needs.

The Government should commit to putting in place a funding programme that will provide additional support and resources for children who live in the most severe poverty and in the most deprived areas to help improve their life chances. That could be done through the creation of children's zones, which, by co-ordinating a funding programme that addresses education, parenting, health and employment needs, would focus on improving children's life chances in specific areas. Such a programme would make those children in the most severe need the centre of help in their communities. Will the Minister commit to a programme of policy and funding that is aimed at creating children's zones to address the needs of children who live in severe poverty?

Other groups of children that are most at risk of poverty are those from families in which either a parent or an adult has a disability. Will the Minister confirm that new targets for the Lifetime Opportunities strategy will address the needs of families with disabilities? Specifically, will a programme of action consider and address the additional cost of disability, and review the opportunities for disabled parents and disabled young people to access training and employment as one mechanism to reduce the level of poverty?

Will the Minister confirm that, as well as the life-cycle approach undertaken in the Lifetime Opportunities strategy, the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister will co-ordinate a range of actions across all Departments to address, in a holistic way, the needs of those most likely to be in poverty?

In conclusion, I thank the Minister for his response to a number of questions during yesterday's Question Time, in which he set out the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister's commitment to addressing this issue. This is a timely debate, and I look forward to the Minister's response. Go raibh maith agat.

Mrs D Kelly: I beg to move the following amendment: Insert after "outcomes"

" , supported by a dedicated budget, "

I thank the proposer of the motion for accepting the amendment. I, too, welcome this important debate, which, in the light of recent tragic suicides, provides a timely reminder of the need for comprehensive action to protect our children and young people.

The welfare of children is a particularly significant issue for the Assembly. All the parties represented in the Chamber stood for election on the promise that they could do better for our young people than the direct rule Administration. Therefore, we cannot simply ignore this issue; we must ensure that it is in the mainstream throughout all the decisions that we take. We must be informed consistently as to the success of the actions that we take, and we must adapt and improve policies gradually if we are to have a chance of eradicating child poverty by 2020.

Yesterday, the Deputy First Minister acknowledged the statutory obligations of the Assembly, particularly those of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, with respect to the eradication of poverty and the provision of a more inclusive and equal society. I welcomed his comments; however, he failed to address the matter of a dedicated budget. Previously, the Lifetime Opportunities strategy had no dedicated budget and no clear evaluation process or action plan. That is another reason why the SDLP welcomes this debate and has tabled an amendment to tie down a dedicated budget.

If child poverty is not tackled on moral grounds, it should be tackled on economic grounds. Along with the shocking misery that child poverty entails, it creates a needless waste of resources, tying up health services with the treatment of preventable illnesses, resulting in underachievement in schools and greater reliance on state benefits. The SDLP has a proud record of prioritising the tackling of disadvantage, and that will remain its focus until all children can be assured of having their basic needs met and of the opportunity to develop their full potential.

The statistics are well rehearsed, and I want to address the significance of those statistics and the failure to begin the work necessary to remedy them. TSN and New TSN have not had dedicated resources, and nor has there been adequate accountability to ensure their effective implementation. Now, the Lifetime Opportunities strategy has no dedicated budget. The children's fund, which was established during the last period of devolution, has been scrapped. Children make up more than a quarter of the population; however, only a fraction of overall funding is spent on children's services.

We are not starting with a blank sheet: a substantial amount of work has already been done by the community and voluntary sector and, in particular, by the Northern Ireland Commissioner for Children and Young People (NICCY), on the type of action plans and policies that are required. For example, in a briefing paper for MLAs, NICCY states:

“NICCY recommends an audit of existing spending within the new Trusts to assess if the needs of children and young people in Northern Ireland are being met in all Trust areas.

Assessing expenditure on children's health services proved extremely difficult as funding is often tied up with other spending across the community and hospital settings. In other research, NICCY has uncovered problems such as a post code lottery in the delivery of services such as speech and language; has identified areas of unmet need across Northern Ireland and has identified barriers in accessing services outside the Belfast area, in areas such as specialist mental health support and in the provision of sexual health services.”

NICCY recommends that further research should be commissioned into socio-economic inequalities in educational attainment, because it believes that the current policy is failing pupils from socially deprived backgrounds and that a change in policy is required.

An opportunity to further reduce the pupil:teacher ratio has been presented by the falling school rolls; and that is what should be recommended, rather than school closures. NICCY recommended that the Department of Education should develop and implement a policy of having smaller class sizes, as research has shown that that has a positive effect on achievement.

In 2005-06, £179 million was spent on provisions for children with special educational needs in Northern Ireland, and from 2005-06 to 2006-07, an additional £53 million was provided. Therefore, NICCY recommended that the Department of Education should measure and evaluate whether that funding has been spent effectively. As the sums involved are huge, there must be accountability, and it must be demonstrated that the special educational needs of children are being met.

Poverty is not just to do with lack of resources. However, our efforts will come to nothing without a dedicated budget to address that lack of resources. Equally important is the need to ensure that there is joined-up working on the issue in areas such as housing, health, childcare, social care, education and recreation. Tackling child poverty requires the focused attention of every Department in some way and merits teamwork on a scale that we never imagined through all our years of conflict and division. The whole point of having the Executive programme funds was to address the gaps and divisions between Departments and encourage interdepartmental working in a way that remains absolutely necessary.

Let the eradication of child poverty be at the top of our new political agenda, foremost among the aims of our Programme for Government and central to our efforts to work together for our community.

Mr Spratt: I support the motion. As elected representatives, it is our duty to act now to better the lives of children. On many occasions, the House has discussed this issue and questioned the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. Members are discussing the matter once again — it is an issue that will not go away.

As other Members have said, the current level of child poverty in Northern Ireland is unacceptable. It is also unacceptable that that level exceeds the rate of child poverty elsewhere in the United Kingdom. Although we can all agree that that is the case, and we can stand in the House and quote statistics, and say time and again that we find the current situation unacceptable, we have to ask what real action we are taking to actually make a difference to children's lives in Northern Ireland. The effect of poverty on a child's life is so widespread that we must ensure that everything possible is done to enable us to aspire to the 2020 target.

The effect of poverty on children is heartbreaking. For many families, the inability to afford a new school uniform has caused difficulties in the past month. The poor diet that is attributed to families in poverty contributes to high levels of obesity in children in Northern Ireland. Poverty affects the formative years of a young life and has been shown to increase the likelihood of exclusion from school and low educational achievement. Poverty affects an individual's entire life. With that in mind, we must ensure that every child is given the opportunity, regardless of social background, to reach his or her full potential.

More than 124,000 children are being brought up in poverty in Northern Ireland — that is 124,000 too many. It is quite clear that more must be done. First, we must reaffirm our aspiration to eradicate child poverty by 2020. To do that, we must get to grips with the root cause. In Northern Ireland, thousands of people have been lifted out of poverty in the past eight years. However, although that is welcome, a closer look at the statistics shows that those who benefited started just below the poverty line and those who were worst off have remained in the same position.

Child poverty is a manifestation of the more deep-rooted problem that is societal breakdown. Evidence shows that deprivation is often passed down through generations. If a family's income is benefits based, it is likely that the children of that family will grow up to be long-term recipients of benefits. Educational achievement follows a similar trend: if a parent has been a low achiever, a child is also likely to be a low achiever.

The keys to eradicating child poverty are to break such a cycle, to remove the dependence on the state, and to reinvigorate the family as an entity. Those goals cannot be achieved by simply throwing money at either parents or children; the family unit must be repaired, the grip that crime and drugs have on communities must be broken, and education must be promoted. It is only when those measures, alongside measuring accurately the levels of poverty in specific areas and formulating particular policies to address them, are implemented that we will get to grips with the real root of the problem and have any chance of meeting the 2020 target.

I support the motion and the amendment.

Mr Elliott: Like other Members, I congratulate the mover of the motion for securing the debate on what is an important matter. I also congratulate the mover of the amendment. As we study the motion, it is important that we remember the definition of poverty as the Government accept it. That definition states that a child is deemed to be in poverty if the household income is below 60% of the UK median. I sometimes wonder whether that calculation will ever increase; if 60% is the accepted figure, obviously, a significant number of children will always be in poverty.

Using that definition, a recent Government report found that in Northern Ireland up to 120,000 children live in varying degrees of poverty, as has been mentioned already. If we add to that the number of children who are deemed to be living in deprivation, the figure increases to 160,000. Those figures are highly disturbing, given that in 1999, the Prime Minister pledged to end child poverty within a generation. A start has been made: in the UK as a whole, 600,000 children have been removed from states of poverty. However, more needs to be done, including here in Northern Ireland. If the targets of halving child poverty by 2010 and eradicating it by 2020 are to be met, action must be consistent and not dip in and out of dealing with the matter. Government policy must focus on such steady action.

It is important for us, as a regional Government, to choose a focal point from which to tackle child poverty. I mentioned the 120,000 children who live in poverty; however, that figure drops by more than 50% if the target group changes from including children living in general poverty to those who live in severe poverty. When we shift the focus, the number of children in Northern Ireland whose situations require what we would term immediate action decreases to approximately 44,000.

We must also ask what the difference is between immediate and longer-term action. Differentiating between levels of poverty does not take away from the overall problem. However, if we were to make such a differentiation, the Assembly and Executive could execute a more strategic plan to help those who are in the most immediate distress. To attempt to tackle an issue of this scale in a single move could lead to miscalculations of judgement and prove erroneous in the long run. Child poverty is too important for us to make mistakes; therefore, if we break the challenge into sizeable pieces, we can be more efficient in our actions and more successful with our long-term aims.

Up to 1.5 million people in the UK live in severe poverty. History dictates that children born to parents who are in long-term receipt of benefits are more likely to be long-term recipients of benefits themselves. That point was highlighted by the previous contributor to the debate, Mr Spratt.

We must adopt a bottom-to-top approach. Based on the definition that I mentioned earlier, some 600,000 UK children who have been freed from poverty since 1999 began life just below the poverty line. We cannot forget about the poorest people in our country, and, by starting with them, our task will be made easier and we will make greater progress towards completely eradicating child poverty.

There have been several failings in the Government's attempts to deal with child poverty. Notably, the Government missed their own 2004-05 target of reducing child poverty by 25%. They have also failed to reduce the number of children who are in severe poverty, with one in five children in the UK still living in a persistently poor household. I wonder how many people in the wider community know what it is like for those children and households who live in poverty. Do those children sometimes have to go without the basic essentials of life such as the food and clothing that many in our community take for granted? Those children cannot have the essentials that the rest of us take for granted.

Mrs Long: I thank the Members who are responsible for tabling both the motion and the amendment. They have created the opportunity to debate this important matter. In common with many other Members, I became involved in politics not least because I wanted a fairer and more equal society, but I wanted governance whereby principles of social justice guide and underpin our decisions and priorities.

Any society is ultimately judged on how it treats its most vulnerable. Our response to child poverty is a tangible measure of our commitment to equality and social justice. The fact that levels of child poverty have risen in Northern Ireland in the past year provides a stark backdrop to the debate.

The UK Government introduced their strategy on child poverty — with a view to halving it by 2010 and eradicating it by 2020 — after the publication of the Joseph Rowntree Foundation study 'What will it take to end child poverty? Firing on all cylinders'. That study indicated that poverty in the UK remains higher in relative terms than in all but three of the other 24 EU member states, with around 2.5 million to 3.5 million people living below the poverty line, depending on the precise measure that is applied.

The UK has one of the worst rates of child poverty in the industrialised world. In Northern Ireland, a range of contributing factors, including a higher-than-average cost of basic goods, such as fuel, food and clothing, the worst levels of low pay in the UK, higher levels of disability, and larger household size combine to make the problem particularly acute.

As the cost of accommodation in Northern Ireland, which was traditionally lower than the UK average, continues to rise rapidly, the financial burden on local families will be compounded further. Child poverty not only has massive implications for children who are raised in poverty, it has significant long-term implications for wider society. Educational low attainment not only stops a child from reaching his or her full potential — which is, in itself, a major failing — but restricts the ability of that child to maximise his or her earning abilities in adult life, thereby perpetuating the poverty gap through generations.

We cannot ignore the loss of revenue caused by missed taxes and the payment of benefits due to the reduced future employment and earnings prospects of those who grow up poor. Similarly, poor nutrition in childhood has a significant impact on life expectancy and the individual's long-term health, with all the personal and financial consequences for the individual and wider society that that entails. Investment in the eradication of child poverty is, therefore, not only a moral imperative, but makes good economic and social sense.

Poverty is often a hidden problem in Northern Ireland, and, as the gulf between rich and poor continues to grow, many people are struggling to reach a decent basic standard of living. If both parents are on benefits, their household income will automatically place them below the poverty line. However, sources have estimated that the majority of poor children — 54% — live in a household in which at least one adult is in work. That statistic is clearly linked to the low-pay culture that affects many families locally. In light of those figures, any reduction of the national minimum wage outside of London would clearly serve to push more families deeper into poverty, rather than lift them out of it, and must, therefore, be resisted robustly by the Assembly.

11.00 am

The second report of the House of Commons Select Committee on Work and Pensions on child poverty, from 2003-04, recognised that if the Government are to cut child poverty levels, they need to increase efforts across all the Departments whose responsibilities touch on the issue. As Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, I recognise that, although it is that Office's responsibility to formulate policy in those cross-cutting areas, the responsibility for delivery more often than not lies with a range of other Departments and under the control of other Ministers.

We must, therefore, ensure collectively that an effective mechanism for scrutiny exists, not only of the overarching strategy, but of the individual contributions that Departments make in delivering on those objectives. Given that such co-ordinated action from a number of Departments is required, child poverty will be effectively addressed only if it is clearly identified as a high-level Executive priority. For that to be meaningful, the Executive must, at the earliest opportunity, formally endorse the targets that are outlined in the motion and formulate a clear strategy for the delivery of measurable outcomes, so that child poverty can be formally prioritised in the current Programme for Government, comprehensive spending review and budgeting round. Without a dedicated budget, we will be offering people little more than tea and sympathy, as Dolores Kelly said. Time is, therefore, short. We need to move on the issue urgently if we are to avoid condemning another generation of children to a childhood in poverty and a future of limited opportunities. I, therefore, endorse the motion and the amendment.

Mr Shannon: I support the motion and thank the Members who tabled it. The issue is close to my heart and to that of many other Members.

I begin with an example. A seven-year-old child slogs his way through the busy street, remembering to hold tightly the hand of his little sister. He carries her schoolbag through the door. She looks at him and asks, "Is there anything to eat?" He knows that payday has not come yet and there will be nothing to be found, so he says, "We are being healthy today — just water."

That sounds like an advert asking people to sponsor a child in Africa, but, in fact, that story is played out in the Province every day. That child is among the one in seven children who do not get three meals a day. It is as basic as that: children are going hungry and not getting the nutritional food that is vital to their health and development. They are given free school meals — in a surprising number of cases, that is the only decent food that they get each day.

What is poverty? According to Dictionary.com, it is:

"the state or condition of having little or no money, goods, or means of support; condition of being poor".

In Northern Ireland, that is the life of 29% of the children whom we represent — well over 100,000 people who are all too often hungry. That figure has risen by 3% since last year. Even more shocking, one in 10 children is growing up in "severe poverty", which equates to 44,000 children in the Province. If statistics are needed, they are clearly there.

Northern Ireland is known for its generosity in giving to the needy. Therefore, how is it that some of our own are being neglected? That is a serious question that cannot be answered by citing any one factor. Basic items such as fuel, food and clothing are more expensive here than in other parts of the United Kingdom. The levels of pay are not as high here as they are on the UK mainland. Throw into the pot the fact that, by and large, families are larger here as well and the reduction in child support for each additional child leaves us with a meal that is not so palatable.

Few could argue with the statistics. If anyone is unsure that the situation is as bad as it is made out to be, they should talk to the teachers and dinner ladies, who see a lot. Talk to the youth workers in the Girls' Brigade or the Boys' Brigade: they will be able to point out a child or two who does not have it easy and for whom they bring in extra snacks and food. Some youth workers have told me that they have seen children who cannot afford the 50p weekly contribution and whose "I forgot" excuse is lost behind the embarrassment in their eyes.

Those kids should not be ashamed — they should be taken care of. A full stomach and clothes that fit are basic human rights that too many are not getting. It has been shown that families in which only one or neither parent works are at higher risk of living in poverty. Those are only some of the factors. As I have said before, if there is an illness or disability, whether mental or physical, the family is under more pressure and more strain to ensure that the affected person has what is needed, while the rest of the family scrape by.

It is said to be 25% more expensive to raise a child with disabilities, and yet the wages here are not high enough. Many parents have to leave work so that they can cope, and, therefore, the problems are compounded rather than eased. The rest of the children in the family lack attention and some necessities, as their parents struggle to give all their children some semblance of life.

Around 56% of households with one or more people with disabilities are living in poverty. That is also true when a family member has cancer. Cancer affects one in three people — and those statistics were mentioned in a recent debate. Many families do their best to keep their loved ones at home. They buy the necessary food, keep the heating on all day to ensure warmth, pay for hospital parking — sometimes for all day — take time of work and pay for prescriptions. That all adds to the emotional and financial problems of families already on the breadline.

Child poverty is a sad reality in the Province, and it must be addressed. We must implement a system to set goals to ensure the eradication of child poverty in this generation. That is not impossible — it can be done. We have a duty to help the 100,000 children who are living lives of worry and shame and with parents who are depressed about their lack of money. We are a nation known for its generosity when disaster strikes other regions. Let us see to our own nation with the same mentality and honesty and do all that we can for our children. I support the motion.

Miss McIlveen: Figures vary on how many children are defined as living in poverty in Northern Ireland. Current Government figures from the family resources survey state that 130,000 children live in poverty. The households below average income figures for 2005-06 show that around 124,000 children live in poverty. Other sources place that figure in and around 100,000. Whatever the figure, it is clear that a problem exists.

'Severe Child Poverty in the UK', a report by Save the Children, revealed that 44,000 children in Northern Ireland experience severe poverty. That means that families are getting by on less than £7,000 a year, which is £12,000 a year less than the national average income. Such families feel socially excluded. Children living in such circumstances are not eating healthy food and are not living in well-heated conditions. Last week, the Assembly discussed the impact that fuel poverty has on children, and this debate goes hand in hand with that.

Children need to be given the appropriate launch pad in life: warm homes, healthy food, a quality education and job opportunities. That is the only way to stop the cycle of poverty and benefit Northern Ireland as a whole.

Save the Children has called for the following measures: the introduction of seasonal grants to help those families on low incomes to cover expensive times of the year; investment of £4 billion from central Government; an action plan on severe child poverty to ensure that policies are targeted at those in severe poverty; significant resources to promote take-up and knowledge of benefit and tax credit entitlements; and reform of the social fund to ensure that it is an effective anti-poverty tool. Those are noble, but short-term, measures that will address the symptoms but not the cause.

Northern Ireland has more of its population not in paid work than any other region in the UK: 30% of our working-age population are not in paid work. Amazingly, according to statistics from the labour force survey, only 7% of those people want to work.

Action must be taken immediately to assist those in severe poverty, but we must also be mindful of creating a benefit-reliant society and of creating the perception that people would be better off not working. There is no simple solution to the problem that we face in Northern Ireland. We need a comprehensive plan for addressing poverty, which must include, not only additional support for those most in need, but the creation of an environment in which those who are able to work, but do not want to, are persuaded to work and acquire the appropriate skills and qualifications to contribute to society.

We also need to educate those children and young people about family planning so that they do not inadvertently fall into the poverty trap. The rate of teenage pregnancies for girls aged between 13 and 16 is three times the average. That is both a cause and a consequence of health inequalities and social exclusion. Childcare provision must also be reviewed to facilitate lone parents and those families whose non-working parent wishes to contribute a second income to the family. The barriers that prevent parents from obtaining and keeping employment must be removed.

I have not forgotten those people who cannot work. Some have been left scarred by our divided society, and others have long-term debilitating illnesses. Society has a duty to care for and provide as comfortable a life as possible for those people.

The Northern Ireland Executive are committed to halving child poverty by 2010 and to eradicating it by 2020. That is a huge task, and I look forward to hearing what plans the Deputy First Minister will offer to fulfil those obligations.

Mr Beggs: I support the motion and the amendment. I must also declare an interest as a member of the New Horizon Sure Start committee, which operates in Carrickfergus and Larne. I thank Barnardo's, Save the Children and the Assembly's Research Services for their guidance on this subject.

Recently, we failed to meet the UK target of reducing child poverty by 25% by 2006. There must be more than paper strategies to achieve that, and other, more ambitious, targets, by 2010 and 2020. Specific actions and monetary commitments are required to enable that to happen.

How can child poverty be eradicated? The Labour Government in Westminster laud the child tax credit as their main mechanism for eradicating child poverty. In 2004-05, they indicated that over £3,000 had been added to the incomes of qualifying families in Northern Ireland. Giving additional money is an easy way to lift children out of poverty. However, that is not within the gift of the Assembly, and, owing to budget gaps, unfortunately, it also seems to be difficult for HM Treasury to address.

Barnardo's has stated that barriers to work exist. The best way that I can see of tackling child poverty is for the Assembly to assist individuals into education and, ultimately, work so that they can reach their full potential and benefit their families.

On the subject of employment, Barnardo's has stated that there must be a review to examine the best way of supporting second earners into the labour market and that that support would be one more way of lifting more families out of poverty. It also said that the introduction of the full jobcentre plus programme and the New Deal for families would enable more parents, particularly lone parents, to return to work. It is within the gift of the Assembly to make funding available for such a scheme in Northern Ireland.

A devolved Assembly is capable of other actions. Previously, there was the Executive programme fund for children and young people, which ended with the demise of the first Assembly. In 2006, there was a ministerial announcement of a funding package of £100 million for children and young people. With only six months until the end of that funding, which has enabled a great deal of positive work, there is concern in the voluntary and community sector because there has been no news of what will replace it. That funding is important because, on many occasions, it was cross-departmental and allowed Departments to think differently and work more effectively, so I hope that the Minister will be able to tell Members what will happen with that.

I have worked with other Members on the all-party group on children and young people. A recent letter from the Minister of Finance and Personnel stated that:

"Central funding streams, by their very nature, are intended to provide support to specific projects for a finite period only."

Funding would then be reassessed.

I wish to highlight the fact that it took a considerable time for a Sure Start group that I am involved with to make leasing arrangements with education and library boards and, after we had a building, to get staff. It takes time for such actions to bed in. Sufficient time must be given to determine whether the results are satisfactory. I hope that sufficient time will be given, so that the positive work of that scheme can be seen to bear fruit.

11.15 am

Education and parental support is the best way forward. Government must assist people to improve their children's lot, to give them better educational attainment and qualifications and, ultimately, to contribute to the economy. In that way, they will rise from their situation of poverty. I hope that funding will continue to be available to enable some of the most deprived children in our communities to reach a better level of attainment.

The Chairperson of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister (Mr Kennedy): I apologise to the House and to the proposers of the motion for my absence during the earlier part of the debate. I am afraid that I was caught out by the change in timings.

As Chairperson of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister, I welcome the opportunity to debate this most important issue. In this day and age, the level of child poverty in Northern Ireland is deplorable and unacceptable.

The statistics paint a very depressing picture. In recent questions for written answer, the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister said that in 2002-03, approximately 26%, or 114,000 children, were living in relative income poverty. Although the figure was slightly reduced in 2004-05 to approximately 24%, or 101,000 children, the numbers are alarming.

A report published this year by Barnardo's also showed the severity of the problem by stating that:

"There are currently 100,000 children living in officially defined levels of poverty in communities across Northern Ireland.

A further group are living in severe poverty; around 44,000 children and young people will be missing out on regular items that the rest of the community see as essential".

The statistics are clear: the problem is huge, and action must be taken now.

Some people might say that action is being taken. Lifetime Opportunities, the Government's anti-poverty and social inclusion strategy for Northern Ireland, which was launched in 2006 under the previous direct rule Administration — and is, according to the Deputy First Minister's answer yesterday, being considered by the Executive — pledged to halve child poverty by 2010 and end it by 2020. Those are ambitious, and worthy, goals. However, questions are already being asked about the ability of the strategy to achieve them.

The Committee has raised the issue of child poverty with the Children's Commissioner and several organisations, and has identified it as one of its key priorities. The Committee's concern is such that child poverty will be the subject of its first inquiry, and terms of reference for that will be considered at its first meeting tomorrow.

Although I do not want to pre-empt the Committee's considerations and decisions on the shape of the inquiry, I hope that it enables us to focus on the capability of the current strategy to achieve its ambitious goals and that it will provide us with an opportunity to identify further key actions in the remit of the devolved Administration that can be taken to tackle child poverty. I also hope that the inquiry will be short and sharp, enabling the Committee to report to the Assembly on this most important issue at the earliest opportunity.

I welcome the commitment given by the Deputy First Minister in June that the anti-poverty and social inclusion strategy is an absolute priority for him and for the First Minister. The Committee will scrutinise the draft Programme for Government and the draft Budget to ensure that tackling child poverty has been given the cross-cutting priority that it deserves and that the necessary resources are provided to ensure that the plans can be fully implemented. We will be looking for actions and resources that back up that commitment.

As an Ulster Unionist representative, my personal view is that, although the overall goals of the anti-poverty strategy are commendable, the lack of definitive short- and medium-term targets and actions and a detailed implementation plan means that the challenge that those goals present is unlikely to be met.

Specific areas of concern for me, with regard to the strategy, include the proposals for the development of only four children's centres. That number is, in my view, totally inadequate, and I hope that as part of the Budget discussions, the issue will be given much more priority and the planned number will be greatly increased.

As a former Chairman of the Committee for Education, during a previous mandate of the Assembly, I was keenly aware of the poor levels of numeracy and literacy skills, and the associated problems of educational underachievement.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. The Member's time is up.

The Deputy First Minister (Mr M McGuinness):

Thank you, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank all the Members who contributed to the debate. I welcome the opportunity to address the House on the important subject of child poverty, and, in doing so, I hope that Members will be reassured that both the First Minister and I take the issue seriously. Poverty, and particularly child poverty, is an emotive subject — and rightly so. Many of today's contributions were undoubtedly heartfelt.

Over 120,000 of our children are recognised as being in relative poverty. Of that number, almost half are from one-parent households. Furthermore, when the statistics are examined more closely, they show that, in addition to the 120,000, there are another 46,000 children deemed as being at risk of poverty.

Those figures equate to almost 28% of the total child population, which does not compare well to our European neighbours. The best figures in Europe are around 10%. Poland is worst off, coming in only marginally above our figures at 29%. Taken as a whole, the average in England, Scotland, Wales and the North is 22%. The average in the Republic of Ireland is around 23%. Those statistics are staggering, by any standards, and are an indictment of how we, as a society, have gone about tackling such issues in the past.

Statistics, though, do not tell the whole story. I want to take a moment to put those figures in context for Members, and to explain what being in poverty, or at risk of poverty, actually means to the individuals concerned. It means not having the money to provide for some of the basic necessities that the rest of us take for granted. It means not being in a position to take part in educational or leisure activities that are seen as developmental.

By way of an example, I will highlight a case study that recently came to my attention. A lone parent, who left her job because of childcare problems, recently said that she really has to watch her money. She cannot just walk into a supermarket and buy what she wants. She looks at what is on offer and what she can afford, not what is healthy. If the choice is a bag of apples or a packet of sausages and a loaf of bread, she chooses the sausages and tries to make a meal with them for a couple of nights. She struggles on her own with children, trying to get by. The children come first, and she copes by doing without.

At a time when everyone is looking to the Assembly to make a positive difference in their lives, it is vital that the Assembly does not lose sight of those in our society who are most in need and that we address that need as a priority. Child poverty cannot be considered in isolation. Poverty and all its manifestations are a blight on society and an issue that both the First Minister and I are absolutely committed to tackling.

When we speak of child poverty, we are talking about children in our society who live in families that have an income below, or close to, that considered as placing them at risk of poverty.

It is not too great a stretch of the imagination to recognise that lone-parent households feature prominently in that group. Some 45% of adults in lone-parent households are classed as economically inactive, a fact that practically guarantees that children from those families will be among the most disadvantaged in our society.

Consequently, we have examined factors which impact on lone parents and contribute to their social exclusion. That work has been greatly influenced by the policies and approaches taken in other jurisdictions that have shared their experiences through, for example, the British-Irish Council. That work is nearing conclusion, and I hope to report to the Executive on its findings and recommendations in the coming months.

Action to improve the opportunities and life chances of lone parents will undoubtedly have a significant impact on levels of child poverty here. Poverty is not just about income; as I have said, children from disadvantaged backgrounds are at greater risk of underperforming educationally and of suffering from poor diet and poor housing conditions. Together, these factors place the next generation at risk of not achieving its potential and, therefore, of not benefiting from economic growth and rising prosperity. Members must recognise that, in order to break the recurring cycle of inter-generational disadvantage, we need to tackle aspects of poverty and social exclusion that impact on society from childhood and throughout life. Tackling child poverty will ensure that we treat problems at source and, I hope, prevent poverty, as well as providing a route out of it.

The Executive do not control all the policy levers necessary to tackle child poverty. Tax and benefit policies are not matters for this Administration, and it is generally accepted that tax credits, in particular, have greatly helped in reducing child poverty in recent years. We do, however, control many other important policy levers. In that context, we need to look at ways to maximise job opportunities and enhance the skills and education of those who can participate in the labour market; ensure that people get the benefits to which they are entitled; improve public services for all; and provide support for parents during key transition phases in the lives of their children.

It is, ultimately, for the Executive to agree on the priorities in tackling poverty. The Executive have a statutory duty to do so, specified in section 16 of the St Andrews Agreement Act 2006, which requires the Executive to:

“adopt a strategy ... to tackle poverty, social exclusion and patterns of deprivation based on objective need.”

Just prior to the restoration of the Assembly, Peter Hain launched Lifetime Opportunities, the Government's strategy for tackling poverty and social exclusion. That strategy was the result of the previous devolved Administration's commitment to review the New TSN policy work that had continued during suspension.

Prior to restoration, the shadow Committee on the Programme for Government looked closely at Lifetime Opportunities and took evidence from a wide range of stakeholders. The conclusions are important and the Executive must have regard to them when they decide the future direction of policy. In particular, the Committee felt that Lifetime Opportunities, which used a life-cycle approach, provided a good framework for addressing poverty and social exclusion. However, the Committee wanted to see it strengthened in a number of ways. It felt that the strategy and its main goals and priorities should be adopted by a restored Executive, but wanted to see greater emphasis on the specific needs of certain groups, such as disabled people and lone parents. The Committee agreed with the strong views of many from whom it took evidence that the strategy would be greatly improved with the adoption of specific short- and medium-term targets, action plans and indicators, so that progress in reducing poverty could be properly measured. The Committee also highlighted the importance of resources to implement the strategy properly and recommended that resources be skewed towards disadvantaged areas, including small pockets of deprivation and individual poverty.

In bringing specific recommendations to the Executive Committee, the First Minister and I will pay close attention to the conclusions of the shadow Programme for Government Committee and the representations that have been made to us by organisations.

11.30 am

We are anxious to use this unprecedented opportunity to tackle the problem of child poverty once and for all. Although the strategic approach that we decide on will be important, ultimately, it will be the actions taken across the full range of Government programmes that will make the difference to people's lives. Those areas include education, health, employment, housing, transport and rural development.

Several issues were raised in the course of Members' contributions. Sue Ramsey mentioned the review of the targets in the Lifetime Opportunities strategy. As I have stated, the First Minister and I are examining Lifetime Opportunities with a view to bringing proposals to the Executive to discharge our statutory duty under the St Andrew's Agreement. Part of that process will be to examine the targets and indicators that we set to tackle poverty.

Dolores Kelly referred to a dedicated budget, which is the subject of the amendment. I want to ensure that resources and efforts are targeted to help those most in need. The Executive must agree on priorities for tackling poverty to secure the best results for all children. The process of agreeing the Programme for Government is well under way and will be subject to Executive approval. All Ministers, including Margaret Ritchie from the SDLP, will be involved in implementing the Programme for Government, and the amendment will be noted by all Members of the Executive as that work goes ahead.

I welcome the interest in child poverty from the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, of which Danny Kennedy is Chairperson. I look forward to the outcome of its inquiry, and I will be happy to consider its findings as part of our considerations for the Lifetime Opportunity strategy.

Along with a number of other Members, Dolores Kelly mentioned educational disadvantage and the work undertaken by the Northern Ireland Commissioner for Children and Young People, Patricia Lewsley. The First Minister and I have met with the Commissioner, whose work is undoubtedly valuable, and whose relationship we believe to be important. Dolores Kelly also mentioned accountability as regards special educational needs, which ultimately comes back to the Assembly, and the electorate.

Jimmy Spratt spoke about low educational achievement, and how poverty affects children, particularly in relation to obesity. He also spoke about the root causes of child poverty and the need to break the cycle of poverty, with which I agree.

Naomi Long explained eloquently that her motivation in opting for a political career was to improve the living circumstances for citizens, particularly the most disadvantaged. I have no doubt that every Member of the Assembly is driven by the same motivation and that all Members are anxious, not just to debate the issue of eradicating child poverty, but to make real progress.

Jim Shannon spoke in a heartfelt way about how unemployment affects child poverty, and described the difficulties, and the cost, borne by cancer sufferers and those with mental and physical disabilities when attending hospital services. He spoke about the duty all of us must recognise to do everything that we can for all children, with which I agree absolutely.

Michelle McIlveen mentioned those who are unable to work due to illness and other circumstances. Members are conscious of how that can affect citizens. I agree with everything that Roy Beggs Jnr said when he spoke about the need to encourage more people to become economically active and the importance of Sure Start and education.

In conclusion, the First Minister and I want to see child poverty halved by 2010 and eradicated by 2020. I want to see child poverty prioritised in the public service agreements. The First Minister and I assure Members that in our recommendations to the Executive Committee, we will stress the need to set clear targets and measurable outcomes, and implement specific actions through departmental programmes.

With continued economic growth and political stability, there is possibly the best opportunity that there has been for decades to lead the fight against poverty and social exclusion. I assure the House that the First Minister and I intend to take the matter forward as a top priority.

Mrs M Bradley: I support the amendment. I want to acknowledge the contribution that Members have made to the debate. Different Members discussed different aspects of child poverty, but we all have the same view. The Assembly is at one on this important matter, and I welcome the Deputy First Minister's attendance at the debate.

Poverty has wide-ranging consequences for families. It causes stress, depression and suicide, which can be attributed to a lack of self-esteem, self-respect, life achievements and goals. The economic situations of many must be improved. As politicians, we must not ignore people's basic rights to live a content, happy life and to have enough to get through without hardship and long-term financial worries.

Shantallow is an area in the Foyle constituency, which I represent, where the level of deprivation is at 70%. It is neither good nor decent for people to have to live in those circumstances. When he was the Deputy First Minister of the last Assembly, my party leader created the children's fund. Sadly, it was removed during direct rule. It must be reinstated.

I welcome the Deputy First Minister's comments. However, I am somewhat disappointed that he told the House that budgets would be noted. That is not enough: there must be a guarantee from the Deputy First Minister.

Dolores Kelly said that the Assembly is not starting from scratch: the Northern Ireland Commissioner for Children and Young People's report has given it a good starting point.

Sue Ramsey seeks clearer targets, and she gave the House many statistics.

Jimmy Spratt said that every child deserves the same opportunities.

Tom Elliott wants child poverty to be eradicated.

Naomi Long discussed high levels of disability, poor nutrition and its effects on health. She also referred to the gulf between the rich and the less well off.

Michelle McIlveen mentioned the warm homes scheme and low incomes. She said that funding of £4 million from central Government is essential and that there must be a comprehensive plan.

Jim Shannon mentioned larger families and said that Members should talk to teachers and dinner ladies to get a feel for the poverty that exists: some children cannot afford to bring 50p to school and thereby miss out on certain activities.

Roy Beggs said that sufficient time must be given to allow plans to work, and he asked that funding be continued.

Danny Kennedy said that child poverty is one of the most important issues in society and that it is deplorable that it is at such a high level in Northern Ireland, where one in five children lives in poverty.

The Deputy First Minister told the House that he takes the matter seriously. I do not doubt that. It is terrible that some people do not have enough money to buy necessities that are taken for granted by others. The Minister said that he recognises that and that budgets will be noted. However, the Assembly wants guarantees. His attendance at the debate is welcome. I thank everyone who took part. It was a useful debate and shows that the Assembly is trying to work together for a common aim. When that happens, it is successful. Politics does not come into the situation when there are children going hungry. I am glad that there is consensus on this, and I hope that the Assembly's aims will be achieved.

Ms Ní Chuilín: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Ba mhaith liom tacaíocht a thabhairt don rún.

Mary Bradley is correct: it has been a good debate, which has shown that there is a desire among Members to eradicate child poverty. I welcome the motion and the focus that it has brought to the issue in the Assembly. The Minister has given it particular attention. There is consensus that the issue must be dealt with and progress made.

I also remind Members of the failure to address properly the poverty that so many children and families in our communities experience. That failure means that those children are not ready to participate fully in schools; therefore, they feel that they have failed in education. It is for us, not them, to improve their lives. It also means that children leave school with few, or no, qualifications, and that they cannot — or will not — see a clear route to a better future through productive learning. Every Member who spoke in the debate touched on that point.

Jim Shannon talked about the humiliation experienced by children who have to make excuses for not having money to pay for school activities. None of us can ignore that. The failure to address poverty also means, as most Members said, that children will suffer ill health and will be at greater risk of having accidents. They will also be at risk of being part of the increasing rate of teenage pregnancies that is prevalent in the most deprived areas. Teenage pregnancies often result in a cycle of poverty and social exclusion. Parents who face generational poverty, to which Jimmy Spratt referred, have not found a route out of their poverty, and we must provide that route for them.

What does all that mean? It means that good policies can make a difference. The Assembly — and the Executive in particular — can begin to implement specific measures that will address the needs of people here who live in long-term poverty. It means that we should make clear commitments to achieve the targets of, first, taking 50,000 local children out of poverty by 2010, and, secondly, eradicating all child poverty by 2020.

We must create opportunities to make children who live in the most deprived areas ready for school and able to achieve when there. It means that it is essential that we implement and invest in the kinds of initiatives that will have an impact on all the problems that I have discussed. It also means that we need to fund initiatives that will allow children in the most deprived areas to achieve educationally and will permit social development. As Sue Ramsey mentioned, we must create specific children's zones. That will involve commitments from many Ministers, including the Minister for Social Development; the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety; the Minister of Education; and the Minister of the Environment. However, we all have a responsibility in the matter.

Funding strategies need to be initiated to assist lone parents to get back to employment by providing them with the correct support, advice, and, importantly, access to affordable childcare and transport. Again, those strategies will involve the Executive. It means focusing on those families that are most at risk. In particular, we need to look at the kind of support that is needed to allow disabled parents to have access to work and to enable young disabled people to receive meaningful training and gain employment.

We need to focus on how we can help low-income families at those times of the year when they face financial difficulties. Many families who receive free school meals find that school holidays are a time of survival. Making once-a-year — or twice-a-year — payments to poor families at those difficult times could make a significant difference to their quality of life.

We are talking about the eradication of child poverty. Naomi Long is 100% correct when she says that we must use terms such as equality and social justice when talking about child poverty. We must consider the matter in a human-rights context. The cost of living is higher here, and we have higher levels of disability, and increasing accommodation costs. Many families, through lack of affordable or social housing, have to find private accommodation, often having to pay the rental shortfall themselves. That in turn puts additional pressure on them.

Geographically, we have more areas of deprivation and more areas that face higher and multiple levels of deprivation. For example, people who live in areas of multiple deprivation and interface areas also experience higher levels of violence, suicide, and self-harm. As Dolores Kelly, Mary Bradley and other Members have mentioned, those people may experience reduced self-esteem and self-confidence. We must examine the links between poverty and ill health, and between poverty and poor emotional health.

Michelle McIlveen spoke at length about the Save the Children research, and all that research is simply sitting there. We need to take action and remove the barriers. Danny Kennedy talked about that in his capacity as Chairperson of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, and as a party member. There are concerns about the lack of childcare centres across the North.

The Deputy First Minister, on behalf of the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, spoke about people not having the means to provide the basic necessities, and that often means having to choose between heating or eating — particularly at this time of year. We talked about that in the Assembly last week. It also involves having to make other choices — for example, the choice between spending money on basic necessities or on healthy food, or on leisure activities that many of us take for granted, such as swimming. It is a constant struggle. We cannot look at child poverty in isolation — we must look at the benefits system and whether aspects of it may need to be reformed.

The St Andrews Agreement talked about child poverty, social exclusion and the need to deliver services based on objective need. Resources will have to be skewed to take account of that objective need.

I agree with other Members' remarks that we must go beyond the sentiments of these debates, worthy though they are. We are here to take part in such debates, but action needs to be taken, too. I welcome the input of all the Members today. We must consider how we can eradicate child poverty, and the Assembly must monitor any action taken. We must ensure that we move forward to improve the lives of all our children, not just some, and ensure that they are protected and cherished. I support the motion, as amended.

Question, That the amendment be made, put and agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly regards as unacceptable the current level of child poverty; and calls on the Office of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister to confirm its commitment to the eradication of child poverty by 2020; and to provide an action plan with clear targets and measurable outcomes, supported by a dedicated budget, to ensure that all children are lifted out of poverty.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Members will know that the Business Committee has arranged to meet at lunchtime. I propose, therefore, by leave of the Assembly, to suspend the sitting until 1.30 pm, when the Minister for Regional Development will make his statement.

The Minister for Regional Development (Mr Murphy): On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. I accept that it is up to the Business Committee, in conjunction with the Speaker's Office and the Business Office, to structure the business for the day. However, could you perhaps advise the Business Committee that both the Minister of the Environment and I are available to make our statements. It is not through our activity, or inactivity, that the statements cannot be taken before the lunch break.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I thank the Member for his point of order, and the Business Committee will be notified of his remarks at 12.15 pm.

The sitting was suspended at 11.48 am.

On resuming (Mr Speaker in the Chair) —
1.32 pm

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT

North/South Ministerial Council: Transport

Mr Speaker: I apologise to Members for the absence of the Deputy Speaker.

I have received notice from the Minister for Regional Development that he wishes to make a statement on the North/South Ministerial Council meeting on transport.

The Minister for Regional Development (Mr Murphy): Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. In compliance with section 52 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998, I wish to make the following report on the third meeting of the North/South Ministerial Council (NSMC) in the transport sector, held in the Manor House Hotel, Killadeas on 14 September 2007.

The Executive were represented by the Minister of the Environment, Arlene Foster MLA, and me. The Irish Government were represented by the Minister for Transport and the Marine, Noel Dempsey TD. The Council noted and welcomed the progress made since the previous meeting in April 2002 and the opportunity to meet to discuss opportunities for cross-border co-operation in strategic transport planning and road safety.

The Council discussed the steps necessary to make progress on the A5 and A8 major road projects. Members will be aware of the Irish Government's intention to make £400 million available to help fund the provision of dual-carriageway standards on routes in the North serving the north-west gateway and, on the eastern seaboard, the completion of the dual-carriageway corridor from Belfast to Larne. I welcome that substantial investment, which will help fund an unprecedented package of major road improvement schemes in the North.

The dualling of the remaining sections of the A8 on the eastern seaboard corridor will provide an improved connection between the ports of Larne, Belfast, and indeed, Dublin. A dual carriageway from Derry to the border at Aghnacloy will provide an immense economic opportunity for the north-west. Journey times between the north-west and Dublin will be significantly improved, and road safety will be enhanced. Those projects, combined with the current dualling programme on the A6, will greatly improve transportation links between Ireland's major cities.

The Council agreed the steps necessary to make progress on the A5 and A8 projects. It agreed the payment process, taking into account that progress on the A8 will be the responsibility of the Executive and their agencies. The Council also agreed to the formation by October 2007 of a management structure for the A5 project to evaluate and monitor progress as required, and the early appointment of consultants to enable a route corridor study of the A5 to commence.

The Council noted and welcomed the Irish Government's intention to fund the replacement of cross-border bridges at Annaghroe and Knocknaginny on the Tyrone/Monaghan border. The replacement of those bridges will enhance cross-border linkages and the social and economic well-being of the immediate vicinities on both sides of the border. Construction work is expected to begin in 2008, and Roads Service will play its part in improving approach roads in the North and co-operate closely with Monaghan County Council officials to ensure that work is co-ordinated.

The Council noted the Irish Government's proposal for the construction of a bridge at Narrow Water, linking County Louth and County Down. The Irish Government have granted funding to Louth County Council to undertake preliminary technical work on that proposal. They will keep the matter under review and will draw on the results of the technical work when they are available.

The rail link between Belfast and Dublin is a key service, joining two major population and commercial centres. The link is designated as part of the Trans-European Network of rail services across the European Union. The success of the current service is a credit to the close working relationship that exists between Northern Ireland Railways and Iarnród Éireann. That continuing co-operation will be invaluable in bringing about further improvements to the service.

The Council noted the discussions that were taking place between Iarnród Éireann and Translink on plans for the further development of the rail link, and it agreed to consider the outcome of those discussions at the next NSMC meeting in the transport sector. Any such development will include options for the short and medium term, including limited-stop services, hourly frequency, removal of speed restrictions, and introduction of new rolling stock. The timing of the implementation of those plans will also be considered, and they will be phased in to take account of the availability of resources and the operational issues that are involved.

The Council recognised the importance of transport services to cross-border communities, and it welcomed the fact that the Department of Transport and the Marine and the Department for Regional Development were jointly supporting research into that area. That study is intended to help us to understand the barriers that exist to the development of cross-border community transport and to identify the level of demand and need for those types of services. It should also point to actions that can be taken to encourage cross-border co-operation in the provision of services.

The Council noted that the report from the study is expected to be completed soon, and it agreed to consider the recommendations of that report at the forthcoming meeting of the NSMC in the transport sector. The Council agreed that the next meeting of the North/South Ministerial Council transport sector should take place in December 2007. Go raibh maith agat.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Regional Development (Mr Cobain): I thank the Minister for his statement. It raises a number of interesting issues that I am sure the Committee for Regional Development will want to discuss in more detail.

What contribution will the £400 million make to the overall cost of the A5 and the A8? How does the Minister plan to manage the construction and land-price inflation of those schemes, which are big issues for the Committee? Will he describe the remit, responsibilities, and membership of the management structure that he proposes for the A5 project?

Mr Murphy: Although the Irish Government will contribute to the construction of both roads, the management and payment structures mean that that Government will contribute to the building of the A5 on the understanding that the Northern Executive will contribute to that of the A8. Details on how much those will cost will emerge from the route-corridor study, which will show how land is owned in what will be the final corridors for both roads. Therefore, the final figure for the cost of the roads will not be known until that study has been completed.

The A5 project involves North/South interfaces in at least two parts of the road. The cross-border steering group, which has been in existence and has been dealing with cross-border projects since 1999, has the same type of management structure that was in place when the A1 Dundalk to Newry road was successfully delivered. That type of management structure involves the National Roads Authority, county councils and Roads Service. The proposition is to proceed with the A5 project on that same basis. The group will convene next month, and it will begin to work with consultants in developing the route options. That work will in turn identify more closely the cost of the project.

Mr Dallat: I thank the Minister for his statement, particularly the reference to the Dublin to Belfast rail link, given that improvements are needed on that link. What plans are there to begin serious discussions on the future of the Belfast to Derry line as an obvious extension to the Trans-European Network?

Mr Murphy: There was a substantial discussion on the improvements that could be made to the Belfast to Dublin line, and both Administrations expressed a desire to move towards an hourly service.

The Belfast to Derry line was not on the agenda. However, the Member will be aware that the Department has submitted a bid to upgrade the line, which is an improvement on the previous position when, under direct rule, it was decided merely to maintain that line. The Department's proposed upgrade will form part of the Budget discussions later in the autumn. I hope that the bid will be successful.

The Department's intention is to invest in the railways, because it is clear that where such investment has been made, passenger numbers have increased, which also makes an environmental contribution. Although the subject was not on the meeting's agenda, it is prominent on the Department's agenda.

Mrs Long: After the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister made their statements, I asked them about the Derry line. There is particular interest in that line because of its implications for tourism in the north-west and its strategic link to Donegal. I am interested to know whether it is intended to extend the line, acting on a cross-border basis. Having such good transport links would mean that benefits should accrue from the Republic of Ireland's side too.

Mr Murphy: Members keep asking me about a rail connection into Donegal, but I have yet to hear the Southern Government mention it. People in the north-west are, generally, keen on the idea. They told me that there was once more railway track in Donegal than in any other county in Ireland, and now there is none.

People in the north-west, on both sides of the border, strongly desire that the connection go through to Donegal. However, my Department's priority is to try to invest in the line from Belfast to Derry. I am not being partitionist in my approach — far be it from me to be so. However, other than a general desire expressed by people in the area, the Department has not yet officially heard from the Irish Government whether they have any plans to invest in a railway line in Donegal. I know that they are rolling out a strategy over a considerable period that includes some ambitious plans. I am happy to discuss the subject with them. The Department wants to invest in the Belfast to Derry line and is keen that there should be investment in rail and other forms of transportation.

Mr Kennedy: I thank the Minister for his statement. He referred to the replacement of cross-border bridges on the frontier between County Tyrone and County Monaghan. Given the strength of local opposition to current Government plans for the bridges, particularly the one at Annaghroe, will the Minister undertake to meet local associations and groups and give due consideration to their concerns?

The Irish Government appear to be making all the running on the proposed Narrow Water bridge project. The Minister is aware of the concern in many quarters about the provision of a bridge at Narrow Water, not least of which is the concern of Warrenpoint Harbour Authority. Its stated preference is for the more sensible proposal, of which I know he is aware, for a Southern relief road to deal effectively with cross-border traffic and traffic going to, and leaving from, the busy port of Warrenpoint.

Will the Minister tell the House which of those two projects his Department supports? Will he move, albeit belatedly, to dampen the enthusiasm for the development of a bridge at Narrow Water that would clearly be incapable of solving the road problems that affect Newry, Warrenpoint and cross-border traffic?

Mr Murphy: I agree that it would be beneficial to hold a public consultation exercise on the bridges between Monaghan and Tyrone. However, the proposals must be sufficiently developed to allow that to happen.

Monaghan County Council is going through a tendering process to select an appropriate consultant to take forward the design of those projects. When preliminary proposals have been sufficiently developed, the Roads Service in the North will hold a public information day towards the end of the year to allow for public consultation on the projects.

1.45 pm

In relation to the proposed bridge at Narrow Water, the Executive, in agreeing the Council's papers, took note of the fact that the Dublin Government are paying for a technical study to be carried out through Louth County Council. We will take account of those findings when the study is completed. A study is also ongoing into the traffic situation around the southern end of Newry and, particularly, the traffic that is generated by Warrenpoint port and by commuting traffic on the Southern side of Newry. The Roads Service has undertaken that study, and it has been going on for some time. However, it will be completed in the spring.

Members mentioned that the officials who are conducting both studies should share their information, so that they are aware of each other's studies. Those studies are not competing projects, as that would lead us into negative territory. There are desires on both sides of Carlingford Lough for a connection to be made so that people will not have to travel through Newry. Some of those desires relate to tourism potential, because a connection at Narrow Water would have an impact on tourism in the Cooley Peninsula, the Mourne, and the eastern seaboard generally. There would also be an economic impact for south Down, as strategic traffic could link directly to the A1/M1 road. We should examine the studies as they develop and see where that takes us, rather than getting into the situation of having competing projects.

The Irish Government have indicated their desire to build a bridge at Narrow Water, and they are engaged in a study, through Louth County Council, to bring forward thinking on that. We should consider that, and consider traffic surveys on the Northern side of the border to try to come up with a project. We should not close our minds to anything at this stage. We must consider a way forward that will deal with all the concerns, including tourist traffic, strategic traffic, port traffic and congestion issues in and around Newry.

Mr P J Bradley: The Minister has partially answered my question. I thank him for his statement and for the meeting that he facilitated last week with business people from South Down who support the bridge project. As the Minister rightly said, the project is threefold. There is a social dimension to it. My office is about half a mile across the water from Omeath, yet I do not know anyone in Omeath or in the Cooley Peninsula. From a social perspective, we simply do not know our neighbours.

Reference was made to the economic impact of the project. Last week, we met members of the business community who were large-scale investors in the area. One investor had vehicles going daily to Dublin; another proposes to build a 60-bedroom hotel with chalets; and another is building chalet accommodation to support his already existing hotel. So, from an economic point of view, there is a great need for a bridge.

I do not expect the Member for Newry and Armagh Danny Kennedy to know Warrenpoint, because he does not live near there, but I differ with him regarding the traffic in Newry —

Mr Kennedy: Is there a question?

Mr P J Bradley: There is no question yet, but there will be one.

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mr P J Bradley: I am merely providing information for the Minister. A bridge at Narrow Water would divert traffic from the centre of Newry, as it would make its way to the south and west of Newry by crossing the bridge and travelling via Carlingford or past the Carrickdale Hotel. I do not wish to put the Minister on the spot, but will he go on record to state his commitment to the bridge, specifically at this time? I am conscious of the Minister's earlier answer, but I presume that he is not against a bridge at Narrow Water.

Mr Murphy: The Member has rehearsed the arguments that he and others made to me at a meeting about the bridge, and I accept them. As I told him at that meeting, I have heard arguments from others who have different priorities in that area, such as access and transportation. It is incumbent on us to consider all the arguments and decide how best to develop them.

The present position — which was agreed by the Executive, and subsequently by myself, the Minister of the Environment, and the Minister for Transport and the Marine in the South — is that the North/South Ministerial Council has noted the Irish Government's desire to bring the project forward, and its contribution to a study on the project by Louth County Council. We have undertaken to look at the issues that are reported in that study. That is the position that was agreed before and after the North/South Ministerial Council meeting, and that is where we stand.

Mr Beggs: I thank the Minister for his statement, but hope that he can provide some further detail.

In the early part of his statement, the Minister said that the necessary steps to progressing the A5 and A8 major-road projects were discussed and later agreed, along with the payment process. Will the Minister tell the House what those necessary steps are? What are the payment processes? More importantly — for commuters, road users and those who live along the route — what is the time frame for completion? Is it five years, 10 years or 20 years? Such basic facts should be in the public domain.

Regarding the Trans-European Network, the Minister said that there was discussion about the Belfast to Dublin rail link. Was there discussion about improving the Larne to Belfast section of the Trans-European Network, where there are speed restrictions and old rolling stocks?

Mr Murphy: The Member will appreciate that there was a formal agreement between the Executive and the Dublin Administration — that the A5 and A8 road projects would benefit from a £400 million injection from the South towards their construction — at the plenary meeting of the North/South Ministerial Council in Armagh, and that that was the first opportunity for such an agreement. The two projects are linked together to go forward. That was the beginning of the process. In addition to establishing a study group to identify the right options on the A5 project, we agreed that because there is a joint-management arrangement for the A5 project, it makes more sense for the Southern Government funding to go directly into that project, on the understanding that the Executive in the North and its agencies will fund the A8 project. The two projects are linked in that regard, and that is the present situation.

Identifying the right options, the costs and the time frame of the A8 and A5 projects will now gather pace, and progress can be reported as we go along. The quick and simple answer is that we do not know how long the projects will take; it can take a project six years from design stage to completion through the statutory process. There was agreement in July that the two projects will go ahead. Regarding payment options, the agreement is that the Irish Government funding, for ease of dealing with it, will go directly into the A5 — that does not mean that money will not go into the A8 project.

The Department is investing in railways and stock, which has improved usage. I realise, and heard in a previous debate, that there are criticisms about the stock available on the line to Larne. Where we can secure investment, we will continue to invest in railways to improve the tracks, the frequency of service, and the comfort that people expect when they use the service. That is part of the Department's bidding process when trying to get projects supported.

I assure the Member that the Department's commitment to investing in railways is real, and I hope that he understands that over time we will be able to give more detail about the road projects as they are developed. That is the funding arrangement for the road projects.

Mr Speaker: That ends the statements to the Minister for Regional Development.

I remind Members that when they respond to a ministerial statement, they must ask a question. It has almost reached the point where some Members want to make a statement in the House as well, and that in that statement there may be a question. It is important that Members ask questions and do not make statements.

North/South Ministerial Council: Road Safety

Mr Speaker: I have received notice from the Minister of the Environment that she wishes to make a statement on the North/South Ministerial Council (NSMC) meeting on road safety.

The Minister of the Environment (Mrs Foster): In compliance with section 52 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998, I will make a brief report on road safety issues addressed through the third meeting of the NSMC in the transport sector, which was held in the Manor House Hotel, Killadeas on 14 September 2007.

As already stated, the Executive were represented by the Minister for Regional Development, who chaired the meeting, and myself. The Irish Government were represented by Noel Dempsey TD, Minister for Transport and the Marine.

The Council noted and welcomed the progress that has been made since the previous meeting in April 2002 and the opportunity to meet to discuss the potential for further co-operation on strategic transport planning and road safety. The Council discussed the position on road safety strategies and noted that a review of the existing Northern Ireland road safety strategy had been initiated, and that a new strategy was likely to be submitted shortly to the Minister for Transport and the Marine for consideration in the Republic of Ireland. The Council noted that mutual recognition of driver disqualifications between the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland was expected to be in place by mid-2008.

The Council noted that a study into co-operation between the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland on the mutual recognition of penalty points was currently under way. It also agreed that efforts to promote road safety through joint advertising and publicity campaigns should continue and that the available evidence on the effectiveness of the existing approach should be reviewed.

The Council also agreed that work should continue through the Steering to Safety project to find practical ways of improving road safety in border areas. Furthermore, it agreed that, where possible, the results of relevant road safety research should be shared and that opportunities for improving and harmonising arrangements for collecting, collating and reporting road safety information should continue to be explored.

With your indulgence, Mr Deputy Speaker, I want to mention the latest tragedy on our roads, which occurred in Enniskillen this morning. I understand that one young man has died and a number of other people have been injured, and — as I always do — I offer my condolences to the family and friends of the victim. That tragedy reiterates to me the need to continue with our work on improving road safety — work to which my Department and I are committed. I also pay tribute to the emergency services, which, I understand, had a difficult job this morning, and I assure them that Members appreciate all that they do.

Mr Weir: I thank the Minister for her statement. Are there any plans to introduce mutual recognition of vehicle test certificates?

Mrs Foster: There are no plans for mutual recognition of vehicle test certificates. Vehicle testing arrangements here and in the Republic of Ireland differ in a variety of ways. The main difference is that vehicles in Northern Ireland are tested after four years, and every year thereafter, whereas those in the Republic of Ireland are tested after four years, and every two years thereafter. The longer interval between tests in the Republic would represent a significant barrier to mutual recognition, even if such a proposal were on the table. It would also be likely to encourage motorists here to go to the Republic of Ireland for vehicle testing, and that could have implications for test fees in Northern Ireland and, more significantly, for road safety. A recent report by the Department for Transport in Great Britain indicated that a two-year interval between tests would mean more unroadworthy vehicles, more road traffic collisions attributable to vehicle defects, and ultimately — and significantly, I would say — more deaths and injuries on our roads.

Mr P Ramsey: I welcome the Minister's commitment, and that of both Governments, to harmonisation, collaboration and co-operation. However, will she consider setting up an all-island road safety body? I ask that as a Member who represents a cross-border area and as someone who has a personal interest in the issue, as my brother and his wife were killed by a drunk driver in Donegal. I also have a personal interest, because my neighbouring council in Donegal has one of the highest rates of road traffic-related deaths and serious injuries. An all-island body — especially one that included victims' groups and which co-operated in the sharing of information — would be important in reducing the number of road deaths.

Mrs Foster: I thank the Member for his question, and I understand his special and ongoing interest in this matter. The Member will be aware that the Assembly very recently set up an all-party working group on that subject, and I hope in the near future to discuss with its members all the issues that they raise.

In my statement I mentioned the Steering to Safety project, under the umbrella of Co-operation and Working Together (CAWT), which is carrying out a cross-border road traffic collision research project. That organisation is effective, in that it has already published five detailed research reports and one summary report. The project is now moving forward from developing the evidence base to considering practical steps to dealing with road safety in border areas. That is, perhaps, what the Member wanted to know.

I understand that CAWT is organising a conference on 9 October, in Dundalk, specifically to examine the issue of young drivers. The Member will know that in border areas, Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland, the 17- to 24-year-old age group is an increasing problem that needs to be dealt with effectively.

Mrs Long: I welcome the Minister of the Environment's statement, and particularly welcome the co-ordination between the two jurisdictions. That was discussed at the meeting of the all-party Assembly group, to which the Minister referred extensively at lunchtime.

Following the mutual recognition of driving disqualifications target of mid-2008, are there any plans to extend that to other European countries, given the amount of mobility that now exists in Europe?

With regard to the mutual recognition of penalty points between the UK and the Republic of Ireland, co-ordination between Northern Ireland and GB on the matter is currently poor. Residents of Northern Ireland who commit motoring offences in GB have to present themselves in court in GB because their driving licences cannot be processed there as they are issued in Coleraine, rather than in Swansea. A proper, joined-up arrangement needs to be given attention.

Mrs Foster: The work that the Department is doing on recognition of driver disqualification between the UK and the Republic of Ireland was actually initiated in Europe. Our two nations will be the first two areas to have that mutual recognition, so we are leading the way on recognition in Europe. I hope that we will be able to look at other areas, once that is in place; however, the Member will appreciate that these are the two most urgent areas.

The mutual recognition of penalty points is a more complex issue, and there are additional difficulties, one of which is the problem of licences that are issued by Coleraine and not by Swansea, as the Member mentioned. We hope soon to receive the results of the feasibility study carried out by the Department for Transport, and those must be considered.

Mr Shannon: I welcome the Minister's commitment to road safety; however, it requires the co-operation of everyone in the Province.

Over the last few weeks there has been a large increase in the number of people killed on our roads; that is very worrying. Over the past year the number of motorcyclists that have been killed is of particular concern to me and others. Does the Minister intend to introduce any strategy or policy, in co-operation with other Ministers, to reduce that number?

Mrs Foster: The updated figures show that in 2005, there were 94 fatalities in Northern Ireland up to September. There were 89 in the same period in 2006, and, taking into account this morning's fatality, the figure stands at 80 for 2007.

I know that Mr Shannon has a particular interest in motorcycles. The 2007 figures for the number of deaths attributable to motorcycles are quite startling, and have caused me much concern. The number of motorcycle deaths has increased to 24, plus one pillion passenger, in 2007, compared to just 13 at this stage of 2006.

Proposals for immediate road-safety benefits are to be taken forward prior to the outcome of the road safety review in which my Department is engaged. Furthermore, it is intended shortly to bring forward proposals for the introduction of compulsory basic training for all new motorcycle riders, and that matter will go before the Committee for the Environment in the near future. At present, the Department takes responsibility for assessing and training motorcycle instructors and for maintaining a voluntary register of instructors. My belief is that there would be real road-safety benefits if that register became compulsory.

Mr Attwood: I welcome the Minister's statement, which confirms the substantive body of work that has been undertaken, in the North and in the South, in respect of road safety.

I have two points. First, driving disqualifications are mutually recognised, North and South, and I am aware of the feasibility study on the mutual recognition of penalty points. Is there any indicative time for that recognition? I know that it is subject to ongoing and complex issues, but it would be helpful to have that information.

Secondly, has the Minister considered introducing something similar to the practice in the South of putting the number of fatalities on billboards or advertising signs in each county? Those are explicit reminders to the road user of the threat on the roads.

My final point refers to what my colleague Pat Ramsey said. Does the substantive, ongoing, body of work concerning driving disqualifications, penalty points, border road safety, joint advertising and improved research, and so on, not beg for the establishment of an all-Ireland road safety body? Is that work, carried out by the Minister and her ministerial colleagues, and its importance to road safety, not an appropriate recommendation to the proposed efficiency commission for the establishment of such a body?

Mrs Foster: I thank the Member for his two points, which turned into three. As I said earlier, I hope to have action next year with regard to driver disqualification. Unfortunately, I cannot give Mr Attwood a timescale in relation to penalty points. I am sure that he would be the first to bring me before the House if I did not keep to that timescale. However, he can rest assured that my officials and I will continue to push on the matter, because we want it settled as quickly as possible. We shall await the outcome of the feasibility study and take it from there.

I have heard conflicting arguments concerning the billboards. Some people see them as a distraction on the roads; others say that they are useful reminders that people should take care on particular stretches of road. The Department closes its eyes to nothing that comes before it, and the suggestion will be examined in the review.

Implicit in Mr Attwood's question about an all-Ireland road safety body was the fact that good, effective work is ongoing. I want that work to continue, and I see no need to endanger it by politicising it and turning it into some sort of political football.

Lord Morrow: I thank the Minister for her statement. It is poignant that it should be made on a day that another fatality occurs in County Fermanagh, and my thoughts go out to the family concerned.

The period from 1969 to 2001 was euphemistically known as the Troubles, during which 3,316 people were killed. Is the Minister aware that, during that same period, 7,143 people were killed on the roads? That is almost twice as many.

I understand that there is an issue about policing, and the Minister is not in charge of that — would that she were.

Is it the Minister's intention that those who break the law by speeding and who are caught across the border should be pursued and charged with the same offence on their return? I would recommend that such people be charged twice, and I would like to hear the Minister's views on that.

Mrs Foster: As the Member knows, I was not around in 1969. [Laughter.]

If the figures for road deaths in the 1970s are compared with today's statistics, then we are doing very well. Sometimes that fact is not acknowledged when we are faced with another tragedy — it should be. However, that is not to say that work to reduce the numbers killed should not continue.

The Member made a point about the cross-border work of the PSNI and the Garda Síochána. Noel Dempsey commented that the work to bring people to justice should be acknowledged and that the border should not be used as a way of evading justice by those who break the rules in either jurisdiction. The work should continue so that people will know that there is no hiding place when it comes to road-safety matters.

Mr Brady: Does the Minister see any merit in moving towards road signs displaying speed limits in kilometres per hour rather than in miles per hour? That would be in line with the rest of Europe and Ireland. As someone who represents a border constituency, I can see an obvious anomaly for drivers when moving from kilometres per hour to miles per hour.

Mrs Foster: There are absolutely no plans to change the speed limit signs in this jurisdiction.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mrs Foster: We will be keeping to miles per hour. We continue to work with the Road Safety Authority and the National Roads Authority in the South. However, there are more important issues to be dealt with, and I hope that we have covered them today.

Mr Dallat: I welcome the Minister's statement and share the grief that another person has lost his life on the roads. I am sure that we all send our condolences to his family.

The Minister indicated that there is a current Northern Ireland road safety strategy and that one is shortly to be submitted to the Minister for Transport in the Republic. Will she assure the House that those strategies will be joined up and that they will focus on young people, many of whom are victims of the slaughter that takes place on our roads day and daily?

Mrs Foster: I assure the Member that we have been sharing information, and he will know that there has been a continuous sharing of information especially in relation to the advertising campaigns that have taken place. That will continue. The Minister for Transport has indicated that he will share the new road safety strategy with me — and we will be able to take on board those issues that may have implications for Northern Ireland, especially in border areas where many deaths occur on the roads almost daily.

Mr Deputy Speaker: That brings questions to the Minister to a conclusion.

Establishment of an Independent Environmental Protection Agency

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow one hour and 30 minutes for the debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes to propose, and there will be 10 minutes for the winding-up speech. Two amendments have been received and have been published on the Marshalled List. Each proposer will have 10 minutes to propose, and there will be five minutes for each winding-up speech. All other Members will have five minutes to speak. I call Mr Brian Wilson. My apologies; I call Mr Ford.

Mr Ford: Mr Deputy Speaker, I hope that the rest of our communication will be better than that.

I beg to move

That this Assembly calls on the Executive to establish an independent Environmental Protection Agency for Northern Ireland.

This is an extremely important issue for the people of Northern Ireland. It is absolutely clear that our environment is in a mess and requires urgent attention. We are suffering from a legacy of failure, over many years, to take the necessary action to protect the environment and to recognise its role in the welfare of our people and in the development of our economy.

2.15 pm

Compared to other regions of these islands, Northern Ireland's wildlife-protection laws are extremely weak. We are seeing the disappearance of habitats that ought to be protected. Only this morning, I took a telephone call from someone who was extremely concerned that Prehen Wood, one of our few tracts of ancient woodland in the north-west, is under threat from a proposal to develop housing and build a road. The Planning Service seems to be minded to accept that proposal, and, at the moment, no agency with responsibility for protecting the environment seems to be able to influence the Planning Service on such matters, despite material considerations such as the protected status of the wood.

We are also seeing the loss of historic buildings in towns and villages right across the region. It is clear that important places for wildlife are not being looked after. We are simply not designating enough areas of special scientific interest; we are not doing it fast enough; and we are not protecting the ones that already exist. At the same time, we are seeing wildlife facing — at least localised — extinction. Although we may be grateful to see birds such as the chough return to Rathlin Island this year, it is also clear that birds such as the corncrake and the lapwing are under huge threat.

We all know the problems associated with the EU Water Framework Directive and the failure to deal with water wisely. We see illegal dumps blighting the countryside, despite the fact that the responsibility for policing such matters was centralised from district councils into the Environment and Heritage Service (EHS) a short while ago.

It is clear that, for whatever reason, the Department of the Environment in general, and the EHS in its particular responsibilities, have not been carrying out their duties — perhaps owing to a lack of resources — on behalf of all my people. That may be a political rant, but those are not just my words; they reflect the decisions of bodies such as the Audit Commission; the Public Accounts Committees, both at the Assembly and at Westminster; and House of Commons Select Committees. It is clear that something needs to be done.

I freely confess that, as a party to some of the early decisions on structuring Departments back in 1999, I accepted that we should split the then Department of the Environment in two, creating a Department that would be responsible for infrastructure and a Department with responsibility for environmental protection. There were sound reasons for doing that. Of course, that was later somewhat amended by Mr Trimble and Mr Mallon, who decided on the final departmental duties and managed to place part of the regulatory role into the Department for Regional Development so that it was not simply the Department with responsibility for infrastructure.

However, that aside, there has been a failing in the Department of the Environment's structures to deal with its responsibilities. It seems that those are failings of structures, rather than of individuals. A Department staffed by the Civil Service is not the right place to carry out regulation of environmental matters. Of course, that is no surprise, because elsewhere in these islands, we see the Environment Agency of England and Wales, which has an independent role; the Scottish Environment Protection Agency; and the Environmental Protection Agency in the Republic of Ireland. Northern Ireland is the only region that is out of step. Either they are all wrong, or we are wrong. Look at the litany of issues that I cited at the beginning of my speech — it is not England and Wales or Scotland or Ireland that is out of step, it is Northern Ireland that is wrong.

In recent years, we have seen some movement towards the establishment of an independent environmental protection agency. That probably started with the Macrory Report of 2004. 'Transparency and Trust' was the title that Professor Richard Macrory used; it was about the need for environmental governance. That was then backed up by sound work by the Coalition for Environmental Protection, which led to the establishment of the review of environmental governance (REGNI) and the report that was published earlier this year, 'Foundations for the Future'. There is no doubt that that has been backed by a huge groundswell of support from across the community, as can be attested to by those of us who have received large numbers of green “What future for her environment” postcards.

The review of environmental governance examined a wider issue, but it is absolutely clear that the authors of that report saw an independent environmental protection agency as the key driver for changing environmental governance in Northern Ireland and for ensuring that progress is made. However, that was not just the view of the usual range of environmental non-governmental organisations; groups such as the Confederation of British Industry, the Quarry Products Association, and the Consumer Council all backed that call. We have seen in recent weeks that that is not just a good idea; it is now an essential idea.

On 7 September 2007, in his High Court judgement on the judicial review taken against the strategic environmental assessments in the draft northern area plan and the draft Magherafelt area plan — a judgement that bears reading, even though it was rather overshadowed by another on the same day — Mr Justice Weatherup said:

“By the terms of the Directive it is apparent, as the Department accepts, that there be separation between the responsible authority and the consultation body. In the present cases I am satisfied that no such separation occurred and that it was not achieved by the Planning Service and the Environmental and Heritage Service being separate divisions of the same Department. For all practical purposes there was integration between the Planning Service and the Environmental and Heritage Service in the preparation of the documents. In any event had their been a formal separation of roles between the Planning Service and the Environmental and Heritage Service I would not have been satisfied that there was sufficient separation for the purposes of the Directive while the two services remain part of the same Department and legal entity.”

It could not be clearer than that. An environmental protection agency is no longer an optional extra; it is now essential in order to comply with the European directive that an independent environmental protection authority be established.

By way of an aside, I note that elements of the REGNI report would have cured issues that arose in the other judgement on 7 September on whether the Department for Regional Development or the Department of the Environment was the Department responsible for Planning Policy Statement 14. The REGNI report states that the Department of the Environment should have responsibility for:

as well as several responsibilities that currently reside with the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development, the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure and the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety.

We need to simplify the structures, and part of that simplification process — the essential part — is the establishment of an independent agency. That would be the next logical step in a process that began in 1962, when the Abercorn Report called for an independent nature conservancy council. If an independent environmental protection agency were to be set up, it would follow up on recommendations in the Balfour Report on the need to remove environmental protection from the departmental core. The Balfour Report was published in 1984.

I have no doubt that Mr Wells, with his great experience of the Prior Assembly and the one-man-band role that he played in it, will be able to tell us more about the Balfour Report, but it is clear that we are still playing catch-up 20-odd years later with what was an essential recommendation then.

An independent environmental protection agency would have the duties and the powers to tackle environmental problems that are causing difficulties for us, both here in the Assembly and in Northern Ireland generally. Those problems are making it less attractive for those of us who live and work here and lead to our taxpayers being threatened with fines for failure to comply with directives. We absolutely must have an environmental protection agency, and the case for so doing is quite clear.

I shall mention briefly the two proposed amendments to the motion. When we tabled the motion, our intention was to make a simple, clear statement, and nothing could be simpler or clearer than a call for the establishment of an independent environmental protection agency, with no ifs, buts or qualifications —

Mr Poots: Simplistic?

Mr Ford: I said “simple”, not “simplistic”, Mr Deputy Speaker. I am sure that the Member, in his capacity as Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure, will manage to work out the distinction when it comes to his Department.

Our intention was to set out that simple, clear call. I understand why Tommy Gallagher has tabled amendment No 2, which may be viewed in certain circles as beefing up our original proposal. His amendment causes me no great difficulty one way or the other, although I do believe that a simple, clear call for the establishment of an agency was beneficial.

Amendment No 1, however, which stands in the name of Peter Weir, appears to be a classic example of the obfuscation that we expect in this place. The case for an independent agency is clear, and the benefits are clear. If it was not clear enough from the REGNI report itself, Mr Justice Weatherup further highlighted the fact, yet amendment No 1 calls for further consideration and further delay. There is no choice — we know that we must do something. Instead of pretending that we can debate the issue a little bit more, we should be getting on with the establishment of an environmental protection agency.

I am not a lawyer, but I understand that Mr Weir is, and I have no doubt that he is as capable of understanding Mr Justice Weatherup's judgement as anybody in this place. I hope that the House will be of the clear opinion today that best practice elsewhere be followed. Moreover, I trust that those Members on the Unionist Benches who understand the issues under discussion will add their votes and not just their voices to this call for action.

Mr Weir: I beg to move amendment No 1: Leave out all after "Assembly" and insert

"notes the recent report 'Foundations for the Future', which recommends the creation of an independent Environmental Protection Agency; and further notes that more work needs to be undertaken to identify the costs and benefits of this recommendation, before decisions can be taken."

Although I am not able to speak in the lofty tones of a former QC in this place, I hope that I can at least address some of the concerns that have been raised by the outcome of the judicial review.

I say in passing, with no disrespect to any of my learned colleagues at the Bar, or even in the courtroom, that, whenever we are deciding what is best for Northern Ireland as a whole, the Assembly represents the will of the people. Consequently, we will be taking sound decisions that are based on the best way forward.

We are not here simply to follow the diktats of Mr Justice Weatherup or any other member of the judiciary. We have a proper mandate to fulfil.

This simple — some might say simplistic — motion is somewhat premature, although I appreciate the opportunity to debate the issue. The motion is being debated before the matter has been discussed in the Committee for the Environment, and the Member who proposed the motion will be well aware of that. The DUP's amendment should not be dismissed as some form of obfuscation, as it looks at the issue of costs and benefits. The Alliance Party is not in the Executive and, therefore, has no responsibility in this place. However, on this issue as with any other, we cannot have blank-cheque government. We need to be rooted in reality.

The DUP disagrees with Mr Ford's motion, and it disagrees more strongly with Mr Gallagher's amendment, which would be unworkable. An attempt to set something up immediately would create major problems for many Departments. It will be interesting to see whether the views of those who support Mr Gallagher's amendment will be shared in the Executive by their ministerial colleagues, who may well have concerns for their own Departments. That will be brought out later.

All Members — certainly those on the DUP Benches — believe that there is a need for environmental protection and changes in environmental governance, and that should unite us all. Irrespective of our backgrounds or political views, we all view Northern Ireland as one of the most beautiful places that has been put on the earth, and it is important to protect that natural asset. However, when we look at environmental governance, it is also important to ensure that whatever route we take to try to copper-fasten and preserve the best in our society, we take the correct route. That may mean us taking a little bit longer to get there, rather than rushing, but it is important. We need efficient, effective and balanced solutions.

While it is important to fully protect the environment, we must also recognise the needs of the farming and business communities. The rural community — and particularly the farming community — have suffered greatly from various crises recently. We must have something in place that is responsible for, and looks after, the full remit of that.

I said that the debate is premature, and it is premature for several reasons. There must be recognition of the complexity of the establishment of an environmental protection agency (EPA), which was somewhat skated over by the proposer of the motion. Under the existing arrangements, the EHS has a much broader remit than the environmental agencies in any other part of the United Kingdom. For example, the work done in England by Natural England and English Heritage would be covered by the EHS here.

It is not simply a question of the role of the EHS. In addition to amalgamating with the EHS, an EPA would have a wide range of other functions, which would affect several Departments. For example, the responsibilities of the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development's Rivers Agency; environmental health officers in the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety; the Loughs Agency, a North/South body; and a range of Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure functions on inland fisheries and inland waterways would be subsumed in any EPA.

An EPA may seem like the golden bullet that would cure all our problems — and that may be particularly relevant to Mr Gallagher's amendment — but there are massive political, policy, practical, financial, legislative and administrative issues that would need to be tackled. That could not be done overnight.

2.30 pm

For example, the wider governance model that was proposed in the report will also cover changes to the planning appeals commission, the water appeals commission, the audit office and the judicial system. All those factors must be taken into account when considering an EPA.

Members must also ensure that the scope of the proposed EPA remains focused and that the good work that is ongoing in the Environment and Heritage Service is not lost. Several groups have expressed concern that the built heritage may become a low priority for the proposed EPA. There has already been some success in that area. By 2005, 456 buildings were already on the register, and the number of listed buildings has exceeded each annual target.

Above all, before an independent environmental protection agency is set up the DUP wants an examination of the potential costs to ensure value for money. Although the review panel produced many good proposals, it fell outside its remit by failing to report on how much an environmental protection agency would cost to set up and run.

Given the commitments of the Department of the Environment (DOE), the wide range of other financial pressures and the fact that a large amount of money would be required to set up an EPA, some degree of analysis is required to see where that money is to come from. It is unacceptable to say that the Department of Finance and Personnel can simply write another cheque. If the EPA is to be set up — particularly if Mr Gallagher's amendment is accepted and it happens immediately — people must know which budgets are to be cut. Does Mr Gallagher wish to forego the hospital in Enniskillen? I suspect that that is unlikely. Even the Minister of the Environment would be reluctant to do that. If there is to be a large financial commitment to an EPA, people must explain where the money is to come from, which is why there must be proper costings before the proposal can progress. There are widespread pressures in the DOE — concerns about planning issues and underinvestment in the Planning Service are highlighted weekly. Are we to cut the Planning Service budget to provide an EPA? If people make proposals without any costings, they must give some idea of where the money is to come from.

Given the experiences of environmental protection agencies in other parts of the UK and the Republic of Ireland, concerns have been raised that, in the long run, it would be necessary to levy charges on local businesses and farmers of up to 40% of the total funding. If Members wish to create a competitive economy, particularly in rural areas, can we burden people with such a levy? That question remains unanswered. Funding is the overriding issue.

There are also governance issues that must be tackled. It is important that the idea of independence does not become a panacea. An EPA would be a statutory body set up under the auspices of the Department. It is questionable how truly independent it could be.

Unfortunately, this motion is half-cocked and has been tabled prematurely. Rather than being a well-thought-through proposal, I suspect that it is an attempt by those who tabled it to associate themselves with a cause that they believe to be popular.

Clearly, there is a need for better environmental protection in Northern Ireland, but, instead of dwelling on administrative issues, Members should consider practical issues that must be dealt with first, such as waste discharges, which require urgent attention. Further consideration must be given to costs, and the proposal must be well thought through if it is to progress. I support amendment No 1.

Mr Gallagher: I beg to move amendment No 2: Leave out all after "Assembly" and insert

"notes the recommendation to establish an independent Environmental Protection Agency in the 'Foundations for the Future' report; and calls on the Executive to establish an independent Environmental Protection Agency, which must be fully operational within the lifetime of this Assembly."

I wish to commend Brian Wilson and David Ford for tabling this important motion. The environment is the most important issue to face the world this century. Proposals to address the problems with it can certainly not be dismissed as premature.

My amendment puts the creation of an independent environment watchdog into a specific time frame. Amendment No 1 does not do that; it says a lot about costs. None of us want to duck the issue of costs; it is important and cannot be avoided. However, chapter 5 of 'Foundations for the Future' is specific about the functions that should be transferred. Costings could be carried out in a matter of weeks, at most. That is not a huge task, given that we have the report to work from.

As many Members know, the cost of not setting up an independent agency will outweigh the inaction that lies behind amendment No 1. We have only to think about the EU fines that lie ahead of us.

There is no reason for delay. The DUP amendment is asking the Assembly to fiddle, and Members know the rest of that story. Are we to fiddle while being submerged by floods and with our marine life and biodiversity continuing to be ruined?

The quality of life and the health and well-being of people in Northern Ireland depend on the quality of air and water and the capacity of the countryside to support people as well as a rich diversity of wildlife. Environmental issues have been a low priority here for too long while our neighbours in the Republic of Ireland, England, Scotland and Wales, as we have just heard, have handed over responsibility for regulating the environment to independent agencies. We have not heard any complaints about their costs.

During the 1980s and 1990s, those countries had independent agencies to tackle abuses of the environment and to enforce environmental legislation. We have fallen behind, and we do not have the systems and structures in place that have the capacity to produce the outcomes necessary to protect the environment properly. Illegal dumping and the discharge of raw sewage into the sea continue, and many species are threatened due to the removal of their habitats. The scale of environmental protection is simply inadequate. The Environment and Heritage Service cannot act effectively as our environmental champion — the recent Giant's Causeway controversy and Northern Ireland Audit Office reports on delays in the designation of areas of special scientific interest (ASSIs) are testament to that.

The EHS has also been heavily criticised by the Waste Management Advisory Board for Northern Ireland and the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Select Committee. Granted, after so many reports, there have been attempts to address some of the issues. Work has been done on a cross-departmental basis, and we have had the development of a waste management strategy, but the Government cannot act as both poacher and gamekeeper.

The Department of the Environment is one of 11 Departments, and, as such, is often overruled. Moreover, there are barriers to environmental regulation by bodies within central Government.

Mr Craig: Will the Member give way?

Mr Gallagher: No, I am not giving way.

That has been recognised by many countries, and it is identified in 'Foundations for the Future', which states:

"First, the necessary confidentiality of departmental policy making processes and inter-departmental debate creates a serious lack of transparency around the making of regulatory decisions. Without transparency, regulatory decisions command neither the confidence of the public nor that of the regulated.

Second, the officials administering the regulations are exposed to both a real and perceived risk of conflict of interest."

The report goes on to state that the effectiveness of regulation by bodies internal to Government is inhibited since:

"Modern environmental governance requires a strong and focussed regulator able to adopt modern risk-based regulatory practices without a loss of public confidence."

Northern Ireland needs a strong independent voice to champion and safeguard the environment. It is no surprise that 'Foundations for the Future', launched in May 2007, recommends that environmental regulation should be transferred to a new EPA with statutory powers.

The report is detailed and thorough, and was compiled after wide-ranging consultations. It sets out the functions that should be retained by the Department of the Environment; for example, planning and environmental policy, and it spells out the necessary and important accountability mechanisms for a new environmental protection agency. Moreover, it recommends that the EPA's purpose:

"should be to protect and enhance the environment and in doing so to contribute to the achievement of sustainable development."

A well resourced and independent EPA should be the first layer of environmental governance. However, there are other necessary elements — a shared vision on local and agreed standards for the protection of the environment needs to be developed between the Government and other stakeholders. Effective arrangements for the integrated management of important assets such as coasts, uplands and river basins are also required.

Owing to this being a small island, a problem such as air or water pollution can spread quickly. The reality is obvious — we cannot partition the environment, therefore, managing it needs a whole-island strategy. To maximise its effectiveness, any new EPA must have the capacity and the powers to pursue its own programme of practical co-operation with its counterpart in the Republic of Ireland.

A number of official reports on areas such as water pollution and nature conservation have highlighted problems in Northern Ireland of poor resourcing, inadequate management systems, and, as many Members are aware, poor enforcement. Northern Ireland has a reputation for the late transposition of EU directives, and is currently facing fines for failing to implement them.

Given the urgency of all environmental matters, not least the warnings from environmentalists about time running out for corrective action, procrastination is no longer an option. I propose the creation of an independent environmental protection agency within the lifetime of this Assembly. That would send out the message that the environment has, at last, been put at the top of the agenda in Northern Ireland.

Mr McKay: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I support the aims of the motion and amendment No 2. I thank Mr Ford and Mr Wilson for raising a key issue for many of those who are involved in the protection of the environment.

It is important to state that Sinn Féin is in favour of the eventual establishment of an all-Ireland environmental protection agency. This, we believe, is an important first step in that process. All-Ireland environmental governance makes sense in so many ways, and it is an issue that we will raise at the North/South Ministerial Council.

There is little doubt that there is a need for reform of the present system of environmental responsibilities. Support for that reform stems not only from a loss of public confidence in the quality of environmental regulation, but from a desire for greater transparency, leadership and public debate in decision-making.

The EHS has been criticised by several public bodies because of its activities in recent years, particularly in respect of its poor performance in certain areas. Examples include: poor management of funding for environmental protection; Government intervention to the detriment of the environment; poor performance in achieving environmental objectives; and a lack of co-ordination with Departments with responsibilities for the implementation of environmental legislation.

The Royal Society for the Protection of Birds released a report card on how the EHS was performing in regard to areas of special scientific interest (ASSI). On ensuring that all qualifying sites are declared ASSIs by 2010, the EHS achieved a grade F. That indicates that it is not on course to halt biodiversity loss here by 2010 — a key EU target. The EHS simply has not made the grade in protecting our environment.

2.45 pm

The report of the review of environmental governance, which was published in June and which has already been mentioned, recommended that responsibility for environmental regulation be transferred to a new environmental protection agency. John Woods of Friends of the Earth said at that time:

“This report affords us the best opportunity in a generation to reform the system which protects our environment.”

I hope that the Minister of the Environment shows leadership on the issue and seizes the opportunity that has been presented by implementing the report's recommendations.

Another of the report's key recommendations is that appropriate measures be taken to restore and enhance an all-island approach to environmental governance at policy and operational levels. Given that we have distinct island biogeography that does not consider boundaries, such an approach would benefit biodiversity conservation. That approach would also ensure greater regulatory and enforcement mechanisms and would bring cost-saving benefits in staffing and resource requirements.

Sinn Féin commends the work that environmental non-governmental organisations have done to date to highlight the deficit in effective environmental protection and governance. The establishment of an independent environmental protection agency is essential in order to protect the beautiful environment that attracts so many tourists here every year, to avoid the colossal European fines to which Mr Ford alluded, and to halt biodiversity loss and illegal dumping.

To date, all parties, bar one, have publicly backed the immediate establishment of an independent environmental protection agency. We should not stall, nor should anyone sit on the fence on the matter. Given that the destruction of our environment and its wildlife is already happening without reproach on a daily basis, steps must be taken to establish an environmental protection agency as soon as possible.

I support the motion and amendment No 2. Go raibh maith agat.

Mr Armstrong: I welcome the debate, and I am pleased to contribute to it. There is no doubt that environmental concerns, such as waste, waste management, planning, renewable energy and climate change, are increasingly important and are at the centre of political debate. We are now much more aware of the importance of taking care of our natural environment and of the need to promote sustainable development so that we can play our part in tackling global warming.

At the moment, Northern Ireland is the only part of the United Kingdom that does not have an independent environmental protection agency. The Environment Agency is responsible for England and Wales, while Scotland has the Scottish Environment Protection Agency. Both agencies were established in 1996. Many diverse voices have called for the establishment of an equivalent body in Northern Ireland. Those voices range from environmental groups, such as Friends of the Earth, the National Trust, and the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, through to the Confederation of British Industry, the Quarry Products Association and the Consumer Council for Northern Ireland.

I am a great believer in saying, if it ain't broke, don't fix it. The problem is that the existing system, in which the Department of the Environment, in the shape of the Environment and Heritage Service, is responsible for the protection and control of the environment, most certainly is broken and cannot be left alone.

I declare an interest as a farmer, even though I am not wearing any particular hat today. Many in the farming community view the prospect of an independent environmental protection agency with a suspicion that borders on hostility. That unfortunate position is the result of past experience. The perception in the farming community has been that farmers — and let us not forget that they are the custodians of the countryside — have been an easy target for the Environment and Heritage Service. At the same time, Government agencies, such as the Department for Regional Development's Water Service, which is protected by Crown immunity, and big business have been given something of a bye-ball. That situation cannot continue, regardless of what happens in the future with an independent agency.

If an independent agency is established to protect the environment, it must work in close and genuine partnership with farmers, who, more than anyone, have a vested interest in protecting and preserving the environment as it provides for their livelihoods. On many occasions in the past, such a partnership has been sadly lacking.

An independent agency must not form an additional layer of bureaucracy or become another burden on a farming community already overburdened with red tape and apparently endless regulations. I stress that farmers must not be dictated to by a busybody organisation.

Mr Weir: Will the Member give way?

Mr Armstrong: Go ahead, but do not be too long.
[Laughter.]

Mr Weir: I appreciate that. You do get an extra minute, but I will curtail my time to give you the maximum opportunity. I appreciate the point that you have made that farmers should not be overburdened by bureaucracy. I assume that you are aware that the main representative farmers' body, the Ulster Farmers' Union, is on record as being opposed to an independent environmental protection agency? That may be another reason for further thought and caution before a form of environmental governance is put in place, and that adds further weight to the DUP's amendment.

Mr Armstrong: I welcome the Member's comments, and I am sure that someone else will take them on board. [Laughter.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member is running out of time. Order.

Mr Armstrong: Before an independent environmental protection agency is established, I would recommend genuine and meaningful engagement with the farming and agricultural community so that both sides may learn from the past to ensure that mistakes are not repeated.

Mr I McCrea: I am not sure that I can follow Mr Armstrong's contribution, but I will attempt to.

I welcome the opportunity to debate this important environmental issue. I agree with my colleague Mr Weir that the matter has been brought before the House prematurely. It should have been brought before the Committee for the Environment before the motion was tabled.

I assure the Member for North Antrim Mr McKay that any notion that he has of an all-Ireland environmental protection agency is only in his dreams.

A significant non-governmental organisation (NGO) environmental lobby has prompted today's debate. Its concerns are not without substance; neither is its ambition without merit. As the House has heard, there are critical challenges, both current and emerging, facing Northern Ireland's environment. All will have a huge impact on our communities' quality of life.

Many of the challenges, such as tackling climate change, halting the loss of biodiversity, minimising waste, reducing landfill, safeguarding the marine environment and the protection of landscapes, habitats and species, will require long-term policy frameworks.

Enhanced regulation and a marked change in public attitude and behaviour as well as clear environmental leadership are necessary if we are to sustain the world in which we live. REGNI is an ambitious and complex undertaking that looked beyond regulation and enforcement and considered ways to stimulate action, not only by the decision-makers, but by urban and rural communities, business leaders and individuals.

In addition to encouraging positive behaviour, REGNI ensured that its recommendations are fit for purpose and will result in Northern Ireland having the most efficient and effective arrangements for environmental governance.

In preparing for a 10-year strategy, the EHS referred to an environment that is both highly valued and well protected. Unfortunately, experience has shown that that has not always been the case: there have been numerous high-profile incidents in which our natural and built environments have not been afforded the correct protection, with devastating consequences. Therefore, one can immediately appreciate why so many may feel that the penalties and sanctions for environmental crime have been largely ineffective.

The Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs has considered how offenders could be forced to carry the burden of repairing significant environmental damage. Polluters could potentially be faced with greater financial penalties and increased sanctions. They could also be forced to improve the environmental quality of the communities most detrimentally affected by their actions. I ask the Minister to consider that type of approach in Northern Ireland.

It is clear from the work undertaken by the review of environmental governance in Northern Ireland that there is no quick-fix solution to heal all environmental ills overnight. Any advancement must encompass a considered and measured approach to ensure that any changes to the current system are not only financially viable and beneficial, but, ultimately, sustainable.

While the Minister is considering the options, the opportunity exists to enhance and promote the role of the EHS as the champion of environmental priorities. Progress has already been made on waste minimisation and water quality. Indeed, those achievements were acknowledged in evidence sessions to the review of environmental governance. Partnership between the EHS and other Departments, such as the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development, key environmental stakeholders and representatives from the farming and business sectors has also improved, which can help to deliver joint objectives. As the chief executive of the EHS stated at the Environment Northern Ireland conference in October 2005:

"there is a job to be done; an environment to be protected."

I support the amendment standing in the name of my colleague Mr Peter Weir.

Mr W Clarke: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. It has been outlined already that the North is unique among these islands because it does not have an independent environmental protection agency. That is an absolute disgrace, and it does great injustice and disservice to society's children.

There must be greater transparency and accountability, and an independent environmental protection agency must have rigorous enforcement powers to enable it to hold polluters to account. That is essential to ensure public confidence. The effectiveness of the proposed agency is paramount. It must be a powerful advocate for the environment. Reports stretching back over the past decade, including those of the Waste Management Advisory Board, have been highly damning of the Department of the Environment's record on environmental protection and waste management and have demanded real solutions and answers.

Sinn Féin's view is that an independent environmental protection agency offers the most viable alternative to the Department's many past failures in regulating persistent offenders properly. There is a clear need for radical solutions to problems that will simply not go away, and the emphasis must be on preventing damage to the environment rather than dealing with the aftermath of pollution — or not dealing with it, as is the case in my constituency, where sewage has been lying in Glenlough Park, a public park in Ballynahinch, for the past four weeks. This issue cuts across Departments, and that is why an independent environmental protection agency is needed.

The Department of the Environment should be stripped of its environmental protection powers because it has failed to do its job with the vigour that is needed. An independent environmental protection agency could take the lead in ensuring that all Departments meet environmental targets on, for example, use of renewable energy, recycling and pollution control.

We are facing a crisis in waste-treatment capacity, and it makes no sense to examine the problems of waste management and illegal dumping in a segregated way. We need an all-Ireland waste management strategy that is driven by an implementation body that has tough enforcement powers — “enforcement” being the key word — that will move from landfill and incineration.

EU environmental directives put the onus on the Assembly to act faster and invest more in meeting new tough guidelines, and failure to comply could, potentially, cost millions of pounds. That will hit local councils, which have not been given the support or resources needed. They have led the way in waste management, and that must be recognised.

I am pleased that the recent review of environmental governance recommended that an independent environmental protection agency should be created. However,

Sinn Féin's view is that the focus must be on establishing such an agency on an all-Ireland basis. Other Members have said that also, and it makes sense for a small island.

3.00 pm

The recently published ‘Foundations for the Future’ contains wide-ranging, radical recommendations that the Assembly and the Executive must study carefully. The report calls for the establishment of an environmental protection agency and recommends the transfer of powers from several Departments, those powers to be placed in the Department of the Environment. In addition, the report highlights and signposts the need for an all-island approach to environmental issues. The protection of our environment is a core issue that transcends geographical and political boundaries. The value of cross-border implementation bodies to deliver sound environmental governance makes sense.

It is abundantly clear that the future development of environmental policy should formally go down the all-island route. Enforcement is the key; we must not allow large development companies to ride roughshod over ordinary citizens. The only way to safeguard our environment is through the creation of an independent EPA. I support the motion and amendment No 2, because of its inclusion of a time frame element. Go raibh maith agat.

Mr Wells: There is absolutely no doubt that environmental issues are becoming more important, particularly among young people. There is a rapidly increasing concern about the environment, particularly on the issues of global warming and climate change.

I feel a sense of déjà vu. In 1962 — when I was around and the Minister was not — a report recommended the establishment of an independent environmental protection agency in Northern Ireland. Nothing happened, and our environment continued to be degraded. In 1984, when I was a Member of a former Assembly — of which I am, perhaps, the only survivor present in the Chamber this afternoon — there was a similar debate when the draft Nature Conservation and Amenity Lands Order (Northern Ireland) 1985 was published.

In answer to those points, the then Minister decided to set up a review under the auspices of Dr Jean Balfour. I met Dr Balfour four times during that review. She opted not to have an independent agency. She promised us a new, strong, independent, clear voice for conservation, called the Council for Nature Conservation and the Countryside (CNCC). Twenty-two years later, very few people even know of the existence of the CNCC. If 100 people on the streets of Northern Ireland were asked what the CNCC was, they would say that it was a paramilitary organisation. Few people realise that it exists. It has had absolutely no impact. It has not been the independent voice for conservation and environmental protection — it has been totally anonymous.

Powers were transferred to the Environment and Heritage Service, and the environment continued to be degraded.

We have a third opportunity to try to correct that situation. There is no doubt that the environment in Northern Ireland desperately needs better protection. That is the one issue on which we all agree. We have seen many examples. The classic example occurred in the first Assembly when the then Minister of the Environment, Mr Dermot Nesbitt, was pressurised by developers to allow major developments to be linked up to sewerage systems that we all knew did not work. We had many seaside towns where the only attraction was a brown stream of fluids — untreated sewage — flowing into the water.

People say that there are costs attached to an EPA, and that is undoubtedly true. The fact must be accepted that infraction proceedings were taken by the European Union, and we face significant fines for our failure to implement proper sewage treatment systems. Eventually, those fines could far outweigh any expense associated with establishing an EPA.

We have seen the wholesale destruction of habitats. We have seen much of our countryside destroyed by inappropriate development, and we have seen a lower standard of environmental protection than in any other part of western Europe. I have to ask the obvious question: what is different about Northern Ireland when compared to every other democracy in the northern hemisphere? In every country in Europe, North America, Great Britain and the Irish Republic, there is an independent environmental protection agency. Somehow, Northern Ireland is totally different. Either the rest of the world is wrong, or we are wrong. It cannot be both. Is Northern Ireland's situation so unique that it does not deserve the same strong environmental protection that is afforded the rest of the world?

There are major difficulties in having environmental protection within the ambit of a Government Department. There has already been the suggestion of the problem of Crown immunity. The facts must be put right on that. Since the establishment of Northern Ireland Water, Crown immunity no longer applies to the water service in Northern Ireland. Of course, it still applies to every other Government Department and agency. So, if they cause environmental damage, there is absolutely nothing that can be done about it because one part of Government cannot prosecute another. That alone is a good reason for considering the establishment of an EPA.

I support the creation of an EPA — and I assure Members that this is a personal view, not a party view — because I believe that we need a strong independent voice to stand by the environment in Northern Ireland — a voice that will state, when things go wrong, that that cannot be allowed to continue. The EHS cannot do that because it is within the Government structures; if it tried to do so, it would be sat on, either by its own Department or by the greater Executive, and told not to rock the boat.

I support amendment No 1 because it outlines important issues. There are difficulties that have to be overcome, and a consultation will have to be undertaken. I do not believe that a decision can be taken in September on a report that has been published in June. However, I hope that, after the consultations, Ulster, like every other part of the world, will have a strong EPA — and I point out to Mr Willie Clarke that it will be an EPA for Ulster alone.

Mr Kennedy: It is always a pleasure to follow the honourable Member, particularly when he is on his hobby horse. To be fair to him, he has a long-standing record on those issues.

I welcome the debate, which has been useful. I wish to make it plain from the outset that we are minded — [Laughter.]

We are minded to support the SDLP amendment, although there remain issues of timing and costing that require further clarification and detail.

I also wish to make it plain that we have considerable concerns about the wording of the DUP amendment. Not only does it send out a message of indecision, but it hints that the Minister may reject the proposal for an environmental protection agency. We need look no further than the wording of the amendment to see the way that the Minister's mind might be working and to understand what she might be minded to do. At best, that would be to kick for touch, and the decision can perhaps join the long and growing list of decisions that the DUP Ministers have not made. At worst, a decision may once again put Northern Ireland out of step with the rest of the United Kingdom, which is a very odd position for a professedly unionist party to favour.

However, we should not be surprised by that, because the DUP manifesto was equally vague about what it would do in respect of an environmental protection agency. If I can borrow an expression used by a senior — or perhaps a junior — DUP Member, the DUP tree-hugging faction was openly at odds with that party's environment policy over this issue during the last Assembly mandate. The UUP position is one of clear support for an environmental protection agency.

At the same time, however, my party does not want this issue to be used as a stick to beat the back of our already hard-pressed farming community. The UUP wants the creation of an environmental protection agency, but it wants its terms of reference to be stringently designed so that it gains widespread support among the rural community, particularly the farmers, who, after all, are recognised as the custodians of the countryside. Therefore, we will seek to work with bodies such as the Ulster Farmers' Union to achieve a satisfactory outcome. It is for that reason that my party leader, Sir Reg Empey, the Minister for Employment and Learning, has indicated to the Minister of the Environment that a degree of caution is necessary when deciding how that can best be achieved.

The UUP is a genuine unionist party, and it wants to keep in step with the rest of the United Kingdom by creating such an agency. As people who are proud of Northern Ireland, UUP members are determined to have the best for Northern Ireland, and to end, once and for all, Northern Ireland's sad reputation for having the worst environmental record of any part of the United Kingdom.

The review of environmental governance report of May 2007 advised the creation of an independent EPA. Our party's submission to that review was delivered by my colleague Sam Gardiner. We supported the proposal at an evidence-gathering meeting of the environmental governance panel — a meeting from which the DUP and Sinn Féin were noticeably absent.

The development of such an agency is seen to be important to the people of Northern Ireland. Five thousand people took the time to write to the political parties, asking for an independent environmental protection agency to be established and for the environment to be made a higher political priority. Some 50,000 people belong to environmentally-friendly bodies in the Province. We support the motion and the SDLP amendment because people want it; and what the people want, the people should have.

Let us see progress on this, but, at the same time, design the agency in a way that commands widespread rural support. That is why my party is cautious about timings and costings but gives its broad support to the SDLP amendment.

The Minister of the Environment (Mrs Foster): I welcome this debate, indeed, any Assembly debate on environmental issues, as Members know. I thank Brian Wilson, who will make the winding-up speech, David Ford, who moved the motion and Peter Weir and Tommy Gallagher for their amendments. Many contributors made important points.

We were given a history of attempts to create an independent environmental protection agency by the Member for South Down Mr Wells, who gave us the benefit of his experience. However, the most recent idea for such an agency was proposed by the environmental governance review in its recent report, which I received on 19 June 2007. Having read that report, I said that I was open-minded about an independent agency and, indeed, about all the review's recommendations, including one that urged all political parties to appoint environmental advisers. I look forward to all parties taking action on that recommendation.

Environmental non-governmental organisations have been lobbying for an independent agency for a long time, and I have had opportunities to hear what the representatives of individual organisations have been saying on that. As has been mentioned, other stakeholders who are subject to regulations, particularly the producers, such as farmers and food processors, as well as quarry operators and other sectors of business and commerce, have a different view. Having listened to their representatives, I know that they have concerns about the cost of a new agency and its likely impact on fees.

I am pleased that we have had the opportunity to listen to the views of Members, and I shall briefly respond to some of them. Mr Ford mentioned the transposition of European directives. The need to achieve a high-quality environment is critical to the future well-being and prosperity of everyone in Northern Ireland, and for that reason I am determined not to repeat the mistakes of the past — at least while I am in office. Rather, I want to ensure that appropriate policies and legislation that will protect and enhance the environment are put in place so that all our obligations are met fully, including the timely transposition of European directives, which did not happen in the past.

In that context I am also pleased that we were able to bring into effect legislation on natural habitats under the Conservation (Natural Habitats etc) (Amendment) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2007 on 21 August to meet our commitments under the habitats directive. Legislation will further transpose the requirements of that directive and will provide consistency of approach throughout the United Kingdom.

Mention was made of waste offences, and it was said that my Department, through the Environment and Heritage Service, has not pursued people who have taken advantage of waste regulations. That is untrue. The rising number of convictions is a reflection of the extent of current and historic illegal waste activities in Northern Ireland, but the seriousness of those offences is also increasing owing to the involvement of illegal gangs. In that regard I welcome the intervention of the Assets Recovery Agency and the work that it does.

EHS has a dedicated environmental-crime section, which I had the chance to visit last week in the Klondyke Building. It is using enhanced legislation and interaction with other law enforcement agencies to try to tackle that serious issue.

Mr Ford and other Members mentioned water quality. Since 2000, there has been a 15.5 % increase in the length of rivers classified in the top two categories of chemical quality, and an 18% increase in compliance with discharge consent. Between 2000 and 2005, there was a 30% reduction in the number of substantiated pollution incidents.

Mr S Wilson: The Minister has gone through a catalogue of issues that the proposer of the motion talked about, such as the loss of habitat and the impurities in water. Will the Minister agree that, even where there are independent bodies in Scotland, England, Wales and the Irish Republic, the same complaints are still made? Taking the issue away as a core departmental function and giving it to an independent agency will not produce the panacea that the proposer has suggested.

3.15 pm

Mrs Foster: There is an element of truth in the Member's comments. Many of the points that have been raised in the Chamber concerned resources. That pertains whether environmental protection is externalised or kept in the Department. The issue is one of resources. Unfortunately, the motion and much of the discussion has not concentrated on that. That disappoints me because those of us who are trying to push for more resources for environmental protection put a lot of work into doing that.

Some Members made reference to built heritage. It is a concern that, if REGNI is implemented in the way in which it is envisaged in the report 'Foundations for the Future', built heritage work will have a low priority. As a Minister, I have a special interest in the built heritage, and I am well aware of the good work of EHS Built Heritage in identifying and listing buildings of special architectural or historical interest, in registering those buildings most at risk from deterioration or demolition, and in facilitating restoration and preservation work. Some Members may say that good work has been done but that more needs to be done. I accept that, but it is also a resource issue. Built-heritage groups are concerned that, if built heritage is part of an expanded agency of the type proposed by the review of environmental governance, the work that they do will have a low priority. I appreciate those concerns, and I take them on board.

Mr Ford said that there had been a downturn in the number of corncrakes. I can assure him that corncrakes are thriving in County Donegal and there is an expectation that they may return to Northern Ireland in the near future.

Mr S Wilson: The Braniel corncrakes.

A Member: The corncrakes are in the north. We want them back in Northern Ireland.

Mrs Foster: I am assured that they have a residential address in Londonderry.

Mr Ford mentioned that the CBI supported a review of environmental governance that should run in parallel with the review of public administration. In a letter to me, the CBI says that if a decision were taken to establish an independent environmental protection agency, it should be cost effective and focused on:

"enforcement of environmental regulation and the provision of information and advice on promoting best environmental practice".

The CBI recognises that there must be a value-for-money element to the issue.

Mr Weir referred to a lot of issues, and I welcome his comments. He talked about the concerns about the built heritage and about value for money. He also pointed out that the report did not include costings.

Mr Ford: The Minister referred to Mr Weir's comments about the lack of costings in the REGNI report; indeed, producing costs was not part of the review team's functions. However, will the Minister assure Members that she and her officials will work on the costs and benefits and return to the House as soon as possible in order to advance the discussion?

Mrs Foster: I am happy to address that question. Unfortunately, the REGNI review team was supposed to consider the cost implications, but did not fulfil that part of its remit. As soon as I received the REGNI report, I assigned officials to examine the costings, and they are working on those now. I am happy to come back either to the House to discuss the matter, or, in the first instance, to the Committee for the Environment. The latter option may, indeed, be more appropriate.

Mr Ford: Will the Minister indicate when the "first instance" is likely to be?

Mrs Foster: If the officials are quick, initial costings will probably be available to the Committee for the Environment before Christmas. Santa will bring them in his bag of goodies.

It is important to recognise that the substantive motion calls on the Executive, not the Department of the Environment, to take action. It does so because the report affects almost all Departments. I wrote to my fellow Ministers, the Comptroller and Auditor General, and, because the reports include comments on environmental justice, to the Lord Chief Justice. Most have replied, and the majority have indicated that they welcome the report but wish to see costings. The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety said that he had some initial concerns about the recommendation on the realignment of Government policy functions. He went on to talk about costings. His view is similar to those expressed throughout the Executive. Although some Members may want to use the debate as a DUP-bashing exercise — and that is a matter for them — they must reflect that the issue affects every Minister, not only the Minister who stands before the House today.

Much has been made of the independence of a new agency. There is no doubt that a non-departmental public body has freedoms that an executive agency does not. One such freedom is that chairpersons of boards sometimes feel impelled to criticise Government, and the REGNI report refers to that. It is important to point out, however, that non-departmental public bodies are required to operate within well established governance and accounting frameworks that limit their flexibility and freedom.

The legislation under which any agency is established is likely to set out its functions and powers, arrangements for ministerial appointments of the board, and mechanisms by which the DOE would sponsor or oversee the agency. The Department would set out the agency's funding regime by determining what proportion of its income would be provided through grant aid and how much it must recover through fees or by other means.

In his contribution, Mr Armstrong said:

"If it ain't broke, don't fix it."

He went on to reflect on his discussions with the farming community and spoke of the concerns about an increase in red tape and regulations. If he is concerned, he must ensure that Members have a balanced debate with open minds on that matter in order that they can consider the effects on the whole community in Northern Ireland, not just some of it.

Mr McKay spoke about areas of special scientific interest and the need to designate more. That point has been raised in the House on several occasions. He knows my position on that: if the resources were available in my departmental budget, I would designate more, but, unfortunately they are not. He asked me to show leadership and to implement the REGNI report. Mr McKay knows that that is not solely up to me. The issues with which the report deals are cross-cutting and will affect, particularly where his own party is concerned, the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development, the Department for Regional Development, and the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. He must reflect on the implications that the report will have for his party colleagues who are Ministers.

Willie Clarke said that it was a travesty that Northern Ireland did not have an environmental protection agency. He thought that such an agency would be a powerful advocate for the environment, and he spoke at length about waste and sewerage issues. If Mr Clarke has any specific issues concerning his constituency, I would be happy if he wrote to me about them. He also highlighted the fact that local councils lead the way in waste management, and I recognise that. Furthermore, I recognise the good work of councils in implementing the waste management strategy and the good work of the three waste management boards. They work closely with the Department, and that relationship will continue. Members should reflect on where we are today.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Minister, your time is up.

Mrs Foster: I took interventions.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I am advised that interventions in your case do not permit you to have extra time to speak. I apologise for that. I call Tommy Gallagher to make a winding-up speech on amendment No 2.

Mr Gallagher: It is clear that Members support the establishment of an environmental protection agency as the most appropriate arrangement for caring for our environment. I thank the Minister for her comments, some of which are encouraging. However, she mentioned costings, but I am sure that everyone here will agree that costings are not a problem. She referred to other Ministers in the Executive also raising that issue, and that is not surprising. In fact, we would be alarmed if Departments were in the hands of Ministers who did not carefully monitor the costings of all initiatives.

It is encouraging to hear that there have been some convictions for dumping illegal waste; however, in my view, there have not been enough. I am sure that I am not alone in thinking that convictions for dumping illegal waste are one thing, but cleaning up that waste is an entirely different matter, and the Environment and Heritage Service is not confronting that issue. In fact, it appears to offload the responsibility for cleaning up onto councils and, ultimately, onto ratepayers. That culture of caution and inaction in the protection of our environment is costly, and the price will be higher than that of simply establishing a new, independent environmental protection agency.

I refer again to concerns about the role of the Environment and Heritage Service in the Department of the Environment. I wish to point out —

Mr McGlone: During recent judicial reviews into the draft northern area plan and the draft Magherafelt area plan, the judge expressed a major concern in his determination and conclusions that Environment and Heritage Service, as part of the Department of the Environment, a Government Department, could not act as an independent consultative body advising that Department on matters relating to, in this instance, planning.

Mr Gallagher: The Member's comments illustrate the public's concerns about the role of the Environment and Heritage Service on environmental matters. Daithí McKay and Willie Clarke from Sinn Féin referred to an all-island approach, or, perhaps, an all-Ireland approach.

That makes common sense in relation to the environment. I notice that my colleague on the Committee Ian McCrea said that he did not support any of that. However, the environment is one issue in which the border is not recognised: we cannot stop rivers flowing or pluck the birds from the sky. There should be common sense and logic on this issue.

Billy Armstrong and Danny Kennedy mentioned the importance of working in co-operation with farmers, who are the custodians of the countryside. I agree entirely — we must work in co-operation with them and all rural stakeholders.

Jim Wells gave a passionate speech on the environment, as he usually does, and outlined the previous attempts that have been made to secure independence in monitoring the regulation of the environment. The point was well made, and I hope that as a result of today's discussion we will have that body in place during the lifetime of the Assembly.

3.30 pm

Mr Hamilton: It is a pleasure to speak so soon after the Minister of the Environment, and it was particularly interesting to hear her give a clear commitment to environmental protection — a sentiment that permeated throughout the Chamber.

It is obvious that all Members are committed to environmental protection, and there was much talk about the loss of historic buildings; the threat to certain species; the pollution of rivers, and so forth. Strong environmental protection is clearly supported throughout the Chamber. As that is our shared vision, the task is to find the best way of enforcing it in Northern Ireland.

I would not say that the motion was ill-conceived — far from it. It is obvious that the proposer and his colleagues are committed to environmental protection and are very supportive of an independent environmental protection agency. However, I concur with colleagues who said that the motion is a little premature, because the Committee for the Environment has not yet discussed the matter and the ink is barely dry on the review of environmental governance report.

Fundamental issues need to be addressed before any final decisions can be taken. There are four key areas: cost; bureaucracy; accountability; and overall necessity. Cost is of paramount importance.

The report of the review of environmental governance goes into excruciating detail at times on why an environmental protection agency should be created; its various powers; its management structure; its boards; its personnel; what reports it should produce; and even the need for an iconic headquarters building. The report discusses whether the agency should be in a historic building that has been renovated or in a state-of-the-art new one — it goes into detail about everything except costs. On page 17, which sets out the terms of reference, there is a specific reference to a “costed business case”. That costed business case is not in the report, and it is essential that work to cost the establishment of an environmental protection agency is carried out.

Mr Ford: The Member mentioned the Minister of the Environment's commitment to the environment. This afternoon, the Minister gave the House a specific commitment to do some of the costing work by Christmas that the Member is referring to. I presume that the Member would not regard a report presented to the House by Christmas as being premature.

Mr Hamilton: The Minister outlined that some initial costings could be produced before Christmas, but I will leave the detail to her and will await the results with keen interest.

The matter is important, and although some may consider the report to be wonderful, the absence of costings is pretty woeful. There are essential questions about the costs of creating and running an environmental protection agency. If the designation of areas of special scientific interest, which the Member for North Antrim Daithí McKay spoke of, is to be carried out, and an environmental protection agency performs the functions that people want it to, how much will that cost?

Resources are vital, because if they are not available, people's disappointment with the current system of environmental governance may be perpetuated by any future system. I am sure that no one who supports the need for an EPA wants to see that happen either.

I am mindful of a comment in the Macrory Report on environmental governance which, in considering options for the future, stated that fully incorporating the Environment and Heritage Service into the DOE would:

“recognize that in a country the size of Northern Ireland a more independent environment agency is too costly an exercise.”

That is worth considering, because given the tight budgetary framework within which we are living and with which we have to deal, cost is critical, and it must be addressed.

Allied to cost is bureaucracy. There is, rightly, much talk in the Chamber about the bureaucracy faced by businesses and farmers. During the mandate of the Transitional Assembly, Members supported a motion that backed the Ulster Farmers' Union (UFU) Cut it Out campaign against red tape and bureaucracy. As Peter Weir said, the UFU has made clear its concerns about increased bureaucracy through an independent EPA, and that must be addressed.

I was also struck by the comments of the Institute of Directors in its submission on the review of environmental governance. It stated that:

“a new agency will simply add another organisation, another layer of bureaucracy, another layer of costs,”

Mr Deputy Speaker: Your time is up.

Mr Hamilton: I thought that I had 10 minutes to make a winding-up speech.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Members are permitted five minutes for a winding-up speech on an amendment. I call Mr Brian Wilson to make his winding-up speech on the motion. He has 10 minutes.

Mr B Wilson: I thank the Minister for her response. I welcome her commitment to the environment, and she made some positive points. However, I was disappointed that she could not go further and accept the case for an EPA. If she had even accepted that concept, I would have considered it progress. I also welcome her commitment to providing the Assembly with the associated costings before Christmas, and I look forward to seeing them. However, the costs are not a significant issue, because most of them relate to something that has already been carried out by other Departments, and it would merely be a case of changing Departments, rather than providing new resources.

The case for the EPA is a no-brainer, as the Minister of Finance and Personnel described another issue last week. It is disappointing that we could not get agreement today. The case made by all the NGOs has the support of the public. Moreover, we have to set up some form of EPA to comply with European directives.

I am happy enough to go along with Mr Gallagher's amendment: he recognises the need for an EPA. However, Mr Weir's amendment is merely an excuse for delay. Why did some Members argue for delay? Their arguments relating to costs — among other things — do not stand. I see no excuse for further delay: we have delayed long enough. As Mr Wells said, discussions on the establishment of an EPA have persisted since 1962, so it is about time that something was done. We have gone through many inquiries, and there is no need for any more investigations. The issues have been covered many times, and amendment No 1 is an excuse for further delay.

We must also consider European law and how it is interpreted by our judiciary. Mr Weir's reference and reaction to the dictats of Judge Weatherup are wrong. Judge Weatherup was saying that the present system is inadequate and that it does not comply with European law, and that something must be done about that. We have to do something about it, even if Mr Weir does not agree.

At a recent seminar in Belfast the chairman of the UK Environmental Law Association commented that Northern Ireland was the dirty corner of the UK when it came to protecting the environment, and added that Northern Ireland had a uniquely serious problem of weak environmental regulation and enforcement.

Northern Ireland has ignored the environment for too long, and we seem to be doing it again today. We have not looked at the impact that development is having on our environment.

The other countries of the United Kingdom introduced legislation in the 1970s and 1980s, as did the Republic of Ireland. Northern Ireland is now starting to catch up — but we are doing it very slowly, because we continue to pump raw sewage into the watercourses and the sea. I have been campaigning to end the dumping of raw sewage into Belfast Lough for more than a decade, because of the impact that it has on beaches. The Department of the Environment seems to have little concern about that, and the Environment and Heritage Service is totally ineffective.

The power station at Kilroot is the dirtiest in the UK; and although Lough Neagh is one of the most polluted lakes in Europe, it is the source of most of our drinking water. The European Court of Justice has found Northern Ireland guilty on many occasions of failing to meet minimum standards set out by European directives. Environmental pressure groups continually highlight the inadequate protection of existing wildlife, sewage pollution and poor planning as areas where the DOE has failed to protect the environment.

Mrs Foster: For the information of the Member and the House, papers have been sent to the Public Prosecution Service in the first case against Northern Ireland Water. The Member should take note of that in what he is saying.

Mr B Wilson: I thank the Minister for that information, but Northern Ireland is still doing very little to resolve long-standing problems. It appears that those problems are being further deferred today.

Mr Wells said that the problem dated back to 1962. Certainly, in 1990 the House of Commons Environment Committee called for the establishment of an environmental protection agency. The Environment and Heritage Service already deals with many of the issues that an EPA would, but it is not independent, which led to the situation in 2002, for example, in which the Environment and Heritage Service's concerns over housing hotspots were ignored to let more house building take place, and so raw sewage went on being pumped into Belfast Lough.

That is a conflict between the Department of the Environment and an independent body. A piece in today's 'Belfast Telegraph' reports that the Environment and Heritage Service recommended that the planning application for the Giant's Causeway — an argument I have no intention of entering — be rejected, and yet the Minister is minded to approve it. That shows the potential for conflict in the Department. That is why we need an independent environmental protection agency.

Mr Wells: Would the Member be surprised to learn that every other European democracy has had exactly the same arguments that this Assembly is having today, only 20 years ago? Every one of them decided to go for an independent EPA, and not one of them wants to go back to having it in central Government. Is it not unusual that Northern Ireland is out of step with everyone else?

Mr B Wilson: I certainly agree. The Member has made that point much more clearly than I have. All the arguments are in favour of an independent EPA, but it is going to take longer than I would like.

Mr Weir mentioned cost in his amendment. I am not convinced that significant costs are involved. The Environment and Heritage Service is already performing regulatory and enforcement duties, and other bodies are complying with European Union directives. Those requirements have to be met, and they are being met, so there is no argument to be made that significant additional resources will be required.

3.45 pm

A certain amount of nit-picking is going on. Mr Weir said that we would have to cut our budgets. Which budget would we cut? Would we close hospitals or whatever else was needed in order to find sufficient funds? That is not necessary. The resources are already there but are not being used efficiently or effectively. They do not have the correct legislative balance, so they appear ineffective.

We have a long list of problems to solve, but we should proceed with the establishment of an independent environmental protection agency. I would like the Minister to give that commitment. An environmental protection agency would help us to lose our image as the dirty corner of the UK and would allow us to present Northern Ireland as having a green and clean environment that can attract tourists and investment.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I remind Members that if amendment No 1 is made, amendment No 2 will fall. If that happens, I shall proceed to put the Question on the motion as amended.

PRIVATE NOTICE QUESTION

Classroom Assistants' Dispute

Mr Speaker: I have received a private notice question, in accordance with Standing Order 20, for the Minister of Education.

Mr S Wilson asked the Minister of Education what action she has taken since promising the Assembly yesterday that she would intervene immediately in the classroom assistants' dispute.

The Minister of Education (Ms Ruane): Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Before I explain what I have done since yesterday's debate, Members should remember that the classroom assistants' dispute has been ongoing for 12 years. I do not want to see it continue for another 12 years.

If it takes the next few days to bring about agreement and a resolution, that is what we should do. We must work constantly and carefully until we reach a resolution, and it is important that the correct resolution be achieved.

In the same way in which Sammy Wilson clarified the role of the Committee for Education in such industrial disputes, I will clarify my role as Minister of Education. There are established industrial relations procedures between employers and staff representatives, so it is not appropriate for me to become directly involved in that negotiating machinery.

Nevertheless, as Minister, I have a role to play in facilitating and encouraging both sides to reach a resolution on the outstanding issues. Yesterday, after I had informed Members of my intention to intervene, I immediately directed officials to ensure that management side be made aware of my call for the employment authorities to proceed as swiftly as possible to implement the new grading system so that those valuable staff receive the pay rates to which they are entitled.

Ba mhaith liom a rá go poiblí nach bhfuil cothrom na Féinne ann do chúntóirí ranga agus gur mhaith liom réiteach na faidhbe seo a fheiceáil trí chainteanna.

I believe that classroom assistants have been unfairly treated, and I want to see the dispute speedily resolved through dialogue. I directed officials to ensure that management side convened a meeting with representatives. That meeting took place yesterday evening.

I was kept closely informed throughout the evening, and, as soon as the meeting ended, I ensured that officials arranged further meetings for today, and I reminded them that we would be staying with the dispute for as long as it took.

Throughout the morning, I have held meetings with officials. I have cancelled several engagements that I had planned for today so that I can focus on the matter. Before the debate, I had arranged a meeting with employers that will take place later today. Of course, I am willing to meet unions as well if that would be helpful to them. This morning, in various media interviews, I repeated my desire to avert strike action and to encourage both sides to continue to seek a settlement.

Nílím ag iarraidh cinneadh a fhorchur. Ba mhaith liom conradh gan mhoill, agus déanfaidh mé mo sheacht ndícheall seo a chur i bhfeidhm.

I want an agreement to be reached, and I am doing everything in my power to ensure that that is the outcome. As I stated in yesterday's debate, the issues are part of a bigger picture. The Assembly must give wider and more fundamental consideration to its approach to the planning and management of the education workforce in schools. I have, therefore, directed officials to commence work on drawing up draft terms of reference. To that end, I have passed on helpful correspondence that I have received from UNISON and from the Association of Teachers and Lecturers. Although outstanding issues remain at an advanced stage of negotiation, I am determined to encourage a lasting resolution to the dispute. It is vital that we all work to avoid any disruption to the education of children.

Some Members who were instrumental in yesterday's debate did not perform too well and now seek to have another go. Such an approach does a disservice to children and to classroom assistants.

Mr Speaker: Order. The Minister has the Floor.

Ms Ruane: Níl na cúntóirí ranga ag iarraidh liathróid pholaitiúil — “political football”, for those who do not speak Irish — a dhéanamh as an díospóireacht seo, nó tá roinnt Comhaltaí Tionóil ag déanamh pointí polaitíochta as an ábhar.

Classroom assistants do not want the debate or negotiations to be turned into a political football, with some of the Members who sit opposite seeking to score political points off their backs. Go raibh míle maith agat.

Mr S Wilson: I am glad to see that the Minister is in the same bad mood today as she was in yesterday. However, one thing is certain: she is not in as bad a mood as the unions and the Members of the House.

Mr McElduff: Is the Member coming to his question?

Mr Speaker: I assume that the Member is coming to his question.

Mr S Wilson: I am coming to it immediately.

The Minister said that she has kept herself directly informed of the dispute. If that were so, perhaps she can explain to the House why she admitted that she was unaware of correspondence that was sent by her Department to the management of the education and library boards.

Mr B McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Mr S Wilson: I will give way if it is in order to do so.

Mr Speaker: It is not the convention to give way in this instance.

Mr S Wilson: Yesterday, the Minister told the House that she would intervene immediately. However, today, she tells us that she cannot become directly involved, talk about negotiations, or meet representatives from either side because she is supposed to remain above involvement in the dispute. What is her role? Will she make a commitment to the Assembly, as a matter of urgency, to meet the people who are involved in the dispute, put some fresh ideas on the table, and employ departmental resources in order to ensure that the people who she says are not getting a fair deal will get a fair deal?

Ms Ruane: The letter that the Member referred to was issued without my ministerial consent or authority — [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order. The Minister has the Floor.

Ms Ruane: I will repeat what I have just said in case any Members did not hear me over those who were heckling: the letter was issued without my ministerial consent or authority. The permanent secretary, in his capacity as departmental accounting officer, felt that it was necessary to issue the letter. Later yesterday morning, I was informed that it had been sent.

I am the Minister, not the employer. I cannot usurp the role of employers, nor would it be right to create a situation where there are parallel negotiations. I have undertaken to intervene, with three objectives in mind. Before I mention those objectives, I hope that the Member who raised the matter will listen next time. I did not say that I could not meet people in the dispute. I said that I am meeting the employers today, after I have answered this Private Notice Question.

First, I intend ensuring that the interests of the children, classroom assistants and parents are paramount. Secondly, I want the employers to pay those staff the money that they deserve, and for which they have already waited too long. Thirdly, I want to facilitate the discussions between the management and unions so that outstanding issues can be resolved. I have already suggested one way in which the concerns of classroom assistants could be addressed, and that is by undertaking a much wider, and more fundamental, review of the roles of those working in education.

Republican Parade

Mr Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow one hour and 30 minutes for the debate. The Member who is proposing the motion has 10 minutes to speak, and 10 minutes for the winding-up speech. All other Members who wish to speak will have five minutes. One amendment has been selected and published on the Marshalled List. The proposer of the amendment has 10 minutes in which to propose, and five minutes for the winding-up speech.

Mr McCausland: I beg to move

That this Assembly believes that Belfast City Centre should be a shared space; deplores the Sinn Féin sponsored parade to the City Hall on Sunday, 12th August 2007, which involved depictions of I.R.A. terrorists and participants carrying guns; and calls on the PSNI and the Parades Commission to ensure that this never happens again.

The demonstration in the centre of Belfast on Sunday, 12 August 2007 was one of the most disgraceful episodes that we have seen in the centre of our capital city in quite a long time. There were many paramilitary trappings about it, and it raises serious questions about the PSNI, the Parades Commission, and Sinn Féin. The national H-block committee submitted the application forms for three main parades and one small feeder parade — a north Belfast parade from Ardoyne, via the Cliftonville Road and the New Lodge Road; a west Belfast parade which came from Twinbrook; and an east Belfast parade from Short Strand, which travelled along East Bridge Street and May Street to the city centre.

The application forms which were submitted to the PSNI, by the organisers, listed the republican bands that were to take part in the parades — many of which were known for their paramilitary dress and symbolism. Some of the bands are named after IRA terrorists; for example, the Martin Hurson republican flute band, the Ed O'Brien republican flute band, and the Burns/Moley republican flute band. A whole series of bands is named after IRA terrorists. We do not have time today to list the crimes of which those terrorists are guilty.

Mr Speaker: Order. The Member has the Floor.

Mr McCausland: Anyone, in my view, who is a member of the Irish Republican Army is a terrorist.

Mr Storey: Given Gerry Adams's continual problem with accepting the fact that he was a member of the IRA — something that he continually denies — and given the republican movement's continual denial of its 40-year sectarian campaign, does the Member agree that if a so-called "march for truth" were to be organised, that republicans would be the last people asked to do so, and that Gerry Adams would be the last person invited to speak at that event?

Mr McCausland: I agree entirely with the Member. Again, I point out that we do not have time today to list the crimes of some of those people after whom the bands are named, for example, the volunteer Sean McIlvenna republican flute band. McIlvenna was one of a group of IRA men who planted a 1,000 lb bomb that seriously injured a number of UDR soldiers.

My key point is that when those parades were notified to the Police Service of Northern Ireland, the application forms were marked “non-contentious” — even though the names of the bands were known. The police would not have known about everything that was going to happen on the day. They would not have known that people were going to walk around the centre of Belfast carrying guns. They would not have known that people were going to walk around in masks and uniform. However, they would have known enough to know that there would be something very contentious and serious about those parades. Yet the police in both north and west Belfast marked the application form for the parades “non-contentious”. That raises a serious question about the operation and activities of the police in that regard — there was a dereliction of duty and a failure on their part. We have already taken that matter up with the Assistant Chief Constable.

When it then came to passing the forms on to the Parades Commission, the only form that was passed on was the one for the east Belfast parade. The Parades Commission looked at the form and said: “There is nothing contentious about that parade. We will place no conditions and no restrictions on it.” The commission made that decision even though it knew the names of the bands that would, potentially, take part in the east Belfast parade.

Thus, the PSNI failed in its handling of the matter. Those parade applications should have been marked “contentious”. All the applications should have been sent to the Parades Commission, and there should have been a determination on each of them. In the case of the east Belfast parade, there was a failure on the part of the Parades Commission. When the Parades Commission was subsequently presented with some of the footage, films and photographs of the parade, it was quite appalled by what it saw — as, indeed, were the police. So there are issues for the PSNI and the Parades Commission, and I want to leave it there because the motion:

I want to concentrate on the fact that there is an issue here for Sinn Féin. The whole parade was organised by the national H-block committee, but, it was, in fact, a Sinn Féin parade. The chairperson was Jennifer McCann, a Sinn Féin MLA, and the main speaker was Gerry Adams. So the chairperson was a convicted terrorist, and the speaker was an unconvicted terrorist.

Of course, there was a high class of steward: Sean Kelly, the Shankill bomber, was one of the stewards on the day. It is interesting to note that one of the organisers was none other than Sean “Spike” Murray. He organises a parade such as this, but, at the same time, has no difficulty with sitting on the parades review body. Moreover, he has no difficulty with complaining about Orange Order parades in west Belfast, while being involved in the organisation of a parade, the character of which I will come to shortly. It is abundantly clear that this was a Sinn Féin event — it was organised and fronted by members of Sinn Féin and members also of the IRA.

That brings me to the parade itself and the sort of thing that could be seen on the day. From the Maiden City, Londonderry, there was the Spirit of Freedom republican flute band. They brought two bass drums — with one drum, gunmen can be painted on only two sides, but with two drums, there are four sides on which to paint. They managed to get “tiocfaidh ár lá”, a tricolour and a masked gunman on one drum and two IRA masked terrorists with heavy machine guns on the other. That is the sort of thing that was depicted on the drums.

It could be said: “Well, we did not know what was going to happen on the day”, even though the bands’ websites clearly show the sort of paraphernalia that they regularly use, but it was not just a matter of the bands — there were, of course, the Sinn Féin banners. The south Armagh band, which is named after a number of IRA terrorists, was carrying a Sinn Féin banner. What was depicted on it? Once again, it was IRA gunmen. So the bands were carrying drums with depictions of gunmen, and so on, Sinn Féin members were carrying banners with similar depictions, people such as Sean Kelly were stewarding the march, and a masked man was walking through the city centre carrying a gun. We do not know whether it was a real gun or a replica gun, because the police did not stop the man to ask him. That is why the word “gun” is used in the motion — because we simply do not know whether it was real or a replica.

Nonetheless, that was clearly one of the most appalling parades that has taken place in Belfast in a very long time. At a time when others were seeking to improve the quality of parading, Sinn Féin, including “Spike” Murray of the parades review body, was busy organising a parade such as that in the centre of our capital city.

4.30 pm

I want to make just two more points, because I know that other Members want to address various aspects of that parade. There were folk in that parade who were carrying coffins and who were supposed to be the victims of collusion. That says something to me about the absolute hypocrisy of Sinn Féin. It had people there carrying coffins, but Sean Kelly put people in coffins. Other key figures who were there that day had been putting people in coffins for the past 30-odd years.

The parade was supposed to deal with collusion. Is there not something hypocritical about that, when it is quite clear, and becoming clearer every day, that there has been collusion between the security forces and the Irish Republican Army? People such as Denis Donaldson paid the price for that collusion. What about the others, however, who have yet to be uncovered?

Mr Storey: In this House.

Mr McCausland: Possibly. Who knows? But if it is the time for truth — a point which my colleague raised a few minutes ago — surely the onus is on those who organised and facilitated that parade to give us the truth. Maybe Gerry Adams, who oversaw the IRA in 1972, will tell us who was responsible for Bloody Friday. Maybe Martin McGuinness could tell us who was responsible for the crimes and the murders that were carried out by the IRA when he was in charge. There is a lot of truth that needs to be told, and instead of having a parade about it, Sinn Féin could do much, much more to uncover the truth by simply owning up and giving us the names of the terrorists in its ranks who perpetrated a campaign of murder for 30-odd years.

Mr A Maginness: I beg to move the following amendment: Leave out all after “Assembly” and insert

“believes that public spaces should be shared; deplors any parades that include depictions of terrorism; and calls on the Police Service of Northern Ireland and the Parades Commission to ensure that parades are free from displays of paramilitarism, including banners, insignia and uniforms.”

This Back-Bench motion from the DUP is as hypocritical and as prejudiced as the march that it purports to criticise. It is an exercise in political therapy, the purpose of which is to comfort and reassure the DUP that the certainties of the old politics still exist. We have moved on, however, and Mr McCausland's party leader shares the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister with Martin McGuinness of Sinn Féin.

We now have a Sinn Féin/DUP Government, and it is important that the Back-Bench Members of the DUP realise that. They can produce political gimmicks and motions to make them feel happy and comfortable, give them a warm, orange glow in their tummies and make them believe that they are still in the trenches, but I am afraid that that day is gone. We now have an Administration in which the DUP is involved with other parties, but in which it primarily shares power with Sinn Féin. It is time for grown-up politics. It is time that people in this Chamber, and in particular the Back Benchers of the DUP, realised that there is a new dispensation.

Mr Campbell: The Member has used the term “Back-Bench motion” three times. He should understand that the motion has the unanimous support of all MLAs on the DUP Benches. Does he accept that what he has said about what exists now and reminding people of their vicious, sectarian, murderous past are not mutually exclusive?

Mr A Maginness: The Member says that the motion has the unanimous support of the DUP. That might well be the case, but there are no Ministers here, and I doubt that any Minister will contribute to the debate. There is a strong element of phoney warfare in the Chamber. This sort of adventure, primarily by the Back-Bench Members of the DUP, is permitted in order to keep the troops happy and to keep their support base happy back at home. As we are in a transition period, the leadership of the party does not want the boat rocked, so it allows this sort of thing to happen. The sooner that the DUP wakens up to the fact that it is in coalition government, the better.

The motion is selective: only two years ago guns were brought out by paramilitaries during the September riots in Belfast, and very little criticism was heard from the DUP. In Belfast City Council, where I was a member, there was very little —

Mr Newton: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. That is totally inaccurate. As Alban knows —

Mr Speaker: That is not a valid point of order, I ask the Member to take his seat.

Mr A Maginness: As a result of the police action, members of the DUP, and other unionist parties, removed themselves from the district policing partnership (DPP) in Belfast. They did not show support for the police in difficult circumstances, and any criticism of the riots was superficial and restrained. Members of the DUP rarely criticise paramilitary displays and Orange marches that have paramilitary displays or associations. Anyone is free to check that through newspapers and television transcripts.

Selectivity is at the heart of the motion, not only on the part of the DUP but also on the part of Sinn Féin. Sinn Féin called the August parade a “march for truth”. However, Sinn Féin's truth is a selective one. It calls for truth about the Army and the RUC. What about the truth about the IRA itself, people such as Stakeknife, the murder of Jean McConville, the Abercorn bombing and the deaths of the IRA men at Loughgall? Sinn Féin and the IRA do not want to get involved in those issues, because their approach is selective. Let us march for truth and find out the truth of what happened during the Troubles. We have nothing to hide; we want to see the truth. Members should unite to have a total truth recovery mechanism. All parties, in particular Sinn Féin, should support that.

Both the DUP and Sinn Féin are selective about the truth and criticising paramilitary activity. If a UDA demonstration had taken place, Sinn Féin would certainly have criticised it. If it had been a UVF or a DUP demonstration, Sinn Féin would have criticised it. Any form of paramilitary display is to be condemned. Gerry Adams referred to it as a piece of street theatre, but those who witnessed it and saw it on television did not see it like that.

They found it frightening and intimidating, and did not regard it as theatre.

I have witnessed Orange marches passing the Ardoyne shops: is that supposed to be street theatre? Could someone describe such a march, with its terrible sectarian overtones, as street theatre? It certainly is not, and to describe the march for truth as street theatre is misrepresentative. It was triumphalist and intimidatory and, in effect, it perverted rather than discovered the truth. It was totally wrong.

Town centres, and indeed towns and villages, should be shared spaces. Society has no room for paramilitary displays or anything similar. People must genuinely share the open or common spaces, and no one should be selective in the condemnation of those who transgress. Everyone should be supportive of a shared society; part of that involves being tolerant of free expression. However, there are limits to the way in which people should express themselves. Those who go out of their way to intimidate or express any form of paramilitarism do not serve the whole community well.

I propose the amendment, because it does away with the selectivity of the DUP motion, draws attention to the need for genuine sharing in society and condemns all forms of paramilitarism.

Ms J McCann: Go raibh maith agat. I oppose the motion and support the amendment.

Belfast city centre should be a shared space for everyone, including republicans and nationalists. I remember being part of a group of women, from Belfast and beyond, who gathered on international women's day, 8 March, in 1991. The RUC and the British Army prevented us from holding a rally at Belfast City Hall. We were not marching past the homes of loyalists or unionists who did not want us to be there. We were simply seeking the right to hold a rally at the City Hall to mark international women's day, but a military barricade prevented us from doing so. However, we returned time and time again and, on 25 July 1991, we were able to hold the rally at Belfast City Hall.

On 12 August 2007, I was proud to take part in the march and rally for truth at Belfast City Hall and honoured to be asked to chair it. It was organised to draw attention to collusion and British state violence, a policy that resulted in many thousands of victims being killed, injured or bereaved, and to highlight the administrative and institutional cover-up by the British Government and their state agencies. Many relatives who lost loved ones carried photographs of their dead relations that day and, as has been mentioned, there were several pieces of street theatre.

The street theatre portrayed armed RUC men, UDR men and British Army personnel who were linked to armed loyalists. There were also images of the Force Research Unit and former members of the British Cabinet to illustrate the extent and the level of the institutional state violence and collusion.

Today, it would have been more productive to discuss and advance the serious issues of collusion and truth to help all the families whose loved ones died as a result of the conflict.

Collusion existed as long as the conflict itself. It was not the act of renegades or a few bad apples, as some people would have us believe: it was an integral element in the armoury of the British military, which was financed and sanctioned by successive British Governments. Collusion was at the very heart of British state policy in Ireland and was responsible for the deaths of hundreds and hundreds of Irish citizens. Their families have as much right to pursue the truth about the murder of their loved ones as anyone else. It has been argued by some today that there was republican collusion because there were British agents in the IRA. At the march, our party leader stated clearly that this dimension of British strategy should also be investigated.

I object, as do many relatives, to any notion that there is a hierarchy of victims and that some families are more entitled to the truth than others, or that some relatives are less deserving than others, simply because of the circumstances surrounding the deaths. No one should be treated as a second-class citizen. Over the years, there have been many examples of relatives and relatives' organisations being insulted and demonised by those who speak on behalf of political parties, because they dare to seek the truth about how their loved ones died. The dignity with which those families have conducted their campaign to uncover the truth, and the determination that they have shown when political representatives have attempted to trivialise that campaign by engaging in the politics of denial, must be commended.

In my constituency of West Belfast, the Power family's son Michael was gunned down in front of his young daughter as he travelled home from Sunday mass — a victim of collusion — and the Hanna family's daughter Philomena was shot dead at work. Those families and hundreds more like them have every right to march for truth and to hold photographs of their loved ones at the City Hall. It is wrong to have a hierarchy of victims. Families of all victims of the conflict deserve to be treated with respect and dignity. We should not fear the truth. Those families are determined to pursue the truth, and Sinn Féin is determined to help them in that campaign, even though it may take a long time. If we are to build a society based on equality and respect for all, it is important to deal with the difficult issues —

Mr Speaker: The Member's time is almost up.

Ms J McCann: — and looking after the rights of all victims and their families in an inclusive way must be part of that. No one in the Chamber or outside should fear the truth.

Mr Kennedy: I thank the proposers of the motion for bringing this matter before the Assembly. The march for truth rally — as it was optimistically and euphemistically called — of Sunday 12 August had Sinn Féin's mucky paws all over it, both in promoting it and in attending it. The march was something of a fancy-dress party, but with menace. Individuals posed as IRA men — presumably no acting required there then — and there were other types of dressing up, described by one leading Sinn Féin MLA as "street theatre and pageantry". It was not so much a jamboree, as a ghoulish gathering. Some witnesses felt threatened by the actions of those involved in the parade, including a constituent of mine who is a leading campaigner on behalf of innocent victims. He was verbally abused by many so-called street artists.

It is interesting to compare the behaviour patterns of the organisers and protesters with a code of conduct handed down by that august body, the Parades Commission, in 2006. On behaviour, the code states that people should:

"behave with due regard for the rights, traditions and feelings of others in the vicinity; refrain from using words or behaviour which could reasonably be perceived as being intentionally sectarian, provocative, threatening, abusive, insulting or lewd;"

On dress, the code states:

"No paramilitary-style clothing is to be worn at any time during a public procession."

On flags, the code states:

"Flags and other displays often have a legitimate historical significance, but in no circumstances should such items relating to a proscribed organisation be displayed."

Well done the Parades Commission. We can add to those flagrant abuses of the code of conduct, the charge that those present were simply engaged in the glorification of terrorism.

The march for truth is symptomatic of the hole that Sinn Féin has dug itself into over parades. Although the strategy of using political street protests against Loyal Order parades, which Sinn Féin developed in the late 1990s, was initially declared successful, it is now working disastrously against Sinn Féin. The genie is out of the lamp, and history confirms that it is hard — if not well nigh impossible — to get the genie back in.

In the era of a bright and shared future for all, we are left with the ugly and unattractive expressions of republican street theatre and with gridlock —

Mr McCausland: Will the Member give way?

Mr Kennedy: Yes, but briefly.

Mr McCausland: Will the Member agree that Sinn Féin has made no attempt to defend itself against the accusations of paramilitary symbolism?

Mr Speaker: A Member who gives way and who has spoken for less than five minutes has an extra minute added on.

Mr Kennedy: Thank you for your kindness, Mr Speaker; you are a very generous man.

We are left with the ugly and unattractive expressions of republican street theatre, in addition to gridlock and impasse at important locations such as the Garvaghy Road in Portadown, where it is abundantly clear that Sinn Féin has lost control locally of key individuals.

Sinn Féin needs urgently to rethink how its protests affect its public image and to try to find an urgent resolution to the issue of Drumcree, which — if left unresolved — will continue to fester and eat away at political stability in Northern Ireland. I support the motion.

Mrs Long: It is convention to thank Members for bringing matters to the Floor for debate. However, on this occasion I will refrain from doing so, as I suspect — judging by the contributions so far — that it is unlikely to be an edifying, uplifting, or enlightening episode. That judgement is based on my experience of similar debates in Belfast City Hall, which are the political equivalent of poking a dog with a stick — more designed for a reaction than delivering progress. Such baiting across the Chamber does the Assembly very little justice, and more importantly does no justice to the community outside.

Depictions or glorification of any illegal paramilitary or terrorist activity are deplorable, and I have no difficulty in stating that. Therefore I have no difficulty with the wording of the motion, except that it is an attempt to deal with a complex issue on a purely selective basis. Selectivity on parades or the past is neither helpful nor constructive; it is more likely to damage than advance the prospects for a peaceful future.

It is good practice during a debate to respond to comments from other Members, but again I will refrain from doing that as it would not be productive. I will try to focus on the wording of the motion and the amendment, which refer to the responsibility of the Parades Commission and the PSNI. The primary responsibility for the tone and conduct of any parade lies with the organisers, whether they are political groups, Loyal Orders or any other grouping. Organisers must show respect not just to those involved in a parade but to those who are not. The rights to assemble, march and demonstrate are not unqualified — they must be exercised responsibly and with respect.

Both the motion and the amendment refer to shared space. If we really want to create stability in Belfast and throughout Northern Ireland, we need to share more than just space.

We must share a commitment to work together for a better future. That requires people to be measured in how — not whether — they raise issues in the Chamber or outside it. If Members in the Chamber — and people outside it — want to find ways of inflaming tension through provocative displays and parades or through provocative debates in the Chamber, we can do that. However, the question is not whether we can, but whether we should.

For the sake of the community, Members must focus on trying to move things forward, rather than back. If we are going to debate the difficult issues, let us do so in a productive and constructive manner, rather than the manner in which we are doing it today, and the manner in which it was done in August. I support the amendment.

Mr Newton: It will come as no surprise that I support the motion. I am surprised at the attitude of the SDLP in tabling the amendment, because a similar — almost exactly the same — motion was debated in Belfast City Council some months ago, when the SDLP did not take part in the debate or vote on it; its members abstained. That suggests — as one of my colleagues said — that the SDLP is selective in how it approaches issues.

In proposing the amendment, Alban Maginness said that there was a need for grown-up politics in the House, and I agree with him. However, he misled the House through his comments about the attitude of unionist members of district policing partnerships to the very serious rioting that happened two years ago in north Belfast, and which spread to the east of the city. At one stage, 700 young men and women were rioting on the Albertbridge Road. He referred to unionists vacating their seats on the DPPs, and commented that that was a negative reaction.

Had that not happened, I believe that the rioting would have been worse, because the withdrawals from the DPPs acted as a steam valve releasing pressure. After the unionists vacated their seats, intensive work was done with the police to resolve the situation, and the conditions were created in which the unionist community felt comfortable and elected representatives were prepared to, again, play a positive role in DPPs.

Senior Sinn Féin figures have mentioned street theatre, but that is similar to how Michael Stone described his actions when he attempted to enter this Building, and I do not think that anyone regarded his actions as street theatre.

Mrs Long spoke on behalf of the Alliance Party in the debate. It is not so long ago that an incident occurred at a bonfire site in the east of the city, when masked men appeared at an event that was supported by Belfast City Council. There was extensive debate in the Belfast City Council chamber as to whether that activity on the eleventh night — by men dressed in paramilitary uniform — should be condemned. Ultimately, the community was condemned because the Alliance Party was involved in removing funding for the Twelfth celebration bonfire for the subsequent year. One cannot have it both ways.

5.00 pm

There never was a march for truth. If ever an event was misnamed, it was that march into the centre of Belfast. The march was riddled with duplicity and deceit. When Gerry Adams spoke about truth, there was only one truth he was concerned with. He failed to mention the hundreds of innocent Roman Catholic people who were murdered by the IRA; the thousands of innocent people who were injured by republican thugs, and the millions of pounds worth of damage that the republican campaign did to the economy of Northern Ireland. He did not make one mention of the businessmen who were contributing, and would have continued contributing through inward investment, but who were driven away from the doors of the job-creation agencies of Northern Ireland.

One would expect those with a unionist perspective to view the march as a shameful event, but even neutral observers — foreigners visiting Northern Ireland — were concerned at the presence of some of the people to whom my colleague Nelson McCausland referred. The real purpose of the rally was to assuage the concerns of Sinn Féin followers who are finding it difficult to live with the political realities of today.

Mr Molloy: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. First, the House should consider the issue in a cool and collected way. Although the motion may not be welcomed as one of the more beneficial aspects of debating in the Chamber, and while there are probably better things that we could do, it is useful in helping Members to focus on the difficult issues and how those can be managed in the future.

I agree with the idea that the Assembly believes that Belfast city centre should be a shared space. Having taken part in the civil rights marches 40 years ago, I share the idea that town centres should be shared spaces that are open to everyone. On many occasions, I was battered out of town centres, such as in Dungannon, by the RUC.

Mr Storey: Given the fact that the Member is admitting that he was in the civil rights movement and was engaged in other things, would he tell the House if he was ever a member of the IRA?

Mr Speaker: The Member may take an extra minute.

Mr Molloy: Thank you for the extra minute. The shared space that the civil rights movement tried to create in Dungannon but was battered out of, led to the situation in which we were trying to gain political control.

The imagery used in the motion is that of RUC men, UDR men, those involved in undercover operations in collusion with loyalist paramilitaries, and the Glenanne gang. All of those were very clearly identified. In some cases, they were in makeshift RUC and UDR land rovers. If that is the DUP's impression of terrorists, then it is what we have seen for the past 30 years on the Falls Road. I am surprised that the DUP is so annoyed at seeing the imagery of the British Army back on the Falls Road. Surely, that should not annoy unionists.

Mr Kennedy: Will the Member give way?

Mr Molloy: No, I will not give way again.

The parade was about the truth. If Mr Storey and others are calling on the British Government to tell the truth about collusion, and the activities of the British Army and the RUC in undercover operations, I am quite willing to go along with the DUP and demand that same explanation. The march was about the victims of state violence and collusion, who have come through the past 30 to 40 years of conflict, coming on to the street to hear the truth exposed. They wanted the truth about what happened to their loved ones, and that applies to RUC victims, UDR victims and loyalist victims, because Gerry Adams addressed all the victims and said that he wanted truth for all victims. He was not selective.

The families wanted to know why their loved ones were victims; why they were shot; why they were murdered, and why they were murdered by the Glenanne gang. There was a person who wanted to know the role of the British Army, the British Government, the Irish Government and the gardaí in the collusion with the Glenanne gang over the Dublin/Monaghan bombings.

As so many people seem to have been observing the parade, it might have been worthwhile if they had actually listened to what was being said. Perhaps it reflects more on them that they did not.

Street theatre has an important role to play. We should lighten up a bit. The shared future in Belfast and other city and town centres should mean a shared future for everyone, in which everyone can present their case.

Pageantry contains violence. The Scarva sham fight involves violence, with men fighting with swords and pretending to kill one another. Is that not an example of violence? Is that not the same situation? The families of victims from the murder triangle on the march were looking to discover the truth about RUC men who were involved in collusion with loyalist paramilitaries in that area.

Yes, I want to see the truth come out, and for it to be dealt with. Mr Kennedy talked about fancy dress. Many nationalists and republicans perceive some of the activities in which he is involved, such as band parades, to be just a bit of fancy dress. Everyone's perception of what others do is very much an issue of fancy dress, and perhaps Mr Kennedy knows more about fancy dress than I do.

Mr Kennedy: Will the Member give way?

Mr Molloy: Perhaps when he is talking to —

Mr Kennedy: Will the Member give way?

Mr Speaker: Order. The Member should not persist.

Mr Molloy: When he is talking to the South Down Defenders and beating the drum along with them — he can only beat one drum at a time, I know — he should take into account the imagery that he sends out to the nationalist community.

I welcome the comparison that Mr Maginness from the SDLP drew between the IRA and the British Army during the conflict between the Irish Republican Army and the British Government. Unionists must be careful in their attempts to demoralise by simply calling all the victims "those who were involved in terrorism". That is their way of dealing with the situation. Unionists should look at how the image of calling the IRA volunteers "terrorists" comes across in other parts of the world.

I am open to the idea that prison wardens, the RUC, the British Army and others were let down and betrayed by the Government that they thought they were supporting, and that the Government ran away and abandoned them. I accept that unionists want to know the truth about all that, and I support them in that. However, instead of complaining about the fact that a march was taking place in Belfast on 12 August 2007 — three days after the anniversary of internment — people came out demanding to know the truth of what happened, and I welcome that. Go raibh maith agat.

Lord Browne: As a humble Back-Bencher, I support the motion that stands in my name and in the name of my three party colleagues. Rather than be perceived as a provocative attempt to stir up tension or ill feeling, I hope that the motion will be seen as a measured and appropriate reflection of the horror and disgust that rightfully emerged following the Sinn Féin-sponsored so-called march for truth.

Terrorism has no place in our society, nor has the petty glorification of the sordid deeds of our past, especially if that glorification is an attempt to shore up Sinn Féin support among an outdated, defeated bunch of despots and retired revolutionaries. The parade was a pathetic, unwarranted and unnecessarily hostile display — [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Lord Browne: — of the worst elements in our society, and one that the Chamber should unite against today. Unfortunately, although some may have seen the dangers attached to such a parade, those in the Parades Commission and the PSNI seemed to be oblivious to the divisive effect that such a display could have. If one were to trawl through the Parades Commission website, one would see that almost every parade that is organised by the Loyal Orders that enters any shared space in Belfast, or potentially passes by a predominately nationalist area, is marked “contentious”. In contrast, the only parade marked “contentious” on 12 August was the national H-Block committee feeder parade from my constituency of East Belfast. That was despite the fact that each of the parades contained well known IRA-associated bands. As we have heard, those bands had images of terrorists, criminals and murderers on their drum skins.

The fact that the Parades Commission failed even to consider the potential contention that such elements could cause raises serious questions about its capability and impartiality on such matters. Thank goodness that we now have a strategic review of parades and, it is to be hoped, a more appropriate method of dealing with every public procession in Northern Ireland.

The Parades Commission cannot prohibit parades or circumvent human rights; however, it can use its powers to restrict a parade to the same effect — it does so in the unionist community all the time. For it to not even recognise the need to consider restrictions for every section of that parade, apart from the contingent from the Short Strand, is as inexcusable as it is inexplicable.

Consider the flip side for a moment. When any reference is made during Loyal Order parades to the historical UVF or the sacrifice of the 36th Division at the Somme, members of Sinn Féin wax lyrical about the sensitivities of the victims of the Troubles and the potential for adverse community relations.

Mr Spratt: Will the Member agree that difficulties within republicanism as a result of recent Sinn Féin U-turns have obviously panicked that party into portraying itself as hard line in order to quell discontent? Sinn Féin has entered the Assembly, gleefully administers British rule, accepts the British judicial system and has pledged its support for the Police Service of Northern Ireland.

Lord Browne: I thank the Member for South Belfast for that contribution. This parade was simply an attempt to shore up Sinn Féin’s support.

When the highly professional Ulster Volunteer Flute Band from east Belfast took part in a private function in Belfast City Hall on 11 July, as part of the Orange Order’s Orangefest celebration, the Member for West Belfast Paul Maskey did everything in his power to ensure that the event did not proceed. He continues to raise the matter in the council, describing it as an unacceptable event in the shared space of the City Hall. However, when masked men in paramilitary uniforms took to the streets of Belfast city centre in some misplaced search for the truth, his brother the Member for South Belfast refused to see any problem.

As Members have heard, Sinn Féin regards the whole parade as street theatre — something that everyone could enjoy. To contrast such a gratuitous display with a thoughtful stage drama such as ‘Observe the Sons of Ulster Marching Towards the Somme’ beggars belief.

If Belfast City Hall cannot accommodate a skilled flute band in a private function which commemorates the sacrifice of those who offered us the freedoms of association and speech that Sinn Féin so easily abuses, Belfast’s city streets certainly should not play host to masked gun-toting terrorists and the supporters of a wicked and intolerable past.

I commend the motion to the House, and I hope that Members send a clear, unamended message to those who have yet to move on that the glorification of terrorism is not — and will not be — acceptable in our society.

Mr O’Dowd: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. This motion, whatever the intention, is a complete and utter waste of time. Members have no power over the Parades Commission. I thought that the DUP, and members of the Orange Order within the DUP, did not talk to the Parades Commission. I am delighted to hear that they are now engaging with it. The Parades Commission is not at the top of my Christmas card list either, but I am glad to see the engagement. If members of the DUP have issues relating to that parade, they must bring them to the Parades Commission. There is no point in bringing those issues to this Chamber.

Mr McCausland: Will the Member give way?

Mr O’Dowd: I will not.

We have no powers over the PSNI — because, apparently, the DUP is not ready. In any case, members of the DUP went to the PSNI and lodged a complaint. No one, to the best of my knowledge, has been questioned about any offence at that parade, and it is worth noting that no arrests were made on the day, even though thousands upon thousands of people were on the streets. The number of PSNI officers required to marshal the parade was minimal, and none of them was wearing body armour or riot gear — just short-sleeved shirts on a nice Sunday afternoon, watching the parade pass. The DUP has made its complaint to the PSNI — the PSNI can deal with it.

It is also worth noting that there has been no ministerial response. What is the point of tabling a motion in an Assembly that has no powers to deal with the issues raised? Alban Maginness has suggested reasons why the motion was tabled, and I agree with most of them.

5.15 pm

Perhaps the media attention that followed the debate in Belfast City Council excited some of my colleagues on the opposite Benches. It took four Members from Belfast to sign the motion, some of whom represent the most deprived wards in Belfast. However, I will return to that issue.

The proposers of the motion felt so strongly that the most important thing that happened during the summer was a peaceful parade that they wanted to debate it twice. They could have debated the attempted murder of a police officer on 21 July — but no, loyalists were responsible for that. They could have debated rioting in Bangor, during which there was an attempt to murder PSNI officers — but no, they will not debate that. They could have debated the statement by a senior Ulster Defence Association member that loyalists would no longer marshal Orange Order parades — but no, they will not debate that either.

Mr Kennedy: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. Are Members allowed to engage in what might be called Chamber theatre during a debate?

Mr Speaker: I am aware that some Members have been using visual aids in the Chamber. It is not right to use visual aids in the Chamber at any time.

Mr Kennedy: Apologise.

Mr O'Dowd: Nelson has a folder full of photographs.

Mr Speaker: Let me be clear; the rule applies to all Members.

Mr O'Dowd: I had better not crumple my last piece of paper in case I offend sensitive Members. The proposers of the motion could also debate loyalist bonfires. The names of young Catholic children who died of heart attacks and other ailments were attached to a bonfire. When the father of one of the children removed them, his house was attacked by a loyalist mob — but no, they will not discuss that issue either. Instead, they choose to debate a peaceful parade through the streets of Belfast for no other reason than to gain some headlines. However, I suspect that the media might be as bored with this matter as everyone else is.

Do the proposers from North and East Belfast have nothing better to do with their time? Do they honestly believe that their constituents sent them here to discuss this issue? North Belfast has some of the most deprived wards in Ireland. Such levels of unemployment and deprivation must be rectified, and the Assembly is charged with rectifying them. That is something that we can deal with.

In East Belfast, the heart of manufacturing industry —

Mr Storey: Youse bombed it.

Mr Speaker: Order. The Member has the Floor.

Mr O'Dowd: — the manufacturing industry has collapsed. Would Members not better spend their time doing something about that? I know that Sammy Wilson skips between east Belfast and Larne. Larne has its own problems. Is there nothing going on in Larne that would be a better subject for debate in the Assembly?

No decision can result from this debate; there will be no ministerial response. If Members are serious about wanting a result, it will not happen today.

The debate and the parade are really about collusion, and about the importation of guns to loyalist paramilitaries by the British state. Those guns are now pointing at the unionist community. Those same guns are being used in the loyalist feud and have killed more than 25 Protestants since the DUP came to power. What is the DUP doing about that? Can we debate that?

If we ever reach the truth, as my colleague Francie Molloy said, the truth about the origin of those weapons will come out; the truth about why they are still being held will come out, and they will no longer be pointed at the unionist community. Is that not an important issue?

Mr Speaker: The Member's time is almost up.

Mr O'Dowd: I support the amendment.

Mr Attwood: In taking part in the debate, I am mindful of Naomi Long's health warning: what progress will come from it? I will try to answer that question.

Although I do not support the motion, I do not agree with John O'Dowd's statement that it is an utter waste of time. Issues about victims and a shared society are the business of the Assembly, particularly the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, which is in the hands of the DUP and Sinn Féin. Mr O'Dowd was wrong to make that assertion, just as the DUP was wrong to make the assertions that are contained in the motion.

This debate should be about the issue of truth. Members should be discussing — and I hope that we will have the opportunity to do so soon — what Denis Bradley, Lord Eames and others are currently doing in respect of dealing with the past. They carry a very difficult and heavy burden.

The SDLP fears that, if Members do not get their heads round the issue of the truth of the past, it will come back in our faces. There are elements in unionism who do not want the truth about the RUC to come out. There are also elements in the British Establishment who do not want the truth about MI5 and the British Army to come out, and there are definitely elements in loyalism and republicanism who do not want the truth of what they did for 35 years to come out.

If those elements in the British system, unionism, republicanism and loyalism converge at the same time, for the same end — namely, that they do not want the truth of their past to come out — Lord Eames and Denis Bradley will be ill served, and the community will be ill served by the fact that the truth will be buried. That is a realistic and possible scenario. We know that, because the IRA and the British Government conspired and colluded to bring about that outcome two and a half years ago in their proposals regarding the on-the-runs and state killings. That was an attempt to bury the truth of the past.

Jennifer McCann said that no one should be treated as a second-class citizen. It was her party and the British Government who worked together to create a system of justice that was second class in respect of dealing with the on-the-runs and state killings. Therefore, if Jennifer McCann wants to talk about no one being treated as a second-class citizen, her party should not produce, for people in the North, a second-class system of justice regarding the on-the-runs and state killings.

In one way I welcome the debate, because it appears that elements in the DUP recognise that good authority in the North needs to be upheld. That is implicit in the statement calling on the PSNI and the Parades Commission to ensure that the type of parade that took place on 12 August 2007 never happens again. That statement, for what it is worth, attempts to ensure that good authority in the North is upheld. I hope that the DUP will follow through with that by recognising, and urging everybody to recognise, the authority of the current Parades Commission.

There is an ongoing review of the future of parades. That review is in real danger of trying to replace the architecture that exists around parades at the moment with another version of political fixes between the big political parties in the North. My sense is that the review will report to the Assembly, and to the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, that if Members think that the Parades Commission is not good enough, the authority regarding parades should be addressed by the politicians working together. That is a recipe for conflict and chaos in the future.

I urge the DUP to view the Parades Commission in a new light and recognise that that body has good authority, regardless of the differences that there have been in the past. The DUP should embrace the Parades Commission now, rather than try to create some political fix, through the Ashdown review, regarding parades in the future.

I also urge the Ulster Unionists to accept the amendment. The reason why it should be accepted is that Alban Maginness has outlined the right principles, to do the right thing, at the right time for the Assembly as regards elements of that obnoxious parade organised by republicans last August in this city.

Mr S Wilson: The Alliance Party has accused the DUP of proposing the motion only because we wanted to poke the dog with a stick. I assure the Member for East Belfast Naomi Long that it is not a case of poking the dog with a stick — the motion was designed to bash the dog on the head.

Unfortunately, and for far too long, Sinn Féin has been allowed to get away with hypocrisy, double standards and lecturing —

Mr Molloy: Will the Member give way?

Mr S Wilson: I will not give way now but I might later.

For too long, Sinn Féin has been able to lecture everyone else about standards of parading, about what others should do, and about respecting other people. However, when Sinn Féin Members are put to the test, they totally ignore the sensitivities of people whose relatives were killed by terrorists in the past 30 years. As Mr Kennedy, a Member for Newry and Armagh, pointed out in his excellent speech, Sinn Féin totally ignores the strictures of the Parades Commission, which it elevates and to which it runs on occasion in order to have restrictions placed on unionist and loyalist parades across Northern Ireland. The motion is timely, not just because Back-Benchers want to let off a bit of steam, but because this is a real issue and because Sinn Féin's hypocrisy must be addressed.

Members have heard lame excuses from Sinn Féin today. The party tells unionist Members that they should not worry about the parade; and asks why they are dancing about in agitation; and deems it only a piece of street theatre, or, as Mr Kennedy pointed out, a Sinn Féin fancy-dress party. Sinn Féin claims that it was only acting out what had happened in the past — Sinn Féin actors were dressed up as members of the RUC, the UDR, the British Army, and IRA terrorists. Next, we will hear that Sinn Féin is going to the Arts Council for a grant, or even demanding an Oscar for those who acted. Mr Kennedy said to me that he knew who was acting out the part of the IRA informer who was colluding: he was the boy who won the Brit award in the whole show. [Laughter.]

We are being sold the line that we should be pleased that Sinn Féin is bringing street theatre into Belfast city centre on a sunny Sunday afternoon. However, had an Orange parade been marching down the Newtownards Road or the Albertbridge Road with even so much as a flag depicting the symbol of a paramilitary organisation, Sinn Féin agitators from Short Strand would have been down to the Parades Commission and round at Mountpottinger police station whingeing for the next year to ensure that that parade is never allowed again.

It is right that the House should debate the motion —

Mrs Long: Will the Member give way?

Mr S Wilson: I am more than happy to give way now.

Mrs Long: Will the Member clarify that he does not defend the display of loyalist paramilitary symbols in Orange Order parades? One might be confused about that, given the terms in which he has spoken.

Mr S Wilson: I never gave the impression that I would defend such a thing. However, since the Member wants clarification, I would not defend it. I made that clear.

However, it seems that the standards that apply on the other side of the Chamber do not apply to this side. It appears that we should be prepared somehow to accept Sinn Féin behaving in such a way in Belfast city centre, regardless of the offence that it causes and regardless of the message that it sends out.

I am touched at Sinn Féin's concern for the working-class people of east Belfast, north Belfast and Larne. Mind you, that does not stop some of its agitators in front-line areas of north Belfast. This morning, I drove down the Limestone Road to avoid the traffic jams and saw the large number of houses that have their windows blocked and roofs destroyed. They were good houses that might have been used to meet the housing shortage in north Belfast, but they were destroyed because republican agitators do not care too much about the living conditions of poor working-class Protestants who live in that area; rather, they torture them nightly.

We are told that Sinn Féin is concerned that we are wasting time in the debate and failing to debate issues that affect directly people in north, west or south Belfast or Larne.

5.30 pm

The fact is that this issue affects those people — and Sinn Féin's attitude to republican violence affects those people. In the Assembly, Members debate many issues over which they have no control but on which they want to give their views. Recently, Sinn Féin Members tabled a motion on tax-raising powers, which rest with Westminster. Nevertheless, the Assembly wanted to inform the Government at Westminster of its views. Equally, today's debate gives Members an opportunity to inform the police and the Parades Commission of their thoughts and what they believe needs to be done about provocative parades. The debate is not a waste of time: it raises a legitimate issue and is acceptable to the Assembly.

The reason that Sinn Féin Members did not want the debate to take place was that the only excuse they could give was that the parade was a piece of theatre and not a coat-trailing exercise through the centre of Belfast. Sinn Féin Members cannot answer the charge that their attitude towards unionist parades is hypocritical, or that they claim to support non-violence but still hanker after those who committed violence for the past 30 years. This debate is an embarrassment to them, and all they can do is have the brass neck to stand up and make paltry excuses.

Mr O'Dowd: During my contribution, I said we would not resolve the issue in here today. There is one way to resolve the issue: those who are concerned about the parade could sit down with the organisers and thrash out the issues in order to work towards having a parade, with concerns addressed, for next year.

Mr S Wilson: I thank the Member for his intervention. However, I do not think that there is much to discuss in order to fix the situation. The issues have been examined already: bands with drum skins depicting gunmen, and gunmen marching down the street in full regalia. Those types of things could be addressed easily and without people on either side sitting down together. The point of having the Assembly debate is that republicans can hear unionist concerns first-hand.

The Parades Commission knows what it has to do, and the police know what they have to do. It is important that the issues have been raised during the debate so that we do not have a repeat of the situation.

In closing, the DUP does not believe that the SDLP amendment is necessary. Other Members and I have made it clear that what we say about the parade in question applies to other parades as well. The motion relates to a specific event that occurred over the summer period. The problem with the SDLP's approach is that while they are prepared to condemn with words what they have seen Sinn Féin do in Belfast city centre on 12 August, they are not prepared to march through the lobbies to condemn it. Therefore, their motion is an attempt to run away.

In tabling the amendment, SDLP Members are running away from their responsibility to point the finger of blame at people who involved themselves in an obscene march on 12 August.

Monday 1 October 2007

The Assembly met at 12.00 noon (Mr Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT

Bluetongue/Foot-and-Mouth Disease

Mr Speaker: I have received notice from the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development that she wishes to make a statement on the current situation regarding bluetongue and foot-and-mouth disease.

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development (Ms Gildernew): Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I wish to make a statement on the current bluetongue situation in England and the actions that I have taken to prevent it from spreading here; also, I will give an update on the foot-and-mouth outbreak in England and my response to that.

It is of great concern that bluetongue has been confirmed in south-east England. What is particularly unfortunate for the farming industry is that this has happened while the foot-and-mouth outbreak is ongoing. My priority continues to be to do everything possible to stop bluetongue and foot-and-mouth disease from entering the North.

First, I shall give an update on the bluetongue situation. I shall start by explaining what bluetongue is, and by outlining the disease situation that has been developing in northern Europe over the past year. Bluetongue is a viral disease, spread by biting insects, that affects all ruminants, but particularly cattle and sheep. It does not affect humans, so there are no human- or public-health implications. The bluetongue virus cannot be transmitted directly between animals; it is spread by midges that bite infected animals and pass the infection to uninfected ones.

Bluetongue can have a significant economic impact through on-farm losses, due to death, sickness and reduced productivity, and lost export revenue, as live exports from affected areas are banned. There are no implications for meat or dairy products.

In Europe, bluetongue has usually been found only in the Mediterranean area, but in August 2006 a different strain of bluetongue was found in the Netherlands, Belgium, Luxembourg, western Germany and parts of northern France. Unfortunately, during the summer of 2007, the disease has re-emerged in a more virulent form in the same countries, spreading more widely than in the previous season.

This year, the disease situation in northern Europe is, therefore, much worse than in 2006, with over 5,000 confirmed cases of bluetongue reported in those countries in the past nine weeks; there have also been reports of increased mortality rates in animals and milk production losses. The existing restricted zones now extend across the whole of Belgium, the Netherlands, Luxembourg, a large proportion of Germany and a large area of north-eastern France. The German restriction zones also extend into parts of Denmark, the Czech Republic and Switzerland.

On Saturday 22 September, the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (DEFRA) detected bluetongue in an animal on a farm near Ipswich in Suffolk. The strain has been confirmed as serotype 8, which is the same strain that has been found in northern Europe since August 2006. That is a serious development. It is the first time that bluetongue has ever been recorded in Britain. It has never been recorded on the island of Ireland.

By Sunday 30 September, bluetongue had been detected on a further 14 premises in south-east England. Initially, the premises were all placed under restriction, and the infected cattle were culled because they could have been a source of infection for the local midge population, which could go on to spread infection by biting other animals.

At that stage, bluetongue was not considered to be confirmed in Britain because, unlike other diseases, bluetongue is not confirmed on the basis of positive individual animals. EU law requires that, in order to confirm an outbreak, there must be evidence that the virus is circulating between the local animal and midge populations.

On 25 September, DEFRA put in place a bluetongue temporary control area in eastern England, and surveillance was carried out to determine whether the disease was circulating. After further investigations, on Friday 28 September, DEFRA confirmed that the disease is, indeed, circulating in East Anglia. At present, DEFRA believes that bluetongue was introduced into Suffolk in early August 2007 as a result of wind-borne movement of infected midges from the bluetongue outbreak in northern Europe.

DEFRA has now established a 20 kms control zone around the area in East Anglia where cases have been identified to date. Ruminant animals are able to move within the bluetongue control zone but not out of it, except to slaughter in the bluetongue protection zone of 150 kms that surrounds the control zone. Ruminants are able to move around within the bluetongue protection zone but not out of it. Now that bluetongue has been confirmed in England, infected animals will no longer be compulsorily slaughtered because the virus is circulating in the local midge population.

I will now say something about the actions that I am taking to prevent bluetongue from spreading here. My priority continues to be to keep bluetongue out of the North, if possible, and my Department has a range of precautionary measures in place to minimise the risk of bluetongue reaching here. In the light of the heightened risk from northern Europe since August 2006, imports of susceptible animals from bluetongue-restricted areas in EU member states have been banned. As a safeguard, animals and the vehicles in which they travel across the restricted areas are sprayed with insecticide.

The Department carries out post-import testing of imported cattle and sheep from continental Europe. Those animals are restricted and isolated, pending negative test results. All test results to date from that post-import testing have been negative. The Department has also advised potential importers to request that animals are pre-import tested as an additional precaution.

Our ports remain closed to the import of live animals from Britain because of the foot-and-mouth disease preventative measures that I reintroduced here on 12 September; that gives us dual protection from bluetongue. In response to the foot-and-mouth disease outbreaks in Britain, my officials have traced and examined all consignments of cattle, sheep, goats and pigs imported directly from Britain since the beginning of July. All examinations were negative for signs that could be attributed to either foot-and-mouth disease or bluetongue, which has given me some reassurance that bluetongue has not spread to the North.

Over the past six months, my Department has been working in partnership with key stakeholders here, through the bluetongue working group, on preparedness to deal with the threat of bluetongue; it will continue to do so. In May 2007, my Department, in conjunction with its key stakeholders, issued advice to the industry about bluetongue, including information about clinical signs. That leaflet is available on the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development (DARD) website, along with other comprehensive information on bluetongue. I did have a copy of the leaflet with me, but I have mislaid it; I apologise for that. However, it is available for any Members who may wish to use it.

That leaflet has just been handed to me, so Maurice, you can have a wee look at it if you like. You were slagging me off about it.

Lord Morrow: You said that you did not have it.

Ms Gildernew: I am holding it up now — I hope that that makes you happy.

In June, the Department followed up publication of that leaflet with further advice to local importers to highlight the potential risks of importing animals from those northern European countries in which bluetongue is present.

In light of the detection of bluetongue in England, I have asked the farming community here to remain vigilant for signs of the disease by regularly — at least daily — inspecting their animals for symptoms, and to report any suspicions immediately.

We are working closely with industry stakeholders. Last week, my officials met with key stakeholders in the bluetongue working group. That meeting provided an opportunity to share information on developments in the disease situation, to exchange views, and to review the precautionary measures that are in place here. I thank the stakeholders for their ongoing constructive engagement with us on the disease.

We are continuing to liaise closely with our counterparts in Britain and in the South to monitor the bluetongue situation. We are also working closely with the South to co-ordinate our preventative actions to protect the whole island from bluetongue.

Our current veterinary risk assessment is that the preventative measures that we already have in place continue to be appropriate to the risk of the disease's being introduced to the North through live animals. We will keep that position under active review in line with developments in the situation.

Unfortunately, it is not really possible to control the movement of infected midges, but we are working with the Met Office to seek advice on the pattern of air movements that may carry midges this way. The potential for spread will be lessened by the onset of winter, as the vector cannot survive in very cold conditions. However, we cannot be complacent, and, if necessary, I will not hesitate to take whatever action is required to keep the island of Ireland free from bluetongue.

My Department has a contingency plan to put in place if bluetongue reaches the North. That plan is subject to a continuous process of review and updating. Any action would be in line with the bluetongue control strategy, which has been developed in consultation with local industry stakeholders through the bluetongue working group. The strategy recognises that different regions have different priorities to consider, and it provides for us to respond in a way that is specific to our circumstances.

In conclusion, I will continue to ensure that all efforts are made to prevent the spread of bluetongue to the North. My Department will continue to keep the position under active review, depending on developments in Britain, and will continue to work in partnership with key stakeholders to mitigate the threat of bluetongue incursion. I remind farmers to remain vigilant and to report any concerns immediately.

I will now update the House on any developments in the situation with foot-and-mouth disease in England since I made my previous statement three weeks ago and gave my response to that outbreak.

It is very unfortunate that, within only a couple of days of my previous statement, on 12 September, a further case of foot-and-mouth disease was confirmed in England. That was confirmed to be the same strain as the two cases that occurred in August. Since then, there have been a further five confirmed cases, which means that there have now been eight confirmed cases of foot-and-mouth disease in Surrey since 3 August.

I moved very quickly on 12 September to protect our industry from the outbreak. Even before the disease was confirmed, I put precautionary measures in place, in view of the strong suspicion of disease in England. Those mirrored the preventative measures that I took when the outbreak was confirmed in Britain in early August. I took immediate action to close our ports once again to cattle, sheep, goats and pigs from Britain. I revoked, with immediate effect, all DARD-specific import licences for such animals. I sent one consignment of cattle back to Britain that was en route to Larne.

I also reintroduced an immediate ban on the import of certain animal products from Britain, including fresh meat from susceptible animals and unpasteurised milk. I ordered that disinfectant mats should be reinstated at local ports and airports and that literature should be handed out.

By 13 September my officials had identified and traced all consignments of cattle, sheep and pigs that had been imported directly from Britain since 23 August. In total, 75 consignments were confirmed as having been imported into the North. None of those consignments came from the Surrey area.

By 14 September, inspections of all consignments had been completed, and all examinations were negative. That has given me some assurance that no disease has spread to here. A programme of follow-up visits to those animals is ongoing, and individual animals will remain restricted until the revisits have been completed.

Based on our risk assessment, I decided to apply no restrictions on the movement of animals in the North, except to those imported animals, and to apply no constraints on the operation of slaughterhouses, shows, markets and assembly centres here. Access to the countryside continues to be unrestricted.

I have asked that farmers and the wider public adhere to strict biosecurity measures, and I have reminded farmers of the importance of remaining vigilant by inspecting their animals at least daily for symptoms of disease, and to report any suspicions immediately.

My officials and I are in close contact with our counterparts in Britain and in the South to monitor and assess the situation. I have spoken personally to Mary Coughlan, the Minister for Agriculture in the South, and to Jonathan Shaw, a DEFRA Minister. Our actions are absolutely consistent with those taken in the South, and in line with the fortress-Ireland approach.

My officials worked closely with DEFRA officials who attended the EU Standing Committee on Food Chain and Animal Health (SCoFCAH) meeting in Brussels on 12 September, and were able to influence the EU Commission's decision, which, I am glad to say, was unanimously agreed. I am particularly grateful to the agriculture policy officer from the Executive's Brussels office, who worked closely with my officials to keep us updated on developments. I am pleased that this latest EU Commission decision has again recognised the unique position of the North and allowed us to continue to trade freely within the EU, using the additional certification that we gained after the August outbreaks.

On 13 September, my permanent secretary wrote to all agrifood stakeholders, including farming organisations, retailers and processors, to advise them of the latest developments and enclosing our press release, along with the DARD website address and helpline number so that they can report any problems that they may be experiencing. I am pleased that trade to EU countries continues to be relatively unaffected.

On Monday 24 September, DEFRA published its latest foot-and-mouth disease investigation report, which concluded that there is a low risk of the foot-and-mouth virus having spread outside the current surveillance zone. Based on that report, Britain has been divided into two foot-and-mouth disease risk areas: a risk area in south-east England that includes the surveillance zone and takes in the surrounding counties, and a low-risk area that consists of the rest of England, Scotland and Wales.

DEFRA's stated aim is to reduce the size of the foot-and-mouth disease risk area, taking a risk-based, staged approach, and to permit further movements as soon as the situation allows. Farm-to-farm movements are allowed in the low-risk area, subject to biosecurity conditions, and, from 4 October, movements to livestock markets in the low-risk area will also be permitted, subject to stringent biosecurity measures. DEFRA has adopted an integrated, risk-based approach to deal with the current situation with both bluetongue and foot-and-mouth disease.

Turning to the implications for us, my aim has always been to return to normal trading practices as soon as it is safe to do so. Based on our veterinary risk assessments, and to accommodate industry requests, from 14 September, animals have been able to move directly to approved slaughterhouses in Scotland. That type of movement is allowed because it is considered to present a low risk and is subject to strict biosecurity conditions. We are currently considering whether to allow the movement of breeding and production animals, and we have a strict system in place to ensure that dirty vehicles are not permitted to enter through our ports.

Given these controls and precautions, our current veterinary assessment is that the risk of foot-and-mouth disease entering the North is very low. The most recent cases in Britain have not changed that assessment. However, we will continue to keep the position under review in light of the situation in Britain and our own veterinary risk assessment. We are working closely with the Department of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (DAFF) in the South to ensure that any further action is joined up across the island. Our thinking on the entry of animals from Britain, even from the low-risk zone, remains that it is not permitted until a SCoFCAH decision changes that position.

I believe that my actions and those of my officials have been swift, decisive and proportionate to the level of foot-and-mouth disease threat that we face from the recent further outbreaks. My Department will not be found wanting in respect of any necessary steps to maintain our foot-and-mouth-disease-free status, and to protect our local industry. Everything that can be done will be done to keep foot-and-mouth disease out of the country.

I conclude by thanking all those who continue to contribute to helping me and my Department to deal with the current foot-and-mouth disease crisis. Go raibh maith agat.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development (Dr W McCrea): I suppose that the Assembly should feel privileged that it has been given a personal ministerial statement, because the same courtesy has not been afforded to the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development, which is officially sanctioned by the House.

I have listened carefully to the Minister's statement, and it makes depressing listening. Some clarification is needed, because, at times, I do not know whether she is talking about the north of England, the north of Britain or Northern Ireland. It would probably burn her lips to say "Northern Ireland".

What is clear, however, is that Europe and the Department were complacent. They were too quick to announce a return to normal service in early September. That they prematurely started to relax restrictions then means that we are now worse off than ever. New cases of foot-and-mouth disease are still being declared, more than two months after the first outbreak.

If foot-and-mouth disease emanated from a broken pipe at the Pirbright laboratory site, how is it still spreading around the countryside? It is about time that the Minister engaged regularly with those most affected by foot-and-mouth disease, and by bluetongue, instead of running around the country with her officials to provide updates here and there. Will the Minister set up an emergency committee — consisting of departmental representatives, the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development and other interested parties — to deal with the crisis?

In respect of bluetongue, what are the Minister and her Department doing to ensure a fortress-Northern Ireland policy? The warmer climate in the southern part of the Irish Republic may be more likely to attract the infected midges. Has the Department prepared emergency measures should bluetongue affect animals in the Irish Republic?

Ms Gildernew: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I thank the Chairperson of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development for his questions.

I shall outline what has been done since the first case of bluetongue was detected in Britain on Saturday 22 September. However, it was only last Friday afternoon, 28 September, that the disease was confirmed to be circulating. On Tuesday 25 September, my officials were scheduled to update the Committee on foot-and-mouth disease. That briefing would have included an update on the cases of bluetongue that were being detected in Suffolk. In the event, my officials were stood down at short notice by the Committee Chairperson. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Ms Gildernew: On Thursday 27 September, I gave a presentation to the Executive on foot-and-mouth disease and bluetongue. I also asked the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister for permission to make a statement to the Assembly today, and that request was granted.

Last Thursday evening, I offered to update the Committee on the situation on either Friday afternoon or Monday morning — before I made today's statement to the Assembly. I met the Committee this morning in Dundonald House to brief it before delivering my statement. It was necessary to meet there, because my officials were actively working on the rapidly developing situation in liaison with DEFRA and DAFF.

My officials again stand ready to brief the Committee in detail at its next official meeting tomorrow. Moreover, my Department issued press releases about bluetongue developments on 22 September, which was when the first case was detected, on 26 September and on 28 September, when the disease was confirmed in Britain.

The establishment of the emergency committee that the Chairperson advocates would be more in keeping with a situation in which bluetongue or foot-and-mouth disease was directly affecting us. Our actions to date have been based on the veterinary risk assessment and on the danger that our industry faces. We have worked extremely closely with the entire industry to ensure that there are few problems with trade, and that everyone is fully updated and apprised of the situation as it develops. This is obviously a very fluid time, so we will keep everyone updated as and when necessary. If I feel that going down the route of setting up an emergency committee has become a necessity, I will certainly explore the idea with officials.

The Chairperson remarked about our approach to keeping foot-and-mouth disease and bluetongue out of the country. If animals in the South were to become infected, the emergency measures that we would implement would very much depend on the circumstances of the case in question, including the type of disease, the exact location and the scale of the incident. We would not decide anything before closely liaising with colleagues in Dublin. Obviously, in any decision that we were to take, we would be bound by EU rules for dealing with outbreaks of diseases such as foot-and-mouth disease and bluetongue.

The control zone for bluetongue is 150 km. Therefore, if bluetongue were to appear in Ireland, the control zone would likely extend to the North anyway.

Regarding the Member's comment about the EU decision, I am sure that he will appreciate that EU veterinary officers on SCoFAH make their decisions based on risk assessment and that I, as Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development here in the North, did all that I could to persuade them to keep our trade restrictions to an absolute minimum and to keep our industry going. However, I do not have any sway with them about not allowing exports to be reopened; that would be based on veterinary risk assessment, and it would not be appropriate for me to try to influence that.

Mr Brolly: Go raibh míle maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Will the Minister tell the House what action is taken when a suspected case of bluetongue is reported?

Ms Gildernew: The process is quite technical, and I want to provide as much detail as possible, so I ask the Member to bear with me for a moment.

Dr W McCrea: Does the Minister need any help?

Ms Gildernew: No, I am fine, but thank you for the offer.

If a case of bluetongue were confirmed here, the measures put in place would include a veterinary investigation on suspect premises, and restrictions, including a ban on the movement of susceptible animals on and off the premises. On confirmation that bluetongue was circulating, restrictions would remain in place and be extended to a zone with a 20 km radius around the infected premises. Wider zones would then be declared with a radius of at least 150 km around the infected premises. Restrictions on the movement of susceptible animals out of those zones would be put into place and surveillance programmes implemented. Additional housing requirements and the requirements to control midges with insecticides might also be put in place within the 20 km zone. There would be some flexibility in demarcating the zones with the agreement of the European Commission, but various factors, such as local geography, must be taken into account.

I stress again that the Department is updating its control measures daily. We are looking closely at how the disease is being controlled and dealt with in northern Europe and in Britain and we are learning from that. Keeping our industry free from the disease for as long as possible — until the onset of winter, which, hopefully, will be fairly soon — would be the preferred option. However, there is a contingency plan in place were the industry here to be affected.

Mr Elliott: I thank the Minister for her statement, although with the way that midges and foot-and-mouth disease are spreading, I foresee many more statements in the months ahead.

First, I am curious to know whether the Minister and her Department have given any information to Northern Ireland farmers about the symptoms of bluetongue that they need to look out for. I understand that no recent information has been distributed.

Secondly, I am also curious about the DEFRA and DARD assessment that the latest outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease is a continuation of the original outbreak at the beginning of August and not a new one. In early September, we were led to believe that the all-clear had been given and that imports from mainland GB were to be reopened. I urged the Minister and her Department to be cautious about allowing those imports into Northern Ireland. I suggested that such action would be premature. However —

Ms Ni Chuilín: Is the Member asking a question or making a speech?

Mr Speaker: Order. On many occasions —

Ms Ni Chuilín: Sorry, Mr Speaker.

Mr Speaker: Order. I have advised Members on many occasions that, during ministerial statements, it is vital that they ask questions and do not start making statements too. I allow some latitude in the case of Chairpersons of Committees, and there is nothing wrong with that. However, other Members must address only their questions to the Minister.

Mr Elliott: Thank you for that, Mr Speaker. I suppose that consistency is the name of the game. I posed two questions — one on bluetongue, and one on foot-and-mouth disease — and was supplying background for my final question. Does the Minister believe that she and her Department were premature in allowing imports from GB into Ireland in early September?

Ms Gildernew: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. That matter was raised with the Member after my last statement, and I shall give the Member the answer that I gave him then: I do not have the authority to stop imports if the EU has decided that it is safe for them to continue. I am not in a position to make that decision with regard to Europe. Furthermore, had I made the decision unilaterally to stop imports into the North, when imports were permitted into the South, and from there to Europe, the same Member and others on his Benches would have been extremely critical of me and would have suggested that I had taken that action for political reasons. We must follow the available veterinary risk assessment. SCoFCAH made the decision to lift the ban — I did not, nor did my Department.

As for guidance to the farming industry: in May, my Department and key stakeholders jointly issued advice on bluetongue, including information about its clinical signs. An information leaflet and a question-and-answer guide are available on the DARD website, and officials have written to importers to highlight the potential risks of importing animals from countries where bluetongue is present. An information leaflet has been issued to importers and to private veterinary practices. It is important that farmers and keepers of herds remain vigilant, by daily inspection of animals for symptoms of bluetongue. If a farmer has any concerns, he should immediately consult his own vet or the local divisional veterinary office.

We cannot notify every single farmer in person. That would be a huge job; however, we have done our absolute best via the media, our own website and by every possible avenue to highlight the symptoms of bluetongue and what farmers should do if they suspect a case.

Mr Burns: One line in the Minister's statement causes me concern:

"I sent one consignment of cattle back to Britain that was en route to Larne."

I would like the Minister to make a clear statement about those cattle. Was the ship that brought that consignment turned back? Were the cattle unloaded at Larne and left on the quayside until the Department decided what to do with them? There is no facility there for isolation or quarantine; were the cattle then put back on the ship, with cars, lorries and vans, and sent back to Britain?

Ms Gildernew: Go raibh maith agat. Although I do not believe that the consignment was unloaded, I could be wrong about that; I do not have the details. However, had they been unloaded, the cattle would have stayed on the lorry, which would then have been turned back. The cattle would not have been taken off the lorry at the port. There are no animal-holding facilities for such incidents. If the lorry even left the boat, it would have been driven straight back on again. When that consignment was turned back, we had had no confirmation of the outbreak in England; it was a precautionary measure — just in case — and it followed the risk-assessment guidelines.

I am content to write to the Member with further details of the incident.

Mr Ford: Mr Speaker, I trust that you will permit me to congratulate the Minister and her officials, especially her veterinary staff, for their speedy response between 12 and 14 September in dealing with the latest threat of foot-and-mouth disease.

In her statement, the Minister suggested that one way in which she was dealing with bluetongue was through existing foot-and-mouth disease import restrictions. Will she confirm whether, once the threat of foot-and-mouth disease is over, she will continue to impose those import restrictions on all susceptible animals from GB or whether she will have powers to restrict the movement only of those animals that are within the 150 km control zone? If the latter is the case, will she take up the issue in Brussels to ensure that she can defend farming in Northern Ireland from a threat that occurs in any part of GB?

Ms Gildernew: As I have already said, the situation is very fluid: on Wednesday or Friday it could be different from today. Import bans on the movement of animals from affected areas in northern Europe have been in place since 2006. Therefore, a ban on the importation of animals from bluetongue-infected areas has existed. If the risk assessment finds that it is necessary to ban the importation of animals from bluetongue-infected areas, outside of the foot-and-mouth disease outbreak — I assume that that is what the Member is referring to — EU requirements state that we can ban imports from the zone's affected areas. Imports are, however, permitted from the rest of the territory. That would be in line with European requests. However, the Executive would need to discuss any suggestion that I should go further and seek clarification from the EU about the position on banning the importation of animals from the rest of Britain. As I have said, I will do all that I can if further action is required. I do not have the legislative backup, but we are working closely with people in Dublin, Britain and Europe to protect our industry from this awful disease for as long as we can.

Mr T Clarke: Given that Northern Ireland remains free from bluetongue and foot-and-mouth disease, can we still enjoy some competitive advantage over our colleagues in the rest of the United Kingdom? Livestock that is going to markets in continental Europe often has to travel through GB. Has the Minister's Department carried out any work to improve routes to European markets? Has it worked to ensure that any travel through GB will not affect those animals' disease-free status?

Until recently, it was thought that the climate meant that Northern Ireland, the UK as a whole, and even northern areas of continental Europe were all safe from bluetongue. Given that, what assessment has DARD made of any risk from other livestock diseases that were previously not deemed a threat?

While I am on my feet, on a point of accuracy, the Minister stated earlier that last week the Chairman of the Agriculture Committee stood her down. However, the entire Committee, including her own two party colleagues who were present, did not abstain from agreeing to write to her.

Ms Gildernew: As I said in my statement, animals and lorries travelling through bluetongue areas are sprayed with insecticide to reduce the risk of the spread of the disease. I repeat that the Department has been doing all that it can to keep the disease out of Ireland. It has also been considering routes.

The Member asked three or four questions, one of which was whether we have an advantage. We have a small one, in that we are free from bluetongue and foot-and-mouth disease. We should capitalise on that position for the months that that is the case.

I cannot remember the Member's other questions; he asked several.

Mr T Clarke: I asked whether the Department had carried out a risk assessment of other livestock diseases that were previously not deemed a threat.

Ms Gildernew: Gabh mo leithscéal, a Cheann Comhairle. Climate change affects many of us, and I know that, in recent months, the Minister of the Environment has been considering that issue carefully. Some insects and diseases that the winter would previously have killed off can now live through our winters.

We must consider the situation from a global perspective and identify those diseases that are now prevalent in areas not previously affected. Our geographical location on the western corner of Europe means that we have a wee bit of time to examine how those diseases are spreading. In general, they are moving in an east-west direction, so we must make the most of our geographical location and take advantage of clinical assessments, scientific analysis and everything else in our power to prevent our agriculture industry from falling victim to any of those diseases.

Mr Molloy: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister on her statement, and I congratulate her and her Department for their work to keep the North free of foot-and-mouth disease and bluetongue. It is important to realise that this situation is not about party-political bickering or the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development; it is about trying to keep the North free of disease and continuing to prevent it as much as possible. If we get into a stand-off situation with the Committee, in which everything has to go to a vote, very little business will be done.

We must take a different road. The Committee has an important role — [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order. The Member must ask a question.

Mr Molloy: I certainly will. Is Mr McCrea more interested in Committee business than he is in bluetongue or foot-and-mouth disease?

Dr W McCrea: On a point of order. When did this turn into Question Time for Mr McCrea? If people want to abdicate, or hand the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development over to me, I will take on the job of Minister.

Mr Speaker: Order. I will say to Members once again that we can have lively debates in the Chamber, and there is nothing wrong with that. However, I must inform Members that when they are given the opportunity to pose a question to a Minister, they must do just that. That goes for all sides of the House, because all sides of the House are to blame in this regard. I have been fairly lenient during questions to Ministers, and I intend to be lenient. However, it is vital that Members do not use the time for questions to Ministers as opportunities to make full-blooded statements.

Mr Molloy: I apologise, Mr Speaker. Will the Minister describe the clinical signs of bluetongue in animals so that farmers have that information for the future?

Ms Gildernew: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I suppose the question is not whether Dr McCrea is going to be the Minister, but whether he could do a better job. That is certainly a matter for debate. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order. The Minister has the Floor.

Ms Gildernew: The clinical signs in animals include: fever; swelling of the head and neck; lameness; inflammation and ulceration of the mucous membrane of the mouth, nose and eyes; drooling; haemorrhages in the skin and other tissues; respiratory problems such as froth in the lungs and an inability to swallow; high mortality rate; and discolouration and swelling of the tongue.

Interestingly for a disease known as bluetongue, a blue tongue is a rare indication of the condition. Farmers will know when an animal is off-colour or not in good form, and although bluetongue can kill cattle, it is usually much more virulent in sheep. It is a worry for the farming population, and, once again, I stress the need for vigilance. If any animals display any of the symptoms I have mentioned, I urge their owners to contact their local divisional veterinary office or veterinarian for assessment, because the earlier that we can establish the existence of bluetongue or foot-and-mouth disease, the earlier we can deal with it.

Mr Irwin: I note that in the Minister's statement of 10 September 2007 on the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease, she maintained her commitment to a so-called fortress-Ireland approach. Does she not agree that such an approach would be no barrier to bluetongue, given its ability to spread over distances greater than the Irish Sea, such as when it moved from Morocco into Spain and Italy? Will the Minister commit to close liaison with DEFRA colleagues and the other devolved regions, as well as the Republic of Ireland, so that the spread of the disease across the British Isles may, if possible, be prevented?

In support of my colleague Dr McCrea, who asked a similar question, will the Minister also outline the steps that she intends to take under her fortress-Ireland commitment if bluetongue moves across the Irish Sea into the Republic of Ireland? She did not answer that question.

How does the Minister come to the conclusion that, if bluetongue crosses the Irish Sea into the Irish Republic, it will automatically come to Northern Ireland? I do not believe that.

Ms Gildernew: Go raibh míle maith agat. I hope that I am able to get through all the Member's questions. As the Member has pointed out, bluetongue can often be wind-borne. In the recent case of bluetongue in England, it was believed that the disease was carried by the prevailing wind from Belgium to the south-east of England. Although that makes it extremely difficult to keep it out of the country, most of our winds come off the Atlantic Ocean, from west to east. The Department is working closely with the Met Office to discover whether winds are likely to come from the east.

It is also extremely difficult to prevent midges from leaving an area. Therefore, counties close to Suffolk, where the initial outbreak happened, are worried about where the midges are travelling, their native midge population, and how virulent the disease is when infected midges bite other animals.

Although there are difficulties in keeping the disease out, there are measures that can be taken and we must work on an all-island basis to keep the disease out. For example, lorries that come over from England are sprayed with insecticide. I assure the Member — as I have repeatedly said in my statements — that I work not just with my colleagues in the South, but with Ministers and officials in DEFRA and in other devolved Administrations to try to ensure the protection of our industry. The Member will know that if the disease comes to the east coast of Ireland and is found in cattle in, for example, County Louth, it will have to be contained from reaching south Armagh. Midges do not recognise borders; they will go wherever they want. As my colleague Martin McGuinness will agree, anyone who lives near the lough shore will know about the prevalence of midges.

Bluetongue is an awful disease, and it is difficult to stop. We should use our geographical location to protect our industry for as long as we can.

Mr Kennedy: I thank the Minister for her statement. However, it appears that the Minister continues to be afflicted by her own, unique version of bluetongue, given her ongoing inability to get her tongue around the words "Northern Ireland".

In the event of bluetongue extending to other parts of the United Kingdom, including Northern Ireland, will the Minister undertake to keep under review the issue of compensation to owners of affected livestock? Can the Minister indicate whether any research is available to assist with controlling or killing midges that are capable of spreading such a serious disease?

Ms Gildernew: Go raibh míle maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I wonder whether the Member is suggesting that I have a case of "greentongue".

No compensation package for bluetongue is available for farmers in EU member states. Scientists are working on a vaccine, which may be introduced, subject to a veterinary risk assessment on whether it is safe to use. By and large, infected animals do not need to be culled. Bluetongue is a viral infection; the animals become sick, but can get better. It is not like foot-and-mouth disease, whereby once an animal is infected, it will rapidly deteriorate and die. Bluetongue is an illness from which an animal can recover and is able to go on to the food chain with no health implications for humans. Therefore, there is no need to cull animals that have bluetongue. Some of them will die, and there is no compensation package for farmers who suffer that loss. Although that is regrettable, I am unable to do anything about it.

Many animals recover from bluetongue, so it does not have the same financial implications for farmers as foot-and-mouth disease. Being so far west, we have an opportunity to see what other countries do. I am not aware of any system having been introduced in northern Europe to eradicate the midge.

It is also worth pointing out that not every midge is infected with bluetongue. The midge itself is an important part of the food chain. Even if it were possible, I do not know whether its eradication would be wise, given that it might impact on animal biodiversity. The Department will take whatever measures it can, such as spraying lorries with insecticides.

Mr McKay: The Minister has touched on the role that climate change played in the outbreak of bluetongue in Britain. What difficulties will climate change create in future in the attempt to combat bluetongue?

Ms Gildernew: The Department is carrying out an ongoing assessment of climate change. Other animal diseases and insects can now live through the winter. The Department is keeping the situation under review and working closely with those carrying out veterinary assessments in other European countries. We are trying to ensure that we are one step ahead to prevent the arrival of any new diseases that are not normally found here. The Department is keeping a close eye on the climate and liaising with vets throughout Europe to ensure that any necessary precautions to try to keep out diseases such as bluetongue are taken.

Lord Morrow: There is some disappointment on this side of the House that the Minister only released her statement, and made it available to Members, at 10.45 am, because it was known last week that the statement was going to be made. Perhaps she will bear that in mind when making future statements. I also encourage her to meet the Committee, set aside any political differences and not allow politics to affect her handling of this awful crisis.

The Minister said that:

How long after the disease has been eradicated does the Minister envisage that the decontamination period will have to last? Having listened to the Minister, I understand that the warm climate has caused the movement of the midges that carry the virus here, there and yonder. If the disease were to be eradicated due to a cold snap of weather, how much longer would the ports remain closed — could they reopen this year?

Ms Gildernew: Go raibh míle maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. The Member's question has several elements, and I will try to deal with them as best I can. This outbreak was officially confirmed on Friday, and I could not have made my statement any earlier. I gave the Executive a briefing on Thursday, but, at that stage, there were only isolated incidences of the disease, and it had not been classed as an official outbreak.

I am glad to say that, by and large, I have an excellent working relationship with the Committee. I have asked a number of times — [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order, Members. The Minister has the Floor.

Ms Gildernew: I have been before the Committee three times, and each time I have stressed the need for partnership. We should work together for the benefit of the farming industry and the rural community. If the Chairperson of the Committee wants to go down the road of involving politics, he may do so. I will work with the Committee, which is why I met its members in Dundonald House this morning to discuss the issue.

As for the decontamination period and the reopening of the ports, I will have to act in line with EU requirements and guidelines and the decisions of SCoFAH. The Department is bound by European rules, and I will abide by them.

Therefore, I do not have the authority to keep our ports closed when other ports are open. However, I will liaise carefully with colleagues on this island, and, indeed, across these islands, to do my best for the farming industry. I hope that I can still rely on the support of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development.

Mr McHugh: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I congratulate the Minister on her handling of the latest incidence of bluetongue. There does not seem to be much panic here or on any of these islands. If the Chairperson had allowed officials to attend, my questions could have been answered at last week's Committee meeting. Perhaps this week's questions would not have been so difficult.

Mr T Clarke: Will the Member give way?

Mr McHugh: No, I will ask my question. It concerns DARD's imports of susceptible species following the first outbreak.

Mr T Clarke: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. Again, there are inaccuracies in a Member's statement.

Mr Speaker: Order. That is not an appropriate point of order. I ask the Member to take his seat. There are no appropriate points of order during ministerial statements.

Mr McHugh: My question relates to the import of susceptible species from continental Europe following the first outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease and bluetongue.

Ms Gildernew: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Following confirmation of the first outbreak of bluetongue disease, imports of susceptible species from restricted areas have been banned, and animals that have been imported from areas that are free from disease must be treated with insecticide prior to commencing their journeys if they are transiting a restricted area. We have also advised potential importers to request that animals are pre-import tested, and we carry out post-import testing on animals that have been imported from continental Europe.

Mr McCallister: I welcome the Minister's statement. I hope that her "greentongue" ailment never becomes a notifiable disease, or she will be in real trouble.

I congratulate the Minister. It is vital that she continues to work with industry stakeholders. How exactly did bluetongue get into GB? Was it spread by midges, or were there lapses in the bluetongue testing regime? Does the Minister agree that in order to best protect Northern Ireland, rather than simply hoping for a cold snap, it is vital to find out as accurately as possible how the disease got into the United Kingdom?

Ms Gildernew: Go raibh maith agat. The infected midges that first spread bluetongue to the farm in Suffolk were blown across in a prevailing wind from Belgium. We are not certain of that, but it is believed to be the most obvious source of the disease. The animal that was first found to be infected with bluetongue was born and raised on a rare-breeds farm. It had not come into contact with other imported animals. Therefore, the ports did not cause a biosecurity problem; rather, the close geographical location of the coasts of Suffolk and Belgium caused the midges to be blown across, thus infecting the first animals. The first four or five animals were culled to try to prevent the spread of the disease and to take them out of the equation so that the local midge population would not become infected. However, that was impossible.

On Friday 28 September, it was confirmed that the disease was circulating between the native midge population and the animals in question. Therefore, the ideal scenario is to cull in time in order to prevent native midges from being infected.

That is why the Department is calling for farmers to be vigilant and immediately report any signs of the disease to the DVO or their own vet, so that we can try to stamp it out before it gets into our native midge population.

1.00 pm

Mr Shannon: The agriculture industry seems to lurch from crisis to crisis: from BSE to foot-and-mouth disease, and now bluetongue. Given the importance of agriculture to Northern Ireland — particularly beef and pork produce — what does the Minister intend to do to prevent such diseases spreading to the Province in the same way that they have to the UK and Europe? I suggest a root-and-branch approach. Does the Minister agree — and it is important that she does — that restoring confidence in the agriculture industry is of paramount importance to producers and consumers? Finally, the Minister said that the midge was an important part of the food chain — perhaps I caught her wrongly there.

Ms Gildernew: I stand corrected if that is the case. There is a very important demarcation on this issue. The farming industry in England is going through a horrendous time; it is suffering an outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease, and is now suffering an outbreak of bluetongue. Confidence is at an all-time low after taking some very hard knocks. Equally, our farmers have come through a hard time, but a clear distinction needs to be made; we are currently free from foot-and-mouth disease and bluetongue. We have given ourselves the best chance of ensuring, for as long as possible, that those diseases do not get a handle on our agriculture industry, and our farmers should know that. As the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development, it is hugely important to me that the farming community knows that the Department has done all it can to prevent the diseases from spreading here.

Had a direct rule Minister been in charge in August, the issue would not have been tackled as effectively. Again, I mention the support that I had from the First Minister and the deputy First Minister. As a farmer's daughter, I am grateful that we have a local Minister in charge. As someone who lives and works in a rural community in Tyrone, I am grateful that we have an Executive that are able to deal with such matters. Confidence in and support for our agriculture industry is at an all-time high compared to that in England. Our stock is free from those diseases; our produce is of high quality and should get a price to reflect that. Members should ensure that that message is projected.

Mr McElduff: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Will the Minister elaborate on the close working relationship between her Department and the Department of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (DAFF) in the South — an example of North/South co-operation — which aims to take preventative action to protect the whole island?

Ms Gildernew: Go raibh maith agat. As mentioned, I spoke to the Minister Mary Coughlan and to Jonathan Shaw, a Minister in the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (DEFRA), in an attempt to do what I could about foot-and-mouth disease and bluetongue. As foot-and-mouth disease was in England, we were able to take a fortress-Ireland approach to keep it out of Ireland; that was hugely important for our industry and imports, because we are still able to export our cattle — [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order, Members.

Ms Gildernew: We are still able to export our cattle, meat and dairy produce, which is hugely important. The Department had to take a slightly different approach to bluetongue. Although the fortress-Ireland approach continued, we knew that disinfectant mats at ports and airports would not stop the spread of midges. I liaised closely with my counterpart in Dublin to ensure that the disease was kept out of Ireland — and that returns to the industry were maximised — for as long as possible.

Mr Savage: I thank the Minister for her statement. I declare an interest in the issue as a farmer.

The agriculture industry across the United Kingdom is asking what will happen next. Great Britain continues to have problems with foot-and-mouth disease, and now some animals there have contracted bluetongue. Is there a suitable vaccination to protect against bluetongue disease? If there is, will the Department consider providing it to farmers throughout Great Britain and Northern Ireland — especially in view of climate change? If there is a vaccine, how quickly can it be made available to farmers to use as a precaution for their animals?

Ms Gildernew: Go raibh maith agat. The Blue Tongue Order 2003 prohibits the vaccination of animals in the North unless authorised by the Department. A vaccine is not available for the serotype 8 strain of bluetongue. Development of a vaccine is under way, but it must be demonstrated that the vaccine is safe and effective before it is considered for use. Therefore, a vaccination is not currently available, and we will have to be satisfied that any future vaccination will work if we decide to take that route.

As I said earlier, there are 24 different strains of bluetongue around the world. Although a vaccine is being worked on for serotype 8 — the strain that is currently circulating in south-east England — serotypes 10 or 12, for instance, might affect the industry in the next year or two. Scientific evidence, therefore, has to try to stay ahead of the game. It is difficult to do that, but we are working closely with veterinary colleagues across the globe to see what diseases may be on the horizon, and we are using this time to try to find effective ways to deal with them. Mr Savage is right: it is a worrying time. However, I stress that bluetongue does not kill every animal that it strikes. Many afflicted animals will recover, and farmers will be able to sell them for food. It is important to remember that although bluetongue is a disease — whose vector is hard to control — it is a viral disease from which many animals will recover.

COMMITTEE BUSINESS

Committee Membership

Mr Speaker: The next item on the Order Paper is a motion to change the membership of the Public Accounts Committee. As with similar motions, this will be treated as a business motion. Therefore, there will be no debate.

Resolved:

That Mr Mickey Brady replace Mr Willie Clarke as a member of the Public Accounts Committee. — [Ms Ni Chuilín.]

Health (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill: Extension of Committee Stage

The Chairperson of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety (Mrs I Robinson):
I beg to move

That, in accordance with Standing Order 31(4), the period referred to in Standing Order 31(2) be extended to 7 November 2007, in relation to the Committee Stage of the Health (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill (NIA Bill 2/07).

The Health (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill was given its Second Stage on 19 June 2007, and it was referred to the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety on 20 June 2007. It was the first piece of primary legislation to come before the Committee. Although the Health (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill is not a major piece of legislation, it contains 20 clauses and two schedules, and it involves a degree of complexity, because it deals with amendments to other primary legislation.

The Bill has three main aims. First, it amends the provisions of the Health and Personal Social Services (Northern Ireland) Order 1972 in relation to the regulation of the four family practitioner services: general practitioners; opticians; pharmacists; and dentists. Secondly, it sets out a legislative base for a new contract for dental practitioner services.

Thirdly, the Bill amends the Smoking (Northern Ireland) Order 2006, and makes provision to permit smoking by performers taking part in performances if artistic integrity so requires.

Prior to the summer recess, the Committee heard evidence from the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety and several key organisations affected by the provisions. Twenty-four organisations responded to the Committee's request for written evidence over the recess period. The Committee began its clause-by-clause scrutiny of the Bill on 6 September 2007, immediately following recess. I therefore seek an extension of the deadline to 7 November 2007 to allow the Committee sufficient time to consider the views expressed and compile its report on the Bill.

I ask Members for their support.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That, in accordance with Standing Order 31(4), the period referred to in the Standing Order 31(2) be extended to 7 November 2007, in relation to the Committee Stage of the Health (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill (NIA Bill 2/07).

Local Government Pension Scheme (Amendment No. 2) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2007: Prayer of Annulment

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Dallat] in the Chair)

The Chairperson of the Committee for the Environment (Mr McGlone): I beg to move

That the Local Government Pension Scheme (Amendment No. 2) Regulations (Northern Ireland) (S.R. 2007/372) be annulled.

The purpose of the statutory rule is to amend the Local Government Pension Scheme Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2002 to remove the statutory right of both employer and employee representative bodies to nominate candidates for appointment to the Northern Ireland Local Government Officers' Superannuation Committee (NILGOSC). The Committee considered the secondary legislation or SL1 proposal from the Department at its meeting on 21 June 2007, and the statutory rule was laid in the Assembly Business Office on 3 September 2007.

Members received correspondence from the Irish Congress of Trade Unions (ICTU) on 3 September asking that the statutory rule be annulled when it came before the Environment Committee. ICTU represents and campaigns on behalf of 770,000 working people and is against the regulations as they will remove the statutory right of employer and employee bodies to nominate members to NILGOSC.

At its meeting on 20 September 2007, the Environment Committee deliberated a motion to recommend the annulment of the statutory rule. The outcome was that six members voted to annul, one member voted against and one member abstained. The majority of the Committee, therefore, wishes to see the statutory rule annulled.

There are currently five trade union representatives on NILGOSC. The proposed changes would remove the right of employee representatives to have seats on the committee. If the statutory rule is passed, trade union representatives will not be treated any differently to other people who apply for positions on the committee and who have no interest in the pension scheme or its members. Naturally, ICTU is fundamentally opposed to the appointments being opened to candidates who have no connection with the pension scheme, and it is difficult not to agree with that view. I agree with the old adage, "If it ain't broke, don't fix it", and with ICTU's views on this important issue.

At its meeting on 13 September, the Environment Committee took the views of the Irish Congress:

"NILGOSC, while a public body, is responsible for administering a pension fund of around £3 billion pounds, which belongs properly to the members of that pension scheme itself. The fund is made up of contributions from both employers and employees. The Committee should be constituted on a statutory basis primarily from representatives of the employers and employees. The proposed changes, which will require applicants to have, among other things, experience in the administration of pension schemes, will disenfranchise the vast bulk of the employees who belong to the scheme. In any event NILGOSC provides detailed training for new Committee members. Trade Union representatives have participated in the Committee, as of right, since the 1950s and this arrangement has worked well. In Britain, moves are on the way to provide for nominees of employees to sit on the Committees of pension schemes covering local Councils in England and Wales.”

After hearing from ICTU the Committee decided to invite departmental officials to its meeting on 20 September to brief members on the statutory rule. The departmental position can be summarised as follows: the aim of the change to the constitution of the committee is not to exclude employee and employer representatives but rather to widen the pool of candidates.

The Minister has confirmed that it is her intention to ensure a balance of interests, including employees and employers, when making appointments to the committee.

The answers that we received at the meeting on 20 September were not very reassuring. The Committee was shocked to hear that the recruitment of outside candidates for positions on the management committee had already gone a considerable way down the line, despite the fact that the rule had only been laid on 3 September. There were seven responses to the departmental consultation on the proposed rule, and all but one of the seven respondents objected to it, that one being a small public body.

The respondents were concerned mainly about the potential loss of representation for the two groups that contribute to the fund — employers and employees. The Department argues that the rule is intended to widen the pool of candidates. However, the people already doing the job are more than capable, and the past performance of the scheme is evidence of that. The Committee asked if there was a precedent for removing the employer and employee representation for similar public-service schemes and why a different approach is being taken in Northern Ireland than in England and Wales, where proposals have been put forward to add employee representation.

The response was not encouraging. No such precedent has been set. The Department said that when best-practice principles were available it would consider whether it would be appropriate and necessary to include a similar provision in the regulations, and that if so, it would consult on the proposed amendment. There were many inconsistencies in the Department's arguments and its reasons for fixing something that is not broken, which have not been made entirely clear, and the Committee was unconvinced by the arguments put forward for change.

NILGOSC is responsible for administering a £3 billion pension fund on behalf of its members, which is crucial to enable its workers to lead a good-quality life in retirement. The scheme has worked well until now, and any move to change it can be seen, at best, as an unnecessary step. Among the proposed changes is a requirement for applicants to have experience in the administration of pension schemes. As has already been outlined, NILGOSC already provides comprehensive training to its staff to enable them to become experts in the administration of a pension scheme that is functioning perfectly well at present.

The Committee has no difficulty with an open competition to ensure that the best candidates who have a stake in the pension fund are nominated. Members of the Committee are, however, fundamentally opposed to appointments being open to candidates who have no connection with a pension scheme and no direct interest in it. Therefore, I ask the House to support the motion to annul the Local Government Pension Scheme (Amendment No. 2) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2007. Go raibh maith agat, a leasCheann Comhairle.

The Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for the Environment (Mr Boylan): I support the Chairman of the Committee for the Environment in moving the motion. Go raibh maith agat.

The Minister of the Environment (Mrs Foster): I welcome the opportunity to make a statement on this matter. I have noted the views of the Environment Committee, both today and when it took evidence from my officials.

The Northern Ireland Local Government Officers' Superannuation Committee was established in April 1950 to administer and maintain a fund providing pension benefits to employees of district councils and other admitted bodies. NILGOSC is a non-departmental public body (NDPB) and, as such, is subject to a set of procedures for the operation of NDPBs. These regulations extend to the potential pool of candidates for membership of the committee. NDPBs can benefit from having a board or committee with a mix of experience and expertise relevant to their work. I accept that NILGOSC is rather different to most NDPBs because its primary purpose, as the Chairman of the Committee for the Environment said, is to administer and manage a pension fund to which employers and employees contribute.

It was not my or my Department's intention in making these regulations to undermine the employers or the employees who contribute to the local government pension scheme. Much has been made of the appointments procedure. If it had proceeded, I would have been appointing four employer and six employee representatives. However, I have listened to the concerns raised and the suggestion that the regulations disregarded employee and employer interest and, therefore, I do not intend to oppose the motion.

I presume that the motion will be carried, but, even if it is not, I have already decided to conduct a policy review of NILGOSC's constitution. The Chairperson of the Committee for the Environment is aware of my intention. I intend to invite representatives of employers, as well as employees who contribute to the pension fund, to participate in that review. In due course, I will advise the Committee for the Environment on the details of the policy review.

If the motion is agreed, in order to ensure that NILGOSC continues its important work, I intend to extend the terms of office that were due to come to an end on 30 September 2007 — yesterday — of the three committee members and the chairman of NILGOSC. I also intend to reappoint the remaining seven committee members. I am pleased to say that those three members and the chairman have agreed to remain in office for a further 18 months. I express my gratitude at their willingness to continue in office during what, because of the re-evaluation of the fund and preparations for the introduction of the new local government pension scheme, will be a busy time. For the record, the Commissioner for Public Appointments has been consulted and has agreed to the proposals that affect the NILGOSC committee. I will not be opposing the motion.

Mr McGlone: I shall be brief. I thank the Minister for listening to the views that were expressed in Committee. Members of the Committee for the Environment listened intently to all concerns that were raised, and considered them in detail. I thank the Minister for her positive response. Further details of the review will come before the Committee, and we look forward to getting our teeth into that.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That the Local Government Pension Scheme (Amendment No. 2) Regulations (Northern Ireland) (S.R. 2007/372) be annulled.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

Mandatory Registration of Landlords

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour for this debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes to propose and 10 minutes for a winding-up speech. All other Members who speak will have five minutes.

One amendment has been selected and published on the Marshalled List. The proposer of the amendment will have 10 minutes to propose and five minutes for a winding-up speech.

Mr F McCann: I beg to move

That this Assembly calls upon the Minister for Social Development to legislate for the mandatory registration of all landlords in the private sector.

A leasCheann Comhairle, tá súil agam go bhfaighidh an rún seo tacatocht ó gach páirtí. I hope that all parties will support the motion and the amendment. The content of the debate has been dealt with, and generally agreed on, in wider debates on housing in the Chamber.

Although Sinn Féin accepts the proposed amendment, I wish to put down a marker for the Minister for Social Development that any dilution of the issue will be strongly contested. I ask the Minister to reiterate her commitment to deal with the issue sooner rather than later.

Other Members and I have spoken at various events on the subject, so I know that there is consensus that action must be taken to bring this deplorable situation to a head. I am confident that Members will support moves by the Minister to introduce legislation to make landlord registration mandatory. That would send out a clear message that the Assembly will no longer allow vulnerable tenants to fall prey to unscrupulous landlords.

That should not be interpreted as an attack on all landlords. Many landlords provide excellent accommodation for their tenants. In any society, the private-rental sector fulfils a valuable role in providing a good mix of housing.

Tá dualcais ag again tiarna talon sa tír seo. At a recent meeting with a representative from the Landlords' Association, Sinn Féin stated that the present situation, in which a non-regulated private-housing sector takes advantage of many of its tenants in parts of the North, must not be allowed to continue. Most of those who are taken advantage of are those in need.

How many Members have been appalled at the threats of eviction and intimidation that have been received by tenants who dare to complain about repairs? One well-known estate agency decided that it was not collecting enough rent, so it switched from monthly to four-weekly payments, which guaranteed an extra month's worth of rent each year.

How many Members have received complaints about landlords who place antisocial tenants in properties, causing major problems for residents, but who, when challenged, say that they are only landlords, not social workers?

How many Members have spoken to people who have had to hand over deposits of up to £1,000, only to lose that money when they move due to false claims of damage made by landlords? How many Members have dealt with tenants on housing benefit who are charged in excess of £200 more than their benefits, and who are threatened with eviction if they complain?

Individuals are crammed into houses that are in terrible condition, and are charged up to £75 a week for a bed, and they will not complain in case they are told to leave. They say that it is better than sleeping on the streets. They believe that if they complain, they will get no help from the housing authorities and will be evicted. Sadly, the authorities, including the Department for Social Development (DSD) and the Housing Executive (NIHE), know what is happening but have done nothing to stop it.

Between January and August 2003, the Housing Executive inspected the addresses of multi-occupancy properties in which migrant workers were living. Of the 86 properties that were inspected, 73 were given notices requiring the landlord to upgrade the dwellings to the correct standards under article 80 of the 1992 Housing Order. The Housing Executive's report also said that the majority of unregistered HMOs (houses in multiple occupation) were failing to meet the regulatory standards.

The Housing Executive does not know how many houses are being used as private-rented accommodation. It can tell us how many people are in receipt of housing benefit, but that is the limit of its knowledge. That is a deplorable situation, which cannot be allowed to continue. Tá sé in am stop a chur leis an chás seo.

Statutory and voluntary registration systems have failed. The Assembly must show leadership on this matter. The Assembly has a duty to ensure that those in our society who are most in need are given the protection that they require so that they can live in accommodation that is suited to their needs, which is correctly priced, and where intimidation is a thing of the past.

There has been massive growth in the private-rented sector in recent years, which has coincided with a serious crisis in the provision of social housing. People are forced into private rentals because there is nowhere else to turn. In 2006-07, homeless figures rose again to 21,013 — a 4.4% increase on the figure for 2005-06. However, of those cases, only 9,744 were accepted as being homeless. What happened to the other 11,000 applicants who were refused? They turned to the unregistered private sector.

People cannot understand the Assembly's hesitance to introduce mandatory registration. Some people in housing circles have pointed out that the Administrations in the Twenty-six Counties and in Scotland realised that there was a problem and moved to legislate for it.

In Scotland, each local authority prepares and maintains a register of landlords. Anyone who applies for registration must pass a "fit and proper person" test before he or she can become a landlord. The person must meet all legislative requirements and observe agreed standards of practice. The landlord pays a registration fee of £50, which covers a three-year period. There are other elements to the legislation and criteria in the Scottish model. However, the bottom line is that the Scots saw a problem, moved to put it right, and gave their people the protection that our constituents are crying out for.

In the Twenty-six Counties, the Residential Tenancies Act 2004 requires landlords to register all tenancies with the Private Residential Tenancies Board (PRTB), which administers a central register. The landlord pays a fee of €70 a unit or €300 for multiple units. There are strong enforcement laws, and the PRTB vigorously pursues failure to comply with registration. Failure to register is an offence punishable by a €3,000 fine, or six months in prison, or both.

Disputes between landlords and tenants are referred to the PRTB instead of the courts. The board deals with matters such as deposit refunds, breaches of tenancy obligations, lease terms, termination of tenancies, market rent, rent arrears and neighbours' complaints about tenants' behaviour.

The board also has the power to apply for injunctive-type relief in serious cases, such as illegal evictions or threat to life. It can also award damages of up to €20,000, and arrears of rent of up to €20,000 or twice the annual rent — whichever is the greatest amount.

Furthermore, the board can initiate a resolution process to adjudicate any difficulties that may arise, has the power to mediate in private session and can set up a public session with a three-person tenancy tribunal. That tribunal can oversee issues such as landlords not giving adequate notice periods when bringing tenancy to an end; harassment and illegal eviction of tenants; tenants being charged non-refundable deposits and four weeks' rent in advance, which is also non-refundable, even when housing benefit is paid; tenants being held responsible for making up the shortfall, even when housing benefit covers the full contractual rent; landlords withholding deposits and refusing to refund those at the end of the tenancies; and excessive service charges.

Sinn Féin believes that the rent-officer system should be scrapped, and that it should be subsumed into a new board with powers to deal with the private-rented sector. A board similar to the model in the South — with the right powers — could help to deal with the serious problems in the private-rented sector.

The Minister for Social Development should have no difficulty with Sinn Féin's proposals. From her experience in dealing with those issues, she is aware that a serious problem exists. She has witnessed at first hand the abuse of tenants by some landlords. She also knows that the registration scheme that is currently in place has failed those who it is supposed to protect. It is time to move forward and to put in place a mandatory registration scheme.

The Minister should consult widely on this issue, including the voluntary housing sector, to develop the consultation process in order to ensure that we get it right.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. Fra, please do not hold your papers over the microphone.

Mr F McCann: No landlord should fear mandatory registration — it will assist landlords who provide excellent accommodation and weed out those who abuse the system.

To lead the way on this issue, I urge all Members who act as landlords to take the first step and declare their interest to the House. Both the Minister and Members know that it is the right step to take. Let us send a clear and unanimous message that we support those tenants who have no voice and that we are prepared to legislate to give them that voice. I ask the House to support the motion as amended.

Mr Burns: I beg to move the following amendment: Insert after "legislate"

" , subject to the findings of the Housing Affordability Review Implementation Group, ".

I am delighted to have the opportunity to talk on this issue. I strongly support the call for the mandatory registration of private-sector landlords. Landlords and letting agents have responsibilities, not just to their tenants, but to the wider community. There are too many instances in which those responsibilities are ignored to the detriment of tenants and of society in general.

I appreciate that there is legislation already in place, such as the Private Tenancies (Northern Ireland) Order 2006, which requires landlords to make sure that their properties are maintained in a fit state. It is time that the legislation was taken one step further in order to give the tenant the right to know the name and address of the landlord.

As I have said previously, I agree wholeheartedly with the recommendations of the Semple Report. There is a strong case for the registration of all landlords by the Housing Executive, with sanctions for those who fail to register. It is important to remember that many tenants in the private-rental sector are supported by housing benefit, which is, after all, public money. It is important to ensure that we are getting the best possible value and providing people with the best possible service.

With that in mind, I am fairly sure that the housing affordability review implementation group will share that point of view when it publishes its conclusions.

We should look to our neighbours in the South and in Scotland for advice, and we should learn from their experiences. The model that was introduced in Scotland in 2006 provides a good framework for the development of our own system, mainly because it is strongly tied to antisocial behaviour legislation.

As I have said, landlords have a duty to their community as well as to their tenants. They not only have a responsibility to keep buildings in good order, but they must ensure that their properties are not used as dole drops or party houses. Similarly, landlords should not be permitted to evict tenants from homes at short notice without good reason. We all know that making people homeless puts a strain on our already dwindling public-housing stock. That must not be allowed to happen without the application of sanctions. Within our proposed system, sanctions should be available to punish swiftly landlords who take such action; the threat of the quick administration of anti-social behaviour orders or swift prosecution should prevent such activity.

Although I have talked about legislation and regulation, we must never lose sight of the bigger picture and the main priority. Everyone should live in a good neighbourhood and have warm comfortable homes in which they can live securely without fear or worry. The mandatory registration of private landlords will help to achieve that.

I support the amendment.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Social Development (Mr Campbell): Social housing is an issue that gains in importance with each passing month. A combination of factors in Northern Ireland ensures that we are all only too well aware of the matter. Surveys show that house prices are increasing rapidly month-on-month, making purchasing out of the question for many, particularly young people. Five increases in interest rates have occurred over the past 15 months. Those factors alone have ensured that the demand for social housing has increased significantly in that comparatively short time. As a result, the main provider of social housing, the Housing Executive, has come under severe pressure. In their constituency work, many Members have found that people who have 120, 150 or even 200 points find it difficult to get accommodation in the public-housing sector, and, increasingly, those people are turning to the private-rental sector. We have also recently received the information that £140 million in benefits is going to private landlords to pay rent. That combination is causing problems that are unlikely to decrease; in fact, the situation will probably worsen over the next 12 to 18 months, if not beyond.

We have evidence of the Scottish scheme, which is similar to that proposed. That scheme is undergoing a review, and, at this stage, it appears that it has worked.

Many of the private landlords in Northern Ireland are bona fide landlords, with whom tenants have a good relationship and with whom there is no difficulty. However, as Mr Burns pointed out, several problems have arisen with regard to antisocial behaviour. Residents who live in close proximity to problem families may have difficulties that could be alleviated if such a register were available.

If the Assembly does not take the right steps, the situation will not improve, but is likely to worsen. I am not convinced of the benefits of the amendment, which I understand may be accepted by Sinn Féin. I hope that such a move will not create unnecessary bureaucracy for the housing affordability review implementation group, and that the Minister will say that that will not be the case.

Most private-sector landlords who are effective, efficient and law-abiding, want to see the minimum amount of fuss and bureaucracy in order to allow them to continue to offer private-rented accommodation in a manner of which most people approve, while simultaneously rooting out those private-sector landlords who do not fulfil the criteria in the way in which they should.

On balance, the DUP is in favour of the motion, and, along with Members who belong to the Committee for Social Development, and the House, I look forward to the Minister's response to the motion and the amendment.

Mr Cobain: I am disappointed to hear that Sinn Féin will accept the amendment, which compromises the original motion. Handing over the future of the registration of landlords to another agency would be a mistake. It is the job of Assembly Members to legislate, and that is what we should do.

I am in favour of introducing compulsory registration of all landlords in Northern Ireland. Sir John Semple referred to that matter in his latest report when he called for the registration of all landlords by the new local authorities, when they are established.

The case for registration is self-evident. The number of people who live in private-rented accommodation has grown steadily over the last decade because of an inability to satisfy housing needs in the public sector.

All of the housing studies that I have seen, including the Semple Report, show that there is a need to build between 2,000 and 2,500 new public-sector homes each year in order to meet housing demand. In 2008, it is planned that 600 new public-sector homes will be completed. That will not address the need, and will drive a number of families into the private-rented sector.

There are already more than 80,000 homes in the private-rented sector, which represents more than 11% of our total housing stock. Therefore, there are a number of issues that are specific to the private-rented sector that must be addressed. Those issues include accommodation for the most vulnerable in our society. Historically, that sector also contains a higher number of other tenures.

In 2001, the level of unfitness in the private-rented sector was approximately 9%, and although that improved significantly, reducing to 6% in 2004, that figure was still higher than the overall unfitness levels in the rest of the property market. That sector provides accommodation for the most vulnerable, and covers more than 80,000 homes. Therefore, because the unfitness levels are higher than average, the case for compulsory registration is clear. No one wants to penalise landlords. Instead, we must work with and encourage landlords to improve housing conditions and standards. A registration scheme would be an ideal vehicle to achieve those ends.

The Minister for Social Development gave a commitment to examine how to bring back into use empty homes in the private-rented sector. I look forward to seeing that work completed at the earliest possible opportunity.

There is a strategy for the regulation of HMOs. The Housing (Northern Ireland) Order 2003 provided powers for the Housing Executive to introduce the statutory registration scheme for HMOs, and that has been working well since 2004.

1.45 pm

The registration requires landlords to comply fully with HMO standards; to ensure that the accommodation is fit and that it meets management standards; to provide annual certification that all fire protection equipment has been serviced and maintained in full working order; to provide electric and gas certificates as appropriate; and to pay a registration fee of £15 each year for each occupant. The drive behind that is to ensure that landlords comply with specific regulations.

The Private Tenancies (Northern Ireland) Order 2006, which came into effect on 1 April 2007, provides a new structure for the private-rented sector in Northern Ireland. Although it covers other tenancy issues, it does not go far enough on unfitness and disrepair, rent controls and certificates of fitness. It does not compel landlords to register but relies on their co-operation. That is the Order's weakness.

I welcome the motion and the compulsory registration of landlords. However, I cannot support the amendment.

Ms Lo: It is useful to consider examples from our neighbours. Private-landlord registration practices exist in Scotland and the Republic of Ireland. The Scottish scheme, established under the Antisocial Behaviour etc. (Scotland) Act 2004, aims to ensure that all private landlords in Scotland are considered fit and proper to let residential property. They must meet all legislative requirements and observe agreed standards of practice.

In the Republic of Ireland, the Private Residential Tenancies Board was set up under the Residential Tenancies Act 2004 to provide a centralised register and a comprehensive dispute-resolution service in order to avoid people's having to resort to the courts. The Private Tenancies (Northern Ireland) Order 2006 sets out the obligations of landlords and tenants, including repairs and fitness inspection, and enhances the provisions of the Housing (Northern Ireland) Order 1992. However, its scope is only to ensure that accommodation meets the minimum physical conditions for habitation. That is not enough.

More families are looking to the private-rented sector because of the chronic housing shortage, spiralling house prices and long waiting lists for social housing. Many people who would normally have applied for Housing Executive accommodation are now forced to rent from the private sector. In 2006, the Northern Ireland Housing Executive paid out £140 million in housing benefit to private landlords, which is a massive sum of money. Although it must be recognised that there is much quality private housing and good management practice, there are people who are at the bottom end of the range who pay relatively high rents for poor accommodation, often with short-term tenure and bad management. The demand for a deposit and rent in advance can also cause financial difficulty for tenants, who include migrant workers and their families who have moved to Northern Ireland to live.

The Alliance Party supports the call to regulate the private sector, which is expanding at an unprecedented rate and receives huge sums of public money in rent from housing benefit. My party agrees with the Housing Rights Service that there is a need for mandatory registration of private landlords and letting agents, which incorporates a dispute-resolution service and a statutory deposit scheme. It is essential that registration be compulsory for all landlords and letting agents and that the register be available in a publicly accessible format. It must be co-ordinated by a central agency that is similar to that in the Republic of Ireland and must have rigorous enforcement powers in order to be effective. However, the Assembly needs to be mindful that adequate consultation on such a scheme must be carried out and that there must be a sensible timescale for its development and implementation in order for it to work properly.

I disagree with the proposed amendment. This should not be subject to the findings of the housing affordability review implementation group, as that would only delay matters. We should look at this urgently.

Mr Hilditch: I welcome the opportunity to speak on the introduction of a mandatory registration scheme for Northern Ireland. It would be a good opportunity to promote better standards in the housing sector, and would result in our communities having good-quality private-rental accommodation for a wide range of households at various income levels.

I urge the Minister for Social Development to legislate for the mandatory registration of all landlords, sooner rather than later. Registration would be an important strand of the Assembly's wider policy framework for the private-rented sector, which is designed to secure good management, good standards, and good behaviour right across the housing sector. By doing so, the legislation would reinforce the positive contribution that the private-rental sector makes to meeting housing needs in Northern Ireland. It would increase the quantity of affordable homes, develop the quality of those homes, and address the needs of vulnerable people.

By doing this we would ensure that there were proper tenancy agreements setting out the rights and responsibilities of tenants and landlords. In turn, that would prevent exploitation and harassment of tenants, and would also help in taking action where a tenant's behaviour causes a nuisance to neighbours.

According to the Department for Social Development figures, in 2005 almost 8,000 homes in the private sector, more than 3,000 Housing Executive properties and 210 homes owned by housing associations were deemed unfit. We are aware that there are negligent landlords out there, and we know the problems that they create. We have all heard the complaints about poor wiring, damp homes, health and safety issues, and even rat problems. Other agencies, such as the Housing Executive and council environmental health departments, must be called upon to resolve those problems.

Many landlords live outside Northern Ireland, and, consequently, their tenants find it impossible to get in touch with them. Absentee landlords sometimes use agencies, which brings a third party into the dispute. The lines of communication become complicated, and it appears that the tenant is being given the runaround. The Assembly must realise that many of the people living in houses in multiple occupancy are among the most vulnerable in our community.

"A House in Multiple Occupation is defined as a house that is occupied by persons who do not form a single household.

Typically, a HMO in Belfast is a three storey Victorian terraced house that has been converted into flats, and which do not always meet fire safety standards.”

Therefore, as a matter of urgency, we should be concerned for the residents’ health and safety and we should be insisting on annual gas safety certificates, safety of electrical appliances and furniture, working smoke alarms, and written terms of occupancy.

As politicians, we should encourage inspections of properties that are rented out as houses in multiple occupation. We should issue licences to landlords, as long as their properties comply with the standards of fire safety, amenities and management. We should set up databases of properties for which licences have been issued, and make that information available for public inspection. We should encourage prospective tenants to consult the registration database before renting private accommodation.

The Chartered Institute of Housing in Northern Ireland recommends the development of strategies to improve, and work in partnership with, the private-rented sector. It feels that the current housing benefit levels urgently need to be reviewed. It agrees with the principle of a mediation and arbitration service for landlords and tenants, but states that more detail is needed as to who would operate those functions. As public representatives, we should introduce penalties for landlords who are not licensed and fines for any breach of licence terms.

The other side of the coin is that we must protect our landlords. The availability and stock of social housing would collapse if landlords were not filling the void. It is difficult to provide exact figures for the number of landlords in Northern Ireland, as there are a large number of people who will not declare themselves as landlords.

We have heard of landlords complaining about their tenants, regarding the mess and damage that they cause to their properties. That should not be happening, but it happens to many landlords. If people were vandalising public property they would be charged by the PSNI, yet tenants are not charged unless their landlord takes them to court and wins the case.

I hope that the rest of the Assembly shares my views on the important issue before us. I urge the Minister to begin working on better standards of accommodation in the housing market and insist that she takes immediate action. Without the proposed legislation, it will be more difficult to eradicate fuel poverty by 2016, to halve child poverty by 2010, and to combat the ongoing problems with the lack of social housing. We will need all agencies and Departments to pull together and set dates and targets for the legislation to be passed. Like other Members in the Chamber, I am happy to support the motion as it stands.

Miss McIlveen: I declare an interest as a landlord.

The recent boom in house prices has stemmed largely from people considering property to be a good investment. After the highly publicised pension scheme frauds, the problems surrounding final payment occupational pension schemes, and a volatile stock market, it is little wonder that, having seen the price of property increase over the past 20 years, people have decided to purchase additional properties to give them security in their old age. Their mortgages and supplementary incomes are supplied by the tenants’ rent.

However, certain unsavoury types of landlord can be attracted to those situations in which large sums of money can be made. There are those who fail to fulfil their obligations as a landlord because they want to maximise the money that they make from a property, and there are those who are not fit and proper landlords because of their involvement in criminal activity. I fear that the first category of unsavoury landlord is on the increase because, first, rising mortgage rates have meant lessening profits, and secondly, people are inexperienced. The second category is also on the rise, which is evident from the excellent work of the Assets Recovery Agency. Tenants, of course, need to be protected, and although rights conferred by a tenancy agreement offer some protection, they can be enforced only through the courts. That can be a lengthy and stressful experience.

A landlord-registration scheme is a laudable idea as long as we are clear about the reason why we want landlords to be registered and about what is to be done with the information. Such a scheme can offer tenants a level of security in that they will know that the property that they are going to rent is of the appropriate standard and that the landlord is a reputable person.

Undoubtedly, there are horror stories about landlords, but many look after tenants, comply with housing regulations, and are fit and proper landlords. Currently, there is a form of limited landlord registration in Northern Ireland. That covers certain areas and HMOs that have 10 or more occupants in certain district council areas, along with other conditions. The Northern Ireland Housing Executive has the power to bring prosecutions for failure to register, as was seen in August this year when one landlord was fined £3,000 for his fifth offence.

The house must meet all the requirements that are set out in article 80(2) of the Housing (Northern Ireland) Order 1992; be fit for human habitation as defined by the Housing (Northern Ireland) Order 1981; be managed in compliance with the Housing (Management of Houses in Multiple Occupation) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 1993; and have valid current certificates for electrical and gas installations. In addition, the person having control of the house and the person managing the house must both be fit and proper persons. Each house is registered for occupation by a maximum number of occupants, and a fee equivalent to £15 a year for each occupant is to be payable on first registration of a house. Registration is for a period of five years.

The register is available to the public for a fee, barring certain sensitive properties. The register contains certain information: the property reference number; the address of the property; the maximum occupancy level that is permitted under the scheme; a contact telephone number for the manager of the HMO; the date of the registration of the property; and the date for renewal of registration. However, it does not have — nor should any proposed register have — a provision that enables the public to search against the name of a landlord. The fact that a particular property is registered and that the landlord and manager of the property are deemed fit and proper by virtue of that registration, should be sufficient for anyone searching the register. Such a register should not afford a member of the public the luxury of prying into a person's financial affairs.

The cost of administration is one problem that I foresee with such a register. Those who apply to register will, of course, pay for that pleasure, but costs will arise as staff will have to be employed to investigate and prosecute those who do not register. Legal costs may be recoverable from those who are prosecuted, but with a vast number of rental properties in the private sector, the initial costs could be enormous.

I support the principle of the motion, but, as with everything, the devil is in the detail.

Mr McCallister: I support the motion. It aims to protect vulnerable people from bad landlords and from having to live in unfit properties and in poor quality housing. It is not concerned with those landlords who follow best practice and who are an example to others. As has been mentioned throughout the debate, our society has changed enormously, with rising house prices, increased numbers of migrant workers in HMOs, and so on.

2.00 pm

I support the motion, along with my colleague the honourable Member for North Belfast Mr Cobain. The proposer of the motion said that it was about showing leadership. I agree with him. It is about saying that this is a matter for this Assembly to decide, not farming it out to some review group. It is up to us as the leaders of this society to decide what we want to do.

Mr F McCann: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCallister: Yes, but the Member will have to be quick.

Mr F McCann: I proposed the motion to try to achieve a unified voice in the Chamber. Obviously, when I said this morning that we accepted the amendment, we did not realise the strength of feeling across the House.

Having discussed the issue with some of our colleagues, we withdraw our support for the amendment and state our preference for the original motion.

Mr McCallister: From the Ulster Unionist perspective, that is a very welcome move. The amendment would have weakened the motion significantly. As I have said, policy is for the Assembly to decide. Registration of landlords will provide protection in disputes over deposits, which the Member mentioned earlier. Landlords do have a duty of care, both for the buildings that they own and for the people who live in them.

On this side of the House, my party supports the motion.

The Minister for Social Development (Ms Ritchie): I welcome the opportunity to debate the way forward for the private-rented sector. I believe firmly in the need for all tenants to be protected, whether they live in public social housing or in the private-rented sector. Such a system needs to be open and transparent, and the housing conditions in which people live are of paramount importance. I support the spirit of the motion and that of the amendment.

I wish to clarify something before I continue — this is for the proposer of the amendment, to whom I think it may be of help. The amendment refers specifically to the Minister-led implementation group, which I hope will report in December. After that, measures will be brought forward for legislation, and the implementation group will take on board all possible ideas from within the Semple Report — such as the subject of this motion — and from without. I have encouraged the expert panel to think outside the Semple Report, because there are many issues that we need to address.

I wish to begin by answering a simple question: what has my Department already done to regulate and improve the private-rented sector? The answer is that it has done a very considerable amount. In 2004, my Department and the Housing Executive published a joint strategy for the private-rented sector, 'Renting Privately: A Strategic Framework'. That strategy was the first attempt in more than 25 years to address a full range of vital issues in the private-rented sector. I have no doubt that those issues need to be addressed, that rogue landlords need to be addressed and that all tenants need to be protected. From that strategy emerged a new piece of primary legislation, the Private Tenancies (Northern Ireland) Order 2006, which came into effect in April 2007.

The 2006 Order has established a new system of regulation for the private-rented sector. It gives clear rights to tenants and places new obligations on landlords, with district councils given strong new powers to tackle rogue landlords and poor housing conditions. The councils have been given specific powers to tackle unfitness, disrepair, harassment and illegal eviction. In the case of unfit dwellings, they have been given powers over rent control and registration.

The law prevents unscrupulous landlords from harassing tenants, offers new protections for tenants about notice periods and, importantly, places an obligation on landlords to provide all tenants with rent books and a written statement of tenancy terms. For the first time, that will give all tenants the right to know the identity of their landlords and important written information on their tenancy terms. I am sure that all Members will join me in welcoming those important steps. Having listened to all today's contributions, I have no doubt that Members want to ensure that landlords adhere to strict conditions and that they take due notice of all tenants' rights.

Over the past few years, houses in multiple occupation have been an area of concern. Although such houses are an important provider of accommodation to students and migrant workers, they have their problems — poor housing conditions, overcrowding and poor management. In recent years, my Department and the Housing Executive have worked hard to improve the conditions of such houses. New legislation has been introduced and, in May 2004, a statutory registration scheme was put in place, to be managed by the Housing Executive. Initially, that scheme focused resources on areas where the problems were greatest, and it has now been rolled out across Northern Ireland in areas such as south and north Belfast, Derry, Coleraine, Portstewart, Dungannon, Cookstown and Bangor. Clearly, much has been done, but we must go further. Perhaps more legislation is required.

Before a rational decision can be made on how to move forward, we must be clear about the impact of our achievements since the introduction of the new legislation in April 2007. The Private Tenancies (Northern Ireland) Order 2006 has been in place for six months, so it is early days, and new measures are bedding in. Local councils are starting to exercise their powers, but there are still lessons to be learnt. I am keen to know what has gone well, where the problems lie and, above all, what more needs to be done. Therefore, I have asked my officials to talk to people on the ground — namely, local councils, the Housing Executive, advice agencies, tenants' groups and landlords — and get answers to those questions and report to me as soon as possible. Public representatives have a role to play in this also.

I am also keen to learn what works in other places. The South of Ireland and Scotland have taken different approaches to the regulation of the private-rented sector. They have both adopted registration schemes, which are relatively new. Have those schemes been effective? Do they represent value for money? Have they achieved what they set out to do?

Mr F McCann: I appreciate what the Minister says about the Private Tenancies (Northern Ireland) Order 2006, which came into effect in April 2007. However, many people think that that Order is not worth the paper that it is written on. It is better than the legislation that it replaced, but it still has no teeth. Tenants who are charged exorbitant rents by rogue landlords will not run, because they fear eviction and intimidation. A former direct rule Minister declared that houses in multiple occupation would be allowed to be built in areas of Belfast other than south Belfast.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Does the Member have a question?

Ms Ritchie: That was a comment rather than a question. It illustrates the fact that I need to spend some time with my officials to ascertain the impact of the 2006 Order. If I find that the Order has not been effective, I will introduce changes quickly, because I want to be absolutely sure that the right legislation is in place in order to protect tenants. Various questions must be answered before the Department can say whether a registration scheme will work in Northern Ireland. My officials are currently examining those issues.

We must also consider the Semple Report on affordable housing. I take Fra McCann's comments on board about the number of people on waiting lists and the many people who are homeless.

That is why we must increase the level of supply of social and affordable housing to meet demand, and why I said that I inherited a woefully inadequate budget. Above all, it is why I said that I need the support of my ministerial colleagues to factor into the draft Programme for Government the need for social housing to be a priority so that it can be used as an instrument for tackling deprivation and disadvantage. It must be given a high priority when it comes to budgets.

Sir John Semple adopted a clear line on the valuable role that the private-rented sector plays in the housing mix, and he made the case for the registration of all landlords. However, that case is based on the new local authorities' undertaking the registration and enforcement role, following the implementation of the review of public administration, and will need to be explored further as the Executive and the Assembly debate the way forward for local government. Full registration is not easy; it is a huge and costly matter, and I welcome Sir John's pragmatism in recognising that point and in proposing a progressive move towards registration that builds on existing work.

Today, I will not have time to respond to the points made by individual Members. However I will write to them, in due course, after the debate.

Mr A Maginness: The debate has been interesting. Everyone agrees on the principle of having a mandatory registration scheme for private landlords, and I do not think that there is any doubt about the Minister's intention to move in that fashion. However, there is disagreement on the amendment, and I am disappointed that Mr McCann sought to withdraw the support that was previously pledged. I would not like to be going into battle with Mr McCann as my leader.

[Interruption.]

After the first shot, he would flee the battlefield.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. I ask Members to make their remarks through the Chair.

Mr A Maginness: I am not trying to engage with Mr McCann directly. There was a bit of panic by Mr McCann and his Sinn Féin colleagues, given the remarks of my friend from North Belfast Mr Cobain regarding the amendment.

The amendment is perfectly sensible. When one is proceeding with legislation, the first thing to do is to establish the principle of the legislation, which has been accepted by everyone in the House. Then, in order to put the legislation into context and give it shape and form, one has to be advised as to how that should be done. In this case, there is no better way of doing that than through the housing affordability review implementation group. It is a pity that it could not be given a shorter name. That group will report to the Minister who will, in turn, report back to the Assembly. Therefore, there is nothing to be frightened of.

It is quite clear that there are various ways of dealing with the matter. Scotland has a scheme, as does the Republic of Ireland. The main thrust of the Scottish scheme is to deal with antisocial behaviour, and we could take some lessons from that. However, I note that the scheme introduced by the Department and the Housing Executive, in relation to houses in multiple occupation, failed in the courts, as it was regarded to be too onerous on landlords and disproportionate in its terms.

I ask the House to rethink its apparent opposition to the amendment. Owing to the fact that so many people are dependent on private-rented accommodation, there is an obvious need for increased regulation. Such regulations should be introduced.

I emphasise that the implementation group, which is led by the Minister, is backed by the Executive — I refer to the Northern Ireland Executive, not the Housing Executive. It is important that that ministerial support continue.

Some of the comments that were made during the debate related to the terms and conditions that apply to people who live in rented accommodation. In many ways, that matter has been addressed by the Private Tenancies (Northern Ireland) Order 2006, which is a good set of proposals. The House should bear that in mind.

Mrs McGill: Go raibh maith agat, a leasCheann Comhairle. I welcome the Minister to the House. There was some comment during the debate about Sinn Féin's panicking over whether to accept the amendment. I wish to say from the outset that we did not panic. We fully discussed the matter this morning when we received the amendment. My party colleague Fra McCann said early in the debate that we would accept the amendment because we believe that the motion is exceptionally important, and we did not wish to divide the House. We thought it important to have a mature debate. I repeat that we did not panic; we gave the matter full consideration.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Social Development said that the motion was not aimed at all landlords; it is not — as he rightly said, there are many bona fide landlords. However, in offering leadership, it is important to urgently put in place measures to deal with landlords who are not behaving as they should, no matter who their tenants are. A number of Members, including Mr Cobain, the Minister and others, referred to the 2006 Order, which came into effect in April 2007 — indeed, Mr Burns referred to it at the start of his speech. Mr Cobain was quite right to say that that Order does not go nearly far enough. It is not at all clear how the Order addresses the matter that is under debate, namely the mandatory registration of private landlords.

The Committee for Social Development received a page and three quarters of correspondence that pointed out all the deficiencies of the Order. I am not saying whether the group that sent that correspondence is correct, but I agree with the Members who said that the 2006 Order does not go far enough. I do not see provision anywhere in that Order for the mandatory registration of private landlords.

I listened to Mr Burns, who did not often refer to his own amendment. I felt that his heart was with the House's agreeing the motion. Perhaps that is what he really wants in his heart of hearts, and, if that is the case, I agree with him.

I spoke to Advice NI this morning, and it says that, if the difficulties that Members have highlighted were to arise in the contract between landlord and tenant, in that people on income support who receive housing benefit cannot make payments, those difficulties should be addressed as a matter of urgency.

As I have said, we did not panic at all over whether to accept the amendment. We did not want to divide the House, but, because the text of the amendment does not urgently address the matter, we are minded to say that the mandatory registration of all private-sector landlords should be dealt with in legislation.

The Minister referred to the Semple Review. The Chairperson of the Committee for Social Development was worried that it would add a layer of bureaucracy.

We share his concern — any added bureaucracy would not be welcome.

A leasCheann Comhairle, Anna Lo also said that the mandatory registration of all landlords should be addressed as a matter of urgency. Overall, very few contributors disagreed.

LeasCheann Comhairle, sin é go raibh míle maith agat. My party did not panic. We did not want to divide the House, but we will be supporting the motion. Go raibh maith agat.

Question, That the amendment be made, put and negatived.

Main Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly calls upon the Minister for Social Development to legislate for the mandatory registration of all landlords in the private sector.

Mr Deputy Speaker: We now suspend —

Mr Kennedy: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. Has the Speaker's Office, or, indeed, any of the Deputy Speakers, considered the acoustic that currently obtains in the Chamber? Many Members find it to be unsatisfactory. I know that microphones for the Front Bench have been newly arranged, but considerable problems persist, not least for people in the Public Gallery, who are unable to hear large sections of debate. Whether that is a good thing or a bad thing is a different matter, but, nevertheless, I am concerned about the Chamber acoustic.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I note the Member's concerns, which will be referred to the Speaker's Office, where, no doubt, they will be the subject of further discussion.

I suggest that Members, when speaking, avoid holding papers over the microphones, because that causes muffling.

Mr McNarry: What did you say, Mr Deputy Speaker? I cannot hear you.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I am sure that I will improve.

I will repeat what I have just said. The issue that Mr Kennedy raised will be referred to the Speaker and to the Business Office. In the meantime, I suggest that Members, when speaking, do not hold papers over the microphones. I hope that I was heard that time.

It is almost time for questions for oral answer, so I shall suspend the sitting until 2.30 pm.

The sitting was suspended at 2.25 pm.

ORAL ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

Health, Social Services and Public Safety

Trilingual Translation Services

1. Mr McCallister asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety to make a statement on his Department's approach to trilingual translation services. (AQO 217/08)

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (Mr McGimpsey): My Department will honour its obligations under the European Charter for Regional or Minority Languages. In Northern Ireland, that applies to Irish and Ulster Scots, although each has a different status under the charter. In line with that, I have decided to adopt a trilingual approach to the Department's title on letterheads. I have, however, discontinued Irish-language translations of advertisements and press releases. Departmental publications may be made available in Irish or Ulster Scots on request, providing that those requests meet certain criteria. Moreover, my Department will accept correspondence in Irish or Ulster Scots and will consider arranging for translations so that responses can be provided in the same language that the correspondent has used.

Mr McCallister: I thank the Minister for his answer and for the sensible approach that he has taken on the issue since he took up office.

Does he agree that every penny in the Health Service is precious and that any financial efficiency that is achieved by savings on translations and advertising costs should be ploughed back into front-line services to ensure top-quality care for everyone in Northern Ireland?

Mr McGimpsey: I agree with those sentiments. In an area such as health and social services, every penny is precious because the health and well-being of every man, woman and child in Northern Ireland is involved. It is crucial that full use be made of every resource that is allocated.

Mr McCausland: I also welcome the Minister's decision. Can the Minister provide the House with figures that show the amount of money that his Department has spent in the years since his predecessor as devolved Minister introduced her policy of bilingualism?

Mr McGimpsey: In the past five years, since the onset of suspension, £151,000 has been spent on translation. I know that substantial funds were expended during the previous period of devolution.

With the increased activity that devolution has brought, I would have anticipated a substantial increase in that figure, to beyond £30,000 a year.

Fireworks

2. Mr McClarty asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (a) what plans he had to raise awareness of the health dangers associated with fireworks; and (b) what discussions he had had with other Departments on this issue, ahead of the Halloween period. (AQO 214/08)

Mr McGimpsey: I am launching a fireworks-safety campaign on 8 October to coincide with the lead-up to Halloween 2007. The campaign will highlight the health dangers that are associated with the misuse of fireworks. My interest in fireworks is concerned with reducing — better still, eliminating — the number of avoidable injuries that they cause.

In addition, my Department funds the Northern Ireland regional office of the Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents (RoSPA), which, along with its other messages, promotes fireworks safety. I am particularly concerned about the injuries that fireworks can cause to children and the traumatic effects that they can have on elderly people. Therefore, I wish to see greater control of those dangerous devices. That requires the adoption of a multi-agency approach, and, to that end, I recently met with Paul Goggins, who has responsibility for the control of fireworks, to discuss improvements in the enforcement of controls.

Mr McClarty: I thank the Minister for his response. It is reassuring to know that the Minister and his Department take a proactive approach in tackling what is an important matter. In launching the fireworks-safety campaign, will the Minister ensure that the key messages from that campaign continue after Halloween so that people are continually made aware of the real dangers that fireworks pose?

Mr McGimpsey: It is important that the message is not simply lost after Halloween. People are injured year on year.

The introduction of licensing for the sale and use of fireworks in 2002 led to a significant reduction in injuries. However, since then, there has been a steady annual increase in the number of injuries. Therefore, the Department cannot afford to be complacent and the message must resound every year and throughout the year.

Mr Burns: Given the health risks associated with the burning of toxic materials on bonfires, why was the Department not represented on the inter-agency working group on bonfires that was set up in 2003?

Mr McGimpsey: The inter-agency approach was an initiative that was inspired by local government. I was involved in that as a member of Belfast City Council, and several Members were similarly involved. The issue requires the involvement of agencies and communities because, as the Member is aware, bonfires are an important part of a tradition in Northern Ireland. Therefore, the safe application of that tradition, ensuring that toxic materials are not burned, is a matter for everyone.

Mr I McCrea: I thank the Minister for his comments. There is no doubt that a multi-agency approach is required, and some councils take a proactive approach to the problem. Will the Minister advise the House of the extent of acquisition of fireworks without licences? What actions are being taken to limit that practice, and what more can be done?

Mr McGimpsey: One of the problems, to which I have referred, is the steady rise in injuries since licensing was introduced in 2002. That is primarily due to the increased availability of illegal fireworks. Because people unscrupulously avoid the licensing arrangements and sell fireworks illegally, they fall into the wrong hands. Given that 97% of people who are injured are male and more than 70% are minors — under the age of 18 — the problem mainly concerns children and young people.

This is a matter of control. To that end, my Department involves other Departments and agencies, such as the police, the Department of Education, the Ambulance Service, the Fire and Rescue Service and community safety units, in trying to get our message across and in attempting to gain control, particularly of the illegal importation and sale of fireworks.

Promotion of Good Mental Health

3. Ms Lo asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety what support his Department was giving to students' associations with regard to promoting good mental health among students and young people. (AQO 295/08)

Mr McGimpsey: The 'Promoting Mental Health Strategy and Action Plan for 2003-2008' was published in 2003 and includes 30 actions designed to promote the health and well-being of the entire population. Those include personal development programmes, directories of services and the training of youth workers and teachers.

In line with that strategy, the Health Promotion Agency for Northern Ireland has been working in partnership with the National Union of Students and the Union of Students in Ireland to support the mental health of students in higher education. Their work includes the distribution of the 'Mind your head' booklet to first-year students. The 'Share It' advertisement that was broadcast as part of the implementation of the suicide prevention strategy also encourages young people to share their problems and to seek help at times of crisis. In light of the publication of the suicide prevention strategy and the recommendations of the Bamford Review of Mental Health and Learning Disability, the 'Promoting Mental Health Strategy and Action Plan for 2003-2008' is now being revised.

Ms Lo: I thank the Minister for his answer.

Mr K Robinson: The University of Ulster is in my East Antrim constituency, and I am aware of the excellent day-to-day work of its medical centre. Given the focus on mental health in recent weeks, is any specific work being undertaken directly with local universities to promote mental-health issues in general?

Mr McGimpsey: As far as I am aware, the University of Ulster and Queen's University Belfast have developed mental-health strategies to promote good mental health among the student population. As a matter of course, GP practices in university areas specialise in providing services that are tailored to meet students' needs, which include the promotion of good mental and sexual health. In addition to that, the University of Ulster carries out other related work. The stress and expectations among young students, particularly at universities, and the pressure that they feel under to make the grade and be successful in their degree course, have prompted that supplementary question and also those strategies that the universities have developed.

Mr Simpson: I am sure that the Minister is aware of the Health Promoting Schools initiative, which has proved to be internationally effective. However, the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety and the Department of Education recently refused to fund it. Will the Minister agree to revisit that decision?

Mr McGimpsey: The Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety has introduced a number of initiatives, not least the Investing for Health strategy, which has been successfully in place for five years. I will enquire about the status of the Health Promoting Schools initiative in the Department, and I will inform the Member of the position in writing. He can then discuss the issue with me if he wishes.

Agenda for Change: Ulster Hospital

4. Mr Easton asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety to explain the delay in implementing the Agenda for Change programme for clerical staff in the Ulster Hospital. (AQO 220/08)

Mr McGimpsey: Agenda for Change implementation for the 745 clerical staff in the Ulster Hospital is progressing in the same way as in other trusts. The process and timetable for implementation have been agreed in partnership with regional staff representatives, and significant progress has been made in the past two months. Over 57%, which represents 425 members of staff, will move to Agenda for Change rates of pay within the next month. All staff will receive their increases, and they will be backdated to 1 October 2004. I recently met the main unions to review progress.

Mr Easton: What commitment will the Minister give to those staff who have been affected by the Agenda for Change programme? When will staff receive their entitlements? When will he commit to using his time more wisely and sort out this four-year process as a priority, instead of spending and wasting time interfering in the business of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety?

Mr McGimpsey: I am not aware of my interfering with the work of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety, and I have not heard any remarks about that. As far as the work of Agenda for Change is concerned, Members must understand that 63,000 healthcare staff must be assessed, graded and accorded new grades in relation to the skills and jobs that they do in order to determine their new rates of pay. To date, 97% of staff have been matched to those new grades, so there is no question of anyone's time being wasted. We must bear in mind that 63,000 members of staff require individual interviews and assessments. When they are matched to the new pay bands, their pay will be backdated. Some 65% of healthcare staff and 62% of social services staff are on the new rates of pay. Matching will be completed for all staff in the service by the end of December 2007, and the new rates of pay will be in place by the end of March 2008.

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Minister assure the House that all moneys required to implement Agenda for Change have been provided to each board and trust? Will he further guarantee that audit and accounting mechanisms have been established to ensure that the money is spent on the purpose for which it was intended?

Mr McGimpsey: On both points, I assure the Member that the money that was previously bid for has been set aside. As I said, a large portion of that money has been allocated already, and the rest will be allocated in the next few months — certainly before the end of March. Sixty-five per cent of staff are receiving the new rate of pay — 62% in health and social services — which is backdated to 1 October 2004.

Suicide Prevention

5. Mr Cobain asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety to make a statement on the work of his Department in relation to suicide prevention. (AQO 216/08)

Mr McGimpsey: A suicide prevention strategy, which contains over 60 actions that aim to reduce the rate of suicide, was launched on 30 October 2006. I have allocated over £3 million annually to support the implementation of that strategy. Of that funding, £1·8 million has been invested in local communities.

A cross-sectoral suicide strategy implementation body has been established to oversee and advance the introduction of the strategy. Membership of that body includes representatives from the statutory and voluntary sectors, members of bereaved families, and members of those communities that have been most affected by suicide. The greatest strength of the body is that it brings together all the key players and stakeholders in the issue to advance the implementation of the strategy.

Mr Cobain: I thank the Minister for taking a personal interest in the issue and for visiting recently the community representatives in north and west Belfast who help those who need assistance with this matter. Does the Minister agree that further investment in mental-health services is important and that any cuts in the health budget will have a devastating impact on those who are on the front line and are attempting to save lives?

Mr McGimpsey: Yes, I agree unreservedly. As I mentioned, the Department has a suicide prevention strategy and an implementation body in place that provide mechanisms for various forms of action. Such actions have been discussed in the House; therefore, I will not list them again. That does not mean that anyone in my Department is complacent. As we are aware, suicide rates have doubled, an increase that is largely in the young. Dealing with that is a key priority for me and the Department.

Suicide is one of the most graphic examples of what poor mental health can do. The Bamford Review, which is an exhaustive review of mental health, demonstrates that mental ill health in Northern Ireland is 25% worse than that in England. If we use England as a benchmark, mental-health needs in Northern Ireland are 25% greater. In addition, the spending on mental health in Northern Ireland is about 25% less than in England. That big gap must be addressed. After inescapable costs for diseases that directly kill — such as cancer and strokes — my number one bid in the comprehensive spending review is to fund the implementation of the Bamford Review's recommendations.

Mrs I Robinson: The Minister said earlier that “every penny is precious”. The Health Committee has responded to the worrying increase in suicide in Northern Ireland by urgently setting up a full inquiry, which includes going to Scotland in November, DV, to learn from the experiences of the Choose Life strategy. Why is the Minister not prepared to let the Committee report its findings to him? Instead, he is duplicating our work in the Department. That indicates that he is interfering, despite his protestations.

Mr McGimpsey: I am almost, but not entirely, lost by that comment. As I have repeatedly said to Mrs Robinson and to the Deputy Chairperson of the Committee, I want to work with the Committee, and envisage working as a team. If Mrs Robinson has issues, the door to my office is always open. I will be at the Committee's meeting on Thursday. I totally agree with her about duplication of work — I have no desire to see that.

Mr O'Loan: The provision of mental-health nurses is an important element in a suicide prevention strategy. The Minister will be aware of the small number of teaching places that are available in Northern Ireland for such nurses.

He will also be aware of the Bamford Review's recommendation that the number of teaching places be increased. I welcome the Minister's support for the outcomes of the Bamford Review. What discussions has the Minister had with the universities here on the number of teaching places for mental-health nurses, and what progress can he report?

Mr McGimpsey: Mr O'Loan is correct. There are 400 mental-health nursing vacancies — a huge amount. However, that does not apply solely to Northern Ireland. There is a shortage of mental-health nurses in the other home countries — England, Scotland and Wales — and in the Irish Republic. In fact, there is a universal shortage. This year, we increased the number of training places to 70. It is expected that approximately 53 new mental-health nurses will graduate; therefore, not all of the places are being taken up. I am looking at that again as an urgency, because one of the key matters around the Bamford Review related to how staff can be encouraged to take up those places. It does not matter how many beds are available; without the staff to man the beds, the beds cannot be opened. Staffing is an important determinant, and is one of the big obstacles.

Tyrone and Fermanagh Hospital: Acute Mental-Health/Psychiatric Beds

6. Mr McElduff asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety what proposals he had to either increase or reduce the number of acute mental-health/psychiatric beds at the Tyrone and Fermanagh Hospital in Omagh. (AQO 227/08)

Mr McGimpsey: The Western Health and Social Care Trust's recent mental-health review, ‘Health in Mind’, and the recent Bamford Review, both recommended a reduction in acute inpatient beds in tandem with the development of a range of alternative community services, such as home treatment teams and crisis intervention teams. The number of mental-health acute beds in the Tyrone and Fermanagh Hospital was recently reduced from 52 to 42 as a result of the services provided by several alternatives to hospitals, such as Ferone Drive in Omagh, Clare House in Enniskillen — both step-down facilities — and Ramona House in Omagh, which is an additional unit. It is the trust's intention to reduce acute mental-health beds further as community places become available, in line with the Bamford Review's recommendations.

Mr McElduff: I thank the Minister for his reply. Does the Minister agree that all the health indicators west of the Bann point towards great health investment? Can the Minister assure the House — and me — that he will continue to invest in mental-health provision in the Tyrone and Fermanagh Hospital and west of the Bann?

Mr McGimpsey: As Mr McElduff is aware, we have announced a new hospital facility in Omagh — the enhanced local hospital. It will include 97 mental-health beds, some of which will be for acute mental illness. The thrust of the Bamford Review and the strategy is that patients do better outside of hospital. They do better in their homes, if they can get the support they need. That does not apply to everyone, but it is the thrust of the findings. Our mental-health budget spend on hospitals is about 54%, whereas that in England is 40%. I use England as the benchmark on the trend for the way forward. There is probably an argument about our making an over-provision; perhaps we are too inclined to send patients for long stays in hospital, when it would be more appropriate and beneficial to give them support in their communities. That is the thrust of areas of the Bamford Review, and, as we consider its implementation, I expect to have further discussions on those issues.

Dr Deeny: I thank the Minister for saying that acute psychiatric services will remain in Omagh. That is the very least that we expect from his Department.

The Minister and his Department are — rightly — to spend £65 million on a proper hospital in Downpatrick that will provide for the people of Downpatrick and surrounding district the essential, lifesaving services of an accident and emergency facility, inpatient medicine and coronary care — vital services that the Downpatrick and district GPs need for their patients.

The Minister stated when he became Health Minister that he would listen to the health professionals. However, he proposes to spend £190 million of public money — almost three times the amount spent on the Downpatrick hospital — on a so-called hospital in Omagh, on the site of the Tyrone and Fermanagh Hospital.

Does the Minister listen to the GPs and other health professionals of our area? If so, will he and his Department provide the new Omagh hospital with those vital lifesaving services of coronary care, inpatient medicine and accident and emergency facilities, which are essential in emergency situations to allow us — as front-line health professionals — to save the lives of patients in County Tyrone?

I will finish by asking the Minister —

Mr Speaker: I ask the Member to come to his supplementary question.

Dr Deeny: I am quite angry and upset, because it seems that the Minister is duplicating what we are doing in the Health Committee. Is it duplication or coincidence? First, within a week of the Committee's talking about infections in hospitals, the Minister was doing something about it; second was the case of Mrs Caldwell; and third is the Health Committee's plan to visit Scotland. Within days we will see the Minister duplicating the Committee's work on that.

Mr McGimpsey: I would need another Question Time to deal with Dr Deeny's questions.

To answer his last three points, those issues were on the record and talked about in this House, and in other places, and Scotland offered good practice for suicide prevention. The Department is looking hard at that, and has already had discussions about suicide. There is a five nations group that deals with suicide, including Northern Ireland, Scotland, England, Wales and the Irish Republic. That is all on record. It cannot be said that the Department is jumping the Committee's gun.

With regard to infections in hospitals, I get constant questions about MRSA and C difficile. The Department has already had one initiative on hospital cleanliness before the summer, and I am still looking closely at that. I may not be doing Gordon Brown's "deep clean", but patient safety is key. For me to not do so because the Health Committee wants to talk about it would not be a responsible way for me to go forward. The Caldwell case came about at a particular point in time, and it is not a fair criticism.

The original question was about mental health. There will be 97 mental-health beds, as follows: 28 acute mental-health beds; 20 elderly mental-health beds; nine alcohol and treatment beds; 20 challenging-behaviour beds; and 20 challenging-behaviour beds for the under-65s. That is part of the Omagh hospital project. I recall Kieran Deeny telling me to keep my hospital when I told the Committee that that was part and parcel of what was happening in Omagh.

Mr Buchanan: The Bamford Review encourages the redirecting of more resources into the community. Can the Minister tell us what progress has been made on upskilling staff and enhancing services in the community in the Omagh and West Tyrone area? Will he give a commitment to the House that he will provide full, acute, life-saving services at the Tyrone County Hospital at Omagh, instead of continually interfering with the work of the Health Committee?

Mr McGimpsey: I am almost tempted to ask for that again, but we have already had a large part of it.

I am planning to go ahead with training for staff, because delivery and implementation is key when there is a policy to deliver on the ground. I have already set out what the Department and the trust intend to do at the Tyrone local hospital, although there is a long way to go before the hospital plan is decided.

I entirely refute the suggestion that I interfere with the Health Committee.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Care Matters

7. Miss McIlveen asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety to detail the funding his Department is making available to implement the Care Matters strategy for the most vulnerable children in need of care. (AQO 213/08)

Mr McGimpsey: Responses to the 'Care Matters in Northern Ireland: A Bridge to a Better Future' consultation, which finished recently, are being analysed and considered before determining the final policy.

Funding for the initiative will depend on the outcome of the comprehensive spending review, which is still under consideration. Therefore, it is not possible to give a more detailed answer at the moment. However, the Department is identifying those elements of the strategy that have a neutral or moderate cost, and is consulting colleagues in the voluntary and statutory sectors about implementing those changes and improvements as quickly as possible.

Care Matters will build on recent investments in foster care, leaving care and children's residential homes. That includes introducing nationally agreed minimum foster-care allowances, more foster-care support workers and more resources to recruit foster carers from children's extended families. That also includes the appointment of personal advisers for care-leavers and measures to enable care-leavers to continue living with their former —

Mr Speaker: I must interrupt the Minister because Question Time is now over for his Department. I apologise to the Member that she cannot ask a supplementary question.

3.00 pm

(The Deputy Speaker [Mr McClarty] in the Chair).

Regional Development

Derry/Londonderry to Belfast Railway Line

1. Mr McCartney asked the Minister for Regional Development to outline the next steps in the development of the Derry/Londonderry to Belfast railway line. (AQO 269/08)

The Minister for Regional Development (Mr Murphy): Some £12 million of funding has been earmarked to finance a major project that is designed to extend the track life of the line between Ballymena and Coleraine on the Belfast to Derry railway line. Translink hopes that, when approved, the project will commence work on site early in the new year. In the meantime, the Department has approved funding of almost £500,000 to enable Translink to carry out urgent remedial work on wet beds on the line close to Ballymoney.

In planning for the future, the Department and Northern Ireland Railways have worked together on an interdepartmental steering group to examine a range of investment options for future railway provision. As a result, a bid has now been submitted for additional funding to upgrade the Derry line as part of the second investment strategy for Northern Ireland. Future levels of spending on the line, and on rail infrastructure generally, will be determined after the outcome of the budgetary process.

Mr McCartney: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his response. Does he agree that the development of the Derry line is vital for the further development of the north-west and for his commitment to regional balanced improvements?

Mr Murphy: I agree that the development of the Derry line is key. As the Member and other representatives from that area will know, a spatial development strategy for the north-west generally is under way. That strategy takes in Derry and Letterkenny, and central to it will be infrastructure that will support the area's development. That includes not only the railway but the A5, the north-west gateway that was announced recently, the port, and improvements to the airport. All those aspects are vital to making Derry the regional centre of the north-west area. Supporting infrastructure is needed so that Derry can develop to its full potential, and I support that desire. I know that infrastructure is key, and that is why I am keen to see appropriate infrastructure investments made in the north-west.

Mr G Robinson: Does the Minister have any plans to improve the frequency and speed of the railway service between Belfast and Londonderry, similar to that considered for the Belfast to Dublin line?

Mr Murphy: The bid that has been submitted is to upgrade the Derry to Belfast line. Money has already been invested in stock, which has greatly improved comfort, as well as passenger numbers, on the service from Derry to Belfast. The steering group that examined the investment options felt that the line needed to be upgraded in order to improve the speed and, it is hoped, the frequency of trains. It has been shown elsewhere that investment in railway lines and stock has improved frequency, journey times and passenger uptake.

Mr Dallat: The Minister has said that the £12 million will be concentrated on the line between Belfast and Ballymena. What has happened to the rest of the line, from Coleraine to Derry? Has he discovered what happened to the original £21 million, and has he applied to the European Union for funding under TranSystems, as has been done successfully by the Dublin Government for the Cork to Dublin line?

Mr Murphy: The Department will try to secure funding wherever possible. The decision to maintain the line was taken under a previous Administration, and that was the status when I took up office. I have approved a decision to upgrade the line from Derry to Belfast, and the Department has bid for funds to do that. That is an advance on the position under the previous Administration.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Question 2 has been withdrawn.

Planning Policy Statement 14

3. Mr Boylan asked the Minister for Regional Development if he will give a timescale within which he will make a statement to the Assembly on Mr Justice Gillen's decision on Planning Policy Statement (PPS) 14: Sustainable Development in the Countryside.

(AQO 275/08)

Mr Murphy: The judgement by the courts in the judicial review of Planning Policy Statement 14 found that the Department for Regional Development did not have the statutory authority to make draft PPS 14.

On 27 September, a hearing on remedies was held in which a final decision was reserved. A judgement is expected this week, and I will consider the implications of that decision in conjunction with the Minister of the Environment, Arlene Foster, and ensure that the Assembly is appropriately informed at the earliest possible opportunity thereafter.

Mr Boylan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Does the Minister agree that there are widespread concerns about this issue in rural communities? Pending the decision on Thursday, will he confirm that the matter will be addressed as soon as possible?

Mr Murphy: It is not only in rural communities that there are widespread concerns about planning policies, although they are more keenly felt there. As a consequence, all the parties that were involved in the Preparation for Government Committee agreed that PPS 14 must be reviewed.

There was consensus that the previous policy should not be restored and that the Executive should develop a more balanced policy that is less restrictive than PPS 14 and sympathetic to sustainable development in the countryside and rural communities.

Further to my submission of a paper, the Executive agreed to set up a subcommittee to develop a more balanced rural development policy. That work continues in parallel to, and in anticipation of, the outcome of the court case. The subcommittee met stakeholders and will shortly meet the relevant Ministers.

Whatever emerges from the courts this week will have implications for that; however, it is important to continue the work that the Executive undertook as a result of an all-party report before the restoration of devolution and to strive to develop a balanced policy, which is important for the whole community.

Dr W McCrea: In view of the previous answer, what progress did the Minister make in bringing forward the work of the ministerial review team on PPS 14, before the announcement of the judicial review of the policy?

Mr Murphy: Several things have happened. First, we had wide-ranging debates in Tí Chulainn in Mullaghbane and the Rural College in Draperstown, where we met groups of stakeholders that had responded to the consultation process for PPS 14.

The Executive subcommittee was formed and was due to meet before the court case began. The initial implication from the court case — we await its final judgement — was that the project to decide on, and review, PPS 14 should not be progressed by the Department for Regional Development. The implications of that must be considered.

Although I must discuss the issue with my colleague Arlene Foster, I want the Executive to carry on with their work to produce a balanced policy, for which the parties in the Assembly gave a clear mandate. I am content for that work to continue under the authority of the Executive subcommittee if the desired policy is produced.

The work of that subcommittee is hampered because we await the ruling of the courts. However, I expect some conclusion this week, and the Executive subcommittee will be able to commence its work. I hope that it will have the space to develop a new policy over the coming months.

Mr McGlone: Go raibh maith agat. Mr Boylan stole some of my thunder when he referred to the considerable pressures on rural communities from rural planning and affordable housing for rural dwellers.

In the light of those considerable concerns, will the Minister explain why, embarrassingly, the Executive subcommittee has not yet met some three months after it was set up, although two consultation meetings have been held in outside locations? I am unsure whether the ongoing court case is the reason.

Mr Murphy: As I explained in my answer to Rev McCrea, the subcommittee was due to meet, and it did undertake some consultation work with stakeholders late in the summer. It had been decided previously that I would be the Chairperson of the subcommittee; however, the court ruling was expected, and we knew that it would have implications on who would be the Chairperson of the subcommittee. Therefore, we have had to wait for the court's full response.

As we have anticipated, the early indications are that the judge will rule that the Department for Regional Development should not have taken forward the policy. Therefore, to undertake to review and take forward a new planning policy would, in the court's view, be the responsibility of the Department of the Environment. That ruling will have implications for the way in which the subcommittee takes forward its work.

We are expecting to hear the final judgement this week. Everything is in place to carry the work forward: the subcommittee has had useful consultation with stakeholder groups, and I expect that it, with whoever is the Chairperson, will begin work very soon.

Traffic Congestion in Lurgan

4. Mr O'Dowd asked the Minister for Regional Development what discussions he has had in relation to the bid to bring forward plans for a road bridge or underpass to resolve the traffic congestion in Lurgan, due to the three different railway level crossings in the town. (AQO 289/08)

Mr Murphy: As the Member will be aware, Lurgan is one of 29 towns for which local transport studies were undertaken during the development of the 'Sub-Regional Transport Plan 2015'. Consultation with elected representatives, including those from Craigavon Borough Council, was carried out at that time.

Among other issues, the study highlighted traffic delays on William Street, which is one of the main arterial routes into the town and the location of a level crossing. However, further assessment did not consider a scheme at that location to be suitable for inclusion in the plan. The locations of the other two crossings, at Bells Row and Lake Street, were not considered to be problem areas for traffic delays.

At the request of Craigavon Borough Council, a meeting was held with senior officials from my Department, and it was agreed that a further study would be carried out to assess the William Street crossing and develop and consider options for its possible removal. In particular, the merits of constructing a road overbridge or underbridge were examined. The results of that study have been received recently and are being considered. Roads Service will issue the final report to Craigavon Borough Council for comment in the near future.

Mr O'Dowd: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his response. He is aware that it is a matter of concern for traders and the business community in the Lurgan area, because the three crossings that go through the town centre have a detrimental effect on the social and economic regeneration of the town. I look forward to receiving the Roads Service study, and I will come back to the Minister on the matter.

Mr Murphy: I thank the Member for his comment.

The key traffic problem occurs at the William Street crossing. A railway line that crosses a busy town street will present considerable difficulties when deciding to put the road over or under it. Nonetheless, Roads Service has undertaken to conduct a study of the matter and will be open to discussion with Craigavon Borough Council to examine the options for alleviating the traffic problem there. The problem is considerable and it will be difficult to resolve. However, the Department is content to examine it.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I thank the Minister for answering a question where there was none.

Mr Gardiner: The Minister might have answered part of my question, but will he take steps to address the obstruction of traffic entering Lurgan town centre from the M1 that is posed by the crossing in William Street, as it is a contradiction of PPS 5, which encourages access to town centres and town shopping centres?

3.15 pm

Mr Murphy: The Member will be aware that other measures are being examined as regards traffic congestion in Lurgan, such as at Gilford Road and Millennium Way. As in all towns in the North, problems with illegal parking have also contributed to unnecessary traffic congestion.

Nobody underestimates the problem that the William Street junction poses or the difficulties involved in solving it. As the Member knows, the railway crosses a main arterial route in the middle of a busy town centre. As I said, Craigavon Borough Council prevailed upon Roads Service to consider the matter again. The report is due soon, and, no doubt, there will be further discussion on what can be achieved to alleviate the traffic problems in that area of Lurgan.

Mrs D Kelly: I can assure the Minister that the crossing at Bells Row in Lurgan causes traffic problems for me.

Further to the Minister's comments about reports that he is waiting to be completed, does he have any money in his budget for the current year, or a strategy in a 10-year plan, to facilitate a crossing at William Street, in particular? Will the report include an engineering study and a feasibility study?

Mr Murphy: We will not know how much a crossing at William Street will cost until the report is concluded. Therefore, it is difficult to include a sum in any budget or to do any planning to accommodate that. The report will consider seriously what is required and what is possible in the William Street area.

Building an overpass on a busy street with a railway crossing would have an effect on the properties in that area because there would be a high-level road outside people's bedroom windows. Alternatively, to put an underpass in place would be a significant project. Therefore, the Roads Service report will examine all the options and will undoubtedly outline some indicative costs. After that report is produced, the Department will ascertain how feasible that project is, and whether it can be included in the plans for the budget in the years ahead.

Sustainable Development

5. Mr McHugh asked the Minister for Regional Development what steps he is taking to promote sustainable development within the remit of his Department.
(AQO 277/08)

Mr Murphy: The Department for Regional Development is fully involved in taking forward key elements of the sustainable development strategy, as set out in the implementation plan that was produced in December 2006. A senior official has been appointed as sustainable development champion.

The main areas in which sustainable development is being promoted are: capital investment in the water and sewerage infrastructure to improve standards and reduce water leakage; capital and revenue investment in public transport and other forms of sustainable transport — in the context of the regional transportation strategy; and compliance with sustainable procurement practice.

In addition, my Department is implementing an in-house sustainable action plan, covering waste, water, energy, estates, travel and procurement. I have recently met with the Sustainable Development Commission and I look forward to a further proactive engagement with its members.

Mr McHugh: I thank the Minister for his answer. In order for future sustainable development or successful regional development to be effective, does the Minister agree that there is a need for effective transport infrastructure, such as roads, particularly west of the Bann?

Railway travel, or, indeed, public transport, is not an option for people travelling to Belfast to work, or to other places outside Fermanagh and South Tyrone. Will the Minister give a commitment to the improvement, or the considerable upgrading, of the present roads infrastructure west of the Bann, and, in particular, in Fermanagh and South Tyrone, because that would have an impact on tourism, business and people's journeys to work? Go raibh maith agat.

Mr Murphy: There are many people who argue in support of sustainable development who think that too much investment is skewed towards roads, and that more of it should be directed towards public transport. Investment in roads can, of course, help to improve public transport, because buses can use those routes. Therefore, where possible — and the Department is committed to examining sustainable development options — we will make that investment to try to support public transport.

There are plans for roads infrastructure improvements in the west, including a dual carriageway from Ballygawley onwards. I appreciate that — as in South Armagh, the area that I represent — people sometimes feel that the roads in Fermanagh are very much substandard. However, it is important to get the balance right among investment in sustainable development, public transport and roads, which obviously encourages car users. That is the task that the Department is trying to address.

Mr B McCrea: How does the Minister feel that his Department is performing with regard to sustainable development targets and actions? Furthermore, how does he feel that his Department is performing in comparison with other Departments?

Mr Murphy: I do not have information on comparisons with the other Departments. My Department has been working with the Department of the Environment to establish up-to-date information on transport emissions. As for reduction, we are investing heavily in public transport in line with the regional transportation strategy. Progress and the need for change will be assessed in the review of the regional transportation strategy, which is beginning.

Mr Burns: Has the Department appointed a sustainable development champion? How many times have the departmental champions met?

Mr Murphy: My answer to the first question is yes; my answer to the second is that I do not know, but I will provide the information that the Member requires.

Millennium Way, Lurgan

6. Mr Moutray asked the Minister for Regional Development what plans he has for the completion of Millennium Way in Lurgan.
(AQO 249/08)

Mr Murphy: The road known as Millenium Way, which extends from Edward Street to Malcolm Road, Lurgan, was completed in December 2002 as part of the Lurgan town centre comprehensive development scheme.

I assume that the Member refers to a further proposal by my Department's Roads Service to construct an additional road, linking Malcolm Road and Gilford Road. The link road is included as a proposal in the 'Sub-Regional Transport Plan 2015'. Planning approval for that link road was obtained in 2006, and work is ongoing in preparation for the vesting of the land required for its construction. Like other measures proposed in 'Sub-Regional Transport Plan 2015', implementation of the scheme will be subject to the satisfactory completion of an economic appraisal, successful progression through the statutory procedures and availability of funding through the normal budgetary processes. Therefore, I cannot be more definitive about a commencement date at this time.

Mr Moutray: I thank the Minister for his response. The Millennium Way development road was first mooted 30 years ago. Completion is vital to ease traffic congestion and to advance the economic regeneration of Lurgan town centre. Will the Minister undertake to act as speedily as possible in that respect? I am glad that he recognises that there are traffic problems both in north and south Lurgan.

Mr Murphy: I am due to meet the Lurgan Forward group, which will press the case for that road. I am not sure whether MLAs will be involved in that meeting. I have no problem in ensuring speedy progression of the plan through the statutory processes. Inevitably, it will depend upon budgetary constraints. A case for it must be made through the Budget.

The Department is aware that there is traffic congestion not just on William Street at the railway crossing, but in the other streets. I will be happy to meet the group and to listen to its case. I will do my best to advance the project as quickly as possible in my Department.

All-Island Transport Collaboration

7. Mr W Clarke asked the Minister for Regional Development what discussions he has had with his counterpart in the Republic of Ireland, the Minister for Transport, in developing areas of collaboration and co-operation on an all-island basis.

(AQO 274/08)

Mr Murphy: Members will be aware that I made a statement on 25 September to the Assembly, reporting on a discussion that I had with Mr Noel Dempsey TD, the Minister for Transport and the Marine, as part of the third meeting of the North/South Ministerial Council in the transport sector. At that meeting, Arlene Foster and I represented the Executive. We discussed opportunities for co-operation on strategic transport planning and road safety. We also noted and welcomed progress that had been made since the last transport sectoral meeting in April 2002.

Mr W Clarke: I thank the Minister for that answer. Will he consider improving road signage on a North/South basis? Can he assure me that that issue will be an agenda item at the next North/South Ministerial Council meeting in the transport sector?

Mr Murphy: A question was asked recently in the House about the use of kilometres, rather than miles, on road signs. Road signage — whether in relation to traffic speed or traffic direction — will be reviewed at meetings of the North/South Ministerial Council. If the Member considers that some specific aspect of directional signage is lacking across the island, he should bring it to my attention. I look forward to hearing from him. I have no objection to that item going onto the agenda of a future transport sectoral meeting.

Mr Attwood: Given that many North/South journeys end at Connolly station in Dublin, I ask the Minister what progress has been made in securing a dedicated rail line into that station, in order to service North/South traffic. Furthermore, given that many journeys to the South begin in Newry, what progress has been made in upgrading that railway station?

I am mindful that in recent weeks there have been developments in road funding in the North and that the Assembly has universally welcomed them. What initiatives might be anticipated in the next six months, in respect of road development on a North/South basis?

Mr Murphy: To answer the questions in reverse order, the Department for Regional Development made an announcement about the development of the A5. The Member will be aware that the contract for the last remaining link on the A1 Dublin to Belfast road will be signed in the near future and that the scheme is due to be completed by 2009.

I am pleased to note that work on Newry railway station will commence early in 2008. That is also due for completion by 2009. The recent North/South Ministerial Council sectoral meeting on transport noted that there are ongoing discussions between Iarnród Éireann and Translink on the preparation of plans for the further development of the Dublin to Belfast railway link. The North/South Ministerial Council agreed to consider the outcome of those discussions at the next transport sectoral meeting. Short- and medium-term solutions will be considered, including limited-stop services, hourly frequency, removal of speed restrictions, and new rolling stock. The timing of implementation will also be considered and phased, taking account of the availability of resources and any operational issues.

The Member's question specifically concerns congestion problems on the north side of Connolly station. However, that is primarily a matter for Iarnród Éireann to resolve. The Minister for Transport and the Marine in the South is keen to examine that issue closely and to make progress on it.

Other work can be done on the Belfast to Dublin line to improve the frequency of and the time taken for journeys. The Department for Regional Development, Iarnród Éireann and Translink will consider those issues.

Battletown Gallery, Newtownards

8. Mr Shannon asked the Minister for Regional Development if he will explain the criteria applied in relation to the decision to refuse 'white-on-brown' tourist signage for the Battletown Gallery, Bowtown Road, Newtownards. (AQO 303/08)

Mr Murphy: The Department for Regional Development's Roads Service facilitates the provision of tourist-traffic signs through its policy document 'The Guide to Tourist Signing in Northern Ireland', which was published in April 2004 and was jointly developed and agreed with the Northern Ireland Tourist Board.

Under that policy, Roads Service agrees to and implements local tourist-signing plans. The plans are drawn up by local councils in conjunction with the Tourist Board, and they represent an inventory of tourist attractions, facilities and utilities for the local council area.

Roads Service also provides traffic signage for other tourist destinations that are designated as eligible by the Tourist Board. The policy provides a framework for establishing eligibility for such signing. The white-on-brown road signs constitute one part of the overall family of direction signs. The main purpose of tourist signs is to guide visitors, in the later stages of their journey, to their desired destinations via the most appropriate route, particularly when some sites are hard to find.

As with all other direction signs, tourist signs are an aid to safe and efficient navigation. They are designed to complement, not replace, pre-planning of the journey, verbal instructions, maps, and road atlases.

Under the terms of the agreed policy, a place or service that would be of use to tourists but does not in itself constitute an attraction is deemed to be a tourist utility, and, as such, should not be individually signed. That includes antiques' shops, art galleries, restaurants, and garden centres. Although the Battletown Gallery offers art workshops, Roads Service considers it to be predominantly commercial in nature. It is, therefore, classified as a tourist utility and is not considered eligible for individual signage.

It is Roads Service's view that the gallery's literature provides clear directions to the premises and that it should be found easily without tourism signage.

Mr Shannon: Does the Minister accept that the Battletown Gallery is not only a gallery but a first-rate craft industry? White-on-brown tourist signage has been provided for a craft industry that is within three miles of the gallery. Can the Minister explain why Battletown Gallery, though similarly involved in the local craft industry and a tourist attraction that brings people from all over the world, is not treated in the same fashion as other places that are not too far away from it?

Mr Murphy: I am loath to name the business in case it is not the one that the Member means, but I am informed that when Roads Service was not familiar with the interpretation of the policy, it inadvertently permitted a sign in the locality.

The policy in question was introduced in May 2004. Some signs for properties and tourism attractions and facilities were put up prior to that. Those signs will stay in place until they are due for replacement, when they will fall under the current policy.

Belfast to Dublin Rail Link

9. Mr Simpson asked the Minister for Regional Development if he will make a statement on the number of passengers using the Belfast to Dublin rail link in the last three years. (AQO 250/08)

14. Mr Storey asked the Minister for Regional Development if he will make a statement on the work carried out by his department to enhance the Belfast to Dublin rail link. (AQO 247/08)

Mr Murphy: I had intended to take questions 9 and 14 together, but I fear that I will run out of time.

The railway line between Belfast and Dublin is a key part of our transport infrastructure, and it has important economic benefits for the whole island of Ireland.

A major scheme to upgrade the Belfast to Dublin line between Belfast and the border was completed 10 years ago.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Time is up. Perhaps the Minister will provide the Members with a written answer.

Social Development

Housing Applications

1. Mr Kennedy asked the Minister for Social Development to detail the number of applications for housing units submitted by members of the Northern Ireland Federation of Housing Associations in each of the past 10 years. (AQO 262/08)

The Minister for Social Development (Ms Ritchie): Since 1 April 2003, registered housing associations have made 506 submissions for approval on a total of 6,978 units. In the same period, 506 schemes for a total of 6,734 units have been approved by the Department. Figures for previous years have not been retained. Prior to 31 March 2003, such information was held on paper records. Records were retained for the current year and the three previous years. In 2003, a computer database was established that allows such information to be extracted.

Mr Kennedy: Will the Minister indicate whether her Department has the necessary finances to fund the many schemes that are required to help deal with the increased need for social housing in Northern Ireland and, in particular, in my constituency of Newry and Armagh?

Ms Ritchie: As I have said in the House on several occasions, and in the Committee for Social Development, I inherited a woefully inadequate budget with which to provide social housing. There are 36,000 people on the waiting list for social housing. That figure has increased by 13% since 2006 and rises every year. There are 21,000 homeless people — a figure that has also increased since last year and which continues to rise. Record high house prices are 10 times the average income. Those facts and statistics encapsulate the crisis in the availability of social and affordable housing, which, clearly, precipitates the need for an adequate budget to be provided.

I have made a significant bid to the Finance Minister. I hope that I can gain the support and endorsement of my ministerial colleagues in the Executive in order to ensure that social housing is given number-one priority.

Mrs M Bradley: Does the Minister agree that inadequate finances are available for social housing?

Ms Ritchie: As I said, I agree that I have inherited a woefully inadequate budget for social housing. The social housing programme has inadequate resources. I have bid for significant resources for 2007, and for future years, in accordance with the comprehensive spending review. I await the outcome of that. I will be meeting the Finance Minister this afternoon to continue to campaign for sufficient funds. I have written to ministerial colleagues about land issues, and to district councils throughout Northern Ireland. The issue is also being investigated by a Minister-led team. I will make strenuous and vigorous efforts to gain the support of my Executive colleagues for a significant funding bid.

Mr Storey: Many people turn to the co-ownership scheme because of the lack of affordable social housing from newbuilds, housing associations and Housing Executive stock. What plans are there to improve the scheme and the resources that it is allocated?

Ms Ritchie: The co-ownership scheme is being examined by the Minister-led team, which is dealing with affordability issues arising from the Simple Review. It will also seek advice from an expert panel on housing and any other available information. If the Member, or any other public representative or Assembly Member, has any relevant information on the matter, I suggest that he convey it to the Minister-led team and the expert panel. Any information or advice from Members will be gratefully received.

Housing Needs: People with Disabilities

2. Mr Dallat asked the Minister for Social Development to detail her plans for ensuring that people with disabilities have their housing needs met without delay, and are not offered hostel accommodation as the only option. (AQO 223/08)

Ms Ritchie: In order to resolve the housing needs of a homeless — or potentially homeless — applicant with a disability, all options must be, and will be, fully investigated. Those include: identifying suitable social housing in the applicant's area of choice; the nomination for an allocation on a newbuild scheme, if no suitable existing accommodation is available in their area of choice; or, in exceptional circumstances, purchasing suitable accommodation in the private sector. Hostel accommodation will be the option of last resort. I want to focus on that particular area because that type of accommodation is not suitable for people with multiple disabilities.

Mr Dallat: I could not agree more with the Minister. Does she know what the current position is regarding Mrs Elaine Kennedy, and the proposal to purchase suitable accommodation for her?

Ms Ritchie: I am very conscious of the personal, particular circumstances in which Mrs Kennedy, a lady who suffers from multiple disabilities, finds herself. I am anxious to do whatever I reasonably can to assist her. My Department received a request from the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, asking whether it would be prepared to approve the purchase of a property in Coleraine for Mrs Kennedy.

My Department is in receipt of two reports from an occupational therapist and, currently, the second report is being assessed. I hope that a decision can be taken on the way forward, by early October 2007. I will ensure that that will happen because I am aware that Mrs Kennedy has multiple disabilities and is wheelchair-bound. In any event, I am happy to discuss the details of the case with Mr Dallat, and I will inform him of the decision on the case as early as possible.

Mr K Robinson: With one third of homeless households being families with children — and 50% of those having preschool children — will the Minister state that she does not regard hostel accommodation as suitable for families with young children?

Ms Ritchie: I said in my initial answer that I am currently focusing on the issue of hostel accommodation because I firmly believe — based on my experience as a constituency representative, and after wider debate with many people — that hostel accommodation is the option of last resort. Hostel accommodation is unsuitable for people with young families, and for people with multiple disabilities.

I want to examine that issue and to focus on it, and I want the Housing Executive to concentrate on it. It is most important that I be given adequate resources to provide and increase the supply of social housing that would obviate the need for the use of hostel accommodation.

Mr T Clarke: I am sure that the Minister is aware of the continuing difficulties in obtaining reports from occupational therapists for many people who require adaptations to their properties. Has the Minister made any representations to her colleagues to address the issue of reducing the time that it takes to undertake an assessment?

Ms Ritchie: I have already spoken and written to my ministerial colleague the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety on that issue. I am sure that there is not a Member in the House who has not encountered difficulties with the delay in the processing of such applications by the occupational therapy service. That service is short-staffed. Notwithstanding that, there is a need for the matter to be progressed as quickly as possible. As a result of Mr Clarke's question, I will raise the matter again with the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety.

Empty Homes Strategy

3. Mr P J Bradley asked the Minister for Social Development if she will give an update on an empty homes strategy, aimed at bringing more void homes into use. (AQO 254/08)

Ms Ritchie: I appreciate that there is a widely held perception that there are around 40,000 empty homes in Northern Ireland that can readily be brought back into use. Following my appointment as Minister for Social Development, and a debate in the House at the end of May, I immediately asked the Housing Executive to draw up and cost an empty-home strategy. I have received the interim report from the Housing Executive. The report concludes that approximately 3,300 vacant Housing Executive units can be brought back into use in two years at a cost of around £19 million.

Approximately 5,000 private-sector dwellings and 1,500 housing association properties are potentially available, but further assessment is required to establish the nature of those vacancies. I have asked the Housing Executive to undertake further research on the matter, and I hope to receive a copy of its more detailed report in the near future. However, the Housing Executive will have to undertake considerable additional work before it can provide me with its full report and associated costs. I will pursue the matter vigorously over the coming weeks, because I recognise the need to increase the housing supply to cater for those who have been on the waiting list for a considerable period and to address the needs of the homeless throughout Northern Ireland.

Mr P J Bradley: I thank the Minister for her answer. She dealt with the Housing Executive houses, but how many vacant properties could be brought back into use altogether? How much would that cost, and — probably the most important question for many people — what is the expected timescale?

Ms Ritchie: It will take a little time. It is important to stress that only a minority of houses that are currently vacant can be brought back into use, because many of them are inaccessible and are situated quite some distances from services. Most vacant properties are in the private sector, although, unfortunately, 19,100 of those can be discounted for a variety of reasons — for example, those that are being modernised and are simply part of the natural chain found in any healthy housing market. Of the 16,300 houses that could potentially be brought back into use, 700 are unfit dwellings in isolated rural areas, and a further 10,700 have been vacant for six months or less, leaving approximately 5,000 private-sector dwellings available for action.

As I said earlier, further work needs to be done to determine whether those properties can be brought back into use, and I will pursue the matter with the Housing Executive vigorously to ensure an early receipt of its fuller report. Not only do I need the support of my Executive colleagues to secure a much better budget, I want to try to ensure that more properties can be made available through the empty-homes strategy so that I can increase the supply of much-needed social-housing stock.

Mr Campbell: The Minister will be aware that during what was described as a loyalist feud on the Shankill Road a few years ago — in a deprived loyalist community in Belfast — scores of properties were vacated. What steps is she taking to ensure that the financial support that she has committed to similar areas across Northern Ireland will continue after her deadline regarding the conflict transformation initiative expires next week?

Ms Ritchie: I have visited all areas in north and west Belfast, including all the vacant properties along the interface lines, particularly in the Shankill area and in north Belfast. I am well aware that many of those houses are not terribly old and could be brought back into use. They are currently subject to investigation by the Housing Executive as part of the empty-homes strategy.

I want to make my position very clear — I want all deprived or marginalised communities to have their needs tackled adequately, regardless of whether those communities are in loyalist Protestant areas or Catholic nationalist areas. That will continue to be my position. My Department's focus is on tackling disadvantage and deprivation and on building communities. They remain, and will continue to remain, the key issues for me and my officials.

Mr McHugh: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Has the Minister carried out any research or worked with local Housing Executive offices in various areas to check whether the homes that have been allocated to people are genuinely being used by those people? Is there a strategy in place to verify that and to ensure that there is no abuse of the system, such as houses being re-let by people who are supposed to be occupying them so that others can use a particular postcode when applying for admission to schools, and so on? I believe that that is happening in certain areas.

Has the Minister consulted with local Housing Executive offices and other involved parties to ensure that those practices do not continue?

3.45 pm

Ms Ritchie: Mr McHugh is referring to houses commonly known as “giro drops”. I have raised that issue with my officials and with the ministerial-led committee. More importantly, I have raised it with the Housing Executive in the past and have asked it to insist on, and carry out, a monitoring exercise to ensure that the person to whom the house has been allocated is the person paying the rent and is the resident of the house. On foot of Mr McHugh's question, I will approach the Housing Executive again to ensure that that is still the case. We must have a good standard of housing stock. Public housing is allocated under the common selection scheme; that is the basis on which all this work is done, and it must be adhered to.

Housing Associations: Procurement

4. Mr McCallister asked the Minister for Social Development whether she will confirm that changes to the procurement policy for housing associations will not adversely affect their delivery of specialist housing. (AQO 241/08)

7. Mrs Long asked the Minister for Social Development what progress has been made in respect of her Department's procurement strategy on new developments by groups of housing associations. (AQO 263/08)

Ms Ritchie: Mr Deputy Speaker, with your permission, I shall answer questions 4 and 7 together.

There is no reason for the delivery of social-housing programmes to be disrupted by the change to new procurement arrangements. The projects that are already on site when the change takes place will continue under the old arrangements. No decisions have been taken about the number of procurement groups or the nature of such groups. They could be formed under a lead association, as a group of associations that pool development staff, or they could involve the setting-up of a separate procurement entity. Where development staff from associations who are members of the group move to the new group, they will take their scheme files with them to ensure continuity. There may be a very few schemes in which no dedicated development staff have been involved. In those cases, co-ordination will be necessary between the originating association and the procurement group.

The consultation period for responses to the procurement proposals was extended to 31 August. The responses have been analysed, and my Department is currently considering the final shape of the procurement strategy. Members of the Committee for Social Development have already been consulted and have responded directly to me.

This issue is important for the Executive and for every Member of the House. I hope that all Members will agree with me that there is an urgent need to increase the supply of affordable social housing throughout Northern Ireland, particularly in those areas in which need has been identified.

Mr McCallister: Will the Minister give an assurance that her Department is totally committed to ensuring appropriate housing for people with disabilities?

Ms Ritchie: I assure Mr McCallister that my Department and I are totally committed to ensuring that there is an adequate supply of housing throughout Northern Ireland to accommodate the needs of people with special needs; those with disabilities, or, indeed, multiple disabilities; those who live in inaccessible locations; those with young families; or those who belong to one-parent families. I want to be able to ensure that all the needs of the people of Northern Ireland are adequately met.

Mrs Long: The Minister expects housing associations to form new procurement groups by 1 April 2008. However, the Department has yet to produce much in the way of guidance for housing associations on the subject.

Given the tight time frame, and the experience in Scotland and Wales, where the creation of procurement groups cost a significant amount of time and money, is the Minister confident that she can make the assessment that the benefits of that step will outweigh the costs?

Ms Ritchie: It may be helpful if I provide Mrs Long with some background information. The document that initiated the consultation was issued to 42 groups, and 27 responses were received. Generally, there was broad support for the proposal to create procurement groups. It was felt that having a small number of groups was better for developing client expertise and economies of scale. However, it was also felt that having fewer than three groups might pose a risk in the unlikely event that one were to fail or perform poorly. The selection of three groups rather than six has the advantage of not permitting the largest associations to overwhelm the smaller associations. Three groups would encourage the larger associations to spread their expertise.

The Member also asked when the procurement strategy will be published. I will have it published as soon as is practicably possible, and I want to be able to ensure that that is the case. According to the joint National Audit Office and Audit Commission report of 20 December 2005, the housing corporation procurement strategy, through the use of procurement groups and associated changes, made an efficiency saving of 9% between 2003-04 and 2004-05. The aim of such efficiency exercises is to enable more to be done for the same level of expenditure. It is not the intention that the same level of activity should be maintained for less cost. As the procurement strategy rolls out, I will return to the Committee with further details.

Mr Craig: I listened with interest to the Minister's answer to question 4. Housing schemes are all planned and priced several months in advance. Inevitably, the new procurement groups, and the changes that they will bring, will lead to a crossover.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Does the Member have a question?

Mr Craig: I am coming to it, Mr Deputy Speaker. Will the Minister give an assurance that the new procurement groups will not try to impose new procurement policies on existing projects that are about to proceed?

Ms Ritchie: I take Mr Craig's comments on board. I hope that good-practice guidelines will be in operation. I will get back to the Member on the detail of the issue.

Mr Elliott: Does the Minister accept that, in the past, the Housing Executive has often acted extremely slowly when assisting to access land for housing associations? Does she have any plans to speed up that process in order to help the associations and local people who are waiting for housing?

Ms Ritchie: I am conscious of that issue. The matter is currently being considered by the implementation group, which I lead, into the Semple Review. It is Government policy that all surplus land be circulated in the public sector. Moreover, the clearing-house arrangements give my Department access to other Departments' surplus land. All public-sector needs must be taken into account, and the Valuation and Lands Agency must decide priority. I am conscious of the issues that the Member has raised, but what is important is that the supply of social housing throughout Northern Ireland increases. The Member will no doubt agree with doing that in his constituency of Fermanagh and South Tyrone, where I recently met members of Dungannon and South Tyrone Borough Council on the matter.

Housing Associations: Opportunity to Purchase Surplus Land

5. Mr Lunn asked the Minister for Social Development what consideration she will give to offering Housing Associations the opportunity to purchase surplus land owned by her Department for the provision of social housing, prior to it being offered for sale on the open market. (AQO 293/08)

Ms Ritchie: The Department for Social Development, like all Northern Ireland Departments, is obliged to follow the disposal policy that is incorporated in a document called 'Disposal of Surplus Public Sector Property in Northern Ireland'. The guidance requires Departments to offer any land that has been designated as surplus through a clearing-house process that the Valuation and Lands Agency has administered. The clearing house circulates all Departments to determine whether there is another public use for the land or property. Where there is a social-housing need, the Housing Executive makes representations on behalf of the housing associations. As Members know, it does that in its role as the strategic housing authority for Northern Ireland.

Mr Lunn: I thank the Minister for her answer. In view of the length of time that has been spent discussing housing associations, I will not pursue my supplementary question.

Mr B McCrea: In the absence of measures similar to those proposed by Mr Lunn, is the Minister confident that her Department can meet Northern Ireland's need for social housing? If not, and given her recent announcement of some £77 million for housing in Lagan Valley, will she make representations to find additional funds to purchase land, now that the market has turned?

Ms Ritchie: Some weeks ago, I was happy to launch the housing and regeneration strategy in Lisburn, and Members from the Lagan Valley constituency were present that day. I hope that other district offices will be able to implement similar proposals to integrate housing and regeneration. The aim is to uplift communities, whether they are disadvantaged or not.

With regard to the particular issue that the Member raises, I have made significant representations to the Minister of Finance and Personnel. In fact, the specific objective of my meeting with him later this afternoon is to address the need for capital funding for housing. I will also meet the Strategic Investment Board later today to discuss that same issue. I hope to have the support and endorsement of all my ministerial colleagues.

Several weeks ago, the ‘Belfast Telegraph’ published a Market and Opinion Research International (MORI) poll that showed that health and social housing are the two highest priorities of people right across Northern Ireland. Therefore, the need for social housing must be addressed. There are 36,000 people in housing stress on waiting lists, and 21,000 people are homeless. Their needs must be catered for, and I hope that I have the support of my ministerial colleagues in doing so. Under the comprehensive spending review, I have made substantial bids for the current financial year and for the following three years. Members can rest assured that I am doing all that I can. I think that I have the support of the House that I need.

Mrs D Kelly: I congratulate the Minister on her efforts to date. In response to an earlier question, the Minister referred to land that is owned by public authorities and other public-sector agencies. Will she elaborate on her progress and the responses that she has received?

Ms Ritchie: There is no doubt that it is vital to address the requirement for social housing in Northern Ireland. Therefore, I have written to all my ministerial colleagues, to district councils and to the Housing Executive to ask them to specify any available surplus land. I have received some responses and await others. With the assistance of the First Minister and the deputy First Minister, I am pursuing the subject of military sites. If those sites were made available free of charge — and I hope that that could be the case, as per the Joint Declaration on Peace by the British and Irish Governments on 1 May 2003 — more land could be made available, not only for social housing but also for mixed economy and educational use. I will return to the House on that matter. Suffice it to say that I am pursuing the issue of additional land with district councils, Departments, and agencies. Via OFMDFM, I am in contact with the Ministry of Defence and the Prime Minister’s office about military sites, of which there are several in Northern Ireland.

Job Losses: Social Security Agency

6. Mr D Bradley asked the Minister for Social Development to outline what she is doing to ensure that a reported 1,500 job losses within the Social Security Agency are averted. (AQO 261/08)

Ms Ritchie: I am continuing to put forward a strong, vigorous case in an attempt to secure the maximum amount of funding possible to avert any job losses as part of the comprehensive spending review. I look forward to the support of my ministerial colleagues to endorse the delivery of front-line services in social security offices, particularly the processing and payment of benefits, particularly to those who reside in disadvantaged, deprived and marginalised communities.

I understand the need for efficiencies in the SSA, but I am not prepared to take measures that would result in the diminution of services to needy people —

The Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister will write to the Member with her answer. The time for questions is up.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

Strategic Planning Policy

4.00 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour for the debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes to propose and 10 minutes for the winding-up speech. All other Members who wish to speak will have five minutes.

Mr Beggs: I beg to move

That this Assembly calls upon the Minister for Regional Development to remove gardens from the definition of brownfield/ previously developed sites in the review of the Regional Development Strategy and Planning Policy Statement 12: Housing in Settlements; and to address the failure of strategic planning policy to protect the unique character of towns, villages and urban landscapes throughout Northern Ireland.

I thank the Business Committee for selecting the motion for debate, because I know that this issue is of great concern to many in our towns, cities and villages. I wish to declare an interest as a local councillor; as such, I am involved as a consultee in the statutory planning process. Sadly, I must work within the current guidance.

In 2001, Assembly Members unanimously agreed to the adoption of the Northern Ireland regional development strategy. One of the more eye-catching targets at that weighty time was that 60% of new houses should be built on previously developed sites, also known as brownfield sites. That was universally welcomed, and the impulse behind the target was commendable: to avoid reliance on building on greenfield sites; and to limit urban sprawl and the encroachment into agricultural land. It was a noble planning aim.

The perception of a brownfield site that was conjured up in my mind, at that time, was of a disused industrial site, an urban wasteland, or any inner city vacant houses or areas of dereliction. However, the regional development strategy was not specific when defining what constitutes a brownfield site. Brownfield sites are defined in the glossary of the regional development strategy as:

“previously developed lands sometimes known as ‘recycled sites’. For operational purposes further definition of potential housing sites inside urban areas will be provided in the Regional Planning Policy Statement on Housing in Settlements.”

Planning Policy Statement 12 (PPS 12) was duly delivered several years later in July 2005. Strangely, draft Planning Policy Statement 12 had a detailed definition in its glossary which indicated something different in what is actually being delivered. It stated:

“These are normally sites which have previously been developed or used for some purposes which has ceased. They may encompass re-use of existing buildings by conversion; demolition and new build; clearance of vacant or derelict land and new build; infill and various other forms of intensification. It excludes private and public gardens, sports and recreation grounds, woodlands and amenity open spaces.”

Note that private and public gardens were specifically excluded from being described as brownfield sites in the original draft Planning Policy Statement 12. I contend that its subsequent removal has heightened the current problem. From my reading of Planning Policy Statement 12, brownfield development is classified as any development within the urban footprint of our cities, towns and villages, within their development limits. Gardens and virtually everything else within the urban footprint is included, therefore, when calculating the 60% brownfield target. The link between that oversight and the demolition and replacement of single houses and their gardens with multiple dwellings and apartments is blatantly obvious.

The drive to build — intensively — on previously developed sites, as encouraged by the 60% regional development strategy brownfield target, as newly defined, is the problem. That has led to the overdevelopment commonly known as “garden grabbing”, and it is not what was originally intended.

It causes untold sleepless nights for neighbours, as their tranquil — often rear — gardens are suddenly overlooked by the countless windows of a development next door.

Is that a problem? Many people, including many of my constituents, feel that it is. Moreover, Sir John Semple, in the Review into Affordable Housing, thinks that it is a problem. On page 17 of the final report he states that:

“Many organisation representing communities, housing and planning professionals expressed concerns to me about the demolition of single family dwellings to make way for apartment blocks. Further guidance would be helpful to counter cases of ‘garden grabbing’, ‘town cramming’ and limit what has been referred to as the ‘greying’ of our towns.”

Flash flooding is becoming more commonplace; environmental change is a factor, but there is no doubt that the change in our town centres, and the urban footprints, contributes as well. In urban areas, rain is no longer absorbed by natural drainage in gardens; instead, it frequently lands on roofs and pathways, before immediately entering culverts and streams. That results in additional pressure downstream and, often, flooding. In the case of mixed sewerage systems, there is the additional problem of sewage flowing downstream into homes. Sadly, there have been too many instances of that in recent years.

I am sure that Members who are local councillors are aware of the public concern that exists on the issue. However, as public representatives, they have little input, due to the current policy planning statement by which planners operate. Consequently, houses are often demolished and replaced by apartments. As a local councillor, I recently received a petition from residents of the Old Belfast Road in Larne, following the advertisement of a development opportunity to demolish newly-built houses and replace them with sea-view apartments overlooking Belfast Lough. Destroying newly-built homes to create apartments is not environmentally friendly and is not what PPS 12 intended.

Undoubtedly, many Members will have been lobbied by residents who face their neighbourhoods' being threatened by intensive, and often unsympathetic, development. The Planning Service and the Planning Appeals Commission have the power to refuse planning permission and stop inappropriate developments if the correct planning policy statements are in place. That is why I have tabled the motion — PPS 12 must be adjusted to exclude gardens from brownfield development percentages. The inclusion of gardens almost enables a presumption in favour of development.

Few would argue with the point made by a Rt Hon Member who, during a debate on the regional development strategy on 2 July 2001, said:

"I am appalled by the number of applications for high-density apartment developments, almost invariably to be built in existing residential areas where one or two houses will be knocked down with perhaps 10 or 20 being built in their place." — [Official Report, Bound Volume 11, p339, col 2]

I empathise, and I agree with those wise words of the current Minister of Finance and Personnel.

As recently as last week, I learned of another plan to build, in my constituency, six apartments, six semis, five town houses, and one detached house on the site of a detached house and parts of two adjoining gardens. In another part of my constituency there is a trend for detached homes to be bought by developers, then demolished and replaced by apartments. For example, there have been several applications for such developments on North Road in Carrickfergus, and some developments have already been built. Those change the character of the neighbourhood.

There is nothing illegal about any of that, but what effect does it have on the architectural heritage and the quality of life enjoyed by residents in those areas? I am not apartment-bashing — everyone appreciates the demand for apartments, but they must be carefully located. I have supported the Living Over the Shop (LOTS) scheme, which has been successful in the regeneration of urban areas.

The Assembly, as a legislator, can make a difference, and it is important that we correct this wrong. It is important that developers do not have that presumption in favour of them as they try to remove gardens and disturb neighbourhoods. I ask the Minister to review the situation, and I urge the appropriate Committees to make the necessary changes.

Mr Wells: When the Assembly debated the regional development strategy, all Members applauded the policy that 60% of development should be on brownfield sites. I — as were many Members who are present — was a Member at that time, and when we envisaged brownfield sites, we thought of old derelict, industrial warehouses, factories, and old, terraced housing that would be knocked down and replaced. That was welcomed, and I would still support that. Sadly, however, the majority of apartment developments in Northern Ireland have not been on classic brownfield sites. Instead, old houses have been knocked down, trees have been ripped up and gardens have been destroyed, and the entire plots used for high-density development.

Property development is the single biggest issue in my constituency mailbag: I get letter after letter about it. Even today, I am tackling a problem on the Tollymore Road in Newcastle. People are seeing our old traditional suburbs being wrecked by that type of development. A typical situation pertains in Tullybrannigan in Newcastle, where a developer is going around knocking on doors, brandishing cheques for £1.2 million and asking pensioners whether they would like to sell their houses — which, perhaps, were bought 20 years ago for £40,000. The house, which is an important part of Newcastle's architectural landscape and heritage, is then knocked down and replaced by nothing more than rabbit hutches.

On the Strangford Road in Downpatrick, houses have been knocked down and replaced by 22 apartments, in one case, and 19 and 15 apartments in other instances. If that trend continues, the Strangford Road approach to Downpatrick will be destroyed. I could live with those changes if starter homes for young married couples were replacing those old houses, because there is a need for starter homes in society. However, that is not what is happening.

Apartments do little for the economic regeneration of any town. The late Gerry Douglas was an excellent councillor in Down District Council, and he made a telling comment about apartments in Newcastle. He said that someone who comes to an apartment in Newcastle for the weekend brings with them a £5 note and a shirt, and all that is changed at the end of the weekend is the shirt. There is no doubt that apartments bring little to the town. There are no children coming to live in the apartments or attend the local schools, and those apartments provide little economic development.

We are all politicians and have had the experience of knocking on the doors of apartment developments. I knocked on the doors of a 42-unit apartment development in Dundrum, and found that six householders were on the electoral register. Only six householders regarded that property as their main residence, and the majority of the units were empty. The election was in March, and, at that time, two thirds of the properties were empty. The developments are like ghost towns, and much of our heritage is being destroyed in order to produce something that brings no economic benefit to our community.

I have campaigned on property development for many years, and I called a public meeting in Newcastle in June to highlight the issue. When I knocked on the door of one house in Newcastle to ask the householder to come to the meeting, she took one look at me and told me that she had voted already. She obviously got the wrong end of the stick, but more than 250 people packed that meeting in Newcastle. Property development was the biggest single issue of concern to those ratepayers. Those who are caught up in such situations find that the house beside them is to be knocked down and replaced by 20 apartments — they cannot live with that, so they are forced to sell, and the owners of the next house are forced to sell. A domino effect sweeps through the entire town and destroys its character.

I understand that there are moves afoot to address that situation. The policy issues fall to the Minister for Regional Development, and the Minister of the Environment is responsible for development control. I appeal to those Ministers to move quickly. If they do not, much of what we find historic and important about our towns will disappear before our eyes.

The new developments are nothing to be proud of. If a developer can fit in one and a half car-parking spaces a unit, and the site is within the development limit of a town, the site is regarded as brownfield, and the law of the jungle applies.

I would like to take the two Ministers to meet a lady who lives in a little cottage on Post Office Lane in Newcastle. Her house faces the former post office site, for which an application has been submitted for 42 apartments in a four-storey development. Her life will be ruined, as will the lives of thousands of others, if those developments are not soon stopped and some form of sense and normality is brought back to development, before we destroy that which makes Northern Ireland's towns and villages so special.

4.15 pm

Mr Boylan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Ba mhaith liom labhairt ar son an rúin seo. I welcome the opportunity to speak. The two previous Members clearly highlighted the major problems. Replacing homes and gardens with multiple-occupancy town houses and apartment blocks is an increasingly common practice known as “garden grabbing”. Cramming new housing developments into residential areas is not a suitable way to alleviate housing stress because it significantly erodes the local character and the environmental and social quality of life of the residents and communities affected by it. The practice is getting out of hand, and there is an absence of clear, unambiguous guidance from the Planning Service on the issue.

We should be ensuring that the building of multiple-occupancy properties on what were the sites of single homes is monitored and proactively discouraged. Hopefully, the issue will be addressed as part of the overall review of planning policy.

However, it is quite apparent that until monitoring is implemented, developers will be buying homes with generous gardens and will be applying for planning permission to demolish the buildings and build town houses or flats. Obviously, as there is no need for new roads or services, profit margins are very high. Neighbourhoods are being transformed, and, unfortunately, in quite a few cases not in a positive way. Developers have been known to demolish fit houses and replace them with a large number of smaller dwellings, and often the character of the location is changed dramatically.

Many communities have found that planning applications for multiple-occupancy housing or flats have been parachuted in on them, and the severe housing shortage artificially inflates house prices, which wrenches the first rung of the property ladder from the reach of the majority of young people.

I agree with the previous two Members. To me, brownfield sites are industrial sites or possibly waste or contaminated sites that can be recycled or reused. However, we also know that “garden grabbing” takes place.

Sinn Féin broadly supports the motion, and feels that it should be defined clearly in any future planning policy that building in limited spaces and in built-up areas, including gardens, is not to be encouraged. Go raibh maith agat.

Mr Dallat: I support the motion, because I have knowledge and experience of the harm being done, particularly in the coastal areas of east Derry — Portstewart, Portrush and, of course, Portballintrae.

Gardens have become liquid gold. No longer are they adornments or places of leisure and recreation. They are now valuable pieces of real estate and serve one purpose — to be flogged for inflated prices to land speculators, who will plant them not with flowers and shrubs but with apartments, flats and townhouses. Environmentally-friendly open spaces — open in the sense that people can enjoy them without trespassing — are being turned into concrete jungles with no grass, and no class.

The concept of utilising brownfield land has been turned upside down — with devastating consequences. That is particularly true in the seaside towns. However, towns and villages have also been at the receiving end of the bulldozer and the chainsaw, because it is not just the grass that is lost. Mature trees have been cut down in their tens of thousands, and we must be aware of the damage that that is doing to the air that we breathe.

It is unfortunate that the planners did not foresee that problem, because they are, to a large extent, the cause of the land shortage that has sent the price of development land through the roof — and many roofs no longer exist.

The motion, which was moved by Mr Beggs, identifies rightly the loss of character of our towns and villages, but the problem is more serious than that. Town cramming, as it has become known, has had a much more detrimental effect on the overall environment. In many cases, the sewerage systems cannot cope with the additional pressure placed upon them. Parking becomes a crisis, and there are many additional issues relating to road safety.

Far be it for me to look to England for inspiration, but on this occasion, and as an exception, we could promote the little song 'English Country Garden', and demand that all planners learn it by heart. Those who are taking away the gardens should write that out on their application forms.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I am glad that the Member did not take up the offer about singing.

Mrs Long: Like Members who have already spoken in the debate, most of us would recognise brownfield sites as meaning ex-industrial and ex-commercial sites. In redevelopment areas, that would also include the demolition of existing housing.

I am concerned that brownfield development has been extended to include a lot of other development — particularly gardens. I support the motion as one way of trying to redress that balance. However, it comes with something of a health warning. While it would be helpful to have recognition at departmental level that gardens should be removed from the definition of "brownfield land", as it would show that gardens are not brownfield sites and that they are of a different nature and character, it would not necessarily preclude other people from bringing forward speculative proposals that would relate either wholly or in part to garden sites. The Assembly must be aware that that is a development control issue and, therefore, more a matter for the Minister of the Environment. I am pleased to see both the Minister for Regional Development and the Minister of the Environment in the Chamber; it shows willingness on their part to take action.

"Garden grabbing" and the associated development of sites involving the demolition of existing residential properties have significant consequences for established residential neighbourhoods. As regards infrastructure, we have already referred to the pressure put on the drainage system. Undoubtedly the increase in roofed, paved and impervious areas — which were previously gardens and from where water could soak away over time — has led to speedier run-off and increased the risk of local flash flooding.

Mr S Wilson: I thank the Member for giving way — as she always does. Will she accept that it was the previous Assembly, and all of the parties in it, that agreed to have more houses built on the existing urban footprint to do the very thing that she has referred to — to make better use of the existing infrastructure?

Mrs Long: No one is questioning that, and I thank the Member for his intervention. However, the question is where the houses will be built. Many areas in east Belfast have not been redeveloped, but in other areas houses are under incredible pressure and gardens are being gobbled up by greedy developers. There must be a balance.

As regards the character and local heritage of an area, Members have referred to trees being felled, houses being demolished and the loss of open space, which is inherently part of the character of an area where the suburban grain is interrupted with high-density, urban-style development. That is not good for maintaining a balance, and it is not good from an environmental point of view. The transportation links are often not good enough to maintain the higher levels of population in those suburban areas — in contrast with some inner-city areas.

I am concerned that it has also led to an inflation in house prices. Houses are being priced out of the reach of families. It is rare to see a house for sale in east Belfast: instead, development opportunities are for sale. The houses built on those sites will not be affordable accommodation for those who need it, but will be investment opportunities for those who want a second property as a pension. We must be conscious of the impact that that vacancy of property across the area has on local services.

There is the issue of local amenity for the current residents and for those who will buy properties in the area. The restrictions on building outwards means that many new properties are built higher. The result is that someone's main living room may look into the back bedroom of houses on neighbouring sites. Those are mainly development control issues. However, the policy of back-land development makes it much more important to have a rigorous framework in place.

I recognise the need for a number of smaller properties among the larger ones to facilitate the needs of older residents who want to downsize in their own locality and not to have to leave behind the social support network that they have built up over the years. However, that is not the driver for the current development. It is largely speculative development. There are examples of well-designed, well-integrated development, but increasingly the architecture does little to relate to the local character. Instead, generic house styles are simply dropped in on several sites across a constituency area and bear no relation to what was there previously or to what will remain when building is complete.

It is important to define "brownfield" sites; however, Members must also focus on development control. Without adequate control, that definition will not protect residents from what is increasingly the biggest headache that they face.

Dr W McCrea: This is an important debate — worthy of the Assembly — and Members must address the issues. The previous Assembly debated this matter and took a different view — against the stance of the then DUP Minister for Regional Development. Although the Assembly took a decision in the past, that does not mean that it was the best decision. Therefore, Members must consider the matter in the light of current events.

In my constituency of South Antrim, I am inundated daily by people and communities horrified by what has been proposed for their neighbourhoods. For example, four houses are to be knocked down on the Rashee Road in Ballyclare and replaced by 54 apartments, with no care for adequate parking on a road that has limited traffic access. The developer is simply squeezing as much development as possible onto a restricted site, with no care for the community.

I acknowledge that there are good developers and some excellent developments throughout Northern Ireland; however, there are also some poor developers who want no more than to draw as much finance out of a site as possible. In Ballyclare, Glengormley, Antrim, Burnside, Ballyrobert, Dunadry and Templepatrick, people believe that the developers are concerned only with what they can get out of a community and not with what they can put back in. A developer has not only a right to take out but a duty to put back that which will be acceptable and natural to the character of an area.

Currently, developers pay exorbitant prices to invest in an area — perhaps three times the value of a house. They then feel that it is their right that everyone should buckle to their demands. They force as many apartments as possible onto a piece of ground because they have paid three times the going rate. Those developers deserve to feel the pinch. They must pay — not the community. Developers will learn if their fingers are burnt a few times.

The motion will not provide the instrument with which to solve the problem; it simply puts it on the long finger. I appeal to my friend the Minister of the Environment. She has an effective instrument in her hands — development control. I pay tribute to her because, further to representations by other colleagues and me about the areas that I have mentioned, she has already communicated to her divisional offices that she wishes to ensure that the established character of those areas is properly protected, in line with policy objectives, and that the individual and cumulative effect of proposals does not significantly erode the environmental quality, character and amenities of existing areas. Members must consider that. The Minister has taken the first step, but I appeal to her to take a further step and put that into action. That would be effective and could be done quicker than the motion's proposal.

The Minister also gave instructions that the density and character of new housing must not detract from the environmental quality of residential amenities and the established character of the wider residential area. Ballyrobert is a small community. If plans are passed, it will double in size over a short time, not because of new development but because a swathe of houses will be knocked down to be replaced by apartments.

4.30 pm

I must correct another point: it is not only old dwellings that are being knocked down; some dwellings that were built only a few years ago are being knocked down too. Where developers can build a multitude of apartments on a site, they are knocking down newer buildings too. We must be sensitive to the needs and demands of the community, and, therefore, the House must do something about this problem.

Mr McCartney: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Tá mé ag iarraidh tacaíocht a thabhairt don rún seo. As my colleague Cathal Boylan said, Sinn Féin broadly supports the motion. A review of PPS 12 is under way, which will provide an opportunity to deal with this issue in a wide-ranging and comprehensive manner. I welcome the Minister for Regional Development's attendance for the debate. He will have his own views on the matter, and he will take note of the many pertinent observations raised during the debate, which will be reflected in the outcome of the review.

There is no doubt that the unique character of our towns, villages and cities needs to be protected and improved, and that that requires rigorous and relevant planning policies. There may be examples of that character being disrupted by improper planning policy, poor design and the practice known as "garden grabbing". However, other Members have mentioned those matters, and I do not have to list any more; we see them daily.

That does not mean that we should oppose the development of brownfield sites to improve the character and landscape of urban centres and to tackle the need for affordable housing. There are many excellent examples, particularly in previously commercial and industrial sites, where the urban landscape has benefited from proper development and much-needed housing has been provided.

Without an effective strategy for the development of brownfield sites, it will become common practice for development to spill out onto greenfield sites in the countryside. We see and hear of the consequences of that every day. We have the opportunity to ensure that planning policy reflects people's needs, as well as the character of urban and rural landscapes.

In conclusion, although I do not want to predict the outcome of the pending court case, I urge the Minister to speak to his Executive colleague the Minister of the Environment, who is also present and welcome in the Chamber. The proposed reviews of PPS 12 and PPS 14 can result in the best possible policy for the future protection, development and improvement of urban and rural landscapes and the representation of the best interests of our people. Tugann Sinn Féin tacaíocht don rún seo. Sin é. Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle.

Mr Craig: When I was elected as an urban councillor six years ago, planning issues never appeared on the radar. However, since my election to this House, the number of planning applications from developers in urban areas has exploded. They all seem to want to rip the heart and character out of some of the most settled communities in our towns.

I beg the House's indulgence to talk about some of the most beautiful areas in my community, which have been blighted by that type of character change. In Pond Park, eight apartments were built; in Monaville, there are eight apartments and three town houses; in Ballymacash, there are nine apartments; and there are 26 apartments in Marna Brae. The list goes on and on. All those developments are within one mile of one another.

What is such building doing to the character and development of that area? Looking at the concrete jungle that the area is becoming, the residents and I have serious questions for the Departments. Will the roads cope with the extra traffic that the apartments will bring? How will the council cater for recycling when each apartment needs three bins? Will the crumbling sewerage system be able to cope? The Planning Service seems to dismiss those issues.

I have already received reports from residents who feel intimidated and pressurised by developers to sell their homes or face the prospect of remaining in the houses in which they grew up, surrounded by 10, 15, 20 or more apartments, which they have no desire to do.

Today, the argument is not about the need for new policies. Existing planning policies have to be considered and the erosion of urban areas must be stopped. That aspect needs to be examined. For example, paragraph 1.4 of PPS 7 states:

"The promotion of more housing in urban areas should not be allowed to result in town cramming or damage to areas of distinctive townscape character. In established residential areas the overriding objective will be to avoid any significant erosion of the local character and the environmental quality, amenity and privacy enjoyed by existing residents."

As regards appearance, landmarks and appearance, paragraph 3.2 of PPS 7 states that development plans may set out:

"requirements for the arrangement and appearance of new housing in particular urban areas whose distinctive character would benefit from being reinforced".

Those statements show that there is a critical issue about how policies are being implemented in urban areas.

Mrs Long: Does the Member accept that, even in the circumstances in which planners find common cause with Members on an issue, their decisions are often overruled by the Planning Appeals Commission, which takes a more liberal view?

Mr Craig: I concur fully with that, because I have had similar experiences.

I would defend the Department of the Environment, and especially Arlene Foster, because she has made strenuous efforts to bring the Planning Service under control since taking office. I concur with the measures that she took a few months ago that will result in planners no longer being allowed to view every planning decision as being unique. A more holistic view is required, and one cannot be considering one planning application in isolation when a further 20 are outstanding. Her decision will move the debate on, and could go a long way towards solving some of the issues that we are talking about today.

There is no point in the Assembly passing new laws if those already in place are not being enforced. I know — having spoken to her directly — that the Minister is fully aware of the problems and has started the process in her own Department to stop even more urban areas from becoming concrete jungles.

Mr B McCrea: Like several other Members, I can say that it is this issue that most fills my postbox. People from Drumbeg, Drumbo, Hillsborough, Culcavy, the Belsize Road, the Pond Park Road, the Antrim Road and so on are affected by the issue. However, there is no point in going on about it — people expect Members to do something about it, and they are quoting regulations to us. They quote policy QD1 from PPS 7, which states:

"In established residential areas proposals for housing development will not be permitted where they would result in unacceptable damage to the local character".

People cannot understand why that provision does not count. They then refer to paragraph 1.4 of PPS 7, which states:

"In established residential areas the overriding objective will be to avoid any significant erosion of the local character and the environmental quality, amenity and privacy enjoyed by existing residents."

However, that does not count either. Therefore, when Willie McCrea says that it is great that the rules are in place and that we can go and fix the problem, that does not happen. He quoted paragraph 4.8 of PPS 7, which says exactly the same thing — and it makes no difference.

On 20 April 2007 I took those issues to two permanent secretaries — one from the Department for Regional Development and the other from the Department of the Environment. The reason that I went to two permanent secretaries was because we could not work out who was responsible for the mess and why it could not be sorted out.

This situation is simply not acceptable. Historic villages, towns and townscapes are being absolutely destroyed, and people did not want that to happen.

When it is asked whether the designation of areas of townscape character has actually occurred, the response is no. Planners in Bangor had the foresight to designate the whole of the town as such; however, the only areas in other towns that were designated were those that were deemed important. It was never envisaged that the value of property would rise so high and so fast that it would be economically viable to knock down a perfectly good house and build others in its place.

Who is to blame for that situation? John Prescott. He wanted to cover the whole of south-east England with concrete. He said that he would no longer count gardens as gardens: he would build on them.

I have attended consultation after consultation, and all the time planners say to us that they are only doing —

Mr S Wilson: Will the Member give way?

Mr B McCrea: Go on then, Sammy.

Mr S Wilson: Does the Member appreciate that the target — for good sustainability reasons — of having 60% of houses in Northern Ireland built on the urban footprint can be achieved only if some gardens are treated as brownfield sites? There are not enough commercial or industrial sites for that purpose.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. I ask Mr McCrea to draw his remarks to a close. He was allowed only three minutes; we must finish the debate within the hour that has been allowed for it.

Mr B McCrea: I will finish with the point that has just been raised.

We have to build 200,000 new homes by 2015. Some 60% — as opposed to 30% — must be within the urban footprint, and 60% must be built for single occupancy. We are not getting even close to meeting that target. There is no land for us to build on. Legislation is the only way in which we can address the situation. Past events have proven that controlling development by ministerial decision does not work: the Assembly must legislate.

The Minister for Regional Development (Mr Murphy): Ar dtús ba mhaith liom fáilte a chur roimh an díospóireacht seo. I welcome the motion, and I am grateful to Mr Beggs for tabling it. It is an important issue, and one can see how impassioned Members have become during the debate.

It strikes me, however, that there are contradictions in what some Members have said. Sammy Wilson intervened towards the end of the debate to point out some of those contradictions. Some argue against overdevelopment of the countryside and say that it should take place within the urban footprint; others argue that development should not be within the urban footprint. I appreciate that a balance must be struck.

I recognise the concerns of those in established residential neighbourhoods who find that the characters of their areas are rapidly changing. Our cities and towns have been built at much lower densities than many of their European counterparts. That means that the effect of higher-density proposals, such as town houses or apartment-type developments, can be dramatic in many instances.

Many of our urban areas have a traditional character and identity; they are attractive residential environments. Therefore, preserving and protecting the amenity of such neighbourhoods must remain an important element of our policy. We need to exercise particular sensitivity in areas of distinctive quality. That is done through the designation of areas of townscape character and conservation areas. For example, the draft Belfast metropolitan area plan 2015 designated 100 areas of townscape character.

Mrs Foster: I thank the Minister for giving way. There has been much talk today of cross-cutting issues, and this is one such issue. Mention has been made of the circular that I issued in August. I did that because this is a matter of development control. Will the Minister comment on the work that is going on between officials of his Department and those of the Department of the Environment on development control issues where apartments and garden grabbing are concerned? Despite what some Members think of ministerial action, officials of both Departments are working on the issue.

Mr Murphy: I confirm what the Member has said. Both Departments are taking action on the issue. We must strike a balance between implementing the plans that were desired — and approved — for 60% of development to take place within the urban footprint, and finding appropriate sites for that development.

4.45 pm

Those decisions were taken with the best intentions in terms of sustainable development and the location of housing where there were facilities such as schools and public transport, instead of increasing urban sprawl, or bungalow blight in the countryside. To balance that with the need to build on brownfield sites, the development of “garden grabbing” has come to the fore.

Measures have been taken to attempt to address that, and there will be further opportunities to do so. There is a balance to be achieved in the outworking of that type of policy, but the intention behind it was correct.

As other Members have mentioned, the problems are fuelled by rising populations, an increase in the number of new households being formed, and people choosing to live on their own. By 2025 it is expected that almost two thirds of households will be one-person households.

My officials are working to update the regional housing need figures to take account of the increases in populations that are caused by such trends. It is important that that information be up to date, as it is used to allocate land in towns and cities. There is an equal commitment to the promotion of future growth in a sustainable way. The overarching framework of the regional development strategy promotes growth first in towns and cities. The aim is to make the best use of urban land and buildings. The regional target is to build 60% of new houses in existing urban areas. The purpose is to reduce the amount of greenfield land used for new development and make better use of existing infrastructure.

However, the 60% target is not a mandate for higher-density schemes in all urban areas. There are lots of opportunities for new homes to be built in towns and cities without imposing on those who live there already — for example, using redundant factories and former industrial land, or the Living Over the Shop initiative, for which Mr Beggs expressed support. Important sites such as Titanic Quarter offer real opportunities for redeveloping industrial land to provide new urban housing.

There are good reasons for this sustainable policy approach. Building more houses at higher densities in the right locations has many advantages. People have easier access to jobs, schools and shops, and it allows for the development of more efficient public transport and reduces the number of journeys made by private car. This policy approach is in line with those taken in all European countries.

No one wants to live in sprawling cities and towns where every journey must be made by car. That threat is real. Between 2000 and 2004 the population of Belfast declined by 4%. Other major cities such as Dublin, Cardiff, Leeds, Birmingham and Manchester experienced population growth over the same period. Therefore, the challenge is to strike the balance between accommodating higher densities on appropriate sites and protecting residential areas from insensitive forms of higher-density development proposals.

I have already referred to the regional development strategy, which contains guidance on how additional housing should be accommodated and emphasises the importance of protecting established residential areas and the need to protect the character of cities and towns. My officials are finalising the first five-year review of the strategy. That document will set out the definition of brownfield development in more detail and re-emphasise the need to promote quality higher-density schemes in locations close to existing schools, shops and jobs. It is my intention to consult the Committee for Regional Development on the review of the strategy as soon as possible. I will also seek the agreement of the Executive Committee to the document before its publication.

As I have said, my officials are working closely with those from the Department of the Environment to assess the need to update and revise existing planning policy statements that affect planning in urban areas. For example, there are policy statements that deal with housing settlements, quality residential environments, open-space sport and outdoor recreation. The housing settlements policy sets out guidance for dealing with schemes in established residential areas, and the open-space policy deals with the protection of existing open space and areas zoned for open space in development plans. I am also advised that the Minister of the Environment has reminded all Planning Service staff of the need to consider fully the impact on established residential character when processing applications for new residential developments.

Finally, I emphasise that the issue is very important. Housing shapes our cities and towns and has a major influence on the location of jobs and the provision of services. Therefore, it is important that we accommodate additional housing in a sustainable way that respects the character and identity of all our settlements. More homes in our towns and cities are welcome, but not at the expense of treasured existing residential neighbourhoods and communities. Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle.

Mr McFarland: I thank my colleague Roy Beggs for bringing this motion before the House. I probably speak for most Members in saying that I am disappointed that only one hour has been given to the debate. There is substantial feeling about the issue, so it seems slightly daft that we only have an hour to debate it.

Mr Weir: I sympathise with the Member. However, in the Business Committee, his party Whip asked that only an hour be allocated to the debate because he believed that it could be contained within that time.

Mr McFarland: I thank the Member; I was not aware of that.

I believe that the theme of the debate is an issue that is common to all Members. Every MLA in every constituency will have received an enormous postbag full of letters on planning, building and development in what people believe to be the wrong places. The Minister,

Mr Wells and I are veterans of the Committee for Regional Development in the 1998 Assembly. The regional development strategy is one of that Committee's achievements. That was a long, hard-fought battle. However, the Committee got there in the end.

It would be useful if the Assembly were to remind itself of what that strategy was about: controlled development through consultation with local people. Members will have quickly established that most of the major problems come about because no one consults with local people. There were supposed to be agreed plans so that people knew what would happen in their areas, everyone had been consulted, and developers would work accordingly. That has not happened. The Department for Regional Development was to lay down clearly defined rules. Soon after the regional development strategy was introduced, the Department and the Planning Service released a substantial number of policy planning statements that were supposed to be adhered to by the Planning Service.

The Assembly must also remind itself that the regional development strategy contained housing projections. I do not know whether Members have revisited that document recently. We were assured at the time that those projections were accurate. However, every single one of them was probably a load of nonsense. The projections stated that no houses would be built in North Down, for example. Despite that, several thousand houses have been built there. There is confusion because of that.

The strategy's aim was to stop ribbon development and to build on urban footprints in an effort to avoid towns and villages being joined together. Of course, a necessity of that is to densify development. There is confusion as to whether the strategy states that development should be densified, and what that means. As I recall, the result of people's living longer, leaving home and setting up home themselves, and divorce rates, is that there are expected to be just 1·6 people living in each household by 2025. I stand to be corrected on that.

Mr Shannon: Does the Member agree that PPS 7 is so loosely worded and has been so loosely applied that it has adversely affected the character of certain areas? That has been a key factor in the problem of apartments being built everywhere, including in North Down.

Mr McFarland: I thank the Member for his comment. I also recall that 60% of development was supposed to be on brownfield sites. The Committee rowed with the Department when it said that 40% of development would be on brownfield sites. Six in 10 houses were built on the Castlereagh hills, and there was an enormous row. It was agreed that that figure should be at least 60%. A study was carried out to identify where brownfield sites were in urban areas. It was determined that, as in England, 80% of development could be on brownfield sites, if that was required. The figure was not set at 60%: it was 60% plus.

What has gone wrong? The Planning Service has continued to break the Department's rules.irate constituents have waved the Department's documents at me many times, which have stated that no apartments can be developed in a certain area or that a particular building cannot be built so close to another. For some reason, those documents appear to mean nothing.

Of course, developers will do whatever they can. If they can drive a coach and horses through the regulations, why would they not? They will go around waving cheques for a million pounds in order to get their development. Why would someone not sell their house and garden for a million pounds if he or she had paid just £10,000, 20 years ago?

Another issue that worries me is that of people being scared. In North Down, there are many little old ladies who are widowed and who live in enormous houses.

Therefore, what happens? Those people, knowing that they are about to be hammered by rates and water charges, realise that they will need some sort of pension. Consequently, they sell off their back gardens — on which a developer builds three or four houses. Therefore, many issues combine to make it vital that the current definition of brownfield and recently developed sites be changed.

I welcome the Minister's urgent review of the regional development strategy. It is vital that it take place. I also want him to revisit his policy planning statements, and to team up with the Minister of the Environment to work out why the Planning Service does not appear to agree with the motion.

Mrs I Robinson: Does the Member mean "senior citizens" when he refers to "little old ladies"?

Mr McFarland: I apologise — I used a euphemism. I am sorry if the Member was offended by it. My "little old ladies" in North Down will understand exactly what I am saying.

More co-ordination is needed. Let us get the matter sorted and end the problem of constituents being disadvantaged by the current planning policy. I commend the motion to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly calls upon the Minister for Regional Development to remove gardens from the definition of brownfield/ previously developed sites in the review of the Regional Development Strategy and Planning Policy Statement 12: Housing in Settlements; and to address the failure of strategic planning policy to protect the unique character of towns, villages and urban landscapes throughout Northern Ireland.

Tuesday 2 October 2007

The Assembly met at 10.30 am (Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Dallat] in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE BUSINESS

Company and Business Names (Amendment) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2007

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment (Mr Dodds): I beg to move

That the Company and Business Names (Amendment)
Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2007 (S.R. 2007/344) be approved.

I am seeking the Assembly's approval for a set of regulations to add a new word to the list of those that require approval before being used in the name of a company or business. My Department made the regulations on 23 July 2007, and they came into operation the following day. As laid down in the parent legislation, and to ensure continuing effect, the regulations are subject to the confirmatory procedure and require approval by a resolution of the Assembly within 10 sitting days of their coming into operation.

The Department's prior approval is required for a company seeking to use certain words or expressions as, or as part of, a company or business name. A recent application was received in Great Britain to incorporate a company that proposed to include the word "Government" in its title. At the date of the application, which was rejected on a technicality, "Government" was not on the list of words that were proscribed. However, that application generated concern to the degree that a decision was taken that the word "Government" should be added to the list of proscribed terms in order to protect the public from harm arising from a business using a name that falsely suggests an incorrect status.

Consequently, the Department for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform — formerly the Department of Trade and Industry (DTI) — in Whitehall introduced regulations in Great Britain from 10 July 2007, adding the word "Government" to its proscribed list of words and combinations of words, the use of which requires the written permission of the Secretary of State for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform.

Since that legislation did not extend to Northern Ireland, my Department was asked to consider the introduction of similar legislation here. These regulations amend the Company and Business Names Regulations (Northern Ireland) 1984, which are the principal regulations, to add the word "Government" to the list of those words requiring the written permission of the Department before being included in the name or title of a company. The Northern Ireland regulations were brought into operation as soon as possible following the corresponding GB regulations, which came into force on 10 July 2007.

I hope that this motion, which is non-contentious, will be approved by the Assembly.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment (Mr Durkan):
The Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment has considered the Company and Business Names (Amendment) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2007 (S.R. 2007/344) and, as the Minister has reflected, has noted the circumstances in which the amendment has been brought forward. In a sense, this is "karaoke" legislation — following through on what the Department for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform has done in Whitehall. The Committee understands the circumstances that have necessitated the amendment and recommends that it be confirmed by the Assembly.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That the Company and Business Names (Amendment)
Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2007 (S.R. 2007/344) be approved.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

'Equality in Northern Ireland' Report

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for the debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes to propose and 10 minutes for the winding-up speech. All other Members will have five minutes.

Mr Attwood: I beg to move

That this Assembly notes with concern the report by the Committee on the Administration of Justice 'Equality in Northern Ireland: the rhetoric and the reality'; believes that the numbers of economically inactive Catholic and Protestant households is of particular concern; and calls on the Executive to ensure that the content and conclusions of the report inform decisions and proposals.

At the outset, I apologise. As soon as I have finished my speech, I must go to the Senate Chamber where the Assembly and Executive Review Committee is taking evidence from the Lord Chief Justice and the Policing Board. However, I hope to return as soon as possible. I explained the difficulty to the Speaker's Office, and the Speaker understands it.

It is only right to acknowledge the report, and to note that, at its launch, all the main political parties in the Assembly were represented, either by politicians or by their staff. That indicated the parties' recognition that continued and deep attention must be paid to the issue of equality across the communities of the North.

Furthermore, I put on record that the particular contributions of many who have struggled over the years for equality must be acknowledged and applauded. Although we might disagree with some of their actions and initiatives, the work of people such as Inez McCormick, the late Bob Cooper, and the late Seán McBride have brought this community to a much better place than heretofore in that regard.

I cannot do justice to a 200-page report; I urge Members to read it themselves. Its good authority is based on the statistics and data of Departments in the North, and it should be a catalyst for the next phase of equality.

A catalyst is needed even though there have been significant achievements over the past 30-odd years in respect of equality in the North. As we embark upon the next phase of our political journey, we must be mindful of remaining inequalities — historically, particularly in respect of the Catholic community, and in areas of acute inequality that have begun to emerge in the Protestant community.

I do not want to burden the debate with statistics, but some need to be acknowledged. I will quote two or three from the Committee on the Administration of Justice (CAJ) report.

First, there is an area of employment for which the Assembly has personal and intimate responsibility, namely the Northern Ireland Civil Service. The top-line balance of employment figures in the service is 40% Catholic and 55% Protestant. It is clear that a differential persists in public-sector employment in the North. However, when we probe the headline figures, we discover that deeper differentials exist that are over and above that top-line differential. In the two standard occupational categories where 73% of civil servants are employed, the Catholic community is under-represented by 8%. At the same time, however, that statistic is offset by over-representation of the Catholic community in other categories where, based on the overall numbers in the North, the Protestant community is under-represented. Given that responsibility for the Northern Ireland Civil Service lies with the Assembly, surely we should address such under-representation.

The motion deliberately refers to economically inactive households. That problem is becoming more acute: the percentage of economically inactive households in the North is more than 25% greater than that in England, Scotland or Wales. Therefore, we can see the contradiction in that record numbers of people are in work in the North, and unemployment is at a record low, but, compared to Britain, we still have the highest — and growing — number of economically inactive households. When we examine those figures in more detail, we discover that over the past five or six years, the percentage of such households in the Catholic community — about 19% — has remained stable. That is a big problem. At the same time, the percentage of economically inactive households — meaning that no one in the household, either child or parent, is working — on the Protestant side of the community has increased from 14% to 16%.

Since the restoration of the Assembly a few months ago, housing has clearly been of great concern to Members. The figures in the CAJ report create an acute impetus for the Department of Finance and Personnel to acknowledge in the current Budget negotiations the need to increase significantly the housing budget. Waiting lists for both communities have increased significantly over the past few years — again, more acutely on the Catholic side, by 30%, but, at the same time, by 19% on the Protestant side. At the same time, people on waiting lists to be rehoused are waiting for an unacceptable length of time. Again, it is higher on the Catholic side, at around 13 months, but Protestants still have to wait for nine months.

Government policy on all of this, including anti-poverty policies such as TSN, reveals the following points. I want to read into the record what a CAJ briefing note says on this:

"Of the top 20 poorest areas in Northern Ireland, only one, Ballymacarrett, is outside North and West Belfast or Derry. Of the top 50 most deprived areas in Northern Ireland, only seven are outside North and West Belfast, or Derry ... In relation to community breakdown, of the top 20 poorest areas in Northern Ireland, 13 are overwhelmingly Catholic and 7 Protestant."

Whatever side of the community we may come from, it should be a matter of deep and common concern that those statistics reveal what they do about Protestant and Catholic disadvantage. Yes, disadvantage, for historical and other reasons, is more acute on the Catholic side of the community, and those differentials must be addressed; nonetheless, it is a common problem.

What should we do? The SDLP proposes that, first, the House should support the motion, at least because, in doing so, it will put on record its concern and create a benchmark for the issue of inequality in the North. Secondly, we should acknowledge that, whatever progress has been made in recent years, inequality still endures and is deeply embedded — acutely so in parts of the Catholic community but also in parts of the Protestant community. We should appreciate what the CAJ says about a stable and cohesive society's having as its bedrock the issue of equality. We should acknowledge that the Equality Commission, which, under previous leaderships and in its predecessor form, was an engine for change, has become a body in which a management culture around equality operates, rather than a change culture.

Let us devise specific policies that address the early-years strategy, especially in those areas where people have low educational attainment. Low educational attainment is pretty acute in parts of my constituency, including on the Shankill. Let us introduce the single equality Bill, because legislation has always been an engine for change and part of the architecture for the future.

My colleagues will speak about other proposals, but I urge Members to support the motion so that we will be able say to the people of the North that, on the issue of equality, we are prepared to be judged and to judge ourselves.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I call Mr Danny Kennedy, the Chairperson of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister.

Mr Kennedy: I will not be speaking as the Chairperson of the Committee, Mr Deputy Speaker. Whether that affects the pecking order in which Members are called to speak, I am not sure. I am open to your guidance, but I am happy to speak.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Go on ahead.

Mr Kennedy: The essence of the SDLP motion is the CAJ report's contention that, despite historically high levels of employment, the community differential in economic activity in Northern Ireland should be interpreted to mean inequality between the two main communities. The SDLP obviously agrees with that assertion.

No reasonable person can deny that economic inactivity is a matter of grave economic and social concern. However, my opinion, and that of the Ulster Unionist Party, is that to view the challenge that we face simply by considering supposed inequalities that exist between the two main communities is to ignore some fundamental realities of the nature of economic activity. If we were to do that, the Executive could be distracted from addressing the real, substantive issues that contribute to economic inactivity.

It is vital to note that, although high levels of economic inactivity persist in Northern Ireland, they do so in the context of historically high levels of employment and significant levels of migration from other parts of the European Union.

Even the CAJ notes that the existing legislative framework has promoted equality of opportunity in recruitment and employment. Alongside that, labour-market demands mean that Northern Ireland has required significant levels of migration. According to the Northern Ireland Statistics and Research Agency, Northern Ireland has experienced — proportionately — slightly higher levels of migration from the EU accession states than has the rest of the United Kingdom.

As such, levels of economic inactivity are incredibly difficult to explain merely in inequality terms. Employment opportunities are significantly more abundant in Northern Ireland today than they were a decade ago. Fair employment practices have addressed past concerns, so it would be a huge mistake to interpret the challenge of economic inactivity by using the language and concepts of past debates.

Northern Ireland has the highest rate of economic inactivity of any of the 12 UK regions — 27.1% compared with a UK average of 21%.

However, that bald statistic is misleading. Other UK regions share similar challenges in respect of economic inactivity. Wales has an economic inactivity rate of 24.1%; the north-east of England, 25.7%. In common with Northern Ireland, those regions are well aware that their levels of economic inactivity are significantly above the UK average. The issue is also a matter of much debate and comment in those regions.

To view the challenges that Northern Ireland faces in tackling economic inactivity through a sectarian prism is to miss the point entirely. To rely exclusively on a CAJ report to influence policy on this matter is, again, to miss the point entirely. In common with other UK regions, we have unacceptably high levels of economic inactivity, which undermines our economic prosperity and our social cohesion. However, Northern Ireland is not unique in facing such challenges — there is a wider UK context.

The Executive have a responsibility to secure equality of opportunity for all in Northern Ireland. The securing of a strong economy and a strong society requires that all, irrespective of background, have the opportunity to contribute to economic prosperity and to the well-being of our community. There is also a responsibility on all to respond to those opportunities, to seek gainful employment, and to contribute to the common good. The debate on Northern Ireland's levels of economic inactivity is, therefore, one that we must and should have. However, it should not be couched in the terms of the old divisions. That is the fundamental flaw in the motion, and that is why the Ulster Unionist Party will oppose it.

This debate must take place in the context of the economic and social challenges faced by many regions of the United Kingdom, and by the entire United Kingdom.

Mr Spratt: The report of the Committee on the Administration of Justice is fundamentally and terminally flawed, and it should not form the basis for decision-making on the part of the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister.

On reading chapter 1 of the report, it becomes apparent that its authors believe that unionists have been opposed to equality for years. Unfortunately, that fallacy sets the tone for the rest of the report. The overriding theme of discrimination against Roman Catholics is totally inaccurate, and any notion that the Roman Catholic community was — and still is — downtrodden is not accepted by Members on this side of the House.

If we are to debate discrimination in this Chamber, there are some stark examples of discrimination against the Protestant community that are well worth highlighting. It is clear that Protestants are under-represented in the Civil Service as a whole, particularly in the Child Support Agency and in the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, where Protestants represent only 34% of the workforce. That is to name but a few examples.

If we are to discuss equality and discrimination, let us put all the facts on the table. Let us see what proactive measures are being implemented to attract Protestants into jobs in areas in which they are disproportionately under-represented. Let us discuss the discrimination against young Protestants who want to join, and pursue a career in, the Police Service of Northern Ireland. Members must remember that the imbalance in the ranks of the police was not created by anything other than a murderous terrorist campaign against the RUC, its members, and the families of those members, and by a campaign of intimidation against young Catholics and their families in order to prevent them from joining the ranks of the RUC.

In common with the Member for West Belfast who proposed the motion, Mr Attwood, I am concerned about the number of inactive Protestant and Catholic households in Northern Ireland. However, we do not need to take the CAJ report into consideration when seeking to address that problem. As an Assembly, we have a duty to every member of Northern Ireland's population, regardless of religion, to ensure that opportunities exist to allow those who are seeking employment to find a suitable avenue into the workforce.

The Assembly has a duty to the entire Northern Ireland population, regardless of religion, to ensure that those seeking employment can find suitable avenues back into the workforce. We have a duty to those in most need in the Province. We are well aware of what is required, so we do not need this report, with its many flaws, as a guide to tackling economic inactivity. If we are to tackle inequality, let us tackle it together, and without recourse to a biased and jaundiced report such as that from the CAJ. I oppose the motion.

Ms Anderson: Ba mhaith liom labhairt ar son an rúin seo. I support the motion. Inactivity rates are at the core of the North's economic problems, and they encapsulate the essence of our difficulties, and their solutions. Investment to secure prosperity cannot be separated from investment to address inactivity rates and impoverishment in our communities — the two are structurally and intrinsically interlinked.

Some 272,000 economically inactive people live in the North of Ireland — 147,000 are Catholics and 126,000 are Protestants. Therefore, a huge number of people is excluded from all that we consider must constitute equality of life. People are stuck in a vicious, generational spiral of poor housing, poor health, poor education opportunities and poor social lives.

The phrase "economically inactive" means that people — indeed, whole families — are unemployed but not categorised in total unemployment figures. Many of them are students, carers, those who look after the family home, or those who are sick or disabled. We all know them.

As the CAJ report notes, some of those people would like to work — at least 40,000 of the hidden unemployed — but there are no jobs available for them. When calculated as a societal loss, were those 40,000 people who want to work to gain employment at an average of £12,000 a year — I would want them to earn more — that would represent an increase in income to society of almost £500 million. That does not take account of savings accrued in benefit payments, a conservative estimate of which would be about £300 million. The total would, therefore, be £800 million.

We all know streets in which economic changes meant that everyone had work, yet now they have none. Shipbuilding, textile and engineering industries have collapsed as a result of global changes. With that, whole industries on which local economies were built have gone, leaving behind incomprehension, despair, bitterness, anger and, ultimately, hopelessness.

In the west of the Bann, which includes the city of Derry in my constituency, only 63% of Catholics and 72% of Protestants across the region are engaged actively. There are pockets in which levels of inactivity are higher. However, even those appalling statistics disguise the real story. Derry's resident employment rate is around 10% lower than anywhere else in the North. Only slightly more than 50% of working-age people — half of Derry's working-age residents — are in employment. The waste is criminal.

The CAJ report reviewed some of the policies that have been in place during the past 15 years — New Deal; the action plan in the anti-poverty strategy; and the NIO's 'A Shared Future' — and explained why those have utterly failed to have an impact on inactivity rates. The report also enables us to learn from those mistakes and suggests policies that will be successful.

If we want to deliver economic growth while reversing rates of inactivity, we must target specific areas of disadvantage through investment and procurement policies in which the impact is measured through equality impact assessments (EQIAs) in order to meet the social needs of the people who live there. Under equality legislation, there are legal and statutory obligations on the public sector to do just that. We must change current patterns.

We have come a long way since the Assembly of 2002, when the leading parties in the Executive did not ensure that the Programme for Government was subject to an EQIA.

They did not ensure that economic prosperity would also tackle disadvantage; they did not ensure the proper application of equality and TSN principles to funding allocations in the Budget. Fortunately, intelligent political leadership now prevails.

11.00 am

This Executive will make a difference. This Executive will consider how the equality impact of spending £16 billion on investment can change the awful reality that is experienced by too many people in places such as my own constituency of Foyle.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Will the Member please bring her remarks to a close?

Ms Anderson: I say to Members of the SDLP and the UUP that Sinn Féin will not be found wanting.

Mr McCarthy: The Alliance Party is grateful to Alex Attwood for tabling today's motion and for drawing the CAJ report to the attention of the Assembly.

Inequality — and, indeed, the perception of inequality — leads inevitably to a sense of injustice, which, in turn, feeds anger, bitterness and, sometimes, hate. Building a peaceful society in Northern Ireland is predicated on building one that is scrupulously fair and is seen to be so.

The report's authors do not argue against the widespread perception that direct discrimination is now at a low level, but they do argue — with some force — that structural inequalities are still a serious problem for society in Northern Ireland. There is no doubt that, on virtually every indicator, Catholics are more likely to suffer disadvantage than Protestants.

It is legitimate to debate whether inequality is a historical legacy that is in the process of disappearing or is a persistent gap that will not go away without concerted action. The fact that, despite a period of record economic growth, so many of those inequalities have persisted — albeit at a reduced level — would indicate that the latter is the case. As long as inequality exists, it is the duty of any civilised society to root it out and see that it comes to an end, once and for all.

However, the report falls down badly in its assertion that the persistence of inequalities demands that we move away from objective need being the sole criterion for the allocation of public money. If we move away from objective need, that raises the spectre of people being refused help that they desperately need simply because they fail to come from the targeted background or do not live in the "correct" area. Poverty is no respecter of background, and discrimination has no place in this society.

Indeed, the report makes strong arguments — rightly — against the creation of a task force on Protestant working-class communities. The report notes that the problems faced by those communities are not different fundamentally from those faced by working-class Catholic communities. Therefore, the authors are right to argue against sectarianising poverty in this case, which makes me wonder why they want to sectarianise it in other areas.

Over time, a robust targeting of resources according to objective need must eradicate inequalities, but only if the programmes in question work. In that respect, the report is seriously flawed; for example, the authors examine New Deal and use it as an argument as to why objective need does not reduce inequality. However, New Deal has been shown to be fairly ineffective for people of all backgrounds throughout the UK — Catholic and Protestant, black and white, men and women. If social programmes are to be used to reduce inequalities, they must work in the first place.

I commend the authors' focus on economic inactivity, which could be described as Northern Ireland's "dirty little economic secret". Northern Ireland's economic inactivity rates are the highest in the UK, and, as the report notes, they are not improving.

Mr B McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCarthy: No, I want to finish.

We desperately need to move away from new Labour's failed policies and look at countries where much more active labour-market policies, aimed at the economically inactive, have borne fruit. Denmark is the obvious model. What can the Danish example teach us about tackling poverty, whether in Shantallow or Shankill?

Another flaw in the report is its rubbishing of the shared future agenda and, in particular, the failure to spot its relationship to housing inequalities. North Belfast is highlighted in the report as having particularly serious inequalities in housing allocation. The appalling waiting times faced by housing applicants from Catholic backgrounds are a direct consequence of many areas of north Belfast's neither feeling nor being safe for Catholics to live in —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Mr McCarthy, your time is up.

Mr Shannon: Having read parts of the aforementioned report, I have to agree with Alex Attwood that there is cause for concern. However, my concern flows from the severely tainted nature of the report, which makes no pretence of being unbiased. As I worked my way through the report, I did not see a reflection of the way forward for Northern Ireland — a way to address employment issues properly, or to help those who wish to find work and jobs that they like. I did, however, see a throwback to the Northern Ireland where religion and community background were blamed for every problem. The fact that unemployment is down and Northern Ireland is more economically stable than it has been in many years has no place in this report, which seeks to blame the position of certain sectors of the community on religion, and not on the ability and desire to have work and to seek work.

It cannot be disputed that there are a large number of people in the community who have a desire to work, but who cannot find work — for example, men laid off from factories at the age of 50 and who have limited skills. Undoubtedly they have the desire to work, but they find it difficult to get anyone to hire them. DEL (Department for Employment and Learning) and DETI (Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment) should provide opportunities for training in new skills and confidence in the skills that exist but need to be stretched. That help should not be restricted to the sector of the community that may have had less cause for retraining in that year. It must go, rightly, to the people who need it, regardless of their creed or persuasion.

Alex Attwood referred to deprivation in north Belfast. North Belfast has not cornered the market in deprivation. In parts of the area that I represent — Newtownards and the Strangford constituency — places such as Scrabo estate, West Winds estate and parts of Portaferry, which Kieran McCarthy and I represent with a different hat, have a level of deprivation as high as that in north Belfast. We deserve the same focus. That needs to be put on the record in this Chamber.

I could stand here and read out the statistics in the report, which are undoubtedly thought-provoking. There are general ideas in the report that should be implemented. However, to say that the report should be put into practice in its entirety will not put Northern Ireland in a stronger position. It will trail us back to what we have struggled to come away from — a society where we are tied to one community or another, with an inability to assess any situation without bringing in bias or unfairness.

The DUP wants equality for all, and it has put that on record. This report does not address unemployment in Northern Ireland. It bandies about age-old excuses, and that kind of pot-stirring has no place in the Province today. We undoubtedly have higher unemployment than we would like, but is that down to the religion of those applying for jobs? Of course, if applying to the PSNI, it is down to religion. A large proportion of the people whom I represent cannot seem to get jobs in the police force, even though they have the ability, qualifications and experience.

Mr B McCrea: Would it interest the Member to know, with regard to the supposed jobs that we are looking for and this 50:50 recruitment in policing, that although 30% of people are Catholic males and 30% are Protestant males, only 13% of Catholic women apply? If they are looking for jobs, why do they not apply and try to get themselves out of this economic morass?

Mr Shannon: I thank the Member for his intervention, and I wholeheartedly agree with him. He is absolutely right. I have nothing against a person of whatever religion applying for a job — we should all have the same opportunities to get a job. We must implement a strategy that creates a way forward, not one that looks to the past and offers no real hope.

One of my boyhood heroes was Winston Churchill. He said:

"Continuous effort, not strength or intelligence, is the key to unlocking our potential."

The report does not advocate that approach; it merely plays a blame game. As such, I cannot support a report that offers no real fairness to the people of Northern Ireland, either Protestant or Roman Catholic. I oppose the motion.

Mr Molloy: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I support the motion, and I thank Mr Attwood for securing this important and welcome debate.

The CAJ must be commended on the work that it has put into the report and for the fact that it has given recommendations on how to address the problems that we are experiencing. I encourage unionism not simply to dismiss the report but to welcome it and to play a part in the research that must be carried out into past discrimination. Unionists may not agree with everything in the report, but they should be part and parcel of a process that leads to the production of other reports so that a complete picture can be drawn. If unionists want to contest arguments in the report, that is fair enough; they should do so and challenges should be made, but they must also come up with alternatives.

However, we must accept that the report has identified some projects that the Government have put forward to alleviate the situation — although others would say “mask”. The New Deal programme is one such project. Like new Labour, it is based on a spin policy that has been designed to cover up matters and to create an impression of low unemployment, when, at the end of the day, it has created no real jobs and effected no change. Very often, much of the work and money involved has been wasted. I regret to say that a lot of the European money has likewise been wasted. With no strategy in place to ensure that European money is used to create long-term jobs and commitments, it has sometimes become a case of going round the same old houses.

It is noticeable from economic activity tables that there is a high level of economic inactivity west of the Bann — some 59% or 60%. It is clear from the breakdown by constituency and council area that that is where the inactivity is to be found. I commend those who have created economic activity themselves — those local entrepreneurs who have done it on their own. They created jobs because they realised that there would be no Government jobs west of the Bann, no encouragement from any agencies to create employment west of the Bann, and no inward investment west of the Bann. Local unemployed people and local entrepreneurs created the jobs themselves, and, as a result, some of the best businesses in the world today are located west of the Bann — for example, Powerscreen International plc, which is owned by TEREX. Some 80% of the world's quarrying machinery is manufactured west of the Bann. Therefore, out of that situation came initiative. At the same time, Government continually financed the big industries east of the Bann — the shipyard and so on — but those have failed to deliver. Thus, there is a clear imbalance in investment east and west of the Bann.

From a unionist perspective, it may not be nice to hear that the discrimination west of the Bann affected not just Catholics, but everyone who lived there. It just happened to be that the majority of people who lived west of the Bann were Catholics; therefore, they suffered most. Unfortunately, unionists accepted that discrimination because it was mainly Catholics who suffered and they did not raise their voices. I welcome the fact that Members such as Gregory Campbell are now discussing discrimination west of the Bann and that they accept that situation. Hopefully, we can now instigate change in order that the east/west divide will no longer be a topic for discussion.

I encourage Invest NI to examine how entrepreneurs west of the Bann have helped themselves, and how those efforts could be supported.

11.15 am

Mr Shannon accepted some of the report's concerns, and the intent of Mr Attwood's motion. I encourage Mr Shannon to add his concerns to those expressed in the report so that we can begin to tackle this problem collectively. There is no reason why this matter should divide us. We should unite to eradicate discrimination and inequality across the board, no matter where it is happening. We have the facilities to do that: we have the Assembly in which to debate the matter, and there is a climate of economic growth in which we can tackle the problem. Let us come together and, instead of dividing the House, say collectively that we welcome the report. Go raibh maith agat.

Mr Campbell: This is an important topic, but part of the problem with the report is the nature of its authors. The Committee for the Administration of Justice is not exactly a non-partisan body, and its various reports down the years on a variety of subjects have demonstrated that. However, I shall begin by mentioning a couple of issues on which, I imagine, there is broad consensus.

Statistics indicate that unemployment in Northern Ireland is at an all-time low. There are regional variations but, overall, the country is experiencing significantly higher levels of employment, and consequently, lower levels of unemployment, than has been the case historically. That is good, and is to be welcomed.

However, we must attract the highest possible quality of employment into Northern Ireland, and I know that the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment and others are concentrating on that. We have many part-time employees, particularly women, who are in jobs from which they want to move on. I imagine that there is consensus on that matter. The CAJ report does not address that matter, other than in passing.

To cut to the chase, I have noticed that one or two Members —

Mr Newton: Will the Member give way?

Mr Campbell: Yes, before I cut to the chase.
[Laughter.]

Mr Newton: In a press statement about equality that was published on the Sinn Féin website, Martina Anderson makes disgraceful remarks about the work of civil servants, by stating:

“There would appear to be an army of civil servants there who are opposed to any change in the status quo. They seem to have worked damn hard over the decades to maintain inequalities and to preserve their own privileged position.”

Is that not a disgraceful attack on civil servants in general, who are unable to respond in the political arena to challenge such statements?

Mr Campbell: I thank the Member for those comments, and I will deal shortly — again — with the inaccuracies of the Member whom he mentioned.

The bulk of the CAJ report deals with the issue of employment in Northern Ireland. Almost two thirds of the Province's workforce is employed in the public sector. We must ensure that private-sector investment creates more jobs in order to complement the number of jobs in the public sector. However, the CAJ and the SDLP, in what I might describe as a Back-Bench motion to keep the backwoodsmen happy, to use language from last week, are contending that there is an overall problem that is changing only slowly.

If the CAJ report and the SDLP motion purport to consider overall employment patterns, they exclude and ignore what is happening in 2007. Discrimination in police recruitment is happening now, and Robin Newton mentioned the situation in the Civil Service. A picture is emerging, but I have been raising these issues for decades, along with others.

Currently, there are 300 civil servants in the higher echelons of the Civil Service, where Catholic disadvantage is reducing year on year. Therefore the problem is minimal and is almost about to disappear. The Civil Service employs 30,000 in the general service grades — the largest number by any employer, anywhere in the country. Where is the disadvantage? It is among the Protestant community, and that must be addressed. That is where the problem is and no amount of waffle, statements or rhetoric will address it.

Last week, I met the Minister of Finance and Personnel in an attempt to address the matter and I am hopeful that a remedy can be found for the situation, in which large numbers in both communities — particularly the community that I and my party represent — need higher-quality employment. My community has been disadvantaged, not for six months, but for years. Those people, with all the other communities, need to see the problem and the issue resolved.

Unfortunately, CAJ does not appear to be capable of understanding that. Nor does the SDLP's motion grasp that reality. Given the comments that have been attributed to Martina Anderson, I do not expect Sinn Féin to grasp it either.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Please draw your remarks to a close.

Mr Campbell: The motion does not face up to the reality of the emerging picture; therefore, the DUP opposes it.

Mr Elliott: I am disappointed that the Ulster Unionist Party amendment was not accepted. I welcome the comments made by Mr Molloy. If I heard him correctly, he indicated that there was discrimination against the Protestant population in parts of Northern Ireland. If he wishes to clarify that, I am willing to hear him.

Equality is an issue that raises its head in various arenas. On many occasions in the House I have addressed the issue of equality for agriculture and rural communities. The importance of the word “equality” in the life of everyone in Northern Ireland should not be underestimated. The report published by the Committee on the Administration of Justice — and I support Mr Campbell's comments about that organisation — has several negatives; however, I accept that there are some positives. The report, which addresses the previous 30 years here, shows that the legislative measures adopted during that time have made some headway into the sectarian headcount that takes place in some types of employment. Furthermore, the report notes that ending political and religious discrimination at the point of recruitment has, in general, been effective. Indeed, the Northern Ireland Life and Times Survey shows that 90% of people now prefer a mixed workplace. That is an increase of almost 10% from 2000.

The positive aspects of the report and the survey results show that, after coming out of the dark days of the Troubles, Northern Ireland is making progress in economic diversity. I am sure that a report 30 years from now will further reflect the integration of communities, as Northern Ireland becomes, hopefully, a more normal society.

I agree that the number of economically inactive people living in Northern Ireland is frightening. From March to May 2006, there were 538,000, the majority of whom were female. The main reason given for economic inactivity among both Protestants and Roman Catholics was sickness and disability and nothing to do with religion.

It is important that economic evolution is part of the process of moving forward socially and economically. Although the phrase “economic inactivity” includes adults who, for whatever reason, are not seeking work; children below the age of 16, and those who are beyond pension age, the majority of the figures quoted usually refer to the working-age population alone. We must seek to encourage those who can work to do so, and, as more jobs arrive in Northern Ireland, we must capitalise on the opportunities that will open up.

We must work with those agencies that help people to find employment and we must seek to develop opportunities for Protestant and Roman Catholic students. Too many of them are leaving home to work on mainland GB or in the Republic of Ireland and are not returning due to the lack of jobs.

Interestingly, a recent study conducted by researchers at the University of Bath shows that Protestant countries have higher employment rates than non-Protestant countries. The study claims that that is due to the Protestant work ethic, which makes subjects work hard, even when they do not want to work. I do not know whether that is relevant, but Dr Horst Feldmann from the University of Bath stated:

“the most likely reason for the impact of Protestantism on employment was the legacy of the commitment to work cultivated through the early Protestant church.”

He went on to say:

“In its early days, Protestantism promoted the virtue of hard and diligent work among its adherents who judged one another by conformity to this standard.”

Mr O’Loan: The Committee on the Administration of Justice’s report is an important summary of the state of equality in Northern Ireland, and I praise committee members for the important work that they have done over the years.

There are four key summary points in the report: first, that there has been real progress on equality in the labour market but that structural inequalities remain; secondly, that there is still a large group of economically inactive people and that Catholics are significantly over-represented in that group; thirdly, that there are sectors of deprivation remaining, particularly in relation to housing and deprived residential areas, and that that deprivation still affects Catholics in particular; and fourthly, that the report is critical of the policy approach in ‘A Shared Future’, and argues that it is not equality-based and is, therefore, ineffective. That is the main point.

I will not repeat the information that Alex Attwood provided on employment and on those who are economically inactive, but there are important conclusions to be taken from what he said. The Fair Employment (Northern Ireland) Act 1989 and the Fair Employment and Treatment (Northern Ireland) Order 1998 are significant legislative remedies. The SDLP was instrumental in achieving those pieces of legislation, which are based on compulsory religious monitoring and affirmative action. Those pieces of legislation have done the business, in that they have essentially eliminated discrimination from the employing process. We have achieved balance in the public and private sectors in relation to the numbers of Catholics and Protestants who are employed. However, the report states that there are structural imbalances within that overall balance. Those are important indicators that our community is still divided. We must examine that closely as part of the debate.

The report tackles three Government measures that address poverty, social exclusion and social cohesion. Those measures are: targeting social need, the task force on Protestant working-class communities, and ‘A Shared Future’. The report refers to a mythology around Protestant working-class areas — and there is some validity in the reference to mythology.

Alex Attwood cited the facts. The report contains a lot of factual information, from which it draws conclusions. I have no difficulty with people disagreeing with those conclusions — I disagree with some of them — but the facts cannot be ignored. For some Members, the less their arguments are based on facts, the louder their voices become. If those people do not attend to the facts that are included in the report, they do not deserve to be taken seriously in a debate on equality.

11.30 am

I have no objection to affirmative action in Protestant working-class areas, but it must be directed towards real need and not be politically driven. For example, there is evidence of educational underachievement in Protestant working-class areas — it is proper and necessary to address that. When referring to Protestant working-class areas, it is essential that the scourge of loyalist paramilitarism is mentioned. All Members should unite to state that threats, violence and criminality must be removed. All Members must support that, and there should be no sideswipes at the Minister for Social Development, who is working effectively to achieve that.

The debate about the concepts of equality and a shared future, and their merits, is very important. Some Members advocate equality and reject the concept of a shared future. We could attempt to create a society in which — on the surface — there is equality in each community, but no social cohesion. I am convinced that that would not work. The concepts of equality and a shared future are essential, and should both be supported by all Members. It is on that point that I disagree with the conclusions of the report.

Mr B McCrea: The motion is not only wrong in principle, but also in its approach and analysis of the facts. Declan O’Loan has just stated that he does not have a problem with people’s reaching different conclusions than those of the report. However, certain Members are being selective. The report states that there have been vast improvements on perceived discrimination in employment. However, as Gregory Campbell mentioned, there is no attempt to address such inequalities in the Health Service.

The report deals with the important issue of housing. Yesterday, Alex Attwood's colleague the Minister for Social Development told the House that the Housing Executive was a professional organisation. The Housing Executive's response to the CAJ report referred to issues such as the:

"lack of understanding/acknowledgment of complexities of housing markets; failure to acknowledge the political sensitivities of providing housing services in a divided community; failure to acknowledge the need for additional resources to support an adequate new build programme; failure to recognise the substantial investment in areas of high demand."

Who are the Members on the SDLP Benches going to support: Alex Attwood or Margaret Ritchie?

Mr Attwood: I do not know whether the Member was in the House when I proposed the motion. If he was, he will recall that I stated that waiting times for the Catholic and Protestant communities are unacceptably high — although higher in the Catholic community. I also said that waiting lists have grown in recent years by 35% for the Catholic community and 19% for the Protestant community. I argued that those figures should provide an impetus, during the current Budget negotiations, for the Government to ensure that significantly more money is allocated for housing. What is the problem with that?

Mr B McCrea: I was in the House to hear the Member's speech, as I was for all the subsequent contributions.

Mr Attwood is being selective in the information that he is using. Are Members aware of a report by the Joseph Rowntree Foundation, 'Monitoring Poverty and Social Exclusion in Northern Ireland', which comments on the number of economically inactive people? It states that 7% of the adult population in Northern Ireland were injured during the Troubles, and 36% had a close friend or close relative injured or killed. The report states that those facts account for the differentials in economic inactivity with regard to sickness, mental health and disability living allowance. That is why there is economic inactivity. One may talk about legacy issues and their effect on young people, but the real problem — and we have talked about it in relation to other issues — is that 14% of young people in some areas do not pass any GCSEs. Five per cent of those young people do not get any qualifications at all, and 35% of eleven-year-olds do not even reach level 4 in Key Stage 2; that percentage is twice as high as elsewhere. The real problem does not relate to some type of pseudo-inequality but to education.

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Member give way?

Mr B McCrea: I do not get another extra minute, Dolores, so please be quick.

Mrs D Kelly: Regardless of the reasons for economic inactivity, does the Member recognise that we are in a state of economic inactivity that must be dealt with?

Mr B McCrea: The SDLP is drawing the wrong conclusions from the wrong facts, based on a shoddy piece of academic work, and if the questions are wrong, it is unlikely that the answers will be right. That is why the Ulster Unionist Party opposes the motion. It is utter tripe to talk about inequality when the facts stack up against it. The facts do not fit the argument, so Mr Attwood changes them and carries on regardless. We have faced huge challenges, and we must now deal with improvements in educational attainment. One might ask why some people do not take up employment? Why will the 40,000 supposedly economically inactive people who would like a job not take a job? Is it because almost 40% of all female jobs are part-time positions, or is it because women are 37% more likely to earn a low wage than men? If the differentials are not right, it is difficult to encourage people out to work.

It is not our job to conduct a witch-hunt and ask what is fair, what is unfair or what is right or wrong. The Assembly must explain to people that they have to be responsible for their own actions. We must get those communities sorted out. Duncan Morrow, the chief executive of the Community Relations Council, said that once a community becomes synonymous with rioting and other bad images, it is not surprising that its people — including its skilled people — leave and that it is unable to attract inward investment. I urge the Members opposite to stop going after this red herring: start concentrating on the real issues. If those Members leave those issues aside, this side of the House will support them. The SDLP has brought up an emotive red herring, which is why the Ulster Unionist Party rejects the motion.

The Deputy First Minister (Mr M McGuinness): I thank Members who contributed to the debate. All contributions were valuable, regardless of what side of the argument Members were on.

One of the most important contributions came from Jim Shannon, who argued that deprivation and inequality exist in many housing estates and areas throughout the state. He went on to state powerfully that he and the DUP wanted equality for all. It was significant that, during the debate, not one Member argued that inequality was a good thing. That represents important common ground on which the Assembly and the Executive can, and must, build.

Equality is an important issue for the Assembly and for society. Inequalities exist, and we must strive to achieve the goal of eliminating all forms of inequality. 'Equality in Northern Ireland: The Rhetoric and the Reality', produced by the CAJ, is a thorough and detailed report that deals with a wide range of complex issues.

The report is already a year old, but the issues it raises still need to be considered.

The CAJ report draws heavily on officially published sources of information, and it properly points out that some progress has been achieved in all sections of society over the past 30 years. It also usefully highlights some of the persistent inequalities that affect both communities, particularly the widening gap between the haves and the have-nots.

In the time available today, it is not possible to deal with all the areas covered in the report. However, that is not to say that a further detailed consideration is not merited — indeed, over the coming weeks and months, the conclusions of the report will require a full examination.

Given the focus of today's debate, I will concentrate specifically on the issues around economic inactivity among Catholic and Protestant households. Among the key questions that we should ask ourselves are: what is the level of economic activity in households here, and, more importantly perhaps, what are we doing to address that perennial issue? Although the motion focuses specifically on economic inactivity, it cannot be considered fully without also considering employment and unemployment, given that economic inactivity and economic activity are two sides of the same coin. Obviously, to reduce one, the other has to be increased. That places a mighty responsibility on the Executive proactively to change the existing patterns of social disadvantage by using increased prosperity and economic growth to tackle poverty.

As my Executive colleague the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment, Nigel Dodds, put it in the Chamber on 10 September, we should be raising the economy so that everyone can benefit:

“paying absolute regard to the particular challenges and disadvantages that affect particular areas, whether in the west, the north-west, the south or certain parts of Belfast.” — [Official Report, Bound Volume 23, p223, col 1].

Economic inactivity is due to a wide range of factors. The North has a high proportion of students and people looking after the home, who are counted as being economically inactive. The Assembly needs to consider measures that will allow those with caring responsibilities that are limiting their ability to utilise education, training and quality employment to share in the growing economy.

It is important to note that education is necessary for increased economic growth and prosperity. The fact that there is a high percentage of full-time students is not in itself an unwelcome statistic. Of course, the proportion of economically inactive citizens able to take up employment could well increase if the conditions enabling them to enter the labour market were more favourable. That is the challenge for all of us today — to use information to develop new and innovative measures that will address existing patterns of socio-economic disadvantage based on tackling the objective needs of those worst affected.

One of the main official sources of information on economic inactivity is the labour force survey. The latest seasonally adjusted estimate for May to July 2007 is that there are 290,000 economically inactive people of working age in the North, representing 27·1% of the working-age population. That remains significantly higher than the current rate in England, Scotland and Wales, which is around 21·2%.

None of us can fail to acknowledge the exact scale of the challenge that lies ahead. Seasonally adjusted estimates show that there are around 760,000 people in employment, and the unemployment rate, at 4·5%, is among the lowest of all the regions, as Gregory Campbell correctly said. However, it is important to note that some observers, including the CAJ, have argued that current calculations of the unemployment rate can create a false impression by failing to take account of the hidden unemployment of those who are, for example, on various Government schemes. The latest available data for 2005 from the labour force survey religion report shows that one in three Catholics and one in four Protestants are economically inactive.

The labour force survey is a detailed, complex and objectively compiled statistical assessment that provides a factual overview of the status of the economy in the North. I remind all Members that the report has been published by the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, and can be accessed on the Department's website.

A wide range of policy responses will be required to tackle the problem of economic disadvantage. We know that the economically inactive do not form a static group. Indeed, more people join the labour market who are classed as economically inactive than those who are classed as unemployed or those who are classed as seeking work. By the same account, the latest available conclusions about the New Deal, as outlined by the Department for Employment and Learning's statistical bulletin for April 1998 to June 2007, demonstrate that less than one third of 18- to 24-year-olds and just 20% of over-25-year-olds moved off the scheme into unsubsidised employment during the past decade. We should draw the efficiency and effectiveness of programmes such as New Deal to the attention of the Executive.

Lessons can, of course, be learnt from public-procurement research, which indicates that Government procurement can play an active and effective role in tackling patterns of socio-economic disadvantage.

Working-age economic activity is defined as people who are either in work or on jobseeker's allowance. By that definition, about 67% of Catholics and 76% of Protestants are economically active. The official unemployment figures show that 6% of Catholics and 3% of Protestants are unemployed. The top 20 areas of greatest deprivation straddle both the Shankill and the Falls. Those patterns of disadvantage, which affect both communities to various degrees, will require real and meaningful strategies to ensure that the Executive's commitment to tackling poverty and addressing social need is fulfilled.

Mr McNarry: Will the Deputy First Minister give way?

The Deputy First Minister: I am not sure whether I can give way during my response.

Mr McNarry: Is he willing to give way?

The Deputy First Minister: I am.

Mr McNarry: I am grateful to the Deputy First Minister for giving way.

Will he clarify that he is speaking to the motion on behalf of both himself and the First Minister? Does he agree that it is time that all Ministers who are responding to motions give a clear indication as to where the Executive stand on the issue that is under debate? I say that with due respect to the Deputy First Minister; everything that he is saying today is interesting and reportable, and will be well read in the Hansard report. Nevertheless, we debate motions without a clear indication from the Executive as to where they stand on issues. It would be most helpful for Members if they had clarity on those matters.

The Deputy First Minister: Everyone knows and understands that when Ian Paisley or I speak to a motion such as this, we both speak for the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister (OFMDFM). Therefore, I am speaking for the First Minister in this debate. I hope that my contribution to the debate will give a clear indication of how we, as an Executive, intend to move forward and deal with the vital issues that concern the whole of our community.

The problem of disadvantage is even more acute for women and people with disabilities. Typically, the economic inactivity rates for women are higher than those for men. Both Catholic and Protestant women experience the highest economic inactivity rates, at 42% and 29% respectively. We must look specifically at the barriers that face women in the area of socio-economic disadvantage, because if we do not, the gap will continue to widen to the detriment of us all.

The barriers in accessing the labour market for people with disabilities are reflected in the fact that the majority of disabled people of working age — 66% — are economically inactive. About 14% of households, or one in seven, have no working adults. Clearly, the policy responses to that type of endemic socio-economic disadvantage will require a range of factors to be carefully considered.

As we all know, the Assembly does not have tax and benefit policy levers at its disposal that could influence the labour market. However, where inward investment, anti-poverty, equality, infrastructure, childcare, transport, tourism, housing, health, education and welfare-to-work policies are concerned, we have the opportunity to make things better for those who face the greatest disadvantage. At a time when the potential for economic growth is at its greatest, it is crucial that we use the economy to tackle inequality and use prosperity to end poverty.

Alex Attwood raised several issues during the debate, one of which was housing differentials. Although there are inequalities in housing — just as there are inequalities across society generally — the key issue is whether those inequalities are a result of discrimination or other factors, and which of those other factors are in our control.

The new-build strategic guidelines, which affect the availability of social housing, are the subject of a separate equality impact assessment, which will take account of religious differentials. Targeted strategies have directed resources towards key areas of housing stress and have promoted housing in north and west Belfast, Derry and other areas.

Alex Attwood and Gregory Campbell raised the issue of community differentials in the Civil Service. Catholic representation has steadily improved at Senior Civil Service level and is close to balancing with comparable parts of the workforce. Balance should be reached by the time of the next review.

We also recognise that progress must be made to address the under-representation of Protestants at administrative and junior management grades. That is a priority, and affirmative action has, and continues, to be taken. We have, for example, commissioned research into why there have been low application rates for males and Protestants.

Danny Kennedy spoke in the debate, although not in his capacity as Chairperson of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. In due course, I will welcome the views of that Committee on the important contribution from the CAJ. Danny also spoke of the need for opportunities. I agree; however, currently, those opportunities cannot be accessed by all sections of the population. We must ensure that they can. Even with net inward migration, unemployment levels continue to fall. However, significant numbers of people still face social exclusion.

Jimmy Spratt raised the subject of the CAJ report and suggested that the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister should not base its policies on it. In order to develop policies to tackle inequality, we must take account of as wide a range of evidence as possible, including that of the Equality Commission.

Francie Molloy highlighted the lack of investment in the north-west. Although accepting that regional economic imbalances must be addressed, Members must acknowledge that, in the past five years, 50% of all Invest NI assistance was offered to locations in areas of economic disadvantage, as designated by the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment. Those areas take in 30% of the population. Inward investment must continue to be directed towards areas with the greatest objective need.

Declan O'Loan asked why I am pursuing the shared-future agenda at the expense of equality. OFMDFM is committed to moving society forward in order to make a real difference to the lives of ordinary people by promoting equality, human rights and good relations and by tackling social need. That is a complex and multi-faceted matter, which is affected by many factors, and which requires a wide range of departmental initiatives and responses. OFMDFM remains focused on the need to end patterns of disadvantage, wherever they exist.

The Executive's work is informed by a wide range of internal and external sources of data, independent analysis and challenges, and we welcome the contribution that the report makes to that debate.

Mrs D Kelly: The motion states:

"That this Assembly notes with concern the report by the Committee on the Administration of Justice 'Equality in Northern Ireland: the rhetoric and the reality'; believes that the numbers of economically inactive Catholic and Protestant households is of particular concern."

What is wrong with that declaration as a motion, or as a fact that Members should recognise? Is the issue really that the unionist parties have difficulty with, and cannot accept, the credentials of the authors of the report rather than its findings?

A Member: That is speculation.

Mrs D Kelly: That is anything but speculation, and many Members have made that clear. Mr McCrea referred to the data and statistics that were used to compile the report. All data in the report came from the Government — from the Northern Ireland Statistics and Research Agency, OFMDFM and DETI. If Members rubbish the report because of the statistics, they rubbish all those Government agencies that provided such data.

Mr B McCrea: As the Member's colleague Mr O'Loan pointed out, the problem was not with the facts but with the conclusions. If the report states that there is no real problem with recruitment, why go on about it? The Member says that there is an issue about housing, yet the Minister for Social Development told the House yesterday that the Housing Executive is a good organisation. The proposer of the motion has a problem with both matters. Why rely on a flawed report? That is illogical.

Mrs D Kelly: Some of the Member's conclusions are somewhat illogical, and he must have read the report through tinted glasses.

As for the housing debate, the Minister made it clear that she wants to tackle housing for all. A difficulty with equality in housing provision in the North is the failure to share common ground and space on which to build new housing. That difficulty will continue until we learn to live together. The House should show greater leadership in tackling those inequalities.

I am glad that the Deputy First Minister contributed to the debate; he made it very clear to the House that he spoke on behalf of the First Minister and welcomed the CAJ report.

I welcome some of the statistics that were mentioned by Martina Anderson and Francie Molloy. No one is disputing the fact that people who lived west of the Bann, whether Catholic or Protestant, were discriminated against. Indeed, at Westminster, a former leader of the Ulster Unionist Party recognised the discrimination that existed during 80 years of unionist rule, which affected unionist and Catholic communities.

Martina Anderson not only mentioned statistics but tried to lay some of the blame on the former Assembly. The former Assembly had little opportunity to deal with inequality because of the stop-go nature of politics, and it was held to ransom by paramilitaries — most notably by the IRA's failure to decommission.

The report sets out clear challenges and recommends actions on the way to deal with economic inequality. For example, the latest statistics on New Deal — a direct rule scheme that is still exists — show that 18% of Protestants over the age of 25 moved into sustained, unsubsidised employment after completing the programme. The corresponding figure for Catholics is 13%. The equivalent figures for New Deal for 18- to 24-year-olds are 25% for Protestants and 21% for Catholics. Why are the Executive continuing to fund New Deal under the Programme for Government? Why do we not seek a much more effective strategy to tackle economic activity? What is wrong with that conclusion in the report?

'Lifetime Opportunities: Government's Anti-Poverty and Social Inclusion Strategy' states:

"since the introduction in 1998 of the New Deal programme, unemployment in the main New Deal groups (i.e. 18-24 age group and 25+) has reduced. Additional provision is also available through New Deal 50+, New Deal for Lone Parents, New Deal for Disabled People, New Deal for Partners and New Deal for Musicians ...

An additional package of support measures for Lone Parents will be piloted in 4 areas in NI from January 2007 with resources obtained through the Skills and Science Fund. Again, using resources from this Fund, mandatory participation for those aged 50+ in New Deal 25+ is being piloted so as to provide additional assistance for individuals in this age group to enable them to enter/re-enter the labour market."

Why, therefore, are we even considering mandatory participation in a programme that is not delivering for those most in need? That is setting people up to fail.

Basil McCrea asked why people are not applying for jobs. If he took the opportunity to speak to some of his constituents, he would find that many women are unable to take up jobs because of the lack of affordable childcare. People also lack the skills development and self-confidence that is required to get them to interview stage.

12.00 noon

Look at the anti-poverty strategy. Another finding of the report is that that strategy aims:

"To target 75% of first time inward investment projects towards disadvantaged areas, to ensure that all areas can benefit from sustainable economic growth and high value added employment."

If the target is 75%, what is the current level? The current level is 75%. Why are we continuing to set a target that has already been achieved? Why are we not setting much more challenging targets for economic growth through investment? The target must be set much higher, and agencies and others have to be taken out of the comfort zone.

Mr Gregory Campbell claimed that the report made no reference to public-sector differentials. Chapter 2 of the report is totally focused on that particular aspect, specifically referring to the under-representation of Protestants on Derry City Council and in the health and education sectors generally.

Mr McCarthy claimed that the CAJ report wanted to move away from objective need. In fact, the whole premise of the report is that we need to act on the basis of objective need. It is also clear that the authors of the report are saying that New Deal is failing both communities.

The report sets clear challenges for the future. Although the Deputy First Minister has clearly stated how committed both he and the First Minister are to promoting equality and a shared future, the time has come — some six months later — for decisions to be taken. Decisions have to be made, and the Executive and the Ministers must take responsibility and take the lead in embedding anti-poverty and shared future policies, and in tackling economic inactivity and delivering on social inclusion for all the people.

Mr McNarry: That is a — [Interruption.]

[Laughter.]

Mrs D Kelly: Do you think so? I have not finished with you yet. I was just checking that the Members opposite were still awake; it had gone silent for a while.

There is no reason why this report cannot be adopted by the Assembly. Some Members may not like the messengers, but that does not mean that the message is wrong. There are clear challenges, and also guidance that the Executive can follow in the coming weeks and months.

The SDLP welcomes the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister's acceptance of the report. I look forward to hearing, at the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, how the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister are going to deliver on some of their commitments in the forthcoming Programme for Government and the interim Budget.

Mr McNarry: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. Party Whips were informed at 11.50 am that the Minister of the Environment's statement on the Titanic Quarter, which had been scheduled for 12.30 pm, has been put back until 2.00 pm. I must express my appreciation for the advance notice. I am sure that the Minister has good reason to postpone her statement. However, to do so plays havoc with Members' schedules, particularly on a Tuesday, when Committees are in session. Mr Deputy Speaker, I ask that you raise the matter with the Speaker on the basis of respect for the workings of the House and its Members.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I have noted the Member's comments. He may wish to raise the matter with the Business Committee, which, as Members will be aware, has arranged to meet immediately upon the lunchtime suspension.

I, therefore, propose, by leave of the House, to suspend the sitting until 2.00 pm. Members should note that that is a change from the indicative timings that were issued. The sitting will resume at 2.00 pm.

The sitting was suspended at 12.18 pm.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT

Planning Application for Development at the Titanic Quarter, Belfast

The Minister of the Environment (Mrs Foster): I am delighted to announce that outline planning permission is to be granted for phase 2 of the Titanic Quarter development.

I am particularly pleased that a major planning application was processed in such a timely and efficient manner. The application was received at the turn of the year, validated in January, and has now been approved. That was possible because extensive pre-application discussions took place between the Planning Service and the co-promoter, Titanic Quarter Ltd and Belfast Harbour Commissioners. That work ensured that a good-quality application was submitted, and that it included the necessary environmental information.

In addition, throughout the processing of the application, my planners and the developer were in continual contact to ensure that issues were dealt with as they arose. That demonstrates, once again, that when an applicant submits a high-quality proposal, and works with the Planning Service, a timely result can be produced.

I congratulate all those who were involved in both the private and public sectors and, in particular, my own planners in the Belfast divisional planning office and strategic projects unit, who all worked together to make this result possible.

The proposed development is the largest application that has ever been dealt with by the Planning Service. It will provide approximately 3 million sq ft of new floor space in the centre of Belfast. It is a mixed-use development that will provide some 2,000 residential units, including both social and affordable housing. The development will include a mix of employment, leisure and tourism uses, with the latter centred on the Titanic signature project, which will showcase Belfast's maritime and industrial heritage. The development of the 16.5 hectare site, including the restoration of the Titanic and Olympic slipways, represents a further step in the development of the city.

A new quarter is being created close to the city centre that will not only be a source of employment, but will represent a very attractive living environment. As such, the project will be a means of drawing people back to live in the city and help to halt the decline in Belfast's residential population. The development will provide a significant contribution to the economy and the building industry, and will deliver long-term economic benefits to the whole of Northern Ireland. Today's announcement is a further indication that Northern Ireland really is leaving its troubled past behind and is now very much open for business.

Mr Weir: I congratulate the Minister on her statement, which is good news for Northern Ireland in general, and for Belfast, in particular. There have been worries, in the past — and accusations — that, sometimes, important planning decisions have been held up for a long time. The timely nature of the Minister's announcement, and the relatively quick time in which the project has been turned around does credit to the Department of the Environment. Can the Minister offer assurances that other such announcements will be dealt with in a timely fashion?

Mrs Foster: I hope that today's announcement is indicative of the way in which my Department and I, with our strategic unit, will progress. The planning application for phase 2 of the Titanic Quarter was the largest planning application ever submitted to the Planning Service. We hope to send a strong signal to potential investors in Northern Ireland that we can deal with applications of that magnitude, that we are capable and fit for purpose, and that we want to work closely with developers.

I wish to pay tribute to the developers because they engaged for a number of months with the Planning Service before submitting their application. The quality of that application meant that it could be dealt with very quickly.

Mr Ford: I add my congratulations to those of Mr Weir. This is extremely good news for people throughout Northern Ireland.

I have two questions for the Minister. First, she emphasised the timescale within which the application has been approved. However, can we be sure that, with 2012 being both an Olympics year and the centenary of the Titanic, we will maximise the tourism benefit of the scheme by that date? Secondly, in the context of the 2,000 residential units, will she work with the Minister for Social Development to ensure that the affordable and social housing is integrated, both geographically in the site and socially among the different groups in the community?

Mrs Foster: I thank the Member for his questions. In response to the latter, I am happy to work with the Minister for Social Development; indeed, she has already made approaches to me about the matter of social housing. This is an outline planning application, and therefore the reserved-matters application will follow. I am quite happy to work with the Social Development Minister in that regard.

As for the 2012 Olympics, my Department has shown that it is ready to play its part by the way in which it has turned this matter around. I hope that other Departments will follow suit. Of course, we all await the outcome of the bid for lottery funding, which we hope will be successful.

Mr Wells: Does the Minister agree that this is excellent news? The project is a classic brownfield-site development, involving the reuse of existing resources. Will she also accept that the announcement represents a remarkable achievement by strategic projects division, in that a complex application has been brought through the system at amazing speed? No doubt, announcements over the coming weeks will lead to a flood of planning applications. Will the Minister assure the House that she will continue to use that unit so that important regeneration projects of a regional scale will be brought through the system as quickly as possible to ensure that Northern Ireland remains at the forefront in attracting inward investment?

Mrs Foster: Those regional projects are precisely the type of scheme in which I want the strategic projects division to be involved. That will send out a clear signal to potential investors that Northern Ireland is ready and open for business.

I take on board the Member's comments about the reuse of a brownfield site. The project is innovative, and I hope that Members will have a chance to look at the plans. I also have some very good graphics of what is planned for the Titanic Quarter. This is a very exciting time for that area, and for the whole of Northern Ireland.

Mr P Maskey: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle, agus comhghairdeachas don Aire. I thank the Minister for her statement. I commend the work that the Planning Service has done on the development in conjunction with Titanic Quarter Ltd and Belfast Harbour Commissioners. Will the Minister assure the House that the Planning Service will act in the same manner in respect of developments in other parts of the city of Belfast, including the greater Castle Street area and other areas close to the north and west Belfast gateways, which, hopefully, will be included in the Belfast master plan?

Will the Minister also assure us that Belfast city centre is not being moved eastwards to the detriment of its current centre? We do not want to see the current city centre on the fringes of a great Titanic Quarter.

Mrs Foster: I am happy to tell the Member, who I know is also a Member of another place, that part of the good work of the planning application was the partnership approach that was adopted. Belfast City Council has been very much involved with, and supportive of, the planning application. That was most encouraging to the Planning Service and to the private-sector partners.

As for other developments in the city of Belfast, I think that I know to which one the Member refers. I ask him to take the opportunity to write to me about it. I understand, from my limited knowledge of that application, that it is a matter that cross-cuts with DSD (Department for Social Development). I am happy to look at that matter, if the Member wants to raise it with me.

Mr McKay: I welcome the fact that the application has been processed in a timely and efficient manner; it shows that the matter has been approached professionally. Will the Minister assure the House that the same openness, transparency and professionalism will be shown in dealing with all planning applications, particularly the one in respect of the Giant's Causeway visitors' centre?

Mrs Foster: I wondered how long it would take for the visitors' centre to be mentioned — I have not been disappointed. Article 31 applications are now subject to that procedure, and I intend for all those applications to come before the House. Similarly, when I have made up my mind on the Giant's Causeway application, I will appear before the House.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

Sustainable Development and Climate Change

Mr Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for this debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes to propose and 10 minutes for the winding-up speech. All other Members who speak will have five minutes.

One amendment has been selected and published on the Marshalled List. The proposer of the amendment will have 10 minutes to propose and five minutes for the winding-up speech.

Mr B Wilson: I beg to move

That this Assembly recognises sustainable development, in general, and climate change, in particular, as central to its considerations in all relevant areas of government, including opportunities to use local economic and technological innovation strategies to place Northern Ireland at the forefront of the emerging green economy in Europe.

The Assembly has both a responsibility and an opportunity to introduce measures to address climate change. We must ensure that this part of the UK plays its part in meeting the challenge set out in the Stern Report, which suggested that climate change threatens to be the greatest and widest-ranging market failure ever seen.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Molloy] in the Chair)

Our objectives must be to facilitate Northern Ireland's transition to a low-carbon economy and to create a region that is resilient in the face of three of the most serious global issues: the environmental challenge; the energy security challenge; and the economic challenges and opportunities that climate change, energy security and a low-carbon economy present.

The Green Party's vision for a low-carbon economy extends across all Departments. Every sector and every citizen can understand it, embrace it and contribute to that vision. It is essential that the Executive introduce a climate change Bill in response to the UK's draft climate change Bill, which was published in March 2007. A regional Bill would set out Northern Ireland's plans to integrate fully energy security, climate change and sustainable development into every Department's responsibility. The Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister (OFMDFM) would oversee that.

My party supports the establishment, under the auspices of the Sustainable Development Commission, of a high-level climate change and energy task force, with NGO participation, to advise OFMDFM on the contents of any regional climate change Bill and to monitor progress across sectors that include the Government estate, procurement, and staff transport schemes.

The Green Party proposes a minimum of 60% reduction in greenhouse gases by 2050, and that should include provision for annual targets and reports on performance and the measures taken. Moreover, we call for the introduction of a carbon-trading scheme across the Northern Ireland Civil Service. Such a scheme would ration the ability to pollute. Individual officers and sections would be forced to cap and trade permits if they wished to exceed annual allocations. That would assist the public sector in reaching its goal of becoming carbon neutral by 2015.

Sustainable development does not simply involve environmental considerations. It has profound economic and social impacts and opportunities, and those must be taken into account. Northern Ireland has a growing economy that has changed from heavy industry to service industries. Energy consumption, especially of natural gas, is rising. We are at the end of a very long natural-gas pipeline, and both security of supply and cost make us vulnerable.

Northern Ireland is one of the most car-dependent regions not only in the UK but in Europe. Electricity generation is predominantly fossil fuel-based. However, Northern Ireland, together with the rest of Ireland and Scotland, has some of the best potential for renewable energy development, particularly from on- and offshore wind and wave energy.

The Executive need to show leadership in tackling climate change and ensuring energy security through the use of renewables, as the coalition Governments in the Republic and in Scotland have done; members of the Green Party and the Scottish Green Party have played a leading role.

2.15 pm

Mr S Wilson: I noticed the Member's comments about renewable energy. Does he not accept, however, that some of the greatest opponents of wind farms are members of the Green Party? They object to such farms being set up offshore, for example, because of the effects that they have on wildlife. On the one hand, the Green Party claims to promote renewable energy, but when such projects are proposed, its members are the first to jump up and down.

Mr B Wilson: I take the Member's point. Some members of the Green Party take that attitude, but officially, and as far as I am concerned, the more important priority is to create energy security through renewables.

Unfortunately, our planning system does not seem to be responding to the challenges and opportunities that the development of an indigenous renewable energy industry affords. Some wind-farm planning applications have been waiting for approval for up to four years. That is unacceptable, and I ask the Minister of the Environment to expedite those applications. Given the seriousness and urgency of the need to respond to climate change and to ensure energy security, the planning process needs to facilitate, rather than hinder, the development of renewable energies such as wind and biomass. Planning guidance should be drawn up to facilitate and encourage the greater deployment of renewable energy.

The Executive can help to develop the use of renewable energy in other ways. For example, research and development on renewable energy should be at the heart of both universities so that they become centres of excellence. Initiatives such as Queen's University's institute for a sustainable world, which has a strong focus on renewable energy, should be welcomed.

We should consider introducing an integrated all-Ireland energy policy based on renewables. The developing single market in electricity should be structured in such a way as to allow renewable energy sources to integrate fully. The 2020 vision study, which is currently being managed by Action Renewables, will review the renewable energy potential of the two electricity networks and consider how that can be developed in the coming decade.

We should also support those in Northern Ireland who carry out pioneering work in renewable energy: Thermomax in North Down provides tubes for solar heating; Copeland provides scroll compressors for most of the heat pumps that are sold in Europe; Newmills Hydro makes hydro turbines and exports them across the world; and B9 Energy Services is the third-largest wind-farm company in the world. Harland and Wolff is a leader in tidal energy and wind turbines. Those companies are under threat from competition in the Far East and will need to continue to put efforts into research and development in order to maintain their position as world leaders, and we should help them to do so.

We should also be looking at newbuilds to encourage developers and home builders to make greater use of renewable energy. New homes should be constructed to the highest energy efficiency standards, with renewable energy integrated to provide heat and power where possible. We can learn from the recent initiatives in the Republic — my party colleagues John Gormley and Eamon Ryan recently introduced legislation that requires greater energy efficiency in newbuilds. Similar green building regulations need to be implemented in Northern Ireland.

We should also ensure that Government and the Assembly take the lead on a programme of renewable energy installations on the Government estate. The Northern Ireland Executive must walk the talk on renewable energy.

The SIB (Strategic Investment Board) is spending billions of pounds on buildings such as schools and other public facilities that will be around for the next 50 to 100 years. Now is the time to ensure that the SIB's board includes experts and champions of sustainable development and low-carbon technologies, most notably those in the building sector.

The scale of the public sector in Northern Ireland is such that change exerts a massive influence on supply chains through staff and families in the region.

Significant opportunities exist for Northern Ireland to champion the UK's sustainable procurement programme in the public sector and to act as a location for experimentation.

The implementation plan for our local sustainable development strategy requires integration, regular monitoring, and clear targets across Government as a whole. Climate change is a key theme throughout the UK and Northern Ireland sustainable development strategies, and tackling it provides a practical way in which to make sustainable development real.

Although Government must take a lead on sustainable development and tackling climate change, they cannot do everything. The business and the community and voluntary sectors have an important role to play. For example, the Government and the voluntary sectors have a partnership role to fulfil in advising local councils and Government bodies on the implementation of sustainable development programmes.

In conclusion, the Green Party calls for the entire Executive to take ownership of the energy-security and climate-change agendas and of response mechanisms. It is a popular Green saying that we do not inherit the earth from our parents but borrow it from our children. For the sake of our children and grandchildren, we must move quickly if we are to provide clear leadership on sustainable development in Northern Ireland and make the transition to a low-carbon society.

Mr McGlone: I beg to move the following amendment: After "Europe", insert

"; calls for the full implementation of 'First Steps, the Sustainable Development Strategy for Northern Ireland'; and calls on the Executive to ensure that environmental commitments on sustainable development and tackling climate change are mainstreamed in the Programme for Government".

Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank and pay tribute to Mr Wilson, both for tabling the motion and for his comprehensive contribution.

Climate change and the need to grow in a sustainable way are two of the most immediate global challenges that we face. The intention of the amendment, which I believe supports the motion, is to ensure that urgent action be taken to mainstream the principles of sustainable development and the need to tackle climate change throughout Government. The best way in which to ensure that that happens is for all relevant Departments to have dedicated commitments in the Programme for Government. We should build on the good initiatives that we have in the North, such as the environment and renewable energy fund, in order to establish the North as a leader in green energy.

Sustainable development has been defined as development that meets the needs of the present without compromising the ability of future generations to meet their own needs.

That principle is at the core of the SDLP's thinking and ideology. Sustainable development is a big idea that is underwritten by our biggest ambitions. It is a concept, the realisation of which will require from all people, at all levels, the most fundamental of social, economic, environmental and cultural shifts.

The challenge of sustainable development provides us with fundamental choices. We must choose between embracing the ideals of sustainable development and rejecting them; between respecting what we have, what we want and what we owe to others and refusing to meet our responsibilities; and between closing the gap between rich and poor and widening it further, which would destabilise this world and further disadvantage so many of its citizens. We must set about transforming sustainable development from being honourable in its intentions to tangible in its achievements.

The sustainable development strategy, 'First Steps towards Sustainability', was launched under direct rule in May 2006. It provides a way forward, but we have many questions to ask of it. What are the roles of the departmental sustainable development champions? How many times have they met? What achievements have there been? How close are the Government to meeting their targets? Are we educating our young people on sustainable development? How are the principles of sustainable development getting through to people on the ground? Effective implementation and leadership from Government are needed so that the principles of sustainable development can be enshrined in all aspects of Government policy-making and factored into the choices that we make daily.

The wider community must be engaged in order to ensure that local businesses, local government, the voluntary sector, and the public all play their part. Meaningful sustainable development actions and targets must be monitored and met. Cross-departmental working is required on all those issues. Government must take the lead in promoting sustainable development in all their strategies, but particularly in their transport and energy strategies. In fact, where better to mainstream sustainable development than in the Programme for Government?

As we see from media reports, evidence of man-made contributions to climate change is everywhere — the scientific evidence is overwhelming. Average worldwide temperatures have risen by more than 0.6°C in the past century. Around the North, sea levels are rising to the extent that they are now about 10 cm higher than they were in 1990.

If there is a failure to act, the consequences of climate change will be devastating locally and catastrophic globally. Sustainable development and combating climate change are not merely about meeting global commitments but about ensuring that a viable planet remains for future generations — a point that Mr Wilson made most articulately. Therefore, the Government must ensure that the concepts that I have outlined are deeply enshrined in policy-making, and the best way for that to be done is through the Programme for Government.

Alas, a LeasCheann Comhairle, we live way beyond our environmental means. I ask the House for its support. Moliam an leasú.

The Chairperson of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister (Mr Kennedy): I am pleased to speak in a debate that provides a welcome opportunity to highlight the importance of sustainable development. In 2006, the Secretary of State published 'A Sustainable Development Strategy for Northern Ireland: First Steps Towards Sustainability' and 'A Positive Step: Northern Ireland: A Sustainable Development Implementation Plan'. My Committee has an interest in the subject because, since the summer of 2006, the economic policy unit in OFMDFM has been responsible for taking the lead on the co-ordination of a cross-cutting policy on sustainable development.

To date, the Committee's engagement with OFMDFM has focused on work to produce a set of sustainable development indicators. I will concentrate my remarks on those indicators, because the Executive will use them when they report publicly on progress towards sustainable development in Northern Ireland.

The Committee welcomes the proposal to produce a clear set of indicators that will enable actions to be monitored and information to be made widely available on how good, or not, progress is towards the targets. Many of the proposed indicators will facilitate a comparison with the indicators used to measure sustainable development in the UK. That will enable any progress to be benchmarked against that of the UK.

The wide range of indicators covers areas such as: community relations; economic well-being; the sustainability of rural communities; the amount of waste sent to landfill sites; water consumption; greenhouse gas emissions; air quality; and biodiversity. That holistic approach, which reflects the fact that sustainable development is about more than purely environmental issues and concerns, is appropriate and necessary. That is backed up by the fact that OFMDFM, rather than the Department of the Environment, now has responsibility to support the strategic oversight of the implementation of the strategy.

When the Committee examined the proposed indicators, it considered information on the Northern Ireland sustainable development position since 2001-02, and the picture is not good. Most indicators show either no improvement or a worsening of the position. Significant actions and improvement are required in order for Northern Ireland to become more sustainable. Some areas have improved: for example, the amount of municipal waste going to landfill sites has decreased by 10% since 2001; the recycling and composting of waste has more than doubled; and air quality is generally good, and it is improving.

In other areas, the picture is bleak. There has been little change in the use of different modes of transport. The Northern Ireland population's heavy reliance on private cars for travel has clear implications for longer-term sustainability. The amount of fossil fuels being used to create energy has not changed much. Fewer rivers are of good biological quality now than in 2000. Although the population of common wild birds is increasing, many rare bird species are in decline.

Although some 35% of the population live in rural communities, rural residents — and particularly pensioners — often live in greater poverty and have to travel much further to avail of essential services such as dentists, doctors and clinics.

2.30 pm

Also of concern is the fact that although a percentage of the population is aware of the phrase "Reduce, reuse, recycle", awareness of the concept of sustainable development and what individuals can do to make a difference is low. Although it is necessary to have in place strategies, action plans, indicators and monitoring arrangements, they are a means to an end — action is what is important.

My Committee will closely monitor OFMDFM's performance on both the delivery of the action points for which it is responsible and its support for the overall implementation and communication of the sustainable development strategy. The other statutory Committees also have an important role to play with regard to their Departments, and we have written to them to encourage them to put monitoring arrangements in place. We broadly support the motion.

Mr Moutray: I support the motion and the amendment.

The global surface temperatures in 11 of the past 12 years have been among the warmest since the mid-1800s. Over the past 50 years, the rate of warming has been nearly twice that of the previous 100 years, and man bears a great responsibility for a proportion of that. There is far more carbon dioxide in the atmosphere nowadays. Carbon dioxide does not dissipate quickly; it remains in the atmosphere for about five decades. There is also more water. However, that is not the case everywhere. While there has been more precipitation in parts of North America, South America, northern Europe and elsewhere, places such as the Mediterranean and southern Africa have become drier.

The sea level is rising. Indeed, geological observations suggest that the rise in the sea level over the past 2,000 years was less than that occurring at present. If the sea level continues to rise at the current rate, places such as the Maldives, 99% of which is 1.5 m above sea level, will disappear. Glaciers are melting, and the Arctic is warming. More and more animal species face the threat of extinction. Those facts cannot be ignored.

The reason why man-made greenhouse effects are such a problem is that, in the long term, the earth must remove energy at the same rate that it receives energy from the sun. A thicker blanket of greenhouse gases serves to reduce the earth's ability to do that, which results in a warming of the climate. The ramifications are stark, and among them are the long-term risk of higher temperatures and a warmer atmosphere retaining more water, resulting in heavier rain, higher winds and less drinking water. Higher temperatures will also mean that disease-carrying insects will have a much wider distribution area, as the recent bluetongue scare demonstrated.

I know that other Members will want to mention other relevant facts about this matter, so I will move on to sustainability. Sustainable development has been described as development that is designed to meet the needs of the present without compromising the ability of future generations to meet their needs. Future vulnerability depends not only on climate change, but on the type of development that is pursued. Sustainable development can reduce the world's vulnerability. However, if we are to improve seasonal climate forecasts, food security, freshwater supplies and famine alerts, early action is necessary — not talk, resolutions and good intentions. To delay is to put us all at further risk.

Mr McKay: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I welcome the debate, and I thank Brian Wilson for bringing the motion to the House. I support the motion and the amendment.

Sinn Féin recognises that sustainable development represents social progress for everyone, high stable levels of economic growth and employment, effective protection of the environment and prudent use of natural resources. To achieve that end, we must also be mindful of the need to conserve biological diversity, and such diversity must be fully integrated into our policy-making.

Climate change must remain at the top of the political agenda. As it is a key theme throughout the sustainable development strategy, there is a clear need for climate change targets to be broken down for Departments and public authorities in such a way that they are left in no doubt as to their roles and responsibilities. In addition, monitoring and assessment will be vital if we are to ensure that Departments and public authorities take sustainable development seriously and that the targets that have been set out are met. Sustainable development should be a cross-cutting theme in the Programme for Government.

My party believes that the Executive should develop a separate Bill that sets statutory targets informed by Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment research. The Bill should include a mechanism for reporting to the Executive and the Assembly. Furthermore, the Department of the Environment should be encouraged to explore the development of an all-Ireland approach to climate change. Sinn Féin believes in the setting of carbon-reduction targets. However, those targets should await the results of, and be informed by, the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment's research.

Although carbon emissions have been decreasing elsewhere, they have been increasing here. We need to understand why that has happened and how we can deal with those increases. The Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment must break the link between economic development and greenhouse gas emissions, and fulfil its commitment to meet that challenge.

The stated aim of the sustainable development strategy is to establish a set of overarching indicators against which socio-economic and environmental progress can be measured. If we are to make real progress in measuring sustainable development, the strategy must include indicators for employment, workless households, child poverty, pensioner poverty, education, health, inequality and social justice. It is clear, therefore, that sustainable development is not only a green issue but is much broader than that. Social development also plays a large part in assisting sustainable development.

Our current way of life is simply not sustainable, and if we do not address the problem now, the well-being and quality of life of the next generation will suffer greatly. The sooner that we wake up to that reality, the better. Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle.

Mr Shannon: Global warming is a fact — that is our starting point. The oft-heard joke about the weather in Northern Ireland is that we could do with some global warming, but the issue affects Northern Ireland as much as it does any other place.

Mention was made across the Chamber about the rising sea level. I heard a figure of 9 cm being mentioned, but my information is that it is closer to 10 cm, and continuously rising. I am lucky in that I live on a hill at the edge of Strangford Lough. I am not building a boat, nor do I own one.

In 2005, nine days in December were hotter than any day in the preceding summer. Indeed, we witnessed more changes this summer. There are other seemingly inexplicable events that are all too easily explained. The fact that we do not have scorching weather all the time does not mean that we will not feel the effects of global warming or, more importantly, that we are not adding to the problem.

That is not new information to the Assembly. None here will be shocked by the statistics. We already have strategies in place to reduce carbon dioxide emissions and to help us begin to rely on renewable energies. A mere 3% of the energy that is used in the Province comes from renewable energy sources. That must increase to 40%, and we have in place the beginnings of works to see that target realised. Northern Ireland has the strongest potential for wind power in the whole of Europe. Although we have begun to explore wind power as a source of energy, we are nowhere near where we could be with it.

Mr S Wilson: Will the Member give way?

Mr Shannon: I am loath to give way to my colleague, because I suspect that he is full of mischief.

Ther er kumpanies whau er makin tha yuis o' tha available power an hae taking steps in makin guid cleen energy. Yin example o' sic aa' firm is Airtricity, whau yuis wun-terbine farms tae mak energy. I signed up the Airtricity maesel fer my constituency oafish in an effirt tae dae whut aa' cud tae help those kumpanies whau er bein environmentally freenly in helping Norlin Airlan. An in tha en aa' hae been tha yin tae benefit – as aa' hae lectic licht an heet which is faur cheaper than tha bills aa' paid oot afore. Followin oan helping oot no only Norlin Airlan environmentally but savin mony as weel.

Companies such as Airtricity, which uses wind-turbine farms, are currently making use of the available renewable power and taking strides in producing environmentally clean energy. I signed up to Airtricity in my constituency office in an attempt to support companies that help the environment in Northern Ireland. In the end, I have benefited, because the electricity supplied to me is cheaper than the bills that I paid before. I am helping Northern Ireland on the environmental stage and saving money, which may have something to do with the Ulster Scot in me.

Farms in Fermanagh are doing an exemplary job in service provision, and the relevant authorities should do all that they can to grant planning permission to businesses in locations that can provide energy from wind turbines. I know that that desire is shared by my colleague Arlene Foster.

Although we must increase our renewable energy output to 40%, it does not all have to be done by wind turbines. My fair constituency of Strangford is at the cutting edge of new technology, while appreciating and making the most of the beauty of Strangford Lough. I am sure that Members are aware of the fact that the world's largest tidal-current generator is currently being tested in Strangford Lough and that it will have the capacity to generate 1.2 megawatts of energy, which will supply over 1,000 homes with sustainable energy and make the most of our natural capabilities. The test will be carried out for five years and will establish the benefit of the generators, which are submerged some 3 m under the lough and a cable will then run from the generator to a substation.

We are all trying to play our part in electricity provision and are aware of the television advertisement that encourages us to reduce, reuse and recycle. Brown and blue bins abound — over 30,000 of them were issued recently in Newtownards. Children are taught about recycling in schools and in Tesco and other major supermarkets, customers are reminded to reuse plastic bags. The message is reinforced at every turn. It is the duty of the Assembly and departmental heads to ensure that the drive is strengthened and that each Department plays its full part in turning all the plans that have been laid before us into actions.

As always, Northern Ireland has the ability to shine, and it is up to the Assembly to ensure that we shine in this age so that generations to come can enjoy the beauties of the nation in the way that we can today, untainted by global warming and destructive climate changes. I support the motion and, I suspect, the amendment.

Mr W Clarke: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I also welcome the debate, and I thank the Member for tabling the motion.

One of the main aspects of combating climate change is the creation of sustainable energy. If we are serious about tackling global warming and climate change, we must consider ways of developing renewable energy sources in Ireland. A key to that is the harnessing of clean, green energy that has the potential to provide a safe and affordable alternative to nuclear energy and inefficient coal-fired power stations. The Kyoto protocol commits the developed world to begin action to combat climate change, and industrialised countries have agreed legally binding targets to reduce their combined greenhouse gas emissions.

Biofuels and wind farms can go a long way towards helping Ireland to meet its carbon dioxide reduction targets. The Executive must consider future investment into hydrogen technology. The fact that the Six Counties is currently partitioned from the South of Ireland is something that the Executive must consider seriously when attempting to address the issues of sustainable development. The situation can create difficulties and present opportunities. We must examine sustainability issues on an all-Ireland basis. We must work with our colleagues in the South's Environmental Protection Agency to develop an all-island ecological footprint. For example, large companies are currently exempt from complying with EU regulations on carbon emissions. The introduction of legislation, such as a carbon tax, would go some way to regulating companies that pollute the atmosphere.

Government policies in the North seem to promote an increase in the use of incinerators as an alternative to landfills. That approach is neither sustainable nor eco-friendly. We must consider ways of funding the establishment of an all-Ireland waste-management strategy, including an island-wide drive to research and establish markets for reclaimed materials. In order to benefit from economies of scale, while at the same time pursuing our sustainable development objectives, we have to put in place a co-ordinated approach with our counterparts in the South of Ireland. That is particularly true of environmental protection, where issues such as river basin management, air quality, waste and biodiversity do not stop at the border. There is already a good deal of liaison and co-operation in those areas.

Departments, public bodies, district councils, business and the public must all contribute to progress through leadership, product design, exercising their purchasing power to reduce waste generation and developing sustainable markets for their products.

There is no point in taking all our recycled material across the world as it defeats the purpose and the desire of the public to reduce our carbon footprint. The development of new technologies such as gasification and pyrolysis systems, both of which have proven success rates throughout Europe, must now be seriously considered as an alternative way of harnessing our natural resources. Sustainable development is a concept which, because of its wide-ranging and cross-cutting nature, is difficult to define, and even harder to put into practice.

2.45 pm

The most widely known international definition of sustainable development is development that meets the need of the present without compromising the ability of future generations to meet their own needs.

In principle, that involves safeguarding existing resources and using them to enhance the long-term management and investment in human, social and environmental resources in a sustainable way. I reiterate the obvious but important point that pollution does not recognise political borders. Environmental problems cannot be partitioned, so it makes no sense to partition our responses to them. One of the guiding principles of sustainable development is to ensure a strong, healthy and just society. Moving to a sustainable economy will help us to drive forward the social progress needed to reduce deprivation and inequality and to improve the quality of life for everyone while protecting the environment and its resources.

Mr Wells: This is perhaps one of the most important debates that the Assembly will have, yet the turnout is poor. As one would expect, the usual zealots are here. The Deputy First Minister is with us because he has been compelled to be here. There is the odd philistine here too, but, apart from that, who else has turned up?

It is a poor reflection on the importance that the Assembly places on such an issue. Brian Wilson has proposed a motion on sustainable development and climate change, yet few Members are willing to participate in the debate.

If everyone in the world were to use resources at the rate that we in Northern Ireland use them, we would need four planets to sustain ourselves. That is the stark reality. We are using resources in this part of the United Kingdom at a phenomenal rate. Willie Clarke can blame many things for global warming, but I do not think that he can blame partition — that is going a little too far.

Northern Ireland has a greater environmental footprint than many west African countries. We have a smaller population, but we are using energy at a phenomenal rate. Energy use and private transport use in Northern Ireland are rising rapidly. We love our cars. We do not want to drive to the shops — we want to drive into the shops. Unfortunately, the Province's record on sustainability is not good: we pay lip-service to it. We are almost like the gentleman who drives to the recycling centre in his 4x4 vehicle. We like to pay lip-service to sustainability, and when difficult decisions are being made, we are not at the top of the league. We must take urgent steps to reduce our use of the world's resources.

The Stern Report states that if we take steps now, in the long term, it will be the equivalent of reducing our GDP by 1%. That is a cost that we all could, and should, pay. I am happy to pay that cost: I am happy to reduce my living standard by 1% and I think that Members would be happy to do that. I do not think that that is much of a burden to pay.

If we are serious about sustainability, we, as an Assembly and as an Executive, must take some difficult decisions. Sustainability must be our top priority. Therefore, when difficult issues come before the Assembly and contradict that priority, we will have to bite the bullet and accept some sacrifices. It is unfortunate that the Member for Mid Ulster Mr McGlone is absent, because I take issue with a matter that he raised. He pays lip-service to sustainability, yet he is leading the campaign to bring down PPS14.

I seldom quote from a foreign country, but it has been calculated in the Irish Republic that single dwellings in the countryside generate an additional 12 million miles of needless travel per annum. If that figure were extrapolated to Northern Ireland, about two million extra miles of travel would be generated needlessly because of the proliferation of single dwellings in the countryside. How on earth could anyone who believes in sustainable development say that the answer to our problems is to have thousands more single dwellings in the countryside, with septic-tank problems, the utilisation of resources and the additional mileage all causing increases in greenhouse-gas emission.

Similarly, over the next few years, Members will probably be demanding new super four-lane bypasses around their towns, or a road similar to the Westlink running through their cities. If the choice is between building another Westlink and having greater investment in public transport, we will have to take the unpopular decision to put those resources into public transport.

We have to put our own house in order. The carbon footprint of this Building is enormous; it is one of the most energy-inefficient buildings in the United Kingdom. What is the Assembly doing to address that? Very little. We must not play lip-service to energy efficiency; instead we must take the difficult decisions. The only way that that can be done is as a united Assembly, so that when the flak comes — as it undoubtedly will — it will be aimed at all of us. Members cannot pick and choose what aspects of the environment they want to protect and what aspects of sustainability are acceptable. I will give way to the honourable Member.

Mr S Wilson: I did not ask the Member to give way. [Laughter.]

Mr Wells: I am sorry. I was shocked that I had managed to speak for four and a half minutes — on an issue that the honourable Member for East Antrim considers absolute heresy — without his intervening. I was also looking forward to the extra minute of speaking time, which I will not now have.

Mr McCallister: It is great to see such unity in the DUP. Poor old Sammy Wilson is not on message — he did not intervene during Mr Wells's speech. I am very fortunate — [Interruption.]

Would Mr Wilson like me to give way?

Mr S Wilson: Yes, but I will wait until the Member says something. [Laughter.]

Mr McCallister: I thought that the Member was getting in early.

I, like the previous two Members who contributed, am fortunate to represent the most beautiful part of Northern Ireland, the constituency of South Down. The reliance on the natural environment in South Down is more than a slogan — it is an economic reality. That illustrates why sustainable development cannot be a luxury, because without it our economic future will be harmed.

I take issue with Mr Clarke's comments; he used the usual Sinn Féin rhetoric about all-Ireland solutions. The issue is much bigger than that — it is about Northern Ireland playing its role in partnership with the rest of the UK and Europe. As Mr Wells mentioned, quite rightly, it is vital that we play our part and take those tough decisions that will not always be palatable.

Sustainable development concerns, perhaps chiefly, our responsibilities and obligations. All of us have a responsibility to maintain our beautiful landscape, economic resources and diverse natural environment for future generations.

Climate change poses the defining political challenge of our generation. The decisions that the Assembly takes will have fundamental consequences for the next generation. As the Stern Review indicates, the economic consequences of continued climate change are incredibly sobering.

The Stern Review states that the economic opportunities created by an appropriate response to climate change are also significant. The business community has already indicated that it is keen to harness the power of enterprise and the market to deliver a green economy. Working in partnership with the business community to that end should form the centrepiece of the Executive's approach to sustainable development and climate change.

Addressing the issue of climate change presents huge opportunities through agrienvironment schemes — the Agri-Food and Biosciences Institute at Hillsborough is doing good work on the issue of renewable energy. Therefore, there are opportunities for the Executive and the Assembly to grasp. Mr Shannon mentioned the tidal project at Strangford Lough. Also important are wind energy and willow biomass, and we can start to use the many other biofuels that can develop and, occasionally, flourish in Northern Ireland's climate. That will create opportunities for the agricultural sector, as well as develop science and technologies to take us forward.

Climate change is an important issue. I agree with Mr Wells that it is sad that there is such a poor turnout for a debate on one of the biggest issues that the Executive and Assembly will face.

I thank Mr Wilson for proposing the motion, which I support.

Mr Spratt: I thank the honourable Member for North Down Mr Wilson for proposing the motion. I am sure that Members agree that sustainable development and climate change are two of the biggest challenges facing the Assembly. As we seek to meet the needs of Northern Ireland in 2007, we must, at all times, remember that our actions now determine how sustainable development and climate change will be dealt with in 2070, and beyond. Critical to that is the protection and management of the environment. The environment is a vital resource, and it impacts on all aspects of life. The economy is also vital. For Northern Ireland to prosper, therefore, it is important to formulate a joined-up strategy in which the environment and the economy can be nurtured in a way that protects them to the benefit of everyone.

If I were to quote the mass of available statistics on our negative impact on the environment, I would well exceed the five-minute time limit. The effect of greenhouse gases, our changing climate and massive levels of waste are a few of the issues that threaten our sustainable development. However, there are many reasons to be encouraged by the progress that has been made in recent years. Businesses in Northern Ireland are increasingly implementing programmes through which they will reduce their impact on the environment and better manage their waste. Those companies find that they do not suffer financially by implementing those programmes.

More can be done, and as demand for energy increases, we must look at how our energy is produced to see whether our indigenous renewable resources are being utilised. It is pleasing that we, as representatives of Northern Ireland, can boast that Northern Ireland is at the cutting edge of developing renewable technology, and examples have been mentioned. Such initiatives as the technical advisory unit, which can assess the energy that is used and waste that is produced by businesses, are welcome, as is the green technology initiative. We must encourage the take-up of such initiatives as they can be of help to the financial well-being of those involved.

As we strive to make the Northern Ireland economy competitive on a global scale, we must ensure that, as its economy grows, it is environmentally sustainable. There will be occasions when there will be direct conflict between the environment and important economic decisions that will be vital to our economic development. Sometimes, there will be tough but necessary decisions to be made that may well put environmental issues secondary to matters relating to the competitiveness of Northern Ireland's economy. The Assembly must acknowledge that that will be the case, and, in some instances, Members must make hard decisions.

The House should unanimously endorse the motion. The economy and the environment are inextricably linked, and as we move to make our economy prosper, climate change should be in the forefront of Members' minds to ensure sustainable development for many generations. I support the motion and the amendment.

Mr S Wilson: In the three previous debates in which I have attempted to speak — during which, unionists have been in the Chair — I have not been called. Therefore, Mr Deputy Speaker, I must thank you for calling me. I want to break a wee bit of the cosy consensus that has arisen in the House today. I suppose that some of the greens will be seeing red by the time that I have finished.

There have been some assumptions made during the debate. For example, it has been said that the scientists who say that we are heading towards irreversible and disastrous global warming are to be believed.

There is a significant body of scientific opinion that states the opposite. That has not been mentioned.

3.00 pm

When I was at school, I won a prize for writing an essay on the horrors of global cooling and the impending ice age. The scientists of that time told us that the same gases that are now being blamed for heating up the earth were going to cool it, because the heat of the sun could not penetrate them. We are now being told that heat cannot escape. There has been a complete turnaround in 40 years. There is an assumption that only one set of scientists is right, even though there are others who are not in agreement with them.

The second assumption is —

Mr Ford: I presume that the Member will be able to show the House a detailed, peer-reviewed paper in a respected scientific journal that validates the point he has just made, since he is so certain.

Mr S Wilson: If I had more than 10 minutes, I would bore Members stiff with scientific evidence, but I want to get to the contradictions that I have heard in the House, which are more important.

Secondly, we are told that there is global warming, and that a catastrophe is about to happen, but the figures for the last 100 years show temperatures have risen by about 0.5°C. That is completely in keeping with the cycles that have been recorded in the past. It must not be forgotten that, 600 years ago, grapes were grown in the north of Scotland because the climate was so warm, and 200 years ago, people were able to skate on the river Thames in the winter because it was so cold.

We have been told today that people will have to totally change their lifestyles; that all kinds of taxes will have to be imposed on the public; that house building will have to change to make homes more eco-friendly, which builders reckon will add £40,000 to the price; that our whole investment pattern will have to change, as will the way in which we produce goods; and, as Mr Wells said, that world GDP will have to reduce by 1%, according to the Stern Review. On the other hand, some countries will have to be compensated, while others will have to make a much bigger contribution. Therefore, those figures are slightly misleading in respect of the impact on the developed world.

Let us quickly look at the contradictions, one of which I mentioned to Brian Wilson. On one hand, the environmentalists tell us to use more environmentally friendly ways of producing energy; on the other, it is feared that if we use wind power, seals or fish may get sucked into the turbines. When windmills are discussed, one opposition is that birds could be cut to pieces, and that, because they have to be on prominent sites, there is also a negative visual impact. As well as that, because wind power cannot be stored, it has to be backed up by expensive power stations fuelled by coal, oil, gas or nuclear power, because wind cannot be guaranteed when consumption is at its height.

Mr McGlone talked about sustainable development and how we should build houses in a way that would use the least energy for transport and infrastructure, but he supports people who want to build houses in the middle of the countryside. Not so long ago, the Assembly supported calls for affordable housing, but today a policy is being called for that will add £40,000 to the price of a house. Those are the type of contradictions that have been heard during today's debate, and in various other debates too.

There are simple things that can be done, and of course we should seek alternative sources of energy. We should not be dependent on high-risk and politically unstable areas, so alternatives must be sought. However, if we were to discuss nuclear power as an alternative method of producing power, I imagine that the proposer of the motion would be bouncing down the aisles of the House at the very thought. Nevertheless, that is one way of having energy diversity. I wonder whether the Assembly will consider it.

Mr Savage: I support the motion and the amendment. During the past 20 years, there has been a growing realisation that the current model of development is unsustainable. We are increasing the burden on our planet through lifestyle choices. The level of stress on resources and environmental systems such as water, land and air cannot be maintained, and, therefore, a process of sustainable development is required. A widely used and accepted international definition of sustainability is development that meets the needs of the present without compromising the ability of future generations to meet their own needs. We must be mindful of the generation coming after us.

In 2006, the then Secretary of State, Peter Hain, launched 'A Sustainable Development Strategy: First Steps Towards Sustainability', and the need for that report is evident today. The targets set out in the strategy could be achieved by encouraging and supporting the development of new industry, and renewable and alternative sustainable energy technologies. Targets could also be achieved by supporting projects to facilitate research into renewable energy technology. The Government were expected to develop their long-term approach to renewables continually and to ensure that the technology was available to encourage confidence and promote investment and innovation in cutting-edge sustainable energy technology.

My party believes that looking after our environment requires robust initiatives and policies. Good stewardship of the rural environment needs a partnership among the Executive, the Assembly, local government, local communities, and the business and agriculture sectors — a partnership in which commitment to a clean and healthy environment contributes to our quality of life.

Northern Ireland has a responsibility to work with the rest of the United Kingdom to address the environmental challenges that face our generation. The pressing and urgent challenge of climate change does, of course, require international initiatives. However, it also needs local action. Stewardship of Northern Ireland's environment is the responsibility of us all, and protecting our environment will secure opportunity and well-being for everyone.

It has been claimed that Northern Ireland has experienced some of the effects of global warming. Evidence for such a claim includes the fact that nine of the 15 warmest years recorded since 1841 have occurred since 1990. In 2005, for instance, nine days in December were hotter than in the preceding summer. The average sea level is now about 10 cm higher than it was in 1900, and over 40,000 properties are currently at risk of river flooding.

The 2006 Stern Review outlined a number of conclusions on climate change. It claimed that if immediate action were taken there would still be time to avoid the worst impacts of climate change. It argued that, through analysis of the research, one simple conclusion could be reached:

"the benefits of strong and early action far outweigh the economic costs of not acting."

The review estimated that the cost of ignoring the problems posed by climate change was significant; indeed, it would be the equivalent of losing at least 5% of global GDP each year, now and for ever. If a wider range of risks and impacts were considered, the estimates of damage could rise to more than 20% of GDP.

Sustainable development has wide-reaching effects. The time has come for the Assembly to give a lead in how we should proceed.

The Deputy First Minister (Mr M McGuinness): Thank you, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I have listened with great interest to what has been a varied debate. I assure the Member for South Down Mr Wells that I do not feel that I am a Minister compelled to be here to respond to the debate. I have a tremendous interest in this issue.

Aside from being "compelled" to come here, it was worth coming along just to hear Sammy Wilson in full voice. I have a friend from the Creggan Estate called "Knocker" Tierney. Following Sammy's defence of nuclear power, it would be apt to name him "Nuker" Wilson.

The points raised during the debate have highlighted how sustainable development impacts on a wide range of areas relevant to Government. Brian Wilson has done us a service by tabling the motion. The content of the motion, and some of those points raised, cover areas that are within the remits of individual Ministers. The Office of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister has the lead responsibility for sustainable development, and it is for that reason that I am responding to the motion. However, I am not in a position to give detailed responses to specific points relating to areas that are the responsibility of other Ministers. Therefore, I will confine my remarks to matters of a strategic or Executive nature.

The sustainability agenda attracts greater interest, at all levels of society, on an almost daily basis. Climate change has become a global concern and features predominately in the media. People here are fortunate to live in such a magnificent and varied environment, with a wealth of species and habitats. I am sure that Members would take issue with John McCallister's claim that south Down is more beautiful than the Sperrins, North Antrim, the lakes of Fermanagh or the walls of Derry. They are all significant assets, which help to define us and drive local economies by creating tourism and jobs. However, we cannot take all that for granted.

As in other parts of these islands, as Daithí McKay rightly said, we are losing biodiversity, which must be protected for our enjoyment and because of its importance to our way of life. That loss is one outward sign of the sometimes irreversible damage that we are causing.

The recognition that there is only one planet on which we rely for all our needs and that we are living beyond its capacity to provide for those needs is fundamental to sustainable development. However, sustainable development is about much more than the environment. The consequences and costs of living in an unsustainable fashion are interconnected and straddle the economy, society, and the environment, and this debate recognises that fact.

In this small region, we cannot solve global problems, but we can do something to help by reducing the use of traditional and polluting fossil fuels, seizing the opportunity to promote renewable and cleaner sources of energy and through the development of exportable and innovative technology.

The problems with waste and the need for greater resource efficiency mean that we must consider what we are consuming. Modern lifestyles have led increasingly to ours becoming a throw-away society in which, having invested so much to create new products, almost 70% of household waste is still being sent to landfill. In the long term, individuals must change their behaviour, and people must embrace sustainable living as a way of life. Demonstrating that by our actions and through the educators and the education system has huge potential to influence young people, and we must consider how to do that to the maximum effect.

The sustainable development agenda will affect all children and young people, and the Executive recognises that the education of those people — the business and political leaders of tomorrow — will be an important way to promote it. Sustainable development has been embedded firmly in the revised school curriculum as a key theme to be developed throughout primary and post-primary levels.

Pupils will explore issues such as environmental and climate change and the need to manage the impact of humans on the environment. They will come to understand the interdependence of society, the economy and the environment; to develop respect for the needs of present and future generations, and to act towards promoting an improved environment.

The revised curriculum also places greater emphasis on preparing children better for future employment. The new topic of learning for life and work will equip them with the knowledge and skills to become the entrepreneurs and innovators of tomorrow. There is also a greater emphasis on developing the skills that young people will need for the workplace, such as problem solving and creativity.

Progress has already been made in specific areas such as improving waste-management, where there has been significant investment in district-council civic-amenity sites for the collection and recycling of municipal waste, with the introduction of separate wheelie bins for different waste streams and kerb-side collections, all of which has led an increase in household waste-recycling from 5% in 1999 to 19% in 2005.

3.15 pm

Another example is the increase in the percentage of electricity that is derived from renewable sources. Since 2001–02, that has increased by 4.3%, and it now stands at 5.8%. That is a good start, but we need to go further.

Air pollution is decreasing. There has been a long-term reduction in the average number of air-pollution days; they reached an all-time low of only three days in 2006. That decrease is largely due to a reduction of particles and sulphur dioxide in the air. However, there has also been a long-term decline in nitrogen dioxide concentrations in urban areas since the early 1990s.

Sustainable development is built on the three pillars of economic growth, social progress and environmental protection. Each pillar is integrally linked to the others, and the effective pursuit of sustainable development requires a balanced approach that integrates all three components. That approach lies at the heart of Government's thinking on sustainable development and of their response to some of the elements of the challenging agenda.

Sustainable development is a global movement. Governments have been gradually moving the issue to centre stage for some time. The EU has set out its stall, and all member states were required to have a sustainable development strategy in place by June 2007.

Globally, the G8 group has become increasingly engaged — notably through the Kyoto protocol — with climate change, which is a major symptom of unsustainable living. As Jimmy Spratt argued correctly, climate change has emerged as a huge global challenge that has national and local implications, as evidenced by recent events. It is a challenge to which we must respond.

Although the Minister of the Environment has the lead responsibility for this important issue, it is clear that all Ministers must play their part. The Executive recently approved the extension of the Climate Change Bill to the North. A legislative consent motion will be brought before the Assembly to seek its consent to the Bill's extension after it is introduced in Westminster in November. Committing to that Bill will demonstrate that the Assembly is willing to play its part in tackling this global issue.

We must be in a position to assess better the trends in our emissions if we are to introduce specific CO₂ targets for here. We also need to understand more fully the relationship between the Government's economic competitiveness objectives and how they relate to emissions reductions. To that end, two pieces of research on those matters have been commissioned. Those are expected to be available in March 2008, when we can review the position again.

Following a recommendation in the Scotland and NI Forum for Environmental Research report, the NI Climate Change Impacts Partnership has been established to widen the understanding and knowledge of the impacts of climate change and the actions that are necessary to deal with it. The partnership consists of representatives from central and local government, the business community, the voluntary sector, and professional organisations.

As Daithí McKay argued, greenhouse gas emissions are particularly concerning. The latest figures show that our greenhouse gas and carbon dioxide emissions have decreased from 1990 levels by 6% and 4% respectively. Power stations and road transport remain the most significant emissions sources.

However, it is clear that the underlying message on emission levels varies considerably, given that last year's publication of the figures from 1990 to 2004 showed an increase from 1990 levels. We recently commissioned research to help to inform a better understanding of emissions here, and that should be available next March.

The first sustainable development strategy was published before restoration by the Secretary of State in May 2006. Its objectives are to help to secure a thriving, sustainable economy and prosperity and quality of life for all, combined with the creation of a healthy environment that is so essential to the health and well-being of our people.

The sustainable development strategy was followed by the first implementation plan, which was published in November 2006. The plan sets out in detail the specific targets and actions that every Department must achieve by March 2008. Indeed, Patsy McGlone argued for that. The plan seeks to ensure that the principles of sustainable development underpin all Departments' policy, operational and business processes.

The Executive recognise that they have the opportunity to influence a sustainable development agenda directly through their decisions and policies. We are currently in the process of developing our first Programme for Government. In relation to Patsy McGlone's amendment, we are fully committed to the overall principles of the sustainable development strategy.

The Executive want to ensure that the environmental commitments on sustainable development and tackling climate change are taken into account in the Programme for Government. In developing a further implementation plan to cover the period 2008-11, we will carefully review the targets in the sustainable development strategy in order to ensure that they are still appropriate.

The Executive hope to publish the Budget, the investment strategy and the Programme for Government later in the autumn. In the Programme for Government we will be setting out, for the first time, the Executive's priorities, and the Budget will provide details of the spending allocations to those priorities. We will also be publishing our public service agreements, which will set out the high-level objectives and targets that the Executive are seeking to achieve.

The Executive are working on a draft Programme for Government. As part of that work, we will consider how best sustainable development can be incorporated and how it can underpin all our activities. It is our intention to ensure that sustainable development is taken fully into account when we develop our policies.

I mentioned earlier that the implementation plan covers the period up to the end of March 2008. As I said, we intend to bring forward a new implementation plan, which will be aligned with the Budget years and cover 2008-11. The first implementation plan concentrated mainly on the actions of the various Departments. However, we recognise that Government alone cannot deliver the sustainable development agenda without the participation and involvement of other organisations and individuals. Therefore, it is our intention to widen the focus of the next plan to embrace other sectors.

Both the published strategy and the plan owe much to the ideas, contributions and involvement of the stakeholder group. The Executive want to continue to benefit from the knowledge and expertise of stakeholders, and we are considering how that can be best secured in the future.

The Strategic Investment Board, as a Government-owned company, has been working to embed sustainable development principles in its approach to the investment strategy and the individual projects that it contains — Brian Wilson referred to that in his contribution.

The Executive are fully committed to the principles of sustainable development, and we need to ensure that those principles underpin all our decision-making processes and become embedded in the day-to-day business of Government. We recognise that society needs to embrace sustainable living now to avoid an adverse impact on present and future generations.

The Executive are also conscious that there is a need to balance economic development with sustainability. We recognise the importance of achieving sustained economic growth — we will seek to do that in a balanced way, taking into account the long-term social and environmental consequences of our decision-making. We do not underestimate the challenges presented by this issue. Economic growth, social development, eradicating poverty and inequality, and reducing the environmental impact of society are not mutually exclusive policy goals.

The Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment is undertaking a project to investigate the business opportunities and challenges presented by carbon emission targets. The Department will also examine the appropriate policy response to adopt to ensure that businesses contribute to emission reductions and can fully capitalise on the opportunities presented by the emerging green economy.

A key target of the sustainable development implementation plan is to reduce the productivity gap between here and the rest of these islands. One of the main areas of action relates to innovation. The research facilities in the universities also have a major role to play in supporting the innovation agenda and can address many aspects of sustainable development.

The green economy is an emerging issue, and one which the Executive do not intend to overlook. Economic activities related to the environment have the potential to contribute £573 million to the economy here and to support 32,750 full-time-equivalent jobs.

Danny Kennedy highlighted the importance of agreeing indicators so that we can measure progress towards sustainable development. The Executive plan to agree and publish, by the end of this year, a set of overarching indicators covering a range of key issues.

Willie Clarke argued for the need for an all-Ireland approach to this issue. The Executive's approach is that, where mutually beneficial, we will sensibly work with the Irish Government on an all-island basis across a range of issues, including sustainable development.

As an Executive we need to play our part to minimise the impact of climate change —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Minister's time is up.

Mr A Maginness: This has been an interesting debate, from the zealot to the more bizarre contributions from the DUP Benches.

I look at Jim Shannon, not because his ideas are bizarre or because he is a zealot, but because he brings common sense to the debate. He summed up the situation most deftly in his assertion that global warming is now established as a scientific fact.

There is an old canard that says that weather is variable, has been for centuries and, indeed, since time began. However, the reality is that those variables are exacerbated by the way in which we use our environment. To say that, since the weather changes, those changes would happen anyway, is incorrect. They would not.

That is why one welcomes the motion. Mr Brian Wilson's motion highlights the need for us to commit ourselves to sustainable development. The Deputy First Minister has shown that the Executive and the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister are committed to that. The amendment was tabled simply to strengthen Mr Wilson's motion. It puts the commitment to sustainable development into the mainstream of the Programme for Government. That is important, and I am glad that the Deputy First Minister is here to ensure that the message is relayed to the Executive and that action on this issue is mainstreamed. Throughout the debate, many Members have recognised and supported the need for such action to be prioritised.

The SDLP fully supports Mr Brian Wilson's motion, and he has done the Assembly a great service by greening all our politics, even on the DUP Benches — perhaps more so on the DUP Benches than in other parties — apart from the hapless Sammy Wilson. Having heard his comments, I felt that I should invite him to join the Flat Earth Society. I am sure that it would welcome him with open arms.

Sammy Wilson argued, in futile fashion, that there is little need to do anything in the present circumstances, but anyone with a titter of wit knows that we have to build for the future. We have to preserve our environment for our children and give them an inheritance of worth.

However, all of us contradict what we try to do. We drive the wrong cars; we do the wrong things.

Mr Wells: The Member is seated beside the biggest contradiction of all — the Member with whom he proposed the amendment. I speak of the Member to his right, not to his left. Mr McGlone claims to protect the countryside and the environment, yet he leads the campaign to concrete over the countryside with tens of thousands of concrete monstrosities, in the form of bungalows.

Mr A Maginness: I take it that the Member refers to Mr McGlone, rather than to Mr Ford.

Mr McGlone's opposition to PPS 14 is reflected in the almost universal opposition to that measure that prevails throughout the House. Members oppose it because of the way that it was introduced and the way that it ineptly tackles the problem of unrestricted development in the countryside. Mr McGlone, my colleagues and other Members do not support unrestricted development, but they are opposed to the inept manner in which the direct rule Minister introduced proposals that, overnight, inflated land prices and deprived young people and others of the opportunity to buy affordable homes in rural areas.

There is a need for a new policy that includes reasonable restrictions. I will not go into that matter because my time is nearly up.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr A Maginness: Am I allowed another minute for the intervention?

Mr Deputy Speaker: You have used it. [Laughter.]
3.30 pm

Mr Ford: It is difficult to respond to a debate on which there is complete unanimity in the Chamber — with the exception of the East Antrim joker. It is a pleasure to have that measure of agreement, but perhaps I will manage to introduce a bit of controversy as I continue.

In proposing the motion, Brian Wilson highlighted the three challenges with which we are faced: the environmental, economic and energy-security challenges. Those points were taken up in various ways by other Members.

Early in the debate, Stephen Moutray stated the facts about climate change, for the benefit of those who had not heard them. It was notable that Jimmy Spratt was one of the few people who took up the issue of energy security, which comprises the second half of the motion. Although Mr McAllister linked the economy to the environment, let us be clear that South Down is not the most beautiful constituency in Northern Ireland, but one of the 18 most beautiful.

Mr McCarthy: Strangford.

Mr McNarry: That is right.

Mr Donaldson: We could hold a debate on that.

Mr Ford: That response highlights the quality of the environment across the whole of Northern Ireland, which we must protect. The responsibility for that lies at various levels. The Deputy First Minister highlighted the responsibilities that lie with Europe, the sovereign Governments, the Executive, and local district councils. However, as George Savage pointed out, we must ensure that responsibility for sustainability is carried out in partnership across society, particularly among statutory bodies and the voluntary sector. Much of the expertise that we need lies with certain major NGOs. The grass-roots presence of many local community bodies who work on sustainability also contributes to improving the situation for everyone.

On one level, the problem is that people are overwhelmed by the evidence of the need for change, and feel that they can do little. However, it is clear that when the evidence for how change can be achieved is presented, and the indicators are clarified, as Danny Kennedy said, people will see that there is an opportunity to make worthwhile change.

For that reason, we need not only grand, broad-brush vision statements, but focused targets for various sectors of government and business, so that the global sustainability targets can be broken down into meaningful targets. Certain indicators that have been highlighted for energy, waste or biodiversity demonstrate the areas of responsibility in which individuals can and should take action.

Jim Wells remarked that Northern Ireland dwells in a three-planet economy; however, as an individual region, Northern Ireland is part of a four-planet economy — which shows how much needs to be done, despite the sceptical voices that have been raised.

The Deputy First Minister raised the key issue that we do not yet have full information on CO₂ emissions. Much more monitoring and assessment must be done, and it is somewhat tragic that a report published by the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister last year was named 'First Steps towards Sustainability'. One would have thought that, by 2006, we would be further down than the line than taking first steps.

Having been so far behind, Northern Ireland has an enormous amount of catching up to do. A point that was made by Daithí McKay bears repeating: sustainability should be recognised as a key cross-cutting theme in every Department, as well as a primary responsibility for the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister.

Every Department must accept and carry out its responsibilities on sustainable development, and those must feature in the Programme for Government.

The motion was put forward to give the House the opportunity to debate sustainable development and climate change; to make it clear that those issues must be dealt with urgently; and to urge the Executive to ensure that the Programme for Government takes action, rather than to pay lip-service to the issues or use a fig leaf to cover them.

The debate emphasised that there are clear potential benefits for the economy if action is taken; particularly, but not exclusively, in energy generation. I believe that that point was made by Jim Shannon during his contribution in English, and by Willie Clarke. Some Members believe that the Assembly must play its role as part of the United Kingdom — I notice that that applied to the Deputy First Minister when he referred to the Climate Change Bill — and others wish to see that action taken on an all-Ireland basis. At least, let the House accept that it must be done in both contexts. The Assembly has responsibility for Northern Ireland, but it can form partnerships, North and South and east and west. We should not play border politics with such issues: they affect all of us in different ways.

I want to comment on Alban Maginness's winding-up speech on the amendment, and on the lone voice of scepticism from Sammy Wilson. Climate change is happening. No one denies that — not even the sceptics. Direct correlation between climate change and carbon dioxide production is a fact. There is also a clear correlation between global industrialisation and carbon dioxide production. If Sammy Wilson chooses to read the theories of a tiny minority of people who are not accepted by the reputable academic community, he should not bring such views into the Chamber and try to put them across as serious argument, rather than as cheap nonsense. He is good at doing so, and has excelled himself today.

As I said, there are huge opportunities for Northern Ireland, particularly in the renewable energy sector. The Deputy First Minister highlighted that, although progress has been made, 5% of energy must come from renewable sources. A vast amount of work must be done in order for that to be achieved. It is heartening that the Minister was able to report positive movement in several areas — work that is being done in education; improvements in waste recycling; renewable energy statistics; and reduction in air pollution — all of which are welcome.

The Deputy First Minister has given the Executive's specific commitment to introducing a legislative motion on the Climate Change Bill and on Northern Ireland's responsibilities in that regard. That is a key part of tackling the issues. Furthermore, he acknowledged that, for example, statistics on carbon dioxide emissions are not available. Clearly, a vast amount must still be done if people are to play their roles as citizens of the world; whether they regard themselves as citizens of the UK or of Ireland. In the context of sustainable development and climate change, everyone is a citizen of the world.

This week, a constituent of mine is doing a sponsored run around Lough Neagh for a Third-World charity. There is little point in someone taking such individual initiative to help those in greater need if our four-planet lifestyles contribute to the difficulties that those people encounter. The Assembly must ensure that action is taken on that.

I welcome the amendment standing in the names of Patsy McGlone and Alban Maginness. It amplifies and clarifies the original thrust of the motion. I trust that not only will there be wholehearted support for the motion and the amendment in the House, but that Members will accept their responsibilities as citizens, in the House and in the Committees, to ensure that the Deputy First Minister's commitments are followed through. Members must ensure that the motion will not simply be one of many no-day-named motions that passes through the House and disappears into a hole, but that it will become a key theme for the Programme for Government and for the work that the Assembly must do in coming years.

Question, That the amendment be made, put and agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly recognises sustainable development, in general, and climate change, in particular, as central to its consideration in all relevant areas of government, including opportunities to use local economic and technological innovation strategies to place Northern Ireland at the forefront of the emerging green economy in Europe; calls for the full implementation of 'First Steps, the Sustainable Development Strategy for Northern Ireland'; and calls on the Executive to ensure that environmental commitments on sustainable development and tackling climate change are mainstreamed in the Programme for Government.

Policing in Northern Ireland

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow two hours for the debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes to propose and 10 minutes for the winding-up speech. All other Members will have five minutes.

One amendment has been selected and published on the Marshallled List. The proposer of the amendment will have 10 minutes to propose and five minutes for the winding-up speech.

Mr Donaldson: I beg to move

That this Assembly condemns the recent murder of Mr Harry Holland, and other crimes, including the assault and robbery of an elderly resident in Dromore; supports the call for a zero tolerance policy against crime and anti-social behaviour on our streets; and opposes any move by the Northern Ireland Office to cut the policing budget or reduce the number of officers in the Police Service of Northern Ireland.

I welcome the opportunity for the Assembly to debate the motion. I recognise, from the outset, that as a legislature and an Executive, we do not have the power to take decisions on policing and implement them — except for those of us who serve on the Northern Ireland Policing Board and who play a role in the oversight of policing and in holding the Chief Constable to account. I declare an interest, therefore, as a member of the Policing Board.

There is no doubt that, over the past few weeks and months, major progress has been made in Northern Ireland on support for the police and the rule of law. The Policing Board hears very positive reports from police commanders, from areas as diverse as south Armagh and west Belfast. Those police commanders say that they are enjoying unprecedented co-operation from the community in those areas, and that that co-operation is helping them in the fight against crime.

A few weeks ago, the first district policing partnership (DPP) meeting took place in Crossmaglen, south Armagh. That event was particularly poignant for me, because it was on 12 August 1970 that Northern Ireland's Troubles first really came home to roost when my cousin, Samuel Donaldson, was murdered. He was the first RUC officer to lose his life in what became known as the Troubles. It is good to see that, today, in a place such as Crossmaglen — where Samuel and his colleague Constable Roy Millar were both done to death — that people are meeting the police, engaging with them, and tackling crime. That is important, and that is the kind of progress that we want to see as we move away from the division and violence of the past to what is, I hope, a better future.

There is an increased expectation, on the part of the public, that, where there is greater engagement with the police, that crime will decrease and clear-up rates of crime will increase. Against that backdrop came the tragic murder of greengrocer Harry Holland, in west Belfast, by youths who were engaged in a criminal act. It was a terrible murder. It was a terrible way in which to die, and our thoughts continue to be with the Holland family.

I do not seek to make any political capital out of that tragic event, save to say that we have a duty to the family of Harry Holland. We have a duty to every greengrocer, shopkeeper, and every man and woman on the streets in west Belfast, and in every area of Northern Ireland, to do all that we can to prevent that type of crime from recurring. I am sure that the Holland family would say that if their father is to leave a legacy, it is that the community, and we, as their leaders, say that enough is enough.

3.45 pm

(Mr Speaker in the Chair)

There have been other crimes in recent times. In my constituency, four men wearing balaclavas broke into an 88-year-old pensioner's home in Dromore. She is a lovely Christian lady who lives alone, and Members can imagine what a frightening experience that was for her. They ransacked her home, but stole little. Such crimes, which create considerable fear among elderly people, have been replicated in other areas. Last week, a gang of youths broke into an elderly person's home in Lisburn.

Albeit a tiny minority, some young people feel that they can get away with committing such crimes, that they are above the law and almost infallible. Therefore, in bringing the motion before the Assembly, my colleagues and I couched it in the following terms:

“a zero tolerance policy against crime and anti-social behaviour on our streets.”

No level of crime is acceptable; nor should people tolerate such crimes. I accept and welcome the reduction in the level of some crimes, for which the Chief Constable has presented evidence. However, alongside that reduction, the clearance state of crime in Northern Ireland, at less than 20%, is not at the level it should be. From 21 April 2007 to August 2007, the overall clearance rate stood at 15.7% and, for the previous 12 months, the figure was 16.2%. Less than one in five crimes is solved, which is in contrast to other UK constabularies: for example, the Northumbria Constabulary clears 40% of reported crime.

To build public confidence that crime is being tackled on the streets, the police in Northern Ireland must attain a clearance rate considerably higher than 20% — and soon. To do so, the police must have the necessary resources to deal with crime. Recently, there was news of a shortage of detectives in the PSNI's crime department. That is a result of the Patten process and because many of the most experienced police officers have left the Police Service. There is a direct correlation between the low clearance rate and the shortage of detectives. Therefore, additional police officers are required.

Against that backdrop, Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary has talked about reducing the number of police officers in Northern Ireland from 7,500 to 6,000 by 2011. A cut of some 1,500 officers is simply not acceptable. I have heard the comparisons, and it is said that Northern Ireland has more police officers per capita than other parts of the UK. However, surely Northern Ireland wants to set its own standards. I have been a Member of Parliament for 10 years, and every year that I have been in the House of Commons I have heard Government Ministers from the Home Office speak about the need to recruit additional police officers.

Indeed, it is one of the Labour Government's boasts that they have recruited more police officers. Why on earth is there talk of reducing the number of police officers in Northern Ireland? More, not fewer, officers are needed for front-line policing. The Chief Constable's recent decision to cut the number of full-time reserve officers from 680 to 381 recognises that the PSNI needs those additional officers to enable it to continue delivering front-line policing.

If the Chief Constable believes that he needs the help of the full-time reserve for a further period, there should be no talk of a reduction of 1,500 police officers by 2011. Similarly, under the comprehensive spending review, there may be a cut in the policing budget. Among the different figures that have been bandied about, £300 million has been mentioned as a possibility, and members of the Policing Board have been warned to prepare for such a cut. Historically, more money has been spent on policing in Northern Ireland than in other parts of the UK or in other comparable European countries. There were good reasons for that, such as civil unrest and the threat from terrorism.

However, this is not the time to talk about cutting the policing budget. We must tackle crime and get on top of it, and that means that the police must have available the resources necessary to deal with crime on the streets.

The zero-tolerance policy is not just some aspirational platitude, or some phraseology that we have borrowed from the police in New York; rather, it is about a real desire to see crime being tackled properly on the streets. That means proper sentencing in the courts — so that, when the police clear up a crime and get the offenders to court, the judiciary imposes sentences that are a real deterrent to people out there who are watching and listening. Sometimes, when they see the leniency of the sentences, they think “What have I got to worry about?” Tougher sentencing must play an important part in that, and a zero-tolerance policy on our streets is crucial.

In conclusion, I commend the media for the way in which they have highlighted this issue. In particular, I want to mention the BBC programme ‘The Stephen Nolan Show’, which has done a pretty good job of highlighting the issue and generating public debate on it. This debate is not just for us; it is for the public, too, and it is important that they are engaged in it. I hope that the House will today send a resounding message to the criminal element of society that we will no longer tolerate its criminality.

Dr Farry: I beg to move the following amendment:
At end insert

“; and calls on the Executive to ensure that there is an appropriate policing budget and number of police officers to deal with the range of criminal activities and anti-social behaviour, in the event of the devolution of policing and justice to the Northern Ireland Assembly”

I will support the motion, but with a degree of concern and reservation about how it has been phrased and some of its implications. First of all, I am a little uncomfortable with basing what is, in effect, a policy motion on the murder of a particular individual, as tragic as it was. That is not the appropriate approach for an Assembly to take. Furthermore, it is recognised as bad public policy to base decisions on particular cases, as sad as they are. I will not say any more on the matter at this stage. I do not want to make too much of an issue about it, given the publicity and the huge sympathy that has been expressed for the Holland family.

It is also important to recognise the huge progress that has been made on policing in Northern Ireland, particularly in recent years. All the main parties in Northern Ireland now fully support the police and the rule of law. The Police Service of Northern Ireland is internationally recognised as one of the most professional and effective police services in the world, and it goes without saying that it is also the most accountable police service in the world. We all have the opportunity to make our views known to officers, both at Policing Board level and at community level through the DPPs.

However, it is important to look at what we mean by zero tolerance of crime and antisocial behaviour. Everyone in the Chamber hears all the time from constituents about problems with crime and antisocial behaviour. They are huge issues. If by zero tolerance we mean a robust, effective and proportionate response from the police and the courts, then we will all be in favour of it. There is clearly no acceptable level of crime and antisocial behaviour. However, if we mean that a punitive approach to minor offences and disorder must be taken, then perhaps it runs contrary to the restorative techniques that are being developed, both in the current statutory system and at a community level — an approach that is finding favour with virtually every party in the Chamber.

As Mr Donaldson said, the zero-tolerance concept emerged from New York in the early 1990s. It focuses on quality of life and the “broken windows” theory, the idea being that by dealing with minor problems of antisocial behaviour on the street, a context is created in which crime is less likely to occur and major crimes are effectively dealt with. There is much that we can learn from that. However, if the call is for tougher sentences — and there is, rightly, a lot of frustration in the community about lenient sentences — we must also be aware of the consequences.

At the moment, our prison population is rising, following a dip as a result of the early-release scheme in the wake of the Good Friday Agreement. There are now almost 1,500 people in prison in Northern Ireland: about 911 who have been sentenced, and 567 who are on remand. It is worth noting at this stage that the figure for remand prisoners is hugely out of proportion with what it should be, and that is an indication of the very low speed at which justice is dispensed in our courts.

Our prison system is overcrowded already, and there is a clear case for building a new facility. However, if we are talking about a crackdown on crime, with tougher sentences, we have to be honest and accept that we will have to invest in providing new detention facilities across Northern Ireland. It is worth noting that there was a dramatic increase in the prison population in Scotland in the wake of devolution there.

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Member agree that the situation in prisons is at crisis level? Recently, an accountant charged with blackmail was given a suspended sentence because there was no place in which to put her.

Dr Farry: Yes. I have also heard about a case in which a person was given a prison sentence for not paying a dog licence. The situation in HMP Maghaberry is particularly critical; and there are female prisoners alongside juveniles in the young offenders’ centre at Hydebank, which is not ideal. It is fine to call for tougher sentences, and I endorse that call because that is what people want, but there is a cost attached to building quality facilities in which to house the people whom we send to prison.

When we talk about zero tolerance, we must mean just that: we cannot cherry-pick. I will be interested to hear the DUP’s comments on zero tolerance towards paramilitary flags; abuses and offences committed around bonfires; the use of paramilitary symbols in parades; and major public order problems. In recent memory, both unionist parties have tried to rationalise what has happened and have attacked the responses of the police who tried to deal with those offences.

I note that when the police raided the Alexandra Bar in north Belfast, both unionist parties criticised them.

If we are serious about zero tolerance, let us mean what we say.

The purpose of the amendment is to ensure that the Assembly, having called for action on the Northern Ireland Office budget, takes a consistent approach on resources when policing and criminal justice are devolved. We should not be calling on others to do something that we are not prepared to do ourselves if we had the power and the responsibility.

We must recognise that the Northern Ireland policing budget is large — approaching £900 million a year. Spending on policing in Northern Ireland is more than twice the average spent in Great Britain. At full complement, we have 7,500 police officers, which is larger than the average force in Great Britain. However, there are good reasons for that, and the Patten Report recognised that a complement of 7,500 officers met the required level for policing in Northern Ireland. We cannot rely on the support of other police forces as is the case for most forces in Great Britain, and there is the ongoing threat from paramilitaries and organised crime. Those are all major challenges, and they require an enhanced level of policing resources in Northern Ireland. The Alliance Party recognises that we must retain that level, but we must also accept that it creates distortions in public expenditure and leads to opportunity costs elsewhere in the system.

There will come a time — and the Alliance Party hopes that it will happen sooner rather than later — when Northern Ireland Office and Northern Ireland Civil Service budgets will merge. At that point, and just like other democratic societies, it will fall to the Assembly to make tough choices between investing in policing and security and investing in social, economic and environmental matters. Other matters requiring funding will also fall within the remit of the criminal justice system, and this Assembly will have to make choices.

We may well decide that we want a properly resourced police service to deal robustly and effectively with all the criminal offences and antisocial behaviour that occur in Northern Ireland. As a mature Assembly, if we are calling on the Northern Ireland Office to maintain current resource levels, we should support the amendment, and say that in the context of devolution, we are prepared to give a commitment to the people of Northern Ireland that we will do likewise.

During the months that we have had devolution, the DUP has been very good at lecturing other parties in the Chamber about public expenditure. It is easy to make claims on others for money; Northern Ireland has been very good at that in recent years. I would like to see the DUP applying what it preaches here consistently across the spectrum of public expenditure, including that which will eventually be devolved to us.

4.00 pm

On 26 June 2007, when the Assembly discussed pension provision for the former RUC part-time Reserve, I was concerned that Mr Ian Paisley Jnr said, on behalf of the Executive, that he was happy to call on the Northern Ireland Office to fund those pensions but that if the matter had been the Assembly's responsibility, it would have been thrown into the mix to be considered alongside all other public-expenditure priorities. To adopt such a stance is to be inconsistent. If the Assembly is calling for the Northern Ireland Office to provide for the police, we must say that we will provide for them, too. That is the basis of the amendment, and I urge the Assembly to support it.

Mr Adams: Tá mé buíoch díot, a Cheann Comhairle. Tá mé buíoch fosta de na Comhaltaí eile a labhair ar an rún tábhachtach seo.

I thank you, a Cheann Comhairle, and I thank the Member for sponsoring today's debate. Once again, I extend solidarity and condolences to Harry Holland's wife, Pauline; to their daughters Méabh, Gráinne, Sarah and Gael; to his mother Violet; to his brothers and sisters; to Pauline's mother, Grace; and to the Devlin family. Ba fhear uasal é Harry Holland grá don eolas, grá dá fhoireann don cheol.

Harry Holland was an active citizen. He was a friend of mine, and we lived in the same street until his death. He was also progressive in his ideas on how our community should deal with antisocial behaviour and criminality. Harry was prepared to give people, particularly young people, every support. That is also my position. We must face up to our responsibilities as parents. If anyone needs any lessons on that, the letter from Harry's daughters in this week's 'Andersonstown News' give some insight into how parents can imbue young people with sound, core values. I pay tribute to the Holland family for the dignified and graceful way in which they have faced up to their terrible loss. Bhí agus tá siad cróga, galánta agus mar shampla iontach dúinn go léir.

My friends, there is no tolerance in west Belfast for criminal or antisocial behaviour. However, there is also a justified, deep anger that actions such as Harry's murder are used to smear all the people of west Belfast, particularly our young people. The vast majority of the people of west Belfast are decent, hard-working, law-abiding and respectable citizens. It is also a fact that there is a heightened fear among some sections of our people, particularly our elderly and people living alone, because of the popular view that criminals can get away with anything. That is not only a west Belfast or republican view. I agree with the Member for Lagan Valley Mr Donaldson that the delivery of good policing is a concern for people everywhere.

There is a widespread sense of scepticism throughout the Six Counties. As political leaders and representatives, we have a responsibility to change that. The PSNI and the criminal justice agencies also have a duty to deliver. Sinn Féin has been to the forefront in leading recent community initiatives to engage with the PSNI. In west Belfast, which has suffered terribly from bad policing, particularly in the upper Springfield area, hundreds of citizens are engaged in programmes to assist the PSNI to challenge thugs and criminals, many of whom are repeat offenders and well known to the PSNI and the justice agencies.

Therefore, there are legitimate questions to be asked, not only about policing budgets or numbers of police officers but about how those resources are deployed. There are big questions about how the PSNI responds to calls or to information from citizens. Questions arise about the response times and the relationship between the PSNI and the justice agencies and other bodies, particularly in dealing with offenders.

The motion is useful in focusing attention on those important issues. However, there is also a need to build confidence and community solidarity and to develop a joined-up and sustained approach.

Friends, as we speak, no joined-up approach exists between the PSNI and other justice agencies, including alternative bodies and institutions, to create a cohesive and sustained approach in partnership with local communities. We must get the criminals and the thugs off the streets, but that means delivering good civic policing as a public service so that citizens have the protection and justice that they all deserve. Ní bhfuair Harry Holland ná a chlann an seirbhís sin. Ba rud mícheart sin, rud mílteanach. A chairde, tá a lán oibre le déanamh againn na rudaí seo a chur i gceart.

Mr Kennedy: I thank the proposers of the motion for bringing the matter before the House. However, the UUP regrets that the motion does not go far enough, as it fails to assert the view — widely held among the unionist community in particular — that the time is not right for the devolution of policing and justice. All Members will rightly condemn all murders, including the disgraceful and despicable murder of Harry Holland, and the UUP expresses its sympathy to the Holland family.

Mr Donaldson: I thank the Member for giving way. As Mr Kennedy will be aware, the Ulster Unionist Party tabled an amendment, but it was not selected by the Speaker. The DUP would have been happy to accept that amendment. We share the view of the Ulster Unionists that the Assembly and Executive Review Committee must be mindful of the need for sufficient public confidence to be in place before the policing and justice powers are devolved to the Assembly. The DUP believes that public confidence is not sufficient to enable that devolution to occur at this time.

Mr Speaker: I thank the Member for taking the intervention; he will be allowed an extra minute to speak.

Mr Kennedy: You are a fair man, Mr Speaker. I welcome the clarity from the honourable Member. The UUP also condemns assaults and robberies on all elderly residents, whether those attacks take place in Dromore, County Down, in Bessbrook, County Armagh, or somewhere else.

Antisocial behaviour is now a blight on our society. Most representations that Members receive are from constituents who are concerned about antisocial behaviour and levels of disorder, and they want more police officers on the ground, as well as a greater police presence. Therefore, there is great concern about potential cuts in policing budgets and cuts in the numbers of officers who are available to serve local communities. That includes members of the full-time reserve. I welcome the recent extension to contracts that the Policing Board offered. For some bizarre reason, the SDLP opposed those extensions; I did not understand the logic of that.

Everyone accepts that the public wants a zero-tolerance policy to be implemented, not just talked about. There is broad consensus that the devolution of policing and justice is desirable, but the debate really concerns when that devolution will be considered appropriate. The Alliance Party amendment does not provide any clarity on the matter; rather it introduces fudge — no change there from the Alliance Party, then. We have more fudge from the Alliance Party, because, to a certain extent, the devolution of policing and justice is a complete red herring. It will not make the people of Northern Ireland safer. Since 1997, some 3,023 new criminal justice laws have been passed, but are communities across the United Kingdom any safer? Obviously they are not.

The Policing Board and other statutory agencies already have the necessary powers to address crime — and the fear of crime — on our streets. Therefore, the big issue is not whether, but when.

The Ulster Unionist Party does not feel that there is sufficient confidence to allow the devolution of policing and justice now or in the near future. Why? Because of the lack of confidence in the new institutions and the political personalities who are involved. If clear evidence of that is needed, there is an elephant in the Chamber today. I do not want to personalise this, but responding, not on behalf of his political party but on behalf of the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister and the Executive, we have someone who was convicted of a very serious criminal offence: an attack on the Old Bailey in London. I am referring to Mr Kelly. It beggars belief that anyone would consider giving such a person responsibility for policing and justice.

This Assembly is new; it has not taken any major decisions or been properly tested. Some Members fear that, during the negotiations at St Andrews last year, a political deal was done, and the outworking of that deal is simply a matter of when the political climate permits.

Mr Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr Attwood: I welcome the motion as an opportunity to record the sympathy of the Chamber with the Holland family and to develop the joined-up and sustained approach to crime that Gerry Adams referred to.

As we all know from our recent history, there are moments when events converge to enable a community to move to a place where it had not previously been. I sense that significant parts — but not all — of west Belfast are experiencing one of those moments. That is why a joined-up and sustained approach to crime must be developed quickly.

The Lord Chief Justice was in the Senate Chamber today speaking to the Assembly and Executive Review Committee about the devolution of justice and policing. It is time for the criminal justice institutions to develop that conversation with the wider community. That is why, over the last 10 days, the SDLP has been meeting — mostly in private — with the Public Prosecution Service, the PSNI and others to urge them to open their doors as never before, in order to have conversations with individuals and organisations in the community and hear their concerns on criminal justice issues.

The SDLP has outlined a number of proposals in those meetings. I shall mention only a few. We think that it is time to create a sentencing guidelines council — consisting of law practitioners, the judiciary and other individuals — to inform the High Court about appropriate sentences and how it should conduct itself in bail hearings. That would not interfere with the judiciary's independence, but it would enable the community to speak to the judiciary about its concerns on the administration of justice and how things should develop.

Similarly, the SDLP proposes a panel of prosecutors, so that individuals in the PPS can engage on a rolling basis with the community, politicians and families in an effort to hear and heed their concerns on the management of prosecutions in this part of the world.

As Members are beginning to talk more positively to each other, and as the community is talking more positively with the criminal justice institutions — including the PSNI — my message to the criminal justice family is that it is time for the Public Prosecution Service, the PSNI and the High Court to engage in conversation with the community through a range of mechanisms.

4.15 pm

I endorse Jeffrey Donaldson's remarks about finance. I recently received a letter from the Department of Finance and Personnel confirming that as yet — five months before the Assembly and Executive Review Committee makes proposals about the devolution of policing and justice — there has been no conversation with the Treasury about the future policing and justice budget. Perhaps now is not the time to have that conversation, but it must happen quickly because proposals that the Policing Board is hearing about reducing police numbers may well be matched by proposals to reduce the overall criminal justice budget. The conversation between the Department of Finance and Personnel and the Treasury must take place to guarantee the funding for policing and justice not only for the next three years, but, critically, after 2010-11 when, I think, the Treasury and the NIO will try to claw funds back. That is when the comments that have been made in the Chamber about competing priorities will come home to roost.

The SDLP has some concerns, as does Stephen Farry, about a motion on zero tolerance. Organisations such as Families Bereaved Through Car Crime in west Belfast will tell you that due to the nature of crime and those who are involved in crime, one size does not fit all when dealing with offenders. We need tougher sentences and tougher courts, but sometimes toughness is not the only answer when dealing with those in the community who are already vulnerable. Toughness has its place — it may even have a greater place — but it is not the sole answer to dealing with the issues that have been identified by the tragic murder of Harry Holland.

Mr Weir: I declare an interest as a member of the Northern Ireland Policing Board — as did the proposer of the motion. I have no doubt that the motivation behind the Alliance Party's amendment was well meaning, but the DUP believes that the amendment is wrong, because it takes the focus away from where it should be, which is in the motion, and it lets the Government off the hook.

There is no doubt about the importance of proper funding for policing. If we reach the situation in which the level of public confidence for policing to be devolved to Northern Ireland is right — and, like Mr Kennedy and Mr Donaldson, I think that we are a long way from that — it will be important that there is the proper level of funding. However, if the focus is on guaranteeing that the Executive will provide such funding, that will take pressure away from the Government to ensure that there are adequate levels of funding in the meantime.

Leaving aside the matter of public confidence, if policing and justice are devolved, it would be unacceptable to have a service that has been denuded and that would be receiving a reduced level of resources. To take away from the duty of Government to provide adequate support for policing and protection for the community is to lose focus, and that is why the DUP does not support the amendment.

The motion comprises three elements. On behalf of the DUP, I express my sympathy to the Holland family on their recent tragic loss in such appalling circumstances and to the elderly lady in Dromore who was brutally attacked. They are not the drivers behind the desire for zero tolerance or the need for adequate police numbers. However, it is appropriate that Members express their concerns about those events.

Mr Spratt: In view of the epidemic levels of antisocial behaviour around the Province, does the Member agree that it would have been advisable to retain the 300-odd full-time Reserves until that epidemic were brought under control and strengthen the Chief Constable's budget to allow him to deal properly with this scourge on society?

Mr Weir: I agree with my honourable friend. Any public representative who deals with policing work on the ground knows that there has been an explosion in antisocial behaviour over the past number of years. The police and public representatives are frustrated by the torture caused by a small number of youths who, daily, make life hell for people. Unfortunately, the police simply do not have enough resources to deal with the problem adequately, which is why more resources must be injected into that area of policing.

A zero-tolerance policy has not simply been plucked out of the air but has been tried and has proved successful in several jurisdictions. The focus is usually on New York, but the policy has been used in other parts of the United Kingdom. Zero tolerance does not simply concern policing but the entire judicial system. In this Building this morning, the Lord Chief Justice talked about the need for the independence of the judicial system; no one would argue with that. However, as Alex Atwood pointed out, the judiciary should take account of public concern when sentences are decided, and politicians have a role in framing that discussion and agenda. It is not a myth that sentences in Northern Ireland tend to be lower than in other parts of the United Kingdom, because we still have more generous remission for prisoners. The judiciary has an important role, because members of the public often see police intervention not being followed up with an adequate sentence at the end of the process.

We must ensure that Northern Ireland has enough police officers. Many people, especially those from a rural background, want the number of police officers to be increased rather than decreased. How often have politicians had to tell constituents that, although they are pushing the police to be more active in an area, they cannot be there all the time providing the level of service that people want? How often do we hear that vast areas are left unpoliced for long periods because a patrol car is attending an incident?

Today's motion is a strong one, and I hope that the House will unite around the DUP's sensible approach.

Ms Anderson: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Ba mhaith liom tacaíocht a thabhairt don rún agus don leasú seo. I support the motion and the amendment. I also declare an interest as a member of the Policing Board.

I echo the condemnation of the brutal murder of Harry Holland and acknowledge the fact that his family members are with us in the Chamber. I also condemn the robbery in Dromore and all criminal and anti-community activity, including the scourge of drugs that blights so many of our communities.

Crime and anti-community activity are two of the major issues for the vast majority of people across the North. In Derry, in my own constituency, two families were left homeless and a community centre was gutted in a despicable arson attack at the weekend. That kind of mindless destruction has no place whatsoever in our society, and there should be no hiding place for those engaged in any such anti-community activity.

Sinn Féin has been at the forefront in tackling all those issues and will continue to confront crime in all its guises. Clearly, that requires a proactive and robust PSNI response, for which the police should be properly resourced. Policing with the community is central to that — there must be prompt and effective responses to community co-operation. That engagement with the community must also involve the vast majority of young people who are decent and active citizens, all of whom reject, and have no tolerance for, the day-to-day crime to which they, their families and their peers are subjected.

However, if we are to make serious inroads against crime, the PSNI must also become a first-class service. We are already one of the world's most policed societies, yet the clearance rate for recorded crime — to which Jeffrey Donaldson referred — was just 16.5% last year. Despite the huge number of officers currently employed by the PSNI, they are resolving fewer than one in five crimes. Clearly, there is room for much-needed improvement.

We should focus on the quality of services and where PSNI officers are deployed. There must be a greater emphasis on efficiency, with officers on the streets where they are needed rather than trapped behind desks, filling in forms. That problem was highlighted recently by the Oversight Commissioner, and the PSNI management team has supported those concerns.

We must ensure that we create the highest standard of police service, which is efficient and effective, because the day-to-day level of crime in our communities is totally unacceptable. We must see an end to the death drivers, who are often back on the streets to terrorise our communities only hours after being arrested. We must see an end to drug dealers, who seem able to ply their deadly trade with impunity, despite their identities being well known.

The only way that we will ever deliver a truly effective approach to crime is if the PSNI and the judiciary end the rotating-door justice system that allows some of the most persistent offenders back on the streets, often without so much as a slap on the wrist. The most effective way to achieve such a joined-up approach to tackling crime is by transferring policing, the judiciary and justice powers to the Assembly, but perhaps that is a discussion for another day.

We have the ability, and we should have the confidence, to take our destiny in our own hands. We need to deliver a good, effective, fair and efficient justice system, with a human rights ethos enshrined at its core. That is no less than what the people in our community demand, and it is no less than what they deserve. Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

Mr Buchanan: I declare an interest as a member of the Policing Board.

The heinous murder of Mr Harry Holland in west Belfast — a hard-working, highly respected husband, father and grandfather — not only caused a sense of disbelief and outrage across the Province but also portrayed an image of general lawlessness that continues to exist in Northern Ireland. Although police statistics tend to show a decrease in such violent crimes, the fact remains that seldom a day passes without news of another heinous stabbing or vicious assault in some town or village in our Province.

All too often in our communities and isolated rural areas we hear of robberies, assaults and various attacks on elderly people — the most vulnerable in our society. Those attacks often leave them with broken bones, bruises and scars. That fear remains with them for the rest of their lives. Old and young alike are being attacked on our streets, public parks, school playgrounds and even in our hospitals, with the emergency services coming under constant attack. Is it any wonder that the people of Northern Ireland feel under siege and powerless to protect themselves? Statistics do precious little to stop the thuggery and rebuild confidence in a society where even the security forces are struggling to keep crime at bay.

However, we must be mindful that all crime is an issue that must be tackled on a much wider front than simply policing. Everyone — from the police to the politicians, from the parents to the legal system — has a role to play in seeking to bring into play a zero-tolerance policy against all crime and antisocial behaviour.

4.30 pm

The political representatives on the opposite side of the House fail to give their full, unequivocal support to the police as they seek to uphold the rule of law and order, and tackle all criminal activity. Sinn Féin members of the Policing Board publicly condemned the PSNI and accused police of taking a heavy-handed approach for making one arrest at the weekend in Londonderry, after coming under a severe attack from the nationalist community, which resulted in injuries to police officers. That clearly spells out Sinn Féin's hypocrisy, demonstrates its lack of leadership, and shows little commitment to taking all crime seriously. On that occasion, the mask slipped again, and there is now a challenge for Sinn Féin to condemn such activity and show its full support for the PSNI in seeking to tackle all criminal activity across Northern Ireland.

The PSNI must be properly resourced and have adequate numbers of fully trained personnel to provide an effective service in the community. Any proposals to reduce finances or personnel would eradicate the effective delivery of services to the public and create an even more dangerous and unacceptable situation. Having reduced the numbers of police personnel from 12,000, six years ago, to 7,500, and taking account of the current dissident republican threat, there is no room for any further reductions in front-line personnel.

There is much talk from Sinn Féin and, indeed, the SDLP, of the necessity to devolve policing and justice by 2008. Let me spell it out clearly — that is a fantasy. Republicans have a long way to travel before the devolution of policing and justice could be considered. Nevertheless, the motion — which calls for the condemnation of all types of criminal activity and antisocial behaviour; the establishment of a zero-tolerance policy to help stamp out such thuggery in society; the declaration of unequivocal support for the PSNI and the rule of law; and the building of confidence in our communities — is a starting point for Sinn Féin. Is it capable of showing such leadership on this issue?

Mr B McCrea: Early in the debate, a bearded man, whom I barely recognised, wandered into the Chamber and spoke to me in a language that I do not understand about some distressing matters — which all Members have condemned. It seemed that that man was not talking to Members, but to others. However, he spoke of the need for integration and working together. There is a famous phrase: "Tough on crime and tough on the causes of crime."

Famously, John Major retorted that he wanted to be: "tough on hypocrisy and tough on the causes of hypocrisy."

I should add that, if the Speaker will forgive me, I must declare an interest as a member of the Policing Board, although that is well known.

There are issues that Members should be discussing — the things that are left unsaid about whether we are really ready for the devolution of policing and justice. That is what this debate is really about. The people of Northern Ireland expect — and this was referred to on 'The Steven Nolan Show' on Radio Ulster —

Mr McCallister: Much has been said about sentencing. Does my honourable friend agree that the policy of 50% remission is unacceptable?

Mr B McCrea: I thank my friend for that intervention. It is absolutely the case that the public believes that those in authority are far too lenient and that criminals should be locked up and the key thrown away. I was surprised to hear Dr Farry from the Alliance Party, the proposer of the amendment, arguing for a policy of zero tolerance. Perhaps that is why his speech was somewhat confused and rambling. I was not sure whether the Member was supporting zero tolerance or not.

Individuals were mentioned, and some people might say that Members should not do that, because it personalises the issue. However, it is only by personalising the matter that we can understand what it is really about.

I spoke to the 89-year-old woman and her family in Dromore the day after she was robbed. They were clearing up the mess, and it was a disgrace. The policeman who dealt with them said that the woman would never get over it. Her family, and elderly people throughout Northern Ireland, will never get over it. The most distressing part of the story was that, when the burglars took the money from her purse, she asked if she could have the purse back. They just laughed, took the purse and walked away. How heinous is that?

There are few crimes worse than the taking of a person's life. We have offered our sincere condolences to the Holland family. However, the Assembly must take on board the most basic crimes against elderly people and vulnerable people.

Zero tolerance is not a target; it is not something on which people can be tested. It is an attitude of mind that compels people to believe in working together. It is not simply about the police, crime statistics or the judiciary; it is about the community and every Member of the Assembly. Will we really tackle the issues by working together or will we simply fence?

Sadly, the UUP amendment was not selected, but we wanted to say that the time is not right for the devolution of policing and justice. The UUP will reject Dr Farry's amendment, because the communities need time in which to build trust. We need new and innovative ways to work with communities, and we need to find ways in which people can work together in order to sort out problems. Until and unless trust is built in the community, it will be impossible to devolve policing and justice.

I note that the junior Minister on the opposite Benches will respond to the debate. I am looking forward to that, but I wonder what message that sends out. Is there a hidden message? Are we on a conveyor belt that we cannot get off?

The point is not whether devolution of policing and justice is good or bad; it is whether it is desirable at this stage for the Assembly to tackle those matters. The institutions have only just got up and running. The proposer of the motion talked about what the public were looking for. He mentioned delivery on health and education and on areas covered by all the Departments. Perhaps we should learn to walk before we run.

I want it to be recognised that the Assembly is serious about sorting out the problems, and I want Members to work together to resolve them. Therefore, I urge my colleagues to reject Dr Farry's amendment and to support the motion tabled by Jeffrey Donaldson.

Mrs D Kelly: I too must declare an interest as a member of the Northern Ireland Policing Board.

I want to join in the expression of sympathy to the family of Harry Holland, who have suffered the great loss of a man who was a father, a grandfather and a husband.

It may be of interest to some Members to know that, less than two weeks before Mr Holland's death, one of my constituents had his car stolen by three youths. During the insurance company's investigation, he was asked why he did not intervene. The answer to that question is exemplified by the murder of Mr Harry Holland. It is not safe for anyone to intervene. Perhaps the insurance companies should take that message on board.

Although the debate is primarily about zero tolerance of low-level, high-impact crime, and antisocial behaviour in particular — which, as many people acknowledge, primarily involves young people — it would be remiss of the House if it did not recognise the sterling work of the majority of young people and their contributions to society. Young people are often the victims of antisocial behaviour, and Members will want to make that distinction.

The motion refers specifically to zero tolerance, of which there are many definitions, including the definition that was used in New York. That gave police a non-discretionary policy to stop and arrest people on a regular and ongoing basis. Zero-tolerance measures were also taken by the police in Strathclyde and Hartlepool; however, those measures allowed for some discretion among police officers. Nevertheless, outcomes were effective. One of the strategies involved intelligence-led policing, and improving community relations with the police in order to tackle crime.

Some Members have acknowledged that addressing antisocial behaviour is not the sole preserve and challenge of the police: it is a societal issue. It is not only in the North of Ireland that antisocial behaviour is increasing; it is commonplace throughout Britain, the island of Ireland and in many parts of Europe. That has, in part, to do with an increasing drink and drug culture.

Parents have to take responsibility. Although Members talked about bringing people before the courts, and, quite rightly, about the sentences that were handed down, it is important to realise that many offenders are well below the age at which they can appear before the courts. Therefore, if Members are serious about tackling crime, there must be a more focused approach, while making use of inter-agency resources to tackle those problems.

The Policing Board will meet during October to develop the policing plan for next year, and we will be holding the Chief Constable and his officers to account. Many people say, quite rightly, that there are higher levels of different and more serious crime. Thankfully, however, those crimes impact on only a small number of people. Our key priority is to challenge the police, whether at the Policing Board, or at the district policing partnerships, which are also drawing up their individual policing plans for each district command unit. The community and the Assembly must be shown that antisocial behaviour, and those crimes that are often defined as low-level crimes, are priorities for all of the district command units in particular, and for the Policing Board in general.

I acknowledge the work of community safety partnerships with regard to their inter-agency approaches. They are vehicles by which some of the zero-tolerance policies and the message regarding antisocial behaviour can be delivered.

Many Members made reference to the decreasing numbers of police officers. It is as a result of the Patten Report that, until at least 2011 we have 7,500 police officers. That is something that the SDLP wants to see maintained. When comparisons are made between the PSNI and UK forces, we are often told, as other Members have said, that we have a higher number of police officers.

However, the crime rates in England, Scotland and Wales are not decreasing. We hear cries from the political parties there that they need to improve and increase their numbers of officers. Therefore, it does not make sense to reduce those numbers.

Mr McKay: A Cheann Comhairle, I speak in favour of the motion as amended by the Alliance Party. Furthermore, I declare an interest as a member of the Policing Board. This is obviously an important debate. Unfortunately, hardly a week passes without the public being shocked at the types of crimes that are committed in the community, many of which seem totally senseless.

Earlier this year, the Assembly discussed the concerning rise in attacks on emergency workers. At that time, we in Sinn Féin, expressed our support for the work of the zero tolerance strategic group in tackling this issue. The attacks on emergency workers are mainly, if not entirely, down to, antisocial behaviour. That is just one example of the effect of antisocial behaviour on society.

Antisocial behaviour is a major problem in all communities. If it is not nipped in the bud, it can soon spiral out of control, and lead to assaults, robberies and murder. The PSNI needs to start tackling antisocial behaviour more effectively in rural and urban areas.

In my own constituency, I can think of at least one rural area, namely Loughiel, where there is a major problem with antisocial elements using runabouts, burning out vehicles and driving dangerously — sometimes while intoxicated.

4.45 pm

Such antisocial behaviour is also a pressing issue in some areas of our towns and cities. If it is not handled effectively, there will be more unnecessary deaths on our roads. Clearly, there are gaps in understanding between the PSNI and the Public Prosecution Service, and we are seriously concerned about the delays in legal proceedings and in the failure to prosecute successfully where appropriate. Following my party's suggestion, the Policing Board decided at a recent meeting to make resolution of that situation a priority. Sinn Féin is determined to ensure that people get the policing and justice that they so rightly deserve.

The failure of British direct rule Ministers to prevent the early release of a convicted rapist in County Tyrone has rightly outraged the public, especially since there was more than ample time to act in the wake of the tragic death of Attracta Harron. The Assembly must take responsibility for policing and justice to prevent such injustices from occurring in the future.

We must work to ensure that communities have real access to the criminal justice system in order that their concerns can be taken on board and furthered. All the criminal justice agencies must listen to and work with local communities to deliver good, impartial and effective policing.

I support the motion and the amendment. Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

Mr Ross: During the debate, we heard reports from around the Chamber of various incidents of antisocial behaviour, attacks or murders occurring in each of our constituencies. That proves that nowhere is exempt from crime. I am glad that Members agree unanimously that the perpetrators of crime should be dealt with to the fullest extent of the law.

The horrific murder of Mr Harry Holland in West Belfast and the attack on an elderly lady in Dromore demonstrate the need for everyone to not only support policing but to assist police investigations and give evidence against those who are responsible for such gruesome acts.

Following the incident, the public outcry in West Belfast — as in other constituencies in Northern Ireland — reflected a demand for greater police presence and for a tough response to those who break the law. We have heard today that Northern Ireland is changing — for the better, I hope — as we move away from decades of terrorist attacks on our country towards a more prosperous and stable future. However, a consequence of that is a greater level of serious crime in our communities and on our streets.

We have a choice: we can say that that is to be expected, as paramilitary groups go through transition, or that it is unacceptable and that we must do something about it.

The motion calls for “zero tolerance”. As Mr Weir said, we automatically think of the achievements of zero-tolerance policing in New York under Mayor Guiliani, where major crime fell by some 39% and murder by some 49%. As my colleague Tom Buchanan said earlier, the PSNI reports that crime in Northern Ireland has fallen over the past five years. In my constituency, PSNI figures indicate that crime in Larne has fallen by some 21%, in Carrickfergus by some 22%, and in Newtownabbey by some 20%. Yet the public perceive that crime is on the increase. Public confidence in the police, particularly among the unionist community, is falling. We must do something about that.

Mrs I Robinson: I thank the Member for giving way. Will the Member join me in appealing to those students of Queen's University who live around the Holylands and who, each weekend, make life intolerable for the citizens of that community, to behave as sensible young adults? Those young people are trying to attain high academic resolution. It is in their interests, as well as in those of everyone else, to behave sensibly.

Mr Ross: I thank the Member for her intervention. She is absolutely right: those students must act responsibly. However, we must not forget that several student properties have been attacked recently. We must not always blame the students in those circumstances; we must consider each incident on its individual merits.

We can blame media hysteria or anecdotal evidence for the public perception that crime is on the increase. However, that perception may also prevail because we see crime and antisocial behaviour all around us, and we see that the police are not doing anything. As my colleague Jeffrey Donaldson said in his opening remarks, the PSNI clear-up rate is not as good as it should be. The public want to see results and visible policing, and they want to see the police remove criminals from the streets and those who are involved in crime and antisocial behaviour to be arrested and prosecuted.

Any suggestion of reducing police numbers or cutting the police budget will be met with by massive resistance from the people whom I represent. We have already seen a massive reduction in police numbers in recent years, and we cannot allow any further reduction. As I have said, there is an outcry for public and visible policing.

As a public representative, my job is not to take every opportunity to slate the police. We must recognise that the police have a tough job, but it is important to highlight problems where they exist. We must ask what the role of the police should be: is it to police the streets, to make communities safer and to arrest those who break the law; or is it to act as social workers and take the idea of community policing to such an extreme that, in the eyes of the public, the police appear to become the friends of those who break the law?

I know of a family in my constituency who live opposite a youth centre and who have their cars attacked and their home pelted by stones every night. That family puts up with verbal abuse from a group of young people who attend the youth club daily. The youths are known to the police and to youth workers, but nothing happens to them. The police adopt a softly-softly approach in the belief that, somehow, they will befriend the youths, and the antisocial behaviour will end. Earlier, I heard Mr Attwood say that tough policing and tough justice are not always the answer. That is true but, in this case, the softly-softly approach is not working. I will be raising that matter during a meeting with the police in Carrickfergus tomorrow. Those youths must be arrested and charged, and a strong message must be sent out that anyone who engages in crime will face the toughest treatment for flouting the law.

Those who are involved in drug dealing, car theft, burglary, muggings and antisocial behaviour must be brought to justice. The most effective way of stopping those types of crimes is to remove the perpetrators from the streets through tough and effective policing, and tougher and more effective sentencing. I support the motion.

Mr A Maskey: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I support the motion and the amendment. I commend Jeffrey Donaldson for proposing the motion. Unusually for me, I also commend Stephen Nolan for the contributions that he allowed the general public to make during the last number of weeks, in the wake of Harry Holland's death. The outpouring from the general public has led to a reawakening that there is a need for a policy to which some refer as zero tolerance, although many do not like to use that term.

It is fortunate that there has been considerable agreement among the parties on a number of key issues. I am disappointed that one or two Members have introduced discordant notes to the debate, because the issue is too important for point scoring, or to make party-political broadcasts. I thank Members for their contributions so far; the vast majority have ensured that they have not used their speeches to score points, which has added value to the debate.

Each Member could mention anecdotally — or give first-hand evidence about — events in their constituencies. Although Peter Weir talked of an explosion in antisocial behaviour, I am sure that he is aware that the problem has existed for many years.

One of the heartbreaking facts that emerged after the death of Harry Holland was that a close family friend, who was on the scene shortly after the event, around midnight, had recently had the misfortune of burying his son, who was run down and killed by death drivers in Belfast. The problem of antisocial behaviour has existed for a long time, and it affects many areas and communities, so every Member has a vested interest in supporting the motion and the amendment.

I welcome the fact that most Members have courteously addressed the motion and the amendment. By giving their support to the motion, they support the general community. There has been a considerable amount of agreement among the parties. We may have different viewpoints on the deployment of resources, on a zero-tolerance policy, or on the various solutions that should be employed to tackle problems, but I remind Members that Harry Holland himself was a strong advocate of supporting young people. There are many solutions, but the single message from all parties is that we have — and will have — no toleration for the type of behaviour that resulted in the untimely and tragic death of Harry Holland. The same applies for other examples that were mentioned during the debate, including the serious assault on a lady in Dromore.

Members have stated that there should be no tolerance of that type of activity and that there is a need to ensure that resources, including those of the police, are adequately funded and appropriately deployed. It is recognised that a variety of solutions must be sought. Proper and appropriate prevention models must be devised. Members have referred to clearance rates. However, when clearance needs to be dealt with, the problem has already been created. Therefore, much more time, energy and creativity must be spent devising prevention models in order to ensure that such activity does not happen in the first instance.

In conclusion, it must be ensured that the wider criminal justice system is responsive to people's needs. I commend 'The Stephen Nolan Show' for offering people the opportunity to air publicly their opinions.

Although I do not necessarily agree with all the opinions that were expressed, it is useful that people have been able to state their views. The fact that the debate has taken place demonstrates how the programme and the public outcry have given leadership to the issue. The Assembly must now take the baton of leadership and run with it.

Society has stated that it will not tolerate antisocial behaviour. It expects rightly that the wider criminal justice family — not only the police, but the courts, the Probation Board, the Youth Justice Agency and other agencies — will row in behind communities, listen to and respond to them, and deliver a joined-up service. The Assembly has a responsibility to ensure that that happens.

Mr Beggs: I declare an interest in policing as the chairman of Carrickfergus District Policing Partnership. I also offer my sympathy to the family of the late Harry Holland for the horrendous tragedy that they have endured. It is deeply regrettable that young people who are involved in antisocial activity have become so out of control that, ultimately, someone has been murdered.

I support the motion and oppose the amendment that stands in the name of Dr Farry of the Alliance Party. I listened with interest to the discussion on 'The Stephen Nolan Show' on zero tolerance. It is healthy that his excellent idea to have a period of zero tolerance has resulted in a debate. I hope that such a policy and other subsequent changes will mean that society might experience a zero-tolerance approach, if only for an experimental period. In some communities, policing has reached the stage at which new policies must be tried in the hope that they will bring about improvement.

Antisocial behaviour and criminal damage cause particular problems because it is difficult to trace and identify the culprits. Community involvement, information and assistance are needed in order to solve those problems.

In June 2007, I was fortunate enough to shadow the police during a weekend shift and to witness some of the problems that they face. During the early part of the night, I was surprised when they came across some drunk and disorderly behaviour for which I would have expected arrests to have been made, but were not. Instead, the police generally talked through the situation, allowed the people to go home and, in some instances, assisted them to get home, even though they were being unruly and disrupting the peace. I did not understand why that was the case, but I was told to wait and see what would happen later.

There are limited numbers of police officers on the streets. Given that, it was explained to me that if someone is arrested, police officers could be involved in paperwork for that arrest for two or three hours before the culprit is taken to a custody suite. That means that there are fewer officers on duty in some communities, particularly during the peak times of Friday and Saturday nights.

5.00 pm

Later that evening, a more serious incident occurred, which resulted in some people being taken in for questioning. Subsequently, I listened to a discussion about where they were going. There is a limited number of cells — there are none in Carrick. Cells were unavailable in Belfast or Antrim. I even heard talk of occasions when police had driven from Carrick to Banbridge to take culprits to cells. Therefore, a practical issue must be solved before we begin to think about a zero-tolerance policy. Capacity will have to be increased, as will the speed of processing those involved in criminality. Otherwise, the system will become clogged up and will result in a lack of cells in which to incarcerate criminals. Police officers will be taken off the streets to fill in paperwork, and no one will be available to deal with serious incidents of crime.

The wording of the Alliance Party's amendment to the motion causes me particular concern. It does not call on individual Assembly Members to lobby the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland about the policing budget. Instead, it calls for the "Executive to ensure" that there is adequate funding, and so on, and consequently makes those issues the responsibility of the Executive. Further on, the amendment states:

"in the event of devolution of policing and justice to the Northern Ireland Assembly".

That wording is loaded. I am concerned that it implies the acceptance of the devolution of policing and justice, something for which the unionist community is not ready. It does not have the confidence that the republican community has moved on.

On recent weekends, there have been mixed messages, resulting from the activity in Londonderry. If republicans are asked whether they should inform police about guns that are available in other republican communities, they give out mixed messages in reply. The time is not right, for the unionist community, for the devolution of policing and justice powers. I hope that, at some point in the future, policing and justice can be devolved. However, there is not a sufficient level of confidence at present, and it could have a serious, disruptive effect on the workings of the Assembly, let alone trying to work with policing and justice.

Mr G Robinson: I am a member of the DPP. I speak, with pleasure, in support of the motion. It is imperative that the condemnation of all vicious and cowardly crime against our citizens is total and unequivocal. It is also imperative that the victims of such heinous crimes, and their families, are aware that the Assembly fully recognises the reality of crime in Northern Ireland and is seeking ways to address it.

I have absolutely no qualms in calling for a zero-tolerance policy on crime and the increasing problem of antisocial behaviour. Those problems are not limited to specific pockets in Northern Ireland but, sadly, it is a Province-wide phenomenon. Therefore, schemes are being put in place to address such problems. Just recently, a new scheme, costing £2 million, began to extend the CCTV coverage in our towns. The new CCTV cameras will, I hope, help to reduce crime and the fear of crime. They can also play a vital role in tackling antisocial behaviour by identifying those engaged in it. At the launch in Newtownards, the Policing and Justice Minister Paul Goggins, stated that:

"The Government is committed to working with local people and to make our communities safer and has committed £2 million pounds to this project."

He went on to state that:

"This valuable tool will act as a deterrent, but it will also help to secure vital evidence to support investigations."

Still later, he said that:

"there is no room in our society for those engaged in crime and anti-social behaviour and the launch of the CCTV cameras across Northern Ireland will help ensure that offenders are brought to justice."

Undoubtedly, there is a case for CCTV, which I support. I also support the benefits that it has for people's perception of safety and the increased likelihood of prosecution for antisocial behaviour and other crimes. However, it cannot, and should not, replace the one thing that inspires confidence in all of us — a policeman on the streets. Would the rioting in Londonderry's streets, at the weekend, have been so prolonged if more PSNI officers had been present, along with CCTV cameras? It was announced, recently, that the PSNI reserve is being reduced by 50%, amounting to a loss of 300 officers. Who, or what, can suitably replace them? I do not, and will not, believe that anything can replace those officers.

It is a crime to reduce the number of police officers by 300, thereby heightening the fear of crime in the community and decreasing the likelihood of arrests and convictions for antisocial behaviour, never mind for serious crime. The Assembly should speak with one loud voice and make it clear that a reduction in the number of PSNI officers or any attempt to cut the policing budget is totally unacceptable.

In a recent interview with Wendy Austin, the Chief Constable stated that Northern Ireland is not in a normalised policing situation. Given that view, the reduction in the number of officers, as well as any attempt to reduce the budget, represents a backward step in the effort to create a society in which people do not fear crime and are confident of the arrests and convictions of the perpetrators.

Since the Patten Report and the politically engineered demise of the RUC, the number of police officers on the streets has declined. People are already concerned that the number of officers has been reduced by too much and too quickly. Only more police officers on the beat, with the financial resources at their disposal to continue to do their jobs properly, effectively and for the whole community, can rectify the situation. CCTV alone cannot do so. I thank my colleague Jeffrey Donaldson for bringing the motion to the House.

Mr Shannon: Will the Member give way?

Mr G Robinson: I support the motion. [Laughter.]

The Junior Minister (Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister) (Mr G Kelly): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I welcome the opportunity to speak to the motion and amendment on behalf of the Executive. I join with other Members in expressing my shock and deep sadness at the tragic and senseless murder of Harry Holland. I know that everyone in the Chamber, the local community and the towns and cities shares my outrage.

Rinne an Feidhmeannas seo comhbhrón le teaghlach Harry Holland agus iad ag fulaingt go dian ag an am seo. Tá súil agam go rachaidh said i láidreacht mar gheall ar an tacaíocht a fuair said sa bhaile agus níos faide anonn.

The Executive have already extended their condolences to Harry Holland's family at this difficult time, and we hope that the family will draw strength from the overwhelming outpouring of support from so many people in the community and further afield. From all parties, every Member who has spoken in the debate has referred to the killing of Harry Holland as a turning point in the determination to stand against the criminality that is perpetrated by a small number of people who set themselves against their communities and society as a whole.

The recent attack on Winnifred Irvine in Dromore must also be condemned. That deplorable act is particularly upsetting because she is a frail 88-year-old woman who lost possessions of great sentimental value that she had collected over a lifetime. If we are to build a peaceful, just and prosperous society in which everyone is respected, no place exists for the attitudes and behaviour that lead to such attacks. Above all, the right of individuals to live their lives free from intimidation, threat or harm must be respected.

Yesterday morning, I was delighted to launch the UN international day for older people, and Members will know that it is also age awareness week. Therefore, it is both timely and appropriate that the Assembly voices its support today for the welfare and safety of older people. OFMDFM's strategy document for older people, 'Ageing in an inclusive Society', recognises the need to tackle crime against older people. It includes the strategic objective:

“To ensure that older people have a decent and secure life in their home and community”.

OFMDFM will work closely with older people's representatives and with colleagues from other Departments to ensure that that objective is met.

The 2005 crime survey found that older people worry more about crime. The impact of the fear of crime on their quality of life is higher than for other age groups. Indeed, Basil McCrea referred to the long-term effect that the attack will have on Winnifred Irvine for years to come.

It is important that we quantify the debilitating effect that the fear of crime can have on older people. That fear can often compound the sense of isolation that many older people experience. Our society should not tolerate criminal behaviour, such as robberies and assaults, against any section of the community. Those attacks are wrong, and anyone with information about them should bring it to the police.

Tackling antisocial behaviour is a key issue. I understand that the NIO's community safety unit has, along with several partners, directly funded a number of projects to reduce such behaviour. We also have our part to play. For example, the Department of Education is committed to providing a range of programmes designed to help combat antisocial behaviour by helping young people to develop their social and personal skills and learn to respect others. It is vital that we tackle all the causes of that disruptive behaviour.

It is important that we focus equally on preventative measures, which have the most desirable outcome of any intervention in that they can prevent the crime from occurring in the first place, prevent someone from becoming a victim of crime and prevent young people from ever entering the criminal justice system. In the middle of this debate, it is worth remembering, as Gerry Adams pointed out, that the vast majority of people in our community are good, decent, law-abiding citizens. That is a strength that we must use against the small minority who are involved in criminality.

I recognise the concerns raised by Members about whether sentences received by offenders are appropriate to their crimes. That is clearly a difficult area, and a number of conflicting issues need to be considered. I will ensure that the NIO is made aware of the House's views.

A number of Members mentioned the level of resources that has been committed to policing. I understand that the NIO has indicated its commitment to ensuring that the PSNI has sufficient funds to maintain a fully effective and responsive police service, and I welcome that. It is important that we continue to ensure that resources are commensurate with the needs of the community, particularly the needs of the most vulnerable in our community. We must further ensure that that need is continually reviewed in order that the PSNI can respond promptly and appropriately. The NIO has further indicated that the PSNI baseline budget has not been reduced and that discussions are ongoing about the level of funding that will be available up to 2011. I will ensure that the NIO is aware of the views of this House on that matter also.

As a number of Members mentioned, the Assembly and Executive Review Committee is carrying out an inquiry into the devolution of policing and justice. I am sure that the Executive will consider carefully the appropriate level of funding when the devolution of policing and justice takes place.

The Executive have already recognised the importance of creating a new society, free from attacks of this nature. As I have said before in the House, the Executive are totally committed to moving society forward and to making a real difference to the lives of all our people. I acknowledge the concerns that Members have raised today, especially about attacks on the most vulnerable in our society and the level of resources provided to the PSNI. I will ensure that a copy of today's Hansard report is sent to the Secretary of State for his information.

At the start of the debate, Jeffrey Donaldson, who, along with others, brought this motion to the Assembly, said that the Assembly must send out a resounding message that crime is not acceptable and that the community is fighting back. That is very true. I also welcome Stephen Farry's comments on zero tolerance. There are many different interpretations of the meaning of zero tolerance, but he described it as the “broken windows” theory: dealing with the small issues prevents other, bigger issues from occurring at a later date. That is a very important interpretation of the expression, because it is sometimes used completely out of context.

There is no acceptable level of violence, and another Member — forgive me, I can not remember who — said that the Assembly must show leadership. Despite some of the political point-scoring, the message from right across this Assembly is that we are at a turning point, and we are showing leadership in that matter. Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle.

5.15 pm

Dr Farry: My amendment is not a Trojan horse that locks Members into a particular timetable for the devolution of policing and justice or tries to force the pace. Essentially, the amendment is about the funding that the Assembly will be putting in place if and when — I hope it is a question of when — policing and criminal justice powers are devolved.

All parties here are supporters of the St Andrews Agreement, which envisaged the devolution of policing and justice. From the Alliance Party's point of view, it is right that policing and justice should be devolved to the Assembly as soon as possible.

Mr B McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Dr Farry: I am sorry, no.

Important advantages would accrue in the event of the devolution of policing and criminal justice, such as cross-community ownership of policing, improved accountability, and the ability of the Assembly to allocate resources to address the needs and wishes of society as a whole.

Mr Donaldson: Will the Member take it from me that there will be absolutely no question on this side of the House about our Ministers ensuring that resources will be made available to ensure effective front-line policing when devolution takes place? That is not the issue. The problem with the amendment is that it detracts from the central message that we want to send out, which is about zero tolerance of crime and antisocial behaviour. Would it not be better to avoid dividing the House on the issue so that we can all speak with one clear voice?

Dr Farry: I take on board what the Member has said, and I take some reassurance that the parties in the Executive are serious about ensuring that resources will be put in place. I also think that there are advantages in the Assembly's sending out a clear message today that it will not be asking the Northern Ireland Office to provide a level of funding that it is not prepared to match, if and when policing and justice powers are devolved.

The Alliance Party believes that the timescale for the devolution of policing and justice should be determined largely by the conditions being in place rather than the demands of an arbitrary timetable. However, we differ from both unionist parties in our belief that devolution can be achieved in a relatively short time frame and that, in fact, the Assembly should be building confidence towards realising that aim. Devolution of powers may not happen by May 2008, but we should attempt to achieve it as soon as possible.

For my party, community confidence is not about the bona fides of those in the Assembly who may take responsibility for policing and justice. Those issues were addressed in advance of the restoration of the Assembly. The key consideration is whether the Assembly can operate in a coherent manner, and, in particular, whether the Executive can co-operate on the basis of collective responsibility. We have not seen much sign of that, not least on the evidence of Assembly debates in which Executive parties have been unable to give common support to motions. The delay in appointing a victims' commissioner, for example, does not inspire confidence that the Assembly is capable of taking responsible decisions.

Indeed, the Ulster Unionists referred to the fact that Gerry Kelly is here as the Executive's representative. Their comments are rather bizarre, given that the nature of the Government that we have here is a product of the Good Friday Agreement of 1998, which they supported. Sinn Féin was part and parcel of that process and participated in the previous Administration in which the then leader of the Ulster Unionist Party was First Minister. Therefore, we need to know from the Ulster Unionists: are they part of this Government or are they not? They cannot have it both ways. The people put Sinn Féin into office.

Mr Kennedy: Well, we are and you are not.

Dr Farry: We are here as an opposition party. The Ulster Unionist Party needs to make its mind up as to whether it is in opposition or in Government: it cannot have it both ways.

Mr Speaker: Order. The Member has the Floor.

Dr Farry: The fundamental issue is resources: that is what the amendment is about. It is not about letting the Northern Ireland Office off the hook and sending out a signal that it can pass the buck to the Assembly. The amendment is about recognising that we are serious about tackling crime and antisocial behaviour in Northern Ireland and sending out a strong message that we are serious about putting adequate resources in place.

There are pressures on policing across the United Kingdom, and all forces are demanding additional resources. Any British Government will carefully consider how they allocate those resources. Rather than being weakened, the Assembly's case is strengthened by stating what it would do in the event of the devolution of justice and policing. Indeed, next week will bring the results of the UK-wide comprehensive spending review, which may be an indication of what to expect in the short term.

Several Members have said that the issue of zero tolerance is a complex one that must be given proper consideration. Members have said that there are multiple ways of dealing with this issue. It is not just a matter of being punitive, because that requires resources. We must ensure that a range of agencies take responsibility for dealing with what is a complex and difficult issue. Society as a whole must be reassured that people are safe from crime and antisocial behaviour, and that there will be a robust, effective and proportionate response from the authorities when crime and antisocial behaviour occurs.

I request that the amendment be put to a vote because we must send out a message of consistency.

Mr Simpson: I also declare an interest as a member of the Northern Ireland Policing Board. During the debate, we have heard that policing is an issue that goes right across the political divide. Antisocial behaviour is a major issue for the whole community.

The motion can be broken down into three parts. Each of those matters, taken separately, ought to enjoy the unanimous, unreserved and wholehearted support of every Member. Taken together, they demand the support of every Member, and lay serious questions at the door of anyone who fails to do so.

The first part of the motion addresses the murder of Mr Holland and the attack on an elderly resident in Dromore. That highlights a growing concern for many people. I add my condolences to the family of Mr Holland, who I understand are attending this debate. Our sympathy is with them for the tragic way in which their family member died. To victims, their neighbours and their families, it does not matter one iota how low the chances are of being subjected to such a crime. The fact that such attacks occur demands that political representatives of each and every shade of opinion must stand up with one voice and cry against them.

All Members can point in our constituencies to antisocial behaviour, rapes or attacks on children. I have met many of my own constituents who have been victims of violent crime, and I know that other Members have done likewise. We have a duty to send out the message that all the people in all our constituencies have the support of all the Members of the Assembly.

Mr Shannon: Will the Member express his concern, along with me and many other Members, at the announcement that 54 full-time Reserve officers are to go from C division between now and April 2008? Full-time officers are an integral part of police strategy for C division and the Ards area. Does he further agree that they are needed to deliver the level of policing that is demanded and expected by the community and the populace?

Mr Simpson: Yes, I agree with those sentiments and I will deal with that later in my speech.

We must be crystal clear on the issue of zero tolerance. Zero tolerance must include support for crime-prevention measures, victim support in the aftermath of crime, support for the police as they go about their investigations, and demands for proper and proportionate sentences when people are apprehended.

Mrs Kelly said that not all young people are guilty of antisocial behaviour, and I accept that. I have been involved in youth work for over 20 years, and there are many good young people out there. Antisocial behaviour is carried out by a small percentage of people who are bent on creating havoc among the community. I accept Mrs Kelly's sentiments on that matter.

Gerry Adams said that the majority of people in west Belfast are hard-working, and I accept that. However, it is important for his party to come out and fully support the PSNI, without any preconditions. Recently, members of the Policing Board agreed to send out letters of congratulations to PSNI officers who received honours in the Queen's Birthday Honours List, but Sinn Féin members said that they were taking nothing to do with it, which sent out negative vibes to the unionist community. That was a simple issue, but it sent out negative vibes to the unionist members of the Policing Board.

Mr A Maskey: I thank the Member for giving way. Does he agree that Sinn Féin members of the Policing Board, along with him and his party colleagues, have been extremely productive and constructive in recent months? I expect the Member to acknowledge that Sinn Féin members have demonstrated that commitment, and that it has been acknowledged by all of the PSNI senior management team. I look forward to working constructively with the Member in the future.

Mr Simpson: There has been a certain amount of work in relation to moving forward on the issue of policing, but my point is that when such a statement is made by members of the Policing Board, it sends out negative vibes to the unionist community. We have a long way to go on the policing issue, but I hope that things will work out and that we can send out a message to the unionist community that we are here to deliver policing. I have to wonder where the corporate responsibility lies when it comes to policing. That needs to be addressed.

The recent release of Eamon Foley, who was convicted for the rape of 91-year-old Mary-Anne McLaughlin, is nothing short of a national disgrace — a disaster, an absolute disgrace. On the issue of 50% remission for sex offenders, Minister Goggins gave a commitment to me in the Northern Ireland Grand Committee on 24 July. He stated that:

"The simple fact is that in Northern Ireland, too many victims of sexual crime and domestic violence do not have the confidence to come forward, and they need such confidence. They need the help of the police service, the prosecution service, voluntary organisations and others to sustain successful prosecutions and bring perpetrators to justice, and I shall join him in ensuring that we do better on that issue."

Dr Farry said that there was insufficient public confidence to devolve policing and justice powers. In a recent MORI poll carried out for the 'Belfast Telegraph', only 19% of the community said that there was confidence to move forward, so we have a long way to go.

If the Assembly believes that it must get policing right, Members must send a signal to the public that we are determined to do so and to advance with a zero-tolerance policy. Mr Weir referred to New York: when a zero-tolerance policy was introduced there, crime plummeted. If a similar policy were adopted in Northern Ireland, it would send out a signal to those who harass our senior citizens and commit vicious crimes and murders across the entire community. If every Member supports the motion, a positive signal would be sent across the political divide that the Assembly is determined to resolve policing when there is sufficient public confidence.

5.30 pm

Mr McNarry: During another emotional debate not so long ago, the president of Sinn Féin asked unionists whether they were listening. He then told us that he was listening. Does my honourable friend agree that the president of Sinn Féin now has the opportunity to express those same sentiments in response to what is being asked?

Mr Speaker: Unfortunately, the Member's time is up.

Mr Simpson: I will say yes.

Question, That the amendment be made, put and negatived.

Main Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly condemns the recent murder of Mr Harry Holland, and other crimes, including the assault and robbery of an elderly resident in Dromore; supports the call for a zero tolerance policy against crime and anti-social behaviour on our streets; and opposes any move by the Northern Ireland Office to cut the policing budget or reduce the number of officers in the Police Service of Northern Ireland.

Adjourned at 5.32 pm.

NORTHERN IRELAND ASSEMBLY

I know that the House wishes Mrs Devon every success as she joins the Northern Ireland Assembly for a short period.

Monday 8 October 2007

The Assembly met at 12.00 noon (Mr Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

ASSEMBLY BUSINESS

Mr Attwood: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. I wish to address a matter that has just arisen. This morning, Members received in their pigeonholes a letter from the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister (OFMDFM) — signed by both Dr Paisley and Mr McGuinness — that advises of their proposed process in respect of the appointment of the Commissioner for Victims and Survivors. The First Minister and the deputy First Minister now wish to re-advertise that position.

Is it in order, on a matter of heightened public interest, if not concern — and on a matter that has been debated far and wide among the Northern Ireland public — that neither the First Minister nor the deputy First Minister has come to the Floor of the House to make a statement and to take questions from Members?

Is it in order that the height of the respect for this Chamber of the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister is such as to send a minute to Members, rather than to come to the Floor —

Mr Speaker: Order. I ask the Member to take his seat. I have listened to the point of order. I shall take the matter to the Business Committee and report back to the Assembly as soon as possible.

At the sitting on 24 September 2007, when I announced the retirement of the Clerk to the Assembly, Mr Arthur Moir, I reported that the Assembly Commission was taking steps to ensure the continuity of service to the Assembly.

In that regard, the Commission has asked me to announce the appointment of Mrs Carol Devon as interim Clerk and Chief Executive with effect from 17 October 2007. Mrs Devon is currently employed as Director of Access and Information at the Scottish Parliament and previously served the Parliament as Director of Clerking and Reporting.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT

Further Education Lecturers' Pay Dispute

Mr Speaker: I have received notice from the Minister for Employment and Learning that he wishes to make a statement on the current position of the further education lecturers' pay dispute.

The Minister for Employment and Learning (Sir Reg Empey): Today, I am pleased to announce the appointment by my Department of an independent adviser to facilitate an agreement in the further education lecturers' pay dispute. Sir Joseph Pilling, a former permanent under-secretary in the Northern Ireland Office, has agreed to act as the independent adviser in the dispute.

Sir Joseph is eminently qualified for the role, having had experience of industrial relations in the Department of Health and in the prison service of England and Wales.

The terms of reference for Sir Joseph, which have been agreed by college employers and the lecturers' unions are to explore the position of each interested party including, in particular, the employers and unions; and, using the insights that this provides, to facilitate a settlement of the dispute, which is acceptable to all interested parties.

Any settlement arising from the study will be compliant with the Government's public-sector pay policy, the continued application of which in Northern Ireland has been endorsed by the Executive. It is in the interests of all concerned to get this process under way as soon as possible, in the hope of an early resolution, perhaps by the end of 2007.

This initiative has arisen from my recent discussions with college employers and with lecturers' unions on what can be done to bring to an end this long-standing pay dispute, which is starting to impact on students' education. It is clear to me that discussion between both parties needs to resume as soon as possible. A resolution to the problem will come about only through discussion and dialogue.

The appointment of the independent adviser, with his expertise and independent status, will facilitate this process. In the meantime, and without prejudice to any further negotiations on pay, I have suggested to the unions that lecturers accept the pay offer for 2006-07. Management is also in a position to make a similar basic pay offer to lecturers for 2007-08 as part of a two-year pay deal. If the offers were accepted by the unions, the pay increases could be in the pockets of lecturers by Christmas.

I am convinced that the appointment of Sir Joseph Pilling as independent adviser is a positive development in the dispute and that his work will be pivotal in helping to remove the impasse that currently exists in the negotiations.

With goodwill on all sides, I hope that it will be possible to bring an end to the dispute and to restore normal service in colleges for the benefit of all concerned.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Employment and Learning (Ms S Ramsey): Go raibh maith agat. I thank the Minister for his statement. I would like to say a few words on behalf of the Committee.

The issue came to the attention of the Committee at its first meeting on 16 May 2007 and has been on its agenda, in some shape or form, since then. The Committee has met the employer and trade union sides and is supportive of the principle of pay parity. The Minister has been helpful in keeping the Committee up to date, and I thank him for that. He has contacted me personally on several occasions in order to keep me up to date so that I can, in turn, update Committee members.

The Committee has worked hard to understand the dispute and, in particular, to assess the implications of the public-sector pay policy. Despite the restrictions within which the Committee is working, I stress that it views this dispute as being extremely damaging, and everyone must work together to ensure that it is resolved.

The Committee has not had the opportunity to discuss this ministerial statement. However, there is universal support for the renewed negotiations, and I hope that there will be a fresh impetus on both sides to find a clear way forward on this critical issue. With that in mind, will the Minister tell us when he expects the new round of negotiations to get under way and whether he will continue to keep the Committee fully up to date about progress and, we hope, outcomes? Go raibh maith agat.

Sir Reg Empey: The Committee, in order to fulfil its obligations, must be given as much information as possible, and I have endeavoured to do that. The Department for Employment and Learning will seek the help of the Committee in all these matters to ensure that students in our further education colleges receive the best possible service. It must be remembered that those colleges form a significant part of our economic development strategy, which is why the issue is important to the Department.

The Member specifically asked when the negotiations would start. As soon as the debate on my statement has finished, the first meeting will take place between Sir Joseph Pilling and officials from the Department of Finance and Personnel (DFP), and he will then meet me at lunchtime. Tomorrow, Sir Joseph hopes to meet officials from the Department for Employment and Learning, and the employer and trade union sides. Therefore, the negotiations are getting off to a quick start. In my statement, I said that I would like the process to be completed by the end of the year, but I do not want to prescribe that time frame unnecessarily. If more time is needed, that will be fine.

Mr Spratt: I thank the Minister for his statement and for his commitment throughout this process. I also thank him for keeping the Committee fully apprised about any ongoing talks.

Given Sir Joseph Pilling's remit, will the Minister tell us whether Sir Joseph will be in a position to speak to Treasury officials to see whether that impasse can be broken?

Sir Reg Empey: DFP is the main link in the relationship between the Northern Ireland Administration and the Executive. As soon as the debate is finished, Sir Joseph will meet DFP officials, with whom he will discuss the mechanics of how we might engage with the Treasury. A report from the Sub-Committee on Public Sector Pay referred to "efficiencies", but we do not know exactly what that means. There are also some technical matters to be discussed. Without protocol being broken, DFP officials will be able to facilitate a channel being opened to the Treasury to find out exactly what is meant by the word "efficiencies".

Mr McClarty: I thank the Minister for his statement this morning and congratulate him on giving this issue the priority that it undoubtedly deserves. I ask him to gaze into his crystal ball and outline what he thinks this might mean for the industrial action being taken by the lecturers.

Sir Reg Empey: The Member will be aware that there have been about seven strike days over the past 15 months or thereabouts. On 18 September, University and College Union (UCU) members and their colleagues wrote to the employers advising that they were preparing to step up industrial action. At the moment, the action is taking the form of not providing the college authorities with information on attendance at certain classes, and various other matters. The letter announcing the potential escalation of the industrial action highlighted matters such as non-compliance with the education maintenance allowance procedures, which would impact on the allowances being paid to students. I have indicated great concern at that proposal.

In the notes that I have been dealing with recently, I have said that I hope that, bearing in mind that the unions have to consult their members and their branches, when those talks commence, the best possible circumstances in which they could proceed would be in the absence of industrial action. I hope, therefore, that that action can be suspended once the union members are absolutely clear that the Department — and, I am quite sure, this House — is taking the process seriously. I would not have asked a senior person of Sir Joseph's standing to come into this if we were not taking it seriously. I hope that, after consultation, the members of the trade unions will see fit to suspend their actions. However, that will be a matter for them to discuss with the independent adviser. I look forward to an early decision on the matter.

Mr Attwood: I welcome the Minister's statement and his presence on the Floor of the House this morning, in contrast to one or two of his Executive colleagues. I note that, in response to Mr Spratt's question about a facility whereby Sir Joseph Pilling may have access to the guardians of pay policy in London, it is my sense that, in the fullness of time, those guardians will have to bend on this issue when it comes to pay policy in the North.

Given that the terms of reference are silent on the issue of pay parity for the further education sector in Northern Ireland, and given that this is at the heart of the dispute, will the Minister confirm that it is his wish that the issue of pay parity be now met?

Sir Reg Empey: It is inconceivable to me that that issue would not be first and foremost in the minds of the trade unions when they meet Sir Joseph and the employers. In relation to the first point, about the Member for South Belfast, all Members know that there are certain protocols in dealing with the Treasury. However, officials from DFP have been extremely helpful to my Department throughout the process, and I am not anticipating any difficulties. It is important that people do not go off at a tangent and leave DFP unsighted. We are having very open discussions, and we are not confronting any difficulties. Those who are responsible for making and implementing the policy in London will be fully involved and consulted, and questions will be asked.

Pay parity is the issue. However, there are wider issues here. If we go down that route, terms and conditions will start to come into it, and there are considerable differences there.

I assure the Member that all those issues will be discussed. The terms of reference have — quite deliberately — not been drawn up in a prescriptive manner. I am not trying to rule out anything; I am trying to create the circumstances in which members of trade unions and the employers can bring all the issues to the table. Parity will be one of them. However, there are two sides to that coin: the money side and the terms and conditions. The terms of reference are such — and were designed as such — that they will allow a free and open discussion to take place between the two sides, under the chairmanship of the independent adviser.

Ms Lo: I thank the Minister for his statement, and I very much welcome the appointment of Sir Joseph Pilling. It is of great urgency and importance that this matter be resolved as quickly as possible. I welcome the Minister's effort and commitment in trying to facilitate a meeting between the employer and the employees. Essentially, as other Members have said, it is about trying to put pressure on, and work with, the Treasury to resolve the UK public-pay restrictions in Northern Ireland. At a time when the new colleges are up and running, and with the start of the new term, it is vital that Members support further education lecturers in their demand for fair pay.

Sir Reg Empey: I thank the Member for her contribution. As she said, the colleges have been amalgamated to form new ones, and it would have been my hope that those could have started off, on 1 August 2007, with the lecturers, on whom we depend to deliver the policy, feeling happy and comfortable with their terms and conditions. That has not been the case. However, given the situation as it stands, I felt that it was important not to leave the issues to fester and that some initiative was required to move the matter forward.

The Treasury has a national policy on public-sector pay, which the Executive have endorsed. Again, in the debate on this issue on 26 June 2007, I made it clear that it was the most bizarre industrial dispute that I had ever been involved with. Everyone wanted to settle it, everyone had agreed to settle it, the money to settle it was there, but it could not be settled because of a national pay policy. That has created huge frustrations. As long as that frustration is there, combined with ongoing industrial action, there is always the risk that an event will take place, the employer will take action, and the dispute will escalate, with the upping of industrial action.

Although it is true that the Treasury sets the policies, it does not have to deal with the downstream consequences. That is the difficulty that we face. That is why I said earlier that I hoped that, on a without-prejudice basis, the lecturers could accept the money that has been offered, if for no other reason than to put it in their pockets this side of Christmas. That would not constrain them—it is a without-prejudice offer—in the event that there were to be a change in public-sector pay policy. I hope that the lecturers will accept the offer.

It is important, however, as the Member said, to ensure that there is the best possible atmosphere and commitment in the new colleges, if we are to get the best possible result for the people we represent.

Mr Newton: Like my colleagues, I welcome the Minister's statement. It is an issue that needs to be resolved, and not only in the context of the further education lecturers; it is important to the economy of Northern Ireland.

I note that Sir Joseph has been appointed as an independent adviser. As the Minister stated, Sir Joseph is eminently well qualified for the role and obviously enjoys the Minister's confidence. However, will the Minister tell us whether his Department will be bound by the report's findings when it is published?

Sir Reg Empey: Standing Orders do not bind anyone to act on the findings of any report. However, public-sector pay policy is the overarching framework within which we must work. We must also be aware that a determination that was issued in February 2007 is on the record already. Having said that, there is a certain lack of clarity in some of the comments that have been made about efficiencies. I do not know exactly what creating efficiencies would mean in practice. A fresh proposal or approach could be made to the Committee for Employment and Learning if circumstances were to change.

Although I will not be bound by the report, and I do not think that any party to the dispute will be, if we were not taking the issue seriously, we would not bring in a senior career civil servant of Sir Joseph's standing. Moreover, we would not go through the whole exercise, if we were going to cast aside the study's findings lightly. I emphasise that the point of appointing someone of such standing is to send a clear signal to employers, unions and the public-sector pay bodies that we are taking the matter seriously and that everybody should look carefully at the outcome of the study. I am not legally bound by the study, but I intend to return to the House as soon as is practicable with a response to it. At that stage, whether I make another statement, whether we have a debate or whether the Committee intervenes, I want to ensure that Members are as fully involved in the matter as they have been heretofore.

Mr Butler: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his statement and for his continued efforts to resolve the dispute.

The Minister's statement says that the settlement must be:

“compliant with the Government's public-sector pay policy”.

That creates the perception that the unions have agreed to that policy. My understanding is that they would oppose any settlement that is restricted within the parameters of public-sector pay policy.

Will the Minister also clarify whether the terms of reference are such that the independent adviser will explore, if requested, the basis on which lecturers here belong to the only group in the educational sector that falls under the public-sector pay policy?

Sir Reg Empey: It seems inevitable that that fact will be addressed. I held meetings on either 7 or 14 September with representatives both of the trade unions and the employers, and when I met with the unions, national officials came to the Department along with local officials. Therefore, I met with a high-level delegation. They discussed the situation in Wales, and they mentioned all the issues that the House debated before the summer. As I said, the terms of reference are as broad and as open as I can make them. Notes are attached to those terms of reference, and they are essentially statements from me, but I understand the unions' position on public-sector pay policy. I am not trying to force them into accepting or endorsing any particular policy, but we all live in the real world. Therefore, I must say — the Executive have endorsed this — that we are bound by current policy.

However, I am unclear — as, it appears, is everyone else — over some explanations of what the Sub-Committee on Public Sector Pay meant by “efficiencies”. I am sure that Sir Joseph will look at that. I am sure that the honourable Member knows that there is no way in which trade unions are going to meet with employers and Sir Joseph and not raise his point about how their position compares with that of other workers in the same sector. It is precisely the type of forum in which those points can be raised. Although Sir Joseph is described as an independent adviser, he will also be an interested party, as will my Department and DFP. We are trying to attach some gravitas and weight to Sir Joseph's role so that, when he comes up with his recommendations, everybody, including the Sub-Committee on Public Sector Pay, will take them seriously.

I have left the terms of reference, which have been accepted, as broad as possible. Let us allow the negotiations to take place in the best possible atmosphere that we can create, so that there will exist at least some possibility of a successful outcome. If we continue with the trench warfare that we have been in for the past lot of months, we will get nowhere, while the students and the colleges will continue to suffer. The employees are unhappy, and that does not make for the implementation of a successful policy in the further education sector. That must be self-evident.

I hope that the objective of the initiative will not be to restrict people in what they can say and what issues they can raise, but, nevertheless, I am obliged to set out the context in which we are operating.

Mr McCausland: I welcome the Minister's statement. There is widespread interest in, and concern about, this issue. Will the Minister confirm whether he has discussed the pay offer for 2006-07 and 2007-08 with the trade unions, and, if so, will he outline their response?

Sir Reg Empey: The Member will be aware that the actual pay offer for 2006-07 and 2007-08 is primarily a matter for the employers and the employees to agree. It would not be normal for the Department to be involved in those discussions — but for one issue. When it became clear that this was within the scope of public-sector pay policy, the Department had a role to play. Our role was to ensure that that policy was adhered to. If not for that, we would have played no role in the industrial relations between the employers and the trade unions. That is how we got into the position that we are in.

The Department, along with the unions and employers, made a submission to the Sub-Committee on Public Sector Pay at the end of 2006. That submission was subsequently adjudicated on in February 2007. Hitherto, we would not have been party to the actual negotiation of terms and conditions and pay. Our role was created only because of the existence of the public-sector pay policy. That is how and why we became involved. We have not been involved in the minutiae of negotiations — that is between the unions and the employers — but their agreement triggered a reference to the Sub-Committee on Public Sector Pay, and that is where we came in. Both sides were agreeable to paying the agreed offer. The Department had no anxieties over paying it, but when the policy was imposed, and it was deemed that the offer had to be referred, that was the point at which we arrived at the position in which we currently find ourselves.

I hope that the pay offers that have been made can be accepted on the basis that I outlined earlier — at least for the current year — without prejudice to any subsequent change in attitude by the Sub-Committee on Public Sector Pay.

Mr Gardiner: First, I commend the Minister for his swift action in trying to resolve this difficulty. Would he be prepared, if invited, to help the Minister of Education to sort out the classroom assistants' dispute?

Secondly, under the pay policy, what scope is there to improve lecturers' pay?

Sir Reg Empey: That is what might be called a leading question, Mr Speaker. Are those still allowed in the House?

I will deal with Mr Gardiner's second point first. As I tried to explain, at present, the scope for improving lecturers' pay is limited, and DFP has been interpreting what exists. A referral to the Sub-Committee on Public Sector Pay is triggered only if DFP believes that a proposal exceeds the limit. DFP determined that measure last year — hence the referral.

Pay percentages may increase in some circumstances, such as when there is clear evidence of a lack of retention of lecturers. Even though there were pockets where that was so, it was not the case generally, so the Sub-Committee on Public Sector Pay ruled out that option.

The Sub-Committee will want to explore what scope there is for efficiencies, and how that is interpreted and understood not only by DFP but by the Treasury. Those areas must be explored. I say to the honourable Member that we must wait and see. Although I do not want to overstate the position, I want to ensure that the negotiations take place in the best possible atmosphere.

The Member's first question was whether I was prepared to help my colleague the Minister of Education to resolve the classroom assistants' dispute. I will confine my remarks to saying that that is a matter for her, Mr Speaker.

Mr Durkan: I join other Members in thanking the Minister for his statement, his wider efforts and the initiative that he has taken. Does the Minister agree that lecturers are, through their work, providing benefits and key services not only to students but, in many instances, to communities, community organisations, other public services and, increasingly, businesses and small businesses through the Further Education Means Business review programme.

Even though the Minister mentioned the handful of days of industrial disputes in the past couple of years, one must remember that lecturers have delivered positively on that agenda and have delivered positively on college mergers. It is in that context that lecturers' frustrations must be fully understood and appreciated.

The Minister referred to the pay offer for last year and this year. He said that it could be in people's pockets by Christmas. Will the Minister inform the House of the sums involved so that we might be able to understand their relevance to the lecturers' frustrations?

Does the Minister agree that the exercise that Sir Joseph Pilling will be undertaking is similar to the hole in dear Liza's bucket? No matter what the unions and employers say, it comes back to the issue of the perverse adherence to public-sector pay policy. It is a self-contained grievance and anomaly, which should be resolved on its own terms, without threatening any wider run on public-sector pay policy.

Sir Reg Empey: I am grateful to the Member for his comments. He has a keen interest in the matter and has already expressed concern to me in correspondence on a number of occasions in recent weeks. First, I accept, agree with and endorse his comments that the lecturers provide a beneficial service not only to the colleges but to the wider community. I am also pleased that he mentioned the link with business, because that is becoming increasingly important and significant. It is unfortunate that that relationship is growing against a backdrop of an industrial relations dispute. That business link provides an even greater incentive to get the dispute resolved as quickly as possible.

The Member is correct that the dear-Liza-and-her-bucket scenario is an anomaly, but we have to examine some of the reasons for that. It is an anomaly because, as a Member for West Belfast Mr Butler said, lecturers are the only educational workers that are caught in this dispute. Why is that? Has there been a structural change as to who negotiates their terms and conditions and how that is done? The link between teachers and lecturers in Wales, for instance, will also have to be examined. If we get involved in a headbutting session with the Treasury, the Member knows better than most in the House that that will lead us nowhere. Therefore, we must keep as many options open as possible.

The offer for 2006-07 was in the region of 3.49%. There was a further cost of living offer of 2% for 2007-08, and other adjustments made that slightly higher. However, bearing in mind that that would be applicable from September 2006, quite a lot of back payment is available. There is, perhaps, an opportunity for immediate benefit without people having to accept an offer that, should public-sector pay policy change, would leave them trapped. That was not the intention for 2007-08.

I apologise to Mr Butler — a Member for Lagan Valley — for misnaming his constituency.

That is the current position, and I thank the Member for Foyle for his ongoing interest in the matter.

Mr Ross: I also welcome the Minister's statement, but I seek clarification on one point. The terms of reference set for Sir Joseph are:

"To explore the position of each interested party, including, in particular, the employers and unions".

Who are the other interested parties and what has been their role thus far?

Sir Reg Empey: As I define them, the interested parties are, of course, the employers, the unions, the Department for Employment and Learning, DFP, and the independent adviser. Everyone who is interested and can effect some change is involved, and, obviously, DFP will have a particular interest in interpreting and discussing some of the details with the Treasury. I am trying to keep involved everyone who is essential to resolving this problem.

The Department has two interests. From a policy point of view, it wants the sector to deliver for our economic, and other, benefits. However, the Department also has a specific role to play in ensuring that public-sector pay policy is adhered to.

Ultimately, Sir Joseph Pilling will be an interested party, and his appointment gives him some gravitas and status so that when people speak to him, or when he interfaces with Government at whatever level, he will have a real focus on reaching an outcome.

I hope that that explains the position.

Mr B McCrea: I commend the Minister for the innovative and creative way in which he has sought to tackle a problem that has frustrated us all. I note the comments of the Chairperson and the Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Employment and Learning that we have all wrestled for quite some time with this issue. I guess that we are all still getting it in the neck — if that is not unparliamentary language — from people who are asking us to please do something.

Given that several disputes are currently ongoing, will the Minister tell the House whether what he is doing with regard to this dispute can be used as a model for resolution?

Sir Reg Empey: The Member's last point has an echo of the question asked by my colleague from Upper Bann Mr Gardiner, but maybe I am reading too much into it.

There is no doubt that any industrial action in the public service is of great concern to everybody in the House, and, regrettably, industrial action is taking place in several areas of the public sector. I do not know the details of all the other disputes, and I am not sure whether this model would be applicable to them. However, the model is there, and if anybody wishes to ask me about it, I will be happy to make any suggestions or make available any information that the Department has.

The Member for Lagan Valley Mr McCrea made the point about the frustration that Members have felt for some months — particularly those on the Committee. That frustration is also felt in the Department and everywhere, because everybody wants the dispute settled. The Department thought that it was settled: the money is there to settle it, and there is universal agreement that it should be paid. However, Government are often more complicated than we would wish, and I am left in the middle of public-sector pay policy. The Department must look creatively to see whether all the issues that have been raised can be addressed.

I cannot promise Members that I will come back to the House at Christmas or in the new year with a glowing report and waving a piece of paper that says that the matter is settled. I do not know the answer. However, the past few months have got us nowhere. We are stuck in a rut, going round in circles saying that we want to pay the money and being told that we cannot. We have to see whether there is something that we can do. That is why we have this place — so that we can try to do things a bit differently on the local scene.

It is an anomaly, and the Member for Foyle Mr Durkan has drawn our attention to that. I am anxious to see whether matters can be fixed in some way, and this is a possible way. There are no guarantees, but at least we will give it a good try. All the relevant parties are around the table. We had excellent support from the Assembly during the debate in the summer, support from the Committee and support today. We are sending out a clear message to the parties involved and it is up to them to go away and see whether they can find a creative way of dealing with the matter within the context that I set out. I hope and expect that that will happen, but we will have to return to the matter at another date. I look forward to that opportunity.

Mr Cree: I also welcome the Minister's initiative and the attempt to break the logjam. This dispute has been running for some time, and we will all be glad to see a satisfactory solution. However, the question that I was minded to ask has just been answered, and I am happy with that.

COMMITTEE BUSINESS

Report of the Committee for Finance and Personnel on Workplace 2010

Mr Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour for this debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes to propose and 10 minutes for the winding-up speech. All other Members who speak will have five minutes.

The Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel (Mr Storey): I beg to move

That this Assembly takes note of the first Report of the Committee for Finance and Personnel on Workplace 2010 and the Location of Public Sector Jobs, and the response to the Report by the Department of Finance and Personnel.

At its first meeting on 16 May 2007, the Committee for Finance and Personnel agreed to include in its work programme up to the summer recess an initial scrutiny of Workplace 2010 and the separate, but related, issue of public-sector jobs location.

Mindful that decisions by the Minister and the Executive were pending on both issues, the Committee undertook that scrutiny between 6 June and 4 July 2007 and published a report of its findings. The timing was unfortunate in that it did not provide an opportunity to debate the report in the Assembly before the summer recess. However, the Committee's subsequent decision to publish a special report on the DFP response to the recommendations now provides such an opportunity.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr McClarty] in the Chair)

Workplace 2010 is a major element of the Civil Service reform programme, for which DFP is responsible. The project's stated aim is:

"to develop a strategic and affordable solution to the urgent accommodation problems facing the Northern Ireland Civil Service (NICS) office estate."

In a separate initiative, in January 2007, DFP commenced a public consultation on 'Guiding Principles for the Location of Public Sector Jobs in Northern Ireland'. Although the Committee recognises that jobs location is distinct from Workplace 2010, it has considered both issues in tandem. That approach reflects a general concern that Workplace 2010 has the potential to reduce the Executive's freedom to determine the future location of public-sector jobs.

In scrutinising the Workplace 2010 project, the Committee focused on the best-practice approach to procurement and on the lessons learned from existing private finance initiative projects, both in Northern Ireland and in the rest of the UK.

On the issue of the location of public-sector jobs, the Committee gave initial consideration to the development of a strategic dispersal policy aimed at maximising and realising potential economic and social benefits throughout Northern Ireland. That included consideration of the scope and constraints for dispersal, approaches being taken elsewhere and the relevance of existing cross-cutting policies.

The Committee received oral and written evidence from a wide range of stakeholders, including the Department of Finance and Personnel, the Northern Ireland Statistics and Research Agency, the Northern Ireland Audit Office, the National Audit Office, and the Northern Ireland Court Service. In addition, the Committee was able to draw on a range of published sources, including an inquiry report into public-private partnerships by its predecessor Committee and a report by the Committee on the Programme for Government into Workplace 2010 and public-sector jobs location.

I shall focus, first, on Workplace 2010. From the evidence received, the Committee made a range of key conclusions and recommendations that are designed to establish necessary safeguards and assurances before the Minister and the Executive make the final decisions on the project.

I want to draw Members' attention to the Committee's key conclusions and recommendations on Workplace 2010 and to the Department's response in each instance. At the outset, I should point out that the Committee gave its full support to the strategic objectives of the project, which aimed to enable the Northern Ireland Civil Service to transform the efficiency and effectiveness of the public services that it delivers, provide accommodation in which staff are proud to work and safeguard funding for priority front-line services.

The Committee expressed concerns, however, with some of the findings from the initial, "health-check", review of the Clare House pathfinder project for Workplace 2010, and awaits the outcome of the more extensive post-occupancy evaluation. The Department has advised the Committee that the results of that evaluation will be made available in December 2007.

The Committee recommended that, when finalising the business case, the Department should give due regard to concerns about the use of public-sector comparators and that it should broadly, and strategically, reassess procurement options. In its response, the Department gave a commitment that it will reassess procurement options when finalising the business case and will ensure that benefits, risks, uncertainties and costs are fully appraised.

The Committee considers that the acceptance of upfront capital receipts that are substantially lower than the full market value of properties is a high-risk aspect of Workplace 2010.

The Department has recognised the concerns of the Committee on that issue and has given an assurance that a significant amount of time and effort is being attributed to the commercial aspects of the contract.

The Committee further recommended that the properties to be included in Workplace 2010 should be valued by an independent commercial valuer in addition to the public-sector valuer, and that those valuations should be updated before the conclusion of negotiations.

The Department has accepted the Committee's recommendation and is making arrangements to identify an independent valuer to assess a representative number of properties, providing a benchmark report against which best and final offer bids can be assessed.

The Committee also called for transparency in the establishment of the affordability model and the efficacy of financing arrangements for the total property private finance initiative option. In addition, the Committee believes that there should be greater transparency in relation to the long-term commitments arising from private finance initiatives in Northern Ireland, and to their impact on future budgetary flexibility and affordability.

The Department has noted the findings and has provided assurance that, on the issue of transparency, a full audit trail on that project will be made available on budgetary transfers from Departments and financing arrangements in the Northern Ireland Civil Service.

The Committee further recommended that if the Workplace 2010 project is to proceed on a private finance initiative basis, the Department should ensure that the full range of applicable best-practice approaches and lessons are applied in respect of the final business case, the final contract and contract-management arrangements.

The Department has also accepted that recommendation and sought to assure the Committee that the programme has examined the recommendations of the Westminster Public Accounts Committee and related Treasury guidance on lessons learned. It has also sought to identify best practice from a range of projects, with a view to ensuring that the contract and the subsequent management arrangements reflect a best-in-class approach.

Moreover, with regard to Workplace 2010, the Committee sought firm assurances from the Department that the final business case will be independently and objectively assessed, that that assessment will cover the robustness of the public-sector comparator, and that the final contract will provide for all necessary safeguards, including those identified in the report.

The Department noted that recommendation and sought to assure the Committee that the need for an independent and objective assessment will be addressed through the Office of Government Commerce Gateway Review process, and the work of DFP Supply.

Regarding the location of public-sector jobs, the Committee recommended that the Department and the wider Executive should develop an affirmative policy for the dispersal of public-sector jobs that ensures the capacity of the public sector to deliver, efficiently and effectively, a range of services through a substantial and sustainable approach, and, as a priority, implement it for the benefit of the whole of Northern Ireland.

The Department has agreed with the Committee that it is important that a strategic approach is adopted. It also assured the Committee that the principles of achieving value for money and maximising social and economic benefits, in relation to the location of public-sector jobs in Northern Ireland, will remain a key feature in the final version of the framework to underpin decisions on the relocation of organisations under the review of public administration.

The Department has also committed a time-bound review of policy on the location of public-sector jobs. That will provide the opportunity to conduct a thorough analysis of the short- and long-term costs and the benefits of dispersal, as well as how best to maximise the longer-term economic, social and environmental benefits from an affirmative dispersal policy. That policy review will also take on board the Committee's call for lessons to be learned from experience of dispersal policies elsewhere, particularly in Scotland.

The Committee sought further assurances that the final Workplace 2010 contract and projected costs do not militate against the future strategic decisions on the location of public-sector jobs.

1.00 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker: I ask Mr Storey to bring his remarks to a conclusion.

Mr Storey: The Department responded by explaining that work is ongoing to develop a flexibility model for the "best and final offer" stage of the procurement that will not only secure a competitive price but also demonstrate best value for money and appropriate flexibility.

Ms J McCann: Go raibh maith agat. I welcome the Committee's report. There is no doubt that there is a need for efficiency and effectiveness in the way that public services are delivered. It is important to have modern working accommodation to provide that delivery. The report is important: it raises many questions about the efficiency of PFI, not least those issues identified by the Westminster Public Accounts Committee. It is claimed that, in order to justify the PFI option, Departments have relied too heavily on the public-sector comparators, and that there should be a wider examination of all other alternatives before an assessment of value for money is made.

The report has also raised important questions about the manner in which the long-term impact on the public purse has been assessed by the Department of Finance and Personnel. There are concerns that proper mechanisms are needed to allow for a form of continuous assessment, including an evaluation process throughout the life of the project, to ensure that value for money is obtained.

The successful management and delivery of PFI projects in recent years has also caused concern. The Clare House project provides an example of how problems can arise which cause disruption to staff and to the service they provide to the public. There is a compelling case for the redeployment of Civil Service and public-sector jobs more equally across the North of Ireland. The Committee has examined the proposed PFI for Workplace 2010 in the wider context of the redeployment of Civil Service and public-sector jobs, and of the long-term impact on such desirable re-employment across the North should it go ahead as a PFI project in its current format.

I welcome recent comments by the Minister of Finance and Personnel in relation to initiating a review of policy options on the location of public-sector jobs that would enable the Executive to come to an agreed approach on location policy in the North of Ireland. There is a need to create balanced local development throughout the North and to help kick-start local economies in line with equality and New TSN obligations.

My party is concerned that Workplace 2010, as presently constituted, will merely copper-fasten the status quo and replicate current patterns of investment and disadvantage. That is unacceptable. Serious questions must be answered in relation to the whole issue of PFI projects. In effect, the taxpayer is being asked to fund guaranteed profits for private companies. As a result of Workplace 2010 in its current form, not only will the companies have significant profit at the end of the contract, they will still own the buildings — and they will be ready to repeat the contract again at the taxpayer's expense. In short, it could serve the interests of the private corporations more than those of the general public. Therefore, it is vital that the contract specifications of any proposed PFI project be robust and effective to ensure value for money and to protect the public interest.

Mr Beggs: The Ulster Unionist Party is committed to the provision of quality services in an efficient and effective manner. The objective to be achieved is quality public services. We have no ideological barriers as to how that can be achieved; however, we have concerns regarding the Workplace 2010 project that should be comprehensively addressed.

The setting in which we find ourselves is significant. To be fair to the Minister, it is appropriate that Members take that into consideration. The Northern Ireland block grant is under significant pressure — greater pressure than I have previously been aware of. As a member of the Committee for Finance and Personnel, the message I have been receiving from the Department is that the budget will be tight. There is not much money about.

Where is the £1 billion dowry that we were promised before devolution? We face funding difficulties in upgrading hospitals, schools and water and transport infrastructures, as well as Civil Service office accommodation, which is often of poor quality. There is significant pressure to find ways to finance all that. It would be helpful if the Minister could outline how the new resource accounting procedures will affect the capital assets that are held by the Northern Ireland Civil Service.

The PFI project exposes the public service to considerable risks. At the end of a contract, there is the possibility of a monopoly situation. We have been told that there is a buy-back option, but what if the buildings in question are irreplaceable? How that may affect their value must be considered carefully.

There is a risk that private-sector partners may make excessive profits if they decide to redevelop sites. How do we ensure that there is a satisfactory and legally enforceable clawback provision should that happen? Recently, the Public Accounts Committee heard evidence about how, in the past, the private sector has run rings around the public sector on occasion and made considerable profits.

A cost will be incurred if adjustments are made to the contract mid-process, so it is important to have some built-in flexibility. Such a situation may be expensive to adjust as the developer may have a strong hand, so it must be carefully gauged. The risk of the developer, having taken ownership of the properties, going bust must be carefully examined to ensure that the project is not entirely funded by loans from large banks. Such an essentially unstable situation must be avoided at all costs. We cannot afford to have uncertain ownership of the buildings. I am still seeking clarification from the Minister of Finance and Personnel as to why newly refurbished buildings are being sold. I ask him to address the issue of jobs and benefits offices being sold, despite millions of pounds having been spent on them.

I now turn to the Clare House pathfinder pilot project for Workplace 2010, which received a very poor rating of 3.9 out of 9 in the March 2007 report that was submitted to the Committee for Finance and Personnel. That rating is very worrying, particularly as it is for a brand-new building in a pathfinder project. I hope that there will be a much better pilot outcome before a decision is made.

I remind Members that there is significant disparity in the location of Civil Service jobs. It is not simply an east-west issue. Parts of constituencies in the east of the Province have few Civil Service jobs; that applies irrespective of whether one measures those jobs by the total number of jobs located in an area or the number per percentage of the population who are economically active. Regrettably, parts of my constituency of East Antrim come out worst. It is important that our actions achieve a balance. There are considerable costs involved in relocating Civil Service jobs, but there are potential savings and benefits to the environment. When opportunities arise, they should be considered seriously.

Mr O'Loan: As other Members have correctly stated, Workplace 2010 is a major proposal, for which the stakes are high. However, potential gains and associated risks are great, so the right decisions must be taken. I broadly welcome the objectives of the project; they seek to achieve quality accommodation that will be linked to quality service. Good accommodation ought to lead to good staff morale, and good buildings ought to be fit for purpose and linked to good service. I welcome the reference to flexible accommodation.

I have concerns about the emphasis that has been put on open-plan designing, given that it is somewhat unproven as to whether that is always the best option. The objective is to have a smaller and more efficient property portfolio. Although everyone seeks efficiency, a smaller portfolio carries some risks as it might present barriers to decentralisation. There is no doubt, however, that major reform of the public-sector infrastructure is a worthy objective. Workplace 2010 is certainly a major step towards that. I welcome the specific objectives of local economic growth and flexibility of location, which tie in with the desire for the decentralisation of public-sector jobs.

The warnings about public-sector comparators, which compare PFI with conventional procurement, must be taken seriously. The Westminster Public Accounts Committee refers to past comparators as having been given:

“a spurious precision which is not justified by the uncertainties involved in their calculation”.

In general, the Workplace 2010 report issues a heavy health warning to the Department of Finance and Personnel to be wary of the uncertainties of the process, to assess the risks, and to build in a high level of protection. There must be wariness of the beguiling attractions of a PFI solution.

The Deputy Chairperson of the Committee referred rightly to the trade-off between the amount of the upfront capital payment and the annual unitary charge. That must be calculated properly, otherwise there may be a great loss to the public sector that might be visible only later in the contract. The Committee has sought and obtained welcome reassurance on the independent valuation of assets. It has also taken comfort from the assurances of the independent gateway review of the entire process. The Committee believes that a significant amount has been learnt from past PFI errors. It is chastened — as the Assembly should be — by the awareness that officials will have undoubtedly come before elected representatives and assured them that all contingencies had been considered during the development of those subsequent PFI projects that turn out to be disasters. It is not always the case, however, that all contingencies have been considered.

The scale of the contract and potential subcontracts is an important issue. There are many small businesses in Northern Ireland. It is crucial that local businesses are in a position to tender for subcontracts when they are awarded. I seek reassurance from the Minister on that.

My party is committed to the decentralisation of public-sector jobs. It recognises that there must be a strategic approach to that that maximises local economic development and the quality of Government services. It is a complex issue that must be tackled properly, and I welcome steps that the Minister has taken to do so. The report rightly continues to stress the need for Workplace 2010 to have the flexibility to provide dispersal. When queried on that, departmental officials have said that that is very much part of the scheme. An advantage is that it is clearly costed. Northern Ireland can learn significantly from the Scottish experience on decentralisation.

We must be conscious of Partenaire's legal challenge. The Department currently seeks a further £0.6 million to cover potential legal costs, indicating the substantial blockage that could occur.

In summary, I give a cautious go-ahead to the process.

Dr Farry: Like other Members, I endorse the report from the Committee for Finance and Personnel. It is a valuable piece of research, and it is pleasing to see Committees bring detailed reports to the Assembly.

Workplace 2010 is an important project that has major implications for the entire Northern Ireland Civil Service. Potentially, 20,000 employees could be affected. It is important that the Assembly takes seriously its responsibility to provide quality facilities for staff to work in and quality service for the public of Northern Ireland. It is also important that Members do not judge PFI as good or bad on an ideological basis, but rather on a case-by-case basis, in order to decide when its use is appropriate.

1.15 pm

This project is of a huge scale and is the largest PFI project to date in Northern Ireland. It is also one of the largest PFI projects to be undertaken in the United Kingdom. Therefore, it carries major consequences.

Undoubtedly, just as we learn lessons from elsewhere, people elsewhere will seek to learn from how we in Northern Ireland approach the matter.

I emphasise the importance of flexibility in what we seek to do with the contract. Mr Lunn has referred to the issue of what will now become subcontractors. A wide range of businesses in Northern Ireland have been contractors to the Civil Service. Now, in the single-contract approach, their only hope for business is to become subcontractors. There is concern that they may no longer have the access to work that they formerly had.

We must be conscious of becoming locked in to particular budgets — such as sustaining a certain level of maintenance costs relating to the actual implementation of any overall contract. I am thinking, in particular, of an extremely tight fiscal situation where Departments have to make efficiencies. If we are locked into a contract with respect to certain costs, there could be a danger that efficiencies will be sought disproportionately from front-line services, to the detriment of service delivery to the people of Northern Ireland. Again, we must be conscious of that concern.

I am wary of the timing of the Workplace 2010 contract and the Executive's evolving policy on the dispersal of jobs. Since this report was drafted, the Minister has made it clear that the Executive will bring forward that policy in the next year. In his last appearance on the Floor of the Assembly, the Minister made it clear that decisions on the policy will largely be in place by the time the contract has been finalised. Perhaps we need to go a little further than that and ensure that the final contract is entirely informed by the Assembly's wishes as regards to job dispersal. Otherwise, the cost involved in making contract variations later on might outweigh the savings gained by the Assembly — in the short term — from the early implementation of the contract. Some detailed financial analysis must be done on the pros and cons of the matter to ensure that the Assembly finds the best balance and ensures value for money for the people of Northern Ireland.

With reference to job dispersal, I feel bound to refer to the situation of Bangor — and I make no apologies for doing so. While there is no formal policy in place for job dispersal, under the current proposals Bangor will see a negative dispersal of jobs because Department of Finance and Personnel staff and Department of Education (DE) staff will be further concentrated in Belfast. That will have major implications for the local economy in Bangor. It will account for large job losses — with detrimental effects for local contractors — as the Civil Service is currently the largest employer in Bangor.

It will also add further burdens to the road network, which is already chock-a-block, and runs against the whole spirit of sustainability. That loss of jobs is opposed by the local workforce. I stress that as many as 500 civil servants are currently on a waiting list to relocate to Bangor. The situation, in which Bangor is set to lose jobs, should be highlighted. Bangor has an image of being rich in Civil Service jobs. However, those civil servants commute into Belfast. We do not have a concentration of current workers.

Mr Weir: I welcome the report and the response from the Department of Finance and Personnel. It is essential that we debate this important issue and that the first report of the Committee for Finance and Personnel is dealing with these two important subjects. Given the timescale under which we are operating, it is unsurprising that many of the proposals are being put forward in a cautious manner. The opportunity to evaluate a lot of this stuff has been relatively limited. Therefore, I will avoid the temptation — to which others have succumbed — to do a lot of hand-wringing, or display angst, about Workplace 2010 or PFI.

In particular, I will avoid the general tirade against the private sector that we heard from the party opposite. It struck me as strange that, at one stage, it seemed that that party was about to storm the Bastille in opposition to private-sector involvement, and then it effectively concluded that it is important to ensure that the PFI contracts are right. There appears to be a divergence between rhetoric and reality.

We should remind ourselves that the Committee, as the Deputy Chairperson said, endorsed the three main aims of Workplace 2010: to enable the Civil Service to transform its public services in terms of efficiency and effectiveness; to provide accommodation in which staff are proud to work; and to safeguard funding for priority front-line services. Irrespective of the financial circumstances in which Northern Ireland finds itself in the future, and whatever the budgetary constraints, it is important that we provide the most efficient and effective resources and that those are concentrated on front-line services. Workplace 2010, if implemented correctly, will provide the best possible and most efficient use of services at the earliest possible opportunity. For all the many concerns that have been expressed about Workplace 2010 — and it is right that we ensure that matters are delivered correctly — I have yet to hear a practical alternative being offered that can deliver and provide the best resources.

Some of the problems that arose with the pathfinder project at Clare House were highlighted. It is clear from DFP's response that lessons have been learnt from that. Indeed, the whole point of a pathfinder project is to find out where problems arise, so that when the project is rolled out in a wider context, those problems can be addressed. I am convinced from the measured tones of DFP's responses that this matter will not be approached in a cavalier fashion, that lessons will be learnt and that, as regards Workplace 2010, the best possible system will put in place.

Unfortunately, in the second part of the report, there has perhaps not been the same level of focus on the location of public-sector jobs. Paragraph 64 of the report states that:

“the Committee contends that this policy should not be framed simply in terms of the demographics of public sector jobs location or the need to transfer jobs outside the Belfast area. Rather, a strategic approach is required”.

As was mentioned by a Member who spoke earlier in the debate, it is not simply an east-west issue; there are areas, particularly in the greater Belfast area, that have either not received their fair share of jobs, or cannot face any potential job loss.

It is also important to note that the report states that the Department:

“in categorising the location of offices within the public sector, should accurately reflect geographic reality.”

In that regard, I concur with at least some of Mr Farry’s remarks. It is important that Rathgael House is not simply lumped in with the Belfast offices. Take, for instance, the allocation of the social security offices: we found it rather strange that Bangor and Newtownabbey were lumped in as part of Belfast, whereas other offices that are part of the BMAP (Belfast metropolitan area plan) area were taken as being outside of Belfast. If there is to be proper dispersal of jobs, it is important that that dispersal is carried out on a basis that reflects reality.

The Committee also noted that the costs of dispersal are important. We must have an approach that delivers to people. That is why I welcome the Department’s indication that it will take this matter forward through the Executive, and that it will take a much more strategic look at it to ensure that whatever is implemented will be in the interests of Northern Ireland as a whole. I welcome the report. It offers us a firm foundation for a more efficient and effective public service.

Mr Hamilton: Given the sheer scale of Workplace 2010 — the money involved, the capital investment that will be released, the number of buildings that will be involved and the number of personnel that will be affected — I believe that the Assembly will not see many bigger projects in its lifetime. It was because it shared that sense of gravity that the Finance and Personnel Committee undertook this piece of work and sought this debate in the Chamber today — a debate which my colleagues and I welcome.

The Committee and I support the objectives of Workplace 2010, including, most importantly, the provision of accommodation for civil servants in which they will be proud to work, and from which they can deliver excellent public services. We also envisage immense benefits for Northern Ireland in releasing millions of pounds for capital reinvestment. Those are the two elements on which I want to concentrate.

As has been mentioned already, the health-check review into the Clare House pathfinder project revealed some minor glitches. The discovery of such problems was the reason why the review was undertaken. I am sure that a fuller analysis, which is due before the end of the year, will reveal further lessons that we must take seriously when implementing Workplace 2010. I welcome the fact that the Department of Finance and Personnel has already acknowledged that there are problems with the roll-out of information technology in Clare House, and has undertaken to learn from those lessons.

The realisation of an estimated £150 million to £200 million for the public purse to be reinvested into capital programmes across Northern Ireland is the other side of the Workplace 2010 equation, and it is important, therefore, that the best value is sought for the buildings that are to be transferred to the private sector. One of the recommendations of the Finance and Personnel Committee’s report is that properties included under the aegis of Workplace 2010 should be valued by an independent commercial valuer, as well as by the Executive’s own property experts in land and property services.

The Committee has also recommended that that assessment be made as close as possible to the time of transfer, so that best value for properties is achieved in light of the volatile property market in Northern Ireland. I welcome the fact that the Department of Finance and Personnel has agreed to the independent evaluation of a representative number of the properties that are involved in the project.

Workplace 2010 has been criticised from some quarters since its inception — sadly, in my view — by critics who are wrong, not least because they are beset by an out-of-date and old-fashioned view that the private sector cannot be involved in such a project. Unfortunately, it seems that some of those people are present in the Chamber. Those who argue that PFI is inappropriate for Workplace 2010 miss the fact that several Civil Service facilities, including some buildings that form a part of that project, are leased from the private sector. Any new arrangement would not be much different from what is already happening.

I welcome the Minister’s previous statement to the House, in which he announced that there would be no compulsory transfer of workers who are involved in estate and property management to the private sector. He stated clearly, and repeatedly, that the contract will permit the future dispersal of public-sector jobs, if so desired. Given that Workplace 2010 will provide first-class accommodation to deliver excellent public services, and will release significant amounts for capital reinvestment in Northern Ireland, this is not a difficult decision to take. I commend the Minister of Finance and Personnel for achieving agreement in the Executive for the pursuit of that policy.

I shall turn briefly to the other issue that is addressed in the Committee for Finance and Personnel report on the location of public-sector jobs. As a representative of a constituency in the east of the Province, it will come as no surprise that I do not view this issue in the simplistic terms in which others do — that it is solely about moving jobs from the east of Northern Ireland to the west. It is not as straightforward as that.

As has been said repeatedly during this debate, there are disparities in the east of the Province. In the borough of Ards, which forms a major part of my constituency, there are only 11.1 public sector jobs per 100 economically active people. It is also interesting to note that although approximately 59% of public sector jobs in Northern Ireland are in the greater Belfast area, 60% of Northern Ireland's population live in that same travel-to-work area, so, if anything, some jobs should have to be pulled back from elsewhere and brought into the greater Belfast area. There is considerable merit in examining this issue, and the RPA may provide opportunities to disperse jobs elsewhere in Northern Ireland, but if the policy —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel (Mr P Robinson): First, I thank the Chairperson, Deputy Chairperson and members of the Committee for Finance and Personnel for what I consider a very helpful report, which has been submitted to the Assembly in a constructive manner. As I said in my statement to the Assembly a couple of weeks ago, the debate around Workplace 2010 and the location of public-sector jobs has been difficult, and the issues have been challenging for all parties, not least my own.

Therefore, it was particularly welcome to see a report that had taken the issues seriously and had dealt with them practically and pragmatically. The report has made a substantial contribution to the decision-making process at Executive level.

To sum up the Committee's recommendations, they cover three main areas. First, we must ensure value for money and that PFI is the right solution for the project. I believe that it is.

Secondly, we need an all-encompassing and strategic location policy that maximises the benefits for Northern Ireland as a whole and that looks much wider than the current demographic spread to consider some wide-ranging and complex issues. Today, I have listened to appeals from Ards and north Down. When I am considering the composition of that review panel, I must see whether Solomon is available.

Thirdly, the Committee recommends the importance of learning from experience and of being satisfied that we have done what we can to achieve the best result.

I have already told the Assembly that the difference between a traditional procurement and the PFI option runs into hundreds of millions of pounds. However, in the final business case, issues such as benefits, risks, uncertainties and costs will be refreshed and fully appraised. Value for money and affordability will also be assessed across the lifetime of the contract, so, although the short-term gain of a capital payment will be welcome, it is only one component of a complex contract, on which long-term costs and benefits will be carefully assessed.

The only other point that I wish to make about value for money is that the business case will be subject to rigorous inspection by DFP supply section. For people in and outside the Assembly who are not familiar with that term, DFP supply section is, broadly, the Northern Ireland equivalent of the Treasury in Whitehall. It is responsible for making recommendations on the optimum distribution of resources to Northern Ireland programmes and for ensuring that Departments spend money for the purposes that Assembly agreed. It does that as much for DFP as it does for any other Department.

DFP supply section operates independently of Departments. I recently took its views on the latest iteration before I submitted the paper on Workplace 2010 to the Executive. Before final decisions are taken, DFP supply section will perform a further assessment, which will include value-for-money and affordability considerations. The Committee has been assured of that and of DFP supply section's independence. Its assessment of DFP projects is no different from, and is conducted in the same manner as, that applied to other Departments.

The Committee's recommendations on the location of public-sector jobs were helpful in shaping the way forward on what is a complex issue. As the Assembly will know, the Executive agreed a two-pronged approach, including a framework for decision-making and a review of location policy. It is not simply a case of moving x number of jobs out of Belfast, as some commentators might suggest. Feedback on the consultation highlighted the need for a more holistic approach, which the Committee has also recognised in calling for a strategic approach and a cross-cutting strategy.

The consultation responses and the Committee's report were key factors in our decision to initiate a review, which I am keen to get under way as soon as possible. In a private meeting, I gave a commitment to the Committee's Chairman and Deputy Chairman that I will speak to them about the composition of the review panel. I will bring the draft terms of reference to the Committee shortly, before seeking Executive approval of them.

That will enable the Department to develop the type of strategic approach to policy on the location of public-sector jobs for which the Committee has called. Although I do not underestimate the task that lies ahead for the review team, it will be an opportunity to provide coherent and strategic direction, which will be in the interests of all the people of Northern Ireland.

I fully accept the need to learn lessons and to build on others' experience as an entirely relevant principle. There is a wealth of information on PFI that has shaped much of the recent Treasury guidance. Too often, we hear about contracts that have been successful, or where huge mistakes have been made. Indeed, some commentators would lead us to believe that all PFIs are disastrous, which, of course, is not the case. Therefore, some work on the issue will be fruitful. All too often, we tend to draw conclusions based on those cases, but it is important that projects learn from each other. PFI is not the answer in some cases, but in others, such as Workplace 2010, it demonstrates best value for money and delivers a solution that is in everyone's best interests.

I accept the views expressed by the SDLP Member for North Antrim, Mr O'Loan. There will not be a risk-free option for the Assembly or for the Executive. However, we can use our skills and abilities to learn as much as we can from the experiences of others, good and bad. In this case, the Department has taken lessons and analogies into account, including, for example, effective gain-share provisions, and how we deal with surplus assets, manage risk and deal with flexibility and uncertainty. We have also drawn heavily on the extensive use of open plan in the private and public sectors. The question for us is not whether we move to open working, but how we do it. Again, I recommend that Committee members visit Clare House, and that offer is also open to all Members. My officials will be happy to arrange tours so that Members can get a more colourful picture of the type of environment that we are seeking for our public servants.

Rather than take a huge leap of faith, my Department ran a couple of pathfinder projects, one of which is now well established and working well. The second project, in Clare House, has experienced teething problems with its new technology, and that has taken time to resolve. We expect to receive a further report on that project, which the Committee will examine closely, as shall I. However, I do not accept any inference that the pilot projects are not working. The experience and lessons learnt, both technical and cultural, have been invaluable in moving things forward. At the moment, the full evaluation of Clare House will be completed in good time to feed into the final negotiations. I have been to Clare House and have talked to staff there. Nothing that I have heard or seen has led me to believe that we should not be doing this.

It will be helpful to understand the dynamics and drivers in other jurisdictions as regards the relocation of jobs. Other Governments will have taken the decision to relocate jobs for different reasons, and it will be useful to understand and reflect on those experiences. For the benefit of the Member for North Down Dr Farry, it is my desire to run the two projects in parallel. My only reluctance in this matter is that I do not like giving assurances on things that are outside my control. There are elements in both projects that are outside my control, not least because the courts, the Committee or the Executive may take a view that would make it difficult for me to comply. However, I have made it clear to the House and to people outside the House that I want the two projects to run in parallel so that one can inform the other, and decisions will be taken in the full knowledge of where we shall be overall.

I commend the Committee for its work, and I commend the Chairperson and his colleagues for the role that they have played in dealing with complex issues. I give the Committee and Members a firm commitment that we will address the recommendations and that we will engage positively with the Committee as we move forward in the coming weeks and months.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel (Mr McLaughlin): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle.

I thank my Committee colleagues, Members and the Minister for their contributions on what has been a constructive debate. From the outset, the Committee recognised that the Minister had inherited what was already a mature proposal, and he had to take the project forward on the basis of previous work.

That informed the work of the Committee. Our job was not to create additional difficulties in a complex and strategic area. The Minister has clearly recognised that, and has responded in a positive way to the generality of the Committee's recommendations.

The implementation of the Workplace 2010 project and future policy on public-sector job location will clearly have a direct impact on the working lives of thousands of public servants for decades to come. We have heard carefully-considered contributions from a number of Members and from the Minister. I do not intend to go through all of those contributions, but I acknowledge that, generally, Members were supportive of the strategic objectives of the project. Members pointed to and recognised the many risks that are involved, and they welcomed the responses of the Department — particularly, given the concerns about the relocation policy, the announcement by the Minister of a time-bound review of that policy.

The stated objectives of Workplace 2010, as my colleague Mervyn Storey said, were to: “Enable the NICS to transform the way it delivers public services;

Provide accommodation in which staff are proud to work; and Safeguard funding for priority front line services.”

Go raibh maith agat, it is clear from Members’ contributions that we can all support those objectives. However, for them to be realised, aside from the particular method of procuring Workplace 2010 — to which I will return in a moment — it will be vital that the project’s implementation is handled effectively. Otherwise, there is the potential for massive disruption to staff and to the provision of public services.

The Committee has concerns about some of the findings of the initial health-check review on the Clare House pilot project. I recognise that, already, the Department has indicated that it is taking those lessons on board. The Committee will carefully examine the findings of the more complete post-occupancy evaluation, which will be available in December. Committee members intend to take up the Minister’s invitation to visit Clare House to see the accommodation at first hand.

I believe that there is a general acceptance that it is necessary to move to the best-and-final-offer stage in order to arrive at a final estimation of the value for money and affordability of the total-property PFI option. That will permit and inform discussion on the proposed safeguards of the public interest that can be built into the terms and conditions of the contract specifications. As Committee Chairperson, I look forward to working and commenting on that process with my colleagues on the finance scrutiny Committee.

As the Committee’s report states, taking into account the scale and duration of Workplace 2010, the stakes are high, and much hinges on the robustness and reliability of the final business case in reassessing the procurement options and determining the best solution in respect of value for money and affordability. The Minister has given specific commitments on the robustness of the final business case, including an assurance that an assessment will be made of the costs and risks of each procurement option before finalising the business case. The Committee has a statutory remit to carefully monitor developments and to ensure that those commitments are honoured.

The Committee has called for the final business case, including its underlying assumptions, calculations, analysis, conclusions and recommendations, to be independently and objectively assessed. The Department has suggested that the Committee’s concerns will be addressed through both the Office of Government Commerce gateway review process and the challenge role of DFP supply section, as my Deputy Chairperson said. The Committee had recommended a more independent and objective mechanism; nevertheless, I hope that the two review mechanisms will provide the level of assessment that was envisaged by the Committee. That remains to be tested.

The Committee also concluded that, if a PFI approach is eventually confirmed, the pivotal issues will be whether the final contract takes full account of best practice in PFI procurement and whether the subsequent contract-management arrangements are effective. Again, the Department has given a range of commitments on and positive responses to those matters.

1.45 pm

The Committee called for greater transparency on the long-term commitments to PFI deals generally and on the impact that they will have on future budgetary flexibility and affordability. The Committee believes that the affordability of the proposed PFI option for Workplace 2010 must be considered in the context of the collective commitments of the Executive that result from both PFI deals and other long-term borrowings.

The Department has helpfully provided further information to the Committee on how PFI commitment reports will be reported to the Treasury and on how departmental annual accounts will be reported to the Assembly. Although I welcome that information, I have concerns, and I believe that there is still scope for greater co-ordination and transparency on the reporting of PFI commitments to the Assembly. I also consider PFI commitments to be an aspect of departmental expenditure going forward, which Assembly Statutory Committees should monitor closely.

The one area in which the Department has taken issue with the Committee is on the Committee’s observation that the proposed PFI option will mean that Workplace 2010 will effectively double the present £1.5 billion PFI debt. The Department argues that ongoing charges for the contract will be met largely from the current funding envelope for the buildings in question. The Department further argues that if that figure is to be regarded as public debt, all current and future rents and utility charges would have to be regarded as public debt also. In my opinion, that argument avoids the important distinction between PFI debt and public debt. It also avoids the likely reduction in the Executive’s control and flexibility over commitments in a long-term PFI contract compared to those under traditional or existing arrangements.

Moreover, there is no getting away from the fact that if the PFI procurement option is taken, the resultant Workplace 2010 contract will be by far the largest PFI commitment facing the Executive. There is therefore a heavy onus on the Minister and the Department.

I emphasise that I recognise that responsibility explicitly. Indeed, it is on all of us to ensure that the procurement of Workplace 2010 is right. If the wrong procurement route is taken, or if a flawed PFI contract is put in place, the next generation will be left to pick up the pieces. I do not believe that any of us wish to leave such a legacy.

The Committee concluded that an affirmative policy on the dispersal of public-sector jobs could be an effective tool for supporting the development of the regional economic hubs that were identified in the regional development strategy, thereby closing the significant regional economic and prosperity gaps in the North. The Committee considered that an affirmative policy on dispersal would also complement and advance a range of other existing cross-cutting policies including: statutory equality provision; New TSN; rural-proofing; the anti-poverty strategy; and the forthcoming regional economic strategy.

It will be important for any dispersal policy to be framed and implemented in a way that ensures the strategic distribution of Civil Service jobs across the North. That argument was reiterated today. Careful research and consideration will need to be given to the locations, the number, types and grades of jobs that are selected, and the functions or business units that will be relocated.

The Committee welcomes the Minister's proposal for a time-bounded review of policy on public-sector job location, and it will be considering the terms of that review shortly.

Go raibh maith agat. To conclude, I believe that the Committee's report and the Minister's response represent examples of positive and constructive engagement between the Department and its associated Statutory Committee. I look forward to ongoing engagement on that basis and to further debate on these important matters. I commend the motion to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly takes note of the first Report of the Committee for Finance and Personnel on Workplace 2010 and the Location of Public Sector Jobs, and the response to the Report by the Department of Finance and Personnel.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

Crisis in Burma

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for the debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes to propose and 10 minutes for the winding-up speech. All other speakers will have five minutes.

Mrs Hanna: I beg to move

That this Assembly views with the deepest concern the unfolding events in Burma; salutes the courage of the Burmese people in challenging the oppressive, corrupt and illegitimate military junta that has ruled Burma for decades and which has brought misery to the country and lives of its people; declares its support for Burma's democratic leaders, in particular the imprisoned Aung San Suu Kyi, leader of the National League for Democracy, and calls for her immediate release; supports the call of the Prime Minister for the most extensive range of sanctions possible against the regime, under the auspices of the United Nations; and further calls on the British, Irish and other European Union governments to take all necessary action to help topple this despicable regime.

People of goodwill throughout the world have watched in horror as the fragmentary evidence of events in Burma over the past few weeks has unfolded. They have had to look through a glass darkly, because the vicious and degenerate military junta in Burma, which has effectively been in power for 45 years, has gone to extraordinary lengths to ensure that the world learns as little as possible about what is happening.

Thanks to modern technology — mobile phones, the Internet and camera phones — and unlike the previous uprising of the Burmese people in 1988, no one can doubt that the junta has degraded that country and made its people the most oppressed on the face of the earth. We have watched in horror as wholly peaceful, saffron-clad Buddhist monks and civilians have been shot dead, spirited away for torture — or worse.

Some people may say that to debate this motion is "gesture politics", that all the sanctions and boycotts in the world make no difference to the junta and that Members should stick to their remit of governing Northern Ireland. With all due respect, I do not accept those views. Nor, indeed, do I accept the comments this morning from another sideliner. Although I want the Executive to be far more proactive, please do not let us ever get to the stage in Northern Ireland where we do not think that it is our business to raise such issues, give leadership and take action.

For several decades, the SDLP was a member of the Irish anti-apartheid movement, and, along with other Members, I participated in the boycott of South African produce in support of sanctions against the undemocratic apartheid regime. Throughout those decades, people told us that we were wasting our time, that the white Government was too strong and that they had too many allies and resources. At the end of the day, democracy triumphed, and, in an almost miraculous series of developments involving the leadership of Mandela, de Klerk and others, the apartheid regime was brought to an end, and democracy was brought to South Africa.

It may seem impossible to us now that this vile, murderous junta will, one day, fall and that its leaders will be brought to justice. We in the West may not have the necessary leverage to bring down this regime, but we do have some leverage on those countries that can take action.

I first became engaged with the situation in Burma when Aung Sang Suu Kyi was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1991. This woman has won admiration across the world for her courage and steadfastness on behalf of her people; as she has said, "Fear is a habit". In 2003, I travelled to Thailand to work with some Burmese minority groups — the Karen, the Shan, the Mon, the Chin, the Arakan and the Kachin. If the plight of the majority ethnic group — the Burman — is dire, that of the minority ethnics living in squalor in camps along the Thai and Bangladeshi borders is infinitely worse. They truly are the wretched of the earth, and they have had to endure all types of atrocity up to, and including, genocide.

In September 2005, as chairperson of the Assembly all-party group on international development, I hosted a briefing here at Stormont from Ministers and officials in the democratic Burmese Government in exile. I have kept in regular touch with them.

I am sure that Members will have a good overview of recent Burmese history; I will just give a brief account. Burma is a country of around 55 million people, and it should be one of the wealthiest countries in Asia. It has great natural resources of oil, gas, gemstones and forestry that are the envy of, and indeed exploited by, its larger neighbours, such as India and China. Its land is productive, especially of rice, but now its people are among the poorest on the planet. The great natural wealth of Burma has been looted by the military junta and their family interests, and its economy has been perverted to the position where Burma is the second-largest producer of opium and a major source of drug trafficking in Asia.

Burma is one of the poorest countries in Asia. Some 130,000 children die there every year, and 10% die before their fifth birthday. A third of Burma's children are underweight. In a once highly literate country, less than half the children complete five years of education. Nearly half of Government spending goes on the military budget; less than 30p a year per person is spent on education, and less than 10p a year per person on health.

Burma achieved its independence from Britain in 1948, and was ruled democratically until the military coup of 1962. The military has been in control ever since.

In 1988, unrest over the junta's economic mismanagement and political oppression led to an uprising, and an estimated 3,000 demonstrators were killed. International pressure then led to democratic elections in 1990, when the National League for Democracy won 80% of the votes. However, the military, led by the current thug-in-chief Than Shwe, annulled the results of the election, and announced plans for a new constitution, which came to nothing.

In 1997, despite the misgivings of many, Burma was admitted into membership of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations, on the ostensible grounds that contact with the outside world would help to civilise the junta. As we all know, the latest protests broke out on 15 August, when the price of fuel was increased fivefold — this in a country with vast supplies of oil and gas. That was the last straw for a people who had been provoked beyond endurance.

China has become the sponsor and patron of the Burmese military, cynically adopting a posture at the United Nations Security Council of purporting to oppose any interference in the internal affairs of another country and maintaining that there is a democratic process appropriate for the country. Nonetheless, there are two reasons why China may be susceptible to pressure to act in its own interests in a way that could lead to a transition to democracy.

The first is that the Olympic Games take place in Beijing next year. China's human rights record is already under attack from the world; now its foreign policy is too. As Edward McMillan-Scott, a British Conservative vice-president of the European Parliament, said:

"China is the puppet master of Burma. The Olympics is the only real lever that we have to make China act. The civilised world must seriously consider shunning China by using the Beijing Olympics to send the clear message that such abuses of human rights are not acceptable."

I hope that the British and Irish Governments, and the rest of the EU, are absolutely ruthless in pressing China to put pressure on the Burmese junta to allow international humanitarian aid to be given to the country, under the protection of the UN, without it being siphoned off; to stop shooting protesters; to free all political prisoners; and to end the pretence that a new constitution is being drawn up. The junta must be forced to yield to democratic rule.

I welcome the comments from Prime Minister Gordon Brown that he wants the pressure of the world put on the Burmese regime. He wants sanctions and pressure from the United Nations, China, India and the rest of the world to be placed on the Burmese regime. We are far away from Burma, but we can play our part in lobbying for the cutting off of all trade, tourism and investment links in Burma.

2.00 pm

I thank the aid agencies and Amnesty International for briefing Members and for organising rallies in support of the democratic movement. In most world affairs, economic development has required an accompanying process of liberal democracy and a representative Government, because a modern economy cannot be run by uneducated people. The greatest struggle in the twenty-first century will be between totalitarians such as the rulers of China and Burma —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up. Order.

Mrs Hanna: Lighting a candle is better than struggling in the darkness.

Mr Hamilton: I commend the Member for tabling the motion. I agree with her initial comments: I am sure that there are some people outside the Building who are saying that we should not be debating the motion, considering the problems that Northern Ireland's people believe exist here.

However, for many reasons, it is our responsibility and duty to debate such issues. There are many good reasons, peculiar and specific to this part of the world, for the Assembly to debate the situation in Burma. It has already been stated that Burma is a former British colony, so we have a responsibility to be concerned about the people in that part of the world who were formerly ruled by Britain. Many servicemen fought in Burma in the Second World War. I am thinking particularly of the Burma Star Association, which had many members from this part of the world. In that regard there is a long association with Burma. Local people give generously to charities and aid agencies such as Save the Children, which does tremendous work in Burma. The United Kingdom is the European Union's second-largest donor of humanitarian aid to Burma.

Mention has also been made of the lucrative drugs trade in Burma. It is the second-largest producer of opium, and it is a producer of methamphetamines. Those drugs are destroying the lives of people in our country. I always look at countries such as Burma as being on the verge of failed status — if they are not already there. It is similar to countries such as Sudan and Afghanistan, which international terrorist organisations such as al-Qaeda have seized on, with unimaginable consequences. It is, therefore, essential that Members add their voices to those of our national Government in the world-wide chorus of concern about the situation in Burma.

I am sure that Members have seen the images that were beamed into our living rooms by whatever means were possible in spite of freedom of speech and expression being suppressed. None of us could have watched the images of Buddhist monks and other ordinary Burmese citizens defying one of the world's most brutal regimes without being inspired by their courage and bravery.

Some 100,000 individuals took to the streets in spite of knowing that those who had protested similarly some decades ago were treated most brutally and oppressively, and that over 3,000 people were callously murdered at that time. As Members debate the motion, the whereabouts of many of those recent protesters, and the details of what happened to them, are unknown.

After almost 50 years of one of the most oppressive rules in the world, the people of Burma are once again following the example set in recent times by people in countries such as Ukraine, Georgia, Lebanon, Iraq and Afghanistan. They are embracing democracy and freedom. For years, we were told that democracy and freedom were alien concepts in some parts of the world. However, it seems that freedom is infectious. Who could blame the people of Burma for, once again, doing what they are doing — taking to the streets in pursuit of issues that we take for granted? They are being subjected to the denial of democracy; political imprisonment; severe restrictions in freedom of expression and freedom of assembly; a brutal military offensive; forced labour; the use of child soldiers; and sexual violence by the army. I could go on.

There is also religious intolerance, a high rate of inflation and massive poverty, despite the country's great wealth of natural resources. Burma is potentially a very rich country that is being brought to its knees by a brutal and oppressive regime, as is also happening in Zimbabwe. Burma also has malaria, TB, HIV and AIDS epidemics.

The world needs to say clearly, and with one voice, that this sort of behaviour is not only unacceptable, but will simply not be tolerated. I am encouraged by the positive reaction of our own Prime Minister, the UN and the US Administration. They are saying the right things but now need to start doing the right things.

Mr S Wilson: Will the Member agree that, rather than the British Government or even Europe, its next-door neighbour China, India and the Asian countries that should really be putting pressure on Burma? They can really make a difference.

Mr Hamilton: I agree entirely with the Member; it is almost as if he read my mind. I was about to say that while this is a challenge for all of us, the real challenge is for China, the growing superpower in the region. China is trying to project a more benign, cuddly image to woo the world in the run-up to the Olympics. Pressure must be put on it to back the right side in Burma.

Ms Anderson: Ba mhaith liom cur leis an mholadh seo. Sinn Féin, along with many people on this island, would like to voice its outrage at the recent events in Burma. There has been an appalling abuse of human rights by the military junta, which has usurped and imprisoned the democratically elected Government, and beaten down and killed many peaceful protesters.

Sinn Féin acknowledges the brave people who have risked their lives in that country to bring news and video recordings of those events to the world.

Myanmar is not an isolated incident in the world of savagery and brutality. Abuse of human rights is widespread, and Governments have persisted in both legally and illegally supplying weapons to those regimes. Condemnations from afar are easy, but they are no more than hypocrisy if they come from a country where the Government allow the export of arms and munitions to Governments that abuse and ignore the human rights of their citizens.

I endorse the comments made by Amnesty International programme director Patrick Corrigan, who said:

“We are all concerned for the fate of those protesting for democracy in Myanmar. But what should concern us doubly is that...firms may be contributing — perhaps unwittingly and totally legally — to the miserable human rights situation in the country by providing weapons components to the military.”

The Amnesty International report this year identified firms based in the North involved in the arms industry. The report highlights companies such as Goodrich Engine Control Systems in Belfast and Martin-Baker Aircraft Co Ltd in Antrim that, according to Amnesty International, have made components that may have been incorporated in jets sold to China, which have then been supplied to Burma. Current loopholes in the export licensing system make it impossible to know for certain whether that is the case. There is no comprehensive EU-wide control system in place to ensure that Governments can effectively implement and enforce their embargo commitments.

To support the motion in its totality would be reprehensible. Sinn Féin has concerns about the implication of the unfortunate, if not dangerous, language used. It calls for the taking of:

“all necessary action to help topple this despicable regime.”

That is unsafe language, particularly in the wake of the British and US Governments' illegal invasion of Iraq. For that reason Sinn Féin cannot support a motion that could be seen to sanction a similar invasion against the people of Burma.

Sinn Féin voices strongly its concern and support for the immediate release of Burma's democratic opposition leader from house arrest. Sinn Féin can support only half of the sentiments in the motion, and it is concerned about wording in the motion that states:

“to take all necessary action to help topple this despicable regime”.

For that reason Sinn Féin will abstain from the vote.

Amnesty International has called on all Governments to support actively the UN process to establish a global arms trade treaty with strong provisions requiring full respect for international human rights law and international humanitarian law when considering transfers of conventional arms so as to prevent arms transfers from contributing to the violations of such law. Sinn Féin supports Amnesty International and views that as the preferred option.

The reliance here on international human rights law puts into the sharpest focus the importance of our current work to frame a bill of rights for the North. This is our mutual achievement, that through the Good Friday Agreement and our power-sharing Executive, we are now engaged in working towards defining rights in framing a bill of rights. We in the Assembly along with key stakeholders in civic society are engaging in path-breaking work of global significance and we should congratulate all involved.

We would be detracting from that work if we were to support the unfortunate words in the motion that I read out earlier. We fundamentally seek to endorse the primacy of human rights.

Mr Savage: I support the motion. I thank the Member for bringing the events in Burma to the attention of the House.

Like many Members, I saw the shocking and disturbing pictures on television as Buddhist monks, clergy and other citizens took to the streets in protest to voice their concerns and try to bring about change in their country. All that those people want to see is a reduction in commodity prices, the release of political prisoners and national reconciliation.

The people of Burma have been in that situation before. The nationwide protests in 1998 were suppressed violently by the authorities with the killing of more than 3,000 people. Burma is a country controlled by fear due to the heavy-handed military presence, with many reports coming through of brutal beatings, killings and disappearances. According to media reports, it is difficult to confirm the details of those who have been arrested, where they are held and under what circumstances. That has been compounded by the restrictions placed on the Internet and telephones. Random searches for mobile phones and cameras have been stepped up and those who have been caught with them have been beaten and arrested.

Since the peaceful protests in Burma last week were harshly repressed, the Burmese security forces have raided monasteries and attacked peaceful protesters; they have fired live rounds and tear gas, and they have beaten protesters with batons. It is believed that at least 1,000 protesters have been arrested in Yangon alone, the majority of whom were monks. There have been many more arrests in other towns and cities across the country. That is in addition to the many people detained since August last year, many of whom are key figures in the National League for Democracy.

The authorities have acknowledged that there have been 10 deaths. However, is it feared that the actual number is much higher. How many people have to die before the wider world wakes up, takes notice and does something about the situation? I welcome the fact that the United Nations has agreed a strong resolution and that it will be sending a special rapporteur on human rights to Burma on an urgent mission to give a detailed report on the human rights situation.

The Foreign Secretary, David Miliband, said:

“the international community is determined to see a process of genuine national reconciliation, democratisation and the establishment of the rule of law”.

I believe that everyone in the Assembly wants to see the same.

During the last war, our soldiers fought alongside the Burmese people, and we have a duty to stand by them at this crucial time. I support the motion.

2.15 pm

Ms Lo: I thank Mrs Hanna for proposing the motion, and I welcome the debate. However, although I endorse the sentiment of the motion, I am concerned about calls for the toppling of the Burmese Government.

Mrs Hanna: At no time did I call for the toppling of any Government.

Ms Lo: Our common humanity obliges us to provide the Burmese people with all of the help that we can in their fight with the military regime. The Burmese dictatorship is not only brutal and horrifying, but, tragically, insane. No regime can be described as sane if it locks up a Nobel Prize winner such as Aung San Suu Kyi for simply caring about the condition of her country. The Burmese regime cannot be treated as sane when its citizens live in misery, despite the fact that their country has a vast array of minerals beneath its soil. The generals are at war with the Burmese people. We must aid those people and the forces of democracy in that war.

The key to Burma is not in Rangoon or the new capital — the general's lair — Naypitaw. The generals have been plundering their country and living the high life, at the cost of the ordinary Burmese, for decades. Time and again, they have shown that they have no problem with murdering their fellow countrymen and that they will not, of their own accord, change their evil ways.

The key to Burma is China, which has benefited most from the commercial and diplomatic boycott. China uses Burma's access to the Bay of Bengal for military means, and is the prime customer for Burmese exports such as timber, oil and gas. As the 2008 Olympics approach, China is conscious of its international image. As the world has recently seen in Sudan, international public opinion can do much to encourage Beijing to put the squeeze on the generals.

Mr Kennedy: What is Ms Lo's considered view on advocating a boycott of the forthcoming Olympics in Beijing, as a tool against the Chinese Government?

Ms Lo: No. Working with them, and continuing to exert pressure, is the best thing to do.

In recent weeks, there has been some soft pressure from China — and that is welcome. However, that is not enough. The time is ripe for a tougher stance from Beijing.

China is not the only country in the region that is failing to live up to its basic obligations to humanity. India, another neighbour, constantly struggles with Beijing for influence in Burma, but has little regard for how it is governed.

Thailand is no less guilty. That is the country that buys the largest share of Burmese exports, and which, itself, has problems in sustaining any sort of democratic Government.

The final guilty party is Russia, which blocks any anti-junta initiative in the UN Security Council and sells armaments to the generals — the only internal guarantee they have for staying in power.

The Burmese regime's external guarantee is the nexus of support provided by the countries that I have mentioned.

Those nations hide behind the dogma of non-interference in the internal affairs of another country. However, in reality, they are the generals' lifeline.

The UN must take action. However, given the possible Chinese-Russian veto, the British, Irish and other European Governments must be pressurised into taking joint EU action, and, indeed, collective action with non-EU states, in order to penalise the Burmese generals. That can be done by disrupting their wealth, which is allegedly already being moved to bank accounts scattered around the world.

Sanctions against the country would not frighten the generals and would only be to the detriment of the people. The generals are already at war, so they would not be worried about the misery of the ordinary Burmese people. However, were we to find a way to their pockets, they would surely be worried.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. The Member's time is up.

Mr Shannon: I thank the Member for tabling the motion, which is appropriate and timely.

It is a firm and long-held belief of mine, and of many others in the Chamber, that evil triumphs when good men do nothing. Essentially, it means that to stand and shake our heads, wring our hands and tut about how awful a situation is will by no means change that situation. It will, however, allow evil to prosper and overtake, and, in the case of Burma, to rule a nation.

For too many years, we in the West have wrung our hands and imposed sanctions on Burma. In doing that, without backing up anything that we say, we have lost any sway that we ever had over the ruling dictatorship in that country. Another brief or missive from the UN, or a strongly worded letter from Gordon Brown, would have as much effect on the Burmese ruling army as would politely asking a child in the street to put down the sweets that he or she is eating in favour of a Brussels sprout. Why would that child give up what he or she craves after, and has a taste for, for something less palatable? The simple answer is that the child would not.

In the same way, the dictatorship in Burma has gotten away with strong-arming the people for so long that it now has what it wants. It will not give that up on the say-so of nations that do nothing but write notes and impose sanctions, only to shake their heads the rest of the time. The real power, as my colleague Sammy Wilson said, lies with the influence of China, Russia and India.

The Burmese crisis is not new but has been brewing for many years; and for many years, the UN has been trying to do its best to influence the Government there to play fair. Sadly, it boils down to the fact that the UN has no influence. In saying that, I have no wish to detract from the tremendous amount of good that the UN does through providing relief packages and food and medical supplies.

The junta has doubled the price of rice, and that has led to 70% of wages being spent on food. The price of fuel has increased — 50% of some people's wages is being spent on it. That means that less money is available for food and education. The food on which the Burmese people rely is rice. More sickness and disease will follow for people for whom rice, and nothing else, is their staple diet. Recent statistics show that more than one third of children in Burma suffer from a form of malnutrition.

The junta uses a strong military presence to ensure that those who question their authority do not do so for too long before they are "sent away". A BBC correspondent reported a middle-aged man in a tea shop as saying:

"I really want change, but they have guns and we don't, so they'll always win."

That is the reason why so many of the Burmese people have lived so oppressed for so long. There are sad and recurring incidents in many villages, where the people try to be self-sustaining, only for the military to arrive and steal their stores of food.

There are 20,000 internally displaced persons from the Karen region alone. People who are on the run number more than that. Indeed, people have also fled across the border.

It is little wonder that the peace-loving monks are the leaders in the stand against the regime. The time for them to stand and wring their hands has passed, and they have tried to lead peaceful protests, which is a human right of any person who wishes to express concern and emotion over a situation. However, in Burma, that has led to 4,000 monks being rounded up and sent away in an attempt to stop the peaceful demonstrations.

The demonstrators seek a price reduction in the basics of life — commodities such as fuel, rice and cooking oil. Secondly, they seek the release of all political prisoners, including — and I will try to say this in my Ulster-Scots accent — Aung San Suu Kyi and all of the detainees arrested during demonstrations against the fuel price hike. Thirdly, they want the Burmese Government to enter into dialogue with the pro-democracy forces to promote immediate national reconciliation and to resolve the crisis facing the people and the difficulties they suffer.

We, in the Western World, have little influence; however, China, India and Russia have significant influence and must be pressurised to effect change for good. If that is not done, stronger measures must be considered. If words — and international pressure — do not work, something else must be done to ensure that all the people of Burma have the freedom to live, eat, work and marry without fear and threat. Those are the basics of life.

It is the duty of the strong — the countries of the Western World and of Asia, including China — to speak up for, and uphold, the cause of the weak. We must demand that action is taken now; that the oppression stops now; and that the dictators are held accountable for their actions now. A helping hand is worth a thousand words of advice.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Members will be aware that questions to the Office of the First Minister and the deputy First Minister begin at 2.30 pm. I, therefore, propose to continue this debate later this afternoon. In the meantime, Members may take their ease.

Oral Answers to Questions

OFFICE OF THE FIRST MINISTER AND DEPUTY FIRST MINISTER

British-Irish Council

1. Mr Bresland asked the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister to detail when the next meeting of the British-Irish Council will be held; and what issues will be considered. (AQO 330/08)

The First Minister (Rev Dr Ian Paisley): In July, at the Belfast summit of the British-Irish Council (BIC), the Council agreed to host the next summit in Dublin in late 2007. Even though the Belfast Agreement provides for two BIC summits per year, it will be the first time in five years that that will have happened, and reflects the momentum and commitment to enhance east-west relationships that we have brought to the work of the Council. The date and the agenda for the summit will be subject to agreement by the participating administrations. We will wish to review progress on issues agreed at the Belfast summit including the strategic review of the Council's works programme, and support arrangements for a standing secretariat. Once the date and agenda for the summit have been agreed we will inform the Executive and the Assembly.

Mr Bresland: Could the First Minister outline the current position on the commitment to have a dedicated standing secretariat?

The First Minister: The St Andrew's Agreement provided that following consultation with members, with a view to giving further impetus to the work of the Council, both Governments would facilitate the establishment of a standing secretariat for the British-Irish Council, if members agreed. We have made it clear that our preference is for a standing secretariat, and the strategic review will take the views of the participating administrations into account when arriving at its recommendations.

Mr Attwood: On 18 September you indicated that you would enquire if the issues of affordable housing, suicide and the Irish Sea could be included in the ongoing review of the Council. Will those matters be part of that review, in particular the matter of the Irish Sea, which was previously on the BIC's agenda?

I welcome you to Question Time, and say on behalf of many people in the House that it would have been welcome if the First Minister and the deputy First Minister had come to the House in order to announce a decision —

The Speaker: Order. I ask the Member to take his seat as his question is inappropriate.

The First Minister: As the host administration the Northern Ireland Executive bore the costs of the meeting held in Northern Ireland, which was a good meeting. However, the review body is its own boss. Although we can and do recommend that those matters must be dealt with, we cannot compel the review body to deal with them.

Mr K Robinson: Will the First Minister investigate the level of staffing of the British-Irish Council, which is currently at a markedly lower level than the North/South Ministerial Council (NSMC)? Will the First Minister undertake to see that the staffing level is increased to reflect the importance that all unionists place on the British dimension of all the relationships between these islands?

The First Minister: I have already commented on the extent of our authority, but I welcome the Member's comments and I will draw them to the attention of the review body.

Children and Young People

2. Mr Shannon asked the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister what action the junior Ministers will be taking to serve the needs of children and young people. (AQO 323/08)

The First Minister: The junior Ministers have specific responsibility to progress important commitments and priorities with regard to children and young people.

They will play a key role in driving forward the 10-year strategy for children and young people and in putting into place the most appropriate arrangements and actions for its delivery. The junior Ministers play an important role in keeping the needs of children and young people high on the agenda and in determining and shaping progress to improve their lives.

Mr Shannon: I thank the First Minister for his assurances on tackling the needs of children and young people. Will he indicate to the Assembly the work that has been done to eradicate child poverty, which is another important issue?

The First Minister: The United Kingdom targets are to halve child poverty by 2010 and to eradicate it by 2020. The 10-year strategy for children and young people includes outcomes that are linked to the elimination of child poverty in Northern Ireland; namely economic and environmental well-being.

Poverty must be eradicated by 2020 in order to close the gap between the young people who do well in life and those who do not. Throughout the development phase of the strategy, child poverty, particularly social exclusion and multifaceted need, was consistently identified as a key theme in the lives of children and young people. In working to achieve the UK target to eradicate child poverty by 2020, Northern Ireland Departments will deliver a wide range of initiatives and programmes that will have a positive effect on child poverty and exclusion.

Mrs M Bradley: Will the First Minister confirm whether there are any plans to take forward a ministerial subgroup on children?

The First Minister: Yes, there are.

Mr Beggs: Child poverty in Northern Ireland is increasing. Will the First Minister and deputy First Minister set specific tasks for the junior Ministers so that strategic action will be taken to tackle that problem? Will they ensure that the junior Ministers will inform the Assembly of what is being done, so that they can be held to account for their actions?

The First Minister: The two junior Ministers are working hard. They are already occupied with other child-poverty matters. I assure the honourable Member that they have been well tutored on those matters by the deputy First Minister and me. The children of today will be the men and women of tomorrow. They deserve all that the Assembly can give them.

The Cost of Division – A Shared Future Strategy

3. Mr Ford asked the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister to indicate when the Deloitte Touche report on ‘The Cost of Division — A Shared Future Strategy’ will be published on the Department’s website. (AQO 379/08)

The First Minister: The report was commissioned, conducted and finalised during direct rule. Copies of the report have already been placed in the Assembly Library and have been made available to the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister and to other Members. Furthermore, if anyone contacts OFMDFM for a copy of the report, it will be provided as quickly as possible. Our Department has no plans for formal publication.

Mr Ford: Since the report is not available elsewhere, I advise Members that it has been provided on the Alliance Party website, should they wish to see it. Is the failure to publish the report not a further example of the failure and inability of the First Minister and deputy First Minister to agree on difficult issues? For example, we have seen today their failure to announce movement on the appointment of a victims’ commissioner, which is another key aspect of a shared future. The way that that announcement was made showed absolute contempt for the Assembly, for victims and for people who had applied in good faith for the post.

The First Minister: I resent what the Member has said, and I challenge him to prove that we are insulting victims. We are trying to find the best possible way to find the best possible person to do the job.

Mr Kennedy: I broadly welcome, on behalf of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister, the announcement that was made earlier today on the appointment of a commissioner for victims. Given the public interest in the issue, can the First Minister be more specific on the time frame that is envisaged for the appointment and, in particular, can he outline the final process by which any successful applicant will be appointed?

The First Minister: I have nothing more to say on the statement that was given to the honourable gentleman by us this morning, before we made our statement to the press. He is aware of all the facts of this matter. I understand that all Members were sent a copy of that statement. Therefore, they all know what is in it.

Mr Spratt: I thank the First Minister for his answers. He has answered my question on the appointment of the commissioner for victims when answering the two previous questioners.

Mr Speaker: I call Martina Anderson —

I call the First Minister.

The First Minister: That is a new name that I have been given.

To put it bluntly, we believe that some potential applicants may have been deterred from applying for the post during the direct rule period because they could not be confident of securing the broad political support of local parties — [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order. The First Minister has the Floor.

The First Minister: The commissioner for victims must become a true champion of victims and survivors. I knew that that comment would bring that response. Certain Members were looking for some excuse to make that response. I am simply repeating what I have already told them.

Ms Anderson: I ask the First Minister to outline the status of the report; his views on the statistics; and to reinstate OFMDFM’s commitment to equality as being the top, bottom and middle line.

The First Minister: The report that the honourable lady mentioned is independent. She will be well aware of that.

Mr A Maginness: I do not know whether I am more confused than the First Minister. I am confused by his answers, and I am also confused by some of the questions.

I thank the First Minister for placing the Deloitte report, 'Research into the financial cost of the Northern Ireland divide', in the Assembly Library. That was subsequent to my question of a couple of weeks ago on that report. Will the First Minister tell me why the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister will not publish, formally, that report? That is a serious report, it is important, and it is a twin to the 'Shared Future' policy document. Let us have a debate on it in the House.

The First Minister: It does not seem that other people are of the same mind as the honourable Member. Only 18 people requested the report. Is the Member suggesting that we should print hundreds — maybe a thousand copies — when only 18 people asked for it? It is not OFMDFM's report; it is a private report. We are not in the business of publishing private reports.

Transfer of Policing and Justice Powers

4. Mr Burnside asked the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister what representations it has made to the United Kingdom Government, concerning the transfer of policing and justice powers to the Northern Ireland Assembly and Executive. (AQO 335/08)

The First Minister: The Member for South Antrim will be aware that the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006 placed specific responsibility on the Assembly to report to the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, by 27 March 2008, on progress towards the devolution of policing and justice matters. He will also know that the Assembly has asked its Assembly and Executive Review Committee to undertake an inquiry and report to the Assembly by March 2008.

We believe that that issue is not one in which OFMDFM considers it necessary to make such representations.

2.45 pm

Mr Burnside: I thank the First Minister for his answer. However, he must surely believe that before policing and justice powers can be transferred to the Executive and the House, there must be some confidence-building measures.

Does the First Minister not find it amazing that, over the weekend, Robert McCartney's sisters said that there was no evidence of senior republicans in Sinn Féin/IRA taking part in the PSNI's Historical Enquiries Team? Does he not find it totally unacceptable that his deputy First Minister will not personally, or corporately on behalf of Sinn Féin/IRA, take part in the Historical Enquiries Team? How can any confidence be built in the transfer of policing and justice powers when his deputy First Minister and Members of the Sinn Féin Bench are involved in such activities?

The First Minister: I remind the Member that his party is part of this coalition, so he should get on to his own party leader and his own party instead of reading to me what he thinks should happen. I repeat what I have said: the Assembly has referred this matter to the Assembly and Executive Review Committee. If the Member has something to say to the Committee, he should go to the Committee and say it. If he is not happy with the result of that, he can bring the matter to the Assembly.

Miss McIlveen: Can the First Minister indicate that such a transfer could come about only by agreement and with cross-community support in the House?

The First Minister: The answer is yes. I am very glad that the Member for South Antrim is convinced that what the DUP says on this matter is right. If the party has one convert, it is doing well. There are only 18 requests for some of these reports — I got one today.

Sexual Orientation Strategy and Action Plan

5. Dr Farry asked the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister to detail what progress has been made towards presenting and launching the sexual orientation strategy and action plan. (AQO 380/08)

The First Minister: A consultation on the draft sexual orientation strategy and action plan was carried out during direct rule under the former Secretary of State Peter Hain. The draft strategy has yet to be considered by Ministers and the Executive.

Dr Farry: I thank the First Minister for that answer, even though it was rather brief. Can he assure me that all Ministers are working in harmony on sexual orientation issues and that this draft strategy will be brought forward as soon as possible? Does he agree that sexual orientation issues need to be seen through the prism of good relations? Will consideration be given to placing sexual orientation issues within the wider remit of the shared future strategy and, in particular, the second triennial action plan?

The First Minister: The First Minister and deputy First Minister have made it clear that the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister is totally committed to promoting equality and human rights and is completely opposed to any form of discrimination or harassment against any citizen.

Mr Storey: Will the First Minister inform the House who approved the current funding package, and has any further funding been agreed?

The First Minister: Mr Peter Hain approved the package; neither I nor my colleague across the way has since approved any funding.

Mr McCartney: Does the First Minister agree that, in order to be effective, the draft sexual orientation strategy needs the full and total support of the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister?

The First Minister: That is a matter for negotiation. I can say only that we have to face the facts that are before us, and the facts are that the money that is now being provided is based on the undertaking made by the then Secretary of State Peter Hain and that the draft strategy has yet to be considered by Ministers or the Executive.

Freedom of Information Requests

6. Mr T Clarke asked the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister to detail (i) the number of freedom of information requests it has received; and (ii) the number of freedom of information requests received in total by all Northern Ireland Departments. (AQO 342/08)

The First Minister: From 1 January 2005, when the Freedom of Information Act 2000 was fully implemented, to the end of August 2007, OFMDFM has received 272 requests for information.

During the same period, over 8,700 requests were received across all the Northern Ireland Government Departments. In over 77% of those cases, all the information requested has been released to the applicant. In 14% of cases, part of the information has been released to the applicant, and in 9% of cases, all of the information requested was withheld, using the appropriate exemptions.

Mr T Clarke: Does the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister have any plans to consider reform of FOI (Freedom of Information)?

The First Minister: There is no doubt that the evidence thus far already suggests that dealing with FOI requests takes up a considerable amount of staff time. On occasions, the requests are of a wide-ranging and detailed nature that requires many hours of research, and are sent in by lazy journalists, who will not do any work, but who think that we should pay them and give them the information that they want. That, inevitably, adds time and resource pressures onto the Departments.

If, in collating evidence on how the current procedures are working, the Departments discover that reform is needed — and I think they will — it will have to take place. The civil servants are not employed full-time to pursue the requests of enquiring minds. They are supposed to be serving the Departments that they are called upon to serve, and helping those who run those Departments.

Mr O'Loan: The First Minister may be aware that I have sent a freedom of information request to his colleague the Minister of the Environment asking for the opinion received from the Planning Service in relation to the private-sector application at the Giant's Causeway. Will he use his close working relationship with the Minister to ensure that I get a reply?

May I also ask, given the publication of a letter written in 2003 in his name, signed on his behalf by Ian Paisley Jnr, now a junior Minister in OFMDFM, and carrying the reference IPJ, and given that that letter totally misrepresented UNESCO's position in relation to development at the Giant's Causeway, what confidence this Assembly and the public can have in the integrity of ministerial decision-making —

Mr Speaker: Order. I ask the Member to take his seat. That is the second occasion on which a Member has asked a question that does not relate in any way to the original question asked. I rule that totally out of order. I call the First Minister.

Mr O'Loan: It needs an answer.

Mr Speaker: I call Mr Gardiner for a supplementary question.

Mr Gardiner: Will the First Minister outline to the Assembly the cost to the taxpayer of a question for written answer from an Assembly Member, and in particular the cost of civil servants' time and the various resources devoted to providing the answer?

The First Minister: All I can say is that it is the right of a Member to ask questions and it is the right of a Minister, if he so desires, to reply to them. We cannot tell Members that they cannot ask questions because they are costly. That is a matter for the Assembly, not for me.

North/South Bodies

7. Mr Weir asked the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister what action it is taking to review the work of the North/South bodies, as outlined in the St Andrews Agreement. (AQO 316/08)

The First Minister: At its plenary meeting on 17 July 2007 the North/South Ministerial Council agreed to take forward the review of the North/South implementation bodies and areas for co-operation, as provided for in annex A of the St Andrews Agreement.

The appointment of the advisory panel is under active consideration. Officials have now met to discuss the review, and preliminary work has commenced. It is anticipated that the intensive work will be undertaken from October to December, and that a final report will be made to the first North/South Ministerial Council plenary in 2008.

Mr Weir: I thank the First Minister for his reply. Will he confirm that the review group will examine the efficiency of the implementation bodies, and that any attempts to create new bodies will be subject to a vote in the House?

The First Minister: The answer to the Member's question is yes. The House will have the final say.

Mr Gallagher: Does the First Minister agree that, in recent years, there has been a marked increase in co-operation on environmental issues through the development of recycling facilities and through tackling the dumping of illegal waste?

Does he agree that many other issues are crying out for a strong, all-island approach? Those include water quality, the protection of our marine environment and the protection of wildlife habitats. Will the First Minister tell the House whether, during the review, consideration will be given to the establishment of a North/South body on the environment?

The First Minister: The review will be undertaken by a review group, which will report to the NSMC. The review group includes senior officials drawn from the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister, the Department of the Taoiseach, the Department of Foreign Affairs, the NSMC secretariat and an advisory panel of four experts, two nominated by the Northern Ireland Executive and two by the Irish Government. Those are the people to whom the honourable Member must direct his queries. He should provide them with the information that he wants them to study for their report.

Mr Elliott: I thank the First Minister for his answer. Does he concede that Assembly control of the North/South bodies was something that he spoke about a great deal before assuming office? Does he agree that any North/South parliamentary forum could lead to undue interference in the political affairs of Northern Ireland?

The First Minister: The Democratic Unionist Party, which I lead, always had strong views on that matter. We made those views known to the British Government and to the Southern Irish Government, and we are thankful that changes have been made. In no way will our representatives sell anyone out from the unionist side of the House at any of those meetings. We will keep our flag flying, and, as far as we are concerned, it will fly from the masthead. Others will do what they want, but the DUP will not be bribed or bludgeoned into any surrender of our unionist principles.

Victims

8. Mr Storey asked the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister what plans were in place to bring forward a new blueprint for the victims sector. (AQO 315/08)

The First Minister: The needs of victims and survivors are a high priority for OFMDFM and for the Executive as a whole. We intend to introduce a new strategy for victims. That strategy will direct available resources to the areas of greatest need. It will emphasise the importance of ensuring that what is done by all service providers makes a real difference to the lives of victims. In doing so, we will consider issues such as services and practical help for victims who are dealing with the legacy of the past and building a better future.

We will discuss our proposals with the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister before they are finalised. A key factor in the success of a new strategy will be the appointment of a Commissioner for Victims and Survivors who will play a central role in taking forward the strategy. I want also to add to that —

Mr Speaker: Time is up for questions to the First Minister and deputy First Minister.

3.00 pm

AGRICULTURE AND RURAL DEVELOPMENT

Foot-and-Mouth Disease

1. Mr McCarthy asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to give her assessment of the current threat of foot-and-mouth disease. (AQO 386/08)

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development (Ms Gildernew): Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. As I said in my statement to the Assembly on 1 October, in view of the strong suspicion of foot-and-mouth disease in England on 12 September, I took immediate precautionary steps to prohibit the import of animals and relevant products from Britain, to reintroduce biosecurity measures at local ports and airports, and to call for vigilance. Those measures remain in place. No further cases of foot-and-mouth disease have been confirmed in England since 30 September. Therefore, the number of confirmed cases of foot-and-mouth disease in Surrey since 3 August stands at eight.

By 14 September, my officials had carried out clinical inspections of all 75 consignments of cattle, goats, sheep and pigs that had been imported directly from Britain during the relaxation of the import ban between 23 August and its reinstatement on 12 September. All examinations were negative, which has given me some assurance that no disease has spread here. I reminded farmers of the importance of remaining vigilant by regularly — by that, I mean at least daily — inspecting their animals for symptoms of disease and reporting any suspicions immediately.

My officials and I continue to liaise closely with our counterparts in Britain and in the South to monitor and assess the situation. On the basis of our veterinary risk assessment, the movement of live susceptible animals from here to Scotland has gradually eased over the past few weeks for slaughter animals and for breeding and production animals. We will continue to work closely with the South to co-ordinate our actions in order to protect the whole island from foot-and-mouth disease.

Given our current controls and precautions, our veterinary assessment is that the risk of foot-and-mouth disease entering the North is considered to be low, and the most recent cases in Britain have not changed that assessment. I will keep the position under constant review, depending on developments in Britain, and will make any necessary changes in the existing preventative measures in response to any changes in the level of risk.

Mr McCarthy: I thank the Minister for her detailed response, and I congratulate her and her officials for the work that they have done in preventing the scourge from entering Northern Ireland. What steps will the Minister take to ensure that proper lessons are learned from this year's outbreak across the water? Will those lessons be appropriate as we continue to face the threat of bluetongue or any other fatal disease that could threaten our agriculture industry?

Ms Gildernew: We reviewed our contingency plan for foot-and-mouth disease in August, on the back of the initial outbreak in England, and we have since reviewed it. That will be a live document, and we will continue to review and update it, as scientific evidence, etc, provides us with further information. We are on a constant learning curve.

It was important that we took the experience of the first outbreak in August and applied that when we imposed the bans in September. I imposed the bans before the disease was even confirmed, so we acted even more quickly than we had in August. We continually update our contingency plan, and that is the same for bluetongue and for any other epidemiological diseases. We want to try to keep on top of that as much as possible.

Mr Savage: Have the Northern Ireland food exporters experienced difficulties from any countries that may be confused over Northern Ireland's regional status of being free from foot-and-mouth disease?

Ms Gildernew: I thank the Member for his supplementary question. There have not been as many difficulties in trading as there were in August, when, as Members know, we changed our certification requirements. Restrictions were due to be lifted the day after the foot-and-mouth outbreak on 12 September. We have continued with the certification scheme and have had very few complaints from the industry.

We have asked farmers to contact us if they are having any problems, and we will do everything that we can to eradicate such problems. We have worked very closely with the farmers' unions, exporters and the entire industry to maintain our trade with the rest of the world and to ensure that our farmers do not lose out financially because of the foot-and-mouth disease outbreak in England.

I am happy to report that any recent problems have been fairly minimal and have been dealt with very quickly.

Mr T Clarke: What discussions has the Minister had with European Union officials on livestock movement restrictions between Northern Ireland and the rest of the United Kingdom? How will any change in those restrictions affect Department of Agriculture and Rural Development's (DARD) efforts to keep foot-and-mouth disease, as well as bluetongue, out of Northern Ireland?

Ms Gildernew: Officials are working with their European counterparts, and the Chief Veterinary Officer is in constant contact with officials in other EU member states and in DEFRA. We will continue to work at official levels. However, when the EU Standing Committee on the Food Chain and Animal Health makes a ruling, we cannot go beyond the confines of that. If SCoFCAH decides that we are free to trade again with Britain, I do not have the statutory power to prevent imports from coming into the country from England, Scotland or Wales.

I am bound by the statutory obligations of the Department, and by EU rules. I do not have any discretion to go further than the recommendations of SCoFCAH.

Rural Poverty

2. Ms Lo asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development what representations she had made to the Minister of Finance and Personnel in regard to the provision of funding to address rural poverty.
(AQO 390/08)

Ms Gildernew: I thank the Member for her question. My Department has submitted a significant number of bids for additional resources for tackling rural poverty to the Department of Finance and Personnel in the 2007 priorities and Budget exercise. That is for the period of 2008-09 to 2010-11. An integral part of those bids for funding is an element to deliver on my Department's obligations under the anti-poverty and social exclusion strategy.

In order to tackle poverty and social exclusion in rural areas, I must ensure that the needs of rural communities are met by equitable access to public services and programmes and through activities that enhance economic opportunities while strengthening and enhancing social infrastructure. An example of that is the regeneration of former military sites into rural hubs where a range of services can be provided.

In addition, as part of the Northern Ireland Rural Development Programme (NIRDP), we will be targeting rural poverty by seeking to improve the competitiveness of the agriculture and forestry sectors through supporting restructuring, development and innovation, by improving the quality of life in rural areas and by encouraging diversification of economic activity. I hope that, by adopting that dual perspective, we will provide a synergistic approach to tackling disadvantage in terms of isolation, lack of facilities and quality of life. To that end, I had a meeting with the Minister of Finance and Personnel, Peter Robinson, on 19 September to discuss the bid that was submitted in the 2007 priorities and Budget exercise, in which specific reference was made to my Department's bid for anti-poverty funding.

Ms Lo: I thank the Minister for her response and for her commitment to address rural poverty. The Minister mentioned the rural development programme. Will the Minister ensure that rural disadvantage is a key priority in the work of the new local action groups and in the rural development programme?

Ms Gildernew: Yes. We have had great experience of local action groups delivering rural development money over the last 17 years. We want to maintain that bottom-up approach, which I feel is the best way of delivering money on the ground. We are asking for councils to help deliver some of that through local administration, and so on. There will therefore be an enhanced role for councils in delivery of the programme. The local action groups will certainly be a key element in that work, and I see them as the strength of the success of the RDP in previous years.

Mr Kennedy: Is the Minister content that the roadshows planned for throughout Northern Ireland — which she announced on 27 September — to promote equality in the new rural development programme will be accessible by all areas of the Province, given that none is planned for County Armagh or for her own rural constituency of Fermanagh and South Tyrone?

Ms Gildernew: I will revisit that point. If there is any potential to expand the roadshows I will be more than happy to do so. I would like to see the public engaging with the roadshows and giving us some guidance, because I very much believe in working in partnership with the rural community. I ask MLAs and local councillors to engage with the roadshows to see how best we can tackle inequality through the rural development programme.

Mr Boylan: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Does the Minister agree that the purchase of the Forkhill barracks site in south Armagh could be of great benefit in targeting rural poverty, and will she advise the House of progress in any such initiative?

Ms Gildernew: Go raibh maith agat. Forkhill barracks is only one of several former military and PSNI sites being regenerated, and I believe that that will contribute towards combating social exclusion and poverty. My Department became involved with Forkhill after several approaches had been made to Ministers early in 2006 about the potential opportunities surrounding redundant military sites. As regards Forkhill, my Department is still negotiating, through the Valuation and Lands Agency, with the Ministry of Defence and the PSNI regarding the final purchase price.

I agree absolutely that the project will help to reduce significantly rural poverty and promote social inclusion in the area. It is intended that the site will be regenerated into a rural economic and social hub. It will provide a range of integrated services such as local enterprise units; light industrial units; community space; and childcare facilities; all of which have been identified as being much needed in the area.

Some social housing has also been provided for, and my Department is working with the Housing Executive on that aspect. Forkhill Development Company has developed a concept plan and business case, and those are with my Department for consideration.

Protected Regional Food Status

3. Mr Hamilton asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development what progress she had made in securing European Union protected regional food status for Comber potatoes, Strangford Lough oysters, and Portavogie prawns and scampi. (AQO 308/08)

Ms Gildernew: Go raibh maith agat. I want to promote local produce whenever possible. Last week in the Long Gallery, I attended the launch of seafood week. My Department's role is to publicise the EU protected food names scheme, encourage uptake, and progress applications, through DEFRA, to the EU Commission once they have been submitted by the industry.

At this stage, no applications have been received for Comber potatoes, Strangford Lough oysters or Portavogie prawns and scampi. However, I welcome applications from the producers of those products, which I, and no doubt many others here, have sampled.

My Department is happy to offer support and advice to groups that may wish to register products under the EU protected names scheme. We have liaised with Ards Borough Council, which is in the process of communicating with groups representing the products that the Member has identified.

Mr Hamilton: I welcome the Minister's commitment to local produce. Would she would commit to engaging with local producers of Comber potatoes, Portavogie prawns and Strangford Lough oysters so that not only will those products be protected but that they will be enhanced and their full potential realised in the worldwide market?

Ms Gildernew: My Department has been proactive in promoting the scheme. We have consulted with producer groups from all sectors of the food industry and have provided specialist support through an experienced food-and-drinks marketing consultant to outline the benefits of the scheme, which includes the potential to link up with tourism initiatives for those visiting the North and those who are selling into markets that recognise the designation.

Mr McFarland: What are the Minister's plans for bringing forward a positive case for the Northern Ireland fishing industry in negotiations at the EU Fisheries Council meeting in December 2007? Will she ensure that the facts are established, and robustly put, for the defence of the local fishing industry?

3.15 pm

Ms Gildernew: I congratulate the Member on his imaginative use of a supplementary question. Even though it is not directly related to the question, I will answer it. On Friday, I had a meeting with the devolved Scottish and Welsh Administrations, as well as Jonathan Shaw from DEFRA, in Peterhead in Scotland, about issues relating to the fishing industry and what needs to be done to protect it. In recent weeks, I have also met the processor and producer organisations. I will have further meetings in Brussels in October, and I am preparing a robust case for the December Fisheries Council meeting. While our fishing industry may be smaller than Scotland's, for example, it is still an important part of our tradition and culture. I want to see our fishing industry protected, enhanced and sustainable well into the future.

Red Meat Task Force

4. Dr W McCrea asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to make a statement on the publication of the Red Meat Task Force report.
(AQO 325/08)

Ms Gildernew: I welcome the publication of the task force's report, and I take this opportunity to thank the task force for its work in finalising a report on which all its members agree. While many of the conclusions and recommendations contained in the report make for difficult reading, it presents a more informed picture of the extent of the difficulties faced by producers. The report provides information that will enable farmers and others involved in the red meat supply chain to make more informed choices about the future of their businesses. We must take stock — collectively — to consider the recommendations and the ways forward.

My Department will respond positively to the report, and it is ready to work through it with the other key stakeholders. I have written to Dr McCrea in his role as Committee Chairman inviting views on the report, and I look forward to hearing interim views — tomorrow, I hope.

Dr W McCrea: As is clear from the findings in the red meat task force report, the returns to Northern Ireland's beef and sheep industry at the farm gate are far from meeting the totality of cost. Can the Minister therefore inform the House what new practical or imaginative steps she will take to ensure the future stability of the industry? In light of the assessment that a significant increase the market price per kilo is necessary to give a proper economic return for the production of red meat, can the Minister inform the House what negotiations she or her Department have had with processors and retailers to assist in achieving that end?

Ms Gildernew: In my initial speech on coming into this Department, I said that I was keen to work with everybody involved in the supply chain, and that includes processors and retailers. Last week, I met Grampian Pork's chief executive and members of his senior team, and I have met representatives from Foyle Meats. I have also had a recent meeting with Tesco, and I hope to meet Justin King from Sainsbury's this week to discuss those issues. I will meet representatives from Asda on Friday.

I am conscious of the need to work with all the stakeholders in ensuring that primary producers get a better return. However, I do not have control over the price that is paid for produce. I will do everything in my power, but I cannot interfere with competitive issues, such as the retail price. The task force report states that the market is unlikely to deliver the significant pence-per-kilo increase that would be needed for our most efficient producers to break even. The report also makes it clear that the price that consumers pay does not reflect production costs for the quality beef and lamb produced in the North. I am doing all that I can, and I will continue to do so to encourage constructive relationships and dialogue across the supply chain. That will include working with retailers to ensure joint efforts in helping to address the challenges facing beef and lamb producers.

Mr Elliott: Considering the demoralising content of the Red Meat Industry Task Force report, will the Minister give consideration to the option of short-term direct financial assistance for the suckler cow farming enterprise?

Ms Gildernew: The task force report focuses on the economic viability of producing beef and lamb here. That does not translate to an immediate income crisis. The range of payments made to farmers through the single farm payment and other schemes are substantial, and they give us some space to take stock and to consider the way forward. My Department will assist in whatever way it can, but, as the task force report says, the current structure of our industry is not viable, and we need to secure change.

I will ensure that Government resources are focused and targeted on viable production options.

Mr P J Bradley: The Northern Ireland Red Meat Industry Task Force suggests that farmers should sell off their livestock; cut production; diversify; accept lower returns; or exit the business altogether. As the custodian of agriculture, does the Minister subscribe to that suggestion? If not, to what estimated timetable would she work to reinstate the red meat industry of Northern Ireland?

Ms Gildernew: Farmers certainly need to take stock, look closely at their own circumstances and come to the right decision for them and their families. However, I realise that there is an increasing decline in the number of producers, and we may need to look at alternative business opportunities and support for those producers.

I also have to keep wider environmental and social objectives under close review as we move forward on the report's findings and recommendations. I will engage fully with all stakeholders in doing that.

Agricultural Careers

5. Mr Burnside asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development what measures her Department was taking to encourage young people to embark on an agricultural career. (AQO 318/08)

Ms Gildernew: Young people entering the farming industry have a strong future and are vital for the prosperity of the industry and the rural community.

Through the College of Agriculture, Food and Rural Enterprise (CAFRE), the Department offers programmes to equip young people with the knowledge and skills for successful careers, not only in farming, but in the equine sector, food processing, horticulture, floristry, land-based technology, veterinary nursing and related disciplines.

If they have not already done so, I recommend that Members visit the CAFRE campuses at Enniskillen, Greenmount or Loughry, where they will be impressed by the programmes that are being delivered. College staff are working closely with post-primary schools to promote careers in the industry and CAFRE programmes. Each year, schools receive a college prospectus, associated promotional material, school visits and briefings for careers teachers. College staff attend careers conventions and major industry events, and host open days for prospective students, parents and DEL careers advisers, while promotional adverts and articles are regularly published in the farming press.

Although CAFRE full-time courses have already commenced this year, places are still available on some part-time courses, such as the part-time NVQ programmes in agriculture that are provided by CAFRE at various locations throughout the North. I am keen to raise the profile of agriculture, food and the rural environment among young people, and I commend the work of CAFRE, Lantra and the CCEA in preparing a land-based occupational studies option for the 14- to 16-year-old age group in schools under the new entitlement framework.

As well as further and higher education programmes, CAFRE will be delivering agricultural training under DEL's new Training for Success programme. I will ensure that our highly innovative and successful multi-skilling programme, which helps young people combine off-farm employment with part-time farming, can continue under the new framework. College staff are working with DEL and the regional colleges to secure that outcome.

I apologise that this answer is so long, but I wanted to give Members all the information. The new entrants' scheme is still open to young farmers under 40 who possess adequate competence and who are setting up as head of a holding for the first time. The scheme provides an interest-rate subsidy on loans for eligible projects that add value and make a positive impact on the farming industry and the broader economy.

Mr Burnside: I thank the Minister for that almost comprehensive statement, but it was not quite comprehensive enough.

Will the Minister consider giving the new entrants' scheme more flexibility in the head-of-holding requirement that currently has to be within one year — which excludes a number of applicants who may be head of holding for 15 months to two years?

With regard to the response that the Minister gave to my colleague Tom Elliott on the relationship between DARD and the Planning Service on viability criteria, it is her Department that recommends most of the criteria, but 50% are being turned down by the Planning Service. Therefore, there must be many applications for the holding criteria that are being turned down. Why is the Department doing that?

Ms Gildernew: First, my Department does not make the decision on planning permission. That is made by the Planning Service, which is under the auspices of the Minister of Environment.

Secondly, the Planning Service asked the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development for figures on viability. However, the decision is not made on that basis alone. If someone applies for planning permission and is turned down for ribbon development for lack of integration or for green-belt reasons, those are also the criteria for turning down an application. The Member's figures do not point to the fact that the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development does not turn people down for planning permission: the Planning Service has the statutory obligation to look after planning.

Mr Burnside's supplementary question was so long that I have forgotten the first part. Can he remind me of it?

Mr Burnside: It was about the head-of-holding requirement, which at present —

Mr Speaker: Order.

Ms Gildernew: I apologise. I have carefully examined the issue of head of holding. I have also asked young farmers' clubs for their advice and have made several changes. I accept the fact that sometimes matters take a wee while to bed in. However, the Department has criteria to follow. It tries to get a resolution as early as possible, and it tries to get as many young farmers as possible into the new entrants' scheme. However, it is not always easy in respect of the head of holding. I will do more to try to ensure that more young farmers get in. I am keen on the new entrants' scheme, and I want to see as many people as possible taking it up.

Mr Shannon: In a way, the Minister has answered my supplementary question. The DUP has campaigned for the new entrants' scheme for a long time, as have many others. To that end, has the Minister carried out any work to review the new entrants scheme in order to introduce tangible and practical recommendations for the future?

Ms Gildernew: I do not have the answer to that question as it relates to educational issues. However, I am happy to write to the Member with the relevant information.

Mr McGlone: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. The Minister has touched on the issue that I want to raise, which is farm viability. She was technically correct when she said that the ultimate decision rests with the Planning Service, but I am asking about cases in which there are no other planning criteria. Incidentally, the green belt has gone.

Last week, we heard from the Minister's party and her ministerial colleague Mr Murphy that the rural planning review group, set up by the Executive and chaired by him, had not met for three months. In light of the severely restrictive farm viability criteria —

Mr Speaker: Order. This is the third time that I have had to call for order. Members ought to know that a supplementary question must relate to the original question. On several occasions today, that has not been the case. Will the Member ask a supplementary question on the original question?

Mr McGlone: I am sorry, Mr Speaker. I will clarify. My point is that the original question referred to embarking on a career in agriculture. If people want a career in agriculture, where will they live? Will the Minister give an update on whether a review has been carried out on farm viability criteria for part-time farmers to ensure that they could embark on that part-time career and live beside their work?

Ms Gildernew: I am a member of the inter-departmental working group and I will examine that issue. I am opposed to PPS 14, and I am in favour of doing anything that can be done to allow farmers to live at their workplace. The interdepartmental working group will consider all the issues, and I will make my decision based on what is right for our young farmers.

Crossnacreevy

6. Mr McCallister asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development, in light of the decision to dispose of the facilities at Crossnacreevy, to detail how she intends to maintain the work undertaken at the site. (AQO 368/08)

Ms Gildernew: The relocation of the work programme at the plant testing station at Crossnacreevy will be progressed through a project led by the Agri-Food Biosciences Institute (AFBI) and DARD. During the initial stages of the project, the focus will be to specify the scientific and agricultural requirement of any new site. That will assist in identifying and evaluating options for the relocation of the ongoing services provided at the site, so that the work programme, and AFBI's contractual commitments, are not prejudiced. It will also inform AFBI on decisions regarding its future estate strategy. Once a site has been agreed with my Department, a detailed timescale and implementation plan will be developed, which will involve the orderly transfer of the work programme, some of which will take over three years to effect.

That is due to the cyclical and long-term nature of the trials. During that time, the work programme will continue on the Crossnacreevy site, and decisions on its disposal and on the associated timetable will complement the relocation project. Key scientific staff will be closely involved throughout the process.

3.30 pm

Draft terms of reference and an outline business case for the relocation of the functions conducted at Crossnacreevy are being agreed with AFBI. Preliminary fact-finding work has been undertaken, and I assure Members that the greatest possible care will be taken to manage the relocation of that valuable work.

Mr Speaker: Time is up.

CULTURE, ARTS AND LEISURE

Creative Arts and Culture

1. Mr Cree asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure what is his assessment of the role played by Creative Arts and Culture in strengthening the local economy and supporting regeneration; and what plans he has for encouraging such initiatives. (AQO 371/08)

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure (Mr Poots): Arts and culture play an important role in strengthening the local economy and supporting regeneration. In 2005, it was estimated that there are more than 2,500 creative enterprises in Northern Ireland, employing 34,600 people, and representing 4.7% of employment.

Cultural and creative industries and a thriving art scene act as catalysts for developing tourism, inward investment and enhancing the quality of life for all. Cultural tourism is growing faster than any other tourist segment, with an estimated 224,000 visitors a year to Northern Ireland engaging in cultural activities. Arts Council programmes, such as the art of regeneration and re-imaging communities, help to regenerate public spaces.

I aim to exploit the potential of culture and the arts to develop Northern Ireland as a world-class creative and cultural region that generates wealth and sustainable employment opportunities in the creative-industries sector.

The arts are the backbone of the creative industries, and I recognise that a public-funding deficit has accumulated in Northern Ireland over many years. I have called for an increase in funding for the arts in the comprehensive spending review; I am bidding for seed funding to help emerging businesses in the creative-industries sector, and I will continue to support Northern Ireland Screen to develop the film and television industry, which has gone from strength to strength in Northern Ireland.

My Department is investing more than £27 million to significantly enhance the arts infrastructure in Belfast and Londonderry, and I am bidding for additional capital funding from the investment strategy for Northern Ireland (ISNI 2).

DCAL will continue to work with colleagues in the Department of Education, the Department for Employment and Learning, the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment and with Invest NI to promote the creativity agenda.

Mr Cree: I thank the Minister for that full and comprehensive response. Will he provide details of the funding provided to the creative arts and culture during the past three years and set out how that compares, on a per capita basis, with funding in other parts of the United Kingdom?

Mr Poots: I will provide the Member with a written breakdown of the funding over the past three years. The arts and creative industries employ 4.5% of the working population in Northern Ireland and 6.8% in the rest of the UK. We intend to meet that gap.

Mr McCausland: In view of the fact that the creative industries are the fastest growing sector in the British economy, what measures is the Minister taking to boost those industries in Northern Ireland?

Mr Poots: DCAL established a creativity seed fund in 2001 using Executive programme funds and distributed £2.8 million to 96 creative-learning and creative-industries projects between 2001 and 2004. That funding has now been terminated. However, there is still a gap in support. Many micro-businesses and small enterprises operating in that sector are too small to become Invest NI client companies. Many entrepreneurs in the sector require start-up finance, business-planning assistance, access to finance and help with product development and marketing. Therefore, the Department will be bidding for a further creativity seed fund in the 2007 comprehensive spending review.

Mr Durkan: I thank the Minister for his answer, which underlines the importance and potential of the creative-industries sector. Has he considered how his Department might work with Invest NI, and others, on bids and plans to support growth in that sector using new money from the innovation fund, arising from the representations made to the former Chancellor by all parties prior to devolution?

As some people seem to think that there are going to be difficulties in spending that money, the creative-industry sector could have come up with a sound platform for expenditure.

Mr Poots: We are happy to work with Invest Northern Ireland, and, indeed, with DETI in assisting them to spend the funding that comes from the innovation fund. Obviously, DETI has the lead role regarding the creative industries; we are involved in seed funding, particularly for the creative youth categories. Therefore, if the Chairman of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment is encouraging my Department to get some of that money, we would be happy to oblige.

Performing Arts Facility

2. Lord Morrow asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure, given the high level of talent in Northern Ireland in the performing arts, what priority he has given to a dedicated performing arts facility for Northern Ireland. (AQO 327/08)

Mr Poots: Rather than invest in one performing arts facility for Northern Ireland, it is the policy of my Department in conjunction with the Arts Council of Northern Ireland to support existing organisations to develop their infrastructure and performance facilities.

In addition to the £6.3 million already invested in the extension to the Grand Opera House, further funding has been committed for the following performing arts venues: the Lyric Players' Theatre has been awarded a DCAL contribution of £6 million and £2.25 million from the Arts Council; the Old Museum Arts Centre will receive £4 million from DCAL and £4.25 from the Arts Council; the Crescent Arts Centre will receive £2.5 million from DCAL and £1.45 million from the Arts Council; the Ulster Hall will receive £2 million from DCAL and £687,000 from the Arts Council; the Waterside Theatre in Londonderry has received £777,000 from DCAL; the Playhouse Theatre has received £416,000 from DCAL and £1.1 million from the Arts Council; and An Gaeláras has received £363,000 from DCAL and £650,000 from the Arts Council.

That money will deliver a new Lyric Theatre on Ridgeway Street, a new metropolitan arts centre in St Anne's Square in the Cathedral Quarter, and a refurbished and enhanced Ulster Hall and Crescent Arts Centre. In Londonderry, it will help to deliver a refurbished and enhanced Waterside Theatre and Playhouse Theatre, and a brand new Irish language centre and arts centre in Great James Street.

In addition to the Arts Council funding, Lottery capital grants provided funding to the following main regional venues: the Marketplace Theatre and Arts Centre in Armagh received £3.67 million; the Ballymena Arts Centre received £2 million; the Flowerfield Arts Centre in Coleraine received £1.38 million; the Burnavon Arts and Cultural Centre in Cookstown received £1.12 million; the Millennium Court Arts Centre in Craigavon received £1.09 million; the Island Arts Centre in Lisburn received £1.3 million; the Strule Arts Centre received £4 million and the Alley Arts and Conference Centre in Strabane received £758,000.

Lord Morrow: I thank the Minister for his detailed and comprehensive answer. If I lived in Londonderry or Belfast, I would be quite happy. However, I do not live in either. Does the Minister share my concern at the lack of funding and expenditure in places such as Fermanagh and South Tyrone, but also in rural Northern Ireland in general? Will the Minister give an assurance that his Department will consider funding for rural areas in Northern Ireland?

Mr Poots: Yes, I will. A number of regional councils have stepped up to the mark. For example, I believe that Omagh Council has spent somewhere close to £10 million developing the Strule Arts Centre, of which my Department has contributed £4 million. We contributed £758,000 to the Alley Arts and Conference Centre in Strabane to help to deliver a £4 million project.

From what I have read regarding venues in the Belfast City Council area, there is a substantial shortfall in the case of the Lyric Theatre, the Old Museum Arts Centre, the Crescent Arts Centre and others. It is not for my Department to pay for it all. Ultimately, if Belfast City Council does not step up to the mark, in the way that the regional councils have done, I am afraid that there is a risk of those projects being lost.

Mr McNarry: Will the Minister assure the House that the advent of a dedicated performing arts facility will ensure that all sections of society are equally encouraged to participate in its activities, and that it will make strenuous efforts to reach out in a spirit of inclusiveness?

Mr Poots: That is certainly my desire, and if there is any indication or evidence that that is not the case, those matters should be brought to my attention.

Mrs M Bradley: Has the Minister's Department had discussions with universities to explore partnerships or synergies that could be developed between the performing arts in the academic, community, civic and commercial settings?

Mr Poots: My Department works closely with the Queen's University of Belfast on the Belfast Festival at Queen's to ensure the ongoing delivery of that festival, and is happy to work with universities in delivering arts projects.

Minority Ethnic Groups: Arts Funding

3. Ms Lo asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure to detail the funding given to minority ethnic groups by the Arts Council of Northern Ireland to fund arts events or projects. (AQO 392/08)

Mr Poots: The funding provided for minority ethnic groups by the Arts Council of Northern Ireland in recent years is as follows: in 2005-06, the Mandarin Speakers Association received a grant of £10,000 and a grant of £134,930, which was spread over three years; the Chinese Welfare Association received £9,785; the Afro-Community Support Organisation of Northern Ireland received £5,150; the Belfast Travellers Support Group received £4,370; St Columb's Park House received £8,394; Newtownards Road Women's Group received £7,500; Live Music Now! Ireland received £8,200; Border Arts received £6,140; and the Indian Community Centre received £5,920. The Chinese Welfare Association received a further £5,550 in 2007-08.

Ms Lo: Those are all very small grants. In the past, ethnic minority groups have been marginalised in getting access to Arts Council grants. Will the Minister assure me that such groups will receive encouragement and support in accessing better public arts funding in future?

Mr Poots: In proportion to my Department's budget, those are not small amounts. The Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure is one of the smaller Departments. A grant of £134,000 is a significant grant. Nonetheless, within the Arts Council, a dedicated officer works with ethnic and minority communities, and we will consider each application on the basis that it is made. Perhaps the reason for the lower amount in 2007-08 is that applications were not forthcoming; we cannot give grants if applications are not made.

Mr K Robinson: Does the Minister agree that the recent successful Belfast Mela 2007, held in the Botanic Gardens in Belfast and staged by ethnic groups resident in Northern Ireland, provides a useful model for celebrating diverse cultures and aiding the process of integration? Will his Department undertake to work with its organisers to build on that event for future years?

Mr Poots: My Department is happy to work with those who bring forward proposals that meet the relevant criteria. I believe that that festival did so.

Mrs Hanna: Has the Minister considered the potential for the North's growing ethnic minority community to contribute to social and cultural diversity and, in so doing, improve international relations?

Mr Poots: People from other countries bring fresh cultures to Northern Ireland, and that has been to the good. As I have said, the Department has a dedicated officer within the Arts Council of Northern Ireland who deals with people from ethnic communities and assists them in developing the arts infrastructure for those communities.

Irish League Football

4. Mr Spratt asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure what action he intends to take to improve the quality of stadia in Irish League football.
(AQO 305/08)

10. Mr Elliott asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure, in light of live screenings of Cliftonville Football Club versus Linfield Football Club on television, to outline his plans to encourage and promote television coverage of Irish League football.
(AQO 372/08)

Mr Poots: With your permission, Mr Speaker, I will answer questions 4 and 10 together.

Responsibility for improving the quality of stadia in Irish League football rests with the owners of the venues. However, Sport Northern Ireland, which is responsible for the development of sport, including the distribution of funding, runs a number of programmes to help owners of sport venues, including Irish League venues, to improve the quality of their stadia. These include a stadia safety programme and a soccer strategy playing facilities programme.

Responsibility for encouraging and promoting television coverage of Irish League football rests with the governing body of football in Northern Ireland, the Irish Football Association (IFA), and Irish League football clubs. Improving the visual coverage of football, including television coverage, is also one of the key recommendations of the soccer strategy initiative, which is being implemented by the IFA, with assistance from Sport Northern Ireland. In line with that recommendation, the IFA recently agreed a new four-year contract with Sky TV for televising major Northern Ireland matches.

That deal covers full international games, under-21 international games and Irish Premier League games. The live screening of the Cliftonville versus Linfield league game was the first match to be broadcast under this contract.

3.45 pm

Mr Spratt: Will the Minister agree that Irish League football is an improving product, evidenced by, as he has said, the recent Sky TV coverage of the Linfield versus Cliftonville game, and that the stadia and training facilities should similarly improve in order to further enhance the game in Northern Ireland? Furthermore, following speculation at the weekend about the future viability of Windsor Park, what support does Sport Northern Ireland contribute to improve the quality of Irish League stadia? In the light of the entry requirements, is there likely to be further support?

Mr Poots: Very few Irish League grounds meet UEFA standards, and, therefore, work must be done to improve spectator safety and comfort at their venues.

Under the programme, Sport Northern Ireland has already made offers of awards to five Irish League clubs — Ballymena United Football Club, Cliftonville Football Club, Crusaders Football Club, Donegal Celtic Football Club and Portadown Football Club, which are collectively worth approximately £3 million. Over the past two years, Sport NI has provided an additional £610,000 from the soccer strategy for improvements to Irish League grounds that were used for the staging of the UEFA under-19 football championship finals in 2005.

We will look at all bids as they come in, including bids from Linfield Football Club, if it wishes to make one.

Mr Elliot: I thank the Minister for his answer on the televising of Irish League matches. Has the Minister had any communication or contact with television companies regarding the contract or future coverage?

Mr Poots: Personally, I have not had contact with them as that is not my task. That is a matter between the Irish League and the television companies. I understand that the Irish League negotiated a successful contract with Sky TV to the tune of £10 million over four years, which will lead to a significant cash injection into local football.

Mr P J Bradley: Will the Minister provide his Department's assessment of the value of the Setanta Cup in view of its increasing popularity? Will he encourage a Celtic cup competition to include participation of Welsh, Scottish and Irish teams, which would undoubtedly improve the quality of football and create greater revenue for spending on local stadia?

Mr Poots: The Setanta Cup has been a success story and has brought fresh money into Irish League football, and I look forward to the completion of negotiations for the Celtic cup and to the extension of the Setanta Cup competition to include clubs from Scotland and Wales, which will raise the quality of competition that exists in football in Northern Ireland.

Mr Kennedy: Will the proposed national stadium, whether located at the Maze or at any other venue, have other financial consequences for necessary improvements to Irish League stadiums?

Mr Poots: The IFA has made it clear that a maximum capacity of 14,000 is not enough for it to operate as it would wish. Therefore, it is imperative that it gets a larger stadium for its matches. If it does get a larger stadium, there will be more money to spread around Northern Ireland football in general. The IFA has made it clear that it needs a larger stadium, and if we choose to do up one stadium in Northern Ireland, it will lead to less money going to other clubs.

Gaelic Language Event: Mull and Iona

5. Mr Ross asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure to detail the total cost for the Gaelic language event held in Mull and Iona in Scotland; and the number of paying participants that attended the event.
(AQO 337/08)

Mr Poots: I assume that the Member refers to the Colmcille festival, Fèill Chaluim Chille, which was held in Mull, Iona and Oban between 8 and 10 June 2007. The total cost of the festival was £130,330 of which £64,469 was provided by Colmcille.

Colmcille receives one third of its overall funding from my Department. Its draft report on the festival states that 2,611 participants attended, several thousand visited the three ancillary exhibitions, and 252 attendees paid entry into the only ticketed event, which was a concert held at Torosay Castle on Mull. Ticket sales for the event raised £4,200.

Mr Ross: Given the significant cost of the event, the poor number of paying attendees and the fact that part of its funding comes from his Department, does the Minister believe that the festival was value for money? What plans does he have for Colmcille's future operations?

Mr Poots: Consideration is being given to the transferral of Colmcille's operations to Foras na Gaeilge. A judgement on whether the festival was value for money is one that Members may wish to make themselves on the basis of the information that they have heard.

Mr McClarty: Will the Minister give an assurance that similar Ulster-Scots, Ullans and Lallans and other events and projects to be held in Scotland will be given equal encouragement and funding from his Department?

Mr Poots: Its status means that the Ulster-Scots Agency cannot work outside the boundaries of Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland. Therefore, the Ulster-Scots Agency could not hold such a festival in Scotland. That has been inherited from the first Administration, which the Member may know a little more about than I do.

Mr D Bradley: Ba mhaith liom a fhiafraí den Aire an bhfuil pleananna ar bith eile áit ar bith nascanna soisialta teangan agus cultúrtha a níomh idir teangacha dúchais na hÉireann, na hAlban agus na Breataine Bige. I congratulate the Minister on his excellent pronunciation. Can he outline whether his Department has plans to develop further the social, linguistic and cultural links among the various native languages in Ireland, Northern Ireland, Scotland and Wales?

Mr Poots: The Member will be aware that most speakers of Scots Gaelic are Scottish Presbyterians. The difference between what is going on in Northern Ireland and what is going on in Scotland is that the Gaelic language is not being politicised there. Some Members could improve that situation greatly if they were to take a more measured and considered approach to the matter.

2013 World Police and Fire Games

6. Mr Hilditch asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure to detail the support he is giving to assist with hosting the World Police and Fire Games in 2013. (AQO 311/08)

Mr Poots: My Department was actively involved in the bidding process to secure the World Police and Fire Games for Belfast in 2013, and it continues to work closely with the organising committee on the preparation of a strategy to ensure that the games are delivered in accordance with the World Police and Fire Games Federation's requirements and the procurement and accountability practices of all stakeholders.

Mr Hilditch: I am sure that the Minister will agree that hosting the games will be an excellent sporting success for Northern Ireland, with an expected 25,000 visitors to the greater Belfast area. What economic benefits are the games expected to bring to Northern Ireland?

Mr Poots: The value of hosting that event cannot be overestimated. The total economic benefit of the games to Northern Ireland is predicted to be £19.293 million, which will come primarily from visitors from outside Northern Ireland. An economic-impact-ratio calculation in the draft strategic outline business case showed a projected return of £6.38 for every £1 of public-sector investment. That is a significant return on investment when compared to that of other major events.

Moreover, significant media coverage of the games is delivered around the world. Based on previous games, it is anticipated that the 2013 World Police and Fire Games will generate more than £500,000 from international television coverage, primarily in Northern Ireland's key markets, which are the United States, Canada and Europe.

Mr Burns: Does the Minister's Department support the first ever all-island emergency service games that were held in Dublin at the weekend? Will he support the staging of those games in Northern Ireland in 2008?

Mr Poots: No one has ever before brought that matter to my attention, or lobbied on it. Everything will be given due consideration if it is brought to my attention.

Mr Elliott: Will the Minister inform the House of what other major sporting or cultural events he has secured for, or is hoping to attract to, Northern Ireland during the five-year period of 2008-12?

Mr Poots: Among those events that are being bid for are football matches in the 2012 Olympic Games. We are also considering UEFA events for the under-21s, which would be held in Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland. Aside from those events, we have bid for the World Transplant Games, and a series of bids for significant sporting events has been launched by the Northern Ireland Events Company. The World Police and Fire Games is the second-largest world sporting event, after the Olympics. That is why I said — at the outset — that the benefits that that event could bring to Northern Ireland's community cannot be overestimated.

The Northern Ireland Strategy for Sport and Physical Recreation 2007-17

7. Mr McElduff asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure to give a timescale within which he will bring the draft consultation on the Northern Ireland Strategy for Sport and Physical Recreation 2007-2017 before the Executive. (AQO 356/08)

Mr Poots: The responses to the draft Northern Ireland strategy for sport and physical recreation 2007-17 were submitted to the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure for consideration in June 2007. The Committee was also briefed on the context of the document by DCAL and Sport Northern Ireland officials at its meeting of 28 June 2007. Since then, I have circulated the draft document to Ministers, who discussed it at the meeting of the Northern Ireland Executive on 27 September 2007. At that meeting, Ministers agreed to my recommendation that the draft strategy should be published for consultation. I plan to make a statement to the Assembly on that matter on 9 October 2007.

Mr McElduff: What level and extent of consultation has there been with the governing bodies of sport, such as the GAA, Cumann Lúthchleas Gael, the IFA and the Ulster branch of the Irish Rugby Football Union, in relation to the strategy? Also, could the Minister explain why, earlier today, he refused my request — as Chairperson of the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure — that a copy of the statement that he will make to the House tomorrow be made available this afternoon? Instead, I received a fax at 1.30 pm that stated that a statement would be made tomorrow, and that I should wait until then. I was a bit put out by that.

Mr Poots: All good things come to those who wait. There has been extensive consultation with stakeholders throughout the process. In developing the strategy, DCAL and Sport Northern Ireland have worked closely with other Departments, including the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety; the Department for Social Development and the Department of Education.

In addition to that, and prior to beginning to work on the strategy, there were extensive independent consultations with key stakeholders, including district councils, the voluntary sector, the sports governing bodies, clubs, athletes, business interests, community and rural interests, and the wider public. The purpose of those consultations was to gather views on the issues facing sport in Northern Ireland, and how those could best be reflected in the new strategy.

It is normal protocol for ministerial statements to go out at the time of the statement being made. The Speaker has been furnished with the statement already.

Lord Browne: I welcome the fact that, after two years, the draft Northern Ireland strategy for sport and physical recreation 2007-17 will be made available for consultation. It is a comprehensive and ambitious document. I ask the Minister whether sufficient funding will be made available to deliver the much-needed strategy contained in the document?

Mr Poots: That is certainly a challenge. If we deliver a strategy on that scale, which embraces all aspects of sport in Northern Ireland, there must be a genuine partnership approach to funding among all stakeholders. I am keen to do whatever I can to support the strategy's delivery and, for that reason, it forms a major part of my bid under the comprehensive spending review. I await the outcome of that process. However, all bids are subject to the normal budgetary processes.

Ulster-Scots Academy

8. Mrs Long asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure to outline the process his Department will use to consider proposals for an Ulster-Scots academy. (AQO 391/08)

Mr Poots: The public consultation on proposals on for an Ulster-Scots academy closed on 24 September 2007, in accordance with the guidance contained in OFMDFM's 'A Practical Guide to Policy Making in Northern Ireland'. The Ulster-Scots academy implementation group will now undertake an analysis of the consultation responses and reappraisal of the options. I expect the implementation group to present me with a revised set of proposals, and I will then take a decision on which recommendations should be implemented. My decision will, of course, be subject to engagement with the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure and my Executive colleagues.

4.00 pm

Mrs Long: Can the Minister provide an assurance that, as a minimum, the Department would require a full business proposal, including a budget and clarification of auditing, accounting and recruitment processes, before embarking on the academy?

Mr Poots: That would always be the case.

ASSEMBLY BUSINESS

Mr K Robinson: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. Before we move on to the next item of business, can I draw your attention to the 'Northern Ireland Assembly Companion: Rulings, Convention and Practice', in which a previous Speaker, the then Initial Presiding Officer, outlined the protocol for the use of languages other than English in the Chamber. He felt that, as a courtesy to other Members, a Member who chooses to speak in another language should give a full translation of what has been said.

During Question Time, a Member prefaced his remarks in what I believe was Irish. He then transferred some of his thoughts into English. Mr Speaker, can you assure the House that he complied with the guidance that the previous Speaker gave, and did you take steps to check that? I believe that you have at your disposal a device that allows you to hear a simultaneous translation. I raise this issue just in case another language is used in the next 15 minutes.

Mr McElduff: Further to that point or order, Mr Speaker. Will the a Cheann Comhairle perhaps extend the simultaneous translation system, the C  ras aistri  cha  n, to all 108 Members, so that Members can make up their own minds whether Standing Orders are being adhered to? Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Keep her lit.

[Mr K Robinson rose.]

Mr Speaker: Order. I ask the Member to take his seat.

Standing Orders are quite clear. Members can speak in whatever language they choose in the House, but, as a courtesy, they should then translate their comments into English.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Speaker: That is the issue. Let me make that absolutely clear.

Mr D Bradley: Further to that point of order, Mr Speaker In light of the previous comments, I want to assure the House that I provided a full and faithful translation of everything that I said, at no extra charge to the House.

[Mr K Robinson rose.]

Mr Speaker: With the greatest respect, I ask the Member to take his seat. This debate is now over. The last point of order moved away from the original point of order. I do not want to repeat myself, but Members ought to know the procedures in the House with regard to Standing Orders and speaking in another language.

PRIVATE NOTICE QUESTION

Strike Action by Classroom Assistants

Mr Speaker: I have received a private notice question, in accordance with Standing Order 20, for the Minister of Education.

Mrs Long asked the Minister of Education, given that the continuation of strike action by classroom assistants has resulted in the closure of special schools, what arrangements are being, or have been, put in place for children with special needs who access specialist therapy, such as physiotherapy, occupational therapy, speech and language therapy, through their respective schools.

The Minister of Education (Ms Ruane): Two weeks ago, I advised the Assembly that I had undertaken to intervene in this matter with three objectives in mind. The first objective was to ensure that the interests of the children, classroom assistants and parents are paramount. The second objective was to ensure that the employers pay those staff the money that they deserve and for which they have already been waiting too long. The third objective was to facilitate the discussions between the management and the unions so that the outstanding issues can be resolved.

Nuair a phléigh muid an t-ábhar seo ar 19 Meitheamh, ghlac mé leis go raibh an scéal ag dul ar aghaidh ar feadh ró-fhada agus gá é a réiteach. Rinne mé amach labhairt leis na boird agus leis na ceardchumainn faoin ábhar.

When we debated the issue of classroom assistants on 19 June 2007, I accepted that the dispute had gone on for far too long. I undertook to speak to the education and library boards and the trade unions to urge them to resolve the dispute. It is my priority to ensure that classroom assistants receive promptly the money that they are due, and to do all I can to prevent the disruption of the affected children's education.

I have made it clear that I want an agreement, and I continue to do everything in my power to ensure that outcome. There are established channels through which the issues are to be resolved; I have always made it clear that parallel talks would be totally counter-productive. Any imposed solution would be a contradiction in terms. I am determined to see an agreed settlement.

Ba mhaith liom a chur in iúl, arís eile, go bhfuil an-mheas agam ar chúntóirí ranga agus an obair a dhéanann said. Tuigim go bhfuil litir oscailte eisithe ag an Taobh Bainistíochta ag míniú go mion téarmaí na tairsceana. Mholfainn do gach duine machnamh ceart a dhéanamh ar an tairiscint. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mr Burnside: On a point of order. This is terribly important for the fair conduct of business in the House. Mr Speaker, do you or your clerical assistants have a full, educated understanding of the Gaelic language? If you do not, how can you rule that contributors are in order?

Mr Speaker: Order. The Member must take his seat. That is not an appropriate point of order.

Ms Ruane: Ó rinneadh tairiscint níos fearr a mholadh ar an 29 Meán Fómhair chuirfinn ceist orthu siúd a bhfuil baint acu leis an ghníomhaíocht tionsclaíoch gan aon aicsean a dhéanamh a chuireann ualach an aighnis ar na páistí agus ar na teaghlaigh is mó a bhfuil cuidiú de dhíth orthu.

As a result of my intervention in this matter a revised offer was tabled by the management side, and all sides have described the result as representing substantial progress. I understand that three of the four unions involved in the collective negotiation process, and which are not taking industrial action, are currently consulting with their members about the full terms of the proposed offer. I am glad that those unions are giving the offer the consideration it deserves. It is important that that consultation process is completed before the unions meet again with the management side.

I reiterate that I have the utmost respect for classroom assistants and the job that they do. I am aware that the management side has issued an open letter to all classroom assistants, explaining in detail the full terms of the offer. I urge everyone to give the offer their full consideration. I am aware that, from today, a number of the unions intend to hold a series of meetings to explain the details of the offer, and have provided their members with a question-and-answer document, as they are concerned to ensure that classroom assistants are in receipt of the maximum amount of information.

The particular focus of Mrs Long's private notice question is the position of children with special educational needs, and in particular, those in need of specialised therapies. The most effective way of addressing that will be to bring an end to the dispute. Once again, therefore, I ask all classroom assistants to carefully consider the offer.

My Department has sought information from each of the education and library boards as to the contingency measures for that particular group of pupils. They have advised us that the paramount consideration in this situation is the safety in the classroom of children with special educational needs. Where an assessment of risk carried out by the special school determines that a child's safety cannot be assured, that child's attendance is deemed inappropriate. Education and library boards will ask schools to undertake an assessment of risk in order to determine the application of uniform criteria for the admission of children to individual schools.

I have also noticed that some misinformation exists in the Chamber. Let me be helpful, and give Members a brief idea of what the revised offer actually means. As a result of the additional £15 million, every classroom assistant will receive a one-off payment that can be £1,613 or £2,478, depending on length of service. That offer recognises a movement from the historical terms and conditions of service. Up to 50% of classroom assistants will receive job evaluation arrears amounting to around £25.2 million. Classroom assistants in special schools will receive the highest payment for job evaluation arrears, which could be up to £20,000 each. As I announced last week, there will be a review of support staff in schools which will consider such issues as qualifications and career development for classroom assistants.

No classroom assistant will lose any pay. No classroom assistant will be forced to increase their hours, and there will be no cut in hours. There will be full salary and pension-protection arrangements. Those classroom assistants who were on protected salaries will continue to receive salary increases on elements of their salary. Therefore, nobody will be worse off. Many will receive considerable back pay in arrears, and every classroom assistant will gain from the £15 million that is designated for the movement from historical terms and conditions.

Whatever people's views on the wider issues, there can be no denying that the offer is substantial. It recognises the important role that classroom assistants play as staff, while taking account of the cost implications for the rest of the education budget. As I said earlier, the unions that are not taking industrial action are currently consulting their members about the full terms of the revised offer, and it is important that that process be completed. The continued disruption to our children's education is not the way forward. I remain hopeful that the revised offer can lead to a fair and equitable settlement being reached in the near future. I assure the House that I will continue to do everything that is in my power to bring about a resolution to the issue.

In light of the improved offer that was made on 28 September, I call on those who are engaged in industrial action to desist from any activity that places the burden of the disagreement on those children and families that most need help. Go raibh maith agat faoi do cheist.

The education of our children must be paramount, and I implore all those who are involved to do what is needed to prevent further disruption.

Mr B McCrea: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. Is it in order for the Minister to have given an all-encompassing answer and strayed off the point of the question?

Mr Speaker: Order. I am not in control of how a Minister answers questions. I wish that I were sometimes, but, unfortunately, I am not.

Mrs Long: I thank the Minister for providing such a comprehensive answer to what was a different question about the general progress of the dispute. More specifically, I am concerned about those who need paramedical therapies, which are normally provided through the school. Therefore, will the Minister explain what, if any, liaison there has been between her and the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety or between the respective boards and trusts regarding interim provision of specialist paramedical therapies during the current dispute? Will she advise to whom parents should refer for advice? Currently, when parents approach the trust, school or board, they are referred to someone else in that triangle. It is important that parents know to whom they should speak about the issue.

Ms Ruane: First, the dispute must be resolved, and I thank Naomi Long for her interest in the matter. It has been a difficult time for the parents and the children. We must ensure that our children get the best possible education and that all their needs are attended to.

The boards have asked all schools to carry out a risk assessment for the children who need paramedical therapies, and I am waiting for the details of that. My departmental officials are in consultation with the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety. My priority remains the health and safety of the children and resolving the dispute.

Parents who are concerned about the provision of paramedical therapies should contact the schools and the boards.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Education (Mr S Wilson): The Minister has outlined the current position on the dispute, but we are none the wiser about her role. Does the Minister agree that on 19 June, the matter was raised in the Assembly and she promised that she would take immediate action? On 24 September, it was raised again, and she promised then that there would be immediate action.

Last Friday, on the eve of an all-out strike, the Minister took herself off to Drumcondra to talk about promoting oral Irish in English-medium schools, rather than addressing the issue that was most prevalent back here at home, namely those children.

4.15 pm

Since 19 June, Members have been asking the question that Naomi Long has asked again today, which is whether the Department of Education has a contingency plan if the dispute ever ends up in a strike. Although the youngsters are not likely to find the school doors open tomorrow, all we are told today is that parents should contact the boards or the trusts. Does the Minister really believe that that is how the general public, the parents, the principals and the classroom assistants expect her to deal with what has now become a crisis situation? Thirty special schools will be closed tomorrow, and the most vulnerable youngsters will be left on the street without the kind of backup care that, in some cases, they need for their physical attention, let alone their educational attention.

Ms Ruane: Go raibh maith agat. First, I was in Drumcondra meeting the Minister for Education and Science in the South of Ireland, Mary Hanafin. North/South interventions between Mary Hanafin and me are important, and developing North/South links is a priority for me. I trust — [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Ms Ruane: One of the joint actions that Mary Hanafin and I are working on is looking at the issue of special needs, and ways in which we can co-operate. We are co-operating substantially on the Middletown centre for autism, which will be a world-class centre of excellence. Therefore, I hope that people will not play politics with this issue. It is important that we continue our North/South links. I pledge to the people of the North of Ireland that I take my North/South statutory duties very seriously.

Mrs Long: Will the Member give way?

Ms Ruane: No, I want to answer the question.

Secondly, the classroom assistants' dispute is 12 years old. When I came into office, I said that the matter must be resolved and that I would intervene to ensure that there would be a fair and equitable settlement. My priority has been, and remains, ensuring that classroom assistants receive promptly the money that they are due, and doing all that I can to prevent anything from adversely disrupting the education of the children affected. I trust that everyone in the House will work with me on that. I have made it clear time and time again that I want an agreement to be reached, and I continue to do everything in my power to ensure that that is the outcome.

Following the previous debate on the dispute, I asked employers and unions to resume their talks, and they did so that same evening. I also asked employers to act as swiftly as possible to get the long-overdue payments into the hands of their staff. Today, I issued a statement calling on all classroom assistants to give full consideration to the offer that has been outlined. This offer is a substantial improvement, and I ask all classroom assistants to read it carefully. I am aware that many classroom assistants from various unions have contacted the boards and their trade unions to get detailed information. I have also called on those who are engaged in industrial action to desist from any action that places the burden of the disagreement on the children and families who most need help.

This is a 12-year-old dispute. It must be resolved, and I believe that it can be resolved. Three of the four unions are currently consulting. That is part of the process, but we must wait and listen to what the classroom assistants say about the offer.

Mr Storey: Will the Member give way?

Ms Ruane: No, I will not give way.

We also need to put in place health and safety assessments of every child for whom we are responsible, and we are doing that. My officials are in discussions with the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety to ensure that health and safety arrangements for our children are in place. Go raibh maith agat.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

Crisis in Burma

Debate resumed on motion:

That this Assembly views with the deepest concern the unfolding events in Burma; salutes the courage of the Burmese people in challenging the oppressive, corrupt and illegitimate military junta that has ruled Burma for decades and which has brought misery to the country and lives of its people; declares its support for Burma's democratic leaders, in particular the imprisoned Aung San Suu Kyi, leader of the National League for Democracy, and calls for her immediate release; supports the call of the Prime Minister for the most extensive range of sanctions possible against the regime, under the auspices of the United Nations; and further calls on the British, Irish and other European Union governments to take all necessary action to help topple this despicable regime. — [Mrs Hanna.]

Mr P Maskey: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. In recognising that sanctions can have a positive influence, one must also be aware that sanctions may hurt the poor — not the regime leaders. One has only to look at the situation in Iraq, where United Nations sanctions have killed between 500,000 and 1 million young people and children due to the lack of medicines. Sanctions must be directed against the military, rather than the people, and they must be imposed by non-violent and non-military interventions. The motion does not state that, and that is why Sinn Féin will abstain.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Dallat] in the Chair)

Sinn Féin strongly condemns the oppressive regime of the ruling military junta, which, during its 40-year rule, has driven the Burmese economy into the ground and held its people hostage. The unrelenting violence by the state against its people over the past few weeks has left an unknown number of people dead and injured. That is unacceptable and must be tackled by the international community. Everyone has seen the horrendous scenes from Myanmar on their television screens.

There has been an escalation in mass peaceful protest nationwide since 21 September 2007, and those have been met by force. There is a need for a co-ordinated and prompt international response. We have had our experience of state violence, not least when 14 civilians who were protesting for their civil liberties — and ours — were murdered by the British Army on the streets of Derry.

Buddhist monks, clergy and ordinary people have taken to the streets in protest against the Government, calling for the release of political prisoners and for national reconciliation. The Government of Myanmar and their military, security and police forces have a well-documented record of serious human-rights violations that the United Nations has described as “widespread and systematic”. Excluding recent arrests and imprisonments, more than 1,160 political prisoners are held in prison, and most senior members of the opposition parties continue to be detained.

State abuses include extrajudicial killings and torture, and the routine suppression of opposition politicians. On the evening of 25 September 2007, the authorities introduced a 60-day curfew between 9.00 pm and 5.00 am. The heavy military presence and the mass arrests have led to an increase in the already intense climate of fear. There are many reports of brutal beatings, killings and disappearances. The Myanmar/Burmese military has raided monasteries and attacked peaceful protesters. The authorities have acknowledged 10 deaths; however, it is feared that the actual number is much higher.

The demonstrations were sparked by rises in fuel prices, and recent research from Save the Children identified that almost 50% of families in rural areas cannot afford a basic healthy diet for their children. However, increases in fuel prices represent only a part of a much bigger problem for local people. Myanmar is a rich country: it is the world's largest exporter of teak, and it has deposits of jade, pearls, rubies, sapphires and off-shore oil and gas. There is an arms embargo in place, but it is being flouted by the Chinese, Indian, Russian, Serbian and Ukraine Governments in particular. Loopholes in the European Union legislation mean that arms, weapons and components manufactured in the European Union are finding their way into the weapons systems that are being sold to the Burmese regime.

Save the Children has been working in Myanmar for 12 years. Its representatives say that the agencies working there face some operational constraints from the regime. The key problems identified by Save the Children are severe underinvestment in basic services and huge poverty. Children in Myanmar are facing some of the worst poverty in Asia. More than 130,000 children under the age of five die every year — one third are underweight, and hunger contributes to half of those deaths. Less than half of the children complete five years of school. Myanmar is one of the few places in the world where children are likely to have worse health and education outcomes than their parents.

Child trafficking — particularly across the eastern border — has also been identified as a big problem, with many children involved in prostitution or child labour. The international community has, in many ways, abandoned Burma. International assistance is less than $2.50 per person per year, and that is one of the lowest figures in the world. That is why we need an international approach that avoids further bloodshed and which supports and leads to inclusive political dialogue. Regardless of the political outcome, there is an obligation to address the dire humanitarian situation for children.

The international community needs to increase its assistance to aid agencies and its efforts to improve the human rights situation in Burma. A LeasCheann Comhairle, go raibh maith agat.

Lord Browne: I agree with the declaration of support for democratic forces in Burma as set out in the motion. I am sure that all Members earnestly hope that the oppressive, undemocratic rule of the military junta in Burma will soon be brought to an end.

I also join with other Members in the Chamber in saluting the courage and determination of Aung San Suu Kyi, whose steadfast support for civil and religious liberty has been an uplifting example for freedom-loving people throughout the world.

It is essential that the United Nations should speak with one voice in making clear to the regime that its actions in suppressing legitimate dissent are completely unacceptable to the international community.

However, I have some concerns about the wording of the motion. First, calling for the most extensive range of sanctions possible to be introduced against the regime might well result in great hardship for the ordinary people because the Burmese economy is already in a powerless state and the military junta might be well able to protect itself. It could lead to further political instability, which would further impede the restoration of democracy.

Secondly, I am also concerned about the call for the British, Irish and other EU Governments to take all necessary action to topple the regime, which is a little too broad. As the motion stands, military action by those countries would not necessarily be ruled out, and I am sure that all Members would agree that military action would be misguided and would be contrary to international law. In any case, action taken against the regime should be under the auspices of the United Nations and should not be undertaken by individual Governments, or groupings, acting independently.

I am old enough to remember the campaign against the communist Afghan Government of Najibollah and its Russian backers, which led to the boycott of the Olympic Games in 1980 by the United States and other countries. That campaign was followed by a long period of western military support for the Islamic mujahedin fighters, who eventually achieved power, and as we know, set up what might be described as the wicked Taliban dictatorship. Care must be taken when seeking to undermine one Government and replace it with another, and care should be taken now.

A free and democratic society is a priceless asset; and I am sure that no one would disagree with that or the fact that the Burmese people do not deserve anything less. It is important that western countries think carefully about the best way to achieve that, rather than precipitating a knee-jerk response. However, there is great merit in the motion in front of the House today, and I support it.

Mr Burnside: I agree with Lord Browne's sentiments. I also express my concern at the wording of the motion, which is open ended and threatening and is not the right language to use to have this dealt with through the United Nations. Topple a military regime and one will not end up with a democratic regime the next morning.

Pressure needs to be brought to bear through the United Nations, especially on the two superpowers; China, which is still not democratic and free, but is a totalitarian, capitalist regime, and the Indian Government, which can also exert great influence. In international affairs, there comes a time when the mood is right for change, and the mood is right in Burma. A devolved Assembly such as ours can only express opinions, but our voice should be added to the United Nations international community action.

4.30 pm

Sanctions should be brought against Burma and consideration given to putting pressure on China over the Olympics, but I would warn that that could be a double-edged sword: one does not know where to start or where to end when taking action and interfering in politics. Every international soccer tournament and athletics event could be non-existent in six months' time if the political structure of all those countries involved were not supported. I am worried about international boycotts.

However, Burma may be a special case. China is suffering as a result of its own international image. Although it was some years ago, the image of the student in Tiananmen Square is still in our minds. The television pictures that we have seen from Burma recently have stirred the same emotions and international outrage. We should, without forcing the Chinese to lose face, put pressure on them. When dealing with the Chinese, it is important that they are not seen to lose face. China, which is slowly evolving, wants and needs the Olympic Games, so it could help to bring about the sort of change that we all want to see in Burma.

We should admire the individual courage of those who go out and stand in front of tanks: they are very brave people. I support the motion, while sounding one note of caution. I feel that the language used at the end of the motion is rather extreme. We should apply international pressure through the United Nations. I support the sentiments of most Members: what is happening in Burma is unacceptable and the military regime must be replaced with a better and fairer form of Government for the depressed and oppressed people of Burma.

Mr A Maginness: I thank my colleague Mrs Hanna for tabling the motion. She does a great service to the House and to the struggle of the Burmese people for liberation from their military rulers.

I have a couple of points that I hope do not repeat the other Members' contributions. The context in which to place the current situation is in the wake of the 1988 suppression of the Burmese people when they stood up to their military dictatorship. Many people in the West and in other parts of the world regret the fact that more pressure was not applied at that time to those people who have pillaged the country. It is not simply a dictatorship but a kleptocracy, in which the generals and their minions exploit the exchequer and the riches of Burma for their own ends. It is not simply a nasty military regime but a regime whose members are enriching themselves and are totally self-interested.

It is not usual for me to agree with anything that Mr Burnside says, but he has made very pertinent points today about the Chinese. It is very important that pressure be put on China. It is a big international power that is approaching superpower status. It is right and proper that any legitimate pressure should be put on it to intervene peacefully and to use its good offices and its tremendous influence — both political and economic — on that particularly ghastly regime. If any country in the world can do that, it is China. Therefore, we in the West and other countries must exercise legitimate pressure on China. The people who belong to that regime are clearly so self-interested and so self-sustaining when it comes to their military power that it would be very difficult for Western countries to exercise the necessary pressure to change their minds.

I emphasise the point made by Ibrahim Gambari, the special envoy of the United Nations Secretary-General, who said that the purpose of his visit, and the common purpose of us all, must be to achieve dialogue between the legitimate opposition to the regime and the regime itself.

After his meeting with Aung San Suu Kyi, he believed that there was a window of opportunity to create a dialogue between the regime and the opposition, and that it was important to encourage that, in a spirit of national reconciliation. The Assembly must also encourage that. The motion does not, in any way, suggest any form of military intervention. Rather, it suggests that non-military pressure should be applied. The United Nations Charter states that, other than in self-defence, only the Security Council can authorise the use of force. Neither the former nor the latter currently applies.

Unfortunately, the Burmese military regime enjoys the consequences of a culture of impunity, as do other military regimes and dictatorships that extensively and systematically abuse human rights. Members must help to undermine that culture of impunity by supporting the United Nations and in particular High Commissioner for Human Rights, Louise Arbour. We must send a strong message to those people in the Burmese military regime. Remember Milosevic, Saddam Hussein and Pinochet. Throughout the world, there must no longer be a culture of impunity.

Mr S Wilson: I congratulate the Member for South Belfast Carmel Hanna on securing the debate, which is good for several reasons. Although it is not within the Assembly's remit to do anything, I welcome the happy participation of Sinn Féin, which complained last week about the tabling of motions that do not fall within the Assembly's remit. Secondly, it is incumbent on Members, and a sign of how politics have developed in Northern Ireland, to consider issues that lie further afield, rather than engaging in a form of introspection in which we only considered our own problems.

Before I address the substance of the motion, I wish to mention an earlier Sinn Féin comment about Northern Ireland's part in supporting the Burmese regime. A scurrilous allegation was made in which several Northern Ireland firms were named as — possibly — having supplied parts for planes, which might eventually have found their way into Burma. Firms were named that provide local jobs. Of course, in the past, Sinn Féin had no worries about importing arms from other dictatorial regimes in order to engage in human-rights abuses — so it is a bit rich for Sinn Féin to get weepy now.

On the substance of the motion, the UN's involvement has been mentioned. Even amid the storm of events in Burma, when the UN debated the use of sanctions on 27 September, China and Russia used their vetoes. The UN cannot be relied on too heavily. Sanctions would tend to hurt the people of Burma as much as, or more than, the leaders of the country.

It is significant that the gap created by American-imposed sanctions was quickly filled by Burma's neighbours — the Association of Southeast Asian Nations — which felt that Burma was better in than out, and that it would learn that, by behaving properly, it would experience high economic growth. That did not work.

Of course, attacking the aid budget will hit only the poorest in that society.

There are a number of pressure points that should be examined. Alban Maginness made the point that the people who perpetrate the abuse must know that whatever action is taken will hurt them personally. If there is change in the future, they need to know that there will be nowhere for them to hide. The first point of pressure should be to ensure that the assets of the leaders of that military junta cannot be hidden and squirrelled abroad, so that when things go pear-shaped and they have to leave, they cannot go and live a life of luxury. They also need to know that once they leave the borders of Burma, they will be hunted down and held responsible for the abuses that they have carried out.

The second point of pressure is China. In dealing with China, we have to be careful. China, of course, has got a vested interest. It is involved in 17 oil and gas projects and a 1,500 mile pipeline to transfer oil. It has military bases on the Indian Ocean. That is all as a result of co-operation with Burma.

There are, however, a couple of pressure points that must be examined regarding China. First of all, the instability in Burma could not be helpful to the Chinese economy. It does not want an unstable neighbour, and the longer it supports the military junta, the more instability there will be. That instability is leading to the manufacture of drugs in Burma, which is already affecting China. Secondly — and this has to be used carefully — China needs international support for its hosting of the Olympics. The issue of the Olympics, if handled properly, could be used to put pressure on one of Burma's biggest backers at present.

Mr G Robinson: In Northern Ireland we are fortunate to live in a democracy with freedom of speech, movement and political expression, which have been so obviously and brutally denied to the people of Burma. We have experienced, what are in comparison, minor troubles. However, in Burma, the world's media are being denied access to the occurring events, telephone links have been deliberately cut and Internet services have been consciously disrupted by a military dictatorship desperate to hide the violent and abusive nature that characterises it. The Burmese Government are not the protector of the Burmese people — they are its enemy.

In the past number of weeks, on our television screens, we have seen pictures smuggled out of this oppressed country — often at great personal risk — that have highlighted the appalling abuse of power by the military regime in Burma.

That so-called Government triggered the present crisis when they doubled fuel prices and raised the compressed gas prices fivefold. That compressed gas is used to fuel the buses that are the main means of transport for the vast majority of Burma's population. Those increases have had a knock-on effect on food prices with devastating consequences for the Burmese people, who struggle to provide basic foods for their families. This is a country that was already afflicted by poverty of the deepest and truest kind.

The Burmese Buddhist monks, who are the religious leaders and spokespeople for the man in the street, came onto the streets in peaceful protest at the devastating consequences that those price rises had on the already impoverished population. By walking past the home of the opposition leader Aung San Suu Kyi, they made it abundantly clear that regime change and democracy was an essential element of their protest.

The so-called Burmese Government's reaction to that was to use tear gas and baton charges to clear the monks and their fellow protestors off the streets. The fear now is that a repetition of the August 1988 slaughter will occur, or already has. It is essential to acknowledge that a cornerstone of Buddhist teaching is non-violence, and it can therefore be determined that the protests that are taking place are non-violent, as those monks have great influence on and immense respect from the Burmese people.

I wish to stress again that those monks are engaged in peaceful protests, and the brutal suppression of the recent marches in which they were involved has raised not only much anger, but defiance among the Burmese people.

4.45 pm

On 1 October, the BBC website reported that the body of a monk was seen floating in a river. Monasteries have been raided, and some 4,000 monks have been detained and are being sent away in an attempt to quell the marches. One defector from the Burmese army stated:

"I knew the plan to beat and shoot the monks".

If the military dictators will do that to religious leaders, imagine what they will do to the ordinary citizen and to the political opposition.

Aung San Suu Kyi is the political leader of the people of Burma. She won a Nobel Peace Prize for her attempts to bring democracy to Burma. She has spent 11 of the past 18 years under house arrest and has dedicated her life to representing the average Burmese citizen. Her father, also a pro-democracy advocate, was murdered when she was two years old. In August 1988, after the violent oppression of opposition marches, she stated that:

"I could not, as my father's daughter, remain indifferent to all that was going on."

She is a woman of courage and dignity, and she is inspired by the non-violent campaigns of figures such as Martin Luther King and Gandhi. In May 1990, her party, the National League for Democracy, won the general election, but the military regime refused to recognise the result and has dictated in Burma ever since.

The current dictator enjoys a lifestyle of which the people of Burma can only dream. A video of his daughter's 2006 wedding showed a bejewelled and champagne-drenched occasion. Understandably, it caused outrage, because the country that that leader claims to represent is impoverished and desperate for democracy.

The brave monks, citizens and Aung San Suu Kyi and the National League for Democracy seek only one thing: democracy. We all accept that as a normal state of affairs because we live in a democracy. Indeed, some Northern Ireland soldiers in the Second World War made the ultimate sacrifice so that the people of Burma could be freed from oppression and enjoy democratic institutions.

Mr Durkan: The debate has been important for all the reasons that so many Members mentioned. In moving the motion, Carmel Hanna said that the Assembly was being given the opportunity to express its sense of responsibility. That is something that all democrats have felt motivated to do since seeing the pictures from Burma. However, we understand that pictures of other actions have been suppressed from international view.

Carmel Hanna reflected on how her own contact with that country and its ethnic groups had deeply touched and impressed her. She reflected on the misery and the atrocities — including genocide — that people in that country have suffered. She emphasised that, as in South Africa where the regime did terrible things, visitors are conscious that Burma is a beautiful country that has numerous natural resources, but it is an ugly state that has a very corrupt and ruthless regime.

As the first Member to speak to the motion, she was the first to pay tribute to Aung San Suu Kyi, and she quoted her famous statement: “Fear is a habit”. Carmel set out Burma’s historical context, describing how it had been under military control for several decades and how the military rulers moved to annul the results of a democratic election in 1990. Carmel was the first Member to touch on the need to pressurise particular Governments in that area, especially China, Burma’s puppet-master. She also mentioned the Beijing Olympic Games. In moving the motion, Carmel made it clear that sanctions under the auspices of the UN are crucial. With reference to some of the points that other Members raised, the motion must be seen in that context.

Simon Hamilton spoke about the legacy of responsibility and concern that many people here feel about Burma. He mentioned the personal links that many have had through military and other experiences.

He highlighted the work of locally represented charities, including Save the Children. He also identified other dimensions of the Burmese situation, such as the fact that Burma is a major source of illegal drugs. He spoke of the inspirational bravery of the democratic protesters, and asked where so many of them have been taken.

Martina Anderson addressed the issue of the arms trade and the countries and companies that provide weapons to the military junta, either directly or through others, particularly China. She criticised the motion for what she felt was dangerous language, suggesting that the phrase:

“to take all necessary action to help topple this despicable regime”

was an endorsement of an invasion of Burma on the model of the US and British invasion of Iraq. The motion is consistent with the UN, and the invasion of Iraq was illegal and was not done under the auspices of the UN. Neither Carmel Hanna nor any other SDLP Member would propose violent action. In the past the SDLP has proposed motions using similar language. Many motions in the Assembly have used the terms “taking all necessary means”, and it has never raised such an issue before.

George Savage spoke of how, like many others, he was moved by the brave protests and the repression suffered by the monks. He pointed to the significant restrictions used by the regime to ensure that those inside the country do not report the full story and those outside the country do not hear the full story. Mr Savage asked the poignant question: how many people have to die before the wider world does something? He also welcomed the appointment of the UN special envoy and talked of the need for a genuine process of national reconciliation.

Anna Lo said that common humanity obliges us to provide all possible help to the Burmese people in their fight with the brutal military regime. She also highlighted the significance of China’s role, as well as that of the Taiwanese Government. Another Member touched on the fact that India has time to use its influence.

Jim Shannon used the well known line from Edmund Burke that:

“It is necessary only for the good man to do nothing for evil to triumph.”

He feared that there would be a lack of impact if international action amounted to letters of protest and resolutions for sanctions. He complained that the UN has no real influence and, like others, he stressed that China is the key. He highlighted the impact of the commodity price rises, as well as the economic plight and the malnutrition of the Burmese people and their children.

Paul Maskey warned that sanctions do not always work quickly and must be carefully targeted. Again, he reflected concern that the motion did not specify that sanctions should be non-violent. I hope that I have provided sufficient assurance in that regard. He went on to highlight the extrajudicial killings, the torture and the 60-day 9.00 pm curfew that has been introduced.

Lord Browne expressed support for the democratic forces against the military junta and, along with many others, saluted the courage of Aung San Suu Kyi. He expressed concern that if sanctions were as extensive as the wording of the motion suggested, that might have an impact on suffering people. Again, I draw Members' attention to the fact that the motion suggests sanctions targeted at the regime, not at Burma or the Burmese people. He said that the West should think carefully and avoid having a knee-jerk response. Given the length of time that the regime has been in power, to take action now is not a knee-jerk response.

David Burnside warned of the possible dangers of using the Beijing Olympics in a careless way. He believed that the circumstances warranted careful use of such pressure on China.

Alban Maginness put the debate in its historic context of a long-standing military plutocracy, and identified the need for legitimate pressure to be put on China. He quoted the UN special envoy, who said that the purpose of his current diplomatic exercise is to achieve dialogue to bring about a true process of national reconciliation.

He underlined that the challenge for all of us is to confront the culture of impunity for systematic human-rights violators, be they in Burma or elsewhere.

Sammy Wilson took exception to some Members' having named local firms as possible sources of weapons. However, I will not dwell on that. He too highlighted China's and Russia's veto of UN resolutions. It is precisely the UN's undemocratic structure, in which superpowers have vetoes, that limits its effectiveness. If people want to call for a more democratic international world order, they must support significant reform of the UN, which would remove those vetoes. All too often, however, people support the vetoes of other superpowers while complaining when China and Russia exercise theirs. Superpowers must earn the privilege to use vetoes.

George Robinson highlighted the fact that the military dictatorship is desperate to hide its tyranny and that Burmese Government are not the protectors of the people, but their enemies. He also referred to the violent response to non-violent, democratic protest.

The regime in Burma is absolutely vile and bestial; people are randomly tortured, and it has the highest number of forcibly conscripted child soldiers in the world. The Government spend more than 40% of their budget on the military and less than 60p per person a year on health and education combined. Since 1996, the regime has destroyed more than 3,000 villages in eastern Burma alone. Members have rightly said that the UN must take stronger action on that issue.

The motion reflects the fact that the UK Prime Minister has said that countries must take strong action and that the only way to do that is through the UN. Many Members have rightly highlighted China's position: however, there is the question of India, the country of Gandhi and Nehru, which has stated that it cannot intervene, but yet provides military equipment and training. Of course, there is also the issue of EU sanctions that stop a firm investing in a pineapple juice factory but do nothing to interfere in investment in oil, gas and the gems sector, which are the very businesses that prop up the corrupt military rulers.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly views with the deepest concern the unfolding events in Burma; salutes the courage of the Burmese people in challenging the oppressive, corrupt and illegitimate military junta that has ruled Burma for decades and which has brought misery to the country and lives of its people; declares its support for Burma's democratic leaders, in particular the imprisoned Aung San Suu Kyi, leader of the National League for Democracy, and calls for her immediate release; supports the call of the Prime Minister for the most extensive range of sanctions possible against the regime, under the auspices of the United Nations; and further calls on the British, Irish and other European Union governments to take all necessary action to help topple this despicable regime.

Referendum on the New European Union Treaty

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for the debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes to propose and 10 minutes to make his winding-up speech. All other Members will have five minutes.

Mr Easton: I beg to move

That this Assembly calls on the United Kingdom Government to hold a referendum on the new European Union treaty.

Members are familiar with organisations that are relentless and single-minded in the pursuit of their own agenda, even when the beliefs that they promote are held only by a minority of the population. They are also familiar with how powerful political and commercial interest groups have, for half a century, attempted to bring into being a united states of Europe, which would cause each member state to lose its individual identity as it became absorbed into a bureaucratic monolith.

The powerful agenda to subdue individual nations to the will of the European Central Bank has been characterised at every step of the journey by the surrender of the civil and religious rights and liberties that are enjoyed by citizens of the United Kingdom. It has also been characterised by a determined effort by sinister forces to diminish our distinctive British identity.

When the European Economic Community was formed in 1957 with six member states, we were assured that it was a beneficial organisation that was designated to enable European neighbours to tackle mutual social and economic issues. By 1973, when the United Kingdom was absorbed into the EEC without a national referendum, the principle of the primacy of European law over the national law of member states was already clearly established. Even then, it was clear that there would be major winners and major losers. Some countries such as the United Kingdom paid an extreme price for its continued membership, while other countries became major beneficiaries, with massive amounts of financial and other gains flowing their way. One only has to look across the border to see how the Celtic tiger has flourished as a result, while the UK pays the second-largest contribution, worth £12 billion, to the EU, of which, it has been said, it only gets a fraction back.

5.00 pm

In the past 34 years the European Union has grown to include 27 member states. At no stage during those decades of enlargement were the people of the United Kingdom afforded the opportunity to declare their consent, or opposition, in a referendum. Now, countries like Croatia, Macedonia — and Turkey, with its dubious reputation on human rights and still in military occupation of parts of Cyprus, another EU member state — want to join the European Union. The admission of a country such as Turkey, without a referendum, flies in the face of common sense.

The agenda established with the Treaty of Rome has been vigorously pursued through the Single European Act 1986; the Treaty of Maastricht in 1992; the Treaty of Amsterdam in 1997 and most recently through the Treaty of Nice in 2001. The European express train, with large numbers of net beneficiary countries already on board, came to an abrupt halt when the people of Holland and France halted its progress by voting against further expansion of the European constitution in 2005.

The treaty, to which they declared their opposition in referenda, was developed and proposed by an intergovernmental conference in 2004 so as to create a constitution for Europe and give the European Union all that would flow from that, such as a legal identity, a president, a motto, a flag, an anthem, and all the trappings of constitutional power, with no accountability to the people of any individual member state.

People in the United Kingdom, including the majority of people in Northern Ireland, do not want to lose their distinct British cultural and political identity to a European Union whose powers supersede those of its member states. We want to have a genuine say in the direction of our foreign policy, and we want to retain independent control of the way in which we relate to deprived countries and communities in the Third World.

We are all appalled at the enormous increase in bureaucracy and fraud that characterises many departments and programmes in the European Union. We want to have a say in changing things to suit the people who pay the European piper but never get to choose the tune. We want to be able to control our borders and have the power to impact directly on issues such as immigration, terrorism, asylum and crime.

We do not want an international system of rolling devolution to take us to the point where we surrender power to the people of a hugely expanded European community. We do not want to pay over the odds for every morsel from Europe that might come our way. Can anyone honestly say that EU membership has made a major difference in the lives and life chances of the people of Northern Ireland?

Our farmers get the worst deal in Europe, and at no stage in the whole European journey have we been given the chance to have a democratic referendum. We do not want the United Kingdom Government, acting on our behalf, to move the European process forward without a full and open discussion on the issues involved and without submitting proposed changes to a referendum.

Throughout Tony Blair's administration we became accustomed to spin and the overcoming of reasoned arguments and justice. We became accustomed to Government deceit and unaccountable decision-making that was not in the best interest of our country or the Province. It is my considered view that what we have had to endure in Northern Ireland is indicative of the need to have power in our own hands, as far as possible, to influence our laws, our lives, our future and that of our children. Direct rule Ministers taught us that lesson.

We all understand the need for co-operation in matters of mutual interest. Indeed, we can see many benefits in European co-operation. However, we do not want a treaty that establishes a constitution for Europe that will lead to complete integration into a European super-state without our Government affording us the democratic right to have a referendum on the issue.

As Members of this Assembly, our duty is to defend the rights and freedoms of those who put us here. Gordon Brown is attempting to get the European train rolling again by declaring that if certain red lines are drawn in the amended treaty — that is, if certain subtle, but significant changes in the text are made — he will proceed with submerging British interests into a federal Europe.

It is not for Mr Brown alone to determine what represents an acceptable treaty for the people of the United Kingdom. Mr Brown and his party do not represent the majority of the people in the United Kingdom on this issue. This treaty is not right for the majority of the people of the United Kingdom, and we must be given the opportunity to declare our opposition to it by means of a referendum. It is wrong for the UK to give up 60 national vetoes and agree to an EU foreign minister and a president of Europe. It is wrong to agree to 96% of the original EU constitution. Just like there will never be a united Ireland, there must never be a united states of Europe.

Mr McLaughlin: Thank you very much, a LeasCheann Comhairle.

I support the motion, but possibly for different reasons from those of the proposer. I welcome the debate. [Interruption.] Let me assure the Members opposite that this debate will be an all-island one — the people of the South will also have their say in the matter.

We should all be concerned about the issue of the democratic deficit. Already, the Council of Ministers and the European Commission exercise powers and vetoes over the democratic decisions of the European Parliament, and much of the legislation that we pass here originates from them — they initiate the process, and the legislation eventually arrives in legislative Assemblies such as this one. Thus, the democratic deficit is a considerable issue. We must consider the idea of participation in a process that elects MEPs who then often find themselves following a trail that has been set out by unelected members of the Council of Ministers or European commissioners. That is a serious issue for us all. I very much welcome the debate, and I look forward to the amplification of those important issues.

There is the question of the ability of sovereign Governments in Dublin, London or Paris — let alone a legislative Assembly such as this one — to rein in the bureaucrats in Brussels and Strasbourg. The idea of the new European Union treaty was to set up a superstate. The treaty was rejected in referendums in France and in Holland. Did that deter the Council of Ministers? No, it doctored the text and presented it again. It took out words such as “constitution”, but its intention is still very much the same. That is very important. There are people here who have long experience of the issues of either a lack of democratic accountability or the absence of democracy itself. We must therefore do our utmost and play our full part in bringing to the attention of the populace the implications of this drift towards a centralisation of power in the hands of unelected bureaucrats at the heart of Europe.

That is not a Euro-sceptic approach. [Laughter.] It is an approach that ensures that we address the questions. Members can make their own contribution to this debate. However, it is important that they reflect on whether critical engagement with the reality of the European Union is, in fact, protecting democratic rights. Alternatively, we can simply close our eyes; it will still be there, and it will still take more and more powers onto itself. However, we cannot walk away from the European Union, nor will deciding simply to ignore the reality of it enhance or protect democratic rights. Likewise, we cannot adopt the position that no progressive legislation has emerged; such legislation has emerged, and we must acknowledge the positive impact that it has had on society in Ireland. However, the key issue that must be addressed is whether people's democratic rights and judgements are being respected when they cast their votes in European elections. Go raibh maith agat.

Mr Kennedy: It is interesting to follow the comments of the Member for South Antrim Mr McLaughlin. He claimed that he was not being a Euro-sceptic — his speech was a little more to the right than Attila the Hun.

It is deeply disquieting that Ministers want to sign the United Kingdom up to a treaty without first asking the British people their opinion. There is, after all, no pressing reason why a decision has to be made quickly. The debate on a new constitution is already years old and has been the subject of a great deal of spin, fudge and misrepresentation. No change there, then.

The essence of the debate was summed up by Keith Vaz, the Labour MP and former Minister for Europe — an unlikely person for me to quote. He said on 31 August this year:

“We don’t need a referendum on the reformed treaty because we didn’t have one on the Nice Treaty or on Maastricht. But I think there’s a difference between need and desirability.”

That, in a nutshell, sums up why there should be a national debate, followed by a referendum. It is not because there has to be, in a technical or legal sense, but because, for a variety of reasons, it is desirable that there should be. At the top of that list of reasons must be the Prime Minister’s own professed desire to make matters more transparent than they had been under his predecessor. What has the Prime Minister to fear if he believes that this new treaty represents a good deal for Britain? Surely he is capable of defending such a good deal in any referendum or election campaign. One thing is certain: a national debate followed by a referendum would confer legitimacy on the whole process. However, the evidence of the past week, and, particularly, of this weekend, suggests that the Prime Minister may not want to engage with the people. His rapid U-turn on an election suggests precisely that.

The Foreign Secretary says that the Government have made it clear that because of the real changes in form, substance and style, and the abandonment of the constitution, we have moved away from the previous situation and now have a treaty that is in line with previous treaties. In that approach he misses the point. The French and Dutch voters rejected the previous versions of this treaty — which was then known as the new European constitution — and, in doing so, forced its modification. Without those referendums we would be facing an EU constitution that has taken centralism in Europe one step too far.

Would the Government deny the British people the same rights as French and Dutch citizens? Surely in doing so they are being bad Europeans, since they are arguing for a two-tier Europe. In one of those tiers the people are allowed the right to vote and decide, but in the other they are not. There is, then, a democratic Europe in France and in the Netherlands, and a top-down despotic one in Britain, of all places.

The Prime Minister’s intellectual case against allowing a referendum has now collapsed. If he persists in forcing this issue through without a referendum following “the election that wasn’t” last week, his moral authority will continue to be seriously undermined. How can he pose as a democrat or as someone who wants to listen to the people, and yet deny a referendum on an issue which most disinterested observers say is little different from the original form of the —

Mr Burnside: Does the Member agree that if the United Kingdom Parliament and Government deny the right of the British people to have a referendum here in Northern Ireland, we should organise our own referendum to express the views of the people of Northern Ireland?

Mr Kennedy: I would have much preferred that a general election campaign had been called at the earliest possible time so that this issue could have been fully debated and amplified among the people and a verdict given, so that we could have taken our place in that national argument as part of the United Kingdom. The situation is little different from the original form of the EU constitution, on which this Government promised a referendum. That is why I support the motion in its undiluted simplicity.

Mr A Maginness: I oppose the motion, but welcome Mr Easton’s refreshing honesty, which, I presume, reflects the DUP’s anti-European Union position, and contrasts with the representations made by Sinn Féin’s representative Mitchel McLaughlin who disingenuously said that he was not a Euro-sceptic. His speech could quite easily have been an editorial from the Daily Mail.

There is absolutely no difference between the type of things that he was saying and the type of things that the ‘Daily Mail’ says, day in and day out. That is scarcely surprising because, at heart, Sinn Féin opposes the European Union. Recently, it changed its mind and has given nominal support to the European Union. However, Sinn Féin has opposed every major change to the European Union. It opposed enlargement and it is opposed to the present proposals.

It is claimed that the proposals create a greater central control in the European Union. Nothing could be further from the truth. The treaty proposes that the EU have a president to serve permanently for two and a half years, instead of chopping and changing every six months. That would provide continuity of service to the European Commission. A high representative of the European Union would speak for the EU on foreign affairs and security policy. That would be a positive step for continuity in the European Commission. The national Parliaments would have an increased role in making European law. I would have thought that Members from both sides of the House would agree that that would be a positive step.

Mr Kennedy: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: No, I have to get through this and I have only a few minutes left.

I am, perhaps, a sole voice in the Chamber today, apart my good friend, Carmel Hanna.

Mr S Wilson: And the Alliance Party.

Mr A Maginness: And maybe the Alliance Party as well.

The treaty proposes to reduce the size of the European Commission to two thirds of its current membership.

Surely that is something that Members should welcome. The treaty also extends qualified majority voting in a sensible, weighted manner. The proposed system will give the larger countries less voting weight, and that is important because it gives smaller countries, such as Ireland, a greater say in European affairs. A new system of voting is also proposed for the European Council. That is also helpful for allowing smaller countries, such as Ireland, a greater degree of influence over decision-making. Surely that is to be welcomed because people have criticised the European Union over many decades for ignoring the smaller voices in its membership. The expanded EU, with its 27 member states, cannot allow each of those countries a veto because it would grind to halt.

Under the treaty, MEPs would have increased responsibility for determining policy, and would be involved in co-decision-making with the Commission. I would have thought that all Members of the House would want that, if they were in favour of more democracy. The European Parliament and ordinary MEPs would have more power. That is important and it would enhance the role of politicians from here and elsewhere. Another important aspect of the treaty is that it would allow countries of the European Union to come together and engage in areas of enhanced co-operation.

Mr Ford: I shall do my best to annoy Sammy Wilson as much as possible by congratulating Mr Easton on proposing the motion. I welcome the opportunity for the House to debate the motion, which I shall support. I do so almost entirely not for the reasons that were put forward by the three Members who have spoken in favour of it, and with considerable agreement with the points that Alban Maginness made against the motion. Such is the kind of politics that takes place in the Chamber.

Fundamentally, I disagree with the narrow-minded interpretation that has been put forward by Mr Easton in his proposing of the motion. Yet, Mr Easton hit on a key issue if Europe is to make progress. That was highlighted when Danny Kennedy referred to the difference between the need for a referendum and the desirability of a referendum. Those who are involved in European Government at different levels have, largely, envisaged their futures in enhancing co-operation; however, it is clear that there are problems in bringing the citizens of Europe with them. That is why I disagree with Mr Maginness's point in opposing a referendum.

At least we have been spared the "bent banana" debate, but we have been concerned about national self-interest in a nineteenth-century version of sovereignty. Frankly, that is no longer the world in which we live. Eleven or 12 years ago, on a visit to Copenhagen, I met a Danish politician and sat with him on the banks of the Skagerrak looking across the narrow stretch of water to Sweden. As a boy, he had watched the Soviet Baltic fleet steaming past in a way that directly threatened to the people of Denmark.

In December 2004, I had the pleasure of returning to Copenhagen when the Europe of 15 became the Europe of 25. Three former states of the Soviet Union were among the ten extra nations that joined. That is how much the European project has moved on. We should concentrate on what Europe has done to build a culture of peace and prosperity for its citizens. That is why the European Union is not made up of 6, 9, 10, 12, 15, or even 25 member states; rather it is composed of 27 member states. Other countries wish to join, as huge progress has been made, and working together in Europe has benefited everyone.

However, it is clear that many people have been left behind and have not reaped the benefits. That is why I urge Alban Maginness to take heart and to have confidence that, in a referendum, the case can be argued for the benefits of belonging to the European Union. Many of the points that he highlighted about the new arrangements in the reform treaty are valid. By and large, they are tidying-up exercises, yet there is a need to show that people can be brought along with them.

The hypocrisy of the Conservative Party that refused a referendum on the Maastricht Treaty, which is of great significance, has now been turned on its head into demanding a referendum, but that does not mean that those of us who want the people of Europe to be engaged with Europe and engaged with a cross-European future, should not also support such a call.

I remember the 1975 referendum to which Alex Easton briefly referred, in that it was actually a fundamental debate about whether the United Kingdom should be in or out of Europe. Indeed, that is the argument that Mr Easton advances today. It is not about the treaty — it is about whether we should participate at all. I welcome the opportunity to have a debate about the role of the United Kingdom in general, and Northern Ireland in particular, and the benefits that we will have from the future of Europe. That referendum was called as an opportunity for the Harold Wilson Government to escape difficult decisions, by palming them off on a referendum. It resulted in a convincing and clear decision among the people of the United Kingdom that they wish to remain in Europe. Against expectations, a resounding majority in Northern Ireland also wished to remain in Europe and to play their part in it.

Therefore, let us have the referendum. Let us have an honest, clear and open debate about all the implications, and let us not pretend that it is simply about the fine detail of the treaty, because there is a strong argument to be made for the United Kingdom being active in Europe. The case, frankly, is whether we will be influential in Europe, or irrelevant in Europe. I want that case to be discussed, and I want the United Kingdom to continue to play its part in that Europe as we move forward. A referendum on the EU treaty is long overdue: bring it on.

Mr McCausland: The European Union treaty is a matter of the utmost importance. Two years ago, a proposed constitution was rejected in France and in the Netherlands. There was also widespread opposition to a proposed constitution in many other countries across Europe. We now look back and realise that there was stalemate on the issue. In June 2007, during a European summit, EU leaders agreed on a detailed mandate to finalise the text of a new treaty.

If one looks at the extent of the opposition and the debate around the EU treaty that has taken place over the past two years, and the nature of the proposals that are currently being pushed forward, one will see that it is a matter of some substance. This is not a minor issue; it is a matter of the utmost importance. That is why we are entitled to have a referendum on the new European Union treaty.

Mr A Maginness: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCausland: No; I will follow the Member's example and not give way. The treaty makes a proposal for an EU foreign minister, dressed up under the name of a high representative. There is also a proposal to extend qualified majority voting, and other proposals are being put forward that would significantly change the nature of Europe. Danny Kennedy said that centralism in Europe has been taken a step too far, but many Members would say that — when it comes to Europe — there have already been many steps too far.

There is a strong and overwhelming case for a referendum. The danger is that the Prime Minister, Gordon Brown, appears to be afraid of a referendum. Last weekend, he ran away from an election, and I was pleased to see that Alex Salmond — in good Scots — described him as a “big feartie from Fife”. The Prime Minister is afraid; he ran away from an election, and he is trying to run away, again, from a referendum on Europe. If he believes that the European Union treaty is a good thing, he will be willing to have a referendum, because he will be sure and certain of the quality of his case and of the strength of his arguments. He will have no fears or doubts; he will go into a referendum with confidence, believing that he will win. However, the Prime Minister realises that if he goes into a referendum, he might well lose.

I believe in co-operation among different nation states, but I do not believe in the ongoing, gradual or incremental integration that is being put forward as the vision for the European Union, and which will eventually lead to a united states of Europe. I also believe in democracy and that the people should have a right to a say on matters relating to Europe. I do not believe in Gordon Brown, as a dictator, enforcing his decision on the treaty without consulting the people. We were promised a referendum, and we deserve one.

In Great Britain, it is clear that there is growing momentum for a referendum, and there is a cross-party coalition including such Labour MPs as Kate Hoey and Frank Field, which is promoting the case for one. As democrats, we should add our voices to that campaign and send out the loud and clear message to Gordon Brown that the political representatives of the people of Northern Ireland — this part of the United Kingdom — are convinced that there should be a referendum, and that they are joining their voices with those across the rest of the United Kingdom in saying that the referendum must take place.

Mr Doherty: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I support the motion, which, if passed and implemented, will give the entire Irish nation an opportunity to have a say on their national future by way of a referendum. However, if a referendum is not held, the imposed treaty that embodies the revised EU constitution will cause a great many problems for the people of Ireland.

The new treaty will, first, add to the powers of the Brussels institutions, which already make the majority of our laws while, correspondingly, reducing the powers of national states and their citizens. Secondly, in making those laws, the new treaty will increase the voting weight of the bigger states and reduce that of the smaller states. Thirdly, it will deprive the member states of the right to have a permanent representative on the European Commission — the body that has the monopoly on proposing European laws. Large states, as well as small ones, will lose a permanent commissioner. Fourthly, the new treaty will contain a mechanism to enable majority voting for European law-making to be extended to new policy areas by agreement among Governments, without the need for new treaties or treaty ratification.

5.30 pm

Fifthly, it would make the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights legally binding on member states and their citizens, and that would give the 27 judges of the European Court of Justice in Luxembourg the final decision on the wide range of human rights matters covered by the charter. Their decisions would, therefore, supersede national constitutions, the Supreme Court, and the Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg. It would greatly extend the power of the European Court of Justice. The charter would apply in all areas of EU decision-making, which makes most of our laws, and it would lead to disputes between the EU Court of Justice in Luxembourg and the Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg, as the former would have superiority in the event of any conflict between the two.

Moreover, the constitution would provide that the exercise of the rights and freedoms recognised by the charter would be limited to meet the objectives of general interest recognised by the EU, which means that the rights set out by the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights would not be fundamental after all, but would be varied in the interest of the smooth running of the market.

Sixthly, and perhaps most important, the treaty would, in effect, create and establish a super-national state for the first time, making the new EU separate from, and superior to, its 27 member states. That would make it like the United States, inasmuch as the United States is separate from, and constitutionally superior to, individual states such as California and New York. It would mean that the citizens of the new EU state would become real and legal citizens of that state, rather than the national, or ordinary, citizens they are at present. It would give the new treaty the character of a constitution, or basic law, and that is a fundamental step that we should not take until the people have had a thorough debate on its full implications, which are deep and wide. I urge that the people are made aware of them.

The revised treaty will contain 90% or more of the constitution that the French and Dutch voters rejected two years ago. In effect, that means that an EU elite could avoid referendums and push through issues that they deem relevant without reference to national Parliaments.

Mr S Wilson: If there is any group of people in the UK who would understand the reason for having this issue debated and resolved, resulting in a referendum being held, it is the people of Northern Ireland, because they know the impact of undemocratic governance and what that looks like.

The Member for North Belfast Alban Maginness said that people have nothing to worry about in the treaty and that it should be welcomed because it gives them greater say. Despite what he said, when the detail is examined, it is quite clear that anyone making such an argument would make Arthur Daley look like an honest car salesman. Pat Doherty has already gone through some of the problems, and do not forget that others who support the treaty said that it is a constitution in all but name. Indeed, some people say that 99% of what was in the old constitutional proposal is contained in this treaty.

Alban Maginness says that we are now going to have a president, who would be in office for two and a half years. That president could have a second term and would not have to be elected; indeed, he or she could be someone who has never stood for election. Yet the draft treaty is supposed to create a democratic organisation and lead to more democracy in Europe. Alban Maginness says that someone would hold the position, with the fancy name of High Representative of the Union for Foreign Affairs and Security Policy. Effectively, however, that is a European foreign Minister.

There could be a situation in which the UK is taking a national route in foreign affairs but the EU, through that High Representative, is taking another. That is supposed to be a step forward. The European Union will take on the legal personality through which it can have its own treaties and agreements with other nations. Again, those arrangements would diminish the sovereignty of the UK.

There will be an increase in qualified voting in about 70 new areas. Alban Maginness has said that the national Governments would have more of a say in a range of areas. However, more powers in matters such as defence, foreign affairs and migration will be centralised in the European Union.

I do not count the European Commission as a democratic body, but at least each state is entitled to representation on it. However, that will no longer be the case. Nonetheless, Alban Maginness says that we should not worry about that: there will be no need for a referendum because all those changes will make the European Union more democratic. The more that one looks at the terms of the draft treaty, the more it becomes clear that the document is about centralising power and putting it in the hands of those who can subvert the wishes of local people. There seems to be a total contradiction: on the one hand, people in Northern Ireland welcome the fact that there is now a devolved Assembly where decisions can be made locally and in which local people have a input, but at the same time, Europe is moving towards concentrating power more centrally into the hands of people who have not even been elected. That is the reason that there should be a referendum on the draft treaty.

The other Euro fanatic who spoke in the debate disappointed me in the stance that he took. However, he supports our motion so I cannot have a go at him. He believes that people can be persuaded to hand over yet more powers to Brussels. I say to Mr Ford that all the evidence shows that people in the United Kingdom — and all over Europe — are sick and tired of the centralising tendencies. However, at least he is a democrat and wishes to give people the opportunity to have a say about whether they wish to move towards centralisation.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr S Wilson: The SDLP has been shown to be undemocratic on this occasion.

Mr Savage: I speak as a member of the only mainstream unionist party in the House that has representation in the European Parliament. [Laughter.]

I share the concerns of the proposers of the motion that, in the next few weeks and months, a document that is, to all intents and purposes, the rewrapped EU constitution will be approved.

The EU constitution fell because it did not receive the support of either the French or the Dutch, who both rejected it in referendums in 2005. Although the 2001 Labour manifesto promised a referendum in the UK on a new constitution, it was held off in order to allow for what was described as “a period of reflection”. That was time to basically allow the Brussels bureaucrats to think of a new way to achieve their aims.

The period of reflection is now over, and what we have is the EU constitution in all but name. It is now to be called a “reform treaty”. Surely the Brussels bureaucrats could have come up with a better name than that.

I fear that we are being sold a pup. Many of the original elements of the EU constitution are to be found in this wonderful new reform treaty. There will be a full-time president of the European Council, who will sit for a 30-month term; an EU foreign minister; fewer European Commission members; and a change in national-voting weightings to reflect population levels.

New treaty proposals are being drafted during the German presidency, which is keen to include a shift to qualified-majority voting in an extra 51 areas of EU policy. Germany also wishes to make the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union — a declaration made in 2000 — legally binding.

Members acknowledge that Europe is a difficult issue. The Labour Party is scared to lose a referendum, and the Conservative Party has split asunder on the issue. The bottom line is that we must not allow Europe to impose a pseudo-constitution on us — a document that, to all intents and purposes, is the same as the one that was rejected two years ago. The only difference is in the repackaging. Contrary to statements from Brussels bureaucrats, that pseudo-constitution would erode national sovereignty and damage Britain's global position. As a British citizen, and an elected representative, I will not vote to allow that to happen.

Members acknowledge Northern Ireland's unique position as the only part of the UK to have a land border with another EU member state, and, because of that, people in Northern Ireland are well aware and astute when it comes to European issues. They want to have their say — and they deserve that.

As a member of the European unionist party, I know that our party provides the people of Northern Ireland with that mainstream unionist voice that they want to hear — and that must be heard — in the corridors of power in Brussels. I support the motion.

Mrs Hanna: I welcome the debate, although it will come as no surprise that, at this time, I do not support the proposal for a referendum. It is premature; we do not have the full picture. We have some substance, but we must still fill in the blanks. At this stage, we cannot make an informed decision.

I am not a Euro-fanatic, but I believe in the European ideal. I am not sure if Mr Ford — who is not in the Chamber — is aware that Sir Menzies Campbell said that the reforms to the new European Union treaty were sufficiently different as to not require a plebiscite. That is for David's information.

Since the SDLP was founded in 1970, it has supported the European ideal, and every Member of the Assembly must be aware of the immense benefits to the people of Northern Ireland — many hundreds of millions of pounds from structural funds, cohesion funds, special support programmes and other EU contributions to the International Fund for Ireland. Given those benefits, the rest of the EU member states — if they have ever thought about it — must be somewhat amazed that all three Northern Ireland MEPs are negative on the idea of Europe.

I am old enough to remember when our esteemed First Minister ran on the platform that the whole idea of Europe and its union was a devilish Roman plot. Sinn Féin has called for a Europe of equals; however, since 1972, in the Republic, Sinn Féin has opposed every referendum on Europe. Its inconsistency lies in the fact that, although it wants European institutions to intervene, it simultaneously denies them the authority to do so because it knows that health and education matters, and so on, are the preserve of the sovereign states.

These are institutional changes to the constitution, and they still require considerable discussion, which is why I welcome today's debate. People must have a better understanding of those matters in order to allay fears — and they do seem to be fears — of the planned reforms.

5.45 pm

We want a constitution that is effective, transparent and accountable, and, of course, we must look after our own interests in Northern Ireland. However, it is important to think of it in a much wider context, owing to the involvement and needs of less-well-off countries. As David Ford has said, it is a culture of peace as well as prosperity — that is important to remember.

If there were a referendum, would a positive outcome really make any difference? Would the DUP continue to be instinctively and reflexively anti-European anyway, and would Sinn Féin continue to be in the same anti-European camp?

Mr Spratt: Whether we are pro-Europe or anti-Europe in our politics, when something is brought forward that has a massive constitutional impact on the United Kingdom, it is only right that the people should decide. In this case, the EU treaty is quite clearly, if progressed, going to fundamentally change the European Union and Britain's place in it.

The packaging of this latest European treaty is misleading to the country. It is not a treaty; it is a constitution in all but name. Furthermore, it is a constitution that has already been rejected. The bureaucrats in Brussels want to fool us into believing that it is non-threatening and based on slight technicalities that will have little impact on the sovereignty of our own Government.

Mr Brown says that there will not be a referendum, because the constitution does not fundamentally change the relationship between the EU and the UK. Mr Brown is fooling no one, especially not the British people. There is near unanimity across Europe that the new EU treaty is fundamentally the substance of the EU constitution repackaged. The Prime Minister of the Republic of Ireland, Bertie Ahern, says that 90% of that constitution is still there; I do not always agree with the man, but on this occasion, it is hard to differ.

When we examine what is in that 90% that is recycled from the constitution, we see dangers that must be repelled, and which the people of the UK must be given a say on. Paragraphs 1, 4 and 18 of the mandate for the current intergovernmental conference bring back, unless stated, the whole of the EU constitution. For example, paragraph 18 tells us that parts of the old EU constitution:

"will be inserted into the Treaty [regarding such areas as] security and justice, ... the improvements to the governance of the euro, ... specific provisions such as public services, space, energy, civil protection".

The list goes on.

Further provisions, such as that for a new EU president, would allow that individual to set the EU's agenda. There would also be an EU foreign minister. Such provisions would allow the EU to sign treaties in its own right, and our sovereignty in foreign policy would be further eroded. The jurisdiction of the European Court of Justice would be widened. Those proposals are dangerous to our sovereignty. The effects might not be immediate, but they would be far-reaching in the future.

The proposals will not stop here; they will, I am sure, evolve into a broader agenda whereby the lines across Europe are further blurred and our powers in home affairs on issues such as asylum, immigration and many other key policy areas are diminished. We totally reject anything that allows that, and we vehemently oppose anything that threatens our vetoes on EU affairs, which this treaty does. In my opinion, we should be looking at ways to pull back from involvement with the EU, rather than bolstering our links.

The current British Government lay much weight on the supposed opt-outs that they have been assured of by Brussels. The vain attempts by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office to dispel so-called myths fool no one. The assurances received from Brussels in the past have proved to be worthless. Surely we should learn from the mistakes of the past.

A recent 'Daily Telegraph' poll shows that two thirds of voters want a referendum on the EU treaty. In the past few days, we have seen that Gordon Brown is not keen to go to the polls. However, on the issue of the treaty, the British people must decide.

What is there to fear, Mr Brown? That the vote will be against the treaty? Let the people speak. I support the motion.

Mr Shannon: I, too, support the motion.

Thomas Jefferson once said:

"Information is the currency of democracy."

There can be no democracy if people do not know what is happening, and they cannot know what is happening when statements that cloud the facts are issued and distract from the real topic. The topic, in this instance, is that the British Government, through Gordon Brown, are trying to induct the United Kingdom, through the back door, into a united states of Europe. That information must be recognised and processed. People must be given a chance to exercise their democratic right to have a say in something that will affect their national identity.

As many of my colleagues have said, we, in Northern Ireland, are no strangers to strong-arm tactics, to the overriding of fairness and democracy and to having little say in the decisions made for our country. Direct rule has taught us much, and we are, therefore, in a strong position to say to the Government on the mainland that to be dictated to by an overseer far removed from the day-to-day life of the nation, can never be a good thing.

Whether Gordon Brown admits it or not, it is not difficult to see what the treaty means for the UK. It means that our social policy will be dictated to us, and our Health Service inundated with Europeans who feel like using our superior NHS. Since practically every case in the European Court of Human Rights is bogged down in litigation and costs thousands and thousands of pounds, those who threaten legal action will always be shunted to the top of the queue to save the hassle.

What of the embassies? The EU will have a 5,500 strong diplomatic service and maintain EU embassies all over the world. What will happen to our embassies and consulates?

The City of London could lose the freedom that has turned it into a multi-trillion pound hub of world finance. The increase in EU influence will jeopardise UK independence with respect to the police, justice, energy, transport, employment policy and financial regulation. Those are vital areas that affect the lives of all of us every day. We could even find Brussels dictating energy prices and quite possibly casting an envious eye on our North Sea oilfields.

It goes further than that. The EU will also have the right to regulate wage caps and transfer caps for soccer clubs, with the European Commission taking over as ruler of the game right across Europe. With respect to justice, the proposed treaty means more rights for criminals, making it harder to fight crime. EU judges could stop the Secretary of State for Justice from recommending longer sentences for horrific crimes, or make it impossible for him to recommend that serial killers should not be released from jail.

The implications of the treaty go on and on. Police will have the right to enter your home, even if they are from outside the United Kingdom. We have heard much talk about the EU army, and we all know the stories about it. Is it true? Do people feel that it is right? Is it worth asking whether we would prefer Britain to be defended by its world-class armed forces, or by those of some of the other EU states? I leave Members to decide for themselves.

The EU Commissioner for External Relations will be given a lovely new wordy title and be known as the High Representative of the Union for Foreign Affairs and Security Policy. He will represent our country at the UN and elsewhere.

Those prospects are horrendous, and many of us have concerns about them. The irony of Gordon Brown taking the strong line against the Burmese junta for not listening to the wishes of the people is paradoxical considering the Labour Party's promise of a referendum on the EU constitution.

Members have probably seen the results of the YouGov poll, which showed a large majority of those asked about the European Union reform treaty to be opposed to it. Two national newspapers, 'The Sun' and 'The Daily Telegraph', represent opposite ends of the journalistic spectrum with regard to the type of readers that they appeal to, but 100,000 readers of 'The Sun' objected to the treaty and wanted to be able to vote on it in the referendum, and 100,000 readers of 'The Daily Telegraph' also wanted to have a referendum on it. The two ends of the spectrum were agreed on the subject.

I am very concerned about how the treaty will affect agriculture and fishing. I represent a rural area, and the more power the EU has, the more worried I become.

Gordon Brown must not be allowed to pull the wool over our eyes in this case. We in Northern Ireland must take a firm stand and settle for nothing less than what is our right — to have our say.

I have no desire to become part of a second-rate, characterless, spineless, united states of Europe. I am British, and proud to be so, despite our faults and failings. I will not stand back and allow Gordon Brown to accomplish the unification of Europe by the back door. I support the motion.

Mr Burnside: In a debate on European unity, in order to find out who sold the pup, it is worth examining the language and presentation of the Euro-fanatics and that of Euro-sceptics since we joined the Common Market. The pup was first sold when membership of the Common Market was described as membership of an area for free trade in goods and services. At that time, it was not even concerned with labour and people, but then slowly developed.

Following the establishment of the self-perpetuating bureaucracy called the European Commission, it gained power and interbred. The Commission wants to have more central control, and the one thing in Europe that has stopped — and will continue to stop — the new constitution has been the consultation by national Parliaments of their people.

The con job has been carried out by the Euro-fanatics, starting with Edward Heath and his supporters, and including David Ford and the Alliance Party. The Euro-fanatics said that we would gain a free-trade area. The European Union has grown and gained powers including that of intervention.

In the United Kingdom, and, I hope, in many other countries throughout the European Union, we now have the opportunity to take a decision and say enough is enough. We do not want centralisation, an increased bureaucracy, or a foreign minister. The honourable objectives represented by David Ford that arose post war, and the resolving of the conflict between east and west, were not dependent on the creation of a European Union.

It was the strong and powerful countries such as the United States and the United Kingdom, who stood up to communist dictatorships, and the inherent weaknesses of the economic dictatorship of Eastern Europe that caused those systems to collapse. They collapsed because those of us in the west who believed in freedom and democracy stood up against them.

We must stop this centralising bureaucracy, which can only take power away from the people in Northern Ireland, and throughout the United Kingdom. Let us consult the people. At least the leader of the Alliance Party says let the people decide, unlike the SDLP, who are the real Euro-fanatics in Northern Ireland. The constitution is unnecessary.

I am optimistic about the association of states in Europe, because of the increase in membership since 1969. Those countries that are coming into the European Union do not want centralised power and control. There is a blocking factor by virtue of the increased membership in the European Union — the people we must stop are the Euro-fanatics in the Commission, the full-time directorates, and the full-time politicians who would like to turn what is not a Parliament into a Parliament. I do not know whether I am member of the European unionist party or not — that was news to me this afternoon, but it seems to be an interesting new initiative.

The European Parliament is not and should not be a parliament that has sovereign power over the member states of Europe. It should be a consultative forum that can be used on behalf of the member states, to exert pressure whether in the case of the reform of the common agricultural policy, or at whatever stage the social and regional grants are at within the European Union. That is how we should use it — as a lobbying platform for our elected representatives to try to get better executive action through the Commission and the Council of Ministers.

I feel strongly that it is time for people to control the professional politicians and the Euro-fanatics, and to tell them that enough is enough, and that they do not want the new constitution. If there is a referendum in the United Kingdom, Scandinavia, France, and perhaps Germany, a massive proportion of people will vote to say that they do not want or need a constitution. We are not a one-nation state; we will remain as individual nation states, as when we fought against the rise of communism and dictatorship from the East. If that happened again, I hope that Europe would operate together in defence of freedom and democracy within the European Union. I support the motion, and the resulting alliance between the DUP and Sinn Féin.

I do not support many such alliances. However, the people must decide. If they are given the choice, they will make the right decision.

6.00 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker: It will be clear to Members that the business on the Order Paper will not be completed by 6.00 pm. In accordance with Standing Order 10(3), I will allow business to continue until it is completed.

The junior Minister (Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister) (Mr Paisley Jnr): I have listened with interest to the views of the House. Having heard Members' concerns and examined the draft provisions, it is clear that the new draft European reform treaty will give increased powers to Brussels. It must be asked whether the citizens of Northern Ireland will benefit from such a transfer of power or whether their interests are better served by the status quo. Members on all sides of the House will have noticed that several speakers highlighted that the draft treaty is a constitution reform Bill in all but name. The European Scrutiny Committee of the House of Commons, which, I understand, will report soon, has indicated that the draft treaty is equivalent in substance and effect to the European draft constitution.

Many Members would be advised to take home a copy of the draft constitution and to compare it with the new text, which is now available on the Internet, and judge for themselves whether its 440 clauses differ at all from those of the draft treaty. They will, therefore, be able to draw their own conclusions on the similarity of those documents.

The Executive considered a paper on the draft European Union reform treaty on 27 September 2007. It is important to state that the Executive unanimously agreed that there should be a referendum. They have mandated the junior Ministers to negotiate to that end on their behalf. On 2 October 2007, I represented the Executive at a meeting of the Joint Ministerial Committee on Europe in London. In attendance were, amongst others, the Foreign Secretary, David Miliband — who chaired the meeting — the Attorney General, Baroness Scotland QC, and the Scottish Parliament's Minister for Europe and External Affairs, Linda Fabiani. I took the opportunity to strongly press for a referendum and also to put on record my displeasure that the Prime Minister, without first consulting the people of Northern Ireland or the regions, has stated that there would be no referendum.

In concluding that there should be a referendum, the Executive said that there must be no dilution of the principles and provisions that relate to subsidiarity or proportionality, of the recognition of regional and local self-government within member states, or of the recognition of cultural and linguistic diversity that is enjoyed by many throughout the European Union.

Ratification of the draft treaty is a matter for each member state's Government according to its constitutional rules. Member states may choose to ratify through parliamentary procedure and/or a referendum. The UK Government has stated their position on ratification, which is that a referendum is not necessary because the draft reform treaty is an amending one. The Administrations in both Scotland and Wales deferred a decision on whether to lobby for a referendum until after the text of final treaty is known. That text is now available. I am sure that they will soon make their positions clear.

Carmel Hanna said that it would be premature to have a vote. As the text of the draft treaty is now available, the point has been reached where Members can study it and make their own conclusions on whether a referendum is necessary. As I have said, if one compares the 440 clauses of the draft constitution with the 440 clauses of the draft treaty, one will see little difference between the two documents.

The Government in the Republic of Ireland have indicated that a referendum will be held there, most probably in the summer of 2008. Denmark is also planning a plebiscite, and referendums are possible in the Czech Republic, Poland, Portugal, and the Netherlands. The Labour Party promised a referendum on the draft treaty for the establishment for a European constitution in its manifesto for the 2005 general election. The pressure on Gordon Brown to hold a referendum on the draft reform treaty is steadily increasing.

Members of his parliamentary party — as well as of the Conservative Party and the Liberal Democrats — are clamouring for a vote on the issue. At last week's Conservative Party conference in Blackpool, few will have missed the shadow Foreign Secretary, William Hague, promise a change in the law. He wants to amend the European Communities Act 1972 and require future Governments to hold referendums on future transfers of powers to Brussels.

There is a legal position for holding referendums in Northern Ireland. It is important to put that fact on record, given what Mr Burnside said in one of his interventions. I am sorry that he is not in the Chamber to hear what I am about to say. As a result of the Northern Ireland Act 1998, and the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000, both holding referendums and the proposed reform treaty are excepted matters. No Department in Northern Ireland has the power to organise or fund such a referendum. That could only happen after primary legislation were laid at Westminster.

I note that Mr Burnside, during Danny Kennedy's speech, said that he would like a referendum to be held in Northern Ireland alone. The new "ourselves alone" position that has been adopted would fundamentally weaken our position for holding a UK-wide referendum. That is an important point of distinction. The people of Northern Ireland would be sold a real pup were a referendum held here. It would be the biggest con job of all, because we know the sort of political capital that many would make out of it. I hope that Mr Burnside will recant that position when he has had time to reflect on his heat-of-the-moment outburst in the Chamber.

Whatever views individuals and parties in the House may hold on the European Union, and the parties that are represented on the Executive hold a wide spectrum of views, the European Union affects us all. It is important to note that the Executive have expressly stated that they are not taking a joint position on the fundamental principles contained in the treaty but are saying that there should be a referendum. Changes in the way in which the European Union is run, and in its powers, procedures and its administration, matter to us all.

Approximately two thirds of the legislative and administrative actions in the region originate from decisions made in Brussels. Europe is integral to the policy-making and legislative process — it is not an add-on. Any Member who represents a rural constituency will know that European issues are not add-ons but are an integral part of much of the actions and activities in which the farming community is involved.

We are responsible for implementing the legislation that will affect the everyday lives of people in Northern Ireland and across the European Union. In administering those responsibilities, we become an essential step in the process of implementing the European Union's decisions. The way in which decisions are taken on such matters, and our opportunities for influencing those decisions, are of essential interest to us all.

Europe, and how it equips itself to respond to future challenges, is not of abstract concern to us; rather, it is of fundamental concern to us. Hence, there should be a referendum on the issue. In my view, the draft EU reform treaty is significant. We cannot pretend that it is not as far-reaching as its predecessor, the draft constitutional treaty of the EU, as some have claimed. That would be a deliberate misrepresentation of what is in the draft EU reform treaty. The Amato Group of high-level politicians, led by the former Italian Prime Minister Giuliano Amato, confirms that the draft EU reform treaty takes over all of the innovations contained in the draft constitutional treaty of the EU.

If it looks like a duck, if it walks like a duck and if it talks like a duck, it is fair to conclude that it is duck. The draft EU reform treaty speaks for itself — or quacks for itself — in that regard. The draft treaty, if ratified, will streamline voting in the European Council using qualified majorities rather than unanimity. All amending treaties — the Single European Act of 1987, and subsequently, Maastricht, Amsterdam and Nice — have extended qualified majority voting. The draft EU reform treaty will extend majority voting under 50 articles and require codecision with the European Parliament under 39 articles. About 80% of EU legislation is already codecided with the Parliament. In the most sensitive areas of justice, home affairs and social security, the United Kingdom has the right to insist on unanimity or not to participate.

The extension does not apply to us in other areas; for example, as regards rules about the Eurozone. Benefits to us, such as the lifting of the beef ban, were secured through qualified majority voting, when they would almost certainly have been blocked through unanimity voting. Therefore, the so-called "red lines", which Alex Easton mentioned, are not as secure as some would try to portray them.

Mr Maginness talked about bringing Europe closer to its citizens. Indeed, the recognition of the need for reform coincided with a new awareness that the European Union has become remote from its own citizens. Many people think that it adds an unnecessary layer of governance and also restricts the freedom of action of national and regional Governments. Of course, one way to redress the balance is to give the citizens a vote on the reform treaty, and Mr Maginness himself posed the strongest argument for that. If he is so convinced by his argument, he would support putting the question to the people and letting them have a say on this important matter.

A 'Financial Times'/Harris outline poll conducted in June of this year found that the majority — around two-thirds or more — of Spaniards, Germans, Britons, Italians and the French believed that the revised treaty was important enough to warrant a vote. The people of the United Kingdom are entitled to have a vote on that basis, too. We need a debate with our citizens on how to maximise the benefits that we derive from our membership. To a large degree, that debate was started by OFMDFM when it brought Mr Barroso to Northern Ireland.

EU legislation, EU funds, and the internal market have had a huge impact on the economic, social and environmental fabric of this region. Indeed, many thousands of community-based social-inclusion projects have been assisted through Peace moneys, which the Member for South Belfast Carmel Hanna rightly pointed out. Indeed, our farmers have received around £1.6 billion in direct support.

However, while many benefits have come from Europe, those funds should not be portrayed as perks or privileges; they are our rights. We are entitled to them, just as we are entitled to our right for a referendum. It is vitally important that the people of Northern Ireland get the opportunity to have their say on this important matter.

In conclusion, the Executive want to ensure that Northern Ireland citizens have their say. They should not be robbed of their right to vote. If we call for a referendum, we have a responsibility to lay the facts before the people. The issues are complex, but Northern Ireland has good reason to be interested in them. As elected representatives, we should not shirk our collective responsibility to explain the treaty to our electorate, and the reasons why we are for or against it. We should seek to engage in a transparent and well-informed debate. We must explain the context of the treaty to the people, focusing especially on how it will impact on their lives, so that our voice will be heard and we can have a greater say in how Europe is shaped in the future.

Lord Morrow: The debate has been useful and interesting, and many useful and interesting comments have been made. A great constitutionalist once said the referendum is the "people's veto", and that:

"The nation is sovereign and may well decree that the constitution shall not be changed without the direct sanction of the nation."

If that is one reason that we should have a referendum, then there is another good reason why we should have one: the Government promised in their 2005 manifesto that there would be one. However, it would not be the first promise that this Government have broken, and I suspect that it will not be the last.

I was very interested to hear what Minister Paisley had to say, and I am sure that Mr Alban Maginness cringed when he heard him say that the Executive were united in deciding that there should be a referendum. I am sure that he is listening to every word that we are saying now. The Executive were united on that decision, so the SDLP is committed to it. Mr Maginness and Carmel Hanna may not be, but at least the SDLP is.

So, Mr Maginness, you are a lonely voice, if not a lone voice. Your party is now up for a referendum, and we welcome it on board.

6.15 pm

I was a bit concerned by Mr Burnside's intervention, although his speech was infinitely better than Mr Maginness's. He said that Northern Ireland should consider having a referendum on our own. No, thank you. We are not in Europe because we are Northern Ireland; we are in Europe because we are a part of the United Kingdom.

Mr Burnside: I thank the Member for allowing me to make a point of clarification. A referendum is not mandatory under the British Constitution. If the United Kingdom Government and Parliament deny the people of Northern Ireland the right to express their view, I would be interested to know the opinion of the people of Northern Ireland in that process. That is my understanding of the British Constitution. I would want our national Parliament and Government to hold a referendum first, but if they did not, I do not see why we should not have a local referendum that expresses an opinion for the Government to take account of.

Lord Morrow: I will take that as a climbdown. However, the Member is acutely aware that there is no such thing as a British Constitution.

Mr Burnside: There is.

Lord Morrow: I beg to differ. The Member and I will have to differ, as we do on many things.

I must take issue again with Mr Maginness. He was so steadfast in his position, and although what he said was not convincing, he tried to convince us. The challenge for the likes of Mr Maginness is simply this:

why does he fear a referendum? Is he afraid of the result?

Mr Maginness has every right to be afraid of the result, because a recent study found that, in the rest of the United Kingdom, 85% of Conservative Party voters wanted a referendum and 55% of Labour supporters wanted one. I see that Mr Ford has flown the nest. I wish he had stayed, because he is another fanatical European. A total of 59% of Liberal Democrats — a majority of Mr Ford's sister party — wanted a referendum.

Mr A Maginness: Will the Member give way?

Lord Morrow: Since I have named the Member, I will give way.

Mr A Maginness: First, I want to emphasise that the SDLP has never been against a referendum in principle. Secondly — and this was reflected in both SDLP contributions — because the treaty has not been completed as yet, and despite what junior Minister Ian Paisley Jnr has said, it is premature to make a decision. On the substance of what we have seen, and in respect of the document that Mr Paisley Jnr is holding in his hand, we are talking about institutional changes, not constitutional changes. Therefore, the argument that constitutional changes demand referendums does not hold, because we are talking about institutional changes.

Lord Morrow: Only Mr Maginness could explain that. His task is now in front of him: does he support his Minister in calling for a referendum, or does he not? We are all confused. As Mr Maginness sat down, I saw the forlorn looks on the faces of everyone in the House. He will have to sort that out in the not-too-distant future, but his intervention has not clarified the issue at all, because he has made it distinctly clear that he is not in favour of a referendum. I listened to what he said — that his was a lone voice. I did not understand the implication of that at the time, but I understand it now, because it seems that his is a lone voice in the SDLP too. That is the Member's problem, and he will have to square that.

Following World War II, there was no stronger symbol of Britain's central role in shaping the architecture of the world than its place as one of only five permanent members of the United Nations Security Council. That position promoted Britain substantially, and permitted it to form part of a major influence on a global platform. That strength would be greatly jeopardised, however, if the Minister for Africa, Asia and the UN, Lord Malloch Brown, a former UN deputy secretary general, gets his wish to relinquish Britain's seat in favour of representation by the European Union.

The EU constitutional treaty proposes to have its own foreign minister, to be known as a high representative, who will act on the world stage on behalf of all of the 27 member states, as a whole. That will mean that more power and control is exerted from the EU's central headquarters over its 480 million citizens.

I cannot understand for the life of me why those who are opposed to a referendum would want the centralisation of control. I am absolutely delighted that the House, with one or two exceptions, has practically united in the view that there should be a referendum. I am delighted that Mr Ford is back in the House, and even he accepts that there should be a referendum, although for different reasons from those of us on this side of the House.

Why should there not be a referendum? The treaty is everything. It is a constitution, and let no-one say that it is not a constitution but only a bit of tweaking here and there. No less a person than Bertie Ahern has said that 90% of the old treaty has been retained. I suspect that Mr Maginness, his party and others opposite would listen more readily to him than to some of the Members in the Chamber.

The centralisation that is proposed by the treaty is a dominant force that will pull away from the democracy and democratic rights that are at the heart of the United Kingdom. Despite that, people in the Assembly have claimed today that that would be legitimate. I am delighted that the Executive are united on the issue and said that they feel that it would be unacceptable for there not to be a referendum. I am also delighted that the House has delivered a loud and clear message that a referendum is a must.

I am not talking about an all-island referendum, but a referendum for the United Kingdom, of which Northern Ireland is an integral part. Therefore, the Assembly must speak with one voice, without any suggestion that there should be separate referendums for Northern Ireland and the Irish Republic to find out what the whole island wants. The Irish Republic must do what it feels is necessary, and the Assembly does not say what the Republic should, or should not, do. However, as part of the United Kingdom, we want a referendum for the United Kingdom so that we can speak as one voice and one people. We are confident that that voice will say "no" to the new treaty and "no" to the new constitution. Anyone who advocates otherwise should be man enough to accept what the people decide.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly calls on the United Kingdom Government to hold a referendum on the new European Union treaty.

Adjourned at 6.24 pm.

NORTHERN IRELAND ASSEMBLY

Tuesday 9 October 2007

The Assembly met at 10.30 am (Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Molloy] in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

ASSEMBLY BUSINESS

Mr Elliott: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. In a reply to a question of mine yesterday, the First Minister gave what I would term a party political answer. Is it normal for a Minister to give a party political answer?

Mr Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order. It is up to the Minister to decide how he answers questions.

Mr K Robinson: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. I do not know whether other Members experienced this yesterday, but I had great difficulty with the acoustics in the Chamber. I notice already today with your good self, whose voice usually projects well, that there is an echo around the Chamber. Even during ministerial speeches yesterday, we could not pick up all the words. Is it possible to have the sound adjusted or to have the problem looked at?

Mr Deputy Speaker: Officials monitor the sound levels in the Chamber continuously. Members should ensure that they talk clearly into the microphones. I had difficulty hearing what you were saying, Mr Robinson. Officials are working on the system to try to get the sound right. Quite often, Members hold files or papers over their microphones, which cuts out the sound, so I ask Members to bear that in mind when they are speaking.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT

Northern Ireland Strategy for Sport and Physical Recreation 2007-2017

Mr Deputy Speaker: I have received notice from the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure that he wishes to make a statement on the Northern Ireland strategy for sport and physical recreation 2007-2017.

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure (Mr Poots): Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker. I shall do my best to help you to hear me today. I had trouble hearing the questioners yesterday, and I had to listen intently to make out what they were saying.

I welcome the opportunity to make a statement on the future of sport in Northern Ireland. It is important that the Assembly should have an early opportunity to engage on sport.

Northern Ireland has a rich sporting heritage. It has produced an impressive array of sportsmen and sportswomen of national and world renown. Many of us will have fond memories of great achievers who have become household names both locally and well beyond — Mary Peters, Pat Jennings, George Best, Joey Dunlop, Barry McGuigan, Alex Higgins, Mike Gibson, David Humphreys and Peter Canavan, to name a few. Their great tradition has been maintained in more recent times by stars such as David Healy, Andrew Trimble, Madeline Perry, Janet Gray, Jenna McCorkell, Rory McIlroy and Richard Chambers.

As well as celebrating outstanding individuals, we have celebrated the great team triumphs of Northern Ireland squads. All of us have been delighted by the endeavours of the Northern Ireland football team of late in its quest for qualification for the European Football Championship.

Many have paid tribute to Ulster's success in all-Ireland Gaelic games in the past few years, and the recent triumphs of the Ulster rugby team have been widely celebrated in Northern Ireland. Equally, the great performance of the Irish team in the ICC Cricket World Cup in 2007 is fresh in our minds. Northern Ireland is also savouring the unique feat of the Ulster ladies hockey team in winning the inter-provincial championships this year.

Furthermore, Northern Ireland has gradually established itself on the national and international stage as a venue for major sporting events. We have hosted the IAAF World Cross Country Championships; the World Amateur Boxing Championships; the UEFA European Under-19 Championships; the Special Olympics Ireland Games; and, just lately, the IRB Under-19 World Championships; the Waterways Ireland World Water Ski Championships; and the Walker Cup.

Northern Ireland is also part of the itinerary for the 2007 International World Rally Championships, starting in November — one of the most demanding and challenging motor sport competitions in the world. Moreover, in the past few months, Belfast has been awarded the right to stage the World Police and Fire Games in 2013. All of those come on top of such well established international events as the North West 200 and the Milk Cup.

The rich sporting heritage that embraces all sections of our community underlines the value of sport to the people of Northern Ireland. Sport is an integral part of our culture and identity. We enjoy sport; we cherish it, it inspires us and creates a sense of pride. It projects a powerful, positive image of our community to international audiences.

Sport is, of course, much more than that. Taking part is fun, fulfilling and of value in its own right. Equally, sport has the potential to deliver other significant benefits. It can, for example, play a vital role in improving public health. Moreover, it can contribute to an improved academic performance from our children, as well as adding to their self-esteem.

Sports volunteers are the single largest group in the voluntary sector, both in the UK and on the island of Ireland. In addition, 12,500 people are employed in sport and physical-recreation industries in Northern Ireland.

Equally, although the benefits of sport and physical recreation to people with a disability require further research, there is an emerging indication that regular participation in sport may contribute positively to improving the prospects of disabled people in seeking employment. Sport can also be a valuable tool in the promotion of neighbourhood renewal, rural development and tourism.

Therefore, no one can doubt our sporting heritage nor question its importance, both culturally and in our wider society. However, that is not the whole picture. Today, sport in Northern Ireland faces major challenges and significant difficulties. Participation rates in Northern Ireland are among the lowest in the United Kingdom and are falling. There is evidence that some people in our community — most notably women, people on low incomes and people with disabilities — remain seriously under-represented in sport.

Our sporting and recreational infrastructures require substantial development and modernisation. In addition, Northern Ireland has a declining record of achievement in major competition. For example, the last Olympic medal won by a Northern Ireland athlete was in 1992. Despite their best efforts, the Northern Ireland team at the 2006 Commonwealth Games won the lowest number of medals since 1962.

That situation cannot be allowed to continue. We need a new long-term vision for sport in Northern Ireland, to enable it to be developed on a sounder basis and to deliver all the benefits that are potentially available. The 2012 Olympic and Paralympic Games in London will provide all UK regions with considerable opportunities for participation in sport, for infrastructure improvement and for athlete development.

The games have the potential to motivate and to inspire our young people to take up sport. They can also help us to lay many of the foundations for a sound and durable sporting and cultural legacy. Undoubtedly, the 2012 Olympic and Paralympic Games, as well as the World Police and Fire Games in 2013, are an important context in which to promote sport in Northern Ireland. Nevertheless, regardless of the opportunities offered by those events, Northern Ireland still needs a wider, long-term plan for developing sport and securing its future.

What issues do we need to address? First, we must recognise that we are starting from a much lower base than many regions of the UK, and many nations beyond. We want to — and we must — do better, but we must also be realistic about what can be achieved over the next few years, given the current state of sport here. It is equally important that we recognise collectively the value of sport and that we commit to take action to develop it.

Sport Northern Ireland (SNI), which was formerly known as the Sports Council for Northern Ireland, also occupies a pivotal position, given its overall responsibility for funding and development. It needs to be involved fully in — and be supportive of — any proposals that are designed to improve the state of sport in Northern Ireland. Similarly, district councils, which are vital to the development and delivery of local sport and physical recreation opportunities, must play a key role in implementing future strategies for sport.

The draft strategy recommends that the extensive network of sports facilities that exists in the education sector be used for schools and communities. Governing bodies and sports clubs have a crucial role to play, given that they are the main interface between those who play sport recreationally and those who perform at the highest levels. The community, voluntary and private sectors contribute substantial human and financial resources to sport and recreation, and they can help greatly to drive forward and support future development.

Our athletes and coaches can do a great deal to assist and inspire others in the community to become involved, and to achieve. If we are to succeed, all of us need a common purpose, a shared vision, shared goals, and an agreed structure through which we can take action. It is with those points in mind that I announce today the publication for consultation of a draft 10-year strategy for sport and physical recreation in Northern Ireland.

The draft strategy, which my Department is compiling in partnership with Sport Northern Ireland, suggests a new vision for the future of sport and physical recreation, and it envisages a new, shared sporting future. The strategy seeks to reflect the sporting aspirations of the wider public, the community, and those who work in sport. Indeed, those aspirations were expressed in earlier consultations.

The draft strategy aims to inform the direction of future investment and the way in which sport should be developed over the next 10 years. It is structured to reflect the current and anticipated needs of sport and physical recreation that were expressed during the pre-consultation stage. Those needs relate to participation, which concerns the number of people who regularly take part in sport and physical recreation; performance, which concerns the achievements of Northern Ireland athletes and teams in competitive sport; and places, which deals with the venues and localities that are used for sporting and physical recreation.

The draft offers 24 specific targets to be achieved over the next 10 years for sport and physical recreation. Those are designed to address concerns about participation, performance and places. Those concerns include the need to improve participation levels in sport and the need to deal with the under-representation of certain groups. The draft strategy is also designed to address the need to improve Northern Ireland's performance in international competition, and the question of a major multi-sports stadium for Northern Ireland. Those are all pressing issues that face me, as the Minister with responsibility for sport. Indeed, Members will be aware that a decision on the way forward for the stadium will be required in the near future.

I have no doubt that many of the targets will be regarded as challenging. However, if they are achieved, there is the prospect of injecting much-needed rejuvenation into the way in which we deliver sport and recreation in Northern Ireland.

However, change on such a scale comes at a price. The need to marshal the skills and resources of all stakeholders, including Government, SNI, local authorities and the voluntary and private sectors, is raised in the draft strategy. The document estimates that full implementation of the strategy will require a total additional investment of around £200 million over 10 years. Clearly, levels of public funding remain subject to the normal budgetary processes, including other competing priorities and the ability of all stakeholders to contribute. Already, however, work is under way to address many of the resource shortfalls that are identified in the document. For example, given the upcoming London 2012 Olympic and Paralympic Games, plans are in train to improve Northern Ireland's sporting infrastructure, including the provision of a 50 m swimming pool. Under that programme, there will be the opportunity to cater for the facility needs of several other sports, such as athletics, cycling, tennis, table tennis, fencing, volleyball, rowing, canoeing, basketball, sailing, gymnastics and equestrian sports.

In parallel with that, improved infrastructure will enable more people — regardless of age, gender, location, and community, ethnic or other backgrounds — to participate in sport and to achieve their full sporting potential. That is consistent not only with the objectives in the draft strategy but with the equality obligations, which have, of course, been considered while we have been developing the document.

10.45 am

I want as many people as possible to consider the draft strategy carefully and respond to it. The future of sport in Northern Ireland is at stake, so the strategy must concern us all. I, therefore, look forward to the outcome of the consultation and to receiving comments. I will be particularly interested in the views of the Culture, Arts and Leisure Committee. The document can be accessed from the Department for Culture, Arts and Leisure's (DCAL) website — www.dcalni.gov.uk — and copies are being placed in the Library. The closing date for receipt of responses is 9 January 2008.

The outcome of the consultation will help to shape the final strategy, which I expect to publish as soon as possible after the consultation's completion. I hope to make a further statement to the House on the matter then.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure (Mr McElduff): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Cuirim fáilte roimh an ráiteas seo ar maidin ó thaobh cúrsaí spóirt.

I welcome the statement and the fact that the Minister has made it in the House. The draft strategy has been long awaited. I commend the Minister for his recognition of sports volunteers and the contribution that they make to sports development. That was a very good starting point. I, perhaps, take issue with the fact that it took the Minister a couple of paragraphs to reach the name of Peter Canavan — “Peter the Great”. Nonetheless, I shall overlook it.

The Minister said that:

“sport has the potential to deliver other significant benefits”.

He also talked about health, and community development and social cohesion could have been mentioned as well. We all know that sport contributes to wider Government objectives and priorities in the fields of health, community development and social cohesion. Will the Minister assure us that the principal governing bodies of those field sports that make the biggest contribution of all — namely, the GAA, the IRFU and the IFA — will be funded to the necessary levels, in order that they may continue to develop the work that they do to contribute to improving health, community development and social cohesion?

I have picked up messages from sports organisations that the level of consultation undertaken before the draft strategy was published was not good enough. I want an assurance from the Minister that, between now and January 2008, when the consultation closes, the aforementioned governing bodies will be properly and meaningfully consulted, and that any substantial changes that they may wish to suggest will be carefully considered.

Mr Poots: To take the last point first, I dealt with this matter to some extent yesterday. However, to add to the answer that I gave then, all governing bodies were invited to a special governing-body workshop in September 2005 to give their views on the state of sport and on priorities for the strategy. That was in addition to the public consultation meetings that took place at various venues across Northern Ireland.

In April 2006, DCAL arranged a special testing session on the initial draft of the strategy, to which all governing bodies were again invited. Governing bodies will also have an opportunity to submit their views as part of the consultation on the draft strategy. Ultimately, because this is a public consultation document, I want to hear the public's views on it. However, governing bodies are key players in sport in Northern Ireland, so particular note will be taken of their views.

The Chairman of the Committee asked whether the "big three" will receive the necessary funding. Participation in sport may be at a higher level in those three particular sports, but there is a plethora of sports outside the "big three" that we must not forget about and that we must recognise.

For example, this morning, I met members of the Northern Ireland surf kayak team, which is shortly to compete in the World Surf Kayak Championships in northern Spain, and which I trust will bring home something significant. The World Transplant Games have just ended, and Northern Ireland did remarkably well in them, bringing home many medals.

There is a wide range of sports that people can choose to take up and participate in. The draft strategy for sport and physical recreation's aim is to identify how we can best support people across a range of sports, and how we can identify areas of financial need. It will be difficult to achieve the level of finance that is required, but, nonetheless, the draft strategy identifies and makes clear what we need to deliver in ideal circumstances, and we are happy to do that.

Participation in sport in the UK is lower than in other parts of Europe. In Northern Ireland, participation is lower than in the rest of the UK. That presents a challenge. We can contribute to better health by fighting childhood obesity, in particular, and by reducing the number of children who develop diabetes from the age of 10.

Owing to current levels of childhood obesity and diabetes, this country could find itself in a scenario in which a generation will not live as long as its parents' generation. That would be the first time that that had happened in modern times. Those matters must be addressed, and they will be addressed, not by cure, but by prevention. Sport has a key role to play in preventing illnesses.

Mr McCausland: I thank the Minister for his statement. I am glad that the draft strategy is to go out for consultation; it is very important that we have an extensive and inclusive consultation.

I wish to ask the Minister how the draft strategy for sport relates to wider social and Government agendas. The Minister explicitly mentioned the health agenda and implicitly mentioned the shared-future agenda.

It is certainly the case that sport can contribute, as has been said, to social cohesion and good relations. What will be done about the position of the Gaelic Athletic Association, which, by its constitution and ethos, is an exclusively nationalist organisation, and is, therefore, not merely a cold house but a closed house for the unionist community?

Mr Poots: I shall deal first with the point that the Member made about the health agenda. The sports strategy states that:

"In Finland, 70% of the population attain physical activity levels that are recommended by Chief Medical Officers in the UK."

In the UK, that figure is 32%. That demonstrates a stark difference between where we should be and where we are.

In Northern Ireland, the percentage of overweight or obese boys has increased from 13% to 19%. Among girls, the percentage has risen from 20% to 27%. Those figures cover the period from 1997 to 2004. Lack of activity can contribute to diabetes, colon cancer, osteoporosis, anxiety and stress, among other illnesses. It is clear to me that we must address public-health matters, and sport plays a key role in doing that.

It has been stated in the House of Commons that for every £1 that is spent on sport by central Government, £866 is spent on health. If there were a marginal increase in sport funding, we could make a real contribution to the health of our society. People must grasp that fact.

As far as possible, politics should remain separate from sport. During my first conversations with the Gaelic Athletic Association, I raised some issues along those lines. I will continue to have conversations with the GAA on that matter. Ultimately, it is for that body to decide how it goes about things. The GAA makes a significant contribution on the sporting side. As for the political side, perhaps all of us need to move on.

Mr McNarry: I thank the Minister for his statement, which we received only an hour ago during our party group meeting. Undoubtedly, there will be an opportunity to explore the matter more fully in meetings of the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure.

The draft 10-year strategy is to be welcomed in principle. With respect to participation, performance and places, will the Minister clarify the need to improve levels of participation and performance in respect of the national sports stadium? Will he be making a decision soon on the location and format of the stadium, or is he contemplating a further period of consultation and reflection?

Mr Poots: I intend to make a decision on that matter in the not-too-distant future. The final draft is almost complete. Applications from private-sector partners to develop a multi-sports stadium have been made and are being assessed. Ultimately, all the information that is required to make a decision is coming together, and when it has been brought together, and I have had time to consider it, a decision will be made. The Member should not worry about having to wait too long for that decision.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle, agus gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as an ráiteas a rinne sé anseo ar maidin agus as an cháipéis chomhairliúcháin atá curtha ar fáil aige.

I thank the Minister for his statement and for providing Members with the consultation document. I take issue with the Minister's list of sporting luminaries, insofar as he failed to include any Armagh players. I suggest that, in future, he should include the great Ciaran McGeeney and Francie Bellew in that list.

Later in the same statement —

Mr Deputy Speaker: I have given the Member some leeway because he was speaking about Armagh, but could we have a question? [Laughter.]

Mr D Bradley: I am heading in that direction, Mr Deputy Speaker. The Minister, in his statement, said that we have all delighted in the endeavours of Northern Ireland, and that many have paid tribute to Ulster successes in Gaelic games. I hope that we would not be as begrudging as that, and that, in the spirit of sport, we would delight in Ulster's successes in Gaelic games and in rugby.

My question relates to education. In light of the importance of school facilities and policy — and after-school activities in particular — in the development of physical literacy from an early age, will the Minister outline the level and quality of engagement by the Department of Education in the development of the sports strategy? Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle.

Mr Poots: First, I do not think that anyone could accuse me of begrudgery in relation to sport. I have always welcomed those who have achieved great things in sport regardless of their backgrounds or communities, and I will continue to do so. I will leave begrudgery to the other side of the House.

The drawing up of the sports strategy involved the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, the Department of Education, Sport NI, and other key stakeholders. Therefore, the Department of Education did help us to draw up the strategy. In my view, schools play a key role. One of the aims in the strategy is to ensure that children spend at least two hours in after-school activities and in physical recreation. We cannot achieve that without the Department of Education, which has bought into the strategy.

Another key point about schools is that there is an opportunity for dual use of school facilities, in conjunction with community facilities.

There is a plethora of facilities in Northern Ireland, but none is up to scratch. I want more investment in high-quality single facilities of premier league standard. It is imperative that local councils and education authorities work together to deliver a single facility that is used for the education of young people during the day and for community purposes at night. I can point to several successful examples of such usage. In fact, I recently opened a multi-sports pitch in Limavady that will be used by several local schools during the day and by the community and local clubs in the evenings.

11.00 am

Mr McCarthy: I have a special interest in a sports strategy for Northern Ireland because I chair Ards Borough Council's sports development committee. In the Minister's statement, he noted some well-known Northern Irish sporting heroes, of whose achievements we are all proud. However, in order to reach that status, people must start at grass-roots level, and Members must never forget those sportsmen and sportswomen who participate in their chosen sport, week in and week out. I take this opportunity to congratulate Ballycran hurling team, which clinched all this season's championships. Also, Kircubbin Football Club —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Can the Member please ask his question?

Mr McCarthy: I am coming to my question.

The sports development committee that I chair has a budget of a mere £4,000. Here is my question: will the Minister direct sufficient funding through local councils to encourage more people in the community to become involved in sporting activities, thus helping to promote the sports strategy. Sport Northern Ireland has lost some £4 million because of lottery funding being diverted to the 2012 Olympic Games. How will the Minister replace that lost funding? Does the Minister share the opinion of his colleague — who is not in the Chamber — that the GAA is a nationalist organisation? I am a GAA member, and I certainly do not have any labels hung around my neck.

Mr Poots: Last night, the Executive discussed the Budget, and I was absolutely and abundantly clear about what is needed to deliver a sports strategy in Northern Ireland. I spoke about how the loss of lottery funding would affect arts and sport, and that that shortfall must be made up. If that is not done, we will enter the next financial year with a deficit, and there will be a break-even situation the following year. The sports strategy cannot be delivered unless there is sufficient funding. Members' Executive colleagues will confirm my position.

It is not for me to interfere in the internal affairs of Ards Borough Council, but I would suggest that if the Member's council colleagues can be persuaded to give the sports development committee only £4,000, perhaps that is a reflection on the committee's chairman.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Several Members wish to ask questions of the Minister on this important document. Can Members please ask short questions? The Minister will then be able to give brief answers, and we will get through more Members' questions.

Mr McCarthy: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. I did not get an answer to my third question.

Mr Deputy Speaker: It is not for me to rule on how the Minister answers the questions. The question was asked and the Minister answered.

Mr Shannon: I thank the Minister for his positive statement and for the way in which he has encouraged sportsmen and sportswomen to be successful. In the past, Northern Ireland people have shown their prowess at various Olympic Games, including winning a silver medal, so perhaps now is a good time to promote sport and support young people. We have the talent and we should promote it for the future.

I have two questions, and I will come to them very quickly. The first is in relation to the Olympic Games. How will Northern Ireland benefit clearly and directly from the London Olympic and Paralympic Games in 2012 and the World Police and Fire Games in 2013? Secondly, the draft strategy refers to those who are over 60 — and I am still a few years away from that category; some in this Chamber fit into that category, but I do not. However, is there any strategy for the participation in sport of people who have attained that age. The reference is on page 34 of the draft strategy.

Mr Poots: It is important that more older people participate in sport; that has been identified as one of the areas where there is not enough participation. The opportunity needs to be there and the facilities need to be readily available and have a welcoming environment. Clubs should provide opportunities for people to participate when they may be past their physical peak but still wish to participate — I am not looking at Mr Campbell in particular — and enjoy physical recreation and sport.

We are bidding for elite facilities for the Olympics. We have sought £53 million for the delivery of that in Northern Ireland, and that sum will be topped up by those who are making bids for the money; in general, that will mean local authorities. There had been 29 bids; that is now down to 15. The facilities will have premier Olympic status, and they will be excellent facilities. My desire is to have 10 Olympic teams training and participating at such facilities in Northern Ireland. Those groups will attract young people to watch them training, and the facilities will be available thereafter, so there is a huge opportunity for people to go and get involved.

I want to stress how important it is that we fully engage on the Paralympics. There are many individuals who have physical disabilities but love sport and want to participate in it and enjoy it. We need to ensure that people who have disabilities have equal access to opportunities to participate in sport.

Mr P Maskey: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle, agus comhghairdeas ar an ráiteas ar maidin. I congratulate the Minister on his statement. He said that the evidence shows that people in our community, most notably women, remain seriously under-represented in sport. Does he agree that camogie and ladies' Gaelic football somewhat address that issue? Will he ensure that there is a proactive approach to female sports in the 2007-17 strategy?

Mr Poots: Camogie is a Gaelic sport and falls under the governance of the GAA. I am happy to work with all governing bodies in the delivery of sports and access to sports. Obviously, women are a key target, because of their level of under-participation. The strategy will enable governing bodies to work better and to bring people with disabilities, women and other under-represented groups into sport.

Lord Browne: I also congratulate the Minister on his statement. The draft strategy is detailed and ambitious. Is the Minister confident that the additional money required to implement it in full will be available? It is important that young people engage in sport: how does the draft strategy go about retaining young people's participation in sport and physical education?

Mr Poots: One would need the wisdom of Solomon to answer your question on confidence and money because one does not know what the future will hold. The Chancellor, Alistair Darling, will reveal the CSR at some point today, and final decisions in Northern Ireland cannot be made until the implications of that are known. However, an excellent case can be made that sport deserves greater funding, and I am hopeful of achieving more funding for sport within the CSR bids.

The best way of encouraging young people to participate in sport is to get them involved at an early age and to let them find sports that they enjoy. There are different sports for different people, and identifying which sports are best suited to individuals will help to ensure that young people continue to participate in those sports even after they leave school and college.

Mr K Robinson: I note the ministerial statement and the many expressions of motherhood and apple pie that it contains. Will the Minister assure me that he has the full support of his party and the total backing of the Executive for the draft strategy? I also note that the name of the famous Sammy Hughes was omitted from the list of greats, and I am sure that the Minister will join with the rest of the House in congratulating Glentoran Football Club on achieving its one-hundred and twenty-fifth anniversary at the weekend.

Mr Poots: I thank the Member for that. The problem with starting a list of names is deciding where to stop. There are many great sporting people from Northern Ireland who have not been mentioned today but would have been worthy of mention.

I do have the support of the Executive for the draft strategy.

Mrs M Bradley: Will the Minister outline whether the priority of the strategy is to ensure the greatest participation in sport across all sectors of our community, including Gaelic games, rugby, soccer, hurling and hockey, rather than to improve the level of performance at competitive international level? I could go on listing sports, but participation by disabled people in sport is particularly important.

Will the Minister also give an overview of the level of expected cross-border and all-Ireland investment and partnership that will be developed over the period of the strategy?

Mr Poots: Obviously, we want our sporting performances to be at the highest levels because that will provide inspiration for others to get involved in sport. However, sport is also about people getting out and enjoying physical recreation. People in areas of social need do not achieve and participate to the levels that are expected in sport. The strategy targets those people.

There is substantial investment in sport in the Republic of Ireland. During various meetings, the Department will be discussing that matter with Ministers from the Republic of Ireland. A number of sporting bodies are organised on an all-Ireland basis. Many of those arrangements pre-date partition, and it is not a good idea to involve politics in sport. It is fine that some governing bodies operate on an all-Ireland basis, but it is important that people can fulfil their desires to participate for the team that they wish, whether that is the Great Britain team or the Ireland team.

Mr Brolly: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I will break with tradition and merely ask a question. How hopeful is the Minister that he will get the estimated £200 million required for the sports strategy over the next decade? Will he assure Members that, if he is successful, it will be entirely new money, or will it be partly, or fully, old money that has been recycled or redirected?

Mr Poots: An additional amount of £200 million is required. It cannot be old or recycled money.

Central Government must make a substantial contribution. However, others who are involved in sport, such as local government, sporting bodies and the private sector, have a sponsorship role to play. I am confident that more money will be invested in sport over the next 10 years and that the levels of participation and performance can be raised. All sides must pull together: the Department will take the lead, but I trust that others will join it.

11.15 am

Mr Ross: I thank the Minister for his statement, and I welcome the launch of the draft strategy. As the Minister said, sport has the ability to lift not only the individual but a nation.

Members have referred to the importance of equipment and facilities. However, does the Minister agree that a high level of coaching is, perhaps, the most important factor in improving the overall performance of athletes in Northern Ireland, at elite and grass roots level?

Given the timescale for the proposed strategy, is there scope to review and update the document, and who is responsible for implementing the strategy?

Mr Poots: The document identifies that DCAL wants to appoint an additional 900 accredited sporting coaches between 2007 and 2017. People with the ability to train and teach others how to maximise their skills and abilities at their chosen sports will make a considerable difference.

DCAL intends to review the document around the start of 2011. The Department will assess how the strategy is developing and consider how to reach those targets that are not being met. DCAL will take the lead responsibility for the strategy's implementation.

Ms S Ramsey: A LeasCheann Comhairle, I also welcome the Minister's statement and his commitment to taking action to develop sport.

As Kieran McCarthy said, the cut in lottery funding to Sport NI is due to the diversion of money to the 2012 Olympic and Paralympic Games. I wrote to the Minister recently to request a meeting to discuss a project for which the Lenadoon Community Forum submitted a bid for funding. The forum has recently been told that a final stage letter of approval is not forthcoming because of the cut in funding. Has the Minister any plans to put in place alternative arrangements to offset that reduction?

Mr Poots: Yes, I have. Lenadoon is one of several clubs that find themselves in the same position. They have gone through the process of submitting bids and meeting all necessary requirements, only to find that they are unable to obtain funding because of the cut in lottery funding related to the 2012 Olympic and Paralympic Games. For the clubs involved, that is a most regrettable situation. They put in a great deal of effort, and I understand their huge disappointment.

As part of the strategy, DCAL has identified capital development needs and has made bids for capital in ISNI 1 and ISNI 2. The Department awaits the outcome of the comprehensive spending review to identify how that can be taken forward.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I remind Members to switch off their mobile phones, as a phone is interfering with the recording.

Mr Storey: I welcome today's statement and particularly the Minister's reference, in his opening remarks, to the late Joey Dunlop, who came from my constituency.

On page 38 of the draft strategy, there is a reference to the:

"reduction in the number of district councils from 26 to seven by 2009."

Will the Minister confirm that that is a printing error rather than a DCAL policy statement? Will he assure me that that mistake will be corrected and, with reference to the 2012 London Olympics, that he will not forget the famous son from Dervock? The anniversary of Kennedy Kane McArthur's winning gold at the 1912 Olympics in Stockholm will be marked in 2012.

Mr Poots: I thank the Member for pointing out a clear error in the document. The document is in draft form and is open to correction. A consultation process will be carried out before the final document is published.

I am sure that many people will highlight other deficiencies in the document. With no disrespect to those who were involved in drafting the document, they cannot think of everything. Ultimately, others will make contributions to the strategy, and it is important that people respond and bring forward their ideas and proposals. I encourage people to read the document and to identify its shortcomings and bring them to the attention of the Department and Sport Northern Ireland.

Joey Dunlop from Ballymoney was a great sportsman who was in a league of his own, but other people have also made significant contributions.

Mr Elliott: I thank the Minister for his statement. However, I will reserve judgement until I see the effectiveness of the strategy's practical outworkings.

Does the Minister share my disappointment that Northern Ireland's part in the 2007 World Rally Championship itinerary, which he noted in his statement, is very small, considering the earlier indications from Rally Ireland that it was likely that one of the two rally hubs — either the headquarters or the service park — would be based in Northern Ireland? Both are now to be based in Sligo in the Republic of Ireland.

Mr Poots: I inherited the World Rally Championship from the previous Secretary of State, who was a great motorsport enthusiast. He was keen for the event to take place in Northern Ireland, and the plans had been put in place before I took up office. Nonetheless, we should not totally decry the event because of disappointment in Fermanagh over one aspect of it. Over 300 million people will watch the event live on television. In case Members do not know, it is to take place on 15 November in the grounds of the Stormont estate. That will send out a positive message that Northern Ireland is a good place to be. With the backdrop of this Building, 300 million people will watch a world-class event taking place in Northern Ireland, and I am encouraged by that.

Mr O'Loan: I welcome the statement and the important draft strategy. The Minister referred to sport for the disabled. What was the level and quality of engagement with disabled people in formulating the strategy? How will the strategy be promoted to the disabled? Will a budget and funding be provided for sport for the disabled? How will disabled people be enabled and encouraged to participate in sport at a local level?

Mr Poots: Some 90% of disabled people who engage in sport are also in employment. Representatives from Disability Sport have said that sport has given disabled people the confidence to do well in other aspects of life. That 90% is a higher percentage of disabled people who are in employment than is normally the case. Therefore, what sport can do for people with disabilities is significant.

Janet Gray is an inspirational character. She is a world-class blind waterskier who has won many gold medals. She trains at the sports institute in the University of Ulster at Jordanstown. That involves making a taxi journey, two train journeys and a walk from the train station to the university. Those are the efforts that she makes in order to maintain her physical fitness levels. She is a tremendous inspiration to everyone in sport and, in particular, to those who are disabled. Sport can do great things for those who are disabled. We engaged with those people, and the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety took the lead on that.

The Department is very keen — and it is a priority in the strategy — that people with disabilities can participate in, and be able to enjoy, sport.

Mr McHugh: A LeasCheann Comhairle, I welcome the Minister's statement, particularly the 10-year strategy for the provision of physical-activity facilities. The Minister mentioned the benefits of participating in physical activity and sport, and the need for young people to begin at an early age in order to progress in sport.

The Minister also mentioned the issue of neighbourhood renewal and the fact that, in many towns and villages, private developers are building on as much green land as possible — as is anyone else who can get their hands on such land. In many of our towns and villages, there is very little for young people aged nine and older to do. Antisocial activity is seldom perpetrated by young people who play GAA sports, soccer or other sports. Has the Minister consulted with other Departments and local councils, to prioritise the provision of facilities for sports and other physical activities for our young people so that they are not forgotten as they are at present?

Mr Poots: Planning Policy Statement 8 deals with the provision of open space. It states that, in any given area, there should be four acres of open-space land for every 1,000 people. PPS 8 also stresses that the Planning Service and DOE must work together to ensure that that ratio is adhered to. When new area plans are published, it is important that the provision for open space is identified in them. That is even more important nowadays, due to issues such as town cramming and houses being built on small plots of land, which mean that many gardens are not big enough for young people to play. It is essential that adequate open space be provided, and that is an issue for the Planning Service. Planning Policy Statement 8 states that plans must make provisions for adequate open space.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

Arts Funding

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up one hour and 30 minutes for the debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes to propose and 10 minutes for the winding-up speech. All other Members who speak will have five minutes.

Two amendments have been selected and published on the Marshalled List. The proposer of each amendment will have 10 minutes to propose and five minutes to wind up.

Ms Lo: I beg to move

That this Assembly recognises the critical role that the arts can play in promoting a positive international image of Northern Ireland, attracting visitors and growing the local economy and the contribution that community arts make to social cohesion; expresses its alarm that the arts are relatively underfunded per capita in Northern Ireland compared to all other regions in the United Kingdom; and calls upon the Executive to raise the level of arts funding to at least the United Kingdom average within the forthcoming Comprehensive Spending Review.

The Alliance Party is against the two tabled amendments. The first amendment considerably weakens the motion's request for increased funding. The second amendment, although it supports an increase in funding, does not go far enough; £10 per person is not enough, and the Arts Council is now calling for £11.55 per person.

I thank the Arts Council, the Ulster Historical Foundation, the Invest in Inspiration campaign and others for sending me their briefing notes, which have contributed to this speech. Northern Ireland has a wealth of talent in art, music, drama, film, poetry and many other forms of artistic expression.

Both of our major traditions provide us with rich culture, and that is enhanced by the different people who come to live among us in this beautiful land. We should have a flourishing arts sector of which we can be proud, but the arts sector is facing a serious funding crisis with low morale and job threats. For too long, citizens in Northern Ireland have been denied access and entitlement to the arts at a level that is enjoyed by other parts of the UK and Ireland.

11.30 am

Over the past 10 years, Northern Ireland has moved from a position of near-parity in arts funding with other regions to bottom of the league. The trend over that period shows a widening gap in per capita public funding and the lowest level of growth compared with elsewhere in the UK and Ireland. We invest £6.13 per head of population in the arts sector, which is in stark contrast to the £8.39 that is invested in England, £8.80 in Wales, £11.93 in Scotland and £12.61 in the Republic of Ireland. Not only has the arts sector sustained three successive years of standstill funding, but the decline over the past two years in National Lottery income has been further compounded by the decision to allocate lottery funds from the good causes fund to the London Olympics 2012. As a result, the Arts Council faces a reduction of £4.5 million over the next few years in its lottery-funded arts projects.

Arts funding is not only about funding the Grand Opera House or the Belfast Festival at Queen's — it enables organisations such as the Belfast Community Circus to instil values and transferable life skills to young people. The new Belfast community arts initiative has programmed workshop activity for more than 10,000 individuals — mostly young people — and employs more than 240 artists. Some 84% of its participants come from the most deprived wards.

The development of a social dialogue through the arts offers a real-life demonstration of a shared future in action. However, the proof of need for additional arts funding is not only found in and around disadvantaged urban communities, but throughout urban and rural areas in Northern Ireland. A range of arts activities are promoted in Northern Ireland through such organisations as the Share Centre in Fermanagh, which works with disabled and able-bodied children; the Nerve Centre in Derry, which works in music, film, animation and new media; Altnaveigh House in Newry which celebrates Ulster-Scots culture; piping and drumming schools; and touring theatre companies that ensure that quality theatre is available to the network of new art centres that have been supported by local councils and the Arts Council of Northern Ireland.

Cutting arts funding year in, year out is a short-sighted strategy to save money, whereas investing in the arts brings a multitude of economic, social and health benefits to society. Investing in the arts brings about a vibrant creative industry sector to boost the local economy by generating revenue and providing employment and business opportunities as well as attracting inward investment.

Investing in the arts promotes rural and urban regeneration. Examples of that were seen in Glasgow, Manchester and Liverpool in the 1980s, when they turned to the arts to drive urban regeneration following the decline in manufacturing industries. If they can do it, so can we. Everyone would love to see Belfast crowned as the European Capital of Culture.

Investing in the arts stimulates tourism, and Northern Ireland is already attracting more and more visitors. A high, international profile for the arts, and well-developed cultural and heritage projects and centres, will help the growth in cultural tourism.

Investing in the arts has been well proven to increase confidence, improve behaviour and generate more positive attitudes to learning in children and young people.

Investing in the arts enhances social cohesion by promoting the integration of minority groups, tackling sectarianism and racism and contributing to a more inclusive society. The arts sector is calling for an increase in arts funding from £6.13 to £11.55 per person per year, which is an increase of approximately £26 million for the 2008-10 funding cycle. It is a modest request that represents less than a quarter of one per cent of the annual spend on hospitals and community health, or less than half of one per cent of the education budget. The Executive need to take a strategic view of the overall development of Northern Ireland.

Investing in the arts is like investing in business, in that everyone will reap its benefits in economic and social gains.

Mr McCausland: I beg to move amendment No 1: Leave out all after “cohesion;” and insert

“and, while recognising that economic growth must be the Assembly’s main priority, encourages the Executive to explore means of enhancing promotion of the arts in Northern Ireland.”

There is much in the motion with which I agree. Its basic thrust is that we should seek to increase expenditure on the arts, which I support. I will come to my amendment in due course, but there are many reasons for increasing arts expenditure, and the Arts Council has highlighted a range of them in a number of its documents. One is increasing the positive international image of Northern Ireland, and a good example of that was Northern Ireland’s contribution to the recent Smithsonian Festival in Washington, where expressions from the whole range of cultures in Northern Ireland were on display, including very colourful contributions from the Orange Order and the Ulster Scots. That was an example of how we can use Gaelic, Ulster-Scots and Orange cultural life, in mainstream, high or community art to give a positive international image to our country.

The arts are also a way of attracting visitors to Northern Ireland, and cultural tourism will certainly be one of the main thrusts for tourism in the coming years. Whatever happens with climate change, people will not normally come to Northern Ireland for sunshine and sandy beaches, but they often come to sample the interesting and diverse cultural life of the country.

There are many ways in which the creative industries can help the growth of the economy, and the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure has spoken of them. Only yesterday, there was mention of the importance of creative industries to the local economy. It is an area in which there is particular local expertise, such as in the film industry.

We can also consider the benefits of community arts and the role that they have in social cohesion. Many communities find the arts a means of expressing their aspirations, hopes and fears. That is a way of bringing people together, in a shared experience, as a community. Community arts, in all their various forms, represent a sector that needs encouragement and support.

The voluntary arts sector is of particular value and importance, and it does not get as much attention as it should. There are many folk who may not wish to engage in a group activity in community arts, and they may not want to join a theatre group or play in a local band. However, those people can participate in the voluntary arts as individuals, and the benefits include social experience, opportunities for expression and improved self-esteem.

The expression of cultural identity is another aspect of the arts that is often talked about. It is important for people to have an opportunity to express their cultural identity. If we are to create a stable and coherent society in Northern Ireland, all cultural traditions should be treated on the basis of equality and diversity, whether that is Ulster-Scots, Irish or Orange culture — they all deserve the opportunity and equality of support and expression.

The figures that are often quoted refer to the money that flows into the arts via the Arts Council. However, it is important to remember that money also goes into the cultural tradition aspects of the arts through bodies such as Foras na Gaeilge or Tha Boord o Ulster-Scotch. Therefore, there are other funding streams into the arts sector that may not be automatically included in those figures.

The aim and aspiration of the Arts Council is that the arts should be:

“at the heart of our social, economic and creative life”.

That is a good aspiration and one that I hope that we could all endorse. The arts should not be seen merely as an add-on or an optional extra, but as something that is at the heart of every aspect of Northern Ireland society.

People's views of the arts can, sometimes, be a bit narrow. The Arts Council not only involves the arts, but architecture, the built environment and the craft sector. There is a tremendous opportunity for local businesses and the local economy. If we are to invite tourists to Northern Ireland, we should provide goods for them to purchase when they are here. The greater the range and diversity of those goods, the higher the spend, resulting in more money coming into our economy and to the artists who are involved in various creative arts.

My colleague the Member for East Londonderry Gregory Campbell has highlighted the fact that when one arrives at our ports, harbours and airports, the items for sale reflect one cultural tradition only — and not very well at that. Quite often, one finds a cow with a green shamrock stuck on the side, made in China or somewhere. Nevertheless, we want to see goods that are available from the whole range of cultural traditions in Northern Ireland, so that when one arrives at the airport and sees, “A Taste of Ulster”, it really is a taste of Ulster and not a taste of Killarney or Galway.

The biggest community arts sector in Northern Ireland, and one of the areas often neglected, is our bands. There are in the region of 100 pipe bands, although not all of them take part in competitions. We have several hundred accordion bands and an even greater number of flute bands. All those bands have around 20, 30, or more members.

Folk are also involved in a wide range of associated activities in support of the bands. The involvement of all those people means that bands, which do not get the attention that they should, are a large and key sector in community arts. In that sense, I hope that the Arts Council will review its provision of funding.

Lottery funding is tight, but, considering the large number of people who are involved with bands, that provides only a modest amount of money for instruments. Therefore, I hope that consideration will be given to increasing that funding.

I have mentioned various aspects of culture and the arts and their importance to society. In my final two minutes, I want to concentrate on amendment No 1.

Importantly, the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure is about to consider funding for arts and culture and will want to study what is currently being spent in Northern Ireland compared with the rest of the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland. Therefore, to tie ourselves to any target figure at this time would be premature. I prefer amendment No 1, which:

“encourages the Executive to explore means of enhancing promotion of the arts in Northern Ireland.”

It is not only a matter of direct Government funding, a culture of sponsorship must be encouraged in Northern Ireland. In addition, local authorities must be encouraged — borrowing the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure's phrase from yesterday's debate — to step up to the mark.

I am pleased to refer to the Arts Council of Northern Ireland's publication, ‘Local Authority Arts Expenditure Survey 2003-2004 and 2004-2005’, which I will not wave around because that would be inappropriate. In 2004-05, Belfast City Council did step up to the mark by setting aside £9,228,487 for the arts. It was the highest figure by far when compared with councils that only set aside about £3,000. People may say that the figure relates to the size of population; however, North Down Borough Council, headed by one of the proposers of the motion Stephen Farry, gave £2.68 per capita to the arts, compared with £33.27 from every citizen of Belfast. Amendment No 2 is tabled by Barry McElduff, whose council gave just £5.83 per capita. One way to increase spending on the arts would be for Omagh District Council and North Down Borough Council to step up to the mark in the same way that Belfast City Council has done.

Mr McElduff: I beg to move amendment No 2: Leave out all after the first “Kingdom”, and insert

“and Ireland; and calls upon the Executive to raise the level of arts funding to at least £10 per person, in the context of the Comprehensive Spending Review.”

Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I take issue with Nelson McCausland, not on his final point, but in that he may inflict damage to the tourism industry by suggesting that we do not have sandy beaches. We do have sandy beaches, and, furthermore, Mr Brolly told me that the sun was shining the day before yesterday.

A LeasCheann Comhairle, cuirim fáilte roimh an rún seo, ach tá mé ag moladh leasú don rún seo ag an am céanna. Is maith an rud é go bhfuil muid uilig ag déileáil leis an ábhar seo - tacaíocht do na healaíona. I welcome the Alliance Party's motion —

Mr McNarry: On a point of order. If a speech is made in a language that is not English, does the Speaker not have a mechanism to interpret what has been said in order to assuage my fears that nothing was said that I did not want to hear? I did not notice that you used any such mechanism, Mr Deputy Speaker. Will you satisfy me — because you were not even paying attention to what the Member was saying — that you understood what the Member said in a language other than English?

Mr Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order. Rather, it is a correction of the Deputy Speaker, which I do not accept. I was attending to several different matters at the same time; however, I understood what Mr McElduff said.

Mr McElduff: Go raibh maith agat. I hope that the Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure, Mr McNarry, will support the procurement of a simultaneous translation system to benefit all 108 Members. He could then rely on that system and no one else. That would be a quare good idea.

It is important for the Assembly to hear the case for increased revenue funding for the arts, and the Alliance Party, by tabling the motion, has done a service for the Assembly and the arts.

We should debate the critical role of the arts in driving the economy; in job creation and, crucially, job retention; in improving people's social lives and uplifting communities; in attracting visitors to our sandy beaches; and in improving the health and well-being of the wider community.

To some degree, everyone is aware that investment in the arts contributes greatly to achieving a range of Government priorities, as does investment in sport, which was mentioned in the previous debate. I wish to re-emphasise that fact.

A key message in the Arts Council's proposal to the comprehensive spending review for more revenue funding is that every £1 currently invested in the arts gives a return of £3.60 to the local economy. That cannot be disregarded, and the implications must be understood across the board.

Sinn Féin's amendment seeks to strengthen the motion and add to the case, not take away from it. The amendment proposes to add the words, “and Ireland”, not only because of the North/South dimension to the political architecture, but because, crucially, in 2006–07, the Twenty-six Counties spent £12.61 per capita on the arts. That is over twice the amount that is spent on the arts in the North. A lesson can be learned from the Twenty-six Counties.

I was surprised that the Alliance Party omitted that fact, because it would be common sense to include it if one wishes to reflect accurately the scale of arts underfunding in the North. I ask the proposers of the motion to accept amendment No 2, particularly the financial dimension, because it highlights further the substantial difference in investment. That is the missing part of the jigsaw, which is why Sinn Féin tabled amendment No 2.

The bottom line is that Sinn Féin wants to secure an increase in revenue funding for the arts in order to avert further funding crises and prevent crucial arts projects having to pull down their shutters. The case is best served by presenting a comparative picture of arts funding throughout these islands.

The amendment suggests spending at least £10 per capita as an endorsement of the Invest in Inspiration campaign, which was launched in January 2007 by the Arts Council with the support of the Forum for Local Government and the Arts. That campaign outlined 10 great reasons to invest in the arts.

I acknowledge what Anna Lo said about the lottery funding crisis. The double whammy of decreased lottery income and the diversion of funding to the 2012 Olympic Games has caused the figure for average spend to be recalculated. The new figure deemed necessary to invest in the arts will be £11.55 per capita over the period of the comprehensive spending review.

As Chairperson of the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure, I can tell Minister Edwin Poots that if, or when, he goes to the Executive to seek greater revenue funding for the arts, the Committee will support him. Edwin Poots and I might not always agree on everything, a LeasCheann Comhairle, as you might appreciate, but we have a common purpose in seeking greater revenue funding for the arts.

Society must demonstrate how it values the arts and show that they matter. The arts enrich everyone's lives and help to provide a more inclusive and cohesive view of society. Nelson McCausland talked about a narrow view of the arts, and we must note that some people feel that the arts are elitist. However, they are not elitist — they are for everyone.

When members of the public are asked when they last attended, or participated in, an arts event, they often tend to shy away from the subject, saying that they are not involved in the arts. They then realise that they might have attended a community play the night before, a concert in the recent past, even a painting class, an exhibition, a scór, a fleadh competition, a céilí, or a dance class. Therefore, everyone is involved in the arts; sometimes people are a bit slow to acknowledge that.

In my community, in mid-Tyrone, my introduction to the arts, in a formal sense, was through the Mid Ulster Drama Festival, which was held in the Patrician Hall. We were always treated to nine nights in a row of theatre. I commend organisations such as the Mid Ulster Drama Festival committee.

It is important that we acknowledge what the Minister talked about yesterday. He also previously stated that:

“Having quality arts facilities ... to showcase creative and cultural talent builds confidence and a sense of pride in local people.”

In the West Tyrone constituency, people are proud of facilities such as the Strule Arts Centre in Omagh, the Alley Arts and Conference Centre in Strabane, and the Patrician in Carrickmore.

Our amendment draws attention to the more complete picture of per capita spend on the arts in these islands. The amendment also adds to the context of the motion because the £12·61 per capita being spent on the arts in the Twenty-six Counties during 2006-07 is a significant figure that must be analysed and taken note of. People in the North have the same cultural entitlement as everyone else on this island — in this country. We want to assert that fact.

Sinn Féin notes that the deepening crisis in arts funding means that the amount that is being asked for has had to be recalculated to £11·55 per capita. It is intolerable that, during the comprehensive spending review period, further reductions are planned in funding for the arts. Those cuts total £4·5 million — that is not acceptable, especially considering what was originally and previously planned.

We want funding returned directly to the arts sector. We also want increasing democratisation of how that money is managed and spent. However, in a general sense, we are supportive of the motion that has been tabled.

Mr McNarry: On behalf of the Ulster Unionist Party, I express our sincere gratitude to Ms Anna Lo and Dr Farry for tabling the motion, which highlights the significant comparative underfunding that exists between our region and England, Scotland and Wales.

We readily identify with the proposal to increase arts funding to, at least, the United Kingdom average. It is with eager anticipation that we await the response of the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure, whom we welcome once again to the Chamber. We look forward to the Minister's giving his view on the scope that he may have to secure extra and additional funding through the comprehensive spending review, which is likely to be in the news today.

Although I accept that Northern Ireland is playing catch-up, and clearly has, from its current position, a long way to catch up on England, Wales and, massively, per capita, on Scotland, the differences in funding among the regions may not be able to be narrowed in one leap. If the case to realise parity of funding with even one of the United Kingdom regions is to succeed, there would have to be much more money than is in the kitty at present, and likely to be in it tomorrow.

I hope that neither the proposers nor the Minister see this proposal as an ultimatum, but as the beginning of a realisation through negotiation to reach — in as short a time as possible — a situation whereby funding for the arts in Northern Ireland is on an equal footing with other regions in the United Kingdom. Of course, if the Minister tells us today that he can meet the increase of funding that is called for in the motion, let him intervene now as the bringer of great news. If not, let us hear what news, if any, he can bring us today.

The Ulster Unionist Party firmly believes that our country's culture, including world-class events, the community arts, and the cultural riches available in our libraries and museums, enrich our common lives as a society. As such, they require support and strengthening, with no dithering.

We see investment in the many facets of arts and culture as investment in people and in their quality of life. My party is pleased, therefore, to support the motion. The House should set down some markers for the Minister and the Executive, at least to give a target to meet or beat and to put Northern Ireland in touch with other United Kingdom regions.

12.00 noon

Amendment No 2, as its proposer indicated, is effectively out of date, and I will leave it at that. Amendment No 1 would pass the initiative back to the Executive, as its proposer said. However, it would do so without putting down a marker. That would weaken the case for an increase in arts funding. My party, therefore, prefers to support the motion and to send the message that the House wishes to give the Minister on this important issue.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Tá na healaíona iontach tábhachtach ar fad, iontach tábhachtach do shláinte na sochaí ina bhfuilimid inár gcónaí. Téann said i bhfeidhm ar shláinte, ar shaol sóisialta, ar oideachas agus ar mheon an phobail, agus téann siad i bhfeidhm fosta ar eacnamaíocht na tíre seo.

I declare an interest as an amateur actor. I am aware, however, that there are many more professional actors and limelight-grabbers present in the House today. I do not put myself in the same category as them.

The arts are extremely important to the well-being of society. They impact directly on our social lives, education and health. Art also contributes to our economic well-being. It is an indictment of historic governance that the arts have fallen behind so badly in this part of the world. The arts are considered very important in the Republic of Ireland, Scotland, Wales and England. Why were we unworthy of proper investment under direct rule? We now have the opportunity to correct that, and I hope that the Minister will take appropriate action.

The increase asked for by the Arts Council is modest: less than £10 million per annum. A relatively small increase can produce substantial leveraged income for the arts, and the economy generally, through other investment opportunities, box office receipts and so on.

In direct economic terms, in 2005 the arts and creative industries employed nearly 35,000 people in over 2,500 enterprises in Northern Ireland. In indirect terms, the economic impact is more difficult to quantify. There is no doubt, however, that regions with a successful high-value-added tourist industry also have a thriving and dynamic arts industry. There is a positive, synergistic relationship between tourism and the arts. One relies on the other.

In a global economy, where this region competes with thousands of others for direct foreign investment, the arts are extremely important. When location decisions are being made, companies consider whether employees will locate and remain in the region in question. Often, senior managers and key personnel are required to move to the investment location. In high-value-added industries, key employees are extremely mobile. If they do not like a region, they will not stay; they will quickly move on. It is no accident that highly successful economic centres also have vibrant and properly-funded arts industries.

Economic advantage is gained through industrial and product innovation. It is often the case that market advantage is gained through aesthetic aspects of product design and marketing.

Often, technical functionality is expected as a given, and competitive advantage derives from the look and feel of a product. Such design is carried out by designers who live and work in centres where there are high levels of creativity. It is not by accident that Italian, French and Japanese products have distinctive and attractive aesthetic attributes that give them an advantage in the marketplace.

Most importantly, it is great for our children and grandchildren, our parents and ourselves to have the opportunity to enjoy the uplifting experience provided by music, art and drama. The arts are life-enhancing — often life-changing — and open up new ways of thinking. They take us from the mundane to the fantastic. The arts are most limited when they reflect our world, and most inspirational when they influence and shape our relationships with each other and how we view the world around us. I support the motion, a LeasCheann Comhairle.

Lord Browne: It is only right that the Assembly:

“recognises the critical role that the arts can play in promoting a positive international image of Northern Ireland, attracting visitors and growing the local economy and the contribution that community arts make to social cohesion”, as the motion states. However, I support amendment No 1.

For over 200 years Northern Ireland has been a centre of cultural and academic excellence. From the mid-nineteenth century on, cultural activity, coupled with a proud tradition of academic excellence, has earned Northern Ireland many accolades. There is no doubt that, in more recent times, there has been a resurgence in cultural and academic achievement in Ulster.

It can be difficult to define what Northern Irish culture is, but there is no doubt that Irish culture, as epitomised by the Irish language, music, dancing and art, is a strong influence. Similarly, in the last 15 years Ulster Scots has undergone what can only be described as a revival, with more than 200 groups in existence throughout the Province.

There are other cultures in Northern Ireland that have not been tapped into or explored to their full potential — I refer to the new immigrant communities that have come into Northern Ireland, from central and eastern Europe, for example, bringing with them their cultures and traditions. Those communities must be cherished and built upon as a potential way of drawing visitors to Northern Ireland.

There is high culture and there is popular or mass culture, and the British Isles successfully displays a shared heritage of both, which can be enjoyed by people of all affiliations. Border and regional identifications are no barrier to the enjoyment of this common British culture. Equally, we must also recognise modern culture, as epitomised by artists such as Van Morrison and Snow Patrol, who are enjoyed by millions of people throughout Northern Ireland, the Republic of Ireland and the United Kingdom.

Culture is a big business, and it can be turned to economic advantage. That said, art and culture help many people, and it must be encouraged at a local level, where money could be well spent. In my constituency of East Belfast, there is the Beat Initiative, which is a carnival and a community arts organisation that promotes art across the city and the communities, and seeks opportunities for young people.

There is a problem with arts funding. I say, with a little regret, that prudence must be exercised. Members could cite many projects that would benefit from an increase in their budget allocations. Sport has been mentioned in the debate; it, too, could benefit from an increase in budget per capita. In Northern Ireland, the expenditure per capita on sport between 2005 and 2007 was £5·31. Compare that with the amount that is spent on the arts, which is £6·13. Therefore, a little prudence is needed.

All methods of increasing the arts budget must be considered. That is why I support amendment No 1, which calls on the Executive to, at least, explore the means by which the level of arts funding could be increased. Society benefits from culture and the arts, and would be less well off without them.

Mr P Maskey: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I commend Ms Lo and Dr Farry for bringing the motion to the Floor. I also want to commend the arts community, which has worked tirelessly for many years with a miserly budget. Without its vision, communities in some areas would be much worse off through deprivation and antisocial behaviour. That is why I proposed to the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure several months ago that an inquiry be held into expenditure on the arts and on what the arts mean to communities. Fortunately, the proposal was supported. I hope that the Committee will work on that process soon.

I disagree with Mr McNarry, who said that amendment No 2 is out of date. Barry McElduff and I tabled the amendment in the hope that this matter will be taken seriously and that additional funding can be made available to the arts community, because we are all its beneficiaries.

The figures that I am about to quote have already been mentioned in the debate. However, they are vital to the winning argument. The current spend per capita on the arts in the North of Ireland is £6·13, which is around 50% of what is spent in the rest of Ireland and Scotland, and two thirds of what is spent in England and Wales. I want to see expenditure here being brought into line with what is spent in the rest of these islands. Sinn Féin wants the spend per capita to increase to at least £10 per person.

There would be many benefits to society from a little extra investment in the arts. In my constituency of West Belfast, organisations such as Féile an Phobail have contributed to regeneration. The féile attracts many visitors every year, including the Culture Minister in 2007, and has generated millions of pounds to an area of high deprivation. Despite that, its funding has been cut over the past several years. The Dubbeljoint Theatre Company has presented many award-winning plays, and many of its young acting stars who were given their first breaks on the stage on the Whiterock Road are now regular faces on television. Consider what could be achieved if such organisations were given proper funding.

The murals throughout Belfast attract many thousands of visitors every year. Mr Bradley said that people visit from Italy and from elsewhere around the world. Visitors come to West Belfast from China and Japan to look at the murals. The murals must also be supported.

Many arts organisations assist with economic regeneration and social cohesion throughout the North of Ireland. It is essential that they are able to continue to do so in a properly funded environment. It is often left to the Arts Council to tell groups the bad news that the amount of money that is needed to deliver all of their projects is simply not available. The Arts Council has done an excellent job with the limited resources that it has. According to the Arts Council, projects have had to work during the past three years with a budget shortfall of £5·6 million.

Mr McElduff mentioned earlier that for every £1 that is spent on the arts, there is a return of £3·60. It is, therefore, hard to fathom why there is not more investment in the arts. With more investment, that return would be enhanced. More investment would mean more income for all areas, including those of high deprivation. It would mean more jobs and more tourists. It would mean that pride is instilled in communities and that more children are given the opportunity to take part in the arts.

It means more international recognition and possibly more acclaim for literature — for example, in the form of the Nobel prize. Work must be allowed to continue in the arts sector, but it is clear that more investment is needed. It is important that the arts budget for the North of Ireland is brought into line with budgets in the rest of these islands. That will allow the arts sector to grow and thrive, ensure that all of our communities can go from strength to strength and that we leave a legacy of which future generations can be proud. Go raibh maith agat.

Mr K Robinson: While I have some reservations regarding the wording of the motion — due in no small part to the budgetary pressures that will shortly face all Members of the Assembly — I recognise, and fully support, the aspiration to reach funding parity with that of the other devolved regions of the UK. That is clearly stated in the Ulster Unionist Party's policy manifesto.

We all bathe in the reflected glory of international recognition when "one of our own" makes it to the big time. Liam Neeson, Seamus Heaney, Barry Douglas, Van Morrison and Sir James Galway have held up the banner of excellence and focused the attention of the world on the positive, constructive side of Northern Ireland. At that same time, others were intent on giving their own version of Attila the Hun, by bombing and shooting over 30 sterile years, when the flame of artistic endeavour in the Province was in danger of being snuffed out.

The grotesque spectacle of the Grand Opera House, in the aftermath of bombing, was flashed around the world. Yet, the raw talent, enthusiasm and determination of this society to resist the philistines, triumphed. I pay tribute to the work of those in the performing and creative arts who weathered that stormy period.

Many Members have quoted various financial figures that highlight the dire situation of the arts sector, in its broadest sense. I will not go into those now. However, I call on the Minister, Edwin Poots, to apply maximum pressure on his colleagues in the Executive, to find the necessary moneys to raise the level of arts funding towards the shibboleth of parity. If any of them should be tempted to play the role of Scrooge, let him highlight the fact that, for every £1 invested in the arts, £3·60 is generated for Northern Ireland's economy.

With an employment figure of over 2,000 active in the arts, the sector is too important to neglect. Its growth potential is enormous. For too long the arts have been viewed, by many, as the domain of a select few. In the ranks of the chosen few, the temptation was to look down on the rest of society, who did not share their rarefied view of artistic worth. Such an attitude did nothing to achieve widespread sympathy and understanding for further arts funding.

Thankfully, today, outreach projects — and the development and appreciation of community-based arts projects — have helped to demolish those walls that needlessly divided the world of art and the world of creativity. That approach has helped to build confidence in communities and enabled them to discuss and explore their experiences. That, in turn, has further enabled them to tackle other more thorny issues.

I echo Lord Browne's appeal that the ethnic cultures, which are now present in Northern Ireland, should be supported. I referred, in my speech yesterday, to the successful Mela festival that was held in Botanic Gardens, which was attended by Anna Lo and me. Again, I commend it as a template for community involvement.

The most recent blow to arts funding occurred in March 2007 when a reduction of £4·5 million was sought in order to divert money to the Olympic Games in London. That, on top of the historic lack of adequate resources for the arts, under the direct rule regime, has led to a crisis in that crucial sector.

Minister Poots noted on 19 September 2007:

"Public funding is needed to support and sustain our arts organisations which form the backbone of our creative economy."

He went on to state:

"Investment in arts and culture strengthens the economy and fuels economic regeneration by supporting local jobs and stimulating consumer spending."

Therefore, we must all play our role in relation to funding so that we can all enjoy those benefits.

I support the Minister's sentiments, and so does the House. It is now up to the Minister, not to rob Peter, but to persuade him to invest in the growth potential of our existing talent.

I support the motion.

Mr O'Loan: I strongly support the motion. The figures very much speak for themselves. Spending per capita in the year 2006-07 was as follows: in the Republic of Ireland, £12·61; in Scotland, £11·93; in Wales, £8·80; in England, £8·19; and in Northern Ireland, £6·13. It is not good to be at the bottom of that league table.

Sometimes what we get back more than compensates for what we spend. That is the case with the arts, both in social and economic terms. Take, for example, the success of tourism in the Republic of Ireland and Scotland — their tourism sectors input greatly to the economy. By contrasts, we lag hugely behind. It can be no coincidence that those areas spend the most on the arts.

The Arts Council is requesting an increase in funding of £26 million over the CSR period, which would bring our per capita spending up to £11·55 per annum, similar to that in the Republic of Ireland and Scotland. We should aim at getting that level of spend.

The arts have a huge role to play in society and in tackling social disadvantage. The motion rightly outlines that role, and other Members have mentioned it, too. I welcome the recent shift towards funding for the community arts, although the high-level arts must not be neglected as they have a significant role to play. In England, the simple creation of a choir in a disadvantaged run-down estate did a huge amount to turn around that community's lack of confidence. Sometimes non-typical approaches to problem-solving can be adopted, and, just like that approach, they can be very successful. Here, drama and film have been used to explore and spread an important message about domestic violence. Therefore, there is the potential for major payback. We know that a lack of social cohesion results in huge costs, and that can often be addressed by developing well-targeted arts programmes.

Recently the chairman of the Ulster Bank, Dr Alan Gillespie, made important comments on what attracts foreign direct investment to a country. He mentioned four or five factors on which investors reflect when making their investment decisions, and among them was the presence of a rich cultural environment. Thus, our flagship projects, such as the Lyric Theatre and the Ulster Orchestra, play a part in creating that environment, as does the local provision of music and drama education for children, and so on. We must build on that if we are serious about playing an important role in the international community.

I welcome Ken Robinson's remarks about Liam Neeson. I hope that the day will come when we properly recognise what Liam Neeson has done for Ballymena, and for Ireland as a whole. Work on a new museum, arts and civic centre in Ballymena is nearly completed, and some £20 million has been spent on it. I welcome the departmental contribution to that project, to which the Minister referred yesterday. I have no doubt that that will encourage a huge flood of community arts activity; in fact, such activity is already starting to happen.

For example, a Ballymena Chamber Orchestra has recently been formed. That classical orchestra comprises a small number of professionals and a large number of ordinary community members. They have enhanced their standards beyond all recognition. There is nothing airy-fairy or ivory tower about this orchestra — it works in the community and in disadvantaged areas and visits schools, getting youngsters excited about music that they might not have been excited about before. That is all marvellous.

There are other significant community arts projects in the areas. Ballymoney has a strong and continuing tradition of involvement in drama. There is also has a strong interest in traditional music, which is promoted by groups such as Comhaltas Ceoltóirí Éireann and others. Interestingly, the music played in north Antrim is very influenced by Scottish traditional music, and there is a great deal of interaction between those two areas. Thus, the arts have a crucial role to play with regard to their contribution to quality of life and potential contribution to the economy. We must therefore invest more money in them.

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure (Mr Poole): I thank those Members who tabled both the motion and the amendments for demonstrating their interest in such an important subject. I agree with the points that have been made about the positive role that the arts can play in society, which is not always highlighted when funding for the arts is debated in the media or elsewhere.

Since taking up office in May I have spent a great deal of time in meeting a wide range of arts providers, from community-based voluntary arts groups to the professional arts organisations. I have listened and learned, to get a feel for the issues that have an impact on the arts sector, and to see for myself the positive benefits that are derived from the arts. I fully appreciate that, for some considerable time, there has been a historical deficit in arts funding in Northern Ireland. Arts Council funding has been pegged at about £11 million since 2002 without much change. Other Members have already highlighted the disparity with other parts of the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland. In some places, Northern Ireland funding for the arts amounts to only half of that provided elsewhere.

We are already behind, and the 2012 Olympic Games will further reduce lottery funding available to the arts. We will lose £1.5 million per annum from 2008. The Arts Council's income from the national lottery will have dropped from a high of £10.3 million in 1997-98 to only to £4.5 million in 2011-12. That represents a significant loss to the local economy.

Following the last two rounds of national lottery applications, requests from arts organisations totalled over £10 million against available funds of just under £3 million. That gives an indication of the funding shortfall. Inevitably, many good projects and organisations will be disappointed as a consequence of not obtaining funding, because the Arts Council simply does not have the money to distribute.

The per capita figures that have been quoted relate to revenue funding, and do not include the recent investment in capital funding in the arts infrastructure. In the 2004 comprehensive spending review, the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure secured £18 million in ISNI 1 (investment strategy for Northern Ireland), which was primarily intended to address the deficiency in Belfast's arts infrastructure that was identified following the unsuccessful bid to be European Capital of Culture. Including arts lottery funding, the Department has invested £6.3 million in the redevelopment of the Grand Opera House; £8.25 million has been allocated to a new Lyric theatre, and a further £8.25 million to the new Metropolitan Arts Centre which will replace the Old Museum Arts Centre (OMAC). Almost £4 million was earmarked for the refurbishment of the Crescent Arts Centre, and £2.7 million for the Ulster Hall. Therefore, there is potential to improve the arts infrastructure in our capital city and it should be an exciting time.

As I said yesterday, however, we require support from other sources to ensure that those capital projects go ahead. I have to make it abundantly clear that if that support is not forthcoming, it is likely that some of those projects will fall. That is for others to consider. There has been some success in the regions. Capital infrastructure has been well supported; for example, Ballymena Borough Council paid for 66% of the cost of a new arts centre, and Omagh District Council invested £3 million in its new arts centre — 28% of the total cost. In my own constituency of Lagan Valley, Lisburn City Council contributed 94% of the cost of the Island Arts Centre. There is investment to be made in capital infrastructure for the arts, and benefits to be derived from that investment.

I want to comment on where the arts come into the scheme of benefits and other Departments. Some people see the arts as the cherry on top of the icing. I do not even see the arts as the icing on the cake, but as part of the mixture that makes up the fabric of Northern Ireland, and what it can deliver.

12.30 pm

With regard to economic development, for example, some 33,500 people are employed in the creative industries and in arts-related occupations. That represents about 4.6% of the population. If we were to emulate what has been achieved in the rest of the United Kingdom, we could create another 11,000 jobs in that industry. If we want to attract high-quality jobs to Northern Ireland — and we do — the arts have a key role to play. People who are employed and have a good disposable income will want to spend that income on attending quality events. The arts have a key role to play in that. In the not-too-distant past, I was aware that a company that was considering coming to Belfast chose in the end to locate in Edinburgh simply because the arts infrastructure was better there. The people that it employed had a very strong disposable income and wanted to go to a city where there were plenty of events in which they could participate.

The arts sector improves the attractiveness and image of Northern Ireland and provides a key product that contributes to tourism development. Major arts and cultural events supported by the Northern Ireland Events Company in 2005 generated 25,000 additional bed nights. It is my desire that venues such as the Grand Opera House — and the Lyric Theatre, when it reopens — should be open all year round. However, they cannot do that if they do not have the funding. Ultimately, if we want to make Northern Ireland a tourist destination for 12 months of the year, we need the arts to make that contribution.

The arts support learning, education and training, and that contributes to economic development as well. The Arts Council of Northern Ireland has used the arts to promote education among children and young people. In particular, the creative youth partnerships have involved over 13,000 children and young people and 130 artists in Northern Ireland. That initiative has helped to strengthen links to the curriculum and provide high-quality educational experiences. Projects such as the Nerve Centre, AmmA and Studio ON provide real benefits to education as they demonstrate to our young people the opportunities that are available in the creative industries.

The arts sector promotes improved health outcomes and can often act as a preventative measure. I talked about how sports can contribute to health; however, art can contribute to health as well, particularly for older people and those with disabilities or mental-health issues. People's mental health can be assisted and improved as a consequence of having the opportunity to engage in the arts. In a survey carried out by the Mater Hospital, 88% of patients described arts activities as beneficial.

As well as promoting general economic development, the arts can act as a driver for local regeneration in both urban and rural areas. Over the past 10 years, funding to the arts has helped to establish nine new cultural buildings in towns and cities across Northern Ireland, with plans for further developments. The Cathedral Quarter in Belfast city will largely be successful on the back of the arts.

The arts sector has high levels of participation across a range of social groups and ages in Northern Ireland and contributes towards addressing issues of social inclusion and participation. Statistics show that, between April 2005 and March 2006, 47% of residents aged 16 and over had participated in or attended an arts event. The arts sector has high levels of participation among people with disabilities, and, according to research carried out by the Arts Council, 82% of the population with disabilities have expressed interest in one or more art forms.

That is a demonstration of the benefits that the arts can provide to the wider community, and that is critical. Mr O'Loan referred to Alan Gillespie's comments, and that ties in quite neatly with what I said about the experience of the company that chose to go to Edinburgh, as opposed to Belfast. The arts are critical to the desire of this Government to deliver a stronger economy for the people of Northern Ireland.

Cultural tourism is the fastest growing segment of our tourism industry and, last year, 224,000 people engaged in cultural tourism activities. Earlier this year, the Rediscover Northern Ireland programme provided us with an opportunity to attend the Smithsonian Folklife Festival in Washington DC to demonstrate Northern Ireland's wares and show the United States of America the quality of our arts and culture. That showcase was hugely successful and, since then, the United States has shown a lot of interest in what we are doing in Northern Ireland. Many outdated, Northern Ireland stereotypes were challenged, and we showed that we were a creative, confident and outward-looking people, capable of partnering with businesses, organisations and people from all sections of the community. We also showed that, for some individuals, Northern Ireland has a lot more to offer than what might initially meet the eye.

I want to develop Northern Ireland as a world-class creative and cultural region, generating wealth and sustainable employment opportunities in the creative industries. We have made it very clear that, the arts are critical to many aspects of Northern Ireland; therefore, arts funding is of critical importance. A significant shortfall has been identified, and a case has been made for that in the comprehensive spending review. I have listened to my colleagues, and for example, to what the Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure, Mr McNarry, had to say about his party's support. That is not always reflected by his ministerial colleagues; some of the more negative comments about arts funding perhaps have come from that source.

We need to get together and identify how we, as a Government, can deliver more from the central pot, and how local government can deliver more. We must look to the corporate sector and to private sponsorship because, in many other cities and regions, the private sector makes a far greater contribution to the arts. It is not simply about giving money away — there is something in it for business. There is significant benefit —

Dr Farry: In light of the Minister's discussions with his colleagues, has his Department, through the CSR, made a formal bid to bring spending on the arts in Northern Ireland in line with the other regions of the United Kingdom?

Mr Poots: The answer is yes, and the Member should not have expected any other answer. It would cost around £26 million over the three years of the CSR. I do not need to tell Members that this is a very tough negotiating round, and we shall see what comes out of it. What happens today will have some impact on the announcement at Westminster on the CSR.

I support the spirit of the motion and of both amendments. For all the reasons that I, and other Members, have outlined, investment in the arts is a sound investment for Northern Ireland. It is important that local government and private funders step up to the mark along with central Government. Members can rest assured that I have made the case very strongly in the context of the CSR, and I very much value the many contributions made by the arts to Northern Ireland, its society, and its economy, as illustrated in the speeches this morning.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Thank you Minister. Members will be aware that the Business Committee has arranged to meet as soon as the Assembly suspends for lunch.

I propose therefore by leave of the Assembly to suspend the sitting until 2.00pm, when we will have the winding-up speeches on the motion and on the amendments. The sitting is by leave suspended.

The sitting was suspended at 12.39 pm.

On resuming (Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Dallat] in the Chair) —

2.00 pm

Mr Brolly: I had prepared a pre-lunchtime address, so I will be brief. Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle.

I want to deal not so much with arts funding but with where the Arts Council directs its funding. I have been at various Arts Council meetings over the years, and at one such meeting, I made the point that its promotion of the arts should be more proactive and dynamic. It seemed to me that the council simply doles out any funding that it receives to people who promote the arts. It even passes the buck to the Events Company, which doles out money on its behalf.

I understand the reason that that is the case. It is probably linked closely to the fact that the funding is not available and that the council works on a shoestring while doing as much as it can. Therefore, I look forward to the Arts Council's receiving extra funding — and I hope that it will get the sum that it seeks — so that it can become more proactive. The Arts Council is different in nature from the body that was known as the Sports Council; at sporting events, the Sports Council has a certain presence. However, people do not get a sense of an Arts Council presence at arts events. If the Arts Council adopted the same kind of promotional attitude as the Sports Council, people might show more interest in, and be more enthusiastic about, the arts.

Last night, I listened to an interview with Anna Lo, one of the proposers of the motion. I predicted the question that the interviewer would ask her when she said that the arts needed an extra £6 per capita. I said to the person who was in the car with me that the interviewer was going to ask whether that money would not be better spent on schools or hospitals. We must get that attitude out of our minds. I have an image of hospitals and schools being soulless places. These days, compared with when I was a young man, schools and hospitals are soulless. Local schools and hospitals used to have souls, but now they just have bodies. That is a good reason for the Arts Council to receive extra funding — it can use it to add soul to schools and hospitals.

My second — and last — point is that it is important for us to sustain and encourage North/South co-operation in the arts. That would give everyone a wider geographical and cultural area of interest.

Many benefits have come from North/South co-operation. I mention a very good initiative called Turas/Journey, which is a North/South funding initiative to encourage individuals and group performers in all areas of the arts. Such initiatives are useful even from an economic point of view, because, when Dublin is involved, it usually contributes a wee bit more money than we do. Apart from that, widening people's perspectives and giving them a greater opportunity to enjoy artistic things is beneficial.

I am sorry, but I do not know whether we have yet heard the Ulster Scots for Turas/Journey from Nelson.

Mr McCausland: Three Ulster-Scots translations for "journey" are "stravaig", "gang" or "rake".

If we are to broaden the vision, we should be inclusive, not insular. To think about one island is to be insular. We must take a broad-minded and comprehensive view, which means embracing all the islands — the entire British Isles. Let us look east to Scotland as well.

Mr McElduff: Did Nelson previously offer "dander" as another alternative?

Mr McCausland: It was a possibility, but I thought that three alternatives were enough. I did not want to overpower people.

Mr Brolly: Will the Members give way?
[Laughter.]

I shall conclude very soon, because most of the points have already been made. The Turas/Journey initiative is as inclusive as any initiative can be. I attended its launch, at which Ulster Scots and Irish were represented. Indeed, anything that could have been represented was there. I appreciate what Nelson has said about embracing all the islands. We can travel across the water to enjoy morris dancing, and perhaps even learn a bit of it. Everything cultural is good, from wherever it comes in the world.

Mr D Bradley: When the Member refers to crossing the water to enjoy culture, does he include the Scottish Gàidhealtachd in that? We heard yesterday about the worthy Colmcille initiative that was organised on Iona and Mull.

Agus ba mhaith liomceist a chur ar an bhall an aontaíonn sé liom gur choir an gaol sin idirgaeltacht na hÉireann agus gaeltacht na hAlban a fhorbairt agus a threisiú.

Does the Member agree that we should do all that we can to encourage arts links between the Gaeltacht in Ireland and the Gàidhealtachd in Scotland?

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member literally has 10 seconds.

Mr Brolly: Aontaím go mór leis an bhall eile agus gor raibhmíle maith agat, Dominic. I have little more to say. Go raibh míle maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle.

Mr Shannon: I support amendment No 1, which I urge Members to back.

The benefits of the arts in Northern Ireland as a means of expression are important. Indeed, those benefits are essential. Many famous poets and artists from Northern Ireland gained their inspiration from — dare I say it? — the beauties of Strangford, so I readily enjoy seeing pieces of art on display that give me a taste of home.

Undoubtedly, art has been the vital means of expression and release in the rehabilitation of many in the Province. The fact that 88% of people in the Mater Hospital felt that crafts helped them to recuperate should come as no surprise. People are made aware that they can do something useful and therapeutic, whether that be to make Christmas cards, to dedicate a piece to the memory of a loved one, to erect a monument that represents a loss of life or to paint a mural that depicts history — but that does not glorify terrorism. There is a major difference there.

Arts and culture are vital to our children's development. It gives them an outlet for expression other than rage or bad behaviour. Ask any youth leader in the Province how he or she guarantees good behaviour from a group: the threat of their not getting to do craft. Children and adults alike enjoy working with their hands to achieve something beautiful, so that must be encouraged. For that reason, 75,000 children in the Province participate in art workshops. In my constituency alone, many workshops are held, not only in Newtownards Town Hall but right across the entire Ards Peninsula. Moreover, art classes are held in the techs, and classes are taught on the intricacies of knitting and crocheting — skills that I dare say elude many of us in the Chamber. I certainly would not possess them.

Historically, Strangford has produced superior poets, authors, artists and craftsmen. That must be fostered and maintained.

Everyone present will have heard me use the Ulster-Scots language in the Chamber and will know the importance that I, and many of my colleagues, place on our cultural identity. Recently, Newtownards celebrated the four-hundredth birthday of the Hamilton and Montgomery settlement, and many events were co-ordinated to celebrate that.

Mr Campbell: The Member has, on occasion, used Ulster Scots in the Chamber, but will he accept that the difference between his use of it and others' use of Irish is that he does not use it every single time he gets to his feet, in order to make a political point?

Mr Shannon: I thank the Member for his intervention; it is quite clear that I do not use Ulster Scots every time that I speak, and I do not use it for political means.

We in Ards Borough Council saw the four-hundredth anniversary of the Hamilton and Montgomery settlements as an opportunity to remember our history, as a way to enjoy our culture, and as a drawing point for tourists. Judging by the expressions on people's faces as they enjoyed the theatre, the crafts and the history of how Ards and Strangford have developed, a great time was had by all.

One needs only to take a drive around my beautiful constituency of Strangford to see that the lack of money is leading to serious accidents on the roads. That is why the DUP amendment is important. One needs only to sit and wait in the Ulster Hospital to realise that the Health Service is understaffed and underfunded. One need only sit in the library in Ards, which holds 40 people, or go to our schools to witness the problems that arise from a lack of funds, and to see that there are areas in the Province that must be given priority in a wholehearted allocation of funding.

Although it is important for children to be able to express their talents and gifts, it is crucial that they can sit in a classroom that is equipped to meet their needs, and that they can go to a library that will enhance their basic literary skills. As important as good funding is in boosting tourism, it is essential that the infrastructure can bear the weight of the load. As amazing as the results of rehabilitative arts expression are, it is imperative that the correct drugs and treatment can be recognised for each patient, and afforded accordingly.

It would be great to be able to afford to do everything; to have the perfect country with enough funds to ensure state-of-the-art hospitals and schools alongside artistic forums, workshops and dedicated facilities. However, Northern Ireland is not that country; at least, it is not yet. I have no doubt that a time will come when our nation's investment portfolio is greater, when our tourism potential is explored, and when we get all the benefits that that will bring. At that time, the funds will be available to invest greatly in young, individual artistic talents. However, that day is not yet here, and the essentials must take precedence.

As a member of the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure, I would love enough money to be available to support all of the applications for funding that are made. However, that is not possible, so we must strive for the most and excel with what we have. We can do that. I support the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure in his bid for the extra £26 million for arts funding over the next three years, because that gives an indication of what he is aiming to do, and it gives the Committee a chance to support him.

I support the amendment, which recognises the importance of arts funding in Northern Ireland, but also identifies the fact that there are pressing needs that must take priority if we are to develop as a nation. I support amendment No 1.

Dr Farry: I welcome the vast majority of the comments that have been made in the debate. It has been a constructive debate, although Members have, at times, wandered into the next debate.

All parties, and especially the Minister, accept that, per capita, the arts are underfunded in Northern Ireland, compared to every other region of the United Kingdom, and compared to the Republic of Ireland. There is no need to repeat the figures, but they are revenue-based, and additional capital investments should be taken into account when arts funding is considered. Parity with the rest of the United Kingdom to meet the UK average requires an investment of £26 million over the course of the forthcoming comprehensive spending review period. I am pleased that the Minister has today confirmed that DCAL will make a specific bid for those funds in the comprehensive spending review.

The Minister made a strong case for the Alliance Party's motion during his speech. I hope that the Assembly will approve the original motion. If it does so, the Minister's efforts to persuade his Executive colleagues to come up with that money will be reinforced.

2.15 pm

The Assembly is not asking for something unrealistic or off the wall but for something that the Department has put on the agenda. Unfortunately, the Alliance Party cannot support amendment No 1, because it ducks the core problem of underfunding in Northern Ireland relative to other regions. The issue of parity must be addressed in the short term and as quickly as possible.

The DUP Members who spoke reflected the essence of the motion. When the Minister spoke, he effectively made a bid for the money to which the motion refers. Rather than blurring the issue, there are advantages in DUP Members weighing in behind their Minister in order to reinforce his efforts around the Executive table. There is a real advantage to be gained by the Assembly's speaking in a clear, united voice.

I must slap myself on the wrist and apologise to Barry McElduff, who proposed amendment No 2, for not sufficiently reflecting the Irish dimension in the original motion. The motion tried to place Northern Ireland in the context of overall UK public expenditure. However, Anna Lo and other Members, including Mr McElduff, referred to the figure of £12·61 — or its euro equivalent — that each person in the Republic of Ireland receives in arts funding. It must be recognised that people in the Republic are even further ahead of people in Northern Ireland in arts funding per capita. The North/South and all-island dimension to the arts must also be acknowledged. Many facets of the Irish story of arts and culture can be marketed to the world. That point has been well made, and I accept the criticism of the original motion.

That said, the reference made in amendment No 2 to arts funding of £10 per person perhaps sells Northern Ireland somewhat short, given the loss of the National Lottery funding for the arts. To achieve parity in arts funding, the figure per capita in Northern Ireland would now be £11·55. Given my comments on the Irish dimension to arts funding, it would be advantageous were Sinn Féin to withdraw its amendment and back the original motion.

During the debate, Nelson McCausland referred to the Smithsonian Folklife Festival in the United States. I agree that that was a tremendous demonstration of the creative arts in Northern Ireland. I also fully accept his points that the Orange culture must be incorporated into the arts and that alternative funding streams must be considered.

Much has been made of the fact that the Arts Council is the main recipient of funding. Although the Arts Council is in the driving seat and has made the strongest arguments for additional funding, it should be recognised that other sectors in Northern Ireland contribute to the creative arts. The motion made no specific reference to the Arts Council; it dealt with arts funding in general rather than specific funding for a particular organisation.

Several councils throughout Northern Ireland make strong interventions in support of the arts. Mr McCausland criticised North Down Borough Council, but I reassure him that North Down is at the cutting edge of the arts. In my capacity as Mayor of North Down, I recently attended a concert by Camerata Ireland and Barry Douglas. Moreover, the annual Aspects Irish Literature Festival was held in my constituency at the end of September. The council is working to secure a new theatre and multi-purpose venue in the near future. On the back of that, the council will increase the amount of money that it diverts towards the arts.

Barry McElduff mentioned the sandy beaches of west Tyrone: I am not sure where they are, but I look forward to sunbathing there in the future. However, he made the important point that for every £1 invested in the arts, the benefit to the economy is £3·60. If anything, that may be an underestimate.

David McNarry said that the Assembly is setting a target and a challenge for the Minister on arts funding. That should not be perceived as an ultimatum to the Department. The motion does not try to back the Minister into a corner but to reflect concern about a critical issue and achieve some consensus in the Assembly that should aid him in his efforts.

I look forward to seeing Dominic Bradley's acting ability being put to good use in the future. He made useful points about tourism potential on the back of arts and the importance of arts investment in the context of the global economy. He referred specifically to the importance that countries such as Italy and France place on high-quality design to create high-value products. Northern Ireland can learn lessons from that.

Lord Browne referred to the history of creativity in this part of the world, and to the benefits of groups such as Snow Patrol and Van Morrison putting Northern Ireland on the international map. On 1 September, 30,000 were people in Bangor for the Snow Patrol concert.

Paul Maskey referred to Féile an Phobail, which is an excellent example of a community arts festival. It has been a tribute to the ongoing work in west Belfast, and, as we move out of conflict, has done much to create a positive image for that community.

Ken Robinson mentioned a host of names who have benefited from arts funding in Northern Ireland, and who, in turn, have played a crucial role in promoting its international image. He also referred to the Grand Opera House, and it is worth reflecting that it was a beacon of hope in Belfast during the Troubles. The Grand Opera House, at the start of the golden mile, is the centre of so much investment and spin-off in Belfast.

Declan O'Loan referred to how areas that invest in tourism also invest highly in the arts. Surely there is a link there. He also referred to the importance of providing a rich, cultural environment in which to attract foreign direct investment.

The underfunding of the arts is not the fault of the Assembly, but a legacy of the past. We now have an opportunity to put things right. That underfunding illustrates that there are structural problems in our economy, and it is one of the many areas where we will come across major distortions in public expenditure that are having a detrimental effect on our ability to grow as an economy. There are a range of reasons for investing in the arts — social benefits; health and education; helping people with disabilities, including the visually and aurally impaired; dealing with mental health; community engagement; and promoting a shared future. Two thirds of art activity is, in fact, cross community.

In conclusion, I shall focus on the financial and economic aspects. Investment in the arts can be viewed as a major investment in our economy and future prosperity for us all. As Anna Lo stressed at the beginning, the sums involved are small in the context of the overall budget. However, the investment that we make on the back of the motion could have a disproportionate positive effect. In the 1820s, an English political economist, David Ricardo, set out the theory of comparative advantage: Northern Ireland has a comparative advantage in the creative arts. It is something that we are good at, and we should develop that to its full potential. We have the excellent talent — we have mentioned the names already — and we have the culture and the heritage on which to capitalise. We should, arguably, try to build on those areas at a rate ahead of the UK average.

As the Minister has stated, the Arts Council supports about 2,500 jobs. It is larger than any other industry in Northern Ireland. The arts underpin a wider range of creative industries, including design, architecture, fashion, marketing and the media, which amount to around 33,000 jobs. As the Minister has said, that is only 4·7% of our economy, whereas the UK average for those industries is 6·8%. Again, there is huge potential to build on that. Artistic output goes further in branding Northern Ireland. Not all investment in the arts will work, but some investment will produce huge gains for Northern Ireland. That investment is a form of research and development. Overall in Northern Ireland, research and development is a major problem, and we should invest in that for everyone's future.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Before I put the Question on amendment No 1, I advise Members that if amendment No 1 is made, amendment No 2 will fall, and I will proceed to put the Question on the motion as amended.

Question, That amendment No 1 be made, put and negatived.

Question, That amendment No 2 be made, put and negatived.

Main Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly recognises the critical role that the arts can play in promoting a positive international image of Northern Ireland, attracting visitors and growing the local economy and the contribution that community arts make to social cohesion; expresses its alarm that the arts are relatively underfunded per capita in Northern Ireland compared to all other regions in the United Kingdom; and calls upon the Executive to raise the level of arts funding to at least the United Kingdom average within the forthcoming Comprehensive Spending Review.

Irish Language

Mr Speaker: A valid petition of concern in respect of the motion was presented to me on Monday 8 October 2007. Having checked the petition, I regard it as fulfilling the requirements of Standing Order 27, thus allowing the vote to take place at the conclusion of the debate. Members wishing to inspect the petition of concern may do so in the Business Office.

The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for the debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes to propose and 10 minutes to make a winding-up speech. All other Members will have five minutes. One amendment has been selected and published on the Marshalled List. The proposer of the amendment will have 10 minutes to propose and five minutes to wind up. The vote on the motion will be on a cross-community basis, whereas the vote on the amendment will require only a simple majority.

Mr McNarry: I beg to move

That this Assembly reaffirms its support for the recognition given to the Irish language and Ulster-Scots culture through Foras na Gaeilge and Tha Boord o Ulstèr-Scotch as an equitable framework for the expression of these linguistic and cultural traditions; objects to the proposal for an Irish language Act in light of these arrangements; and calls on the First Minister and deputy First Minister to request all members of the Executive Committee to recognise the sensitivities of using the Irish language by refraining from its use in the Assembly Chamber, in Committees and in written communication with MLAs.

At the outset, Mr Speaker, I should state that I accept the amendment. Nine years ago, the Ulster Unionist Party concluded that the 1998 arrangements provided for an equitable framework through which due recognition would be accorded to the Irish language and the Ulster-Scots culture. That matter should have been left at that juncture to allow Tha Boord o Ulstèr-Scotch and Foras na Gaeilge to develop. However, as Members know, the promotion of Irishness was never going to be left there. The 1998 arrangements were seen as merely a means to ram home the abrasive side of republicanism, based on the sentiment that they should bank what they have got, then push hard and demand more.

I see a smile on the face of junior Minister Kelly. I do not know whether he is here to speak in response to the motion, but I hope that he will be speaking for OFMDFM, not for his party.

Since 1998, unionists have been subjected to having the Irish language forced down their throats in an uncompromising and adversarial way. How disappointing it is, therefore, in our country — blessed over a short but unique period of history in the United Kingdom, in which we have contributed to the society of a Union that flows with a rich diversity of cultural traditions and where, in recent times, we have embraced a growing range of ethnic minority traditions — to find conflict manufactured by an Irish-speaking minority, as represented in the House by Sinn Féin, which is forcing an obscene aggression of deliberate defiance right smack into our unionist faces.

The motion reaffirms support for Foras na Gaeilge and Tha Boord o Ulstèr-Scotch. It aims to unite — not divide — the House on current arrangements and to continue to support the significant commitment to fund both bodies. It neither imposes nor implies any threat to the agreed equitable framework; indeed, it is wrong for anyone in the House to suggest otherwise.

The Ulster Unionist Party has not shifted and does not intend to shift its position on the introduction of an Irish language Act. In our opinion, the 1998 arrangements remain the best means of respecting our cultural diversity, of contributing to community cohesion, and of promoting good community relations.

Decisions that were taken at St Andrews were not agreed by the Ulster Unionist Party, but, whatever the truth about who agreed to what, the decision that was taken in itself has served to be profoundly unsettling for unionists and has potentially damaging implications for both community and Assembly relations.

I have no doubt that the responses that the House will hear will be the laments of those who are unwilling to compromise and be practical about the issue. Compared to the lengths that unionists have come since the introduction in 1998 of the arrangements that had the aim of reflecting respect for cultural values and traditions, the lamenters' tunes are old, familiar and played out, and they no longer stack up or impress anyone.

What did the myth makers behind the consultation process try to get away with? They told us that an Irish language Act would have no adverse impact on those who did not speak Irish. However, in this place, even without an Act, unionists are constantly experiencing the effects of an adverse impact, and today we are plainly saying to you that we are having no more of it.

The scribes of scribble and deceit also suggest dangerously that the proposed Act would help build support for, and understanding of, the benefits of promoting and protecting the Irish language. Even those on the opposite side of the House do not believe such nonsense. It completely ignores the political, social and cultural reality that the Irish language is not — I repeat not — viewed as a neutral form of cultural expression.

Look at the sinister side of the Act. Despite the admission by the draftsman that the current demand to have public services delivered through the medium of Irish is, at best, relatively modest, it is proposed that public authorities be duty-bound to prepare a language scheme.

What about the cost? There has been nothing but a failure to even estimate with any accuracy the cost of introducing the legislation. How would the avalanche of Irish-language strangulation be paid for? Will the funding come from cuts in hospitals, or will there be more school closures? Will you take it from the farmers, Ms Gildernew? Will the teachers, parents and pupils pay for it, Ms Ruane? How about putting a cap on social housing, Ms Ritchie? Will the road works be slashed, Mr Murphy? Tell us that.

People have asked me why I have thrown Executive Ministers into the mix over the Irish language. The truth is that I have not thrown anyone into the mix: it is well stirred up, and I am responding to it.

The Ministers' inclusion is a serious issue. I was prompted to include them because on 19 July 2007, the Minister of Education wrote to update me on RPA proposals on the education sector that the Executive accepted. The second page of her letter was all in English, but half of the first page — and half of the last page — was in what I assume was Irish. Obviously, that Minister is incapable of writing in English only. I wrote back saying:

"I find your communications inclusive of Irish intimidating, disrespectful and off-putting. I would respectfully request that in future you would correspond with me in English only."

To date, I have not received a reply to my letter, let alone an acknowledgement.

Hansard records the same Minister, in her opening remarks on the classroom assistants' dispute, which covered 11 paragraphs, speaking in Irish for what I assume was more than 30% of her allocated time. I did not understand any of it. I noted that the Minister did the same thing yesterday.

I am aware of Standing Order 73, which states:

"Members may speak in the language of their choice."

I accept that Members have endorsed their nomination to hold office in a British regional Assembly, and also being Members, may speak in the language of their choice. However Standing Order 73 does not state that Members can communicate in writing in the language of their choice. Therefore, in light of the obvious unionist sensitivities over speaking in Irish, it seems reasonable and forthright to ask the First Minister and his deputy to take stock of those sensitivities, to recognise the serious implications of such, and to request that Ministers refrain from using Irish in the Chamber, in Committees and when communicating in writing.

There is really nothing to get het up about. However, by judging the unwarranted charges tossed about by Sinn Féin, the word "request" seems to have been overlooked. There is no demand, just a request. There is no abuse of anyone's rights, and I reject outright any attempt by any republican to slur any unionist by branding him or her a bigot over the issue. Make no mistake: what has been presented here is a clear, definitive signal that unionists are fed up with the Irish language being thrown in their faces.

Many a time we have been asked to look to the Republic — indeed, we were asked to do that today. I have looked to the Republic, and I am grateful to the Bills Office of the Houses of the Oireachtas. The kindly people in the Houses of the Oireachtas have given me the following information: in 2006, 65 English-only Bills were published; five bilingual Bills were published; and no Irish-only Bills were published. Up to 2 July this year, 41 English-only Bills were published, and no bilingual or all-Irish Bills were published. Not once did a Member of the Houses of the Oireachtas produce, present or publish a Bill in Irish only.

On that formidable and conclusive evidence, I rest my case. I ask the House for its support.

Mr Speaker: I remind Members of two matters. First, the junior Minister is present to represent the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister. Secondly, the remarks of Members must be made through the Chair. Members should have the courtesy to do that.

Mr McCausland: I beg to move the following amendment: After 'Ulster-Scots' insert: "language and" and after 'MLAs' insert:

"and requests that the Official Report uses the same policy for recording the opening words of speeches when they are spoken in Irish as when they are spoken in English."

I am grateful to Mr McNarry for accepting the amendment. Minority languages are part of the cultural wealth of any country, including Northern Ireland. Here in Ulster, we have two minority languages that are indigenous to this place — Ulster Scots and Irish.

The difficulty for many of us is that what should be cultural wealth has been turned by Sinn Féin and others — they are not alone — into a cultural weapon. I believe that the way forward for minority languages is found through the European Charter for Regional or Minority Languages and through the Government's strategy, 'A Shared Future'. 'A Shared Future' sets out a vision for Northern Ireland of equality and diversity. The European Charter for Regional or Minority Languages sets out a linguistic framework for language development.

Under the previous devolved Government, there was a substantial disparity in funding, support and commitment regarding the two languages, in that vast resources were pushed into the Irish language through Foras na Gaeilge, whereas very limited resources, coupled with many imposed difficulties, went to the Boord o Ulster-Scotch.

Therefore, the concept of equality was not there.

2.45 pm

As a result of funding and support during that period, there was capacity to employ a range of workers and build up a head of steam in order to demand an Irish language Act. One must only consider the amount of public money that was paid into organisations such as Pobal to run that campaign. It was no wonder that thousands of signatures could be collected and that events and conferences with international speakers could be organised — it was all done with public money. Unfortunately, the Ulster-Scots community was not supported in the same way.

In the European Charter for Regional or Minority Languages, Ulster Scots has part II status. We can now move forward, and, in a few years, we will be at a point at which Ulster Scots will achieve part III status — on the same level as Irish and entitled to the same provisions. There will be real equality then.

In 2002, under the previous devolved Government, the DCAL adviser on minority languages, who was employed as a consultant, produced a plan to promote the status of Ulster Scots from part II to part III. Tragically, that document sat in the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure, and no one bothered to do anything — it was forgotten. There was no mention of it when the DUP asked for feedback from the inter-departmental charter implementation group. Was it sent to a working group? No, it just gathered dust on a DCAL shelf.

Under devolution, I hope that Members will be able to progress the comprehensive spending review to a point at which the funding for Ulster-Scots reaches parity with Irish. That is what a shared future must be about.

On 10 September 2007, Mrs Carmel Hanna said:

"I ask the Minister to take into consideration, when he looks at the matter, the most recent census figures, which show that around 10% of the population of Northern Ireland speak the Irish language and only 2% speak Ulster Scots."

The census did not ask whether those completing it spoke Ulster Scots. It is remarkable that she knew how many people spoke Ulster Scots when the question was not even asked. The figure of 10% is grossly exaggerated, particularly in light of recent figures from the Republic that show that, even though a proportion of the population has some capacity for the Irish language, those who bother to use it are about a third of Mrs Hanna's figure. I learned French at school, but I never use it.

Concerning Sinn Féin's use of the Irish language and points that were raised about the Irish language

Act, Mr McNarry used some relevant words. He spoke of people ramming the Irish language down other people's throats — he is right about that. Many years ago, the predecessors of the IRA, the Irish Republican Brotherhood, published a magazine called 'Irish Freedom'. In one article, it encouraged every Irish speaker to become — what a great phrase — a "language bigot". The magazine actually advocated bigotry. Therefore, people were compelled to become Irish language bigots and to go around the place and "shove it down their throats" — whether they liked it or not. Sinn Féin's policy today is the same as that which the Irish Republican Brotherhood advocated 100 years ago — nothing much changes.

At the beginning of the Gaelic revival, a few Protestants were involved; however, they soon dropped by the wayside. One need only examine the records of the Glens of Antrim Feis to see that leading republicans were on the platform. It was more political than cultural. The GAA and the Gaelic League have been involved in events such as the Casement commemoration — another republican event. The linkage between the Irish language, Gaelic culture and republicanism spans more than 100 years.

Concerning knowledge of the Irish language, Sinn Féin kindly posts a magazine through the doors in my area every so often. That magazine formerly had an Irish headline in letters an inch and a half large.

However, the last issue that came was called the 'Sinn Féin Bulletin'. Although the "Sinn Féin" bit seems to be Gaelic, the word "Bulletin" is English. The original big banner headline is now a minuscule strapline. That says clearly that the people who were getting the newspaper did not know what it was, because they could not read it.

That is a bit like the case of the Sinn Féin Members who, at the start of the Assembly, were given little crib sheets. Somebody left one in the photocopier, and I picked it up. The crib sheet gave phrases in English with their Irish equivalents — which were also spelled out phonetically, so that the Members would know how to say them. Over the summer, some of those Members went to classes, and now they can actually manage to say a few words. That may be progress linguistically, if not otherwise.

Finally, we added the reference to Hansard because at the start of a speech made by a Sinn Féin Member there are usually five or six words — I will not attempt to pronounce them — which probably mean something like "Thank you, Mr Speaker". However, when I say the same thing in English, it is not recorded. That raises two points. First, if that phrase were removed from the speeches there would be little Irish to record, because that is about the limit of most Sinn Féin Members' knowledge. There are a few fluent Irish-speakers among them, but the bulk of them struggle with their seven or eight words.

Secondly — if we believe in equality — if such phrases are recorded in one language, but not in the primary language of English, who decided that they should be recorded in Irish for Irish-speakers?

Mrs Long: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCausland: I have less than two minutes left, I am sorry.

Finally, if we are to deal with the issue, we need to get rid of the divisiveness, friction and abrasiveness that the Irish language lobby has brought to the matter. We must restore the Irish language to its place in our cultural wealth.

All minority languages are of value wherever they exist, whether they belong to indigenous or ethnic communities. However, indigenous languages are particularly significant, because, if they die out in the countries in which they are spoken, they will not exist elsewhere. If Chinese ceased to be spoken here, it would still be spoken in China, and it would survive. However, if Ulster Scots dies out in Ulster, it will die out completely. The same can be said of Irish. If it dies out as a minority language on the island of Ireland, it will die out. We need to reach a point where those languages are respected, not used as cultural weapons in an abrasive and offensive manner. We can reach that point if we stick to the core principles outlined in the European Charter for Regional or Minority Languages and the Government policy of 'A Shared Future'.

Ms Ni Chuilín: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Agus ba mhaith liom labhairt i gcoinne an mholadh seo. For Nelson, that was: "Thank you, Mr Speaker. I am not supporting this motion."

This motion is divisive, offensive and sinister. The issue of language rights is not controversial in Wales, Scotland, the South of Ireland or throughout Europe. An expression of human rights has become a political football in the battle for supremacy between the unionist parties. The determination of unionist politicians to block any recognition of the Irish language is a misguided and macho demonstration of anti-Irish bigotry. It is almost as if unionism has decided to define itself by how ferociously anti-Irish it has become. That is nothing short of pathetic.

According to the latest census, 75,000 people in the Six Counties speak, read, write and understand Irish. An additional 167,000 people say that they have some knowledge of the Irish language. The increasing demand for Irish-medium education is an indication of the value attached to the language by many families in the North. Those are the plain facts.

The Irish language has a particular relationship with the people of this island. It is an indigenous language, with an unbroken historical line, and it has been spoken here for over 2,000 years. It is part of a common culture; a language that has been shared with Gaelic Scotland for 1,500 years. The names of our mountains, rivers, towns and streets are deeply rooted in the Irish language.

The Irish language is not just a nationalist issue; it is part of the shared cultural heritage of us all. Indeed, the Irish language is rooted in the proud tradition of Presbyterianism, and there are many examples of Presbyterians who viewed the language as an integral part of our shared cultural heritage.

In 2001, the British Government signed up to the European Charter for Regional or Minority Languages. The committee of experts who oversee the implementation of the charter has consistently been critical of the British Government's approach to the rights of Irish language speakers. There has been a deliberate attempt to inflate the likely costs of affording language rights to Irish speakers, and measures to address the historical exclusion of Irish speakers have been presented as an unnecessary burden to the taxpayer. Like many of the arguments that have been deployed, those arguments are also spurious.

Where costs have been incurred, the bottom line for Irish speakers, who are also taxpayers, is that for decades they have been paying towards their own exclusion. The Irish language community is asking to be treated equally with the Welsh language community regarding resources. We need to safeguard the rights of Irish language speakers — the same rights that were part of the Good Friday Agreement, which David McNarry's party supported.

Ba mhaith liom buíochas a thabhairt do Dháithí McNarry. I thank David McNarry, because as a result of his motion, in just one week, the demand for people requesting to find out where their local ranganna Gaeilge or Irish language classes are being held has increased. Therefore, go raibh maith agat, Daithí. Mar fhocal scoir —

Mr McElduff: I want to point out that David McNarry, who proposed the motion, vacated the Chamber as soon as the Sinn Féin Member got up to address the issues contained in his statement.

Ms Ní Chuilín: Go raibh maith agat.

Mar fhocal scoir, ba mhaith liom na rudaí seo a leanas a rá. Mr McNarry should know that a proposed Irish language Act is now with DCAL, and that it will be discussed on 25 October 2007. This motion is a pre-emptive strike, and is unhelpful to us all. Náire ort Sinn Féin is opposed to the motion. Go raibh maith agaibh.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh maith agat. Ba mhaith liom a rá ón tú go bhfuil mé gla in éadan an rúin seo mar nach bhfuil crothán céille leis in aon chor.

At the outset, I express my opposition to the motion. It is not a sensible motion in anyone's language, whether it is Irish, English or Ulster Scots. It seeks to have the First Minister and the deputy First Minister request that members of the Executive Committee refrain from using the Irish language in the Assembly Chamber, in Committees and in written communications with MLAs.

Fiú dá n-iarraidh an Chéad agus an Leas-Chéad Airear airí a léithéid a dhéanamh cén cumhacht a bheadh acu a n-iarraitas a chur i bhfeidhm?

Even if the First Minister and the deputy First Minister were minded to make such a request, what power would they have to enforce it? Such a ban would fly in the face of every piece of human rights and equality legislation that we have — not to mention international charters.

Rachadh sé in aghaidh rialacha an Tionóil féin chomh fada agus atá cead ag bail a rogha teanga a úsáid ach a n-aistriúchán féin dá ndúirt siad a sholáthar.

Indeed, it would go against the rules of this House insofar as Members may use the language of their choice and provide their own translation. That is the convention, and it is observed by Members who use Irish and Ulster Scots, and, therefore, recognises the sensitivities of those who may not understand what is being said.

We should be considering the ways in which Irish speakers are disadvantaged by the rules of the House. As I said, Irish speakers, according to convention, must translate everything that they say into English. In doing so, they lose part of their speaking time.

Tá cosc orainn ceisteanna scríofa nó ruin a chur síos i nGaeilge ach lena cheart a thabhairt don Cheann Comhairle tá geallta aige a scéal sin a inniúcadh.

We are even prohibited from submitting written question or motions in Irish, even if we provide translations. Although, Mr Speaker, to give you credit, you have promised to consider that issue, and I welcome that pledge.

3.00 pm

Mr Speaker, the House should move into the modern age and provide a facility for instantaneous translation, as Assemblies in other parts of the UK do. Instead of trying to curtail cultural rights and diversity, we should be trying to facilitate them. The message that we should send out is that we are open to diversity and we facilitate it, not that we are narrow-minded bigots who cannot share our own cultural traditions. If we cannot share them here, what chance do we have of embracing a wider diversity?

The motion calls on the House to object to the proposal for an Irish language Act. However, Mr McNarry should know that such an Act would have to pass all the legislative stages, including a Committee Stage. He is Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure. Why does he seek to undermine the integrity of that Committee by bringing this motion? Mr McNarry is vociferous when he considers that the Minister or the Department are seeking to undermine the Committee's integrity, yet he brings a motion today that seeks to do that for which he condemns the Minister and the Department. That, Mr Speaker —

Mr McNarry: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. Did you not say, when chastising me, that Members were to address their questions through you and speak through you?

Mr Speaker: Once again, I remind Members, as far as possible, to address their remarks through the Chair.

Mr D Bradley: Mr Speaker, you will have noticed that I have addressed you in name at least five times already.

Mr McElduff: I thank the Member for giving way. I wish to welcome Mr McNarry back into the Chamber. Ba mhaith liom a rá fáilte ar ais. The Sinn Féin Member has spoken: Mr McNarry can now come back into the Chamber.

Mr Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr D Bradley: Mr McNarry's attitude to the debate and to the Committee is utter hypocrisy and points to the shambolic nature of the motion, which calls on people who have no power to do anything, to do nothing. It is a waste of the Assembly's time. Even if the motion were to be carried, it would not change a thing. Members should see Mr McNarry's motion for what it is — a cheap publicity stunt. We should not encourage that sort of thing; we should reject it.

Tréasláim le gach duine sa teach seo a roghnaíonn an Ghaeilge nó n Ultais féin a úsáid, is cuma cá mhéad den teanga atá ar eolas acu. Tá mé cinnte de nach gcuirfidh an rún seo as dóibh agus ta súil agam go mbeidh na háiseanna cuí againn le húsáid na Gaeilge a fhorbairt mar is ceart i ngnó an Tionóil.

Mr Speaker, if you give me the time, I will translate that.

In conclusion, I congratulate every Member who chooses to use Irish, or indeed Ulster Scots, in the Chamber. It does not matter how much of the language they know. I am sure that the motion will not discourage them from doing so, and I look forward to a time when there are facilities in the House for instantaneous translation. Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

Dr Farry: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

[Laughter.]

Mr Kennedy: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. I ask the Mayor of North Down to explain that remark to his constituents.

Dr Farry: As the Mayor of North Down, that well-known hotbed of republicanism, I point out to the Member that, on the mayor's chain of office, and on the crest of the borough of North Down, the place name Bangor appears in Irish as Beannchor, a Cheann Comhairle.

The motion is completely unnecessary. The people of Northern Ireland wonder why we are discussing the motion when so many pressing issues face us, such as health, education, community relations and the classroom assistants' strike.

Does a knockabout over an issue regarding symbols really add to the credit of this Assembly?

I think not. It is a real shame that the situation is such that a petition of concern has been submitted on an issue that does not affect the vast majority of the people of Northern Ireland. That is an interesting statement of the priorities of the Ulster Unionist Party, which follows its proposing the same motion twice.

We must have respect for one another in the Chamber. My colleagues and I do not find a Minister's using Irish in the Chamber, or in a letter, offensive or intimidating. Provided that a translation is supplied, what is the problem? As Mr McCausland said, relatively little Irish is spoken in the Chamber. It is not a big deal and is not holding back the Assembly.

We must avoid a situation whereby the Irish language is associated with republicanism. When that association has been made, it has come from the allegations of unionists. The Irish culture and heritage belongs to us all as part of our shared background. Many place names in Northern Ireland have an Irish root.

Mr McCarthy: Ballygowan.

Dr Farry: Ballygowan, among many others. My Irish is limited, and I will not attempt to speak it again, but I did attend an Irish class when I was at Queen's University. Guess who organised that class? It was the Queen's University Ulster Unionist Association.

[Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Dr Farry: Even Mr McNarry used Irish in his speech today when he referred to the Southern Parliament as the Oireachtas, and he did us all a great discourtesy by not providing a translation of that term.

[Laughter.]

The Alliance Party is happy to discuss an Irish language Act, but our preference would be for an overarching language Bill that would encompass all the languages that are used in Northern Ireland, whether Irish, Ulster Scots, or the growing range of ethnic and minority languages.

We must make a distinction between giving respect, and facilitating people to engage in freedom of expression, in which case duties are placed upon others. Allowing Members to use Irish in the Chamber does not place duties on other Members, but it respects people's rights to exercise part of their identity, and none of us should have a difficulty with that.

The Alliance Party is reassured by the approach that is being taken in relation to the current version of the Irish language Act, under the aegis of the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure. The Alliance Party had major reservations about the rights-based approach that was advanced as part of the initial consultation, which we believe would place substantial burdens on public bodies. The approach of creating language schemes, whereby public bodies have a duty to put in place suitable provision for their user base, is constructive and merits further discussion.

Today's debate is not about the Irish language Act, but about respect for Members of the Assembly and how we relate to one another. Members must send out the message that respect and tolerance is now the ethos of the new Northern Ireland. There is a risk that this motion will drag us back to the old-time politics that many people believed we had moved on from. The Assembly must reject the motion in the strongest terms.

Mr G Robinson: I support the amendment. Sinn Féin, and others, use the Irish language as a political tool and as a political football. Sinn Féin use the Irish language as a means of creating an identity that they can hide behind when they want to whitewash their electorate into thinking that they are still a republican party.

The motion identifies the sensitivities involved in using the Irish language, and it aims to create equality in the Assembly Chamber. The request for only English to be spoken in the Assembly Chamber has been made for sensible and practical reasons, in order to build an environment that is truly shared. There can be no equality when the majority of Members cannot understand what certain Members say, or try to say.

Janet Muller of Pobal said:

"Demanding Irish speakers cease to use the language in public is the language equivalent of telling black people to sit at the back of the bus."

That is a misleading and scurrilous attempt to blind the Assembly and con the public into believing that there is a unionist agenda of language apartheid. Language apartheid is being created only by those Members opposite who deliberately preface their remarks with a statement in Irish, and sometimes pronounce that badly.

There is no doubt that respect for cultural heritage in its various forms is a slow and ongoing project. However, forcing contentious aspects of a culture, which has become closely associated with terrorism, is not the way to gain respect for it. The Members opposite cannot honestly compare the use of Irish — which became closely identified with IRA terrorism, whether they accept that or not — with the use of Ulster Scots by their Protestant neighbours. Is it so difficult for some Members to use the language that they use in everyday conversation in the Building, and, indeed, through which they make the majority of their comments and contributions in the Assembly?

Recently, Members will have become aware that £151,000 of the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety's budget has been wasted in the past five years. I, and many others, have no doubt that that money could have been better utilised to the benefit of all. Members are aware of the tightness of the budget that the Assembly has at its disposal. Small savings in each Department add up to a substantial amount. Those savings can be made immediately and will benefit the whole of Northern Ireland, unlike the sometimes stuttering comments in Irish to which Members are subjected in Assembly debates, Committees and written communications.

The proposal of an Irish language Act is another example of how Sinn Féin has tried to appease the people who elected its members into office. Sinn Féin knows as well as everyone else in the Assembly that there is no way that such a proposal would be passed. The DUP promised its electorate that that would not happen. My party can deliver on its promise. With that in mind, any such proposal can be seen as Sinn Féin's use of part of its culture and heritage as a political device. Sinn Féin knows that an Irish language Act is undeliverable. That is tantamount to an abuse of the trust that its electorate has put in the party.

I sincerely hope that the amendment is carried and that the ridiculous speculation on an Irish language Act can be put behind us. We are an English-speaking nation. In the context of Northern Ireland, the Irish language is a highly divisive issue that is used to inflame and to cultivate political sport. Scots Gaelic and Welsh are not used in that way, and are more popular in their respective countries than Irish is in Northern Ireland. I support the amendment.

Mr Brolly: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

Caithfidh mé a rágo gcuireann an rún seo díoma or magus go mór mór ós rud é go bhfuil sé curtha inár láthair ag fear a bhfuil breá Gaelach air – Dáithí McNarry, agus tá sé as láthair arís.

I am disappointed by the motion, especially as it was brought to the House by a man who carries a fine Gaelic surname: David McNarry. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order, Members. Order.

Mr Brolly: Tá sloinne breá Gaelach orm féin agus tá mé cinnte nach gcuirfidh sé ionadh ar dhuine ar bith sa teach seo go bhfuil mé ag éirí i mo sheasamh chun labhairt go láidir agus go teann in éadan an ruin sheafóidigh seo.

I carry a fine Gaelic surname as well. I am sure that no one will be surprised that I speak strongly and firmly against this pointless motion.

Is féidir go bhfaca cuid agaibh na páistí scoile agus a múinteoirí taobh amuigh den fhoirgneamh seo ag am loin ag déanamh agóide i gcoinne an rúin seo. Tá na daltaí sin i measc ceithre mhíle acu atá ag staidéar trí mheán na Gaeilge ar chuig scoil agus seasca ar fud an Tuaiscirt agus tá na huimhreacha sin ag ardú ó bhliain go bliain.

Perhaps some Members saw the children who assembled in protest outside the Building at lunchtime. Those children are among 4,000 who study through the medium of Irish in 65 schools across the North — a number that is growing from year to year.

Briseann an moladh seo rialacha an Tionóil. Briseann an moladh seo Comhaontú Aoine an Chéasta maidir leis an teanga. Briseann an moladh seo an chairt Eorpach a thacaíonn le ceart an duine an Ghaeilge a fhoghlaim agus a labhairt.

The motion breaks the rules of the Assembly. It breaks those rights enshrined in the Good Friday Agreement regarding language and it breaks the European Charter for Regional or Minority Languages, which supports the right of people to learn and to speak Irish.

3.15 pm

Mr D Bradley: The Ulster Unionist Party, of which Mr McNarry is a member, signed up to the Good Friday Agreement, which stated that the Government should:

- “ • take resolute action to promote the language;
- facilitate and encourage the use of the language in speech and writing and in public and private life where there is appropriate demand;
- seek to remove, where possible, restrictions which would discourage or work against the maintenance or development of the Irish language;”.

Does the Member agree that it seems that the Ulster Unionist Party is now posing as an anti-agreement party?

Mr Brolly: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Go raibh maith agat, a Dhominic.

I thank Dominic for his intervention and for that very useful information.

Tá an ceart chun teangacha dúchasacha a úsáid aitheanta go hidirnáisiúnta agus ní féidir le ciníochas frith-Ghaeilge nó páirtithe polaitiúla ceart mhuintir Thuaisceart na hÉireann a dhiúltú. Ní cóir ach oiread do dhuine ar bith sa teach seo nó taobh amuigh de gan meas a bheith aige ar an Ghaeilge, ar Ghaeilgeoirí agus ar lucht tacaíochta na Gaeilge.

The right to use indigenous languages is recognised internationally, and no racist, anti-Gaelic racist, or political parties have the right to deny the people of the North of Ireland their right. It is not proper for people in the House, or outside it, to show disrespect for the Irish language, Irish speakers or supporters of the Irish language.

Cinntíonn an rún seo agus an drochaigne a ghin é go bhfuil acht láidir agus éifeachtach de dhíth ar an Ghaeilge gan mhoill.

The motion and the ill-will that gave birth to it reinforce the need for a strong and effective Irish language Act, as soon as possible.

Tá mé ag iarraidh oraibh go léir anseo inniu vótáil in éadan an rúin seo. Go raibh míle maith agaibh.

Mr Speaker: Before I call the next Member to speak, I will clarify a point that has been made about the motion. The motion does not break the rules of the House. The motion is competent, and I must put that on the record.

Mr Shannon: There should be little doubt about the importance that I place on the celebration of culture and heritage. People cannot know where they are going until they know where they have been. There is not — and should not be — anyone in the Chamber who is opposed to the expression of a culture, as long as the expression of that culture is dignified and is carried out in an appropriate manner.

There is no doubt that, in order to give our young people a sense of self-worth and national pride, they should be made aware of their history and roots. I congratulate Foras na Gaeilge and Tha Boord o Ulster-Scotch for their hard work in the promotion of those objectives. Both bodies work hard to achieve their aims, which are the promotion of language and culture, and both are successful in those aims. For that reason, the Irish language Act is redundant, as it calls for the promotion of the Irish language and culture — that is the purpose of Foras na Gaeilge.

To push for more than the stated aims of Foras na Gaeilge is nothing to do with the love of culture and heritage. It has more to do with the love of political machinations and expression of anti-British malice. It is an attempt to stir up resentment and emotions, while achieving no gains in the promotion or development of Northern Ireland.

Do some Members think that the boards are not doing enough to promote culture and heritage? Do they lack belief in the ability of those hired to do the job and achieve the aims of those organisations?

I find that hard to believe, given that Assembly Members are instrumental in running the boards. What need is there for an Irish language Act to carry out that which should already be being successfully carried out by the bodies that are currently in place.

As I have said, the motives behind the call for such an Act must be examined, and I firmly believe that those motives are harmful to progress in Northern Ireland. Rather than making people more open and receptive to the Irish culture, the manner and the means by which this matter is being approached is alienating and intimidating the majority of people in Northern Ireland.

That bullying approach will, in no way, soften the Province's population or encourage it to embrace that language — rather, it is having the opposite effect. That, of course, is the intention. There is no real honest intention for Northern Ireland to step forward in celebration together. Rather, an Irish language Act is a political statement, which would be a waste of money, and which many in the Province would find too insulting to overlook.

That type of mentality and endeavour can have no place in a Chamber to which we are elected to serve and represent the needs of the Province as a whole — not to place one section of the community above the other. There is no fairness and equality in doing that. Surely the equitable approach would be to use the money that is set to be wasted on that unnecessary Act on something that would benefit the whole Province, rather than isolate the majority of the people who live here.

It is my personal belief that both language bodies are successful in their endeavours. Indeed, the young public in my constituency recently benefited from the hard work of the Ulster-Scots Agency in organising a fitba coaching day with David Healy, during which football and language were taught with equal skill. That day was thoroughly enjoyed by all. That is the way in which language should be promoted — in a way that is fun, informative and pleasurable. That is where the Ulster-Scots Agency is thriving. In linking the past to the present, and then to the future, we can be secure in the celebration of our heritage in ways that do not exclude any members of the community. That celebration was not exclusive; people from all areas of the Strangford constituency, and of all political affiliations and religious views, participated in that event, which had no political emphasis — it was merely a day of information and fun. That should be the aim of the promotion of culture and heritage, which should be free from political statement and machination.

It is clear to anyone in the Chamber that the Irish language Act and its connotations are aggressive in nature. We are well past the point in Northern Ireland where the aggression of one section of society should impact on so many others.

Northern Ireland does not have funds to throw about willy-nilly — so much needs to be done to its infrastructure and on the essentials. Wasting money on a political statement that offends and upsets the majority of people in the Province cannot be, and should not be, considered.

I support the amendment and ask the Assembly to look past the political machinations of one sector and to concentrate our effort, attention and funds on matters that will benefit all the people of the Province.

Mr K Robinson: Herr Sprecher, Ich danke Sie für Ihr verstanden. Ja, meine Damen und Herren, und beliebten Mitglieder, will Ich in Englisch sprechen.

I support the motion standing in the name of my colleague David McNarry. In doing so, I ask Members to read the motion carefully. It contains a generous recognition of the cultural diversity of our society. It also notes the carefully constructed framework that supports an equitable approach to those linguistic and cultural traditions.

The motion further seeks to streamline the work and improve the effectiveness of the Assembly by indicating areas in which the use of one of those languages — in the Chamber, in Committee and in written communication — adds to costs and impinges on the most constructive use of the time available for conducting our business.

There is not a Member in the House who will not admit that shortage of time is a major obstacle to our workload. How many Committee members are engaged in meetings that last up to three hours in an attempt to cope with the huge workloads? Just look at the forward work programmes for those Committees and remember that we have not yet begun to scrutinise legislation, clause by clause and line by line. Dare I remind Members that that business will be conducted in the working language of this House and this society — the language that all immigrants and overseas workers who arrive on our shores seek to master in order to integrate and prosper.

A few years ago, I had the pleasure of attending the annual conference of the Irish National Teachers' Organisation, which was held in Newry. During that event, which, in those days, would not normally have been attended by unionist politicians, I had the good fortune to sit beside the president of the union. He spoke fluent Irish in a most melodic and pleasant manner. However, for me, he highlighted the difference between the melodic intonation of the Gaeltacht and that harsh, staccato "Jailtacht" variant that has been instilled into certain parts of the Province.

A former employee of this estate, who was also a native Irish speaker from the Republic, told me how he listened to the attempts of Members of a previous Assembly to speak to him in Irish. Their pronunciation and structure were wrong, and their words were not those that a fluent speaker would naturally use. We also had the interesting spectacle of two Members on the opposite Benches disagreeing in Irish until one of them quickly ran out of words. The winner of that pan-nationalist struggle was a native of the Gaeltacht. My former colleague and Irish speaker Ian Adamson had many a chuckle as he analysed the attempts of the Members on the opposite Benches to speak in Irish. A Southern unionist visitor to the Public Gallery explained to me that certain speeches that she heard in the Chamber were delivered in less than impressive Irish. Although that can be readily understood, for many there is a more sinister side to the desire to use Irish.

Unionists know what Sinn Féin's underlying traditional aim is in its promotion of Irish. In saying that, our so-called unionist paranoia is not kicking in; rather, I am describing the vision of a namby-pamby, Brit-loving, Treaty-signing Free Stater — none other than "The Big Fellow" himself. That vision was recalled by a former head of research for the Soldiers of Destiny in a lecture that was reported by 'The Sunday Times' on 9 March 1997. It pointed out that Collins's vision for Ireland was no different from that of de Valera. Collins asserted that:

"We are now free in name. The extent to which we become free in fact and secure our freedom will be the extent to which we become Gaels again... We can fill our minds with Gaelic ideas, and our lives with Gaelic customs, until there is no room for any other... The most completely anglicised person in Ireland will look to Britain in vain."

That is why Irish is still being used and abused, not as a cultural expression, but as a weapon of exclusion. I support the motion and Nelson McCausland's amendment.

Mr McGlone: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

Seasaim chun labhairt in éadan mholadh David McNarry.

Ní chuidíonn an moladh le híomhá an Chomhthionáil mar áit inar chóir fáilte bheith roimh gach duine agus inar cheart aitheantas don teanga agus iolrachas bheith á léiriú agus á aithint go hoifigiúil. A mhalaírt ar fad, go díreach.

Agus, is tábhachtaí fós, ní chuidíonn moladh den chineál seo agus aon sort díospóireacht conspóideach, nimhneach le cur chun cinn na Gaeilge, ná le meas ar teanga ná cultúr ar bith.

Mr McNarry's motion does the opposite of enhancing the impression of the Assembly as a place where everyone should be welcome and where, as of right, the language and cultural diversity should be officially on display and recognised for all to see. More importantly, the motion — and any controversial or poisonous debate — does absolutely nothing to promote the Irish language and, consequently, to promote respect for any language or culture.

Reverend Martin Brennan, writing in 'A View of the Irish Language', says that:

"Language is indeed primarily a means of communication. It unites two minds in the common possession of an idea given and received, held in common. Because of this power to unite minds it must have something of the spiritual in itself, in spite of the evidently material nature of the symbols it uses to convey the ideas. The spiritual aspect of language gives it a depth and a dimension that a merely material medium could never share. Language is not a mere code, a sort of intellectual coinage where each unit, each word, has a set value and is capable of fitting into a sort of mental slot-machine to give a mechanical result."

Baineann sé sin le gach teanga – an Ghaeilge ina measc. That applies to every language — including Irish — where history, music and literature are concerned.

3.30 pm

Today, a distinction has been made between the funding and the recognition of the Irish language. Mr Shannon referred to funding; that is one mechanism, and it is welcome and important. However, we need formal, statutory, legislative recognition for the identity of the communities.

Le bheith fírinneach linn féin – baintear úsáid as an Ghaeilge gach lá — in fact, Irish is used every day — Carrickfergus, Annaghmore, Mullaghmore, Garvaghy, Gort, Keady — go díreach ón Ghaeilge — those names are taken straight from Irish.

Difference can be either an excuse for division and all the prejudice that underpins it, or a reason for a society to embrace plurality and emerge all the richer for it.

Tá mé ag obair ar son tire a ghlacann an bunphrionsabal sin go hiomlán ar bord. I will continue to work for a country that enshrines those basic principles in their entirety.

Cuirimse in éadan an rúin.

I oppose the motion. Go raibh maith agat.

The junior Minister (Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister) (Mr G Kelly): Am bye hairtfelt glaid tae bae complutherin at tha forgeitherin o tha semmlie.

I am glad to be in the Chamber to speak on this important issue. I welcome the opportunity to respond to the debate, and I have listened with interest to the contributions. I am glad that Mr McNarry pointed out that I am speaking as the junior Minister for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister.

The proposer of the motion is correct in saying that the Ulster-Scots Agency, Tha Boord o Ulstèr-Scotch, is the main vehicle for the promotion of Ulster-Scots language and cultural issues, and that Foras na Gaeilge provides that function for the Irish language.

Is Tionól reigiunda é an tionól sear chíuseanna an chairt agus cur I gcíoch an chairt taobh istigh dá nobraidí.

Beidh á fhios ag na baill go bhfuil sé iontach soiléir sna hordaithe seasta go bhfuil cead ag Baill labhairt í dteanga a rogha féin – cludaíonn seo na Baill nuair a labhrann said mar Airí, the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure has undertaken two consultation processes, from December 2006 to June 2007, on proposals for Irish-language legislation. The second consultation, which ran from March to June 2007, sought views on a number of possible draft clauses. The clauses gave an indication of what shape the legislation might take.

The Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006 places a duty on the Executive to adopt a strategy setting out how it proposes to enhance and protect the development of the Irish language. The general aim of the legislation, as presented in the second consultation, was to enhance and protect the Irish language in the North through supporting its use in the provision of public services. The approach set out in the draft clauses was based mainly on a language-scheme model. A comparable model to that is the scheme that was adopted by public bodies under the equality duty — section 75 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998.

The draft legislation proposed the creation of a duty on public authorities to prepare a language scheme, specifying the measures that they would take on the use of the Irish language in the provision of their services. In addition to that, a Cheann Comhairle, it proposed that a person would be able to use Irish in legal proceedings in courts and tribunals sitting in the North, subject to the provision of notice and the interests of justice.

Draft provision had also been included to enable certain statutory forms to be made available in Irish. Over 90% of the 11,000 responses to the second consultation on Irish-language legislation have been processed. It is expected that a summary of those consultation responses will be published later in the autumn.

There are also obligations arising from commitments that the Government made when the European Charter for Regional or Minority Languages was ratified. I note that the proposers of the motion and the amendment support that charter. The charter highlights the need to base policies, legislation and practice on the principles of recognising, promoting and encouraging the use of Irish and Ulster Scots in order to preserve and safeguard both. It also includes a commitment to take “resolute action” to promote languages such as Irish and Ulster Scots.

For the purposes of the charter, the Assembly is a regional assembly and is responsible for the implementation of the charter in its operations. The Assembly's Standing Orders also state that Members may speak in the language of their choice. That also applies when Members speak as Ministers. Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

Mr McNarry: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. In case the Chairperson of the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure makes another point about my absence, I must say that I am heartily sickened to hear a Minister of this institution speaking in Irish.

Mr Speaker: That is not a point of order.

Mr G Kelly: Tá sé ceart agus coir don bhall an méid atá fáite aige nó aici é a aistriú go Béarla má tá sé/sí ag caint as Gaeilge nó I dteanga ar bith eile. Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

It is, however, a convention that any statements made in a language other than English, are translated fully and accurately by the Member immediately afterwards, as I have been doing. The use of Irish or Ulster Scots in correspondence — for example, in letter headings or salutations — is a matter for each individual Minister.

Slán go fóill. As go brách leat.

Braitheann sé ar an Aire más maith leis nó léi teanga or bith eile a úsáid I gcomhfhreagais oifigiúla.

I make the point that David McNarry did not walk out when I was speaking in Ullans.

Go raibh míle maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

Mr Campbell: I intend fully to utilise my allotted five minutes. There have been several complete misconceptions about the amended motion. A Sinn Féin Member described it as blocking any manifestation of Irishness. Another Sinn Féin Member described the motivation behind the motion as “racist”.

Mr McGlone quoted a Minister who said that Irish should be a means of communication. Of those who spoke against the motion, his was the most sensible quote that I heard all day. Language is precisely that and, if no one can understand the means of communication, what is the point in using it — unless as a political weapon? Members who say that they speak Irish — whether they took a crash course over the summer and missed some classes or are proficient — use it each and every time that they speak in the Assembly. People do not understand the words that are being used, never mind the impact of what they are trying to say. If not to make a political point, what is the point of speaking Irish?

Mr Farry referred to various Irish appendages on the mayoral chain of North Down Borough Council, and I am sure that there are others. Other Members weighed in with Irish place names, the relevance of which totally escapes me.

Today's motion asks Ministers to ensure that when they communicate to Assembly Members and the public they do so in a language that people can understand. Why on earth such a request should be described as “racist” or an attempt to block any manifestation of Irishness is totally beyond me.

Less than a month ago, and in answer to my question, the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure, who has responsibility for the Irish language, outlined that last year some £17 million of taxpayers' money was spent on the promotion of Irishness — in comparison to the £600,000 that was spent on the promotion of Ulster Scots. How can expenditure on Irish that is 30 times greater than on Ulster Scots block any manifestation of Irishness? The people who talk about equality will get it: the DUP is committed to that.

When the bullseye is hit, we get a response. That is good, and I hope that we will get more of that — in a language that I understand. I am happy to take that on the chin, whether it is on a ferry, in the Chamber, or elsewhere.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Campbell: I will not leave and come back when the heat is off. Jim Shannon talked about an equitable approach, and that is what we are seeking. The mover of the amendment made that point very well.

No one who opposes the motion has attempted to address the anomaly that exists whereby Members who begin their speeches in Irish have their words recorded in Hansard, yet those of us who begin our speeches in English do not. They did not refer to that, but that is equality. We intend to see that matter through.

The junior Minister referred to the outline of any proposed language Act, and he spent some time doing that. It is precisely because of the content of any Irish language Act that there will not be one.

Mr Kennedy: Thank you for the opportunity to make a winding-up speech on the motion. In spite of the way in which the motion was unhelpfully heralded and trumpeted in some quarters, particularly by Sinn Féin representatives, with references to black people at “the back of the bus”, it has been an interesting debate.

The debate has been largely free from any element of real viciousness — we will have to wait a bit longer for that. However, the context of the debate — and let me be clear and inform the House yet again, because the proposer of the motion went to great pains to make the point clear, and it clearly was not heard, and some people are not good at listening —

Mr McElduff: Especially if they have left the room.

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mr Kennedy: Mr McElduff may regard himself as the self-appointed attendance officer of the Assembly, but if he takes some time to listen, he may become better informed. The Ulster Unionist Party respects cultural diversity, as a key foundation for a stable, peaceful, pluralist society.

Northern Ireland's unique history in the United Kingdom and the British Isles has given to our society a rich diversity of cultural traditions — British, Northern Irish, Anglo-Irish, Irish, Ulster Scots and, in recent years, a growing and welcome range of ethnic-minority traditions. A framework that fosters respect for that diversity contributes to community cohesion and to good community relations. That is the starting point of the Ulster Unionist Party on those issues. That is why we believe that the arrangements that were agreed in 1998 provided principles and architecture that facilitated a growing respect for our society's cultural diversity. In particular, recognition was afforded to the Irish language and Ulster-Scots culture through Foras na Gaeilge and Tha Boord o Ulstèr-Scotch. It was there to provide an equitable framework for the expansion —

Mr Elliott: Does the Member agree that if the Irish language is treated in a respectful and appropriate manner, in the same way as other languages, it can be respected by everyone in the Chamber and outside it? In Fermanagh this evening the chairman of Fermanagh District Council, who is a unionist, will present Irish-language bursaries on behalf of the council. That is progress, and that is respect for what is right.

Mr Kennedy: I thank the Member for his well-made point, which highlights again that the allegations of racism and bigotry that were promoted, principally, by Sinn Féin representatives in the Chamber today are completely wide of the mark.

The decision at St Andrews by the political parties — including the DUP — to introduce an Irish language Act is profoundly unsettling and potentially has very damaging implications for community relations and for respect for cultural diversity. Any person who claims that an Irish language Act would have only a positive impact on community relations demonstrates a wilful ignorance of the views that a wide range of political and community stakeholders in Northern Ireland hold.

3.45 pm

Historically, Sinn Féin has used the Irish language as a political tool. It continues to do so, which does a huge disservice to those people who are genuinely interested in the language and its cultural diversity. The Irish language is severely hampered by Sinn Féin continuing to use it in that way. In many ways —

Mrs Long: Will the Member give way?

Mr Kennedy: I am sorry; I do not have enough time.

In many ways, Sinn Féin uses the Irish language as a kind of warped ideological jihad. That is the overwhelming perception of the unionist population and unionist representatives in the House.

On the subject of Ministers who use Irish in correspondence, I recently had occasion to write to the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development about a bull. It was a local bull, but when I got the reply, the writing appeared to be bullish. I was greeted with “Danny, a chara” and “Is mise” at the end of the letter. I was not interested in that; I was more interested in her doing something for the owner of the bull, but that did not happen.

The debate has been sensible. Mr McNarry outlined his concerns very well and again underlined that the Ulster Unionist Party regards the 1998 settlement of those issues as final.

I welcome and accept Mr McCausland's amendment. He rightly pointed to the European Charter for Regional or Minority Languages and expressed a concern about the disparity in funding between Irish and Ulster Scots. The other interesting aspect of his speech was that he learned French as a young person but no longer uses it, particularly not in the Chamber.

As the round table went around, Carál Ní Chuilín — if that is not the right pronunciation, it is my fault — again accused those in favour of the motion of being racist, almost to the point of their being very bigoted. She also reminded the Chamber of the link between the Irish language and the Presbyterian tradition. I again thought of my great-granddaddy Jones Black, who was a very competent Irish speaker many years ago, but, because of various influences, did not pass that on through the family. The Assembly must ensure — [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mr Kennedy: The Assembly must ensure that, when Irish is taught, it is not being done so to be used as a political tool. Mr Dominic Bradley, a Member for Newry and Armagh, got himself into a lather and shouted at Mr McNarry in particular, who left at one point. [Laughter.] He then accused the UUP of being narrow-minded bigots.

The Mayor of North Down then made an intervention with Irish translations, which confirmed that people in Bangor could never spell. [Interruption.] I meant that some people in Bangor could never spell. [Laughter.]

Like George Robinson, I was greatly offended before and during the debate by the suggestion that the sentiment of the motion equated to a blacks-at-the-back-of-the-bus culture. That was a directly offensive and outrageous remark, which has no basis.

Mr Brolly clearly knows the difference between chuckle and our la — or whatever it is — and he treated the House to what some might regard as an Irish-speaking master class. However, it was lost on me because I was unable to translate it.

Mr Shannon confirmed that there is no need for an Irish language Act, and he stated that the Irish language is sometimes used to intimidate and bully.

I compliment my colleague Ken Robinson who opened his speech in German and reminded the House that there are genuine lovers and speakers of the Irish language who use it responsibly.

The junior Minister Mr Kelly set out, on behalf of the Executive, his factual views on the issue.

I agree with Gregory Campbell's comments about the means of communication. The language of communication in the Chamber is English. People should understand that, respect it and get on with it.

Mr McElduff: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. Mr Kennedy made a comment about people in Bangor not being able to spell. Bangor is in North Down, which is the only constituency in which the Ulster Unionist Party held on to its MP. It may be in danger of losing that constituency if it continues to insult the people of Bangor.

Mr Speaker: That is not a point of order.

Mr A Maginness: Mr Speaker, I have a serious point of order, and I would ask you to give a ruling later. Members have witnessed one Member going in and out of the Chamber during the debate. Not only was the Member going in and out, he was also the proposer of the motion that gave rise to the debate. In any other parliamentary institution, there would be at least some comment — if not censure — on that Member. The Member did what he did for ostensibly political reasons and not for any reasonable excuse. Mr Speaker, I ask you to give a ruling later as to whether those actions were a discourtesy to the Assembly. I also ask that rules are enacted in the future to censure a Member who carries out such acts.

Mr Speaker: I appreciate the Member raising that point of order and I will bring back my ruling to the House as soon as possible.

Mr McNarry: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. Are you accepting that as a point of order?

Mr Speaker: What was your point of order, Member? I did not hear it.

Mr McNarry: Thank you for the invitation to get to my feet again, Mr Speaker. My point of order is to ask whether you are accepting the last point as a point of order and will be bringing a ruling to the House?

Mr Speaker: I stated clearly that I will bring a ruling to the House as soon as possible.

Mr McNarry: Mr Speaker — [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: I ask the Member to take his seat. I want no further discussion on the issue.

Mr O'Dowd: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. Is it appropriate for a Member to question the ruling of the Speaker?

Mr Speaker: It is not, and I came close to saying that. [Interruption.]

Order. The Member came very close to questioning the ruling of the Speaker.

I remind Members that the amendment only requires a simple majority.

Sex Offenders

4.15 pm

Mr Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for this debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes to propose and 10 minutes to make a winding-up speech. All other Members who wish to speak will have five minutes. Two amendments have been received and published on the Marshalled List. The proposer of each amendment will have 10 minutes to propose and five minutes to make a winding-up speech.

Mr Butler: I beg to move

That this Assembly expresses concern at the disparity in child protection regulations and the registration of sexual offenders across the island of Ireland; and calls for an early North-South Ministerial Council cross-departmental sectoral meeting, including the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, the Department of Education and the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister to address the disparity.

Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle.

The most fundamental right that children on the island of Ireland should have is the right to be safe. Those of us who were elected to the Assembly, and those elected to the Oireachtas in the South of Ireland, have a responsibility to safeguard our children. Tá áthas orm as an deis a phlé an ábhar tabhachtach seo sa Tionól inniu.

Any approach to child protection must be based on the rights of the children on this island, regardless of which jurisdiction they live in. Both Governments have a clear duty to protect citizens, children and young people. The rights of the child must be paramount. The Irish and British Governments have signed up to the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child. That is the standard that they must reach.

Taking the border out of child protection is the challenge for both Governments. We must have a borderless country when it comes to the protection of children. The North/South Ministerial Council provides an opportunity to introduce protective measures. The North/South Ministerial Council must address the issue that we have two different legal and child protection systems and processes on the island.

Tá a fhios agam fosta go bhfuil fabhdh idir an tír seo agus An Bhreatain agus ar fud na hEorpa i dtaca leis an cheist seo.

I accept that the difficulties we face on the island of Ireland are also reflected in the different jurisdictions in Europe, and between Britain and Ireland. There is a need for that situation also to be addressed.

Glacfaidh muid leis an leasú atá ag an Alliance i dtaca leis an mholadh seo.

Two amendments have been tabled; the one proposed by the Alliance Party recognises that there is a problem not just between the two jurisdictions in Ireland, but between Ireland and Britain, and right across Europe.

Sinn Féin's long-standing objective has been the introduction of an all-Ireland sex offenders register. My party has been to the forefront in demanding an all-Ireland register as the most effective way of protecting our children. A single all-Ireland body should be responsible for holding standardised child protection information.

Nuair a bhí Mairtín Mac Aonghusa agus Bairbre de Brún ina hAí sa Tionól deireanach, rinne said iarracht ar an cheist tabhachtach seo a réiteach.

When Martin McGuinness and Bairbre de Brún were Ministers in the last Assembly, they initiated a process to allow for the setting up of an all-Ireland register to protect children, young people and vulnerable adults. There must be an all-Ireland approach to eradicating sex crime. That is why Sinn Féin has tabled this motion: we want an effective and integrated all-Ireland sex offenders register.

At present, a paedophile arrested in one jurisdiction on this island is not automatically included on the register of the other. That is worrying. Sex offenders are taking advantage of the loophole. We have a situation in Ireland where convicted sex offenders can move from one jurisdiction to another and legally seek work with children. There is already a battery of legislation to combat sex crime. However, there is a serious question about the effectiveness of the present system and the proper application of existing powers. There is a need for more powers, and for effective all-Ireland legislation to deal with the matter.

Sinn Féin wants to see the establishment of a single all-Ireland body responsible for holding standardised child protection information, supported by the Department of Health here, the Department of Health and Children in the South, and the Departments of Education in both jurisdictions. That body could also work within wider EU and global contexts, given that the issue is not confined to these islands. That is reflected in the amendments to the motion that have been tabled.

Sex abusers know no boundaries. It is vital that a key tool for protecting children and young people should not be confined by borders. The loophole still presents clear dangers and needs to be closed. It is disgraceful that a paedophile convicted in one jurisdiction on this island does not automatically appear on the sex offenders register in the other part of the country.

In recent years, high-profile cases have underlined the seriousness of the issue. The Bichard inquiry was established to examine the handling of Ian Huntley, who was convicted of the Soham murders, with which we are all familiar. That case gave impetus to the need for criminal justice agencies and, in particular, the police to be enabled to share information.

On the island of Ireland there have been several high-profile cases. Vincent McKenna was convicted of abusing his daughter Sorchá McKenna. At that time, her family appealed for a change in the law. Mary McCleary, Sorchá's grandmother said that changes were necessary in order to stop sex offenders who were jailed in the South — such as Vincent McKenna — moving to the jurisdiction of the North.

Paul Redpath is a convicted paedophile who broke his probation by fleeing to the South of Ireland, where he was free because Garda had no power to arrest him. That case highlighted that the border was being used by sex offenders to evade justice, and underlined that police services and agencies had inadequate statutory legal powers to track sex offenders who moved from one jurisdiction to the other. Furthermore, it underlined the need for a change in the legislation and policies in relation to sex offences on both sides of the border. Last week, the arrest in the South of one of Britain's most-wanted sex offenders, John Murrell, again emphasised that sex offenders from other jurisdictions see the South of Ireland as a safe haven.

In November 2006 the British and Irish Governments agreed a new protocol to track sex offenders who may attempt to evade detection by travelling out of Ireland or Britain. That initiative came in the wake of the controversy generated by sex offender Paul Redpath, who broke his probation conditions by moving from the North to the South of Ireland where he could not be arrested. Under that agreement, police services on both islands will share and impart information on all sex offenders who plan to travel between Britain and Ireland.

An intergovernmental advisory group on registered sex offenders was established to enable continued and close co-operation in the exchange of information between Britain and Ireland. However, that memorandum of understanding between the Governments does not create binding legal obligations between Britain and Ireland.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr McClarty] in the Chair)

The decision to establish a memorandum of understanding between the British and Irish Governments is a welcome and important first move; however, it must also serve as a catalyst for a full harmonisation of powers to protect children and young people on this island.

The next logical step to the process is a comprehensive all-Ireland policy. Sex offenders in the South are now subject to a new risk analysis before they are released from prison, or serve their sentences in the community. The system will determine the risk that offenders pose to community and will help in the formation of a plan to deal with that risk. The measure is part of an all-Ireland system for tracking and monitoring paedophiles and sex offenders.

Our border is shared by two jurisdictions, and sex offenders and paedophiles take advantage of that. In the North over 700 paedophiles and sex offenders are monitored, 43 of whom are classed as high-risk. To take the border out of child protection is the challenge for both Governments on this island. We must have a borderless country when it comes to the protection of children. A thorough, systematic and effective way of dealing with child abuse is needed on this island. We need changes to the law, better co-operation between the PSNI and the Garda and effective legislation on both parts of the island. Go raibh maith agat.

Mr Buchanan: I beg to move amendment No 1: Leave out all after “offenders” and insert

“between Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland; recognises the threat that can arise when sex offenders from Northern Ireland move to Great Britain; and calls for full co-operation from all relevant departments to address these matters.”

I propose the amendment to provide a broader scope and to include the UK when dealing with the issues before the House today.

4.30 pm

I am sure that the protection of children from sexual abuse is a matter that lies close to the hearts of all Members. Too often, when we open our newspapers, turn on our televisions, or listen to the news headlines, we read or hear of another appalling incident in which a child or young person has been the unfortunate victim of sexual abuse — incidents that occasionally result in that young person's death. Such harrowing incidents not only instil fear and anger in communities, but provide a wake-up call that much more needs to be done to protect children and young people from such violent offenders.

Primary responsibility for safeguarding children rests with their parents, who should ensure that they are safe from danger and free from risk in their homes. However, given the society in which we live, where the family unit has been disregarded and many children are raised by single-parent families, there is an even greater need for full co-operation and a strategic approach from all relevant Departments in order to safeguard our children.

Today's 'Belfast Telegraph' carries yet another harrowing story. The headline is “Monster raped me at age 13”. A teenager has courageously spoken out about a vile attack that has ruined his life — a horror that he can never forget. That is the type of abuse that some young people must endure without their families' knowledge. Indeed, sometimes, such vile abuse is carried out by a close and trusted family friend. What is the testimony to such a horrific ordeal? The victim tells us that he endures flashbacks, nightmares that continually disturb his sleep, and torment that has driven him to attempt suicide on three occasions.

Recently, the House debated the problem of suicide, particularly among the young. The Health Committee is currently dealing with that issue. Could it be that sexual abuse is a contributory factor to the high rate of suicide? Young victims may be unable or too ashamed to express their feelings to close family members, which results in such pain welling up inside them that they are driven to suicide. That reinforces the fact that urgent action is required to deal with this matter.

The disparity in child-protection and sexual-offender regulations between Northern Ireland and the Republic must be addressed. The Assembly must ensure that, wherever possible, legislation and policies on those issues work effectively on both sides of the border. A weakness that has been identified is that the Republic of Ireland does not have the same management arrangements for sex offenders as Northern Ireland, where strict arrangements for both the assessment and management of such offenders are already in place.

Multi-agency sex-offender risk-assessment and risk-management processes, which involve the PSNI, the Probation Board for Northern Ireland, the Prison Service, the Housing Executive and representatives from the voluntary sector, help to protect children and reduce opportunities for offenders to gain access to potential victims. Although the register of violent sex offenders, which was launched by the PSNI in January 2006, allows information to be shared on violent sexual offenders on a UK-wide database, a loophole in the law means that such offenders can evade serving their full sentences and can be released on probation back into the community. That has been witnessed recently in the case of Billy Adams in England and in today's 'Belfast Telegraph'.

Mr Weir: I am glad that the honourable Member has mentioned Billy Adams, as one of his victims was a constituent of mine.

Does the Member agree that the Billy Adams case highlights the cross-jurisdictional nature of the issue, which effectively resulted in his being able to benefit on three separate occasions?

The first time that he benefited was when he was transferred from a prison in the Republic of Ireland, where he had committed offences, to a prison in Northern Ireland, where he was able to benefit from 50% remission of his sentence. That meant that he was released early from prison. The second occasion on which he benefited was after his release from prison in Northern Ireland when he went to Liverpool. At that point, there must have been a breakdown in the system as he was able to commit serious offences again.

Perhaps what is most galling for his victims is that, in the third and final instance of his being able to benefit, given that he committed his most recent offences in Liverpool, the Northern Ireland Office has indicated that the months that he gained from 50% remission will not be added to his sentence. Had he committed the offences in Northern Ireland rather than in Liverpool, the early release period would have been added to his sentence. However, the different applications of both policy and sentencing across the British Isles have meant that he has benefited from legal loopholes. It shows the need for the matter to be examined, not only on an all-Ireland basis, but across the British Isles

Mr Buchanan: I thank the Member for his intervention and for his valid point. The issue needs to be examined across the whole of the British Isles and a single policy developed to deal with it.

As we have read in today's 'Belfast Telegraph', a man who sexually abused eight young children and who has 45 charges pending against him is to serve only part of his sentence. Is it not an indictment on Government and society that this evil paedophile, Henry Irwin—who was jailed for 14 years for sexual abuse, including rape—has already spent two years in jail but will walk free in five years under the 50% remission rule? It is an insult to the poor victims that have to live with the consequences of that injustice.

The House must send a clear message that there shall be no hiding place for the scourges of society who assault, abuse and destroy children and young people's lives. Governments must work with the relevant Departments to ensure that those offenders can no longer flout the law and that our young people have a secure environment in which to grow up.

I was somewhat encouraged today when the Speaker sent to all Members a letter from the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, Mr Shaun Woodward. That letter stated that two Orders in Council would be introduced in the House of Commons. One of those Orders will refer to the repeal of 50% remission of sentences, and the other refers to the modernisation and strengthening of the law on sexual offences, along the lines of the Sexual Offences Act 2003. Those Orders in Council are to be introduced in the near future for consultation. When we consider the cases that have been mentioned in the House today, that development is to be welcomed.

Mrs Long: I beg to move amendment No 2: Leave out "an early North-South Ministerial Council cross-departmental sectoral meeting," and insert

"early sectoral meetings of the North-South Ministerial Council and the British-Irish Council"

I have no doubt that Paul Butler and Carál Ní Chuilín's motion will command support across the Chamber, and I thank them for bringing it to the House. Our amendment does not seek to detract in any way from the importance of North/South co-operation on the issue.

Most of us will remember the name of Father Brendan Smith who manipulated, and who was facilitated in manipulating, poor co-operation between the authorities on either side of the border. We owe his victims, among many others, the reassurance that the authorities across the island are doing their utmost to make sure that a case such as his can never happen again.

Rather than opposing North/South co-operation, we want to expand the motion to ensure that the co-ordination between authorities across the islands is maximised and that sex offenders cannot slip through the net of official supervision by simply moving across the Irish Sea.

We are not attempting to provide some kind of artificial sense of balance. Instead, we are attempting to address a serious issue that has massive implications. I am sure that many will have heard of the Murrell case, which was reported in the media last week and to which Paul Butler referred earlier.

Murrell served a sentence for indecently assaulting a child in Worcestershire, but did not register with the police when he was released seven years ago. He disappeared along with his wife and children. Failing to register on the sex offenders' register has been recognised as indicating an extremely high risk of reoffending. In spite of that high risk, Murrell simply vanished. The authorities spread their net as far as Canada in an attempt to recapture him. However, last week, it was discovered that he was living in County Kildare; he was soon arrested by the gardaí and now seems set to be extradited back to England.

It is worth noting that Murrell was not recaptured as a result of standard practices and statutory authorities working in proper harmony with one another. He was recaptured as a result of an appeal on the UK programme 'Crimewatch' followed by his details being placed on the "most wanted" page of the Child Exploitation and Online Protection Centre's website. That was what eventually led gardaí to his whereabouts.

That is not an isolated case. Sadly, for many decades sex offenders have recognised that borders and seas provide little barrier to their movement but can be a serious barrier to the legal authorities in tracing and managing them. The example given by Peter Weir earlier clearly shows why proper co-ordination is needed.

There is a case for exploring some degree of European harmonisation on holding and releasing criminal record information and on how sex offenders are managed and tracked. However, we should not underestimate the serious issues that would be raised through any Europe-wide harmonisation because of different legal definitions and different understandings of items such as freedom of information, privacy and the rehabilitation of offenders. While EU-wide arrangements have merit, and the Alliance Party would support efforts in that direction, it should be recognised that such arrangements could take a decade or more to agree.

However, there are particular issues concerning the movement of sex offenders around different parts of the British Isles. We have a common travel area and a common language, and that makes movement much easier. We have legal systems that are rooted in common, rather than Roman, law, and we have similar traditions of policing and offender management, which should, in theory, make co-operation and harmonisation easier to achieve. Indeed, we will not be starting without some foundation, as progress has already been made between authorities on information-sharing.

My research leads me to believe that the migration of sex offenders from mainland Britain to the Republic is the area in which action is needed most urgently. Co-operation would also enable us to learn from best practice that is being developed in other jurisdictions, and that could be implemented in Northern Ireland as quickly as possible.

Our systems of child protection and sex-offender management are very similar to those across the water but are quite different to those that exist south of the border, as Members have already pointed out. Indeed, Sinn Féin has framed the debate very much on the Republic's catching up with the standards that we enjoy in Northern Ireland. However, we cannot be complacent and assume that we will always be at the cutting edge of child protection.

For example, the Scottish Parliament has shown considerable reforming zeal on criminal justice matters. Its sheer determination and energy in making the lives of Scottish people better puts us to shame, and we may well have to learn much from the Scottish Parliament and our colleagues in Wales in the years to come. Good ideas cannot simply stop at the Irish Sea.

I thank Carál and Paul for raising this sensitive and difficult issue, and I reiterate that our amendment is intended only to amplify the intention of the motion rather than oppose it. I thank them for accepting the amendment. When issues such as this arise, it is normal practice for people to say that they will leave no stone unturned. I hope that at the end of this debate, that really will be the case, and that borders will be no barrier to lawful authorities in protecting the public from some of the most dangerous criminals in our society.

Mr McCallister: I would like to make it clear from the outset that the UUP will be supporting amendment No 2.

This debate is important and worthwhile. One cannot underestimate the gravity of the issue under discussion because the protection of children is paramount and is a priority for any Government, and I am pleased to contribute to the debate.

North/South co-operation on this issue is sensible and wise. There is evidence that some unsuitable individuals who pose a risk to children have accessed work in the Republic despite being barred from working with children in the UK. Child protection regulations and the monitoring of sex offenders must be considered on a European — indeed, global — level, rather than simply on an all-Ireland or UK level.

4.45 pm

Diana Sutton, head of policy and public affairs at the NSPCC made an excellent case for those measures when she said that:

“We need a simple system that allows an education or health authority in Manchester to ensure a potential employee from Madrid or Marseilles is not a danger to children.”

The management, vetting and barring of sex offenders is a live issue across the EU and requires urgent attention in light of some very serious cases. Ours is not the only area of Europe to share an international border. Our colleagues across the EU have huge experience in these matters and of the various legal systems involved. My party's disagreement with Mr Butler's motion is not, as Mrs Long rightly put it, because we are against an all-Ireland body; it is because the motion does not go far enough — the problem is much larger and must be set in a wider context.

The Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety has been examining the serious blight of suicide on our communities, and I agree with Mr Buchanan that there is no doubt that sex offending contributes to that blight. The role of the Internet was mentioned during the Committee's deliberations, and, in his evidence to the Committee last week, the Minister told us that he had been in contact with colleagues from the Home Office on that subject. I am sure that the Minister will continue to communicate the views of the Assembly and the work of his Department to the Home Office in that regard.

Mr Weir made a useful point about sentencing. It is important that the House notes the current rules on 50% remission, which many Members take issue with.

To conclude, my party supports amendment No 2 in the context that it will deliver the best protection for our children: that is the key point. We share a common travel area and a common language with the Republic of Ireland, and there are lessons that all jurisdictions could learn from one another. We should adopt examples of best practice and work together. We must never close our minds to new ideas or other exciting developments to tackle these serious issues, and the last thing that we want to do is to repeat the tragedy that developed out of a case some years ago in which neighbouring police forces in England failed to share information. We want the fullest co-operation between the various jurisdictions in the UK, the Republic of Ireland and, indeed, across the EU.

Mrs M Bradley: When the First Minister met the Taoiseach at the Battle of the Boyne site earlier this year, he said that:

“it is important to engage with our closest neighbour from a position of mutual respect and with assured confidence”.

Nowhere is that more important than in child protection. It is good to hear such sentiments; however, old suspicions cannot be buried by victims of sex offenders, especially when he or she is confronted or haunted by their attacker in their own locality.

I am sure that the motion will receive a resounding Aye in the House. Unfortunately, I am equally sure that every one of us could recount horrific stories described by a broken-hearted mother, husband, daughter or relation, of how their loved one was humiliated, threatened, abused or, in the worst case, murdered by a sex offender who was known to the agencies but happened to commit the crime in another jurisdiction.

More stringent and restrictive regulations must be introduced. The most basic of those would be an inter-agency and inter-judicial database of offenders.

The motion is emotive, and it is infuriating that the Assembly must debate an issue that should be a given — the right of all our children to be protected. Despite the many horrific attacks that take place throughout the world on a daily basis, our various Governments have yet to create one general database that the legal agencies of any given country can access. Such a mechanism is now commonplace where terrorism is concerned; a click of a button will indicate to airports, criminal bureaux and Governments those individuals who are attempting to enter their respective countries. Why not give the statutory agencies that are responsible for security and protection a similar facility for the identification of sex offenders? It is a scary thought that throughout the EU there are over 27 varying templates upon which information about national sex offenders is stored, yet there is not one single database that is comprehensible enough to be shared or circulated among the various countries for the purposes of prevention and protection.

It is imperative that, in the context of EU expansion and increasing migration across member states, we address the issue not only on an island-wide vetting basis, but on a European-wide basis. That is not an attempt to demonise migrants, or infer that they are somehow less worthy of job opportunities than those who currently reside here or in Great Britain; rather, it is a recognition that British or Irish citizens would, as a matter of course, be subject to such checks if they were applying for the same posts as migrants.

It has always been a major priority and a genuine goal for the SDLP for child protection regulations to be taken seriously and improved as our society evolves and changes. The SDLP introduced private Member's Bills in the former Assembly, and that, combined with our determination and tenacity to work closely with various children's agencies and charities, has resulted in the adoption of legislation.

I and my party colleagues held lengthy discussions with the Minister for Health and Children in the Republic of Ireland about many health and child-protection issues and about how cross-border co-operation could be extended and assisted. Given the close proximity of North and South, the sharing of one cross-border database would be a tremendous start towards creating a safer future for us all. In the absence of an international database, a lifeline at least would be available to those who are responsible for child protection and for the protection of all our residents from sex offenders.

My constituency of Foyle is literally a hop, skip and a jump to the border, and Donegal is our natural hinterland. Unfortunately, it has been known for sex offenders and other criminals to go missing by crossing the border. The Hunter Redpath case is synonymous with such a scenario. He remained free in the Republic of Ireland, as the gardaí were powerless to arrest him until he set foot on UK soil. Based on the details of that case, on 27 November 2006, the UK and Irish Governments produced a memorandum of understanding on the transfer of information about sex offenders and on inhibiting perpetrators fleeing over the border for any purpose without the consent of the probationary services.

For many years, the SDLP has been clear and forthright about its position on cross-border co-operation, and sometimes it has been demonised for that stance. However, —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Ms S Ramsey: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. No one in the House would have a problem with ensuring that there are no borders in child protection. Indeed, other Members highlighted that point. All borders pose a challenge in dealing with those who are a potential risk to children.

We are not unique in dealing with this issue. Last week, the NSPCC published a research document entitled 'Protecting Children from Sexual Abuse in Europe: Safer Recruitment of Workers in a Border-free Europe'. That report examined the different mechanisms that exist across the EU for the holding and disclosure of criminal records and information, the managing and tracking of sex offenders, and vetting and barring arrangements.

It is of great concern that there are different arrangements throughout the EU. In a recent case, a French national, convicted of a series of murders and sexual assaults, was able to move to Belgium, where he gained employment in a school and continued to murder and commit sexual assaults. That highlights the need for common EU standards on convictions, sharing of information and vetting.

Both Ireland and Britain have enacted legislation to ensure that convicted sex offenders are required to notify the authorities of where they are. The two pieces of legislation are similar in their notification periods and the requirements placed on offenders with convictions outside the state. There has also been progress on the sharing of information on sex offenders. As a result of such structured co-operation, there has been much more cross-border work between probation officers and police on the management of sex offenders. That is to be welcomed.

However, although agencies in the North risk-manage all sex offenders in a structured manner, that is not the case in the Twenty-six Counties. Arrangements in the North have developed through the introduction of new risk-assessment techniques, new powers under the Sexual Offences Act 2003 and the probability of new legislation to place the MASRAM arrangements on a statutory footing later this year. That has not been paralleled in the Twenty-six Counties.

Recent high-profile sex-offender cases, such as the murder of Attracta Harron by Trevor Hamilton, demonstrate the need for a cross-border element in the management of adults who pose a risk. Although there has been some progress on the management of sex offenders on a North/South basis, concern remains about the vetting and barring arrangements for those who are unsuitable to work with children.

The North has some of the strongest vetting and barring arrangements in the world, but they differ starkly from those in the South, where the checking of criminal records only recently became a requirement for a range of posts. There is no equivalent disqualification list to the disqualified from working with children list or the list of unsuitable persons, nor is there lifetime monitoring of the workforce. Without common legislation and policy development on a North/South basis, unsuitable individuals will be able to exploit the border, and Members have highlighted recent such cases. Given the all-Ireland nature of sporting and faith groups, if the arrangements are to work, there must be a clear understanding with the Twenty-six Counties on their implementation.

As Mary Bradley said, many people work on one side of the border and live on the other. That highlights again the fact that effective barring and vetting arrangements need to be put in place on an all-island basis, with the highest level of co-operation. Last year, my colleague Bairbre de Brún was instrumental in developing a North/South seminar, which was organised by the Department of Health and the South's Department of Children and attended by the respective Ministers. The key professionals who attended the seminar displayed no shortage of energy and enthusiasm on the need to work together.

The Minister has already looked at this topic and has held useful recent meetings with his counterpart in the Irish Republic. One of the key issues to arise from the seminar was the need for some kind of regular forum to examine child-protection issues on an all-Ireland basis. That is a massive agenda, encompassing a range of Departments in the North and South. Therefore, I propose that OFMDFM, as a matter of urgency, places the matter high on the agenda for the next sectoral meeting of the North/South Ministerial Council.

The Health and Education Ministers, in conjunction with their counterparts in Dublin, should publish a discussion document that sets out the current levels of co-operation on the management of sex offenders, and all that goes with that. The Minister of Health, in conjunction with his colleague in Dublin, should establish a North/South child-protection forum to look at specific operations and policy issues —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. Your time is up.

Ms S Ramsey: I realise that the Minister may not have time to respond to all those points, but I would appreciate —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. The Member's time is up.

Mr Beggs: I support amendment No 2. As Members have said, sexual offenders do not recognise international borders but try to exploit weaknesses in the system. The management of sex offenders is not only a North/South issue; it is an east-west, European and international issue. Any policy that is based solely on an all-island, North/South approach will fail. Narrow political ideologies should not come before children's safety. Sinn Féin's motion is flawed.

5.00 pm

The weakness in the system lies in the Republic of Ireland, but its weakness is our weakness. As others have said, there is a memorandum of understanding between the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland. Sex offenders from Scotland, Wales and other places can come to the Republic of Ireland and cross our borders. This issue is clearly much wider than a North/South concern.

Amendment No 1 recognises that there is a threat when sex offenders from Northern Ireland move to Great Britain, but what about sex offenders who cross the border from the Republic of Ireland? What about those offenders who would be maintained on Northern Ireland's register of sex offenders, which would limit their employment in Northern Ireland? No equivalent lists exist in the Republic of Ireland, so those people can be successfully employed in positions in Northern Ireland. Their weakness is our weakness, and it is endangering all our children. Amendment No 1 is incomplete, and I call on the DUP not to be governed by its narrow political ideology.

Northern Ireland follows the legislation that exists in the rest of the United Kingdom, and it is widely recognised that the United Kingdom has some of the most comprehensive legislation in the world to deal with sex offenders. There is a disqualification from working with children list and an unsuitable persons list. The people on those lists have not even been convicted of a criminal offence, but they have raised concern with statutory agencies. There are methods of vetting through criminal records. As others have said, we have a multi-agency sex offender risk assessment and management system.

I too welcome the news of the sexual offences Order, which will follow the lines of the Sexual Offences Act 2003, but why did we have to wait for four years for additional legislation to protect our children? As a side issue, the Secretary of State also announced that powers to expand curfews and electronic tagging would be considered. That must be welcomed, because it will mean additional tools to protect and safeguard children from sex offenders who, at some point, are released into society. There is a clear flaw when such people cannot be monitored 24 hours a day.

The weakness in the system lies in the Republic of Ireland, and no one wants it to become a haven for paedophiles, as would appear to be the case. However, as the border is porous — and again I say that their weakness is our weakness — we need changes in the Republic of Ireland to protect our children. If that is done on a North/South basis, or through the British-Irish Council, that is fine, but narrow political ideology is no reason for not making changes. We must use all means at our disposal to work with the Republic of Ireland to bring it up to modern-day standards because, without those changes, our children remain at risk.

There is a very high attrition rate in the prosecution of sexual offences — only about 5% of offenders are successfully prosecuted. It is important that those additional lists are created in the Irish Republic, so that when people from the Republic of Ireland apply for jobs in Northern Ireland that involve our children, we are aware of their history and their background, and inappropriate people do not gain access. It is important that changes occur there.

Furthermore, there is risk management associated with sex offenders when they are released back into the community. That is why issues such as electronic tagging are important. In Northern Ireland, we have various methods of assessment for level 1 and level 2 offenders, and that happens automatically. However, in the Republic of Ireland, that happens only in cases of court action. Changes must happen in the Republic of Ireland.

Mr Attwood: I apologise to the House that I was absent for 20 minutes, but the Speaker and I had a meeting, and I was in some conflict over where I should be. Therefore, I apologise that I did not hear the full debate.

I welcome the debate and I acknowledge the briefing that was provided by relevant agencies including the NSPCC, which has heavily informed the sensible substance of the debate.

However, the points that I wish to make are political. I make those points despite Roy Beggs's reference to narrow ideology. Although a party's views may be seen to stem from a narrow ideology, on this issue the House should look beyond arguments based on narrow ideologies to the best architecture to protect young children and vulnerable adults on this island, between these islands, and beyond.

In the event that policing and justice powers are devolved, part of the current architecture that protects children and that deals with justice and policing issues falls. At present, there is a British-Irish agreement on justice, and one on policing matters. At the point of devolution, when those two agreements fall, there will be a vacuum. With a vacuum comes risks that may jeopardise young people on this island. I ask the House to ensure — through the Assembly and Executive Review Committee and any other appropriate mechanisms — that, when justice and policing powers are devolved, North/South agreements on justice and policing are in place to advance the good work that has already been done on a British-Irish basis to protect young children, as well as vulnerable young people and adults.

In the period until then, I ask that the Minister uses his good offices to ensure that there is agreement on this, and any other relevant issue, so that a vacuum is not created and that joined-up justice and policing is implemented that maximises the protection of individuals — especially children.

Mr Beggs: Does the Member accept that there is no need to wait for six months, a year, two years or five years? Why can standards in the Republic of Ireland not be raised immediately to the same level as those in the UK in order to protect our children?

Mr Attwood: I agree. Those politicians in the Chamber who have said that the South is lacking in protections must converse. The South needs to hear from them where those weaknesses lie. As the NSPCC and other briefings have confirmed, the South lags behind in child protection measures compared with Britain and Northern Ireland, which are considered world leaders in that field.

How will that conversation be taken forward? One way in which it could be done would be to create the North/South parliamentary forum in which politicians from the North and South talk to one another rather than have Ministers, officials or experts talk to one another. That is not about ideology; rather, it is about the protection of the citizens on this island. We in the North — where there is better protection for children — could inform politicians in the South about how to improve their standards. Without that form of action, Mr Beggs's voice will not be heard by a TD or a Senator in the South, because the conversation will be at a ministerial level and official level, which, although relevant, will not be between the politicians in this Chamber and the politicians in the South.

I ask the Minister to ensure that politicians' voices are heard on the matter through the early establishment of the a North/South parliamentary forum. This is not about ideology but about maximising the political impact of politicians in the North in order to convince our counterparts in the South that improving protection of their children will improve the protection of all children on the island.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mrs Hanna: I support the motion and amendment No 2. Child protection presents a complex array of challenges in an already difficult situation for the trained professionals who are trying to help and protect children from harm. However, the protection of children is the responsibility of their parents, family, the statutory and voluntary sectors and the rest of society. Even though much has been done in Northern Ireland in recent years to improve child-protection measures, a multi-agency and interdepartmental approach is required. That is practised to a degree, but there is room for improvement. Several high-profile child protection cases in the North and South of Ireland have verified the need for developments and changes. Members may have heard in the media today of another sad case in which the lives of a young person and a family have been ruined. As has been said, the automatic 50% remission for offenders will exacerbate that damage and hurt. That reduction in sentences is unacceptable, especially in cases of sexual abuse.

Even though I welcome the relatively new memorandum of understanding regarding sex offenders, more can be done to improve the cross-border co-operation. For instance, it is important that all professionals and volunteers who work with children are subjected to police checks before they are hired. In the Republic of Ireland, the checks taken by the Central Gardaí Vetting Unit provide information on police convictions, but they do not include any soft information such as allegations, concerns or inquiries about the applicant. Neither do the checks cross-reference against those on the sex offenders' register, unlike the system in the North which is more comprehensive and includes such information.

The importance of that cross-border co-operation and parity on child protection cannot be overstated. People who want to harm children are not put off by borders, as we have seen in Ireland and throughout Europe. We have seen cases in which opportunistic, convicted, high-risk sex offenders have fled to the South to escape the rigour of the law and to evade justice. Loopholes — whether in the law or in practice — in either jurisdiction must be filled so that the risk of potential exploitation by those who seek to harm children is reduced.

Governments and agencies must, together, develop ways of working to make sure that every child north or south of the border is properly protected. With the influx of migrant workers from the EU, interjurisdictional protocols to ensure an easier, more efficient and comprehensive exchange of information on sex offenders between the PSNI, the Gardaí and foreign police services are also vital. Sharing information is crucial; however, I am aware how different child protection systems are in the North and the South. Systems for sharing the information need to be adequately developed and strengthened if we are to ensure that those who are a risk to children do not exploit the differences and loopholes. It is not a straightforward task, and interconnected Government policies are required. A comprehensive vetting service and an all-island register are two ways of improving the child protection system on the island. Allied to that are funding arrangements that will have to be put in place for improved services.

The Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, the Department of Education and OFMDFM have a role to play in safeguarding vulnerable children and young people in Northern Ireland. As health spokesperson for the SDLP, I am keen to ensure that safeguarding the welfare of children remains a high priority for all, and we have an opportunity to do that during this time of considerable administrative reform in the Health Service.

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (Mr McGimpsey): Children are our most precious asset, and they must be protected and nurtured in a positive environment if we are to have a stable and progressive society. The statutory responsibility for the protection of children does not fall to one Department, group or individual. The Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety and the Department of Education have specific responsibilities for child protection; however, all Departments that work with children or fund organisations that work with children have child-protection responsibilities.

5.15 pm

The registration of sex offenders is the responsibility of the Northern Ireland Office, and I fully agree that information on sex offenders should be shared between jurisdictions. We all have a responsibility — whether as parents, family members, or neighbours — to protect children from sexual predators who prey on some of the most vulnerable members of society.

I also share the concern of others about the location of hostels near schools and family homes that house sex offenders when they are released from prison. Full and open debate is required on the need for a “Sarah’s Law” in Northern Ireland. This should also be the subject of an ongoing debate between the Executive and the Northern Ireland Office.

Society expects us, as legislators, to provide powers and legislation to ensure the protection of children. Our legislation and arrangements for monitoring and vetting, and for the regulation of services, are primarily aimed at protecting children from stranger abuse, or from abuse by known offenders.

Unfortunately, most abuse takes place within families and extended family circles, and is often associated with domestic violence, parental drug and alcohol abuse, mental-health problems, and families under stress. Those situations often limit the capacity of parents to adequately care for their children, and young people who are abused often suffer mental-health problems. Further investment in family-support services offers the best potential for reducing levels of child abuse within the family. The same is true of many new or expanded services that will require an increase in the health and social care budget. I have been making that point strongly to my Executive colleagues.

Ninety per cent of what is commonly referred to as child protection actually falls under the heading of safeguarding, whereby measures are put in place in order to prevent children and young people from being subjected to abuse. The monitoring of sex offenders and the vetting and barring of unsuitable persons from working with children are the best known ways of safeguarding.

Overall responsibility for the management of sex offenders in Northern Ireland rests with the NIO, and is managed through the multi-agency sex offender risk assessment and management system. Those arrangements should reduce the offender’s opportunity to reoffend, although we are all aware of occasions where reoffending has occurred while the offender was being monitored.

The Protection of Children and Vulnerable Adults (Northern Ireland) Order 2003 has improved safeguards for children and vulnerable adults by preventing unsuitable people from working with them in paid or voluntary positions. In order to do that, the Department maintains lists of individuals who are considered unsuitable to work with children and vulnerable adults. That disqualifies them from working with children and means that they will commit an offence if they apply for, accept, or do any work — either paid or unpaid — in a childcare position.

There has been continuous progress in the UK in efforts to strengthen arrangements. That has sometimes been in response to technological changes in the workplace, but, unfortunately, it has sometimes been in response to lessons learned from cases in which children were abducted, abused or murdered. No system of protection will ever be perfect, but we have a responsibility to make our arrangements as effective as possible, to continue to take steps to improve the internal arrangements of Northern Ireland, and to improve collaboration with the Republic of Ireland and the UK.

Paul Butler mentioned the Bichard Inquiry, which focused on the failure of police forces and social services to share information with one another after the murders committed by Ian Huntley in Soham. New arrangements to be introduced by The Safeguarding Vulnerable Groups (Northern Ireland) Order 2007 will address those concerns, and that will enable the sharing of information between police forces and social services across the UK.

As a result of North/South co-operation, a memorandum of understanding was signed last year to ensure that information on sex offenders who plan to travel between Ireland and the UK, including Northern Ireland, is shared by the relevant police forces. This means that when someone from the South seeks employment with children in Northern Ireland, the vetting procedure will include a criminal record check by gardaí that would show up any conviction for a sex offence.

However, therein lies one of the problems. Although we in the UK have safeguarding and barring arrangements, the Irish Republic’s problem is that it has a written constitution. The family is specially enshrined within the constitution, so the Republic cannot simply pass laws — there must be constitutional change. We are well aware that that is always a difficult issue in the Republic.

I had a meeting recently with Brendan Smith, the Minister for Children down South. We discussed those issues and the need to introduce legislation in the Republic, which is well recognised in Dublin. That is probably the key issue. If the situation were to develop rapidly, it could mean that a series of constitutional changes would be needed in sequence. However, that is a matter for the Republic, and they are aware of the problem, the challenge and the need to change.

All those on the sex offenders registers in the Republic and the UK must inform the police of where and when they intend to travel if it is for more than a certain length of time. The memorandum of understanding — the first agreement of its type in the world — means that our police forces share that information about all sex offenders who plan to travel between the two states. The Agreement on Co-operation on Criminal Justice Matters between the Irish and British Governments was signed in July 2005. There is a significant level of co-operation between gardaí and the police here at an operational level on those matters.

As has been said, the border is no respecter. This is not an issue of political positions or political correctness: it is an issue about what needs to be done to safeguard our children. That applies in Northern Ireland, the Republic and the home countries. We must work together closely. My officials and their counterparts in the Republic of Ireland liaise closely on developments in their respective jurisdictions. We work closely with our counterparts in the South to ensure that they are kept abreast of developments, and we will continue to provide information and assistance to them based on our experience. I have already referred to the meeting I had recently with the Minister for Children in Dublin.

The arrangements for the sex offenders register lie with the Northern Ireland Office. I do not have the authority to raise the issue at a North/South Ministerial Council meeting. However, I will be happy to raise the matter at the British-Irish Council, as all the relevant authorities would be together. I will continue to discuss the full range of child protection issues in my regular meetings in the Republic and throughout the British Isles.

The Executive needs to have some oversight of the decisions by the NIO on the arrangements for the management of sex offenders.

All Departments must discharge their responsibilities for protecting children. I hope that there is a clear understanding that providing support to families dealing with domestic violence and parental drug- and -alcohol abuse, and the provision of better mental-health services will, in practice, have the biggest impact on protecting our children.

Dr Deeny: I thank all the Members who have contributed to the debate. I thank the Minister for being here and for his commitment to this serious issue.

The Minister said that the problem of sex offenders affected society, and that health professionals should not be the only people to deal with the issue. To focus on the health thing and the sex offences that we hear about, the fallout and the aftermath can be devastating for the people concerned. They often do not recover from the serious health situations that result from their having been sexually abused. That is important to point out, and it is why I am interested in this issue.

I am convinced that the people who commit those crimes are evil. As a doctor, I hear time and again from across the water, talk of providing medication that might, somehow, help paedophiles. That appals me, because it attempts to medicalise those evil acts. We often hear that paedophiles must be sick. That is an insult to the sick. I work with the sick, and none of them do things like this. Those are my own personal views.

The Minister mentioned Sarah's Law. I am not too sure. The releasing of offenders' names is certainly an avenue to look at; however, when that happened in the US, a lot more people cleared off, ran away and disappeared. We need to look at that again. Withholding the names and allowing offenders to stay in an area might permit more monitoring. That needs to be discussed and talked about. The public insists on the proper registration and monitoring of sex offenders.

Members have spoken of recent cases. There was a horrific situation not so long ago in Castlederg. I heard about one this morning — I think Carmel talked about it too. It was a young boy on the radio this morning, talking about his terrible ordeal. Another gentleman was found in the South, and the position there has to be sorted out.

The punishment must fit the crime. Mr Weir mentioned 50% remission, and I agree that that has to be looked at seriously, along with judicial accountability. However, that is an argument for another place. When one sees the consequences of some people's actions, it is appalling that they are free to roam the streets and reoffend after just a few years in prison. When those people are released and undergoing rehabilitation, proper registration and monitoring must be involved, whether it be tagging or whatever. That is their punishment, and it is how they must pay.

Sensitive, but important, issues such as this must be discussed, and it is what politics should be about. Therefore, I thank Carál and Paul Butler for tabling the motion and for accepting amendment No 2. To be precise, it was tabled by the United Community group — not just the Alliance Party. There are another two of us.

There is a realisation and an understanding — and it was mentioned by a number of people: Mary Bradley, Sue Ramsey and others — that borders do not count when we are talking about sex offenders. I thank them for accepting the amendment. Members also mentioned that the debate should be widened to include the whole of Europe as well as these islands.

The United Community amendment was tabled to demonstrate how serious we are about this important issue. The duty of pursuing it must be assumed at levels as high as the North/South Ministerial Council and the British-Irish Council.

Tommy Buchanan means well, but amendment No 1 is too vague. On reading that amendment, it appears that culprits only travel in one direction — from Northern Ireland to Great Britain. Of course, there is the reverse direction, and indeed North to South and South to North. Amendment No 1 also mentions “all relevant departments”. That does not specify who needs to be responsible for this important issue. Its lack of emphasis undermines that importance, and that is why I ask Members to support the motion and amendment No 2.

Mr Easton: I support amendment No 1. The evidence clearly shows that those who perpetrate sexual offences against children know no borders or boundaries. Therefore, Government's response must be to introduce an effective and proactive system of information-sharing, registration and monitoring which is fit for purpose and has the capacity to address the dangers and challenges presented by such dangerous perpetrators.

Sex offenders target, groom and exploit victims whenever and in whatever opportunities arise. The lives of victims and survivors are characterised by the severity of the traumatic stresses they have suffered.

Often, flashbacks of the abuse endured bring back the pain. The mental scars will often outlast the physical scars. Sadly, eating disorders, self-harm and suicide attempts are all too prevalent in the life stories of survivors of sexual abuse.

5.30 pm

The statement that “prevention is better than cure” is particularly relevant today. The onus must be on the prevention of abuse and the protection of society, and measures to enhance information sharing and the monitoring of sex offenders must be introduced as a matter of urgency. In so doing, we can proactively protect the community, and let us note that many survivors of abuse come from the most vulnerable groups in society.

We must also recognise, in the debate, the outstanding efforts of those who work in this area. I draw attention, in particular, to the excellent job done by the Police Service's child abuse and rape enquiry units, and the professionalism of the social workers, psychologists and psychiatrists who provide a public service to the victims of child abuse.

The charitable organisations in the voluntary sector that provide counselling and healing therapies for survivors deserve the highest possible commendation. The work being undertaken locally by the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children and Barnardo's is worthy of particular mention.

Let us learn the lessons that the research reveals: there is an appalling rate of reoffending by child sex abusers. The best strategy to deal with them necessitates a multi-agency response that can register and monitor the perpetrators, combined with stiffer sentences that ensure that those people will never be released from jail.

In supporting the amendment, Members will rise to the challenge that the perpetrators of child abuse present. We will provide a more effective system of protection and prevent other children from suffering the horror of abuse. The progress that is being made in transport, information technology and communications presents us with the challenge of ensuring that the perpetrators of child abuse can be effectively monitored, as they become more flexible in their transport and communication arrangements. The motion goes some way towards allowing us to do that.

Ms Ní Chuilín: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Ba mhaith liom tacaíocht a thabhairt don rún. This has been a very important debate, and I value every Member's contribution. It is evident that we do not want the House to divide on the matter. To that end, it is possible to support both amendments without division.

I am grateful for the opportunity to speak on this important matter that embraces all communities and our respective constituencies. As Alex Attwood pointed out, a devolved and locally sensitive Government can achieve improved outcomes. The transfer of policing and justice is only one of those outcomes. Mary Bradley also mentioned that the Assembly is in a position to do something about the issue.

Dealing with those who would harm children and vulnerable adults has become a borderless matter. Sexual predators do not recognise partition, and every Member who spoke pointed that out to some degree. Increased movement of population through the EU, the availability of cut-price travel and rapidly changing technologies all present a huge challenge to us.

Last week, the police forces in Britain, in conjunction with their Irish counterpart, the Garda Síochána, announced the start of Operation Pentameter 2, a Britain- and Ireland-wide operation designed to locate and rescue the victims of trafficking. We have also seen the creation of the Virtual Global Taskforce, which is designed to bring about international co-operation to deal with Internet sex abuse and, lately, the UK Child Exploitation and Online Protection Centre (CEOP), which aims to police the Internet and catch those who seek to exploit the lives of the vulnerable.

Social networking, which is becoming increasingly mobile, has become a feature of many young people's lives. Unfortunately, there are well-documented cases of dangerous individuals grooming children over the Internet and travelling, sometimes from overseas, to meet and abuse them.

In Britain, the appalling spectre of sex tourism has been partially countered by new powers and Orders to restrict the movements of registered sex offenders when they attempt to leave the jurisdiction. Furthermore, when individuals are convicted of offences overseas, they can be made the subject of notification Orders on return.

All those developments are based on the fact that dangerous people are not any respecters of borders, boundaries, laws or values. Indeed, some will actively seek to exploit international boundaries and loopholes; that fact has been mentioned by almost every Member who has spoken during the debate. In response, we must remain on the offensive and ensure that our legislation and policies counter that exploitation. It is also important to ensure that the best use is made of operational co-operation and information exchanges in, and between, states.

In these islands, there are two different systems for dealing with sexual offenders — sex offender management, vetting, and barring regarding the protection of children, and safeguards for our children; Thomas Buchanan outlined the importance of that.

I welcome the interest that there has been on this issue between the British and Irish Governments, and the signing of the memorandum of understanding. I also welcome the interest that the previous direct rule Ministers with responsibility for health, social services and public safety, Shaun Woodward and Paul Goggins, showed in taking forward a seminar in October 2006 on cross-border co-operation with Brian Lenihan TD, who was the then Minister for Children.

On this issue alone, much more can be done to ensure that our child protection systems are harmonised and can be operated in a more seamless way across the border. Naomi Long referred to harmonisation in her contribution. For example, the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety will shortly launch the new child death review protocol, which was instigated in part by the review into the case of David Briggs. That protocol could easily be adopted in the South and operate in a seamless way across this island.

Through devolution, high levels of aspiration must be turned into direct action. We must ensure that systems are in place to deal with a range of measures. For example, Sue Ramsey spoke in detail about the development of common policy, assessment and risk management arrangements when dealing with sex offenders. It would be foolish for us to have different structural and management arrangements for the registration of sex offenders, North, South, east, west or elsewhere.

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety spoke about the development of vetting and barring on an all-island basis. Although I know that there are constitutional issues south of the border that are often cited for difficulties in developing vetting arrangements, it seems that it is neither helpful — nor is it to anyone's advantage — to have an individual barred from, or deemed unsuitable in, one jurisdiction but able to work in another; measures regarding that need to be tightened.

There will be an increased gap between the two jurisdictions in both legislation and practice because of the changes to the vetting and barring arrangements in the North that are to take place in this jurisdiction next year through the implementation of Access NI, and the provisions of the Safeguarding Vulnerable Groups (NI) Order 2007.

Vetting is only part of good safeguarding and recruitment practice. Given that most sporting and faith groups now operate on an all-island basis, it makes sense to ensure that a joined-up approach on advice and guidance is being given to both Health Departments.

Naomi Long, as I mentioned earlier, discussed the issue of harmonisation and the co-operation across borders and boundaries. John McCallister spoke about the need to think bigger and to strengthen, where possible, legislation for vulnerable children and adults. I support those positions.

We also need to have a mechanism to take forward developments collectively and allow the North/South Ministerial Council to have ministerial oversight and to take political direction on both parts of this island on those matters. One of the early tasks on the agenda should be an examination of the gaps and differences that exist and how we might deal with those on both sides of the border.

Finally, given that there are devolved and reserved aspects to the subject and that the responsibility for policy is split among several Government Departments, it would be useful if officials from the Department of Education, the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, the NIO and the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister could report to the Assembly setting out current levels of North/South co-operation on assessment, risk management, vetting, barring, and child protection generally, and identifying the work that has yet to be done.

I thank all the Members who spoke in the debate, each with sensitivity and compassion. Obviously, there will be no Division. As the Minister said, children everywhere must be protected and nurtured; and that must be the case all over this island. I support the motion. Go raibh maith agat.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Before I put the question on amendment No 1, I would advise Members that if amendment No 1 is made, amendment No 2 will fall, and I will proceed to put the question on the motion as amended.

Question, That amendment No 1 be made, put and negatived.

Question, That amendment No 2 be made, put and agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly expresses concern at the disparity in child protection regulations and the registration of sexual offenders across the island of Ireland; and calls for early sectoral meetings of the North-South Ministerial Council and the British-Irish Council including the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, the Department of Education and the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister to address the disparity.

Motion made:

That the Assembly do now adjourn. — [Mr Deputy Speaker]

ADJOURNMENT

The future of Donaghadee High School

Mr Easton: Donaghadee High School is a co-educational school for 11- to 16-year-olds, and is perceived by its community to be a very good school. In 2006, the school celebrated its fiftieth anniversary. Many pupils of 11-plus age and above travel from Donaghadee to schools in Bangor and Newtownards, and as a consequence, the viability of the school, in the present segregated, 11-plus system, has been threatened. As the song tells us, those journeys are in the order of at least six miles.

The failure of the South Eastern Education and Library Board to undertake an effective review and reorganisation of school provision has added to, and fuelled, the feeling of uncertainty in the minds of parents about the future of Donaghadee High School. For any school to be blighted in that way damages pupils and staff, and condemns the community to a future without a secondary school. For the town, it is like the death of a thousand cuts, leading slowly and painfully to extinction.

Donaghadee, like any large rural town, needs a secondary school in the heart of its community. In many towns, it might be wise to consider amalgamation of the primary school and the secondary school under one administration to achieve economic success, so that children do not have to travel considerable distances to be educated. It is also the case that many people are moving into Donaghadee and its hinterland, and the general population of Donaghadee is on the rise.

We are in the midst of chaotic times in education; and that chaos has been exacerbated by the tensions attendant on the review of public administration (RPA). We are unsure about the outcome of the RPA; we are uncertain about the future of the 11-plus; and we are not able to describe the future structure of the education system.

This is not the time to close schools. It is not the time to ignore the rights of parents to have their children educated in their own town, with their own friends as classmates, and in a school that has done much to encourage a vibrant, inclusive culture in Donaghadee.

We must make hard economic choices, and education is not exempt from that necessity. In that context, we must all recognise the cost to society of segregated education and its impact on community, cohesion and solidarity. While we engage in a debate about a future state education system that will provide the opportunity for children to be educated together, and which respects and honours diversity, we must also respect the wishes of parents who want that experience for their children now.

5.45 pm

Donaghadee High School has applied for integrated status, partly in an attempt to maintain viability but also on the basis of its long tradition of cross-community work and the promotion of a culture of tolerance among its pupils by a staff of skilled and dedicated teachers and auxiliary staff, whose positions are now under threat because of the commissioners' announcement.

It is vital that the townspeople and the school are given an opportunity to explore the possibilities of that arrangement while the Assembly works out the way forward for all of us. The school must be given the chance to remain viable and to grow, and to ensure its place in the social, cultural, educational and economic life in the town of Donaghadee.

Along with NICCY, I call on the Minister of Education to support Donaghadee High School's application for integrated status and to give the staff and parents a reasonable period to succeed in their determination to retain a local integrated secondary school at the heart of their community. The parents and pupils of Donaghadee do not want to lose their school, and they do not want the proposed merger with Movilla High School. A letter that I have received from the board of governors of Movilla High School states that the board has voted to oppose the merger, which indicates that there is no appetite for such a venture.

Since then, the commissioners have declared that the merger is off the agenda and are now aiming for the complete closure of Donaghadee High School. I condemn that announcement, because we have yet to carry out the consultation on integrated status and present a business plan. I call for the South Eastern Education and Library Board, the commissioners and the Minister of Education to give Donaghadee High School a fair chance to come up with a viable business case to prove that there is a need for the school. There is clear evidence that there are more than enough pupils in the Ards Peninsula area to make the school viable. Why not merge the local primary school, which is situated on the same site and has over 300 pupils? The secondary school also has a special needs basis, with over 90 pupils in that category, so it is a specialised high school. A viable business case can be made, and I call on the parents, teachers and board of governors to work together on a business plan.

I have tabled this debate in the Assembly to state my support for the Donaghadee people, which I hope will encourage others to stand by them at this worrying time. To those who wish to see the school close without a fight — I will give those people a fight that will leave no doubt about the determination of the people of Donaghadee. I warn the Minister of Education that if she can open Irish-language schools for 12 pupils, she can save Donaghadee High School, which has over 200 pupils. I will stand with the pupils, parents and teachers who are here today. Let us unite and try to save Donaghadee High School.

Mr Cree: On 17 September 2007, the Minister of Education told the House:

"Pupil numbers are clearly an important factor in assessing the future viability of schools, but they should not be the sole factor." — [Official Report, Bound Volume 23, p323, col 1].

That came as no surprise to many Members. She listed the other factors as:

"the educational experience of the children, the financial position of the school, leadership and management at the school, accessibility, and links with the community." — [Official Report, Bound Volume 23, p323, col 1].

The consultation document issued by the former direct rule Administration on a policy for sustainable schools is still under discussion. The Assembly was assured that it was necessary that any review of a school's future viability should be handled carefully and sensitively, and that local circumstances must be considered on a case-by-case basis. During the same Question Time, Members discovered that the Minister had approved the opening of an Irish-language school that had an intake of 12 pupils, and they received an insight into her logic when they were told:

"if there are 12 pupils in primary 1, a long-term enrolment for a seven-class school can be calculated by multiplying 12 by seven." — [Official Report, Bound Volume 23, p323, col 2].

That long-term enrolment is subject to a deduction because of the projected population figures. However, it totally ignores major issues such as new house building in the area and other imminent development proposals. Donaghadee and other parts of the constituency of North Down are subject to considerable development; I will return to that issue.

In the South Eastern Education and Library Board area, commissioners have been appointed who appear to be autonomous. They make decisions that will have a significant effect on children and their school careers. A primary school in nearby Conlig — an academy that I graduated from many years ago — has served the community well for many decades. It has had a most difficult time because of those commissioners. At a recent meeting between interested parties, the governors were able to satisfy all the requirements that were laid down by the Minister, yet the commissioners decided to push ahead with a proposal to close the school.

Some 1,600 houses that are under construction in the area are to be completed within the next two years.

The Minister will now have two proposals on her desk at the same time: one to close the school, and one to allow the school to transform. All interested parties say yes; the commissioners say no. That is just not good enough. The same woolliness is demonstrated in respect of Donaghadee High School and Movilla High School. Consultation has been ongoing for some time. We have been told that formal consultation by the South Eastern Education and Library Board is to take place during the autumn term, which is now.

Any proposal that the board brings forward for the rationalisation of post-primary provision in the area could mean the publication of a further report and more consultation. All of that consultation is suspect, because it may not be heeded. The delay in resolving the issue is detrimental to the good governance of both schools. Sensitive, sympathetic and prompt action is needed to remove the blight that mars the progress of several schools in the south-east region.

Dr Farry: I welcome the opportunity to discuss the situation with regard to Donaghadee High School. Donaghadee could potentially become one of the largest — if not the largest — settlements in Northern Ireland without a dedicated secondary school. All Members would consider that a tragic outcome. That said, I am realistic and I appreciate that there are current difficulties with enrolment figures at Donaghadee High School, which are considerably lower than the level that was set by Sir George Bain in his report of December 2006, and in the Department's subsequent draft policy on sustainable schools.

That policy set out a framework in which decisions can be taken on rationalisation of the school estate. I fully recognise that difficult choices must be made, given the huge number of empty school places — around 50,000 at present, which could rise to 80,000 in a few years' time. Therefore, there is a need to redirect resources from school buildings, where there are often large overhead costs, towards ensuring that the scarce education budget is focused on the needs of children and on supporting teachers' and schools' support staff, such as classroom assistants.

It is, therefore, disappointing that there is not yet a formal departmental policy within which difficult choices on rationalisation could be taken. There is an urgent need for the Department to bring forward its formal policy on sustainable schools. The consultation period closed six months ago, during April 2007. Given that so much pressure is being applied right across the various education sectors, there is a need to bring forward a clear policy as soon as possible in order to give guidance to people who are faced with difficult choices.

In that context, the option of integrated schools becomes much more attractive. My party firmly believes that integrated schools are the most viable form of education for the social good — the best interests of pupils — as well as for financial considerations. Often, people in towns and villages must make difficult decisions on the rationalisation of their schools. The integrated route may provide a more sustainable local option, as opposed to sectors having to merge across a large geographical area, resulting in children having to travel a greater distance to school.

Integrated education is a more viable way of ensuring the continuation of local provision. Therefore the proposal for Donaghadee High School to transform to integrated status should be considered in that broader context.

It is worth pointing out that there are already some very successful integrated secondary schools in the North Down and Ards area. Strangford College, in Carrowdore, is well oversubscribed. Priory Integrated College, in Holywood, has been artificially capped by the Department of Education. However, there is clear evidence that that cap can be broken and a much higher level of enrolment sustained, well above the limit of 500 pupils that was suggested by Sir George Bain.

Clearly, there is scope for additional integrated education in the greater North Down and Ards area, at secondary level. The same argument applies at primary-school level, where Bangor Central Primary School is perhaps the most successful integrated primary school in Northern Ireland. Similarly, Glencraig Primary School, at Seahill, is equally successful.

Leslie Cree mentioned the proposal for the transformation of Conlig Primary School. While its numbers are well below the Bain threshold figure for primary schools, there is considerable evidence of housing growth in that area over the coming years. An integrated primary school would, of course, provide the maximum appeal to people who move into the area, many of whom will be young parents with children of primary school age. Therefore, there are opportunities to be considered, if we take a wider look at what is actually happening. Indeed, just to stress that point, there is the potential for 1,600 housing units to be built in a one-mile radius of Conlig Primary School, and there are similar degrees of building going on in the vicinity of Donaghadee.

It is worth noting that Ards Borough Council takes a proactive approach in encouraging additional housing units for its council area, of which Donaghadee is a key part. Obviously, there are difficulties whenever schools seek to transform to integrated status in the face of what is a threatened closure. I prefer that schools would consider that issue much earlier. However, the overall thrust of the Bain Report is that schools should look to those types of solutions to become more sustainable. That is what the parents in Donaghadee seek to do through the proposal.

I have a major concern that the Department seeks to consider proposals for closure, or amalgamation, in parallel with proposals for transformation to integrated status. That is seriously detrimental to consideration of the integrated proposal, which should be considered first. We have the same problem with Donaghadee High School and Conlig Primary School. I ask the Minister of Education to reassure us that her Department will consider all proposals for integration — in advance of any decisions regarding closures or amalgamations — so that full consideration is given to creating locally sustainable options.

It may also be worth considering whether Donaghadee High School is viable as a campus of Strangford College, and whether a solution can be found in that wider context. I would also like the Minister to consider the issue of viability criteria for integrated schools. Her predecessor, as Minister of Education, Mr McGuinness —

Mr Deputy Speaker: I invite you to draw your remarks to a close, Dr Farry. Do you wish to draw them to a close?

Dr Farry: I would like to continue, if I may. Are you telling me —

Mr Deputy Speaker: OK. Thank you. I call Mr Peter Weir.

Mr Weir: My colleague says that I should try to bring some sense to the proceedings. I welcome the opportunity for the debate, and I thank my colleague for raising the issue. With regard to Donaghadee High School, it is important to examine the recent history of the current proposal and to understand where it came from.

In March 2006, when the issue of general provision of education was considered in Donaghadee, the South-Eastern Education and Library Board (SEELB) convened a special workshop to deal with Donaghadee, Millisle and the north-east Ards area. A number of public representatives attended the workshop, including myself and my colleague from Ards Borough Council, Councillor Bell.

Alderman Wilson may well have been present, too. It was very clear from that workshop that both the board officials and members had reached a consensus that the way forward for Donaghadee was not amalgamation or the closure of its high school, but the creation of an all-age school — a suggestion that my colleague Alex Easton made.

A successful primary school already operates on the same site as the high school, so if there were greater integration and better throughput — allied with the current proposal for integrated status — there would be a clear route forward for the school. The Department, by its own admission, recognises that there is no post-primary integrated education provision in Bangor, Donaghadee or Millisle. Thus, if the school is given breathing space, a clear route forward can be taken that will make the school viable in the long term.

6.00 pm

However, the unelected commissioners who were imposed on the South Eastern Education and Library Board came up with the proposal for either closure of the school or its amalgamation with Movilla High School. Anyone who has talked to the parents, the governors or teachers of either Donaghadee High School or Movilla High School will know that that imposed solution clearly bears no relation to what would work on the ground. The proposal is opposed not only by all those involved with Donaghadee High School, but those involved with Movilla High School.

If Donaghadee High School were to be closed tomorrow, it would clearly not be a panacea for Movilla High School. The pupils from Donaghadee High School would not simply transfer to Movilla High School; they would be scattered around a wide range of schools. Thus, the proposal for amalgamation is very much a non-starter.

Within the framework of a new beginning for Donaghadee High School — by way of an all-age school and integrated status — it is clear that it is not the case that Donaghadee is a declining community whose reduced numbers could not sustain a high school. I think that I am right in saying that Dr Farry stated that if the school were to close, it would mean that Donaghadee would be the largest town in Northern Ireland without a secondary school.

Donaghadee and its surrounding area have experienced substantial growth in recent years, and is due to experience even greater growth in years to come. There is, therefore, clearly an influx of people who could sustain the school, if it is placed on the right footing. I appeal to the Department, even at this late hour, to show a degree common sense and give the school breathing space.

However, there is another issue at stake, and it has been touched on only briefly. Mention was made earlier of special-needs provision in Donaghadee, and, at present, some degree of provision has been put in place for about 90 children. More particularly, around 50 of those 90 children are in the separate special-needs unit of Donaghadee High School. What will happen to those children who currently are in an environment that enables them to progress and learn if Donaghadee High School closes? When questions were asked about that earlier this year, the Department indicated that there were no other special-needs units in the secondary sector in Millisle, Donaghadee or Bangor that could cater for the children involved.

Indeed, in the Department's response to a question from my colleague Miss McIlveen, there was not, at the stage, any evidence of expressions of interests from any other secondary school in the Bangor, Donaghadee or Millisle area that showed that they would be willing to take on those special-needs pupils. What is to happen to those children? Are they simply to be scattered to the four winds? All the good work that has been carried out in Donaghadee High School to nurture those pupils will go to waste.

It is clear that if Donaghadee High School is given a fresh opportunity and some space, and if the Department applies a bit of common sense, the situation can be turned around, and we can have a very successful school that contributes valuably to the local community. I appeal to the Minister to show that common sense today and to overturn the proposals of the unelected and out-of-touch commissioners of the South Eastern Education and Library Board. She should show a bit of faith in Donaghadee and retain Donaghadee High School. I urge the Minister to respond positively to the proposals that my colleagues and I have put forward today.

Mr B Wilson: Speaking as another unemployed member of the South Eastern Education and Library Board in the last year or so, I believe that this matter should not be decided by unelected commissioners but by the members of the South Eastern Board.

I support integrated education, and I have been involved in its promotion since the All Children Together campaigns nearly 20 years ago. This application for integrated status is valid because there is considerable demand for integrated education in North Down. As Mr Farry pointed out, Strangford College is over subscribed and Priory College could take more pupils. St Columbanus College in Bangor, although it is not the same type of school, is pretty well integrated, 50:50, and could take more pupils if it were allowed to do so. However, its intake has also been capped. The demand for children to be educated together is there, and that fact should be considered in this instance.

I would like to think that this application could be successful, but I am concerned that several applications for integrated status have been submitted by schools because they are under the threat of closure. That strategy may save schools for a couple of years, but in the longer term it may lead to unviability and closure. It is totally unacceptable to use integrated education as an excuse to keep a school open. However, I do not believe that that is the case as regards Donaghadee High School. It will be important for the school to consider its long-term enrolment, because there are serious problems; and the issue of long-term viability must be considered and other options prepared, if the viability criteria cannot be met.

The South Eastern Board figures show that Donaghadee High School enrolled 12 new mainstream pupils in September 2006 and did so again this year. If that situation were to continue, the school will have fewer than 100 pupils in five years' time. Nobody could argue that that number would make for a viable post-primary school, because enrolment would amount to one fifth of the target set by the Bain Report, and we should be looking to implement that report.

As other Members have said, more building is taking place in Donaghadee, and the figures I have mentioned might be only a blip — but we must be honest and admit that an annual enrolment of 12 pupils a year — [Interruption.]

Dr Farry: I thank the Member for giving way — I think he needs a glass of water.

Will the Member agree that there is a particularly strong case for changing the viability criteria as regards the religious balance of pupils in the integrated sector in north Down and Ards? In particular, it may be difficult to maintain the 70:30 Protestant/Catholic split over the 10-year target period. The large number of people — within what is defined as the minority segments — who define themselves as “others” should be taken into account in order to improve the viability of every school in that area.

Mr B Wilson: I agree. The population of north Down is imbalanced. However, there are many “others” who would not identify with either tradition but who would be very keen on integrated education. Donaghadee High School could provide a place for those children to go in the longer term.

However, it is not in the best interests of pupils to have a school with an enrolment of fewer than 100 pupils, which might be the case if present trends continue. Under such circumstances pupils might miss the many opportunities that would be available at larger schools. The Bain Report focused on amalgamations, or joining schools in partnerships so that they can use each others' facilities and maximise opportunities for their students. That is the way forward.

I hope that the Department of Education will reconsider Donaghadee High School's application for integrated status and that the application will be successful. There is a demand in the north Down area for such a school, and integrated status for Donaghadee High School would allow it to look forward to a brighter future.

Mr McFarland: I worry greatly about the current state of education policy. It is in a complete mess; there is a constant drip, drip, drip throughout the Province as schools close here and there. I am greatly concerned that there are moves afoot to close Donaghadee High School on viability criteria. It is deemed that there are not enough pupils to keep it open. The number of pupils at a school is related to the number of people who live in an area. I am sure that the Minister of Education has closely examined the regional development strategy, because that document gave Ards Borough Council 4,500 houses to build, and, for reasons known to itself, it volunteered to take an extra 3,000 houses. Some 7,500 houses are being built in the Movilla area of Newtownards and in Donaghadee. I urge the Minister to go to Donaghadee. Every time we canvass during an election campaign in Donaghadee, we need a map, because one, if not two, more estates have been built and roads expanded. It is a rapidly expanding town, with more people moving into the area. I cannot for the life of me understand how, with an expanding population and new houses being built, a decision to close the high school is in the offing.

I have also been in contact with the Minister about Priory College, which is being prevented from expanding because it does not have enough pupils. It does not have enough pupils because the system will not allow it to have any more pupils. That is a ludicrous, catch-22 situation, yet, as my colleague Mr Cree has said, an Irish-speaking school can be built for 12 pupils. The whole criteria policy is absolutely barking. The education system will probably develop into a system of something like academic schools and vocational schools, although how that system will evolve has not been decided. I cannot understand why it is in such a mess.

I urge the Minister to keep Donaghadee High School open until there is a clear education plan that takes into account the population increases in Donaghadee and the changes that are likely to come from a change in educational philosophy that results in a move either to academic schools and vocational schools or to another system. In the absence of any clear plan on the future of education, I urge the Minister not to close schools, and certainly not Donaghadee High School.

The Minister of Education (Ms Ruane): Go raibh maith agat. The future planning of the controlled schools estate in the South Eastern Education and Library Board area, which includes Donaghadee High School, is, in the first instance, a matter for the board. To date, the board has not submitted any proposals to the Department for Donaghadee High School.

Is eol dom go bhfuil an bord i ndiaidh dul i gcomhairle le gobharnóirí, foireann teagaisc, agus tuismitheoirí in Ardscoil Dhomhnach Daoi agus in Ardscoil Mhaigh Bhile maidir leis an fhéidearthacht go ndeanfaí an da scoil a chónascadh, le héifeacht ó Mhéan Fómhair 2008.

I am aware that the board has initiated consultation with governors, staff and parents at Donaghadee High School and Movilla High School on the possibility of amalgamating the two with effect from September 2008. Before I go into detail on that, I wish to make two points.

6.15 pm

First, please stop playing politics with the Irish language in schools. Members are not even comparing like with like, because today's debate is about post-primary schools. The criteria for the establishment of an Irish-medium school in the North of Ireland are exactly the same as for an English-medium school, whether in the maintained, controlled or any other sector.

To receive funding, Irish-medium schools must meet the same criteria as any other proposed new school. For primary schools — not post-primary schools — the year 1 intake must be at least 15 pupils in Belfast and Derry, and 12 pupils elsewhere. It is the same for controlled, maintained and integrated schools.

Therefore, that issue can be put to rest. I do not know about other Members, but I am sure that anyone listening to the debate is sick and tired of people abusing information, giving out wrong information and using scare tactics. The education system in the North presents enough difficulties. In the past couple of days, I had the unpleasant task of informing the principal of St Gabriel's College that the school does not have enough pupils. I take any decision on school closures extremely seriously. Therefore, I ask Members not to play at politics on the issue.

Donaghadee High School and Movilla High School have been experiencing falling enrolments, primarily as a result of demographic changes in the area. Donaghadee High School has an approved enrolment of 380 places. Ten years ago, its enrolment was 327 pupils, and today it has 213 pupils, including 48 children who attend a special unit. Movilla High School has an approved enrolment of 900 pupils. Ten years ago, its enrolment was 888 pupils, and the figure has now fallen to 652. It was in that context that the board determined that a review of school provision in the area was necessary.

After meetings on 15 May 2007, the SEELB advised that both boards of governors agreed that it was appropriate to consult staff and parents from the two schools on a possible amalgamation. Meetings were held during May and June with the board of governors, parents and staff of both schools. The SEELB will present the outcomes of those consultations to the commissioners to inform their decision-making. To date, no decisions have been made.

The parents of some children who attend Donaghadee High School are particularly concerned about the future of the special-needs provision at the school. The four special units located at Donaghadee High School cater for pupils with moderate learning difficulties from year 8 to year 10. That provision will remain for the 2007–08 academic year, and parents of pupils in the unit have been advised accordingly.

Whatever decisions the South Eastern Education and Library Board take on the future of Donaghadee High School, it has a statutory duty to make the special education provision and placement necessary to meet the needs of each individual child, as outlined in the statement of special needs.

In recent weeks, the board advised the Department that parents of children at Donaghadee High School had submitted a request to the school's board of governors that a ballot be held on whether the school should move to controlled, integrated status. As more than 20% of parents signed the request, the governors resolved to hold a ballot, and the Electoral Reform Society has been asked to conduct it. The board has advised that the closing date for the ballot is 22 October 2007 and, if successful, the board of governors must submit a development proposal to the South Eastern Education and Library Board for the school's transformation to integrated status.

Post-primary schools that seek to transform to integrated status must demonstrate the ability to draw at least 10% of their year 8 intake from the minority religion in the first year of operation, and the potential to achieve a figure of 30% in the longer term. Other factors that must be taken into account include the long-term viability of the school and evidence of the school's awareness of, commitment to, and preparation for, the process of integration. The impact of any change in status on other schools in the area must also be considered. The SEELB commissioners must decide whether to proceed with the proposal for the amalgamation. However, if it is decided to proceed with any change to the school, there is a statutory requirement for a development proposal to be published.

In response to Stephen Farry's question, no proposals have been published for Donaghadee High School. If two proposals are published at the same time, they will both be considered, in line with current procedures. All relevant information will be carefully considered before any decisions are made, including issues such as new housing estates, which Alan McFarland mentioned, and projected pupil numbers. Before such a proposal is published, there is a requirement for the relevant education and library board to consult any schools that may be affected. There is also a duty on the proposer to consult governors, parents and teachers of the school or schools that are the subject of the proposal.

Following publication of the proposal, there is a statutory period of two months during which representations can be made to the Department in support of — or against — the proposal. No doubt, I will receive letters from people requesting meetings about that, and I will be happy to meet those people. At the end of the two-month period, the Department evaluates all the relevant information on the proposal in order to decide whether it should be approved. All development proposals are considered on their individual merits. It would be inappropriate for me to comment on potential future proposals for Donaghadee High School, because I will be required to make a decision on any published development proposal and I cannot pre-empt the outcome of the development proposal process. However, it is important to recognise the issues that face us as we plan future education requirements.

The biggest issue that affects all of us is demographics. The demographic trends in the North of Ireland present the education system with the major challenge of ensuring that schools remain educationally viable and that they avoid inefficiencies arising from excess surplus capacity. The strategic review of education — the Bain Report — was undertaken in the context of important challenges that were presented by the reduction in pupil numbers. School rolls fell by 9%, which amounts to 30,000 pupils over the past decade, and they are projected to fall by a further 9.5%, which amounts to a further 30,000 pupils over the next 10 years. That places increasing strains on budgets and on teaching staff in schools with falling numbers, which can impact on the quality of children's education.

The Bain Report recommended that there be an estate of fewer, larger schools, with greater collaboration and integration in and across school sectors. I agree with the general thrust of the report and with the objective of providing modern fit-for-purpose schools that provide high-quality education for all our children. Many of the recommendations require further detailed work, and the report could certainly not be implemented overnight.

Dr Farry: Does the Minister recognise that schools in all sectors face difficult choices in respect of rationalisation? In the absence of revised up-to-date guidelines from the Department, resulting from the Bain Report on sustainable schools, when will the Minister's Department have that framework in place?

Ms Ruane: Go raibh maith agat. I wish to congratulate Dr Farry on his use of Irish earlier. We will have to find out the name of the UUP teacher who taught him at Queen's University, because he or she is obviously very good.

On a more serious note, I will address some of the issues that Dr Farry mentioned. The Bain Report recommended that provision should move to a system of schools that are educationally and financially viable for the long term, planned on an area basis. That should help to reduce problems of over-provision, provide the choice that parents and children need in a period of change to pupil numbers, and ensure that communities have the schools that they need.

Dr Farry pre-empted me on the sustainable schools policy. At the heart of area-based planning is the need to provide a system of strong, viable schools. We are considering the responses to the consultation on sustainable-schools policies. The draft policy document proposed the enrolment thresholds that had been recommended in the Bain Report, which were: 105 pupils for rural primary schools; 140 pupils for urban primary schools; and 500 pupils for post-primary schools for 11- to 16-year-olds, or 14- to 19-year-olds, or whatever the provision may be. The Bain Report did not state that schools below those levels automatically need to be rationalised. Instead, schools below those thresholds were to be reviewed to consider whether they continued to provide high-quality education for children.

Concerns about a school's viability are often only raised when enrolments have fallen irreversibly. The indicative criteria in the policy are intended to provide a framework for early consideration and possible remedial action. The level of enrolment is only one of six proposed criteria for helping to assess school viability. Others include the educational experience of the children, the financial position of the school, the leadership and management of the school, and its accessibility and links with the community. The core objective of the policy is high-quality education for children regardless of their background or where they live.

The entitlement framework is also part of the creation of the schools estate. The introduction of the revised curriculum and the entitlement framework aims to provide young people with a broad and balanced education, with access to a range of courses both generic, which means academic, and applied, which means vocational and technical.

The Education Order 2006 places a mandatory requirement on boards of governors to provide all pupils at grant-aided schools with access to the entitlement framework. From September 2009, schools will be required to provide pupils with access to a minimum number of courses at Key Stage 4 and post-16 levels. In both cases, at least one third of the courses must be general and one third applied, that is, vocational and technical. For most schools, some form of collaboration with other schools or FE (further education) colleges and training providers will be necessary to enable pupils to have that. I am glad to say that many post-primary schools are doing that now, and some of them are very successful. This is going to be very challenging for schools.

In conclusion, I have not received any proposals from the SEELB in relation to the future of Donaghadee High School.

Maidir le moltaí a thugann na húdaráis oideachais cuí chun cinn, beidh orm eispéiris na bpáistí atá i gceist a mheas anois agus sa todhchaí. Ba é seo an príomhshlat tomhais ar leagadh béim air is gcáipeis polasaí scoileanna inbhuanaithe. In regard to proposals brought forward by relevant education authorities, I must consider the educational experiences of the children concerned, both now and in the future. That was the key criterion highlighted in the sustainable-school policy document, and we are looking at it before announcing proposals.

I am sure that Members will agree that in all the proposals that I am asked to decide on, my prime concern must be the educational experiences of the children. However, the proper process must be adhered to. Although I welcome the opportunity to debate this issue, I feel that it is a little premature, because I have not received development proposals yet. Go raibh maith agat.

Monday 15 October 2007

The Assembly met at 12.00 noon (Mr Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

ASSEMBLY BUSINESS

Mr Speaker: Last Monday, Mr Attwood raised a point of order about the absence of a ministerial statement on a matter that he described as being “of heightened public interest”. I undertook to report back to the Assembly after discussing the matter with the Business Committee.

Although I understand that Members may feel frustrated, I stress that I cannot direct a member of the Executive to make a statement to the Assembly. That decision is for the Executive or the individual Minister concerned.

I am also aware that the Committee on Procedures is considering the possibility of allowing written statements. I await with interest the Committee’s decision on that.

In the meantime, however, I assure Members that I have encouraged — and will continue to encourage — the Executive to ensure that Ministers make statements to the House on important matters. I will continue to accommodate Ministers’ requests when at all possible.

Therefore, no breach of Standing Orders has occurred.

Mr Attwood: On a point of order, Mr Speaker —

Mr Speaker: I understand that the Member is anxious to respond, but I propose first to deal with another point of order that was raised in the House last week.

During last Tuesday’s debate on the Irish language, Mr Alban Maginness raised a point of order asking me to rule on the issue of a Member’s leaving and returning to the Chamber during debate, and, specifically, whether that was a discourtesy to the Assembly.

I have alerted the Business Committee previously to certain standards relating to the attendance of Members who wish to take part in debates. Those standards include: attending for, and making references to, earlier contributions; remaining in the Chamber for at least two further contributions after their own; and returning to the Chamber to hear the winding-up speeches. I have also said that Members should, during their own speeches, provide an explanation to the House if they find that they are unable to meet those standards.

Having considered the request from Mr Alban Maginness, I do not intend to take any further action on the specific incident that gave rise to his query. However, all Members should act in an orderly manner at all times, both towards one another and to the Speaker and Deputy Speakers. Members should take care not to obstruct the business of the Assembly or challenge the authority of the Speaker, and I remind Members that Standing Order 60 allows the Speaker to take action if Members choose to behave inappropriately.

Although I am grateful to Mr Alban Maginness for raising the issue, I hope that we will not have to return to this matter soon.

Mr Attwood, you indicated that you wish to raise a point of order.

Mr Attwood: Thank you for the attention that you have paid to this matter, Mr Speaker. I welcome that you have said today that, where appropriate, you would encourage Ministers to make statements.

On a point of order, given that there is no procedure for written statements only as a means of communicating with Members of the House, is it in order for Ministers to use a note to Members as an alternative to a statement, when such a note is, in content, character, nature and in all other circumstances, the equivalent to statements that are covered by the Standing Orders of the House? The minute — as it was described — that was forwarded to MLAs last week through their pigeonholes was a statement in character, nature, content and in all ways.

Mr Speaker: I hear what the Member says. However, Standing Orders are clear. It was not a statement to the House — and that is the issue. It is for individual Ministers to decide whether to send letters or notes. I have said to the Business Committee and to the House continually that it is not for the Speaker to direct Ministers or the Executive on when they should bring ministerial statements to the House. Standing Orders cover ministerial statements only when they are brought to the House.

EXECUTIVE BUSINESS

Draft Renewables Obligation (Amendment) Order (Northern Ireland) 2007

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment (Mr Dodds): I beg to move

That the draft Renewables Obligation (Amendment) Order (Northern Ireland) 2007 be approved.

I seek the Assembly's approval of this statutory rule, which introduces a technical amendment to the operation of the Northern Ireland renewables obligation (NIRO). The amendment is necessary to maintain the effective operation of the NIRO in the single electricity market for the island of Ireland. Therefore, there is the need for the Order to be in place by 1 November 2007, which is the go-live date for the single electricity market.

This statutory rule is being made under powers contained in the Energy (Northern Ireland) Order 2003, which prescribes that the Order must be laid in draft for approval by affirmative legislation of the Assembly. Nonetheless, although there is a statutory requirement for this detailed legislative procedure, I should explain at the outset that this particular statutory rule is purely technical: it involves no change to existing policy; it has no cross-cutting elements, and it is non-controversial.

I will now outline why the amendment is needed and also give some background to the renewables obligation, because it is a complex mechanism to comprehend for anyone who is not closely associated with its operation. NIRO is the main plank in our renewables policy. Since its introduction in 2005, it has supported the development of renewable sources of electricity generation in Northern Ireland as we progress towards our target of 12% for the proportion of our electricity that is to come from such sources by 2012. To date, the success of NIRO has been evident in the 60% increase in planning applications for wind farms during its first year of operation and the fact that we now have 1,000 MW of wind capacity in the planning process.

NIRO provides a financial incentive to eligible generators and renewables developers through a system of certificates known as NIROCs, which are awarded for each megawatt-hour of their output that is consumed in Northern Ireland. Those certificates are, in turn, needed by electricity suppliers to demonstrate that the proportion of their sales specified in the NIRO legislation for any particular year can be accounted for by renewables generation. Otherwise, they must pay a buyout fee to meet their obligation under NIRO.

NIROCs, therefore, have a tradable value, which is typically in the region of £40 to £50 and which provides an additional revenue stream to generators of green electricity. NIRO operates in tandem with similar obligations in Great Britain in a single United Kingdom-wide market for these renewables obligation certificates. That provides a viable market for such certificates and ensures the effective operation of NIRO. Moreover, the fact that the mechanism is enshrined in legislation provides certainty for investors and developers alike.

The introduction of the single market in electricity, and, specifically, the all-island wholesale pool into which all generators with a capacity of over 10 MW of electricity must sell out, will introduce complications for the operation of NIRO. That is because electricity is purchased from the pool by suppliers across Northern Ireland and the Irish Republic, and it will, therefore, be difficult for our renewables generators to confirm that they are meeting NIRO criteria and that their output is consumed in Northern Ireland.

The provisions of the statutory rule before the Assembly are intended to address that issue. They augment the existing criteria specified in article 16 of the Renewables Obligation Order (Northern Ireland) 2007 to take account of electricity sold through the single market. Specifically, they will enable generators who sell electricity into the single electricity market pool to comply with the criterion relating to supply in Northern Ireland by entering into a bilateral agreement, referred to in the draft Order as a "relevant arrangement", with a Northern Ireland supplier. That "relevant arrangement" will account for equivalent amounts of electricity being sold into the pool by the generators and purchased from the pool and sold to customers in Northern Ireland by the supplier. I am sure that Members will be grateful if I do not give a line-by-line explanation of the draft Order, but I am happy to provide any clarification needed in response to Members' questions.

The Order will ensure that generators of renewable electricity — both existing generators and new developers — will be able to access the financial benefits of NIRO under the new single-market arrangements. Fundamentally, it will ensure that Northern Ireland's renewables policy remains robust and effective after the introduction of the new arrangements on 1 November.

I want to refer briefly to the other small technical amendment in this statutory rule. Members will note that article 3 of the draft Order amends references to "the Company" in the 2007 Order from "Northern Ireland Electricity plc" to "NIE Energy Ltd". That reflects the structural changes being made to NIE's business in order to comply with article 15 of the European directive concerning common rules for corporate restructure, which, in the case of NIE, will separate its supply activities from its distribution activities.

The Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment (Mr P Maskey): Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. The Committee considered proposals relating to the operation of the Northern Ireland renewables obligation (NIRO) within the single electricity market on 22 May 2007, and then again on 26 June 2007. NIRO is the main policy mechanism to promote the development of renewable sources of electricity, and it plays a critical role in ensuring the continuing viability of renewable generating stations such as wind farms.

The Committee has considered the necessity of the Order in maintaining the integrity and effectiveness of NIRO within the single electricity market that is due to be introduced to the island of Ireland on 1 November 2007. Following consideration of the proposals for NIRO, the Committee subsequently considered the Order on 18 September and recommends that it be affirmed by the Assembly. Go raibh maith agat.

Mr Gallagher: I have a few points to make, and I will take them in the order in which the Minister dealt with them. He mentioned the number of planning applications that are in the system; I am sure that many Members will agree with me that applications for wind farms and other forms of renewable electricity are spending far too many years in that planning system. There are a great many obstacles there to be overcome. Given the importance of achieving the targets that have been referred to — and, in my view, we should be aiming to exceed those targets — there must be a more streamlined system for dealing with planning applications. They certainly need to be dealt with in a shorter time frame than at present.

My reason for making that point is that there is massive investment behind each of those applications, and the investors are unlikely to hang around for three or four years while our planners take the applications through the system. They can go to other countries in Europe — and, indeed, outside Europe — and have their plans dealt with in months, or certainly within one year.

The Minister referred to bilateral arrangements between companies — no doubt they are helpful to those involved. However, this problem goes beyond such arrangements. As far as the island of Ireland is concerned, with the single energy market coming in on 1 November 2007, there must be an arrangement between the two Governments to facilitate and promote the development of alternatives.

The current mechanism allows for the NIROCs to be tradable, but they are only tradable in Northern Ireland and the UK. Given the potential in the north-west of this island, and particularly in Ulster and Connaught, for the promotion of wind farms, there should be a mechanism that allows those certificates to be traded across the border. I call on the Minister to consult with the Irish Government about putting such a mechanism in place. I understand that, even if it were in place, there would be a problem as far as the Irish Government are concerned, because they have no equivalent of the NIROC system. I understand that their system is known by the acronym REFIT, which stands for the Renewable Energy Feed-In Tariff scheme. There is a challenge there for the Governments, and it is time that they got down to the work of harmonising the two markets and removing the restrictions to which I have referred. This island is the second-best wind resource in Europe and has the potential to produce much more electricity. The two Governments should be developing that potential.

I welcome the creation of a viable market, but I want to see a viable all-Ireland market as well, so that renewables can be sourced and traded on either side of the border. In that way, we will be taking steps to ensure that we achieve our targets.

Mr Neeson: I very much welcome the development of the single electricity market, and I look forward to proposals for the creation of a single natural-gas market. I have two questions for the Minister. First, will he assure me that he and his Department will co-operate with other Executive Departments on increasing the development of renewable energy sources in Northern Ireland? Secondly, will he update the Assembly on the progress made on the wave-power experiment in Strangford Lough?

Mr Newton: I thank the Minister for his statement. This is an important piece of legislation, and progress in this area will be welcomed by householders and the business community across the board. It is an example of co-operation with another state that will bring benefit to our people and, in the longer term especially, to the manufacturing industry, which is under great pressure.

The Minister will be fully aware that over the past years there has been a lobby for competitive supplies of all forms of energy in Northern Ireland, particularly the supply of electricity, and that there has been a strong feeling that more could have been done to bring unit costs more in line with those in other parts of the United Kingdom.

I note that the draft Renewables Obligation (Amendment) Order (Northern Ireland) 2007 imposes a compulsion on all electricity suppliers who are licensed under the Electricity (Single Wholesale Market)(Northern Ireland) Order 2007 to supply customers in Northern Ireland with specific amounts of electricity from renewable sources and, indeed, that targets have been set. That is to be welcomed. It is a step forward and will be welcomed by everyone; in particular, by those who are concerned about the environment. I suppose that we all should share that concern.

It is a very technical piece of legislation; however, the salient facts are easily understood. Suppliers must meet a legal requirement to account for a specific amount, and an increasing proportion, of their electricity being supplied from renewable sources. That cannot be a bad thing. Alternatively, they must pay a buy-out fee that is proportionate to any shortfall. They must also provide evidence of compliance by presenting renewable obligation certificates from generators of renewable energy for each megawatt hour of eligible output.

In welcoming the Minister's statement, I am pleased that, in general, it is another indication of the Assembly working, and I hope that the benefits of the legislation may soon be seen across all sections of the Northern Ireland community.

Mr Storey: I support the motion, and I concur with the comments made by the Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone Mr Gallagher about the number of applications for wind farms that are currently in the system. Some have a particular importance and relevance for my own constituency of North Antrim. I concur also with the remarks of my colleague the Member for East Belfast Mr Newton with regard to the provision of this benefit to the Northern Ireland economy.

Although the Minister rightly said that the amendment introduced by Statutory Rule in the House today is technical, it gives Members an opportunity to focus their minds on the importance of encouraging the use of renewable energy sources such as wind, water, solar power and biomass. I take this opportunity also to remind the Minister and the House of the ongoing concerns in my constituency with regard to the particular problem that we have under the ground — lignite. I reassure the Minister that those concerns are still there, and in the light of the importance that is given to documentation with regard to renewables, I trust that that lignite will remain firmly under the ground for the rest of our generation and will never be exploited as a fossil fuel.

That being the case, I welcome the Minister's announcement. He referred to the target of 12% of electricity from renewable sources by 2012. That is just five years away, so it is important that we give that target the priority that it deserves.

I welcome the proposed amendment to The Renewables Obligation Order (Northern Ireland) 2007, even though it will be a technical amendment. The single electricity market is imminent, so it is only right and proper that, under the renewables obligation, our renewable generators get the credit for supplying energy to Northern Ireland consumers. Can the Minister indicate the likely financial loss to the renewables industry if the current position is not rectified as proposed? Moreover, I should appreciate it if the Minister were to clarify whether a wind farm in the Irish Republic would qualify for a certificate if it were linked directly to the Northern Ireland grid.

The single electricity market has had negative press in recent days. Does the Minister agree that it has the potential to transform the electricity market in Northern Ireland? Does he agree that it could open up new and exciting possibilities for a regional European market that involves the rest of the United Kingdom and countries such as France?

In conclusion, I should appreciate it if the Minister were to agree that such a competitive market potentially has the dynamic to deliver considerable benefits to Northern Ireland's electricity consumers.

Mr Dodds: I am grateful to all Members who contributed to the debate for their consideration of this draft Statutory Rule. I am pleased to note the broad support for its provisions. The draft Order is technical, and it deals with a complicated area, but Members touched on important points.

I shall try to deal with particular points that Members raised, but if I am unable to do so now, I shall respond in writing to Members in greater detail.

Mr Gallagher raised the matter of the planning context and the need to streamline decisions. As he will be aware, those responsibilities fall primarily to the Department of the Environment. However, I assure him that my Department will work closely at official level with the Department of the Environment, because, from our perspective, we wish to process those matters as quickly as possible.

Moreover, Mr Gallagher mentioned the harmonisation of renewable support mechanisms for Northern Ireland and the Irish Republic. There have been indications that the Irish Republic will follow Northern Ireland down the renewables obligation route. As was mentioned, the Irish Republic decided to introduce a feed-in tariff as its principal support mechanism.

Attempts to make financial support in one jurisdiction available to generators in another would be fraught with complications. Harmonisation of the existing renewable-energy support schemes in Northern Ireland and the Republic presents practical difficulties that would take considerable time to address. As I mentioned, different schemes operate in the two jurisdictions. The Irish Republic operates a feed-in tariff, while NIRO is linked to the renewables obligation in Great Britain. Moreover, separate state-aid approvals would require separate renegotiation with the European Union. Therefore, major problems exist with the kind of approach that Mr Gallagher outlined.

Mr Neeson spoke positively about the single electricity market, and I welcome his comments. I shall deal with the more general issues that he raised in a moment. In particular, he mentioned the project for Strangford Lough, and I know that that topic has been raised on several occasions. The proposal for a marine-current turbine would put the lough at the leading edge of tidal-stream technology. If the turbine is successfully installed, the project will be a renewables exemplar for the world, providing 1 MW of marine-based electricity to the Northern Ireland grid.

12.30 pm

Plans to install the turbine in August 2007 had to be aborted because of technical difficulties that were outside the developer's control. I am informed that any revised installation date will have to take account of seasonal and environmental issues as well as the availability of the necessary installation equipment.

I am grateful to Robin Newton for his contribution and for his positive remarks about the single electricity market. Although that issue is not being debated, it is relevant in the context of the draft Renewable Obligation (Amendment) Order (Northern Ireland) 2007. Several Members, including Mervyn Storey, have already — and rightly — described the benefits that the single electricity market brings to Northern Ireland. That market is a good classic example of the sort of economic co-operation that works for the mutual benefit of business and domestic electricity consumers in the Irish Republic and Northern Ireland. It makes sense to co-operate in that area.

Under a wider EU policy aim, of which the single electricity market forms a part, not only will the electricity markets in Northern Ireland and the Irish Republic be linked eventually, but they will be connected to the market in Great Britain and, ultimately, to that in France. That will create further benefits for domestic and business consumers across a much wider area, thereby representing a positive development for our consumers. An independent cost-benefit analysis has estimated that those links will create overall net benefits that are worth £103 million over 10 years. Those benefits, most of which will go to consumers, will be split between Northern Ireland and the Irish Republic. The new market has the potential to deliver additional dynamic benefits of £135 million to £170 million across the island over 10 years to facilitate the creation of more competitive and wholesale retail markets.

Those are important points, especially given that some comments have been made about the introduction of a policy that sometimes focuses on increases in tariffs. It is important to bear in mind that the overall effect of the introduction of the new arrangements will lead to downward pressure on prices in the medium to long term.

As Mervyn Storey tends to do assiduously on behalf of his constituents, he also mentioned lignite. It is no surprise that he chose to mention that subject again today. May I put his mind and, no doubt, those of his constituents to rest by making it clear that my Department's policy focus remains on increasing the use of renewable energy rather than on the exploitation of alternative fossil fuel sources. The Geological Survey of Northern Ireland has proposed a three-year extension to the moratorium on lignite. People will welcome that move as a positive step, and I know that the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment discussed the issue recently.

Mr Storey also mentioned the potential financial loss if the draft Order did not amend NIRO. If we do not approve the draft Order today, a failure to provide for NIRO within the single electricity market could lead to an annual loss to the existing renewables industry of around £9 million. Therefore, although the draft Order is technical in nature, it has an important effect.

Members also asked what would happen if generators in the Irish Republic were granted renewable obligation certificates. As I have said, the Irish Republic operates a separate grant-based support scheme for its indigenous renewable generation, and NIRO precludes generating stations that are located outside Northern Ireland from being eligible for renewable obligation certificates.

I conclude by restating the importance of the draft Order to ensuring the effectiveness of NIRO in the new single-market arrangements. It is imperative that Northern Ireland develops increased sources of renewable energy as we seek to play our part in addressing climate change and making our energy supply more secure.

The draft Order will ensure that our renewables policy remains robust and effective in the new electricity-market arrangements. I am delighted to be able to introduce this important piece of Executive legislation. Members on all sides of the House will be delighted to know that we are discussing legislation, albeit technical and complex legislation. Nevertheless, it is important, effective legislation that will — and does — make a difference for the people whom we represent.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That the draft Renewable Obligation (Amendment) Order (Northern Ireland) 2007 be approved.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

Bill of Rights Forum Membership

Mr Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for this debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes to propose and 10 minutes for a winding-up speech. All other Members who wish to speak will have five minutes. Two amendments have been received and are published on the Marshalled List. The proposer of each amendment will have 10 minutes to propose and five minutes for a winding-up speech.

Miss McIlveen: I beg to move

That this Assembly acknowledges that the unionist community has been largely excluded from the human rights process in Northern Ireland and under-represented within the human rights sector, resulting in the Bill of Rights Forum having a clear imbalance in the composition of its membership; believes that without the support of all sections of our community any Bill of Rights process is fundamentally flawed; and calls upon the Secretary of State to address these problems urgently, by ensuring processes that will facilitate better engagement with the unionist community and ensuring that the membership of the Bill of Rights Forum is more reflective of all the people of Northern Ireland.

Throughout history, those of the unionist tradition have had no difficulties with the issue of human rights in general; we need only look at the Bill of Rights, which was enacted in 1689 as a result of the activities of King James II. That piece of legislation is so good that the Republic of Ireland decided to retain it under the Statute Law Revision Act 2007. Indeed, it remains in force in the United Kingdom. In fact, it formed the basis of that most vaunted piece of legislation, the US Bill of Rights, which was produced in 1789.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr McClarty] in the Chair)

In addition to the Bill of Rights, we also have the Human Rights Act 1998, which incorporates into UK law the European Convention on Human Rights. The rights that are espoused are protected and enforced by an independent judiciary. Given that those two fundamental pieces of legislation are in place, I wonder why we need a Bill of Rights Forum at all. The answer is, of course, contained in the Belfast Agreement, in which a:

“new Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission...will be invited to consult and to advise on the scope for defining, in Westminster legislation, rights supplementary to those in the European Convention on Human Rights, to reflect the particular circumstances of Northern Ireland, drawing as appropriate on international instruments and experience. These additional rights to reflect the principles of mutual respect for the identity and ethos of both communities and parity of esteem, and — taken together with the ECHR — to constitute a Bill of Rights for Northern Ireland.”

The Bill of Rights Forum's role is to formulate recommendations to the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission (NIHRC) as it fulfils its statutory duty in providing advice to the Secretary of State on a future bill of rights for Northern Ireland.

I am sure that Members will agree that those are noble enough sentiments. However, surely bodies that are set up to protect the rights of the people of Northern Ireland should be reflective of those people.

In the first incarnation of the NIHRC, a unionist with a capital “u” could not have been found about the place. However, one would have found: Tom Donnelly of the SDLP; Angela Hegarty, a former vice-chairperson of the SDLP; Francis McGuinness of Trócaire; and Ms Patricia Kelly of the Children's Law Centre. Patricia Kelly was on the board of the Centre for Research and Documentation in west Belfast. That body was co-founded by Caitríona Ruane, the Minister of Education and expert in South American human rights, and it is renowned for its publication of republican literature.

Selection for the NIHRC was intended, naturally, to portray community balance: instead, it was reflective of a sector that has been skewed against unionists. Some efforts have gone into rectifying the situation in the present incarnation of the NIHRC, but the mistakes are once again evident in the Bill of Rights Forum.

Even though the forum comprises three representatives each from the DUP, UUP, SDLP and Sinn Féin respectively and two representatives from the Alliance Party — which is not indicative of the electoral wishes of the people of Northern Ireland — it is completed by 14 unelected representatives. I say “representatives”, but in the majority of cases, there is no accountability.

Two unelected representatives are from the Churches: one from the Roman Catholic Church, and one from the Irish Council of Churches, which has amongst its membership representatives from congregations as diverse as the Russian Orthodox Church, the Rock of Ages Cherubim and Seraphim Church, the Antiochian Orthodox Church in Ireland, the Church of Ireland and the Presbyterian Church. The evangelical Churches in Northern Ireland do not have the benefit of a voice on the forum. Of the 102,221 other Christian-related church attendees who took part in the 2001 census, approximately 95,000 have no say.

The alternate to Annie Campbell, as women's representative on the forum, is Margaret Ward — a widely published author of numerous books about militant Irish nationalist women. It does not take an incredible stretch of the imagination to appreciate her political leanings: they are a little more red than pink. She is director of the women's resource and development agency, and is co-convenor, along with Sorcha McKenna, of the children and young people and women's working group. Children are represented by Patricia Kelly. I have no difficulty with republican children being represented, but unionist children must also have a champion.

The human rights sector is represented by Aileen Gilmore of the Committee on the Administration of Justice (CAJ), who is also convener of the working group for the preamble and interpretation. Kieran McEvoy sits on the working group for civil and political rights, and Maggie Beirne sits on the working group for economic and social rights.

The CAJ is no friend of unionism, and that is clear from its recent report 'Equality in Northern Ireland: the rhetoric and the reality'. It styles itself as an independent, cross-community, human rights organisation, but its documents reek of anti-unionism and anti-Britishness. The CAJ does not sit on the working group for criminal justice and victims, but its appointed legal advisers are Mary O'Rawe and Linda Moore who have been published by the CAJ. Mary O'Rawe has appeared as a member of the CAJ before the House of Commons along with previous NIHR chief commissioner, Brice Dickson — hardly anything to enhance unionist confidence.

Mr Attwood: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. Will you make a ruling on whether it is appropriate for a Member to list people's names — [Interruption.]

Mr Campbell: That is not a point of order.

Mr Attwood: It is a point of order, and I ask the Member to hear me out. Is it in order for a Member to list a series of people's names in the House for the record, associate those people with the CAJ and subsequently refer to them as producing documents that "reek of anti-unionism and anti-Britishness"? Is it in order to associate individuals with that sort of partisan and narrow comment? Is it not out of order that those people are named in such a way?

Mr Deputy Speaker: The simple answer to your question, Mr Attwood, is that it is in order to do so: it is part and parcel of political cut and thrust, and that is why Members have limited privilege in the House.

Mr Attwood: It may well be cut and thrust between political parties and politicians, but to visit those sorts of comments upon individuals who are carrying out their functions in the public world — I suggest to you, Mr Deputy Speaker — is out of order and inappropriate for the House.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Mr Attwood, I have made a ruling. It is perfectly in order.

Miss McIlveen: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker. I was merely setting the scene and putting my comments into context.

12.45 pm

Amazingly, at a time when Northern Ireland seeks a bill of rights to:

"reflect the particular circumstances of Northern Ireland"

the Loyal Orders are not given their voice in any of the working groups, let alone in the forum itself. Instead, they have been given the token status of observer. What is more particular to Northern Ireland than our marching culture? The Orange Order has around 75,000 members. On the other side of the coin, Mr Hanway, the representative of the Travelling community, speaks for 7,100 Travellers, according to the 2001 census.

Over the years, Northern Ireland's human rights sector has been hijacked for political purposes by anti-unionists. People who would not have been elected are given equal, and sometimes greater, status than those who have been mandated by the electorate of Northern Ireland. The NIHR was meant to reflect the community make-up but does not, and neither does the Bill of Rights Forum.

Valid issues were raised in 'The Irish News' last week, when it was claimed that the bill of rights was in danger of becoming "a left-wing wish list". That is little wonder, with the panel of communists, Marxists and socialists that has been assembled. I echo the representations made by the CBI to the NIHR that:

"additional rights should only be included where there is clear evidence that the ECHR does not cater adequately for the particular circumstances of Northern Ireland."

The Loyal Orders and the evangelical churches do not have a voice. Political representatives on the forum do not correlate with the views of the voting public, and the politics of Members who have been nominated to act for women, children and human rights are patently, and unequivocally, anti-unionist. The power to deal with that rests with the Secretary of State.

Those issues, raised by the DUP since the first meeting of the forum, have yet to be adequately addressed. There will be no confidence in the forum unless there is a balance.

The Assembly needs to send out a message to the Secretary of State that for a bill of rights for Northern Ireland to reflect the principles of mutual respect and parity of esteem for the identity and ethos of both communities, the body charged with advising the NIHR must itself reflect those principles.

I ask Members to support the motion.

Mr A Maginness: I beg to move amendment No 1: Leave out all after "Assembly" and insert

"believes that a successful bill of rights process requires the input and support of all sections of our community; welcomes the cross-party, cross-community and cross-sectoral participation in the Bill of Rights Forum; acknowledges that additional resources have been granted to enable greater outreach to priority groups, including the unionist community; and wishes the forum well in all its endeavours."

This is a very important debate, and a good opportunity to place on record the work of the forum to date and its noble objective to reach agreement on additional rights for people living in Northern Ireland.

For most of Northern Ireland's history, certainly since the 1920s and through the Troubles, we have not had a rights-based society, and it is important for us to build one. We have had a society based on security considerations instead of rights. Now, we see a transformation into a rights-based society in which we are all winners, and a bill of rights will strengthen the safeguards and develop that culture of rights for all of us.

Throughout the world, the human rights culture arose from the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of 1948, the genesis for which was the Second World War and the horrific crimes committed by the Nazis and others.

So horrible was the experience of people who lived through that war that they were determined to eradicate such horrors, in so far as they could. That is why we have the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, of which the European Convention on Human Rights is reflective. It is important for all of us to remember that. We are dealing with something that is of great value and worth to our society, and which has shaped and formed many political systems throughout the world, particularly here in Ireland, Britain and throughout Europe. It is important that Members support human rights.

Human rights are not partisan, but reflect universal rights throughout the world. In trying to create a bill of rights, we are attempting to help everyone in our society.

The bill of rights arises from the Belfast Agreement, and the forum arises from the St Andrews Agreement. It is important that all Members remember that, and to bear in mind that those who seek to criticise that process are criticising what was agreed at St Andrews. The terms of reference for the forum are reflective of the original terms of reference in the Good Friday Agreement: that rights that are supplementary to the European Convention of Human Rights should be devised for the circumstances of Northern Ireland. The forum has been set that task. That is an important task and it will ultimately advise the NIHRC, which will present the bill of rights to Westminster, where, hopefully, it will be enacted through legislation. That is an important exercise.

There has been criticism that that exercise has been biased in some way. I cannot understand that. The terms of reference and the make-up of the forum show that it is clearly representative of the whole of society. It has 14 political representatives who represent all the main strands of political opinion in Northern Ireland, and that could not be fairer or more proportionate. The non-political representation reflects a vast cross section of our society, taking in the trade unions, the employers, the Churches, the human rights non-governmental organisation (NGO) sector, and the community and voluntary sectors. How much more representative could one get?

I have heard criticisms of individuals and, Mr Deputy Speaker, you have said that it is in order for Members to criticise people. However, it is not necessary for a Member to name individuals in that process. That is wrong because those individuals do not have an opportunity to respond, and it is wrong to personalise such matters. Those are good organisations. For example, the Committee on the Administration of Justice is a long-standing organisation that has done good and effective work in a wide range of justice and human rights issues. It has won international accolade —

Mr Weir: The Member has mentioned the Committee on the Administration of Justice, which has, apparently, done good work. Is that a different Committee on the Administration of Justice to the one that is commonly known?

Mr McCartney: Where is the point of order?

Mr Weir: If the Member listened, he would know that that was an intervention, not a point of order.

Is that a different CAJ to the one that the rest of us know?

Mr A Maginness: I do not understand the criticisms of the CAJ, which has been recognised by serious international bodies as an outstanding model of an NGO in this field. Members may laugh and sneer as much as they want, but that is the reality. The CAJ goes about its work seriously and professionally — not in a partisan fashion. That also applies to many of the other organisations that have been criticised today.

The Bill of Rights Forum was constructed to reflect the totality of society. If there are deficiencies, people are free to present their points of view. Recently, the forum, under the able chairmanship of Chris Sidoti, received an additional £100,000 of Government funding in order to engage in outreach work and to appoint outreach workers — the thing that Members have criticised it for lacking. The forum has that capacity, has been given that money and will carry out that work. The criticisms of it are misplaced.

The forum engages in valuable work. It is tedious, painstaking and difficult to reach consensus on such difficult issues. It is of value to every Member of the House and everybody in the community. The least that we can do is to show support for the forum's good work. It is serious work, its members are serious, and political criticism of those people is extremely unfair. I believe that they would totally reject such criticisms.

Members of the Bill of Rights Forum have a sincere and open agenda. They come from different sectors and, of course, they have individual political — and other — points of view. However, they are united in a consensus to achieve the best possible bill of rights for everyone in Northern Ireland. Members should support them.

Ms Anderson: I beg to move amendment No 2: Leave out all after “acknowledges” and insert

“that the involvement of all people in the process leading to a bill of rights is vital; and that the absence of real participation and representation from within any sector would make the achievement of a bill of rights more difficult.”

Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Ba mhaith liom seasamh i gcoinne an mholta agus ar son an leasaithe. I speak against the motion and in favour of amendment No 2. I welcome the debate and thank Gregory and Michelle for tabling the motion and for getting it on the Order Paper. Go raibh míle maith agat. Sinn Féin is content to support the SDLP amendment.

The proposal for a bill of rights goes to the heart of the historic process in which we are engaged. The heart is as much in the process as it is in the end product, and the process must achieve the real, inclusive participation of each and every sector of society. It is important for any sector that feels excluded from the process to action a remedy, and Members must ensure the greatest possible participation in order to make real the notion of democracy as a dynamic, ongoing, persistent and two-way dialogue between the Government and the governed.

As the DUP is aware, the NIO conducted a consultation process on the remit and composition of the round-table forum. Despite the fact that many, including Sinn Féin, wished to have a more balanced forum, the final product strikes an adequate representative balance. Furthermore, the DUP agreed to the establishment of the Bill of Rights Forum at St Andrews.

All parties in the forum have made the point that the observer facility must be used to address some of the gaps. The forum has many observers at its meetings, including organisations such as the WAVE victims' group and the Loyal Orders. I hope that Irish speakers and the GAA will also attend soon.

Overall, the members of the forum comprise an even balance of representatives from political and civic society.

Every forum member has agreed that, in addition to the forum's outreach programme, members have a wider responsibility to engage their constituencies and sectors so that they act as conduits for engaging the public in the bill of rights debate.

1.00 pm

Many of the organisations represented on the forum deal with the rights of elderly people, disabled people, women and children, to name but a few. Those cross-cutting rights affect substantial sections of the population, regardless of religious or political affiliation. Therefore, it would be entirely wrong to suggest that sectors of the forum are partisan; they represent society as a whole. Shame on Michelle McIlveen; she has tarnished the names of groups that work hard for the people in our communities.

The special circumstances of our histories in the North necessitated the right to define, by participation, all the people in that discourse. The forum has identified many groups to which it must reach out, including those in the unionist and nationalist communities as well as those that do not identify with either community.

We have the opportunity to influence the drawing up of a bill of rights that enshrines, and rests on, the core values of humanity, human dignity, equality, freedom, non-racism and non-sexism. We must promote genuine agreement across political divides that human rights are for all. They are not a zero-sum game to be played out between conflicting partisan interests. We are not looking for an equal, negotiated balance between sides in a conflict; we are looking to the greater principles that underpin our humanity and can enable us to build a future that is not marred by unacceptable histories of conflict and division.

The fundamental issue, on which all this is based, is the participative process. Hence, the forum must employ outreach workers because, while sections of our community are excluded — or feel excluded — we are confined to the straitjacket of seeing this huge adventure as a zero-sum game.

The disconnection between the forum and the communities was discussed at length at the bill of rights conference in Derry over the weekend. All delegates agreed that the issue required urgent attention and that outreach workers must be employed as soon as possible.

However, from the outset, the crucial measure of the forum's success — the very basis of its legitimacy — is that the majority of people, whatever their race, religion, ethnicity, political or community affiliation, can say that the bill of rights is theirs.

If the bill of rights is to achieve ongoing dialogue between the governed and the Government, we must be committed to the transformation of society. We have the opportunity to do that now. We must clearly negotiate the inseparable and inextricable link between civic/political rights and social/economic rights. The bill of rights must provide and deliver a remedy, or its legitimacy and people's trust in its participating groups will vanish.

People justifiably expect that the peace process and the power-sharing Executive will vindicate rights. They await education, training, apprenticeships and good jobs for all, housing — and affordable housing at that — that will enable all people to live in safety, peace and stability, without fear, and that will allow everyone to develop their full capabilities.

A bill of rights must protect the disadvantaged, such as the 82-year-old woman, known only as YL, who had Alzheimer's disease and who was evicted from a private care home in England, which was carrying out a public function. Such cases could happen here, but they must not be allowed to, and a bill of rights could prevent them from happening.

We must recognise that minorities must be protected from the majority, especially in a democracy in which minorities can always be outvoted and majorities remain indifferent. The involvement of all people and organisations, such as the Anti-Poverty Network, which is concerned about poverty wherever it resonates, is crucial. The absence of participation in representation from any sector makes the achievement of a bill of rights more difficult. It takes courage.

We must protect the freedom of expression of those whose opinions we find most obnoxious and respect the religious beliefs of those whose moral philosophy conflicts with our own most deeply held convictions.

Our bill of rights should become a beacon to Ireland, Europe and the world. It should be worthy of what has been described as one of the great triumphs of the human spirit — the power-sharing Executive that has been established here.

It is vital that all the people are involved in the process that leads to a bill of rights. The Bill of Rights Forum is clear that additional work is needed to engage with many groups, including those who may potentially mistrust the concept of human rights.

It is not simply a case of one community that is identified as not having engaged fully in the consultation process undertaken by the Human Rights Commission. The forum has agreed to target outreach efforts at engaging others too, such as the disabled, children, and those living in rural communities and TSN areas.

It is wrong to single out one community or group above all others. The bill of rights needs to be the people's document, and we, in this Assembly, must lend our support to the facilitation of a process that will make it possible to better engage all the people, resulting in nothing less than rights for all. Go raibh mile maith agat.

Mr Kennedy: I am pleased to participate in what is private Members' motion number 69 in the lifetime of this Assembly. I say that by way of context because the Ulster Unionist Party has advocated a bill of rights for a long time. As far back as 1972 our party proposed the introduction of:

“a precise and comprehensive Bill of Rights.”

Throughout the 1980s and 1990s, we urged that the European Convention on Human Rights be incorporated into United Kingdom law to protect fundamental rights and liberties. In 1998, we supported the drafting of rights, supplemental to the European Convention on Human Rights, addressing the particular circumstances of Northern Ireland — described as:

“the principles of mutual respect for the identity and ethos of both communities and parity of esteem”.

We recently reiterated our support for a bill of rights through the Preparation for Government Committee's ‘Report on Rights, Safeguards, Equality Issues and Victims’. It is on that basis that the Ulster Unionist Party is committed to participation in the Bill of Rights Forum.

The Ulster Unionist Party understands the sentiments behind the DUP motion and the two amendments. The motion, in particular, recognises unionist concern at how the bill of rights process has extended far beyond the remit and mandate provided by the Belfast Agreement. If the forum is to work properly, and if the bill of rights process is to be effective, it will be important that the concerns expressed during this debate are heard and responded to.

The SDLP amendment urges the forum to proceed by consensus in the interests of all the people of Northern Ireland, stating that:

“a successful Bill of Rights process requires the input and support of all sections of our community”.

That word “support” is vital. Support from across the political spectrum and the entire community will be essential if the process is to have a successful outcome. That, in turn, means that it will be essential that the bill of rights retains the support and confidence of the majority of the unionist community.

The Ulster Unionist Party is gravely concerned at some of the proposals that have been suggested for inclusion in a bill of rights — proposals that were not the original intention of the Belfast Agreement. The agreement talks of supplementary rights to the Human Rights Act, to address the particular circumstances of Northern Ireland. The purpose of such supplementary rights is to address the tensions and grievances in our divided society. That aim is modest, but it is still incredibly significant. In that context, it is worth noting that extensive socio-economic rights were never part of the mandate given by the agreement.

The DUP motion and the amendments share the concern to ensure consensus on the forum. I trust that a careful note will be taken of the concerns expressed during this debate. Without consensus, the forum will fail, and any bill of rights proposals will become a cause of great division.

Although it has some sympathy with the SDLP amendment, the Ulster Unionist Party will support the motion in order to express its grave concern at aspects of the bill of rights process.

The debate is not about names and backgrounds but about policy and ideology. One hopes that Miss McIlveen does not, at an early stage, find herself in the company of forum members, given that she did not have a good word to say about many of them.

Nonetheless, there is a real debate to take place on policy and ideology, and on what the Belfast Agreement intended for Northern Ireland by:

“rights supplementary to those in the European Convention on Human Rights”.

That is the real debate.

Dr Farry: I speak both as a member of the Northern Ireland Bill of Rights Forum and as its supporter. In trying to find a degree of consensus between politicians and civil society that can form the basis of a way forward, the forum provides an important function in the long-running discussion over a bill of rights.

Mr Kennedy said that the Ulster Unionist Party's involvement with a bill of rights goes back to 1972. I will go a decade better: we have been discussing a bill of rights for Northern Ireland since as far back as 1962, when the then Liberal MP for Queen's University, Sheelagh Murnaghan, proposed a motion on the subject in this Chamber. More than 40 years on, we are still discussing the subject. It is important that we bring that discussion to a close as soon as possible.

In supporting a bill of rights for Northern Ireland, I speak as a liberal, not as a socialist, communist or Marxist. It is important to recognise that there is support for the concept of a bill of rights for Northern Ireland right across society. Opinion poll research shows that there is support for it among all sections of the community.

I was planning to recognise some of the DUP's concerns and give it some reassurance, and I will still try to do that. However, I must say that I found the approach that the DUP took — of listing names — to be totally inappropriate and fundamentally counter-productive. It does not reflect well on those who tabled the motion.

Historically, the unionist section of the community has lacked engagement with the bill of rights process. We all recognise that, and the forum has taken that fact on board. Affirmative action to address that deficit is planned in the months to come.

We must recognise that the forum is a combination of civil society and political representatives. It has not been set up to represent the political balance of power that exists in the Assembly. Furthermore, it is a fundamental mistake to try to place party political labelling on any member who sits on the forum as a representative of civil society. Those members are not there to represent a political point of view but to represent their sector in what is an important debate.

There is an issue surrounding how representative of civil society the forum is. All Members will recognise that to try to represent the complexity of civil society in a body of manageable size is an impossible task. I have no doubt that mistakes have been made in that respect. However, the challenge of trying to create a purely representative body is an impossible one.

Consider the Churches. Given the religious diversity that exists in Northern Ireland, all the places that are allotted to civil society would be filled by representatives of Churches. To represent the vast number of Christian Churches in Northern Ireland would in itself be an impossible task, without trying to ensure representation from other faith groups, as well as non-faith groups, that we now have in Northern Ireland society.

The forum serves a purpose in that it allows a critical mass of views to be placed on the table. The fear that unionists have — if I understand the basis of their argument — is that they see a situation arising in which most, or all, of civil society will line up with the representatives of nationalism and push the two unionist parties into a corner. That outcome would then be at odds with the majority of political opinion in society, as represented by the most recent Assembly election results.

Those fears are unfounded for two reasons. The practical reality — if not quite the legal reality — is that the Assembly would have to endorse any draft Northern Ireland bill of rights. If it were not so endorsed, there would be fundamental problems in implementing it. Given their position in the Assembly, unionists must take some comfort from that fact.

1.15 pm

Members must recognise that there are voices within the Bill of Rights Forum who will take a responsible attitude to avoid a situation where two parties are cornered on outcome after outcome. It would be a disaster for the Bill of Rights Forum if that pattern of voting emerged, and action would need to be taken quickly to address that fundamental imbalance.

There is value in the partnership approach to political and civil society working together. It is incumbent on the members of the Bill of Rights Forum to be mindful to ensure that their recommendations will have the power to influence the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission, to get the support of the Assembly and to persuade the British Government. We have a very important task in front of us, and provided that we reflect universality, and international standards and conventions, no one in Northern Ireland has anything to fear. Rather, a proper bill of rights that addresses the circumstances of Northern Ireland is something to look forward to.

Mr McCausland: I am one of the DUP representatives on the Bill of Rights Forum, and I support the motion, which states that:

“this Assembly acknowledges that the unionist community has been largely excluded from the human rights process in Northern Ireland”.

When looking back over the years, Members will find that that is the case. Back in the early 1970s, the Association for Legal Justice was set up as an entirely nationalist organisation, and it was followed by the Committee on the Administration of Justice and the Children's Law Centre. Dermot Nesbitt made a point at one of the meetings of the Bill of Rights Forum, with which I concur on the basis of personal experience. When unionist concerns are brought to those groups the letters are not answered, as Dermot put it, or ideas that were put into the melting pot somehow fall out of the system, are ignored and forgotten. It is clear that the unionist community has been largely excluded from the human rights process and the human rights sector in Northern Ireland.

I turn now to the next part of the motion, which says that unionists are:

"under-represented within the human rights sector, resulting in the Bill of Rights Forum having a clear imbalance in the composition of its membership".

The DUP representatives raised that point at the first meeting of the Bill of Rights Forum when we highlighted the exclusion of representatives from the victims sector, the Loyal Orders and the smaller evangelical churches. Nine months later, nothing has been done about those concerns.

Mr A Maginness: The Orange Order is an observer to the Bill of Rights Forum, and any other organisation can become an observer easily.

Mr McCausland: The point that Alban makes is entirely correct. I proposed that a number of organisations should be given observer status, but the key point is that an observer does not have a vote. An observer is allowed to come and view the process, but is excluded from being part of the process.

Mr A Maginness: Will the Member take a further intervention?

Mr McCausland: No, I do not have time to take a further point as I have too much left to cover.

Let us get down to the core issue regarding the elements that make up the Bill of Rights Forum. My colleague Michelle McIlveen has already mentioned Paddy Kelly of the Children's Law Centre, a good friend of Caitriona Ruane's. It becomes obvious that there is an issue when the women's sector is represented by Margaret Ward and Annie Campbell. There should be representatives from the Townswomen's Guild, the Presbyterian Women's Association, the Mothers' Unions, or the Women's Orange Order, for example. Who do we get? We get Annie Campbell and Margaret Ward.

It is wide of the mark to say that the current representatives are from civic society and are non-political. Take the example of Margaret Ward. I could do the same with a whole series of representatives, but I will tease out the history of that individual. Margaret Ward started off as a member of the People's Democracy and was a founder member of the Socialist Women's Group in October 1975, which was one of the key foundation organisations of the women's rights movement — the other was the Women's Rights Movement itself, which was set up largely by the Communist Party. However, let us stick with Margaret for a moment. As one of the founders of the Socialist Women's Group, she said that it was made up of women from various places such as the People's Democracy, the Revolutionary Marxist Group and the Irish Workers' Group — obviously a broad spectrum. [Interruption.]

No, the Women's Institute did not quite make it that day.

That is the sort of organisation from which Margaret Ward came. She explained that it was a Trotskyite group, to which women came from all those organisations. She, and others, went on to say that the organisation tried to link women's oppression, partition and the imperialist domination of Ireland. There would not have been many unionists in that organisation. Clearly, it did not represent a broad spectrum of views.

The other organisation was the women's rights movement, which was set up by Lynda Edgerton-Walker, who is a member of the Communist Party, and another communist, Ann Hope — the same Ann Hope who is also a Human Rights Commission observer at the Bill of Rights Forum.

I could mention a few more such people. However, the point has been well and truly made. When those points were made by my colleague Miss McIlveen, Alex Attwood and Alban Maginness squirmed and Sinn Féin Members laughed. However, the facts speak for themselves. It was an embarrassed laugh and squirm from those Members.

If there is to be a Bill of Rights Forum, it must be reflective of Northern Ireland society. Mr Maginness mentioned outreach — outreach is aimed at those who are on the outside. A basic human rights requirement in any society, if it is to sign up to international human rights standards, is the right to participation. The current membership of the Bill of Rights Forum denies that to large sections of society, including the Women's Institute, the Townswomen's Guild and others — the sort of ordinary women who are represented by Michelle McIlveen.

Mr Weir: Like the last two Members, I want to state that I am a member of the Bill of Rights Forum. I must also make an even greater confession: I agree with at least one comment that Martina Anderson made when moving her amendment. She said that the end result should be that every citizen of Northern Ireland is able to say that the bill of rights belongs to him or her. That is the point of the DUP's motion: my party wants a bill of rights that is supported by everyone across Northern Ireland.

However, if a system is created in which there is not a level playing field and one community feels that it has not been given proper representation, an inclusive buy-in will not be achieved. For all the great words of the parties opposite in regard to their amendments, the problem is that, essentially, those amendments do not acknowledge the elephant in the room, which is the composition of the Bill of Rights Forum and, indeed, the process that has been put in place.

Much has been said about the political composition of the forum. The 14 political representatives do not reflect the electoral strengths of the political parties. The DUP has 36 representatives in the Assembly — one third of overall representation — but has just one more place in the forum than the Alliance Party, which has merely seven seats in the Assembly. If it were simply a question of the number of faces around the table, that would not matter. However, any voting systems that have been discussed have been on the basis that every member of the forum — irrespective of whether they are elected representatives, or what party they may come from — has exactly the same vote. Consequently, the DUP's three votes will only outnumber the Alliance Party's by one, despite the fact that it has over five times the political strength of that party. That does not create the necessary degree of political balance.

Mr A Maginness: I understand the Member's argument. However, the real substance of the forum's procedures is that agreement is by consensus, not by totting up votes. Even if there were disproportionate votes, ultimately it would not matter.

Mr Weir: It would not matter, if absolute consensus were the only method by which a motion could be passed. However, there exists a loose model of sufficient consensus, in which several members can object to a motion, but it can still be passed. Dr Farry voiced his concern that members could gang up against the two unionist parties, yet when the proposition was made, with the support of the DUP and the Ulster Unionists, that sufficient consensus should require the support of the political wings of both communities — that, if either the unionist community or the nationalist community was opposed to something, it would not pass — we found ourselves completely outvoted by everyone.

Six unionist hands went up — and not one other hand went up on the other side. The vast majority of the forum went against us, with the honourable exception of a couple of independents, who abstained on the issue. Few faces around that table were sympathetic to the unionist position. There were not too many people who —

Dr Farry: Does the Member recognise that the forum has deferred the final discussion on voting mechanisms to the end of the process, given the concerns that have been raised? Would he also accept that the Alliance Party did take unionist concerns on board at the meeting in July, and suggested that discussion be deferred, having recognised a fundamental problem?

Mr Weir: That issue came to head only when a solution was going to be imposed upon us, and the unionist parties were on the point of walking out of the forum. It was the imminent collapse of the forum that caused some, at least, to back off. When looking around that table, there were not too many people on whom I could be overly reliant if I were looking for votes in relation to that matter. Outreach is grand, but it does not give one a place at the table or a vote in the final say. Unfortunately, we are going to be faced with a forum that is likely — unless corrective action is taken by the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland — to produce a report that is so off beam that it is sheer madness.

A representative of one of the Churches complained of loneliness because of the weight of opposition to the views of that Church — that demonstrates that things have gone badly wrong. Members of that forum are aiming to repeal trade union laws of the 1980s. How is that particular to the circumstances of Northern Ireland? The type of agenda that is being pushed may be particular to the circumstances of 1960's Cuba, but it is not particular to Northern Ireland in the late 2000s.

With the best will in the world, some degree of corrective action must be taken, and a level playing field created, so that the voice of unionists, the voice of victims, and the voice of the Loyal Orders is heard. Is there any issue that is more particular to the circumstances of Northern Ireland than the cultural matters that surround the Loyal Orders? However, those people are excluded, and there is a raft of other people on the forum who are not representative. Unless those changes are made, we are going to waste an awful lot of time. That is not acceptable.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr Elliott: I thank the Members who proposed the motion. The Ulster Unionist Party has worked hard to ensure that the rights that are afforded to the people of Northern Ireland have always been in their best interests, in the context of the Union and the wider United Kingdom. For example, since 1998, we have continued to support consideration of the scope for rights that are supplemental to the Human Rights Act 1998, and which address the particular circumstances of Northern Ireland.

However, we are always mindful of the need to maintain our position in the confines of British rights that are afforded to all citizens throughout the United Kingdom. We are committed to ensuring that everyone in Northern Ireland shares in our cherished position of equal citizenship in the United Kingdom — meaning that all are guaranteed fundamental rights and liberties.

That commitment shapes our approach to any ideas about a bill of rights. Rights are not just for nationalism; they are not just for Roman Catholicism; and they are not just for unionism — they are for everyone, and that is why I want everyone to be equal.

The forum does not exist to provide an opportunity for individuals to write a Programme for Government. The forum's aim should be to address the potential need for some supplementary rights in Northern Ireland for all communities, and parity of esteem for everyone — given our special circumstances, which are sometimes described as the principles of mutual respect for identity and ethos. Northern Ireland's position as a member of the United Kingdom, and, therefore, subject to the Human Rights Act 1998, has been ratified by the people of Northern Ireland.

There is no need to have a separate bill of rights to replace that which has been accepted in the rest of the United Kingdom. However, we are not ignorant of the differences that have existed in this part of the kingdom for the past 40 years; therefore, we recognise the need for discretion in matters that concern our country. That is why we continue to support the scope for supplementary rights and support the forum's role in addressing those rights.

1.30 pm

It is rich to hear some people in the Province talk about human rights, especially as over the past 40 years, the murderous attacks that many of them have waged against the people of this Province have destroyed the basic human right to life.

Although the motion is concerned with membership of the forum, that is not the most crucial issue. Rather, it is more important that the forum reaches decisions by consensus. Making any decision without proper consensus will lead only to division. I have no doubt that to draw up a bill of rights for Northern Ireland without consensus would lead to division. It would drive a wedge through our society at a time when people are trying to work together. We should not be forced together — people have too often attempted to do that. Only now are communities beginning to work together, and, in many areas, they are working together for the first time in over 40 years. Without consensus, a bill of rights would not only be a divisive element in a process that strives for cohesion, it would create a vacuum into which would return the distrust and hatred that has plagued our society for far too long.

The Bill of Rights Forum needs to be mindful of the mandate that the people of Northern Ireland have given to it. Through that mandate, the forum has the power to make decisions that should be beneficial to everyone in Northern Ireland. Dialogue and consultation have been guiding principles throughout the Province. I urge people to remember that any Northern Ireland-specific rights that supplement those in the Human Rights Act 1998 must be comparable to and compatible with any emerging broader UK framework, including, for example, the British bill of rights and duties that the UK Government suggested recently.

If the forum can keep to its mandate, pursue its goals with consensus in mind, and remember the broader scope for movement that exists in the rights issue in the United Kingdom, a positive outcome may be reached. However, if it does not take that approach, there can be no such outcome.

Mr Attwood: Miss McIlveen has done herself a disservice this morning. Members from across the Chamber have noted that, in previous debates, she has been at times thorough, and, at other times, thoughtful. However, this morning she was neither. I trust that she might reflect on her comments, which ill serve the debate on a bill of rights and proper party debate in the Chamber.

I disagree with her fundamental point. She said that she endorsed the CBI's views on the proposals for a bill of rights. I presume that she endorsed those views on behalf of her party. As I understand it, the CBI has essentially said that it will sign up to little beyond that which is contained in the European Convention on Human Rights and in the Human Rights Act 1998. In that regard, we are missing a beat. If we do not, through the Bill of Rights Forum and the processes that are involved with that, reach a conclusion that relies not just on the individual and civil liberties that are outlined in the European Convention on Human Rights and the Human Rights Act 1998, and if we do not embrace the other international conventions, especially those that the UN has advanced, we will be doing another disservice to the people of the North.

Mr Kennedy remarked on the 69 motions that have been debated in the House. If we analyse those, it is clear that, time after time, they have addressed issues that involve income, health, housing and education. Indeed, they have addressed the full range of social and economic inequalities that exist in the North. If we adopt the approach of the CBI or the DUP, whereby issues that involve the economic and social entitlement and rights of the citizens in the North would not form part of the bill of rights, the Assembly, the Bill of Rights Forum, and, more crucially, the people of the North, will have missed an important strategic opportunity.

I ask the DUP to consider that point of substance in any further contributions that it might make to the debate on a Bill of Rights Forum.

In 2000, when Mary Robinson was in the North in her role as UN high commissioner on human rights, she said that our human rights proposals were the part of the political process in which the people of the world were most interested. That is a measure of the importance of the Bill of Rights Forum and the architecture around human rights that was created further to the Good Friday Agreement. As evidence that people are watching the North to see what we might or might not do, one only has to look back to the summer of 2007, when the DUP — rightly — went to a Scandinavian country to give advice to the people and parties of Iraq about lessons that could be learned, in their objective circumstances, given what we have endured over the past 40 to 50 years.

Mr Campbell: Scandinavia really is in the north.

Mr Attwood: I do not know whether that was an intervention. I will certainly give way to the Member.

The point is that there is something worth sharing. Mary Robinson said that the work being done by the people of Northern Ireland, through the parties and others, on human rights' entitlements was most worth sharing. For those reasons, I suggest that the Bill of Rights Forum should have an impetus to have the maximum human rights protections available, rather than that which John Reid suggested when he was Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, in which the British Government would listen only to proposals of a minimal rather than more general nature. In the wake of this debate, some of those who are involved in the forum process must carry out a strategic reassessment of its real requirements.

I do not really understand the motivation behind the motion. Is it to beat up on the Bill of Rights Forum process because of a perceived — and sometimes real — lack of proportion about its overall membership, or is the DUP positioning an obstacle in the way of political development in the North? Is this an attempt by the DUP to put down markers in order to bring about gridlock in the politics of the North in six months' time, in the event that no consensus has been reached on the Bill of Rights Forum process?

Mr Hamilton: I am a member of the Bill of Rights forum, as unpopular as that declaration might be on the unionist Benches. Protestants and unionists do not fear rights; indeed, as the proposer of the motion said, going back to the bill of rights of 1689, which was a key element of the Williamite settlement, it was people of Protestant and Ulster stock who helped to form and pen the Declaration of Independence and subsequent Bill of Rights in the United States. Indeed, the solemn league and covenant of 1912 could rightly be described as a rights-based document. Rights are part and parcel of Protestant and unionist history and heritage.

Unionists, however, became detached — or more accurately, dislodged — from the rights process. That was understandable in Northern Ireland, as Tom Elliott mentioned. It was sickening for many unionists to hear the clamour for rights coming most loudly and frequently from those who denied basic rights to people in our country. It was nauseating to hear how barristers or solicitors who defended terrorists or suspected terrorists were referred to as human rights lawyers. That caused great unease in the unionist community.

That disconnection has led to under-representation in the human rights sector, and the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission has been used as an example to demonstrate that. Membership of the Bill of Rights Forum is not fully or truly reflective of Northern Ireland society, and there is a clear under-representation of the unionist community. Perhaps in spite of that, however, unionists are participating in good faith in the process, but everyone involved must accept that, given the political realities of Northern Ireland, unionists must not only be part of the process but have ownership of it and agree to its outcomes.

As mentioned by other Members, the forum's aim is to advise the Human Rights Commission on what should be included in a bill of rights for Northern Ireland. It has been argued that such a bill is required because of the particular circumstances of our recent past. I agree with the concerns expressed by Danny Kennedy that the discussion has concentrated extensively on economic and social rights. That perhaps reflects the membership of the Bill of Rights Forum.

I will concentrate briefly on two particular aspects of our past that are inalienable when it comes to rights. If any aspects are particular to the circumstances of Northern Ireland, they are those of culture, including parading, and of victims. Quite appallingly, there are no representatives on the forum who can discuss the rights of the cultural sector or of innocent victims. Indeed, at last Friday's forum meeting in Londonderry, the convenor of the group that is dealing with victims' rights, the Very Reverend Dr Samuel Hutchinson, said that one of the problems faced by the working group was that there was no representative from the victims' group sector on the forum. The forum comprises representatives from a wide range of sectors in civil society, including women, sexual orientation, the Travelling community, children and ethnic minorities. However, there is nobody from the loyal orders or innocent victims' groups. If issues such as cultural rights and victims' rights are to be addressed, there should be representation from those quarters in the forum.

Although the Catholic Church and the Irish Council of Churches are represented on the forum, that does not reflect the broad swathe of Churches in Northern Ireland, particularly the evangelical Churches, which represent a growing sector in Northern Ireland. The Caleb Foundation, the Orange Order and the Ulster-Scots Heritage Council have observer status in the forum. However, they only have that status at the insistence of the DUP; and I am quite appalled at the suggestion by Alban Maginness that those groups should be happy to have second-class status in the forum, without either a vote or a voice. Those comments were not missed on the unionist side of the House.

I welcome the further investment of £100,000 by the Secretary of State into outreach work, including work in the unionist community. However, there would be no need for that outreach work if those groups were properly represented in the forum. The bill of rights cannot get off the ground and be a success without unionist support.

Mr Shannon: I support the motion. There can be no doubt to any impartial person of the fact that the unionist population has been severely under-represented in the formation of the Bill of Rights Forum. The ethos of many unionists when faced with a difficult situation has always been to get up and get on with it. There was no need to run to higher authorities; you took the knock on the chin and you dealt with it. However, that ethos has left the unionist people far behind in the realm of human rights and in dire need of representation to ensure that a fair deal is reached by all.

Nevertheless, I have no desire to have my words twisted and misconstrued into saying that I do not believe that rights should be enshrined in some form. When I listen to Americans recite the Declaration of Independence, I hear words that everyone would agree to and accept:

“We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness.”

For that reason, I make it clear from the outset that I do believe that rights should be enshrined. However, the manner in which that is approached is delicate; and thus far the entire community has not been shown to have played an equal part. One need not look any further than the composition of the forum, as my colleague Mr Hamilton has outlined, to see how unequal that has been and the undeniable irony of the fact that the forum's remit is to process ideas on real equality for all. The imbalance in the forum has been made clear by the omission of certain bodies, the most glaringly obvious being the Orange Order. The Orange Order has well over 75,000 members and many other affiliates throughout the Province. As such, it represents a substantial proportion of the overall number of people and their opinions in the Province.

However, the Orange Order has no real say or voting rights in the forum — merely the tokenism of lip service and observation. Given that one of the main human-rights issues in the Province is the right to march and celebrate one's cultural identity, that is grossly unfair.

1.45 pm

The ethos of the Orange institution is concerned with the defence of the civil and religious liberties of all, including those of us who are Protestants. However, it apparently has no place in a forum on rights and equality. That is one of the biggest forms of hypocrisy and inequality pertaining unashamedly in the very forum that is supposed to advocate human rights and be a mouthpiece for change. It is little wonder that the people of the Province have no faith in it.

Such inconsistencies make the unionist people — and all right-thinking, open-minded people — of the Province sceptical about the true purpose of the Bill of Rights Forum, and human-rights processes as a whole. The Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission backed up the unfair decree on 50:50 recruitment to the PSNI, which is perhaps the most disgusting and discriminatory such policy ever to have been introduced in a so-called modern country. It is easy to see why some people shy away from anything that smacks of human rights.

If a policy does not address human rights for all, it is of no use to anyone. How can 50:50 recruitment overrule the right to equal opportunity for jobs and other human rights? The manner in which the people of the Province were forced to accept that is nothing short of scandalous: there is no redress, no option and no excuse. That policy sends out the message that it is acceptable to discriminate against a majority. Until those at the highest level of Government accept that that is happening, there can be no change and no true equality in Northern Ireland.

Before she jumps up, I see that my colleague wants to come in at this point, so I will give way to her.

Mrs I Robinson: My intervention does, at least, have the advantage of giving Mr Shannon an extra minute to speak.

Does the Member agree that measures in connection with a bill of rights have had a more detrimental than positive impact on our community?

Mr Shannon: I wholeheartedly agree, and that is why the motion is being discussed in the Chamber today. This matter must be urgently addressed. Whether the Members on the opposite side of the Chamber like it or not, unionists are currently the poor relations in the world of human rights, and that cannot continue. That issue must be addressed now, starting with a more even composition of the forum's membership.

A form of positive discrimination has been operating for far too long, and the Secretary of State must step in and rectify that inequality, which is rife, and create an even playing field for everyone.

I urge the House to ensure that a message demanding equality is sent to the Secretary of State and, ultimately, to the people of the Province. There must be an end to discrimination, whether against a minority or in the form of positive discrimination against the majority. The first step would be a proper, representative forum. I urge all Members, including those on the far side of the Chamber who have made statements today, to support the DUP's clear motion.

Mr G Kelly: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I speak as a Member for North Belfast on this important issue. Níl mé ag labhairt sa phlé seo mar Aire, ach mar ball ar an ábhar tábhachtach seo.

The bill of rights was central to the Good Friday Agreement and was reinforced by the St Andrews Agreement, whereby all parties agreed to establish a forum to facilitate the development of an appropriate bill of rights. After the attacks that have been made on many of its members during the debate, it must be said that the Bill of Rights Forum has benefited massively from the impartiality of the world-renowned human-rights expert, Chris Sidoti. He has acted impartially throughout and has repeatedly stated his wish to create a bill of rights on which everyone can agree.

The forum has also benefited considerably from the input and the contribution of groups that represent disadvantaged sections of society, such as women, children, elderly people and disabled people. Representations have also been made by social partners and the human-rights sector. The forum has expanded its workload by employing recognised human-rights experts who act as legal advisers to its seven working groups. They come from Britain and Ireland, and the forum has also benefited from the advice of EU and UN human-rights experts in developing its recommended draft bill of human rights. No one should feel threatened by the concept of human rights.

A bill of rights would guarantee the fundamental human rights of those living on the Shankill Road and the Falls Road, in Derry, in Larne, or anywhere else. A strong bill of rights would create a win-win situation in which all sections of our community, especially the two main traditions, would gain.

The forum has been clear that additional work is needed to engage with many groups, including those that potentially mistrust the concept of human rights. A LeasCheann Comhairle, all parties in the forum have consistently argued for a robust consultation process and have always supported efforts to engage with members of the unionist and loyalist communities. The forum has engaged those groups that wish to play a more substantial role to attend with observer status and to submit documents expressing their views on all the issues. That provides a mechanism for effective input to groups that do not sit on the forum directly.

It has to be said, because of the attacks that have been made, that the representatives of civil society are selected on the basis of the internal procedures of the groups concerned, and not on the basis of religious or political affiliations. They are there to represent their constituencies. A great disservice has been done today to all those who are involved to suggest that they do not represent everyone in society whose lives they seek to improve, whether that is through working for a bill of rights for older people, for all children and young people, for all workers or for all who are disabled. They did not adopt, and have not adopted, party political lines.

I was disappointed at the personal attacks that were made by the proposer of the motion. I know that you have made a ruling, Mr Deputy Speaker, but that was a disgrace. It was followed by Nelson McCausland, who also launched into a series of personal attacks. I have a forlorn hope that Gregory Campbell will not go further and abuse the House by naming and defaming people in his winding-up speech.

The history of the bill of rights is closely associated with the conclusion —

Mr McCausland: Will the Member give way?

Mr G Kelly: No.

— of periods of conflict. The main body of human rights law in Europe and in the UN came immediately after the conclusion of the Second World War. In South Africa and other post-colonial societies, democratic Governments have moved to guarantee the rights of individuals through strong, world-class bills of rights enshrined in their constitutions. It has become confusing today whether the DUP, in particular, is against the make-up of the forum or the bill of rights itself. The DUP Members who have spoken simply want to introduce the unionist veto, which they will not do. They want to get back to the good old days of unionist domination, but we are well past that.

I support the SLDP amendment; I am willing to give way on that.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I call Dolores Kelly to make a winding-up speech on amendment No 1.

Mrs D Kelly: I welcome Sinn Féin's support for the SDLP amendment. I join with others in expressing my disappointment at the way in which members of the Bill of Rights Forum have been slagged off, in particular by the DUP. Alban Maginness and I represent the SDLP in the Bill of Rights Forum.

I will come to the unionist motion on exclusion later. Some Members had concerns about socio-economic rights. My colleague Alex Attwood pointed out that socio-economic rights are, by and large, much of the work that the Assembly has addressed in the last 68 items of private Members' business. Indeed, whether the bill of rights that we ultimately advise on for the North of Ireland contains specific mention of socio-economic rights is irrelevant, given that international case law has increasingly shown that the bill of rights in terms of socio-economic rights has largely been interpreted under other rights, such as the right to family life and the right to a private life. Therefore, if we examine in greater detail what is happening in Europe, we will see that many of those rights, including the right to health and education, are already enshrined and are being acted upon and informing decisions of Government.

Some Members addressed the issue of unionist participation and mentioned, in particular, a number of individuals, as opposed to their organisations.

Do the unionist parties seriously expect us all to believe that the trade unions do not represent people who are also unionists; that Disability Action Northern Ireland does not represent people who are unionists; that the Northern Ireland Council for Ethnic Minorities does not represent people who vote for unionist candidates in an election; and that Age Concern does not have members who are unionists? The debate has been mischievous, and one wonders if the unionist parties' attitude to participation — particularly that of the DUP — is constructive or obstructive.

The Alliance Party sought to reassure the DUP and clearly set out its long commitment to a bill of rights. [Interruption.] Did somebody speak?

The Alliance Party clearly explained why limiting numbers on the forum is a necessity. We are all made up of several identities. Some Members spoke of an elephant in the room. Is there not an elephant in the room when certain Members fail to declare certain aspects of their identities — such as those who are members of the Loyal Orders, members of evangelical churches, and members of the Caleb Foundation? If there is going to be an honest debate, all Members must be honest. The bill of rights outreach strategy is soon to begin, and a clear commitment has been given that will include all those minority groups that, thus far, have felt excluded from the debate. Other groups may still wish their views to be represented, and it could be argued that, with regard to identity, such organisations as the GAA are not represented; however, there has to be a limit if the forum is to be effective.

The SDLP amendment clearly concerns consensus. We will learn later, and there will be questions about why the Assembly holds so many of these debates instead of advancing legislative timetables. The Assembly is not discussing a programme of Government or an Executive programme.

The credentials of other Members were mentioned. I welcome the Ulster Unionist Party's more mature participation in the debate. Others — most recently, Jim Shannon — stated that 1689 was a key date for the protection of civil and religious liberties. If I recall my history lessons, the penal laws were introduced not long after 1689.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr Campbell: The debate could legitimately be described as having been worthwhile and energetic. Michelle McIlveen outlined the background of members of the forum and, along with others in my party, had criticism levelled at her that was totally unwarranted. If the DUP had criticised the forum in vague terms — by simply stipulating that certain people represented X and Y — what would the criticism have been? People would have asked which members of the forum represented those views. Now the House knows who they are, and the views that they have expressed.

Several Members mentioned the elephant-in-the-room analogy; and in winding-up amendment No 1, Dolores Kelly talked of the need to be honest. That is absolutely right. On occasions such as this, it appears that nationalists and republicans attempt to get into mitigation rather than own up to the facts.

2.00 pm

Are the facts as follows: the Bill of Rights Forum does not adequately represent our community? The answer is either yes or no. If it does not, as we argue — and I do not think that any rational thinking person can dispute that — we can move on from that point. However, if Members on the other side of the Chamber constantly mitigate that fact and try to argue that there is a reason for it and state that unionists do not want certain rights enshrined in Northern Ireland, they miss the elephant in the room. They need to see that. Honesty, according to Mrs Kelly, is what we need, and we must sign up to honesty.

Martina Anderson, in her reference to the amendment, talked about groups that feel excluded. One may feel excluded if one is excluded. There is more to that than simply feeling excluded. If one is not included in a proportional sense, one has been excluded. It is not a matter of simply feeling or perceiving exclusion; it is the fact that one is excluded that matters.

Stephen Farry gave an exposition of the long tradition in his party, and in the liberal wing, of support for a bill of rights. That is quite right, but we wait to see arrival at the point when the Bill of Rights Forum will agree on its voting mechanism. It appears that those who talk about a consensus in the forum but have not been able to agree a voting mechanism hold a somewhat different view of consensus to the rest of us.

Peter Weir indicated that the amendments failed to acknowledge reality, and he too referred to the elephant in the room. Alex Attwood talked about the economic issues that he wished to see addressed. All of us in Northern Ireland society would like to see those issues addressed. However, we must ask ourselves whether a bill of rights, as currently envisaged by many in the nationalist and republican parties, is likely to achieve that objective. It appears that that is not likely, from what we are being told.

Simon Hamilton and Nelson McCausland referred to the historical support in the Protestant community for human-rights issues. Nelson McCausland mentioned the intrinsic bias towards republicanism of many of the women who sit on the forum. Although some Members complained that that matter was even mentioned, I did not hear any resistance to that being a factual statement. That is what should concentrate people's minds.

Jim Shannon concentrated on the relevant matter of 50:50 recruitment to the police. Those Members who passionately advocate a bill of rights should agree that one of the first things that the forum must address is to state that it is 100% united in wishing to get rid of, at the earliest opportunity, the discriminatory recruitment procedures in respect of the police in Northern Ireland.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Campbell: Those who advocate a bill of rights are against that; they are in favour of discrimination because that discrimination is against our community. In some instances, people seem to state that that is all right; that it does not matter; and that it is of secondary consideration.

Gerry Kelly spoke about what he regarded as personal attacks on the forum's membership. That is quite erroneous. Unfortunately, Mr Kelly mentioned going back to the days of unionist domination. No one wants to go back to domination by anyone, unionists or republicans — or by RPG-7 rocket launchers. The day of that type of domination is over, and we are not going back to that either.

Dolores Kelly, in her winding-up speech, and in coming to the conclusion of her remarks, indicated that a consensus was needed. That is a positive contribution. Among all the negative comments that have been made by those who spuriously say that they are in favour of a bill of rights, that was a positive comment: a consensus is required. Are we likely to reach consensus in the direction in which some people appear to be going? I think not.

Do we want a rights-based agenda that is some form of leftist charter aimed at constantly thwarting effective delivery mechanisms for people — in the name of those very people? Conversely, do we want to adopt a minimalist approach whereby people will know that their rights are being protected, no matter what community they come from or sector they belong to, so that we can take Northern Ireland forward in a way in which the whole of our community can rest assured that a bill of rights has been achieved through the consensus and endorsement of all participants?

Mr Deputy Speaker: Before I put the question on amendment No 1, I advise Members that if amendment No 1 is made, amendment No 2 will fall, and I will proceed to put the question on the motion, as amended.

Question put, That amendment No 1 be made.

The Assembly divided: Ayes 42; Noes 47.

Question, That amendment No 2 be made, put and negatived.

Main Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly acknowledges that the unionist community has been largely excluded from the human rights process in Northern Ireland and under-represented within the human rights sector, resulting in the Bill of Rights Forum having a clear imbalance in the composition of its membership; believes that without the support of all sections of our community any Bill of Rights process is fundamentally flawed; and calls upon the Secretary of State to address these problems urgently, by ensuring processes that will facilitate better engagement with the unionist community and ensuring that the membership of the Bill of Rights Forum is more reflective of all the people of Northern Ireland.

The Deputy Speaker: Members will be aware that Question Time begins at 2.30 pm. The Assembly will therefore suspend for seven minutes.

The sitting was suspended at 2.23 pm.

On resuming (Mr Speaker in the Chair) —

Oral Answers to Questions

EDUCATION

Glastry College

2.30 pm

1. Mr Shannon asked the Minister of Education to give her assessment of the current state of negotiations regarding the site for the new build at Glastry College; and to detail the anticipated start date for the work. [R]
(AQO 436/08)

The Minister of Education (Ms Ruane): Go raibh maith agat. I am pleased that Glastry College is to get a newbuild, the cost of which is estimated overall at £12.6 million. I understand that those who are most closely involved with the school may be impatient about the pace of progress. However, I recognise that the procurement of a new school building can be a complex issue. I understand that negotiations between the South Eastern Education and Library Board and the landowner of the site have been concluded and that a sale price has been agreed between the two parties. Negotiations between the board and Land and Property Services on the vendor's professional fees remain to be concluded. The board has advised that it expects work on the site to start in autumn 2008.

Mr Shannon: I wish to declare an interest as a member of the board of governors of Glastry College. I thank the Minister for her comments and for her confirmation of the newbuild for Glastry College. However, I wonder whether she will confirm two points. First, has the board sought planning permission? The Minister said that a price had been agreed between the board and the landowner, and that is good news. Is that the case? I understand that there may be doubt about that. Secondly, will the start date of the build definitely be autumn 2008?

Ms Ruane: The acquisition of the site must be completed. The South Eastern Education and Library Board is confident that all negotiations will be concluded in the near future and that the acquisition of the site will be completed in the current financial year. Once the site is purchased, work on planning permission will begin.

In answer to the second question, the board advises me that the start date is autumn 2008. I know that work was to begin earlier, but there were some delays in negotiating the vendor's fees.

Mr O'Loan: What action is the Minister taking to expedite the current backlog of capital schemes that have already been approved?

Ms Ruane: As the Member knows, different organisations draw up proposals. We are working with the Strategic Investment Board to ensure that once any proposals are lodged, the build in question will be completed as quickly as possible. I am aware of the slow pace of the process where planning and other matters are concerned. The Executive need to look at those matters because they have an impact on Departments other than mine. However, I understand the frustration about the slow pace of builds that groups such as the boards, CCMS (Council for Catholic Maintained Schools), and Comhairle na Gaelscolaíochta have proposed.

Teacher Induction Year

2. Mr Ross asked the Minister of Education to provide an update on her recent meeting with her Scottish counterpart to discuss the introduction of a teacher induction year in Northern Ireland.

(AQO 430/08)

Ms Ruane: A provisional date of 12 December has been arranged for a meeting with the Cabinet Secretary for Education and Lifelong Learning in Scotland to discuss a range of educational matters. I will let the Member know the outcome of our discussions at the earliest opportunity.

Mr Ross: Given that the issue was raised in the Assembly in June, it is disappointing that the Minister has still not got round to meeting with her Scottish counterpart or even telephoning her or corresponding with her. Will the Minister update the House on the latest figures that detail the numbers of graduates who qualified in July and in the previous July but who still do not have a permanent full-time teaching post?

Ms Ruane: We have made contact with the Scottish Cabinet Secretary, and a date for a meeting has been set. Members will appreciate that recent times have been busy. If, for example, I had been in Scotland during the classroom assistants' dispute —
[Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Ms Ruane: I do not have the figures for last July, but I can get them for the Member. However, I have the figures for the number of teachers who are on the substitute teachers register: in June, 5,400 teachers were on that register. That includes not only young teachers, but those of all ages who wish to be employed as substitute teachers and those who no longer wish to be full-time teachers.

Of 5,400 teachers who registered in June, 1,747 are under 30 years of age. It is important to note that many of the teachers on the register are not actively seeking full-time employment.

DETI employment statistics for June 2007, for claimants seeking employment as teachers, are as follows: 240 unemployed teachers; 68 teachers aged under 30 and unemployed for fewer than 26 weeks; and four teachers aged under 30 and unemployed for 26 weeks.

As for the number of teachers on the substitute register who are available for work tomorrow, a free registration service is available to substitute teachers of all ages who are recognised as eligible to teach in grant-aided schools and who are registered with the General Teaching Council. Those teachers may specify how little, or how much, substitute teaching they wish to do, how far they are willing to travel, and the school in which they wish to teach.

After my meeting with the Scottish Minister for Education, I will update the Member. Go raibh maith agat.

Mr Ford: Given that the number of teachers who qualify each year exceeds the number of available posts, how can the Minister guarantee a permanent job for teachers who have undertaken a teacher-induction programme? Has she discussed the number of student teachers with her colleague the Minister for Employment and Learning?

Ms Ruane: Pupil numbers have declined from almost 347,000 in 2001-02 to almost 333,000 in 2005-06. During the same period, the full-time equivalent teacher count has dropped by just over 1,000. In the next five years, numbers will continue to fall. Demography and falling numbers are a huge problem for the system, and that further decline will obviously have a significant impact on the number of newly qualified teachers that are required in the coming years.

I am sympathetic to the plight of newly qualified teachers and I hope that they will be successful in obtaining permanent teaching posts; however, I ask them to be creative and flexible in the choices that they make to determine their career paths. There are subjects with too many teachers and others in which teachers are in short supply. For example, more maths, science and Irish teachers are — [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Ms Ruane: I shall repeat that. For example, more maths, science and Irish teachers are required. Irish teachers are required because of a growing demand for Irish.

In the past three years, my Department has reduced the number of students entering initial-teacher education by more than 20% — from 880 in 2004-05, to 699 in 2007-08. As part of the annual initial teacher-education-intake approval process, we will carefully consider the number of teacher positions that will be available in future years.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh míle maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Does the Minister agree that, according to figures contained in a written answer to a question that I asked, it is unacceptable that 3,871 teachers on the substitute roll have never had full-time employment in education?

Does she agree that we have suffered emigration for long enough in this country, and why, as a so-called republican Minister, did she suggest to me in a written answer that young teachers take an bád bán, the emigration boat, to England, Scotland and Wales to gain employment?

Ms Ruane: First, at the risk of repeating myself, in June 2007, there were 5,400 teachers on the substitute teachers register. DETI unemployment statistics for June 2007, for claimants who were seeking to teach, show 240 unemployed teachers; 68 teachers under the age of 30 and unemployed for fewer than 26 weeks; and four teachers under the age of 30 and unemployed for 26 weeks.

Of course I regret that many people go to England, Scotland and Wales. Although, it is good for young people to travel and gain experience of other countries and other parts of the world, I would prefer that — [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Ms Ruane: I would prefer that opportunities existed for those teachers at home in the North of Ireland. I will also be — [Interruption.]

Mr McNarry: Guarantee one year.

Some Members: Northern Ireland.

Ms Anderson: The occupied Six Counties.

Mr Speaker: Order.

Ms Ruane: There is huge potential for North/South teacher mobility, which is one of the issues that I will be discussing in the forthcoming North/South sectoral meetings.

Transfer Procedure

3. Mr Kennedy asked the Minister of Education, further to her stated intention to replace the existing transfer procedure, to detail what criteria she will be recommending to over-subscribed post-primary schools in selecting pupils who are transferring from primary school at the end of year seven. (AQO 407/08)

Ms Ruane: I consider it premature to speculate as to which criteria might be most appropriate for use by oversubscribed post-primary schools until the fundamental issue of how children should transfer from primary to post-primary education is resolved.

I regard that as a complex matter that requires the consideration of several factors, including the impact of demographic decline on school enrolment, structural changes arising from the review of public administration, the gradual move towards an area-based planning approach for schools, the implementation of the revised curriculum and, in particular, movement towards the entitlement framework, all of which must help children to access, on a fair and equal basis, a high-quality post-primary education.

Mr Kennedy: Will the Minister accept that, as a result of her adherence to political dogma and her determination to flog the absolutely dead horse of imposing a one-size-fits-all comprehensive system of education in Northern Ireland, she has effectively paralysed education here at all levels? Will she, even at this late stage, accept her ministerial responsibilities and act to find an acceptable and sensible way forward? Will she also extend that principle to ensuring a full and final resolution to the classroom assistants' dispute?

Ms Ruane: The current system does not give every child a fair chance. It is essential that we create a system that has equality as its cornerstone. It is also essential that children's individual needs are dealt with, rather than matching children to institutional needs.

Mr S Wilson: Does the Minister realise that she is gaining the reputation of being the Nero of education? She fiddles while the system burns with indignation. The previous question illustrates the point that there is chaos in schools, because principals, parents and youngsters do not know what they will face in three years' time. The Minister still refuses to make a decision on that.

Will the Minister outline to the Assembly the legal position on academic selection as it stands in Northern Ireland? Will she tell the Assembly whether, legally, academic selection can still be used in Northern Ireland to determine which post-primary school children go to?

Mr O'Dowd: Is that a speech or question?

Mr Speaker: Order.

Ms Ruane: I take my equality duties very seriously, and it is essential that every child is given a fair chance in the system. The education system provides academic excellence, and I want to ensure that every child has the opportunity to attain academic and vocational excellence.

We also have an education system with a tail of underachievement, although the Member seems to find it difficult to understand that. If we are failing children — and we are failing many children in all communities — we must take responsibility for every child that we fail. I have been meeting principals from every part of Belfast and from all over Fermanagh, Tyrone, Derry, Down, Armagh and Antrim. Every one of them said — [Interruption.]

There is no need for Members to be rude and interrupt.

Mr Speaker: Order. The Minister has the Floor.

Ms Ruane: Thank you.

2.45 pm

Mr Speaker: I remind Members that while Question Time can be lively, it is vitally important that both Members and Ministers address their questions and responses through the Chair. I also remind Members that this is Question Time; Members are almost making statements to the Minister — from all sides of the House. We have to be careful with that.

Ms Ruane: I take my responsibilities as Minister of Education very seriously. I will bring forward proposals that put the child at the centre of our education system. I will also bring forward proposals that will give every child a fair chance, whether he or she comes from the Shankill Road, Rathcoole, the Falls Road, or the Bogside in Derry.

Members need to have a mature discussion on this issue, rather — [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order. I do not know how many times I am going to have to say this, but I ask the Minister and Members to address their remarks through the Chair, not across the Floor.

Ms Ruane: I ask Members not to play politics with the education of our children. We are bringing about changes that will result in significant advantages to the education system in the North of Ireland. There are huge changes to be made, and I ask that all parties work with me in bringing about those changes, rather than engaging in political point scoring. Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

Ms Ní Chuilín: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Will the Minister agree that whatever replaces the 11-plus, it is essential to ensure that no child is labelled a failure at the age of 11 and that the end to academic selection must ensure that there is an end to the huge trauma and damage that it has caused to the children of society?

Ms Ruane: Go raibh maith agat. As I said, our system is telling far too many children, at a very young age, that they are failures. That is simply unacceptable. I agree that we have to find a method of transferring our children from primary to post-primary education that puts equality at the core, that values all children and that tells all children that they are a success. That is the challenge for me, as Minister of Education, and I take that challenge seriously. I assure the House that I will put the interests of all children at the centre and match educational needs with children, rather than matching children with institutions.

Parent-Pupil Interaction

4. Mr Beggs asked the Minister of Education what steps she is taking to increase parent-pupil interaction in areas of high social need. (AQO 444/08)

Ms Ruane: I thank the Member for his important question. There is a substantial body of research regarding the influence of parents on their child's educational achievements. Parents are the primary educator of the child, and, as such, should be part of a working partnership. Parental involvement in children's learning is related positively to achievement. The more intensively parents are involved in their children's learning, the more beneficial are the achievement effects.

I have attended several recent meetings with school principals and parents. I was encouraged by the fact that they all recognised the importance of parental involvement and the need for all of us to seek and develop ways of supporting parents with their child's development.

While we encourage all schools to work closely with parents, the extended schools programme provides the means by which schools in socially disadvantaged areas can develop their relationships with parents.

The position in socially disadvantaged areas is more challenging because some parents view the school as not being a welcoming place. Perhaps that is because of a poor personal experience when they were at school, an incident at school, or a perception of the school being critical. In many cases, those perceptions are unfounded; in others, there may be a degree of truth. Either way, we must alleviate their fears and engage positively with parents who have such a crucial influence on their children's educational experience.

Parents are being provided with opportunities to engage with extended schools through programmes of activities that have been developed in consultation with parents — for example, family learning, parent support groups and IT classes.

Mr McNarry: On a point of order, Mr Speaker.

Mr Speaker: No points of order can be made during Question Time. I am happy to take a point of order after Question Time.

Ms Ruane: My Department's earmarked budget for parenting initiatives is currently £260,000 per annum and is allocated entirely to the education and library boards.

Each board received £52,000 this year. The purpose of the funding is to develop support for parents whose children are experiencing difficulties in mainstream schooling, with particular emphasis on pupils and parents from disadvantaged backgrounds. It is a matter for each board to determine how these earmarked resources should be used. Boards are also free to supplement this funding by allocating further resources from within their overall block grant.

Mr Beggs: I declare an interest as a member of the New Horizon Sure Start committee, which operates in Carrickfergus and Larne.

I thank the Minister for her answer, but I am concerned about the level of funding that is available for parenting support. In particular, the children's fund is coming to an end in March 2008. Given the Minister of Finance and Personnel's statement that that fund will not continue, will the Minister assure us that the valid parenting support programmes that have been developed through the children's fund and other mainstream funding such as Sure Start will be continued beyond March 2008?

Ms Ruane: I agree with the Member on the importance of the children's fund, and also in relation to early intervention. For everyone I speak to — and I know that it is the same for every Member who is interested in education — early intervention is of key importance. The role of parents is of key importance. In schools that have been founded by parents — in the integrated and Irish-medium sectors, for example — you can see that. Recently, I visited the Belfast Boys' Model School and the Belfast Model School for Girls — the full-service extended school. There is proof that when parents are involved in their children's education and involved with the school in a direct way, where they feel ownership of the school and of the curriculum, you see positive outcomes.

Whatever we have in place after the Budget, it is essential that funding be earmarked for parent-school initiatives and extended schools.

Mrs Long: I declare an interest as a member of the board of governors of Sydenham Infants' Primary School. Given that the Minister recognises the importance of engaging parents directly in the school and creating a welcoming environment, what plans has she to accommodate that within the school buildings handbook?

Schools which are currently engaged in involving parents use spare classrooms. However, when they get new school buildings, they do not have any facilities for bringing in parents and engaging with them. Are there any plans to try to encourage that further by amending the school buildings handbook to reflect its importance?

Ms Ruane: I will bring that question to the attention of my officials and we will discuss that.

Mr P Ramsey: What progress has been made on the formulation of a new literacy and numeracy strategy? What elements have been built into it to address the recommendations of the report of the Westminster Public Accounts Committee, 'Improving literacy and numeracy in schools (Northern Ireland)'?

The Minister will be aware that 1 in 4 adults in Northern Ireland have literacy and numeracy problems. We want to ensure that future generations do not have the same difficulties.

Ms Ruane: I thank the Member for his question. I agree wholeheartedly with him about literacy and numeracy. It is one of the key issues that faces the Executive and me as Minister of Education.

If we continue to produce a tail of underachievement, and if 4,000 young people continue to leave our schools each year with poor literacy and numeracy skills, we will continue to have problems in our society. Not only will we have failed those 4,000 young people each year: we will have condemned them to great difficulty in getting jobs and getting on the first rung of the ladder. It is essential that we bring forward proposals on literacy and numeracy. I am currently considering those proposals and the make-up of a task force. I am examining the school improvement policy and the literacy and numeracy strategy. All the initiatives to deal with disadvantage come into play here. I thank the Member for his question; it is a key challenge that faces us.

Dickson Plan

5. Mr Gardiner asked the Minister of Education what plans she has to develop the successes of the Dickson Plan, which has been operating in north Armagh for the past 38 years, across the whole of Northern Ireland. (AQO 408/08)

Ms Ruane: I recognise the good work that is taking place in schools participating in the Dickson plan. I consider the Dickson plan, which involves children transferring at ages 11 and 14, to be an interesting model, but the part that selection by ability plays in it is something that I find unacceptable as a basis for new arrangements.

Rather than try to match children to types of schools, I intend to introduce proposals that focus on matching education provision to individual children, so that every child may have access to a high-quality post-primary curriculum.

Mr Gardiner: I declare an interest. I sit on the board of governors of both Carrick Primary School and Dickson Primary School in Lurgan.

I welcome part of the Minister's answer. In her early months as Minister of Education, she spoke about giving every child a fair chance and that none would be considered a failure. It would be welcome were she to accept the Dickson plan or incorporate it into her proposals. If she does not, I will be sorely disappointed in her.

Ms Ruane: Children naturally make choices at the age of 14, and that is an interesting aspect of the Dickson plan. At Key Stage 3, children decide whether to concentrate more on science, or on professional or technical subjects. As a pathway, that age is more appropriate. I have been to some of the schools involved, and the use of academic ability as a criterion is an unacceptable part of the Dickson plan. It is unnecessary, and other systems around the world do not do it. There is a better way in which to have a fairer system. However, I will look at the Dickson plan and at the age of 14 as a model for transferring.

Mr Gallagher: Does the Minister agree that, whatever the shortcomings of the Dickson plan, and it may have some, it is at least a local solution, which has the support of parents and governors in the area? As the Minister does not appear to be able to think her way out of this situation herself, has she any intention of welcoming local solutions from other areas that have the support of parents and governors? Alongside that, will she welcome a transfer age of 14 for pupils?

Ms Ruane: I am perfectly able to think, and the Member will see plenty of the results of my thinking in the near future. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order, Members. The Minister has the floor.

Ms Ruane: I have met recently with many principals, parents and governors who are crying out for change. I have met the parents and the principals of the children that we are failing, and I have met the principals of secondary schools who want change and fair play in the system. I have met many people in the grammar school sector who also want change, so there will be change.

As I have said, 14 is a more natural age at which to transfer. It is a natural age for young people to make choices and decisions along with their parents and teachers. Our young people know what they want, what they are good at and what they are interested in. It is vital that young people have power and a voice in the process. At the age of 11, they have no power, and adults are making decisions that are not fair to children or in their best interests. It is time that the children's voice were heard.

Mr Moutray: Given what the Minister has said, will the Minister inform the House whether she considers selection on the basis of ability and aptitude to be more appropriate at the age of 14 than it is at the age of 11?

Ms Ruane: I shall read out my answer again, because perhaps certain Members are not listening. I consider the Dickson plan, which includes children transferring at 14, to be an interesting model, but the part played in it by selection by ability is unacceptable as a basis for new arrangements.

GCSE Achievement

6. Mr McCallister asked the Minister of Education what percentage of pupils in year 12 failed to achieve at least one GCSE at grade C or above (or equivalent); and to outline how these figures compare with other regions of the United Kingdom. (AQO 446/08)

Ms Ruane: Go raibh maith agat, a John. I thank you for your question, which is very important.
[Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order, Members. I rise for the third occasion this afternoon. I remind the Minister to address her remarks through the Chair.

A Member: Go raibh maith agat, William. [Laughter.]
3.00 pm

Ms Ruane: Through the Speaker, I want to congratulate the Member on his Irish.

In 2005-06, the percentage of year 12 pupils who failed to achieve at least one GCSE at grade C or above, or the equivalent, was 14.4% in the North of Ireland, compared with 23.4% in Wales, 20.1% in England and 13.9% in Scotland. Those figures are far too high. The system is failing too many children. Of a total of just under 25,000 year 12 pupils, 14.4% equates to over 3,500 children.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Dallat] in the Chair)

EMPLOYMENT AND LEARNING

Research and Development Spending

1. Mr K Robinson asked the Minister for Employment and Learning to detail the total level of spending on research and development in Northern Ireland universities in each year for the past five years. (AQO 403/08)

The Minister for Employment and Learning (Sir Reg Empey): Investment in research and development is central to the future success of the economy. In total, the universities have spent over £614 million on research and development between the academic years 2000-01 and 2004-05. The yearly breakdown is as follows: £98.8 million in 2000-01; £105.8 million in 2001-02; £127.8 million in 2002-03; £136.1 million in 2003-04; and £146.2 million in 2004-05.

Mr K Robinson: I thank the Minister for his detailed answer. I am glad that the figures are going in the right direction. Can the Minister indicate whether he is still inclined to support the concept of an innovation fund, which, I believe, originated with the former Chancellor of the Exchequer, Gordon Brown, in November 2006?

Sir Reg Empey: The Member is correct; the concept of an innovation fund first appeared at Downing Street in November 2006 and was subsequently reinforced at a second meeting there in early spring 2007. The Chancellor indicated that he would set up an innovation fund. My colleague the Minister of Finance and Personnel will confirm that it was indicated that a sum of money would be provided for that fund in the current financial year. However, that money cannot be spent instantaneously or in-year: it takes three to four years to roll out a meaningful programme. I assure the honourable Member that Ministers are interested in the fund.

The Irish Government have indicated that they are prepared to put forward £36 million for a similar fund, to which Northern Ireland would have access. However, the details of that innovation fund have not yet been resolved. I hope that whatever is available will emerge during the CSR (comprehensive spending review) process in the next few weeks.

Mr O'Loan: The Minister will be aware of the third-level research-and-development forum that has been set up by the Irish Government, the function of which is to develop R&D initiatives. It is a major initiative that involves the expenditure of around €1 billion. The purpose of the fund is to lead to investment and job opportunities on the island at the highest technological level, which is what the economy needs if it is to reach the point that everyone talks about. What plans does the Minister have to provide the necessary funds to Queen's University and the University of Ulster in order to enable them to participate in that initiative?

Sir Reg Empey: Departmental officials and I have been in regular contact with the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Employment and the Department of Education and Science in Dublin in order to identify which projects we can undertake jointly, over and above the work that is already being done.

First, we must establish the availability of an innovation fund for Northern Ireland, and ascertain how the money that will be allocated by the Republic of Ireland's Government would be phased in, when it would become available, and for what purposes. That work is ongoing. I am aware that, as part of the Irish Government's national development plan, approximately €1.2 billion was allocated for research and development. Therefore, it is clear that the Irish Government are making that issue a high priority. We share that priority, and we are working together to see what projects can be jointly undertaken and funded.

Mr McCausland: What actions has the Minister taken to increase the number of university places, particularly PhD places, at Queen's University Belfast and the University of Ulster?

Sir Reg Empey: That is a matter of key importance. We have made bids in the comprehensive spending review for funding aimed at increasing those numbers. Currently, we receive funding for that purpose through Europe, which will come to an end in the current financial year. That funding will not be replaced. Therefore, we must make good on the funding that we used to get from Europe and, in order to make progress, we hope to go further. I have been in touch with the universities, which have told me that they have the capacity to do more. However, we need money to do that, and that is work in progress. I assure the Member that the securing of funding to provide for more PhDs and for research and development is one of our highest priorities

Mr Speaker: Question No 2 has been withdrawn.

Young People Not in Education, Employment or Training

3. Mr Attwood asked the Minister for Employment and Learning to confirm the number and percentage of young people aged (i) under 25; (ii) under 21; and (iii) 16-18, who are not in education, employment or training. (AQO 480/08)

Sir Reg Empey: The closest approximation to the figures that have been requested comes from the April 2006 to March 2007 labour force survey. At the time when the survey was undertaken, it was estimated that 34,000 — or 15% — of 16- to 24-year-olds in Northern Ireland were not in employment, participating in Government training schemes, or in full-time education. For those aged 16 to 20, the estimates were 19,000 — or 15% — and for those aged 16 to 18, the estimates were 9,000 — or 12%.

Mr Attwood: I thank the Minister for his reply. It is somewhat shocking to hear that 12% of 16- to 18-year-olds are not in education, employment or training. There is an even higher figure in respect of older age categories. Does the Minister know what the Department is doing, in broad terms, to address the matter of 16- to 18-year-olds who are not in education, employment or training?

Will the Minister comment on last week's media report that stated that social policy will no longer dominate the Programme for Government, as it has in the past? Given that 16- to 18-year-olds require all sorts of social policy frameworks, is the Minister concerned by the contents of that media leak as an indicator of the Government's policy on young people?

Sir Reg Empey: I thank the Member for his question. Shocking as those figures are, I will put them in context. An examination of the equivalent position in the UK as a whole shows that 15% of 16- to 24-year-olds are not in education, employment or training in Northern Ireland — while that figure is 18% in the UK as a whole. For 16- to 24-year-olds, that figure is 15% in Northern Ireland, and 16% in the UK as a whole. For 16- to 18-year-olds, that figure is 12% here, and 14% in the UK as a whole. However, I take little comfort from those figures.

As for the matter of an alleged leak, that may have been due to a comment that someone made. However, at present, the Executive have not determined their Programme for Government, which is a work in progress. I assure the Member that the economy and all matters relating to it, including the matters that he raised, are very much in our minds.

My Department is trying to reduce the number of people who do not have qualifications, as one of its key priorities. What are we doing about that? The Department has a full range of interventions to help young people, such as Training for Success; New Deal; and the Disablement Advisory Service.

There is the Local Employment Intermediary Service (LEMIS), the progress2work (NI) initiative, not to mention the extensive range of jobs and benefits offices and job centres. Careers Service Northern Ireland actively targets people at risk of exclusion and works with schools to identify vulnerable groups at an early stage. My colleagues in the Department of Education are currently reviewing policy in respect of alternative education provision to encourage young people to continue to engage in learning even though they have disengaged from school.

The problem is difficult. Of course, the figures I mentioned clearly include those who live at home and who are not participating in education. A wide range of reasons are involved, but I assure the Member that we are acutely aware of the problem. Although our progress on this matter is slightly better than that in the rest of the United Kingdom, we still consider the statistics to be, as the Member said, shocking.

Mr Ross: The Minister has detailed the steps that the Department is taking. Will he inform the House of the specific targets that he and the Executive are working towards in order to reduce the number of economically inactive people in Northern Ireland?

Sir Reg Empey: The rate of inactivity is 27%, compared to the national figure of around 23% or 24%. There is no doubt that we have a great distance to cover. One of the new proposals being rolled out is the Pathways to Work programme, which is designed to offer alternatives to people on incapacity benefit and help them to find work. It will be rolled out across Northern Ireland by next spring and it is specifically designed to get people into work. Everyone qualifying for incapacity benefit must now automatically attend an interview, and trained advisors are available to help them.

The Pathways to Work for Lone Parents programme is designed to target lone parents, for whom childcare and other matters are clearly huge issues. That programme is being piloted in a number of areas. The Steps to Work programme is being rolled out simultaneously, and that is open to claimants on a variety of benefits. Indeed, benefits are available to help those who have found work to overcome the transition from being on benefits to being in employment. A substantial range of programmes has been designed to bear down on the issue. Although we have not set a target in the Programme for Government, which is under consideration, I will bear the Member's remark in mind. Perhaps we ought to set a target. However, if we set targets, we must have the resources to achieve them. There is no point in tilting at windmills, and I am sure that the honourable Member would agree.

Training Strategies

4. Mr Cobain asked the Minister for Employment and Learning to detail the strategies his Department has put in place to provide access to training for those in the small and medium-sized enterprises sector.

(AQO 467/08)

Sir Reg Empey: Through 'Success through Skills: The Skills Strategy for Northern Ireland: A Programme for Implementation', my Department is currently taking forward a range of strategies to provide the access to training for businesses, including the small and medium-sized enterprise sector. Among them is the Training for Success initiative, which includes the apprenticeship and preparation for apprenticeship programmes, management and leadership courses, and training in the essential skills of literacy and numeracy.

At local level, six employer-led local workforce development forums are charged with identifying local skills shortages and with the implementation of appropriate local interventions through the further and higher education sector and other training providers.

Mr Cobain: Does the Minister accept that many small companies are reluctant to engage in training employees due to the fact that a high level of employees leave once qualified? What steps does he have in mind to reduce the risk to such companies and therefore ensure that training is available to all?

Sir Reg Empey: Northern Ireland has a very high proportion of very small businesses, which are often owner-managed. There is no doubt that it is difficult to convince such companies that there is benefit in training. Part of the reason is that many owners of such companies carry out a host of different jobs, and it is extremely expensive for them to spare their staff time and allow them to go on training. Thus, many companies opt out of training and do not bother with it.

3.15 pm

However, Northern Ireland has a range of sector skills councils that represent the views of employers on the types of training that are required, and apprenticeship programmes are in place. There is a further opportunity at local level with workforce forums, in which the colleges can engage with the local business community. It is not impossible for the colleges to go to external venues to assist with training.

The further education sector is prepared to be flexible. We must continue to get the message out to small businesses that training is absolutely critical. The more I talk to businesses, at home or abroad, the more I find that skills are at the top of the agenda. We have a huge task to convince businesses that skills training is in their interest, and I take on board the comments that the Member has made.

Mr Buchanan: Will the Minister tell the House what monitoring and assessment of training will be conducted to ensure the successful delivery of all the strategies that he has outlined?

Sir Reg Empey: There is no doubt that if a business does not monitor its programmes, it has no way of assessing their success. Training providers know that monitoring procedures are built into their service contracts, and reviews are frequently carried out. The Pathways to Work programme, for example, has reviews built in, as does every similar programme. We often have to bring in experts to provide an impartial view in tandem with our own review process, and regular figures are provided on our performance as regards getting people into proper full-time work. The Member is correct; it is essential that we monitor progress. Every programme and every contract has monitoring procedures built in.

Community Training

5. Mr Elliott asked the Minister for Employment and Learning what assessment he has made of the impact on other service providers of the decision to deliver a higher proportion of community training through regional colleges.

(AQO 443/08)

Sir Reg Empey: The Department has not yet taken a decision to deliver a higher proportion of community training through regional colleges. Further education colleges continue to offer an extensive range of vocational and non-vocational provision throughout the network of 48 campuses and 876 outreach centres across Northern Ireland. As incorporated bodies, responsible for their own day-to-day management and decision-making, further education colleges may enter into collaborative training partnerships with third-party organisations, provided such arrangements comply with the guidance set out by my Department.

Mr Elliott: Has the Minister any plans to allow further education colleges to outsource any training provision to third parties or outside organisations?

Sir Reg Empey: My Department has no plans to contract directly with third parties for further education provision. That is due to stringent quality assurance, audit and accountability requirements and the potential duplication of services. However, as I said in my original answer, there are 48 further education campuses with 876 outreach centres; they have a very large catchment area. They are prepared to be flexible, and to go out and conduct training in a variety of venues. The experience of other countries tells us that we can use our college system in that way as a major tool for economic development. I encourage everyone to avail of that, and urge local companies with problems to go to the colleges, whether for technical assistance or to use the excellent machinery or equipment. There must be greater engagement in that regard; but we have no current plans to introduce third parties into the equation.

Mr McCarthy: Since the establishment of the new regional colleges, senior citizens have been hammered by increased charges, so much so that they are now deprived of courses in community training and other subjects. Will the Minister admit that the new colleges are discriminating against our senior citizens? As the Minister responsible, what does he intend to do about that?

Sir Reg Empey: Although the Member's question deals with a separate issue, I am happy to answer it. The colleges are incorporated bodies, and they set their own courses and fees. In recent weeks, I have had correspondence from many Members about the issue. An odd quirk has arisen. Age-discrimination legislation was introduced ostensibly to prevent people being discriminated against on the grounds of age. However, there appears to be conflicting legal advice on the matter. One such piece of advice is that one cannot discriminate in favour of someone because of age. Consequently, the colleges have been faced with the problem that, if they were to give preference to someone on the grounds of age, they may be deemed to be acting outside the law.

Furthermore, amalgamation of the colleges has resulted in several of them setting different fees. Therefore, they have had to co-ordinate on that. The Department does not control or direct the setting of fees; it is done entirely by the colleges. However, given that there are fee-setting discrepancies in different parts of the country, I have been in contact with the colleges. Given that colleges cannot discriminate in favour of older people on the grounds of age, other criteria are being considered so that assistance can be made available. I agree that the issue is concerning many Members. I have asked for work to be done on the matter; however, I stress that the colleges set their fees and determine their courses.

Mr Gallagher: Does the Minister accept that there was general support for the way in which community education was delivered under the old college system? Does he agree that, since the amalgamation of the colleges, the minimum enrolment threshold has been raised and that that has had an adverse impact on community education? In the west, enrolments have dropped dramatically. Does the Minister share my concern about the adverse impact that that is having, particularly on rural communities? Will he look into that further?

Sir Reg Empey: Access remained a criterion before the college amalgamation could proceed. The footprint of the colleges has not changed: the campuses all still exist. If the Member has specific issues to raise about his constituency, I am happy for him to write to me and I will take up his concerns with the relevant colleges. However, I repeat that, based on the number of people that must participate in a course to make it viable, colleges decide on the courses that they run and the fees that they charge. Other Members have pointed out that part of the problem is that several people sign up to a course, making the college believe that sufficient numbers allow it to be run. However, some of those students may drop out midway through the course or do not attend, making it unviable. If the Member has a specific example that he wishes to discuss, I will be happy to take it up with the relevant college. However, it is a matter for the colleges to set their own thresholds.

Scottish Executive Counterpart

6. Mr McClarty To ask the Minister for Employment and Learning what contact he has had with his counterpart in the Scottish Executive. (AQO 401/08)

Sir Reg Empey: Following the earlier visit to Northern Ireland by the First Minister of Scotland, I met the Scottish Cabinet Secretary for Education and Lifelong Learning, Fiona Hyslop MSP, in Edinburgh on 30 July 2007.

We discussed areas of mutual interest including the potential for greater co-operation in higher education, support for students and the skills agenda. I look forward to continuing our discussions and I have invited the Minister to visit Northern Ireland to follow up on her interest in our skills strategy.

Mr McClarty: I thank the Minister for his response. During those discussions with his Scottish counterpart, did he raise the issue of offsetting or subsidising the cost of student travel between Northern Ireland and Scotland?

Sir Reg Empey: Yes, I did. When Alex Salmond visited Northern Ireland earlier this year, the First Minister and the deputy First Minister asked for co-operation with the Scottish Government at several levels. This specific issue was raised, and my discussions with the Scottish Government are ongoing. Clearly there is a range of issues, including transport. However, it must be understood that the Scottish Government are taking legal advice, because it could be argued that to subsidise travel costs for students from Northern Ireland, and not from elsewhere, would be discriminatory.

We are also considering whether bursaries for student hardship funds can be made available because, as the Member knows, about 5,500 students from Northern Ireland are studying in Scottish universities. The Scottish Minister acknowledged that that represents a huge inflow of money to the Scottish economy, and our discussions on that continue. However, reciprocal arrangements would have to be made for the small number of students who are domiciled in Scotland but study in Northern Ireland.

Mr P Ramsey: I noted the Minister's comments at the weekend, particularly on inward investment. He said that American companies in particular were no longer seeking grant aid but wanted a skilled workforce. Given the Republic of Ireland's success in providing such a skilled workforce for the high-tech and IT sectors, does he intend to hold discussions with his counterpart to identify how the North could benefit from the successful training schemes that have been operating in Southern Ireland?

Sir Reg Empey: As I said in answer to an earlier question, I am in regular contact with my counterparts in Dublin. I met both the relevant Ministers on my visit to Dublin on 3 September. My Department and its Southern equivalent each hold an annual skills conference, and we have suggested that there be a joint conference next year. It is hoped that that will take place in early summer of 2008.

One of the conference's focal points will be how to assist employers, particularly in the border counties. We want to ensure that labour market intelligence is shared in order to satisfy the training institutions and colleges in the border region that they offer training relevant to the local people and employers.

Although no venue for the conference has been fixed, the honourable Member may be interested to know that one suggestion is to hold it not a million miles away from his constituency. We are hoping that it will happen around May or June next year. I assure the Member that we are pursuing every avenue with our counterparts, particularly because, if the innovation funds of both Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland become available, there will be a much larger pot with which to work.

Mr Shannon: What plans does the Minister have to meet Ministers from other constituent parts of the United Kingdom, apart from Scotland? Is he prepared to make a statement to the Assembly identifying the areas of mutual benefit?

Sir Reg Empey: I am happy to consider making a further statement. I have invited my opposite number from Wales to visit Northern Ireland at the earliest opportunity, but as yet no date has been fixed.

My Department is in daily contact with the relevant Department in the Scottish Government, and I have frequent contact with our opposite numbers in Whitehall in the Department for Innovation, Universities and Skills. There has been recent correspondence and video conferencing. I hope to join Bill Rammell MP, who is the Minister of State for Lifelong Learning and Further and Higher Education, at an event in London in December. I assure the Member that the Department has an active programme of involvement with its counterparts in the rest of the United Kingdom.

3.30 pm

Job Ready Scheme

7. Mr Storey asked the Minister for Employment and Learning to detail the remaining issues that surrounded the completion of arrangements for the management of the new Job Ready scheme. (AQO 459/08)

Sir Reg Empey: All management arrangements associated with the Job Ready strand for the Training for Success provision are in place, including the operational guidelines. They will be updated as required throughout the life of the programme. I am also pleased to report that, to date, we have enrolled almost 3,000 students.

Mr Storey: Although I understand what the Minister has said, I have been listening to the disquiet among the private training providers who have been hitched to contracts for Training for Success and its Job Ready component, and they still await definitive guidelines from the Department for Employment and Learning. Are those training providers being unreasonable in requesting those guidelines from the Department after three or four months?

Mr Deputy Speaker: Time is up. The Minister will have to respond to the Member in writing.

ENTERPRISE, TRADE AND INVESTMENT

Investment from India

1. Lord Browne asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment what action he was taking to deliver investment from India to Northern Ireland; and to outline what sectors were being targeted for investment. (AQO 463/08)

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment (Mr Dodds): From 2004 to March 2007, Invest Northern Ireland (INI) worked with six Indian companies to secure over £65 million in planned investment into Northern Ireland, promoting some 2,235 jobs. In the past three years, Northern Ireland has seen increasing success from the Indian market. Investors from India include Firstsource, HCL Enterprises, Polaris Software Lab, Pix Transmission, BPO Services and, most recently, the announcement by Tech Mahindra.

To build on that success, and with investments from India increasing, Invest Northern Ireland is setting up an office in India to capitalise on the opportunities there. That office will be based in Mumbai, and it will seek to promote further trade and investment links with India. The key sectors to be targeted will be the areas in which Northern Ireland offers a globally competitive proposition, notably in financial services, business services and information and communication technology.

Lord Browne: I thank the Minister for that informative answer. We often hear about outsourcing of jobs to India, but it is good to know that investment is moving in the other direction and bringing much-needed jobs to Northern Ireland. It is important to focus our attempts on attracting inward investment, in particular in the financial services sector. It is also advantageous to concentrate such investments in particular geographical areas. Does the Minister agree that the Titanic Quarter is ideally suited for financial service investment?

Mr Dodds: The Member has made some important points about the significance of the Indian market for Northern Ireland, and he is right to draw attention to that. The Titanic Quarter has strong advantages, particularly in the financial services sector. Other honourable Members have also raised the point about locations, but Invest Northern Ireland does not determine the location for any potential investor. That decision is ultimately taken by the investor. Invest Northern Ireland tries to promote the Province as a whole, so that it is competitive in areas where it might attract foreign direct investment. However, ultimately, the decision on the location rests with the investor. If investors propose specific areas in which they are interested, Invest Northern Ireland will work with local stakeholders to best position that investment.

Mr Molloy: Thank you, a LeasCheann Comhairle. In view of the forthcoming economic investment conference, will the Minister outline what steps he is taking to ensure that Invest NI will involve all councils and constituencies, particularly west of the Bann, to get a proper opportunity for involvement in the conference and for future investment in that area?

Mr Dodds: With your permission, Mr Deputy Speaker, I am happy to deal with the question although it concerns the United States rather than India. The conference is very important, and is one that the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment (DETI) has made a priority. Gordon Brown, when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer, announced that he would give the conference a lot of his attention. The Department is about to establish a steering group to oversee arrangements for the conference, and it will comprise representatives from all key stakeholders — not least, the US consul general.

The Department will be mindful of the best interests of the whole of Northern Ireland during preparations for the conference. Although not every Department, nor the councils, will be represented directly, I expect that councils will welcome the opportunity for a very strong case to be made to potential American investors on why they should bring important foreign direct investment opportunities to the Province.

Mr McCallister: I declare an interest as someone who is involved in the agrifood industry. The Minister will know that agrifood businesses have huge potential for further development in India. Has he had any discussions with Northern Ireland processors with a view to partnering and improving their prospects in the Indian market?

Mr Dodds: The Department has not had any specific discussions about the Indian market. However, in recent days we have engaged directly with the industry and processors to discuss how they can best be promoted. The industry is a key part of our manufacturing sector, and it is also a very important area for Invest Northern Ireland, supplying it with the largest number of clients and sales. My Department and I will continue to give the industry a lot of attention over the coming months and years.

Renewable Sources

2. Mr G Robinson asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment to outline his plans to increase the overall percentage of the power requirements of Northern Ireland produced from renewable sources. (AQO 419/08)

Mr Dodds: The Department is aiming to increase the percentage of our electricity consumption that is generated from indigenous renewable sources from 3·8% in 2006-07 to 12% in 2012-13. The Northern Ireland renewables obligation (NIRO), which is part of the successful UK-wide certificate-trading scheme, is the main support mechanism to help the Department reach that target. NIRO is complemented by other initiatives, particularly the Reconnect programme in the environment and renewable energy fund, which supports investment in non-wind renewables and micro-generation.

A major cross-border electricity grid study is also nearing completion, which will help determine the investment needed to ensure that grid networks in both Northern Ireland and the Irish Republic are sufficiently robust to accommodate the growth in the generation of renewable electricity until 2020 and beyond.

Mr G Robinson: As the aim is to increase the percentage of electricity consumption from renewable sources to 12% by 2012-13, will the grant aid that is available to people building new homes or refurbishing existing ones to install renewable-energy features, such as solar panels, be maintained to encourage the integration of such systems into their plans?

Mr Dodds: The majority of the contribution to the 2012 target will be made by large-scale wind farms and energy systems. The contribution from household schemes is important, and is something that the Department wants to encourage, but it is relatively small — around 1% of the total renewable energy generated. My colleague, the Minister of Finance and Personnel, is looking at scope for including micro-generation in building regulations, which would be an important contribution.

Mr Beggs: The Northern Ireland environment is particularly suited to willow production. Can the Minister advise how his Department has assisted large-scale trials of willow production? Any assistance will instil confidence in producers and, ultimately, in the systems that use willow to generate electricity or heat.

Mr Dodds: The Member is right to stress the importance of willow production. There are good examples of those types of projects and work, particularly in the north-west of the Province, and I hope to visit one of them soon. During the summer, several Ministers visited the Smithsonian Folklife Festival in the United States; one of Northern Ireland's major displays was on energy generated by willows and related issues. Therefore I assure the Member that the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment will continue to work closely with partners to ensure that what can be done to progress willow production will be done.

Mr Gallagher: Even though the Minister says that the implementation of the Reconnect scheme is unimportant in the bigger picture, does he agree that it is important in encouraging people to act locally in relation to what is a serious problem for the country — indeed, for the world? Can the Minister tell the House whether he has plans for the better promotion of the Reconnect scheme, or if there are plans for its refinement or extension?

Mr Dodds: It is right to highlight the important contribution that people can make in their own homes by ensuring that more energy comes from renewable sources, and that can be done by the implementation of such schemes as Reconnect. Recently, I had the pleasure of visiting a home in the Strangford constituency that had lately installed solar panels, and the householders commented on the savings in fuel and energy costs and their contribution to the environment. The Reconnect scheme has been going for a while, and I have been engaged in efforts to raise its profile. I encourage people to apply. Members will be aware of recent television and other media advertisements that have attempted to raise the scheme's profile and to encourage more applications, and help is available with those. The Reconnect scheme, therefore, has an important contribution to make, but, as the Member stated, the majority of the contributions in the area of renewable energy will come from bigger projects. However, that must not lessen the impact that each of us can make if we do our bit.

Northern Ireland Tourist Board

3. Mr McQuillan asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment what plans he had to enhance the role of the Northern Ireland Tourist Board.

(AQO 426/08)

Mr Dodds: Tourism makes an important contribution to the local economy, and the Northern Ireland Tourist Board plays a key role in supporting the sector's development. As a first step in strengthening that role, I recently approved a new senior management structure for the Northern Ireland Tourist Board. In addition, I am in discussion with the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure regarding the merger of the Northern Ireland Events Company with the Tourist Board. That will further enhance the role and portfolio of the Tourist Board by drawing together the expertise and staff of both organisations. I am also mindful of the recommendations of the report of the House of Commons Select Committee on Northern Ireland Affairs, which included references to the fragmentation of support services. I am keen to address those issues over the coming months to ensure that the Northern Ireland Tourist Board is properly equipped to deliver its important objectives.

Mr McQuillan: Does the Minister agree that the Northern Ireland Tourist Board should have a role to play in the promotion of tourism in Great Britain?

Mr Dodds: I was in Edinburgh last Tuesday to discuss that and other matters — including renewable energy — with my Scottish ministerial counterpart, and we discussed the marketing of Northern Ireland. The Scottish Minister wanted to share the marketing of Scotland with me.

3.45 pm

The Tourist Board and Tourism Ireland are co-operating on a Northern Ireland-specific campaign to market the Province to Scotland and the north of England — areas with which we have a very close affiliation. There has been a slight reduction in the number of visitors from Great Britain, and that needs to be addressed very urgently.

However, it must be recognised that with so many opportunities now available for people to fly to foreign destinations at relatively low cost, the short-break market in Northern Ireland and other parts of the United Kingdom is under pressure.

I will monitor the work of Tourism Ireland and the Tourist Board very closely to ensure that there is value for money and delivery for Northern Ireland.

Mr Elliott: Is the Minister satisfied that Tourism Ireland is providing value for money in its role in Northern Ireland compared to the work of the Northern Ireland Tourist Board?

Mr Dodds: I am very conscious of the need to ensure that Northern Ireland taxpayers get value for money, not only from Tourism Ireland, but from every organisation that is under the remit of my Department.

Under the structures that were set up when the Ulster Unionist Party was negotiating those matters, Tourism Ireland is responsible for the marketing of the island of Ireland for tourism purposes outside Northern Ireland and the Irish Republic. I am determined that the substantial amount of money that is put into tourism each year will show a return, that the number of out-of-state visitors coming to the Province will increase and that the Northern Ireland tourism product, for which DETI has responsibility, will be enhanced. Considerable investment is going into tourism, because we all recognise that the tourism industry has enormous potential for the economy of Northern Ireland. There is an opportunity to grow the figures for out-of-state visitors, and that is an area where we can really make tremendous strides. Therefore we must ensure that there is value for money from the investment that we have put in.

Mr P Ramsey: I welcome the Minister's comments on increased tourism in Ireland. In view of the increased use of international websites to book accommodation, has there been any discussion between the tourist boards North and South about the creation of an all-Ireland booking system to enable easier access?

Mr Dodds: I will look into that, although the issue of an all-Ireland booking system has not been raised with me by anybody in the tourist industry as a priority.

Paramilitary Groups

4. Mr McCarthy asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment to give his assessment of the impact on small enterprises of the activities of paramilitary groups. (AQO 448/08)

Mr Dodds: There has been no formal assessment of the impact of paramilitary activity on small enterprises. Small businesses play a critical role in providing employment and contributing to the growth of the local economy. Attacks on small businesses, whether through threats, extortion or physical damage to premises or the workforce, are hugely detrimental and are to be condemned thoroughly. A number of Organised Crime Task Force events were held for the business community during 2006-07 to raise awareness of the help and support that is available for victims of extortion and to encourage victims to report those crimes to the police. The PSNI, supported by the task force, has also launched an extortion helpline that provides access to professional advice and guidance from specially trained PSNI officers who are experts in that field. I encourage anyone in business who has been a victim of extortion to contact the police extortion helpline.

Mr McCarthy: I thank the Minister for that answer. However, given his totally and utterly disgraceful remarks on local radio recently, suggesting that loyalist paramilitaries should be allowed to take their time giving up their weaponry, how can the small-business community have any confidence in the Minister's determination to combat the loyalist gangsterism that costs our genuine business community very dearly?

Mr Dodds: I wait in vain for the honourable Member to get his facts accurate. What he has just described is totally inaccurate. In pointing out the facts, the honourable gentleman leaves a lot to be desired. Of course it is in all of our interests to ensure that businesses are freed from threats of extortion — from wherever they come. My Department and I utterly repudiate and condemn all threats from paramilitarism; we condemn all extortion, threats and all violence and intimidation of businesses or anybody else. I wish that the honourable gentleman had been as strong in his condemnation of the violence of others when the Members on this side of the House were pushing for such matters when we were in positions — [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr O'Loan: The Minister will be aware that there has been an endemic problem of extortion against building contractors by loyalist paramilitaries, particularly in certain geographical areas. What specific discussions has the Minister had with the PSNI in relation to that matter, what is his assessment of that situation, and will he give an assurance that that problem is being eradicated rapidly?

Mr Dodds: The honourable gentleman draws attention to a very important issue, and it does raise its head from time to time in the work of my Department. He can be assured that, as far as I am concerned, the matter is being taken seriously, and I will continue to monitor the situation closely. However, it is essentially a matter for the police and the criminal justice agencies. I assure the Member that in my discussions with the police and those agencies I will apply whatever pressure is necessary to ensure that the matter is properly highlighted and emphasised. It is totally unacceptable that any business — whether in the construction industry, or anywhere else — should be under threat of extortion or anything like it.

Mr Simpson: Is the Minister satisfied that there is a role for the Serious Organised Crime Agency in providing small businesses in Northern Ireland with the protection that they need and deserve against paramilitary organisations?

Mr Dodds: The Member raises an important issue. As I said, the Organised Crime Task Force has organised and held several events. It was set up in 2000, and it includes among its membership a multi-agency approach. It has a stakeholder group chaired by the Minister of State Paul Goggins, and it is made up of representatives of the Serious Organised Crime Agency, the police, customs, the Assets Recovery Agency, the Home Office, etc. It is important that all the agencies here are around the table doing what they can to bring their collective expertise to bear on what is a very difficult problem to eradicate, but one that we must continue to put pressure on.

Salt Caves: Licences

5. Mr Ross asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment to detail what licences have been granted for the exploration of salt caves underneath the Larne area; and what is the purpose of these licences. (AQO 431/08)

Mr Dodds: No mineral prospecting licences have been granted by the Department for the exploration of salt beds underneath the Larne area. A licence for mineral prospecting in the Larne area has been offered to an applicant, subject to the outcome of the statutory and public consultation process. Two mineral prospecting licence applications for areas of Island Magee have been approved by the Department and will issue shortly. I understand that a company is negotiating with the Crown Estate to obtain a lease to explore the area beneath a part of Larne Lough. Offshore licensing falls outside the responsibility of the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment.

The purpose of the licences is to explore, by means of geophysics and drilling, the thick salt beds known to exist at depth beneath the south-east Antrim area, and to assess their suitability for the engineering of caverns for natural gas storage.

Mr Ross: I thank the Minister for his answer. Given that there is considerable concern among local residents about the prospect of storing natural gas underneath areas of south-east Antrim, will the Minister give me, and the people that I represent, an assurance that they will be consulted fully throughout the entire project and, furthermore, that the local community will not experience disruption during the initial exploratory drilling stages?

Mr Dodds: First and foremost, I must emphasise that a prospecting licence only authorises exploration. The granting of mining leases for extraction does not automatically flow from the granting of a prospecting licence. That is a separate matter that must undergo the normal planning processes.

The Member mentioned safety concerns, which I understand; however, worldwide, there are more than 650 underground gas storage facilities, of which 50 are in soft caverns. It is well-known and well-proven technology that has been extensively used throughout the world.

Of course, there must be full and proper consultation, not least because that is set out and required as a mandatory obligation by legislative provisions. If the process were to reach the stage of an application for a mining licence, it would be necessary to follow planning procedures and for DETI to grant other statutory approvals.

Small and Medium-Sized Business Sector

6. Mr Campbell asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment to provide an assessment of the state of the small and medium-sized business sector across Northern Ireland; and to outline the problems currently being faced in that sector. (AQO 400/08)

Mr Dodds: The small and medium-sized business sector is growing and makes an increasing contribution to the Northern Ireland economy. There are more than 58,000 VAT-registered enterprises in Northern Ireland, 99% of which employ fewer than 250 people. We are working to increase the number of small businesses in Northern Ireland and, in the past five years, Invest NI has provided assistance to help to create, on average, eight new businesses every day. Small and medium-sized enterprises in the Province employ 350,000 people — approximately two thirds of all private-sector jobs.

Mr Campbell: The Minister has alluded to the success of the small and medium-sized sector in Northern Ireland. Will he ensure that Invest NI continues to work to improve the skills base that that sector offers and will he ensure that that sector continues to offer much-needed employment across Northern Ireland and, in particular, for the north coast and East Londonderry areas?

Mr Dodds: The honourable Member mentioned the skills base, and it is important that my Department works with the Department for Employment and Learning on that matter, because an increased skills base is a key driver of productivity and entrepreneurship in Northern Ireland.

The Member can be assured that the Department and Invest NI will not neglect the north coast and East Londonderry. For example, between 2002-03 and 2006-07, there were 865 new business start-ups in East Londonderry, which compares favourably with other areas. I can assure the Member that the Department wants to build on that success in the future.

Mr A Maginness: The Minister spoke of the need to provide the appropriate skills for small and medium-sized businesses. Another problem facing that sector, particularly for new start-up businesses, is a delay in VAT registration. That creates serious problems for start-up companies because of their need to claim back VAT on money that they have spent on machinery and plants. Will the Minister use his good offices to raise that problem with the Revenue and Customs?

Mr Dodds: That matter has been pointed out to me before. That is of concern to the Department, and the Member can rest assured that we will pursue that matter with the relevant authorities. As the Member knows, VAT is not the responsibility of my Department or of the Assembly. Some Members may be thankful for that — others less so. The Alliance Party is keen for the Assembly to assume tax-raising powers, and its members may wish to elaborate on that policy in due course.

We will follow up the matter about which the Member asked with the relevant authorities in HM Revenue and Customs.

4.00 pm

Mr McFarland: What plans does the Minister have to encourage clustering of small and medium-sized enterprises in order that their knowledge can be shared and their export potential increased?

Mr Dodds: Clustering does not apply just to small- and medium-sized enterprises; it applies right across the board. It is a well-known fact that it is much easier to attract foreign direct investment where there is a cluster of knowledge-based industries or businesses that deal with life sciences, for example. The same logic can apply to small and medium-sized enterprises, and Invest Northern Ireland looks closely at that.

However, at the end of the day, we in Northern Ireland must focus on those areas of which we can take best economic advantage, such as life-sciences industries, business services, ICT, and financial services. Those are the key cluster areas on which we must focus as we progress.

Enterprise and Investment Zone, Newtownabbey

7. Mr K Robinson asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment what contact he has had with the Minister of Finance and Personnel in relation to the establishment of a major enterprise and investment zone in Newtownabbey, based on the expertise of the University of Ulster and on tax incentives for inward investors. (AQO 424/08)

Mr Dodds: Across the United Kingdom, enterprise zones are no longer seen as an effective way to target resources, given that they can distort economic activity over wide areas through displacement effects. Tax incentives are reserved matters, for determination by the UK Government.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately, the Minister's time is up. That concludes Question Time.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

Executive Legislative Programme

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one and a half hours for this debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes to propose and 10 minutes for a winding-up speech. All other speakers will have five minutes.

Mr Kennedy: I beg to move

That this Assembly calls on the Executive Committee to produce, before the Hallowe'en recess, an Executive legislative programme detailing executive business for the current Assembly session.

Mr Deputy Speaker, on behalf of the whole House, I congratulate you on your shrinking personage. I understand that you are working hard on a diet, and you seem to be making progress. Congratulations, and keep up the good work.

It is 166 days since the Executive assumed office. How time flies. That is almost 24 weeks — or nearly half a year — and it is well beyond the 100-day honeymoon period that most Administrations can expect to enjoy on entering office. In that time, the Assembly has debated some 69 private Members' motions — by my figures, this is number 70. I emphasise the word "motions".

Such motions must not be confused in the public mind with private Member's Bills, which are public Bills that go through several Stages, including a Committee Stage. Those are substantial undertakings. Private Members' motions, on the other hand, have no practical effects. They are not binding on Ministers, and they are, basically, nothing more than a way for Members to highlight issues of concern. They may be worthy and well intentioned, but they go absolutely nowhere where action is concerned.

I contend that the sheer volume of private Members' motions is undermining the reputation of this Assembly. It is causing journalists to comment that this is not a legislative Assembly and is nothing more than a debating Chamber. Indeed, some less-generous types have called it a "school debating society".

As an MLA, the deputy leader of one of the Executive parties and the Chairman of a Committee, I am deeply concerned about the Assembly's reputation and standing. The current dispensation was too long in the making, and the efforts made to establish it too great, for the Assembly's reputation to be damaged in the way in which it is being damaged by the recurrent failure of the Executive to engage in public business.

Since the Assembly started business on 8 May 2007, the House has debated 69 private Members' motions; a further eight Adjournment debates, which, again, were initiated by private Members; 17 items of Committee business; and 21 items of Assembly business. All those items of business — all 115 of them — could be said to have been initiated outside of the Executive Committee, by the ordinary Members of the House.

During the same period, Ministers and the Executive have initiated 36 items of business. Business initiated by private Members since May therefore outnumbers ministerial or Executive business by a ratio of more than three to one. That means that more than three quarters of Assembly business has been initiated by private Members, and only one quarter by Ministers and the Executive.

Even those figures mask an even greater disparity in performance. Many of those private Members' motions were debated for at least one and a half hours, whereas most ministerial and Executive business is comparatively short in duration. Therefore, the time that is used for the Assembly's business is overwhelmingly dominated by private Members' motions, which are going nowhere. That situation simply cannot be allowed to continue.

It would be more normal for Executive business to take up 70% and private Members' business 30% of the Assembly's time — not the other way around. In the first mandate, that was the case.

This is a legislative Assembly, but where is the legislation? The Assembly is designed to be a vehicle for implementing Executive-led government. However, because the Executive have failed to lead, the Assembly has had to busy itself with private Members' motions.

I say all that more in a sense of sorrow than of anger. My party has two Ministers in the Executive, and they sit beside five DUP Ministers, four Sinn Féin Ministers and one SDLP Minister. The Ulster Unionist Party may have Ministers, but the strategic leadership of the Executive lies with the two major parties — the DUP and Sinn Féin. That strategic leadership is now seen to be lacking.

The Ulster Unionist Party did not comment on that growing problem in the two months before the summer recess, because we accepted that business was just beginning. However, it must be said that the Civil Service and the leading parties knew, as far back as March 2007, that the Executive would become operational.

September has now passed and October is half gone — it is almost like a poem — yet there is still little by way of concrete business. In fact, the situation appears to be getting worse rather than better. During the entire month of June 2007, two whole days of business were dominated by Ministers and the Executive. Since returning from the summer recess last month, the Assembly has discussed 28 private Members' motions, with long hours of debate. However, there have been only 11 items of ministerial or Executive business, many of which have been brief.

That has been going on for far too long. As a Committee Chairman, I believe that we cannot allow the situation to continue indefinitely without taking action. The matter has been raised in the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister, which I chair, but it has now been going on for so long that it had to be brought to the House and into the public domain. That is why we tabled this motion, which asks the Executive to produce a legislative timetable that details Executive business that is to come before the Assembly before Christmas.

I am deeply concerned, for example, that no Executive action has been taken — within the bounds of power that the Assembly already possesses, such as power over rates — to help business. Instead, the Minister of Finance and Personnel appears to be like a rabbit caught in the headlights, waiting for Westminster to agree to reduce corporation tax. That reduction may never come. Sir David Varney's review of corporation tax is due to be published soon, so we will then know the truth. I suspect that it will be an unpalatable truth.

Even if a deal on corporation tax were to be agreed, it may materialise only through some device whereby businesses in Northern Ireland could pay tax in the Republic — and what will the DUP say about that?

Why are the Executive waiting? Why do they not do something for business now, through areas such as the rates where the Assembly already has had power devolved? Waiting until all is agreed before anything is agreed — a concept that seems to underpin the premise that before the Programme for Government is agreed there must be agreement on the Budget — is a recipe for political paralysis. I suspect that negotiating habits learned by the DUP and Sinn Féin during the constitutional negotiations, when that was their mantra, mean that neither party can proceed in any other way. They are caught like dinosaurs in rock sediment.

I have something to tell those parties on behalf of the Northern Ireland people and the taxpayers — that approach is just not getting the job done. The DUP and Sinn Féin are not cutting the mustard when it comes to executive action, legislation or — for want of a better term — government. It is difficult to identify the cause of that inaction: perhaps it is the difficulty of having two inexperienced and opposing parties forming the majority of Ministers in the Government, or the more serious political problem of dissension within the enforced coalition; or perhaps the whole government machine is rusty after so many years of unaccountable direct rule. It may even be a blend of all three factors. Whatever the cause, we have to ask whether, after 166 days, the two lead parties of the moment can deliver. The signs are that they cannot. Let us hope that that changes.

In another sense, there is action that we in the Assembly can take outside this ministerial inaction: we could begin the process of revising current legislation in the Committees of the Assembly. That would have a positive impact on people's lives. It would begin to change things for the better. However, it would be preferable for the Executive to do what I am asking them to do in the motion, and issue a timetable for Executive-led business in the coming months so that we could all see an end to the drift.

The Assembly is meant to work, legislate and administer. It is not meant to sit like a Third World dictator's Rolls Royce without petrol. So I say to the Executive: get a move on. Fill the Assembly automobile with the petrol of legislation and Executive action.

Mr Deputy Speaker: We could always write a poem.

Mr S Wilson: I must say that, having listened to the Member, I expected that we might have been given some ideas for legislation. I did not hear one concrete — or sediment of rock — example from Mr Kennedy about what kind of legislation is needed. However, I congratulate him on his courage in tabling the motion for two reasons. First, it is clear that he has no political ambition, because he has offended his party leader and Mr McGimpsey the Member for South Belfast both of whom are Ministers. Neither of them has brought forward any legislation.

Mr Kennedy: The Member should do his homework properly, which he ought to be able to do, having been a teacher in a previous life. Will he confirm that Mr McGimpsey has already introduced the Health (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill, which is currently with the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety for consideration? Mr McGimpsey is also the Minister who attends the House most frequently. He has responded to 15 motions introduced under private Members' business and to one in an Adjournment debate, and he has provided answers to over 400 oral and written questions. So I have not fallen out with Michael McGimpsey.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I am awarding the Member one extra minute for the intervention.

Mr S Wilson: I should get two minutes for that.

I have not failed to do my homework. I deliberately did not mention the Health (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill because I was hoping that the Member would mention it himself. That is the other reason why I think the Member is being courageous. There have been five pieces of legislation so far, and Mr Kennedy — the Member who is so keen to get legislation into this House and who is so keen to be involved in legislation — did not speak on any of them. He had 12 occasions on which to speak on legislation.

I should say that he did speak once — he spoke during the debate on the Budget Bill, when he hoped that he would not be put outside to get wet when the fire alarm went off and the rain was coming through the roof.

4.15 pm

I have three points to make: the first one is that lots of legislation's being passed by the Assembly would not necessarily mean good Government. Many people would say that the less Government interference there is in their lives, the better. Many businessmen have made the point that, rather than more legislation, they would love to see some of the current legislation repealed. The absence of legislation does not mean bad government, although there are pieces of legislation that should be brought to the Assembly quickly.

Secondly, quick legislation is never good legislation. If the Member had done more research on the legislative process and the drafting of legislation, he would know that a piece of legislation is not ready to print the day after a decision has been made. The legislative process and the drafting of legislation require time and skill, and there are a limited number of people who can do it. Very often, quick legislation turns out to be bad legislation. So far, many of the Bills that have gone through the Assembly have been Bills that were drafted under the direct rule Administration, perhaps a year ago, and it has taken that long to put them on the statute book. That is not unique to this Assembly; it is common to other Assemblies and Parliaments, such as Westminster.

Thirdly, there is a need for legislation. In particular, there is one piece of legislation that should be included in the Programme for Government when it comes, and that is legislation to deal with the transfer procedure from primary school to post-primary school. That is one case where the Minister should show urgency.

Finally, the Member said that the Budget is being used as an excuse to delay the Programme for Government. In his naivety, he may have ignored the fact that legislation usually requires resources. The worst kind of legislation is not only drafted quickly but does not have the necessary backup to enforce it. That causes people to become cynical about the process of government. Without a proper Budget and knowing what spending we have in place, it is impossible to know what kind of legislative programme we can afford and what resources we have to back it up. Therefore, while I support the idea that we must have a Programme for Government in place as quickly as possible, the opportunism of the Member for Newry and Armagh — who has not shown much interest in legislation in this House — does not become him, nor does it become this House.

Mr Molloy: A LeasCheann Comhairle, go raibh maith agat. I attended this debate to examine whether serious arguments would be put forward for debate, or whether it was an opportunity for Mr Kennedy to bash the DUP. He has done neither. I know that Mr Kennedy sees himself as a bit of a comedian, but in this proposal he says that we do not need to worry about the Budget or what the legislation is, but that we simply need to make legislation. Therefore, he is proposing that we make legislation for the sake of it without any thinking behind it. He said that he wanted the Executive to produce the legislative programme before the Christmas recess, although the motion cites the Halloween recess; perhaps he can clarify which session of the Assembly he means.

It is important that the Assembly produces legislation that is proper and necessary. Undoubtedly, it must still review and amend certain legislation that was brought in under direct rule. Much of the legislation that was introduced under the old Executive must also be reviewed. In particular, the issues of water taxes and the rates review must be examined. All of those issues are important. Certain legislation was rushed through in the last Assembly. Often, Members were loaded with papers, legislation and documents in order to keep them busy while the Executive did not really do anything on that particular programme.

Sinn Féin will listen to the views that are expressed in the debate and to any alternative proposals that are made. It is important that every Member has the opportunity to suggest what legislation they believe is required. I hope that, by the end of the debate, the Assembly will have heard from Mr Kennedy's party about the issues for which it wants legislation and those on which it wants debate. It is good to hear Mr Kennedy say that the Assembly has been a talking shop. Sinn Féin has said that for the past two years. The Assembly was quite prepared to exist as a talking shop during the Hain Assembly so that it could, at least, discuss relevant issues over which it had no real power to instigate change.

Therefore, if the Assembly is to deal with legislation, my party hopes that it will be meaningful legislation which will benefit people's lives, and will not just simply rubber-stamp that which came from Westminster under the direct rule Administration. The stop-start nature of government by the previous Executive was unhelpful. Mr Kennedy says that the present Executive does not have enough experience. Certainly, the experience of the last Executive was not good. Therefore, a new situation can only be an improvement.

It is clear from Mr Kennedy's introductory comments that he does not consider the debate to be serious, but sees it as an opportunity to cause a reaction. If he were serious about bringing forward legislation, he could do so by way of a private Member's Bill or through Committee legislation, which could be brought to the Floor. I sit on the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and the deputy First Minister, which is chaired by Mr Kennedy. At present, that Committee's business does not include any to propose or amend legislation; nor, indeed, have any particular ideas on how to do so been suggested.

Therefore, I welcome the Assembly's opportunity to support the Executive's in-year development and to bring forward legislation. All Members want that to happen. However, legislation need only be brought forward when changes are required, and not simply for the sake of doing so. It is up to the Assembly to take control of the situation and to pursue the issues that it wants to debate and be dealt with. During all of the negotiations that have taken place during the last couple of years, the onus was on Members having an input on what matters are legislated for by the Assembly. Instead of debating some less relevant issues, now is the time to bring forward motions that propose changes to legislation and new legislation that the Executive can take forward for the future. Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle.

Mrs D Kelly: I am interested by Mr Molloy's comment and criticism of the stop-go nature of the previous Assembly, given that it was the IRA's failure to decommission that held its work to ransom.

The SDLP supports the motion. The debate is long overdue. If Mr Molloy wants to know what legislation Members want, I will tell him what basic, simple legislation is needed; a repeal of PPS 14 (Planning Policy Statement 14). In my constituency, neighbours are in dispute over hedges and trees. I want legislation on that. Consultation on the matter finished earlier in 2007. It appears that a straightforward piece of legislation is all that is required.

My party also wants the single equality Bill to be brought forward. Ministers who belong to certain parties had given clear commitments to bringing forward equality legislation. However, there is now a political dead hand on that matter. Furthermore, my party wants a better sustainable development framework. At last week's Committee, the Office of the First Minister and the deputy First Minister could not put forward any proposals on that issue and wants further time to deliberate.

The Committee is also interested to note that, thus far, the bids for efficiency proposals — and proposals for new moneys — have been overseen only by departmental officials and not by Ministers. That is, perhaps, because some issues may be too controversial, and Ministers do not want to be associated with them at present. An example of that is the £0.96 million that is to be deducted from the community relations budget.

We want progress on the Civic Forum, but we are now told that the terms of reference have not been agreed. We also want some economic development. We want to know what is happening with the Maze/Long Kesh site so that there can be proper regeneration, jobs and houses, and the sporting fraternity can know where their home will be for their big games in the coming years. Are those matters being delayed because they are not important enough for the Executive to debate, or is it, as many observers believe, the fact that the two major parties cannot agree on much at present?

We have also seen delays in the appointment of a Commissioner for Victims and Survivors of the Troubles, and the manner in which the Committee was given that piece of news was quite deplorable — an announcement in the press that afternoon, 20 minutes after the Chairperson and Deputy Chairperson of the Committee were informed of the matter.

Some Members have already spoken about the legislative framework. Mr Molloy talked about debates and debates. Members do not want to be in the Chamber, debating and debating. We often hear Members referring to themselves as belonging to the two leading parties. Where are those parties leading us to? What impact have they made on social and economic matters? Yes, we have greater peace, but do we have better community relations? The events that occurred in some areas over the past two weekends show that we have not made much progress in that matter. We need to build on a shared future.

Mr S Wilson: Will the Member give way?

Mrs D Kelly: Of course I will give way.

Mr S Wilson: I am surprised that the one area that the Member has not mentioned is social and affordable housing, which is a big issue for people in Northern Ireland. It is also the remit of the Minister for Social Development, the Member's party colleague, who has been silent on proposals on that issue.

Mrs D Kelly: I refute that suggestion in its entirety. Perhaps the Minister of Finance and Personnel should make a decision on the Executive's Budget and on the Programme for Government. The Minister for Social Development has said, time and time again, that her Department should be given the money with which to build the houses. Have we heard anything about the Programme for Government in the House? No, we have not. Are we going to be treated to such a programme by the end of the year? Thus far, there has been nothing but delays and slowdown in any sort of legislative framework or decision-making.

Mr Lunn: It might have been expected that this motion would come from the Alliance Party, as the only party that is not involved in the so-called Government. Therefore, it is the only party that should not be embarrassed by the necessity for such a motion or have to defend its own party's Ministers. That irony has arisen from the fact that the motion has come from a party of Government, with two of the main culprits in its own ranks. That fact has not been missed by Members who spoke earlier in the debate. Therefore, I will not dwell on the matter, nor will I dwell on the revelation on 'The Politics Show' on Sunday — courtesy of Mr O'Dowd — that it was not even the Ulster Unionists' first choice of motion at last week's Business Committee meeting. There we are. It is amazing what one hears on television. I wonder how many times, in Parliaments around the world, ordinary Members have had to remind Government Ministers of their primary function.

Effectively, a new Government was put in place five months ago. It was brought into office on a tide of goodwill and public expectation. It pledged to roll up its corporate sleeves and put right all the dreadful things that direct rule Ministers inflicted on us. We might have expected an avalanche of legislation, such were the pressing needs of the people. Instead, we have inertia, paralysis and an evident failure to agree about anything in the Executive, except to promote an image of peace and harmony to cover up the complacency that appears to have gripped them.

We wait for action on so many major issues, some of which have been highlighted today: help for businesses, rating, education, the transfer procedure, planning, and the farce surrounding the appointment of a Commissioner for Victims. At a time when classroom assistants have gone on strike, further education lecturers have become totally frustrated, and people wait for non-existent ambulances, we spend our time discussing ridiculous motions, such as last week's on the use of the Irish language in the House, which was inflicted on us by Mr Kennedy's party colleague. I hope that all Members noted the reaction to that debate out in the real world — it was one of total exasperation and is evidence of the widespread cynicism about our activities.

4.30 pm

Mr Kennedy: It would be very helpful if the Member could outline, in any part of his speech, what side he will eventually come down on. Is he in favour of the motion or against it? It is not clear at the moment.

Mr Lunn: Some declare their intentions at the start of their speeches, and others wait until the end, but I will do so in the middle of my speech — the Alliance Party supports the motion. There is a feeling that we are doing nothing useful in this Chamber and that we are filling our days with discussions on non-binding motions. Some of those motions are perfectly worthy and should be accommodated, when times allows. However, they should not be centre stage — that should be reserved for primary legislation, given that this is a legislative Assembly.

We in opposition are happy to support the motion that has been brought forward by a party of Government to criticise the Government. Once again, that highlights the dilemma that faces the Ulster Unionist Party, and, perhaps, the SDLP, too — whether they are in or out of Government. We have no such problem on these Benches, and we will continue to press for the activity demanded by the motion.

In conclusion, I must say that I admire Mr Kennedy's optimism in setting a timescale of 11 days. Given the way in which things are going at the moment, Halloween 2008 would be a more realistic target, but we live in hope. The Alliance Party supports the motion.

Mr Spratt: I do not believe that there is a crisis of confidence in this Assembly due to a perceived lack of legislation. So far, five Executive Bills have passed through the House, which is comparable to the record of the previous Executive, which also averaged a Bill every two weeks. It should be noted that further pieces of legislation have been delayed for several weeks by some departmental Committees. If we are to progress legislation, we must ensure that Committees work with their Ministers when required so that such delays do not hinder the work of the Assembly.

When we compare the record of this Assembly with that of our friends in the Scottish Parliament, we see that no Bills were introduced by the Scottish Executive before the summer recess, and that one Bill has been introduced since September. That comparison shows this Assembly to have been quicker to bring forward Bills and does nothing to fuel the claims of some that the Assembly is not doing its job.

It is important to state that finalising the Budget and formulating a legislative programme cannot be done overnight. Those decisions are vital to the future success of the Assembly. As such, the necessary time and consideration must be given to them. We should not denounce OFMDFM or the Executive for taking that approach. I am confident that, when revealed, the legislative programme will show the benefits of devolved Government and how that can impact on the daily lives of our constituents.

It is sad that, since devolution has been restored, members of the Ulster Unionist Party have sought to undermine the Administration through cynicism. Now that we have our devolved Assembly, we must question just how serious the Ulster Unionist Party is about devolution. The motion calls for an Executive legislative programme. In my opinion, that is a fair request. However, I believe that, unfortunately, the Member who proposed the motion has done so for the wrong reasons. The Member for Newry and Armagh has made an accusation that this Chamber is nothing more than a glorified debating society. I believe that those were the words of Mr Kennedy.

Mr Kennedy: Yes, they were.

Mr Spratt: Mr Kennedy said that someone else used those words, but I think that he used them over the weekend. However, some debates, such as the one on attacks on Orange Halls, should not be discredited by such a slur.

Mr Kennedy: I understand the important point that the Member is making. I tried to stress that most of the motions that were debated were on important subjects. Unfortunately, as we have seen this weekend, attacks on Orange Halls have not stopped, despite the fact that there was a useful debate on the subject in the Assembly. That remains a matter of ongoing concern.

Mr Spratt: I agree; it is disgraceful that those attacks have continued. I hope that Members opposite, and on all sides of the House, will make sure that something is done to end those attacks as soon as possible.

The Ulster Unionist Party is in no position to lay such a claim or to stand aloof from such an accusation. After all, it submitted the same motion for debate twice in four months. Is Mr Kennedy criticising the members of the UUP who sit on the Executive — the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety and the Minister for Employment and Learning — for the lack of legislation coming from their Departments?

I have every confidence that OFMDFM and the Executive will bring forward a programme when the time is right and that it will be for the good of all the people of Northern Ireland.

Mr O'Dowd: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Mr Kennedy began the debate by bombarding us with figures and statistics, which is always a useful tactic when there is no substance to the argument, and to fill up the allotted 10 minutes. It all added up to nothing, but the most important figure among those that Mr Kennedy threw at us was two — the two Ulster Unionist Ministers sitting in the Executive. If we add on Mr Kennedy's ally, there are three Ministers sitting on the Executive, all of whom can introduce legislation if they so wish. I have not heard any of the many political correspondents who hover around this place state that there has been any demand by, or any record of, those Ministers lambasting other members of the Executive for not bringing forward legislation.

Mr McNarry: They are not being given a lead from the dominant parties.

Mr O'Dowd: I have no problem in giving you the lead. If you wish to learn and follow — [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. All Members must make their remarks through the Chair.

Mr O'Dowd: A LeasCheann Comhairle —

Mr S Wilson: Will the Member give way?

Mr O'Dowd: For you, Sammy, certainly.

Mr S Wilson: Does the Member not find it incredible that the Ulster Unionist Party and the SDLP require the DUP and Sinn Féin to hold the hands of their Ministers to guide them through the legislative process? Does that not say a lot about the quality of their Ministers?

Mr O'Dowd: It is a long time since anybody held my hand.

The Ulster Unionist Party has indulged itself in criticising the amount of private Members' business that has been transacted. Perhaps we could have introduced legislation last week instead of having the anti-Irish language debate, or, the week before, instead of discussing the state of Peter Robinson's back garden. I do not know whether the motion on fuel poverty, which the Ulster Unionists moved twice, was the result of a clerical error or a genuine attempt to address the issue.

That brings me to Councillor Kelly of the SDLP. What legislation has the Minister for Social Development brought before the House to tackle fuel poverty? None whatsoever. It is all part of the handbag fight at dawn between the UUP and the DUP. That is all that it is, and since none of the Ulster Unionists are of the female persuasion, I will leave it up to Members' imaginations as to who it put forward as combatants.

Listening to the Ulster Unionist Party recently, however, it seems that there is no point in introducing legislation. There will be no money to finance legislation because the Ulster Unionist Party is telling the manufacturing industry that there is no need to pay rates; it is telling society that water and sewerage services do not need finance; and it is telling the public sector that there is a pot of gold at the end of the rainbow.

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Member give way?

Mr O'Dowd: I am flowing, Dolores; I will give way in a minute.

Even if we were to introduce all this legislation, the Ulster Unionist wish list would be impossible to finance.

Mrs D Kelly: The Member's last few comments sound remarkably like the Sinn Féin party manifesto. Is the Member saying that Sinn Féin is going to renege on its manifesto promises on water charges and manufacturing tax?

Mr O'Dowd: I hate to break the news to the Member, but the SDLP has broadly welcomed the water report. [Interruption.]

I will not accept any more requests to give way.

If the Ulster Unionist Party wants legislation, I can lead the way for it and suggest a few areas where it can introduce legislation. Bring forward legislation based on the 11 individual reports that formed the Bamford Report. Bring forward legislation on the RPA and the Health Service. Bring forward legislation that ensures that staff have proper representation on trust boards. I am sure that every Member of the House would be more than happy to debate those three areas.

Discussions to agree a Budget and a Programme for Government will take place in the House in the near future. Until then, it is a waste of time to say that a programme of legislation must be agreed before the recess — and Mr Kennedy has yet to decide whether that should be the Halloween recess or the Christmas recess.

I return to my old sparring partner, Dolores Kelly. If the SDLP wants us to lead the way for it, DSD could bring forward legislation on social housing, registration of landlords, support for the community and voluntary sector, and repeal of the repressive measures in the Welfare Reform Bill. Perhaps Margaret Ritchie could say what she is going to do about so-called UDA funding. She put the cart before the horse and did not check the legal advice before she made statements.

Sinn Féin's view is that the process must be followed through its logical steps. If the Executive are to produce a programme of legislative measures, they must follow steps. In the meantime, any party from the Executive can publish whatever legislation it chooses, and I look forward to seeing it. Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle.

Mr Shannon: Thers nae doot whut-sae-iver that in oarder fer Norlin Airlan tae gaun fort we hae tae mak laws. Hoo-iver thees laws shud nae be pit throo in aa' hurry. Fer we fin whun laws er hurried throo, it is tha ivery dae fould whau pay. Tak tae oany first-yeer law student whut they din in ther first yeer o' trainin, en ther anser wull be: tae fin oot tha loop hols in tha law in oarder tae bend tha rools an defen tha in-defensible. Twau much law is hurried throo an in daein this, we gie lawyers — o' whau ther is a wheen in this getherin — a tiem tae twust an ben in oarder tae alloo rang tae be seen as richt. Thon lawyers canny dae ocht but agree.

There is no doubt that in order for Northern Ireland to progress and move forward, we must legislate.

[Interruption.]

If Members listen, I will now translate the Ulster-Scots part of my speech.

However, legislation cannot and should not be rushed through, as whenever things are rushed through the legislature, it is the everyday people who pay. If any first-year law student is asked to explain what they are trained to do in their first semester, the reply will be that they are trained to find loopholes in legislation in order to bend the rules and defend the indefensible. Too much legislation is rushed through, giving the lawyers — of whom there are several in this Chamber, although they may not be present at this moment — the opportunity to twist and bend and allow the illegal to be seen as legal. The lawyers cannot do anything but agree.

Although the Member has proposed the motion for the right reasons, he has not considered the whole picture. With great respect to Mr Kennedy, those points must be enlarged. The people, whom we seek to aid and protect through legislation, end up being dragged through a legal quagmire, which could have been easily avoided through legislation that is properly worded, instead of a rush job in an attempt to show progress.

Since devolution was restored, five, or perhaps six, pieces of legislation have been introduced and more are on the tables of each Department. Those Departments are represented by all four of the parties that comprise the Executive, not only the two biggest parties. However, it is my firmly held belief that the strict timetable for legislation leaves it wide open for mistakes. That belief is backed up by people with legal knowledge. A well-known saying is that if something is worth doing, it is worth doing right. Let us get legislation right when we bring it to the Chamber.

Undoubtedly, there is a frustration that more must be done. However, rushing it through would only create further problems. Dolores Kelly talked about the changes that Members wanted to see. All the parties are agreed about changes to PPS 14, but let us get the legislation right. The lone ranger, to my rear, may have a different opinion on that.

The Assembly must consider housing issues, and the Minister for Social Development can introduce changes, such as freeing up land, to help with the provision of social housing.

4.45 pm

It is easy to bring legislative issues to the Chamber. There have been proposals to leave aside money from the health budget for drugs to treat Alzheimer's disease, cancer and arthritis. Reg Empey can introduce legislation on apprenticeships. All parties can have their say in the Chamber on issues such as industrial rating and EU directives on sewage. Departments, including the Department of Education and the Department for Regional Development, must introduce legislative changes.

Mrs D Kelly: Given the Member's commitment to bringing legislation before the House, does he not think that it was disgraceful that, during the summer recess, the DUP and Sinn Féin snuck off to the Secretary of State to seek a change in the legislation and an increased budget of £100,000 for special advisers to junior Ministers?

Mr Shannon: I do not agree with the Member, but Dolores probably expected me to say that.

The important consideration is that junior Ministers have a job to do. Mrs Kelly wants child poverty and other issues concerning children to be addressed. That is a job for the junior Ministers, and that is why the Assembly needs them. Therefore, the Member's question was most unfair. Several potential subjects for the new legislative programme have been mentioned: high-hedges legislation, car-parking legislation for private residents and a ban on the sale of cigarettes to those under 18 years of age. All parties want legislation on those, and probably many more issues, to be introduced.

Ministers and their officials are not sitting on their hands, but are working to introduce relevant legislation that will stand the test of time, rather than having to be repeatedly amended to cope with the machinations of the legal profession. Some Ministers — and Members know who they are — could, perhaps, have moved more quickly. UUP Members on my right have been shouting, but perhaps they should introduce legislation. The Assembly must put legislation on the table and get it right, first time. Case lawyers must not be allowed to shape the legislation: that is the right of the elected representatives in the Assembly.

Mr K Robinson: Even if there is no result today, it is a long time since there has been such an animated and good-humoured debate across the Chamber. The list of potential legislation that Members have suggested will keep the Assembly busy for the next 20 years.

Mr S Wilson: That means that there will be overtime.

Mr K Robinson: As Sammy says, we will be asking for overtime.

Mr Kennedy introduced today's motion because this is a serious matter, and he wanted to focus the attention of the House on what the UUP considers to be a problem. Several Members, including one or two on the far side of the Chamber, have touched on the relevant issues. I want the House to treat the motion as a serious attempt to focus attention on an existing problem. Despite what was said earlier, the public perception is that the Assembly is becoming a debating society. The Assembly has been up and running for some time, but has yet to deliver what the public perceive as a punch — although some Members may disagree.

High-hedges legislation has been mentioned several times. I asked questions on that matter during the Assembly's first mandate, and the UUP tried to progress the issue during the second mandate. I have approached two direct rule Ministers and the current Minister of the Environment to try to get such legislation passed. That legislation would be fairly simple and non-contentious, and much of the homework has already been done.

However, today's debate has been occasioned by the persistence of private Members' motions on the business agenda of the House. During the Assembly's first mandate, there was 70% of Executive business and only 30% of private Members' and Committee business. In fact, the Business Committee lamented the fact that there had been so little private Members' business. Plans were afoot to increase that by encouraging MLAs to produce private Member's Bills and encouraging Committees to initiate legislation.

The situation in the current mandate is different, partly because the Assembly's second mandate lasted for four years. I will not say on which part of their body Members sat, but they did nothing. As a Member at that time, I felt frustrated, as I am sure did others. The problem is that that Assembly became a talking shop, and some of the bad habits from those days persist into the current mandate.

Two elements are at work here. The first concerns the sheer amount of talking that is taking place. Even some of the questions to Ministers are major speeches in their own right. It is sometimes open to doubt as to whether they contain questions at all. You and your colleagues have addressed that matter several times, Mr Deputy Speaker. The second element concerns the Executive's failure to lead the Assembly strategically. The fault for that lies squarely with the two largest parties, in spite of what they have said today, because they dominate the Executive. It lies specifically with the First Minister and the deputy First Minister, and with their junior Ministers —

Lord Morrow: Will the Member give way?

Mr K Robinson: Yes, I will.

Lord Morrow: I have listened to the debate, and there has been much criticism of the Executive. I will not comment on whether that criticism is justified, but I remind Members that probably everyone sitting in the House today is a member of a Committee. I have not seen any business coming from Committees, and I am not aware of anyone who is restricting those Committees from bringing business to the House.

Mr K Robinson: I thank the Member for his intervention. It is a valid point that Committees also have a role to play. However, at the top of the tree is the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister. As lowly Back-Benchers, we feel that it is the responsibility of the First Minister and the deputy First Minister to introduce policy and to try to co-ordinate it. That is what is lacking, and that is the major problem.

The idea seems to have grown up in the Executive Committee that until the Budget has been finalised, we cannot have a Programme for Government. Why is that? Government financing is a continuous process — it is like a conveyor belt. There is always a certain amount of money that we know that we will have, and there is a certain amount of money that we may have. We also have a borrowing facility, but I urge that we use that wisely, if at all. Therefore, there is no reason why more of the business of Government cannot begin immediately, before the Budget is finalised. It is ludicrous to suggest that we wait — I hope that Sammy is listening to this one — like the South Pacific islanders who believe in the cargo cult, with money dropping from heaven, directed by the current object of their worship, Gordon Brown. Sammy can research that for his homework tonight. A good enough reason does not exist for the Assembly not to address the real issues now. It must start to make decisions, using the devolved powers that we possess at this time. Business cannot wait for the corporation tax debate to be finalised.

Mr McNarry: Will the Member tell me, in his eloquent way, what would happen were private Members' business to stop? How would we fill our time on Mondays and Tuesdays?

Mr K Robinson: I am glad to know that I am in good standing with the party Whip. That is praise indeed. Thank you very much.

I honestly do not know how we could fill our time. I watch the monitor when I am in my office doing real business and I come out of Committees drained, after three hours or more of trying to cover Committee business. However, when I have come to the Chamber, I have found the repetitive nature of all the debates up to now to be boring. I am sure that people who study events in the Chamber sometimes wonder why we are here at all.

Government must go on, and it must be seen to be going on. There is no reason why elements in the Programme for Government cannot be prioritised and set against their own budget. There is no reason why it should not begin here as quickly as possible.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr K Robinson: Do I not have a couple of extra minutes, Mr Deputy Speaker? I have been up and down like a yo-yo.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I have been generous and added one minute.

Mr K Robinson: Your generosity has run out. Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker.

Mr Attwood: I have two points to make, the first of which concerns the approach that the DUP and Sinn Féin have taken to the debate. If Members cast their minds back six months, everyone in Northern Ireland was told that the Executive could not be formed until May, because it was necessary to have six weeks in order to hit the ground running. The Executive were not formed at the end of March, or in April, so that the parties could hit the ground running in May. Since then, some parties in Government have failed to do that.

Secondly, I wish to refer to the comments that were made about the Minister for Social Development. People tend to forget that it was the Minister for Social Development who introduced the first piece of legislation in the House — the Welfare Reform Bill.

The Minister for Social Development has been trying to introduce further legislation, including, for example, Bills on charities, child maintenance, and pensions. Those were signed off by the Minister long ago. Why have they not been introduced? They have been held back by the Office of First Minister and deputy First Minister. It is true that, in recent times, the Department has released two of those pieces of legislation. However, legislation that should and could have been introduced, and that the Department for Social Development wanted to have been introduced, has been held up at the centre of Government. I invite the junior Minister to comment on that.

Deeper patterns of concern are beginning to emerge in the Chamber, and Members need to be aware of those. When the DUP and Sinn Féin were negotiating the St Andrews Agreement, they stated, as articles of faith, that there would be increased accountability to the Assembly on North/South bodies. Where Ministers' functions were concerned, another St Andrews article of faith was that three Ministers would be able to bring one Minister to account on any matter, thereby increasing Executive accountability. Although I am mindful of and respect the ruling of the Speaker on statements about this matter, what did we discover a week ago when the decision to re-advertise the position of victims' commissioner was announced? We discovered that there was no accountability to the Chamber either on the decision not to appoint that commissioner or on the decision to re-advertise the position, a process on which work will be carried out over the next four months. On the one hand, therefore, the DUP and Sinn Féin agreed at St Andrews that the North/South bodies would be more accountable, as would individual Ministers. However, they did not accept that those who made decisions on high-profile, sensitive matters such as the appointment of a victims' commissioner should be accountable to the Chamber.

Mr S Wilson: Will the Member give way?

Mr Attwood: I will give way in a second.

Members must be aware that a concerning pattern of treating the Chamber in that way is beginning to emerge.

Mr S Wilson: The Member has made an important point. However, will he state whether the SDLP Minister sought the support of two other Ministers to have the appointment of the victims' commissioner referred back to the Executive?

Mr Attwood: I am sure that the Minister, who is not in the Chamber, will take that on board. [Laughter.] I am sorry; she is here, I was, literally, unsighted.

There has not been an Executive meeting since the announcement about the appointment of a victims' commissioner. The Executive met on the Monday evening, after the announcement was made and before the agenda could be determined.

Members should be concerned about the wider patterns that are emerging. Government business that will be held up includes the Irish language Act, the 11-plus, and the RPA. Looking six months ahead, it is likely that further legislation that will be held up will include that on the Parades Commission review, the bill of rights and the devolution of justice and policing.

Therefore, the SDLP is putting down the marker that, not only has there been no business of any great substance in the Chamber, but major pieces of Government business are already being held up, and more will be held up in the next six months. Gridlock is emerging, particularly between the two major parties.

The reason that Members should support the motion can be summed up by what someone said to me in my Falls Road office last week. He said that six months after this Government was formed there has been little Government, no Government and bad Government. There has been bad Government on the classroom assistants' pay dispute, no Government on legislation, and little Government on everything else.

The junior Minister (Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister) (Mr Paisley Jnr): My briefing note tells me that I should thank those who proposed the motion. I thank them sincerely. If the motion represents a kicking for OFMDFM, I would mark their homework "could do better". I am impressed by, and Mr Ken Robinson was right to mention it, the enthusiasm of Members to get to grips with Executive business.

Members want to get to grips with the Assembly's business, and they should be commended for their interest.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. Someone has a mobile phone switched on. Please check the phone discreetly and turn it off.

5.00 pm

Mr Paisley Jnr: The Executive recognise the Assembly's understandable wish to discharge its right and responsibility to scrutinise their work, including the important area of draft legislation. The Member for East Antrim is right when he says that good Governments are not measured by the number of laws that they make: it is important to put that on the record. Ministers' acknowledgement of the importance of legislation is on the record, and since the restoration of devolution, Ministers have sought, where possible, to introduce primary legislation in several areas. However, Ministers must be satisfied that the legislation is required in policy terms and is appropriate to meet those needs, and they must secure the agreement of the Executive to do so.

Members will be aware that five Bills were introduced soon after restoration: the Budget Bill, the Health (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill, the Libraries Bill, the Taxis Bill, and the Welfare Reform Bill. Three of those Bills are under consideration by the relevant Committees. Other pieces of legislation are being worked on and scrutinised. The same amount of legislation has been introduced in the nine weeks of the Assembly's present mandate as was introduced in the first 11 weeks of the Assembly that commenced in 1999. It is important to put that on the record. It just so happened that the so-called dominant parties in 1999 were not the DUP or the party opposite: two other parties were dominant. It is important to — [Interruption.]

The DUP were not the dominant party then, but I thank the Ulster Unionists for giving us the position of dominance today. I fully acknowledge the importance of the Executive's informing the Assembly of their legislative intent as soon as they are able, and we intend to inform the Assembly of the business for the current session in a matter of days. However, several observations might usefully be made about the subject of legislation.

First, the Assembly and Executive were restored to bring back accountability — an important issue that was raised by the Member for West Belfast Alex Attwood — and to make the work of the Government here more relevant. The Executive did not take up office to promote, without question, the policies and legislative proposals of their predecessors. If people think that the Executive came here to implement, willy-nilly, legislation that direct rule Ministers had in mind, they are wrong. We intended to bring to this process our own thoughts, strategies and policies and to implement what the public expects us to put in place. All Executive members have brought their own ideas to the table. It would have been an easy option for us to follow, without apology, the policies of the direct rule Ministers, but we have considered — and have to consider — our own policies.

Mr S Wilson: Does the Member accept that the Libraries Bill is a good example of an instance where the Assembly will have to undo some of the legislation that emanated from direct rule and that it will lead — if it goes through — to an unaccountable library authority?

Mr Paisley Jnr: Those are all points that the Assembly and the Executive will consider.

Secondly, the introduction of legislation is not an end in itself. It represents one, albeit important, stage between policy development and implementation. Legislation based on inadequate policy development and consideration is bad legislation and will lead to problems when we try to put it into practice. It is, therefore, right that Ministers are fully satisfied about the purpose, effect and intention of legislation before they bring it to the House — a point that has been ably made by other Members.

Mr McNarry: I accept the junior Minister's valid comment on direct rule, and thank goodness that we are here. He mentioned the repeal of legislation introduced by direct rule Ministers.

What provision will there be in the forthcoming Programme for Government for repeal of legislation?

Mr Paisley Jnr: If the Member will bear with me until the end of my statement, he will hear something that may at least whet his appetite, if not entirely satisfy him.

Legislation does not represent the totality of the engagement among the Executive, Ministers, the Departments and the Assembly. In the relatively short period since 8 May, some 100 pieces of subordinate legislation have also been laid, following scrutiny of their policy content by Committees. Where appropriate, Ministers have also considered asking the Assembly to approve provisions in respect of legislation that is being passed at Westminster to ensure that those provisions are available in Northern Ireland at the earliest opportunity. The Assembly has consented to that in respect of the Forced Marriage (Civil Protection) Bill, and a number of other proposals that will shortly come forward after discussion with Committees.

It is easy to take potshots and criticise the Executive for not doing enough, but it should be recognised that a considerable amount of work has already been done, which makes that criticism unfair.

Mr Kennedy was critical of the Business Committee when he proposed the motion. That was rather unfair because that Committee decides the business to be done, and its timing. The draft Renewables Obligation (Amendment) Order (Northern Ireland) 2007 was brought before the Assembly today by the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment, and it was allocated only half an hour for debate, which shows a lack of interest from some of those who would be the first to criticise the House for not bringing legislation forward. I am not sure whether the Member was interested enough to contribute.

Mr Kennedy also criticised the strategic leadership of OFMDFM, and said that he wants it to follow direct rule Ministers blindly. The Executive sets their own agenda, and do not follow dictates from another place.

The Member did not name one single piece of legislation that he would like to see enacted, although he did make a comment on the rates process. He also outlined what I can only describe as a recipe for financial ruin, because consideration must be given to budgetary concerns before an agenda is set. Therefore, the Executive are showing strategic leadership by taking that process seriously, stating what they want to do, and asking how that can be paid for.

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Member give way?

Mr Paisley Jnr: I am coming to the Member in a minute.

Mr Kennedy promised the Assembly jam tomorrow, which is not a good policy. The Member for Newry and Armagh criticised the Government, and if he must do that, he should at least be consistent, because he cannot claim one day that Ministers are not getting on with one another, and the next day write to 'The Newsletter' describing them as "Chuckle Brothers". He cannot have it both ways.

The Member for Upper Bann Mrs Kelly mentioned eight pieces of legislation that she would like to see introduced to the House. Of those eight, not one was to do with the Minister whom she is closest to, which tells its own story. If the Government and OFMDFM are going to be criticised about the appointment of a Commissioner for Victims, it is important that the appointment process should not be dragged into a debate in the House against a background of Members having gone public and having named people in the press who are not even shortlisted for interview. That brings the entire process into disrepute. When Members do that, they cast a slur on the credibility of the Assembly, and the process, and they should bear that in mind. It is little wonder that there was not enough confidence to put that matter up for debate. Mrs Kelly raised two other points, one of which was PPS 14, on which a remedy hearing will take place in court.

The Assembly cannot legislate where a remedy hearing is ongoing. The Member said other things that were critical of the Government, and one was the appointment of special advisers. Again, that is a matter for Westminster, our national Parliament, and not a matter for here.

The slur cast on the Assembly has been amplified by the conduct of some Members who turn up and debate in the way that they do. I am glad that the Member for Strangford Mr McNarry is here. His revolving-door antics last week, when he had so many walk-ins and walk-outs, brought this place into disrepute, not the actual content of the debate. It is rather strange to be told that there is a slur on the House and a slur on the Executive when Members behave in that way.

Mr McNarry: Will the Member give way?

Mr Paisley Jnr: I have given way to the Member once. He has had his chance. We accept — [Interruption.]

Mr McNarry: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. Was the issue that the junior Minister has just referred to not dealt with adequately and responsibly by the Speaker this morning, and should the junior Minister not accept the ruling of the Speaker of the House?

Mr Paisley Jnr: I do not believe that I have questioned the ruling of the very wise Speaker of the House.

We accept that a balance must be struck between taking time to dot every i and cross every t on each individual Bill on the one hand and, on the other hand, giving Members a reasonably accurate forecast of what lies ahead during the current session. It is with that in mind that the First Minister and deputy First Minister are bringing to the Executive this Thursday a draft legislative programme for the Executive's agreement. As Members will appreciate — [Interruption.]

Do not worry — I will answer that in a minute.

As Members will appreciate, it would not be appropriate for me at this stage — [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. This is supposed to be a serious debate.

Mr Paisley Jnr: It would not be appropriate for me, at this stage, to discuss the potential content of that programme. When agreement is obtained, the legislative programme of the Executive for 2007-08 will be announced to the Assembly as soon as practicable thereafter.

Some criticism has been levelled at the Executive, and people wondered what the House would have done had it not been for private Members' business. Knowing what is coming, Members should be very careful about what they ask for. They might find that there are extra days and extra sessions on legislation in the House. I am sure that the same Members who are critical of the Executive today will be the first Members to criticise the Executive for overworking them. However, we will wait for that in the weeks ahead.

The programme will, undoubtedly, provide the Assembly and its Committees with much to consider and debate over the coming year, as they scrutinise the intentions of each Department. In doing so, I am sure that the Assembly will share and sustain the aim of the Executive by introducing good legislation that is relevant and will make a real and positive difference to every citizen in Northern Ireland.

Rev Dr Robert Coulter: This has been one of the best debates that it has been my pleasure to listen to, not only for the comedy and the repartee from across the House, but for the depth of understanding of what we are trying to get at in the debate.

Mr Kennedy set the tone when he said that the balance of business was the problem. While it is easy in a debate like this to forget the real thrust of the debate, it is the balance of business in a House such as this that is the important factor. When one looks at some of the impressions that are expressed by the public outside concerning the House — and I take as an example an email on the television on Sunday evening that said that the Assembly is a joke — it is time that we, as Members, began to look at the reason why someone, in their wisdom or otherwise, would say that the Assembly is a joke.

5.15 pm

The balance of business is important not only for the work of the House but for the respectability of the House.

One must consider the figures. Mr O'Dowd has poured scorn upon them, but figures are history — they are there. The figures are true, and show that non-Executive business, including private Members' business, currently accounts for about two thirds of what the Assembly does. Considering that Members now constitute the Government, is that balance of business right?

I was intrigued by the logic in some of the speeches — and more intrigued by the lack of it in others. Sammy Wilson said that there have been no concrete proposals. Obviously, he was not listening to the suggestion that one way forward would be for past legislation to be revised by Committees. After congratulating Mr Kennedy, he said that, in life, it is better not to interfere. If that is the case, why have this place at all? Members would agree with Mr Wilson that quick legislation is not good; however, he went on to contradict himself by saying that there is a need for legislation.

Francie Molloy wanted to hear the arguments, and said that it is important for the Assembly to move legislation forward. That is exactly what the UUP is asking for — we must move the legislation forward.

Dolores Kelly said that the debate was long overdue, and gave examples of legislation that must be advanced. She wanted to know what differences between the major parties are holding up legislation.

Trevor Lunn said that he might have expected an avalanche of legislation, but saw only legislative paralysis.

In his attack on the Ulster Unionist Party, Jimmy Spratt said that he does not believe that there is a crisis of confidence — even though people take the time to say on television that the Assembly is a joke.

John O'Dowd bombarded Members with statistics, but, as I have said, those figures are history. Is Sinn Féin depending on other parties to bring legislation forward? He did not tell Members what legislation Sinn Féin wants to promote.

Jim Shannon said that too much law is hurried through and that mistakes are made. That is true; however, he went on to say that we must get the legislation on the table. That is what the UUP wants.

Ken Robinson outlined the problem as the UUP sees it. He said that the Assembly should begin the proper work of Government.

Alex Attwood highlighted the Sinn Féin and DUP approaches and that they said that they needed six weeks in order to hit the ground running. We are still waiting to get the race started.

I thank the junior Minister for his summing up, which was much better than I could have managed, and I am glad that draft legislation is forthcoming. He told Members that it would be before us in a matter of days.

I am reminded of another piece of wisdom from the Good Book:

“Before they call, I will answer.”

The UUP calls for an improved balance of business in the House and for responsibility in legislation. I support the motion.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly calls on the Executive Committee to produce, before the Hallowe'en recess, an Executive legislative programme detailing executive business for the current Assembly session.

Adjourned at 5.20 pm.

NORTHERN IRELAND ASSEMBLY

Tuesday 16 October 2007

The Assembly met at 10.30 am (Mr Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT

Outcome of the Proposed Irish-Language Legislation Consultation Process

Mr Speaker: I have received notice from the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure that he wishes to make a statement regarding the outcome of the consultation process for the proposed Irish language legislation.

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure (Mr Poets): I have placed in the Assembly Library copies of a report summarising the responses received during the consultation of March to June 2007 on the proposed Irish language legislation. The main focus of that second consultation was to ascertain public opinion on a possible legislative framework for Irish language legislation.

The draft framework proposed the creation of a duty on public authorities to prepare a language scheme specifying the measures that they would take on the use of the Irish language in the provision of their services. The establishment of a new oversight body — an Irish language commissioner — was also proposed. The commissioner would have the function of approving and overseeing language schemes.

In addition, it was proposed that a person would be able to use Irish in legal proceedings in courts and tribunals sitting in Northern Ireland, subject to the provision of notice and the interests of justice. Finally, a draft provision was also included enabling certain statutory forms to be made available in Irish.

A total of 11,000 written responses were received, as well as petitions containing 629 names. Of the total number of respondents, 7,500 — 65% — indicated support for some form of legislation.

Over 4,000 — 35% — of all respondents were against any form of legislation. Approximately 80% of responses were submitted in the form of a pro forma, drafted by individuals or organisations to assist themselves and others.

I thank all the individuals and the 168 organisations who responded to the consultation. The sheer number of responses confirms the strong and divergent views on this issue in the community. It is my intention to publish all the responses on the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure website by the end of the calendar year, in line with departmental accessibility guidelines.

Among those in favour of the legislation, there was a divergence of views as to the form that it should take, with the majority advocating a rights-based approach. Those who opposed the legislation raised several concerns, including the significant resource consequences of implementing legislation, its potentially divisive repercussions and concerns that the proposed legislation was a political concession in the context of the discussions at St Andrews.

With regard to costs, in 2006-07, Northern Ireland Civil Service (NICS) Departments and the Northern Ireland Office (NIO) incurred expenditure of £20·62 million on a range of Irish-language projects and translations. That figure includes £10·3 million from the Department of Education for Irish-medium education. It does not include expenditure incurred by the Northern Ireland Court Service or by local councils on Irish translations and linguistic-diversity projects, nor does it include resources — that is, salaries and running costs — deployed by the various Departments in arranging the commitments associated with the £20·62 million annual expenditure.

Members will appreciate that it is difficult to estimate the cost and resource issues that could arise from Irish language legislation. For example, a rights-based framework would likely have greater costs than a language-scheme framework. Equally, it is difficult to estimate the cost and resource requirements of a language-scheme framework without clarity on the content and extent of a typical language scheme.

Officials in my Department undertook a high-level exercise to estimate the cost of implementing a language-scheme framework, which was the indicative legislative framework set out in the consultation document of 13 March 2007. For the purposes of that exercise, the estimates were based on the assumption that the legislation would be applied across all Departments and the NIO in the financial year 2008-09, and drew, where possible, upon estimates based on experiences in Wales and in the Republic of Ireland.

For example, if Northern Ireland were to have an Irish-language commissioner's office similar to that in the Republic of Ireland, the annual running costs would be approximately £500,000. The translation service for the Houses of the Oireachtas costs approximately £600,000 per annum, compared to £1·28 million in the National Assembly for Wales. It is estimated that almost £200,000 per annum would be required to provide simultaneous translation in Irish for the Court Service, and a similar amount for tribunals.

In respect of the 11 Departments and the NIO, it is estimated that, in 2008-09, if each were to deploy two dedicated staff members, each fluent in Irish, to develop Irish-language schemes, monitor their implementation, give advice and arrange translations, the annual cost would be approximately £927,000. The printing and design of forms to facilitate Irish-language schemes in the 11 Departments could cost approximately £309,000, and advertising costs could be in the region of £931,000, based on a 20% uplift to take account of the increased advertising costs for Irish.

It is important to stress that those broad estimates concern mainly the 11 Departments. Those Departments employ 22,973 civil servants, as opposed to the wider public sector, which employs 111,128 in local government, health trusts, education and library boards, and various NDPBs.

If estimates of the cost of implementing a language-scheme approach in the 11 Departments were to be extrapolated across the wider public sector, and if, for example, the agreed language schemes required public bodies to provide bilingual services, the costs would clearly be significant.

Members will be aware of current pressures on public expenditure in Northern Ireland. In light of that, it is highly debatable whether our community is prepared to contemplate the level of expenditure that would be required to introduce even a modest form of Irish-language legislation at this time. There will always be competing priorities for public expenditure; however, can the additional potential cost be justified in comparison with the investment that is needed for infrastructure, health, and other vital public services?

Furthermore, bearing in mind that approximately £20.62 million per annum is currently spent on Irish-language projects and translations, I doubt whether the legislative route will be necessarily the most cost-effective way of achieving the aims of enhancing and protecting the development of the Irish language.

My purpose in publishing the summary of responses to the 13 March consultation paper by way of this statement is to afford Members an opportunity to offer some initial views on the matter. I intend to fully engage with the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure before bringing the matter to the Executive.

Having reviewed the responses to both consultation processes, and having reflected carefully on all the relevant issues, I remain unpersuaded that there is a compelling case for introducing Irish-language legislation at this time.

My first reason for making that decision is that, in view of the political sensitivities on linguistic and cultural policy issues, it is clear that the proposal to introduce an Irish language Bill is divisive in our community. The proposal has given rise to highly politicised claims and counterclaims. As a community, we are faced with the challenge of finding new ways of managing our rich cultural diversity. Indeed, that challenge is enshrined in the duty that was placed on the Executive by the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006 to:

“adopt a strategy setting out how it proposes to enhance and protect the development of the Irish language” and to:

“adopt a strategy setting out how it proposes to enhance and develop the Ulster Scots language, heritage and culture”.

The UK Government signed the European Treaty for Regional or Minority Languages on 2 March 2000. The resulting charter was ratified on 27 March 2001 and came into force on 1 July 2001. That is an international convention that was designed to protect and promote regional and minority languages. In Northern Ireland, it applies to Irish and to Ulster Scots. The committee of experts that is examining the implementation of the charter in the UK has recommended the development of a comprehensive policy for the Irish language.

It is my assessment that the proposal to introduce Irish-language legislation at this time is unlikely to command the necessary support in the Assembly on the grounds of being incapable of securing sufficient consensus.

If we reflect on the introduction of language legislation in Wales, the Republic of Ireland and Scotland, experience there clearly shows that giving legislative effect to linguistic policies needs to occur in a depoliticised manner that is capable of commanding broadly based community support. The two consultation processes that have taken place on the proposal to introduce Irish-language legislation, and the ensuing public commentary, clearly demonstrate the lack of community consensus on the issue.

10.45 am

Furthermore, given the sensitivities involved, if the development of the Irish language is to be enhanced and protected, it would be counterproductive to go down the legislative route. The proposed legislation is unlikely to command sufficient consensus in the community at this time, so, if it were to be advanced, it could damage good relations, increase polarisation and entrench suspicions and patterns of antipathy. That could seriously undermine the efforts of those in the Irish-speaking community who genuinely want to see the language developed in a depoliticised and wholly inclusive manner.

Based on a high-level cost estimate, the introduction of even a modest language-scheme legislative model would have significant resource implications. Mindful of the constraints on public expenditure, and, in particular, the pressures in my Department alone, I cannot reconcile the likely opportunity costs of introducing legislation and other spending priorities.

If our aim is to achieve the tangible outcomes of enhancing and protecting the development of the Irish language and facilitating those who wish to use Irish in their dealings with the public sector, I consider the legislative route to be a disproportionately costly method of achieving positive outcomes. The legislative requirement placed on the Executive to adopt a strategy to enhance and protect the development of the Irish language offers a more cost-effective and proportionate alternative.

I have carefully considered the proposal in annex B to the St Andrews Agreement to “introduce an Irish Language Act” and the consultation processes on which the previous Administration embarked. I fully acknowledge that there are those in the Northern Ireland community who have a close affinity with the Irish language and have legitimate aspirations to secure its official recognition and protection.

The enhancement and protection of the development of the Irish language is an important matter for Northern Ireland, as is the enhancement and protection of the Ulster-Scots language, heritage and culture. However, I remain unpersuaded that a compelling case for progressing legislation exists at this time. There is insufficient community consensus, and there are potentially significant costs. Moreover, there is a real possibility that legislation could undermine good relations. In so doing, it could prove counterproductive to those who wish to see the language developed in a non-politicised and inclusive manner.

In publishing the report that summarises the responses received to the consultation exercise that ran from March until June 2007, and in outlining in my statement my current assessment of the proposal to introduce an Irish language Bill, I trust that I can assist the Assembly’s deliberations. I will be most interested to hear Members’ views. I am scheduled to discuss the matter with the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure later this month, after which I will prepare a paper for discussion by the Executive.

Mr Speaker: Before the Minister takes questions, I remind Members that they are to ask questions, not make further statements. I shall allow Chairpersons of Committees some latitude.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure (Mr McElduff): Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Ar maidin tá faill déanta sa Ghaeilge sa Tionól seo. Drochscéal ar fad atá i gceist agus drochshíniú ón Aire. Agus is mór an trua sin.

The Minister will know, a Chathaoirligh, that, both on Friday afternoon and yesterday, in my capacity as Chairperson — Cathaoirleach — of the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure, I attempted, through my Committee staff, to contact the Minister by telephone and email on more than 10 occasions. I wanted to secure a meeting with him so that he might respond to developing speculation in the media about the content of this morning’s statement.

I will not go on at length, but, suffice it to say, the Minister demonstrated neither confidence nor courtesy, effectively giving the Cathaoirligh of the Committee the runaround. I was told he might be available to meet me in the afternoon but, of course, that meeting never came to be. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order, Members.

Mr McElduff: Speaking in a personal capacity, I wish to say that this morning’s announcement constitutes a mistake. It is a retrograde step that sends out a negative signal to the growing Irish-language community in the North of Ireland.

The Minister is missing a major opportunity to prove that he is capable of being, and willing to be, a Minister for all the people. I am suspicious of the Minister’s view that:

“it is highly debatable whether our community is prepared to contemplate the level of expenditure that would be required to introduce even a modest form of Irish-language legislation at this time.”

Is the Minister placing the Irish-language community in the North of Ireland outside of his community? Is his definition of “community” exclusive of the Irish-speaking community in the North of Ireland? If it is, it strikes me that the term “Minister of Culture” is an oxymoron when it is applied to the post’s incumbent.

One consultation was not enough. When the Minister did not like the outcome of the first one, he decided to carry out a second. Is it the case that the total percentage of responses, over the two consultations, in favour of Acht na Gaeilge — an Irish language Act — was 75%?

Does the Minister agree that, as with the Welsh example, the best way in which to depoliticise the Irish language is to place such rights at the heart of legislation? Is iad sin mo cheisteanna, a Cheann Comhairle.

Mr Poots: The Member spoke of placing the Irish language at the heart of people’s rights. Individuals have rights in this country. The first such right is the right to life, and, thereafter, there are a series of other rights. I am not denying anyone the right to speak in the Irish language. We do not necessarily need Irish-language legislation to enable the Irish language to flourish. For example, there is Irish-language legislation in the Republic of Ireland, yet use of the Irish language is diminishing there. In Northern Ireland, we do not currently have an Irish language Bill, yet it has been told to me by a number of sources that use of the Irish language is growing here.

Introducing a Bill will not, of itself, necessarily encourage or increase the use of the Irish language. Members must reflect on that and take a considered view of the situation when deciding how they want to take the issue forward genuinely.

When I refer to the community, I refer to the entire community. I am referring not to Irish-language speakers, Ulster-Scots speakers, unionists or nationalists, but to the whole community. Irish-language speakers are part of that community. There are those in the Irish-speaking community who are very keen to see the issue progressed in a way that is not politicised.

I have had the privilege of meeting people who are involved in the Scottish Gaelic-speaking community. The difference between the situation in Scotland and that in Northern Ireland is that, in Scotland, language is not a political matter. Language does not necessarily represent a barrier there. Members opposite, in particular, but also people outside of the Chamber, must reflect on that fact and determine how they can take the matter forward in a non-political way.

Mr McCausland: I thank the Minister for his statement, which clearly demonstrates that an Irish language Act would be divisive and extremely expensive. Does the Minister agree that the European Charter for Regional or Minority Languages, to which the United Kingdom Government are committed, provides a good framework for advancing both minority languages in Northern Ireland?

Will the Minister, in considering the matter further, take account of the situation in Wales, where there is growing concern, particularly in the business community, at the cost of implementing the provisions that some activists are demanding?

Mr Poots: The European Charter for Regional or Minority Languages is a European directive, so we must abide by it, even if we do not wish to. Indeed, through our actions, we are more than abiding by it. We do not need to introduce legislation to work within its framework.

Therefore, the European Charter for Regional or Minority Languages is the context in which we must work and the means through which we can identify how to make progress.

Mr McCausland talked about the costs of language schemes in Wales, where such legislation has been enacted. The costs that I identified were at the lower end of the scale and were for a language-based rather than a rights-based scheme, which would be considerably more expensive than a language-based scheme.

Mr McNarry: It is regrettable that the Chairperson of the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure did not consult with the Deputy Chairperson about his concerns, either last Friday or yesterday.

I welcome the Minister's statement. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order. The Member has the Floor.

Mr McNarry: Clearly, the fact that last week's Ulster Unionist's motion on the Irish language was defeated has demonstrated that the House was both deeply divided and reflective of public opinion. Will the Minister confirm the Assembly's authority on the matter by asserting that the powers to introduce an Irish language Act will not be transferred to Westminster, allowing it to be imposed on us? That would be counter-productive to local democracy and would further undermine the good relations that he and I know must be made in this matter.

Mr Poots: This is a devolved matter. If Westminster wished to take back devolved matters, under the Sewel guidelines, this House would have to vote in favour of Westminster's making such a decision.

Members may wish to look to other places, but I say that they should look to this House to ascertain how we can make progress on this and other contentious issues. It will be a test of the Assembly — and of the willingness of Members — as to how we can work with one another for the benefit of the wider community in the months ahead.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh míle maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Leis an fhírinne a dhéanamh, a Cheann Comhairle, níl mórán iontais orm ins an mhéid a chuala mé anseo ar maidin mar bhí an fógra déanta cheana féin an tseachtain seo caite ag an tUas McNarry anseo ar leathanach tosaigh den 'News Letter', só ceapaim go bhfuil poll áit éigin i long na Ranna Cultúir, Ealaíon agus Fóillíochta, agus b'fhéidir gur chóir don Aire paiste a chur ar an pholl sin.

Mr Speaker: Order. Let us have the question.

Mr D Bradley: To translate, I was just saying that I was not really surprised by what I have heard in the Chamber this morning, given that Mr McNarry made the announcement last week on the front page of the 'News Letter'. It looks very much as though there is a hole — [Interruption.]

Mr McNarry: I will give you a copy, and that will keep you abreast of things.

Mr D Bradley: Thank you.

Mr Speaker: Order.

A Member: What is the question?

Mr D Bradley: There is a hole in the good ship CAL, and perhaps the Minister should seek to fix the leak in the future. The Minister seems to understand the cost of everything and the value of nothing. He uses the financial issue to cover up the fact that he has given in to pressures — [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order. I ask the Member to take his seat. I have continually tried to give Members some latitude. I said repeatedly at the start of the debate that statements should not be made to the Minister; we should have questions.

Mr D Bradley: My question is that, given that the Minister has abdicated his duty to implement the promises made by the two Governments in the St Andrews Agreement:

“to introduce an Irish Language Act reflecting on the experience of Wales and Ireland”, will he now advise the British Government of that abdication and ask that the matter be dealt with at Westminster? Go raibh míle maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

Mr Poots: I have no responsibility over decisions that the Governments of the Republic of Ireland and the UK make. I make that completely clear.

This House is its own master, and this House will make the decision. For years, some Members on the opposite Benches were shouting “Brits out”, but now they want the Brits in to make this decision. I can assure the House — [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order. The Minister has the Floor.

11.00 am

Mr Poots: I can assure the House that at no time during any talks was the DUP consulted on an Irish language Bill or legislation. If the Member cares to read the Northern Ireland (St Andrews Agreement) Act 2006, he will find that there is no reference to proposals for Irish language legislation.

Dr Farry: The Alliance Party saw some potential in an Irish-language scheme as a means of trying to find common ground, albeit with a very light touch. What efforts did the Minister make to try to find common ground in the polarised debate between those, on the one hand, who want a rights-based approach and those, on the other hand, who want no legislation whatsoever?

With respect to costs, what consideration was given to pooling resources in a central Government unit, rather than duplicating translation services across all 11 Departments and the rest of the Northern Ireland Civil Service? Given that the Minister is now withdrawing proposals for an Irish language Act, is he prepared to come back to the Assembly with plans for a comprehensive language Act that will address not only the cultural demands of speakers of Irish and Ulster Scots but the real needs of those people who speak non-indigenous languages in Northern Ireland and who find it difficult to access services?

Mr Poots: Consultation has not finished on this issue. If the Member had listened to what I said, he would know that I am going back to the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure and the Executive Committee. The Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure is a microcosm of the House, and I can think of no better place to find common ground. If that Committee can identify an agreed way to proceed, I, as Minister, will be happy to work with it. I look forward to the Committee’s proposals and discussions, under Mr McElduff’s chairmanship, after which we can consider how to progress the issue in the way that the Member outlined.

Mr Shannon: I welcome the Minister’s report on the Irish language Act. It is good that we are discussing the matter, which is one of the biggest issues in my constituency of Strangford, from where the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure received 600 responses to its consultation. The issue gets people’s hackles up, and the costs are horrendous.

The Minister mentioned costs. Can he confirm that the Northern Ireland Office costs are £20 million? He also mentioned £500,000 for the language commissioner’s office, and that it would be £1.2 million if compared to the National Assembly for Wales. For the 11 Departments, he mentioned:

“annual costs ... £927,000 ... printing and design ... £309,000, and advertising costs ... of £931,000”.

It sounds a lot like that Abba song:

“Money, money, money ...
It’s a rich man’s world.”

In this case, it is Sinn Féin’s world, but it is not in the mind, or in the world, of ordinary people. How much, per annum, will it cost the Civil Service and other public bodies if an Irish language Act is imposed?

Mr Poots: In 2006-07, all Departments and the NIO incurred costs of some £117,000 on Irish translations; the overall costs for translations were over £1 million. All Departments and the NIO spent £3,484,000 on linguistic diversity projects. The Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure spent over £3 million on the Irish-language broadcasting fund and £3,556,000 on Foras na Gaeilge. The Department of Education spent £10,303,000 on Irish-medium education, and the Department for Employment and Learning spent £100,000. If Members suggest that the Government are not committed to Irish-language funding, those figures show that that is not the case.

As regards additional commitments for Irish-language translation, we would be looking for an anticipated £1 million over the next 10 years. For Foras na Gaeilge, we would be looking for almost £12 million over the next 10 years. For the Irish-language commissioner's office, we would be looking for £7,600,000 over the next 10 years. For the translation service, based on what is happening in Wales, we would be looking for a further £16,916,000. For the Court Service, we would be looking for £2,117,000. For tribunals, we would be looking for £2,117,000. For printing and design, we would be looking for £3,385,000. For advertising and publicity, we would be looking for £10,193,000, and for an Irish language branch, we would be looking for £10,150,000.

Totting all that up — and this is for the language scheme route, rather than the rights-based route — we would be looking at costs over the next 10 years of £291,538,000 for the Northern Ireland Civil Service and Northern Ireland Office alone. They account for 22,000-odd civil servants. If it were extrapolated out to local government, NDPBs and other functions of government, there would be 111,000 people, so the figures could be increased fivefold if we were to go down that route. That is the extent of what is being asked of me. When Members ask me to consider doing this, I have to look at the costs and the value of it. At the same time, there are other pressing and vital issues being raised by Members on a weekly basis on the Floor of this House.

Mr Adams: Go raibh míle maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle, agus tá mé buíoch díot agus tá mé buíoch den Aire, ach caithfidh mé a rá fosta níl iontas ar bith ormsa. Tá cúpla ceist agamsa. An bhfuil eagla ar an Aire roimh an teanga? Is leis an Aire an teanga. Is le achan duine an teanga seo agus bealach amháin nó bealach eile beidh Acht na Gaeilge ann.

I have just a few questions for the Minister, a Cheann Comhairle. Does he agree that it costs the same to provide English-language services as it does to provide Irish-language services? Does he agree — and perhaps he will reflect on this — that he did a disservice to two languages this morning? He did a disservice to the English language, in the perverted way in which he tried to put forward spurious reasons for his judgement this morning, and to the Irish language. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order, Members. Order.

Mr Adams: Does the Minister accept that the way to depoliticise Irish-language rights is to make them an administrative matter? Will he take the opportunity to spell out to us how he intends to deliver on the commitments that he and his party made in relation to the Irish language in the St Andrews Agreement? Will he accept, finally, that, one way or another, there will be an Irish language Act?

Mr Poots: As regards equivalence of costs, translation comes at a price, and I have identified that price very clearly. I have identified the lower level of costs that would be accrued, as opposed to the higher level of costs.

In education, I understand that there are around 4,000 children in the Irish-medium sector. The costs there are clearly higher than those in the mainstream, and if the educationalists in the Chamber want to look at that matter, they will see that it costs more money to educate children in the Irish-medium sector than in the mainstream. That is a choice for another Minister to make, but she has to make that choice within the budget that is applied to her. That should be reflected upon when we come to making budgetary decisions. I understand that the Department of Education needs substantially more money than it currently has in order to deliver many of its key priorities.

Certain Members opposite could greatly assist in depoliticising the use of the Irish language. When they speak in broken Irish in the House, it does nothing to encourage the wider community. Rather, it persuades people to resist the Irish language. It does not benefit Irish-language activists who genuinely want to make progress in a depoliticised way. I have spoken to people in the Irish-speaking community who have made it clear that they wish that the language issue were not politicised, because it should be a purely cultural one.

Members across the Chamber must reflect on that point, because the more that they politicise the issue and try to ram it down people's throats, the less likely it becomes that individuals will be encouraged to think that the Irish language should be developed and preserved on the basis that it is important culturally. The approach that has been taken by the leader of the party opposite has been most unhelpful, particularly in the House.

Lord Browne: I congratulate the Minister on the way in which he has conducted business on the subject. Given the legislative restrictions contained in The Budget (Northern Ireland) Order 2007 that determine what can be taken from the Consolidated Fund, as well as our limited ability to raise further moneys, will the Minister clarify whether the introduction of an Irish language Bill would have a detrimental effect on spending on arts and sport?

Mr Poots: Were an Irish language Bill to be introduced, my Department would have to bid for substantially greater funds. If we did not receive those extra funds, that would have a detrimental impact on the arts, sport, and everything else for which the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure has responsibility. If we were successful in bidding for that extra funding, it would have a detrimental impact on other Departments, as that money would have to come out of their budgets.

The European Charter for Regional or Minority Languages identifies terms of value for protecting and enhancing languages. The suggestion by some Members this morning has been that Irish-language legislation is the best way in which to achieve that. I am open to listening to a convincing argument, but none has yet been made. However, I look forward to hearing the Committee make its case, and to agreeing a way forward.

Mr K Robinson: I am sure that members of the public who are watching and listening to the debate will have been horrified to learn of the sums of money that are already being expended on the Irish language. It may have come as a surprise to Members, too.

Doubtless, patients who are lying on a hospital trolley would be mightily comforted to look up and see a sign in Irish that told them that they were lying in a hospital corridor. I am sure that the parent of a child with literacy problems, who attends a school in one of the working-class districts about which the Minister of Education tells the House that she is concerned, would want to see a reading-recovery teacher in that school rather than an Irish-language sign at the end of the school's street.

At one stage, on hearing the sums of money that the Minister cited, I thought that we were to get two stadia.

Mr Speaker: I ask the Member to come to his question.

Mr K Robinson: I am coming to the question, Mr Speaker. Does the Minister agree that Sinn Féin has succeeded in scoring a spectacular own goal, and that its strident approach has scuppered what might have been accepted had it been genuinely presented as one form of cultural diversity in our community?

Mr Poots: I will allow Members to make their own judgements on what Sinn Féin has done. I am prepared to continue to speak with people in the Irish-language community, and to others, to identify a way in which to ensure progress in Northern Ireland.

11.15 am

What members of other parties do is up to them. However, I did indicate in my response to Mr Adams that, very often, people do not help themselves.

Mr P Ramsey: Will the Minister agree that deep anxiety, concern and frustration will be felt by Irish-language groups across Northern Ireland as a result of his statement?

Bearing in mind the Minister's comment that the two consultation processes to date led him to believe that an Irish language Act would not command community consensus, does he agree that there is deep worry and suspicion that the second consultation process was contrived to enable troops to gather momentum in opposition to the first consultation process? Why was the second consultation process necessary, when the first one commanded 93% support for an Irish language Act?

The Minister gave a commitment that he would make himself available to the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure on any Thursday. Why, then, did he not feel that it was appropriate, good manners and respectful to bring his statement to the Committee for discussion? The Minister talked about securing consensus from the Committee — failing to discuss this issue with the Committee is not a good way of doing that.

Given that legislation exists to support the Welsh language in Wales and Scottish Gaelic in Scotland, and given Northern Ireland's current constitutional status as part of the UK, why does the Minister not consider that an exception should be made in Northern Ireland for the Irish language?

Mr Poots: The Irish-language community has lost nothing today. The money that was on the table is still on the table. I have not taken away the level of expenditure on the Irish language that currently exists. Let not the message go out that I have decided, in a sectarian or bigoted way, to move against the Irish-language community.

I have reflected on a consultation process that indicated that clear divisions on this issue exist in the community. A previous contributor indicated that I introduced the second consultation process because I did not like the results of the first one. That is absolute rubbish. I inherited a situation in which the second consultation process was under way. In fact, I was under pressure from people outside of this House, such as Jim Allister, to stop the second consultation process. He must have been satisfied by the outcome of the first consultation process because he did not want the second one to proceed.

It is clearly evident that the second consultation process, in conjunction with the first one, identified clear community division on this issue. When there is clear community division, it is unlikely that there will be consensus in this House.

As for working with the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure, I am scheduled to attend the Committee meeting on 25 October 2007 to discuss this matter in detail. The figures have been drawn together, and the analysis has been completed. The normal protocol for a Minister is to bring those matters to the House, which encapsulates everyone who was elected to the Northern Ireland Assembly. I am happy to go into this issue in much greater detail with the Committee, and to discuss it with the Committee to ascertain the best way forward. I look forward to illumination from that body.

Mr Brolly: Go raibh maith agat. The Minister must be aware of the message that he is sending out, not only specifically to Irish-language organisations, but to all organisations in the North who are involved in cultural matters. Most Gaelic cultural bodies and sporting bodies are committed by their constitutions to the promotion of the Irish language. That includes the GAA and Comhaltas Ceoltóirí Éireann — the Dublin-based organisation that looks after traditional Irish music and other cultural matters, and which will be appearing in the Long Gallery tomorrow night or the night after that.

So there is a huge community outside those specifically Irish-language organisations that will take great offence at the statement, and the Minister will certainly hear from them. If I could make another point before I ask the question —

Mr Speaker: I ask the Member to put his question.

Mr Brolly: I will. The Minister is being a bit disingenuous regarding costs, particularly with respect to Irish-medium education. As Mr Adams said, youngsters will be educated in any event. The Minister should have given figures for the difference in costs between Irish-medium and English-medium education. Is the Minister fully aware of the impact that his decision will have beyond Irish-language groups?

Mr Poots: I am not sure that I am fully aware of the impact that my decision will have. However, I am fully aware that any decision I make will have a tremendous impact on the wider community. For example, while more than £20 million is being spent on the Irish language, when I took office, my Department was spending zero — no pounds — on sign language, which benefits people who cannot speak, who have only that language, and can choose to speak no other language.

On 6 October, I was in Dungeness, which is in the Member's constituency, and I had a tremendous evening with the Hands That Talk group. My sympathies are clearly with those who have to communicate in a language that is exclusive to them and who are unable to communicate in any other language. Taking £20 million from the Budget and pouring it into Irish-language schemes would have an impact across the community. Whatever my decision, there will be an impact, and I must consider these issues in the round.

The matter is still open for discussion in Committee. I have identified the costs, the results of the consultation process and the difficulties. If Members can demonstrate to me that those difficulties are surmountable, I am open to hear what they say.

Lord Morrow: I congratulate the Minister on his positive statement, which will send out a clear message. No-one would understand why he should commit to expenditure of £291 million over the next 10 years on the Irish language. That language is in its current position because of the attitude of the folk opposite who have sought at every turn to politicise it.

Will the Minister assure Members that he will not bend to political pressure such as that which comes from the other side of the House? The Members opposite may have got an assurance at St Andrews, but they must go and talk to those who gave them that assurance.

They got no assurance from this side of the House, and they had better face up to the fact that their dream is falling apart at their feet.

Will the Minister assure the House that the money saved will be spent effectively and in a way in which the whole community can benefit? I am thinking of soccer, rugby and activities in which both sections of the community already participate.

Mr Poots: I find pressure readily absorbable. People can apply pressure if they wish.

As regards spending, I cannot spend this money in any other way because I do not have it in the first place. I do not think that the Government has that money because during the comprehensive spending review, and at the Executive Committee meeting last Monday, every Minister was outlining how more money is needed for his or her Department.

Perhaps the Ministers of the parties opposite would identify which part of their Budgets they would like to see cut so that this scheme could be implemented. If they could demonstrate that, Members on this side of the House might be able to take some of their cries more seriously.

Ms J McCann: The Minister quoted many figures in his statement. Does he accept and acknowledge that the £10.3 million of Department of Education money that he mentioned is, in fact, ordinary education costs and not additional costs, and that that money would be spent on children's education anyway, regardless of the language in which those children are taught?

Mr Poots: I accept that an element of those costs represents ordinary education costs, but certainly not all of it. If I wanted to open a school for 12 children in my area, I would be told to go away. However, if someone wants to open an Irish-language school for 12 children, it seems that that can be achieved. The reason that that situation is most aggravating lies in examples such as the one in my constituency, where four schools that were to amalgamate, with more than 100 pupils among them, were all closed, yet a few weeks or months later, new schools are being opened with as few as 12 pupils on the enrolment list. Obviously, double standards are being applied.

If a child happens to be taught in the controlled sector, that child will be discriminated against. Children in that sector have less funding per child than children who are taught in the Irish-language sector or, indeed, in the integrated sector. It is clear that preferential treatment is being given to those who are taught in Irish-medium schools, over and above those who are taught in other education sectors.

Mr Easton: I welcome the Minister's statement. Does he agree that any Irish-language group or Irish-speaking person would not want cuts to front-line services, such as education and health, in order to pay for an Irish language Act? Does he further agree that the fact that only 75,000 people out of a population of 1.7 million can speak the Irish language means that that would have been a waste of taxpayers' money?

Mr Poots: I have laid down a challenge. I look forward to other Ministers stepping up to the table to indicate the reductions that they can make in their departmental spending in order to enable me to go ahead and produce the finance for that measure. I do not believe that people want a reduction in health services, infrastructure not being developed and promoted, or the economy taking second or third place. They want the country to progress. The Celtic tiger was not based on the Gaeltacht, but on the economy. Northern Ireland must identify with that by moving the economy forward and, therefore, by releasing more funding to develop education, health and the other areas that most require it.

Mr McGlone: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. De réir gach dealraimh is é an rud atá againne inniu ná leithscéal i ndiaidh leithscéil agus fáthanna nár chóir rud ar bith a dhéanamh mar mhaithe leis an teanga Gaeilge. The Assembly has been given excuse after excuse as reasons not to advance the Irish language. However, I seek some clarity from the Minister. In his speech, he referred to the European Charter that applies to Irish and Ulster Scots, and to the report of the Council of Europe committee of experts. Can he confirm whether he has now rejected that report?

Mr Poots: I can confirm that the answer is no.

Ms Anderson: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Bearing in mind that the Welsh language has been protected by the Welsh Language Act since 1967, Scottish Gaelic is now protected by legislation, and Irish is protected constitutionally in the rest of Ireland, does the Minister agree with Eamon Ó Cuív's assessment that the North is the missing piece of the jigsaw? Does the Minister care about the reaction or feelings of the Irish-speaking community? Does he care about the effect of his statement on the wider community?

11.30 am

Mr Poots: I have taken the wider community into consideration in looking at this situation. It is important that we consider the views of the wider community. As I have said, the Irish-language community has not lost anything today. There are those who have suggested that legislation was the best way forward on the matter. I have outlined the issues that surround that —
[Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order. The Minister has the Floor.

Mr Poots: I have outlined the financial issues that surround the proposal. I have also outlined issues relating to community support and the communities that are opposed to any legislation, and the difficulties therein. Looking at the issue for the wider community shows that there are very clear difficulties. If Members cannot see those difficulties, it is they who have a problem, not me.

As I said earlier, the Irish-speaking community appears to be growing in Northern Ireland, where we do not have an Irish language Act, and declining in the Republic of Ireland, where there is legislation. Therefore, there are people in the Irish-language community who will not be particularly dissatisfied if Irish-language legislation is not introduced. An Irish language Act would not necessarily help the language.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

Training and Employment Places

Mr Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to two hours — [Interruption.]

Lord Morrow: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. Is it not the convention in this House that, while you are on your feet, everyone else should be in their places? I see that some Members have not yet learned that rule.

Mr Speaker: I thank Lord Morrow for raising that point of order. [Interruption.]

Order. I ask Members to take their places.

The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to two hours for this debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes to propose and 10 minutes for the winding-up speech. All other Members who wish to speak will have five minutes. Two amendments to the motion have been received and are published on the Marshalled List. The proposer of each amendment will have 10 minutes to propose and five minutes for the winding-up speech.

Ms S Ramsey: I beg to move

That this Assembly expresses its concern at the dearth of training and employment places for disabled children and young people; and calls on the Minister for Employment and Learning to undertake an immediate review and produce an action plan to address this issue as a matter of urgency.

Go raibh maith agat. I welcome the opportunity to bring this issue before the Assembly and to put the focus on young people with special educational needs, disabilities or learning difficulties. I also welcome the Minister to the debate, and I welcome his personal commitment to dealing with the issue.

Young people with special educational needs are a group about which it is difficult to get accurate statistics. In 2005-06, there were 53,000 children and young people with special educational needs attending school. That number has more than doubled in the past 10 years. All indications are that that figure will continue to rise. The issue is particularly important because disabilities affect so many young people, who will face many hurdles in their lives and who need and deserve our support. I have a number of questions to ask the Minister during the debate. I would be grateful if he could ask his officials to respond in writing, if it is not possible for him to provide answers in the time that has been allocated to the debate.

In 2006, the Minister's Department, in conjunction with a number of other Departments, published a report on this issue. It recognised that there are real difficulties in ensuring that children and young people with statements of special educational needs can realise their full potential in school and achieve their goals, whether in training, education or work. Too many disabled young people still find themselves, having left school, without access to the kind of employment and training that can allow them to have fulfilling lives. For some disabled young people, the lack of appropriate training and places at day care centres means that they spend the majority of their time at home with nothing to do. Some develop associated mental-health problems.

Too many parents remain concerned that their children will not be able to access further education or training, or that the opportunities that are on offer will not allow them to develop their independence. On leaving school, many young people with learning difficulties or disabilities find that there is no clear path of transition to employment ahead of them. In fact, they often experience multiple layers of discrimination and disadvantage. That means that they have many barriers to overcome to achieve their potential and find suitable employment — barriers that those without disabilities or special needs would struggle to overcome.

Those young people find that there is a lack of full-time vocational training and employment options that lead to meaningful paid employment. In a recent Barnardo's survey of young disabled people, the following barriers were identified: lack of choice in post-school options; lack of accessible colleges; low expectations for young people with disabilities; fewer opportunities to gain recognised qualifications; lack of co-ordination among agencies that work with young people; lack of suitable equipment or adaptations to meet their needs; and a view that there was a policy of cost above need.

Many young people said that they felt that they were pushed into courses in which they had no interest. Administration courses were often cited as those that they were most likely to be offered, even if such courses did not suit their needs. Many young people then dropped out and some failed to find an alternative option. Some young people said that they were not permitted to select the college or course of their choice because the building was inaccessible or the necessary support was not available. Some who had a day care place rather than a training or employment place said that they felt neglected and ignored, with little sense of a hopeful future.

Research by the Joseph Rowntree Foundation shows that the scope and level of aspirations among disabled 16-year-olds are similar to the scope and level of aspirations among other 16-year-olds. However, by adulthood, a sharp change is evident, with only half of disabled young people reporting that they received the education, training place or job that they wanted.

The failure to provide access to the type of training, education and employment places that young disabled people need is also linked to poverty. At the age of 26, disabled people are more than four times as likely to be unemployed or involuntarily out of work than non-disabled people. They are likely to have lower levels of educational qualifications and are more likely to have not fulfilled the employment aspirations that they had set for themselves 10 years previously. However, the research clearly demonstrates that poverty of aspiration is not the main barrier for disabled young people, but the need for additional support, information and opportunities.

Many disabled young people have identified as a major problem the failure of training courses to provide industry-recognised qualifications, which means that they will have spent time on qualifications that have no currency in the real world. A number of reports commissioned by the Department for Employment and Learning have confirmed that that is a problem.

A report on educational provision for students with learning difficulties and disabilities found that improvements have been made since 2001, but that a number of problem areas still need to be addressed. Those areas include the need for colleges to review learning-support structures; the need to ensure that provision exists across curriculum areas; the need to provide broader access to accredited courses; and the need to initiate a process of effective whole-college staff development in special needs. Can the Minister advise the House how each of those recommendations has been taken forward, and what progress has been made?

That report further suggests that, although current further education links are satisfactory in the majority of cases, provision would benefit from a review of the value and outcomes of existing courses developed for that pupil population. Can the Minister advise the House on how that matter is being taken forward?

As well as further education colleges, a number of voluntary organisations, such as Mencap, the Cedar Foundation and Barnardo's, to name but a few, provide training and support for disabled young people. Such organisations provide training, employment and ongoing personal support. However, most of them are dependent on short-term — usually European — funding, and it is difficult to develop services when funding is constantly at risk. Those types of services can provide young people with the additional support and resources that make a real difference.

I ask the Minister to undertake a full review of all provision available in training and employment, further education and the voluntary sector, to assess its effectiveness and determine any other requirements, and to put in place an appropriately funded action plan that will provide young disabled people with the kind of quality choices and training support that will improve their lives.

Two amendments have been tabled, and I accept the Ulster Unionist amendment, for which I thank David McClarty and John McCallister. The SDLP amendment merely restates the Sinn Féin motion; it is an amendment for an amendment's sake. Go raibh maith agat.

Mr McClarty: I beg to move amendment No 1: Leave out all after "Assembly" and insert

"expresses its commitment to securing training and employment opportunities where appropriate for young people with disabilities; and calls on the Minister for Employment and Learning to review the provision of such training."

It has been well said that the true test of the value of a society is how much care it takes of its weakest and most vulnerable members. All of us in the Assembly have a responsibility to see that that duty is carried out. I congratulate the Chairperson of the Committee for Employment and Learning for tabling the motion, and I thank her for accepting my party's amendment. However, we are concerned that the motion has the potential to be too narrow in its focus.

It is important to remember that training and learning courses and further education college places may not always be the most appropriate choices for children and young people with disabilities. In dealing with the transition of young people with disabilities beyond school, it is necessary for other Departments and agencies to fulfil their responsibilities. Although I make that point, I also acknowledge that there is a significant need for governing bodies of further education institutions to provide sufficiently for the needs of students with a learning disability, where appropriate. That is important.

The results of the Northern Ireland survey of people with activity limitations and disabilities, which was conducted throughout 2006 and 2007, showed that among children, 6% were noted as being affected by a disability, there being a greater prevalence among boys in comparison with girls. Eight per cent of boys aged 15 years and under had a disability, compared with 4% of girls of the same age.

The latest Disability Rights Commission briefing, based on the UK-wide labour force survey of April to June 2007, shows that half of people with disabilities are in work, compared with four fifths of non-disabled people. As 9% of those aged between 16 and 24 years of age have a disability, such a figure can be seen to imply that a significant number of disabled young people are out of work. The chances of getting a job are also significantly reduced, as 25% of people with disabilities have achieved no qualifications, compared with 10% of non-disabled people.

A review of the provision of employment and training places by the Department for Employment and Learning would go a long way in addressing those facts and statistics that are of such concern. Since the motion refers to that Department, it is worthwhile pointing out some of the commendable measures that that Department is undertaking on those issues. In 2006-07, an additional £4.7 million has been made available in further education for the provision of extra auxiliary aids and services and special staff training. Almost £1 million has been allocated to special needs projects in further education in 2006-07. Furthermore, an inclusive learning project has been established throughout further education. Young people can now access mainstream further education with additional support; special provision is available if mainstream education is not suitable.

Personal development programmes such as Training for Success and Skills for Work are tailored for trainees with disabilities. The Department for Employment and Learning is in the process of establishing an expert group to ensure that the programmes meet, specifically, the needs of disabled young people

Those programmes take forward work, which 26 training organisations have been involved in for the past few years, to ensure that the provision meets the needs of disabled young people.

Finally, the Disablement Advisory Service (DAS) has a programme called Workable NI, which supports people with disabilities to work in a wide variety of jobs. There is a clear liaison and referral service between the Department's careers service and DAS. That is of great benefit to children and young people with disabilities and their families, and I commend the Department for that.

The motion calls on the Minister to produce an action plan to address the dearth of training and employment places for children and young people. I conclude by referring to an important document that has been published by the Department: 'Department for Employment and Learning: Disability Action Plan: 1 April 2007 - 31 March 2008'. The action plan outlines measures to:

- Promote positive attitudes towards disabled people; and
- Encourage participation by disabled people in public life".

Much of that is related to the realm of employment and learning. Therefore, it can be seen from the document that the Department is working hard to address the issue.

I accept that we have much more work to do on the matter, and I have every confidence that the Minister and his Department will deliver for those children and young people with disabilities who depend on, and can greatly benefit from, training and employment provision.

Mr Attwood: I beg to move amendment No 2:
Leave out all after 'concern' and insert

'at the inconsistency of transition support and the limited choices available to disabled young people moving towards training and employment; and at the lack of mainstream training and employment opportunities that meet the individual needs of all disabled young people leaving school; and calls on the Minister for Employment and Learning to develop a strategic plan, in consultation with disabled young people and their parents, for the commissioning of services jointly with other relevant Departments and for the delivery of effective support.'

I welcome the debate, and I acknowledge the assistance provided to us by the organisations in the disability sector. I ask Sue Ramsey to reconsider the SDLP's amendment because the people who assisted me to draft the amendment did not do so for the sake of it. I take what they said as the best advice and I urge the House to do likewise. They would like to offer some further direction to the Minister in those matters. Therefore, in addition to developing a strategic plan, which is common to the motion and the amendments, the plan should be developed in consultation with —

Ms S Ramsey: The Member will appreciate that Sinn Féin proposed the motion because of its concerns at the lack of training places for disabled children and young people. This morning, I was faced with two amendments and, in my view, the SDLP's amendment is no different from the motion. I take on board the arguments that have been made by the Ulster Unionist Party. If the organisations that Mr Attwood referred to had concerns about the Sinn Féin motion, he could have come to me to work out an arrangement. Sinn Féin does not want to split the House on the issue.

Mr Attwood: I concur with Sue Ramsey that the issue is not one of division or contention. The House should not, and from our point of view will not, divide as the substance of the motion is not in dispute. However, people with knowledge of the disability sector, genuinely, and in good faith, looked to build on the substance of the motion to say that there should be consultation with disabled young people and their parents, and that services should be commissioned jointly with other relevant Departments. The Government need joined-up thinking and strategies when the disability sector in the North is being considered. Therefore, although the SDLP will not split the House on the matter, I urge all parties to consider that those directions to the Minister would be useful additions to the motion.

I am mindful that the disability community is diverse. There are different views on how to address the needs of children and young people with disabilities, particularly on whether they should be integrated into the workplace or develop opportunities in a separate environment. Each view has value and merit, but I will not start a debate on that. Rather, based on the advice that the SDLP has received, I wish to map out the issues of concern that my party believes exist in the disability sector. I shall address, therefore, the transition from school for young people with disabilities. I will highlight five areas of concern, to which the Minister, in due course, may respond, in writing if necessary.

First, in comparison to non-disabled young people, disabled young people face limited choices when making the transition from school. Based on SDLP Members' experiences in their constituencies, that is self-evident. Therefore, it is necessary to test the accessibility and relevance to young people with disabilities of the opportunities that are available in vocational training, further education and higher education. As has been outlined, the Department has developed some good and sensible initiatives. However, those opportunities must be tested to determine their appropriateness for young people with disabilities.

Secondly, although the transition-planning process is set out in a code of practice, accessible information is needed on that process and on the choices available to young people. The delivery of a transition-planning process remains, in part, inconsistent. Such inconsistency is perpetuated by the lack of monitoring of the process across Northern Ireland. Ambiguity remains on the role of transition officers in the education and library boards. Therefore, the availability of information is critical in allowing disabled young people input into the process and in making them fully aware of the opportunities that are available to them.

Thirdly, the SDLP has been advised that there is no strategic plan on how to fund the specialist transition-support services for young people with disabilities, who require significant preparation and support in moving to adult life. Currently, support services are tied by funding to particular geographic regions or impairment-specific groups. Transition support should be universally available to all young people with disabilities, including those with complex and multiple disabilities.

The fourth area of concern relates to the report of the transitions interdepartmental working group, which was published in 2006. That was a welcome initiative but, in the view of some in the disability sector, it has not resulted in significant progress. They maintain that there appears to be little active cross-departmental collaboration or joint working. It is hoped that the ongoing review of special educational needs and inclusion may provide a vehicle for progress when its proposals are announced in 2008. However, at the moment, responsibility remains with the Department of Education, the Department for Employment and Learning, and the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety. They should review their roles in the transition process to ensure that disabled school leavers receive an effective service.

Finally, the Department for Employment and Learning has an ongoing responsibility to deliver a range of provision, including vocational training and employment programmes that support the economic independence of people with disabilities. The principal programmes, as has been mentioned, are Workable (NI) and Training for Success, which are in the early stages of delivery. Their success in meeting the needs of people with significant disabilities will be tested in the coming year. I suggest to the Minister and to the Committee for Employment and Learning that they monitor the new programmes as they evolve and develop over the next 12 months.

I will try to address other matters, particularly vocational training, during the course of the debate. However, for now, the SDLP will not divide the House on this matter. That would be an inappropriate mechanism to employ on a matter that will attract cross-party support. I suggest that, in the course of the remaining one and a half hours of the debate, each party considers that the motion could be enhanced by offering the Minister some direction on whom to consult, in and outside Government.

In that way, enhanced support for disabled children and young people could be better achieved.

Mr Spratt: I welcome the Minister's commitment on this important issue. I also thank the Chairperson of the Committee for Employment and Learning for proposing the motion. It is the responsibility of Members to ensure that we provide an education, training and employment framework within which everyone can achieve more independence and fulfilment in their lives.

Many disabled people in Northern Ireland believe that they do not have the same opportunities as able-bodied people. The Department for Employment and Learning must make the provision of such opportunities a priority in order to meet the needs of everyone in our society. The Department has set out the criteria that govern special educational provision in the further education sector in the Further Education (Northern Ireland) Order 1997. We are told that further education institutions must have regard to the needs of students with learning disabilities who are over compulsory school age. Furthermore, the Department states that provision for students with learning difficulties is a key element of the Government's drive to increase participation and widen access. On paper, the Department has the right mindset, but it is necessary to call for an immediate review to ensure that there is delivery on those words and that the necessary provision is in place for the community.

If we are to move forward with improved access, it is necessary that those colleges that are examples of best practice be used as models for others in the sector. There must be an increase in the provision of courses, with appropriate and nationally recognised accreditation. There is no doubt that the training is of the highest quality, and the commitment of staff in the further education sector is unquestionable. That is reflected in the general positive participation of students who have disabilities. However, we will push forward with staff training to ensure that there is an even higher standard of delivery in the future.

The provision of places is below the level required, and it is, therefore, important that an immediate review, such as this motion calls for, should be undertaken. The necessity and priority is to increase the employability, confidence and independence of those who have learning difficulties and disabilities. That can only benefit everyone involved.

Members on this side of the House support the motion and amendment No 1, as proposed by Mr McClarty. We look forward to the Minister's undertaking a review and producing an action plan to tackle these problems at the earliest opportunity. I hope that there will be no Division on the amendments. I hope that all Members will unite and send out a message to those folks who are less fortunate than ourselves that we intend to better their position in future Committee deliberations. I know that the Minister will do everything in his power to address the issue, and we look forward to that. I support the motion and amendment No 1.

Mr McCarthy: No one disagrees with the idea that there should be more opportunities for training for disabled children and young people.

This is not only a matter of equality — which is a vital issue — but of economic necessity. Despite the Northern Ireland economy facing a shortage of skilled workers, too many people of working age are either on the unemployment register or are economically inactive. Disability Action Northern Ireland states that there are some 300,000 people with disabilities in Northern Ireland. Many economically inactive people want to work, but they need support to close the skills gap between what they can offer and the needs of business. The challenge in narrowing that gap is magnified for people with disabilities.

12.00 noon

Although I broadly support the motion, I am not sure that I can support all its provisions. For example, there is a risk that a review might last ages, cost millions of pounds and produce more recommendations that may — or may not — be implemented in the long term. For similar reasons, if an action plan is produced, it must be done within a tight timescale and remit. Although a short, focused project that leads to an action plan might have some benefits, this is not an area where there is any great mystery about what needs to be done. Action is needed rather than more glossy documents.

Moreover, this is not an issue that the Minister for Employment and Learning can tackle on his own. The Minister of Education has a key role, because of the importance of schools in providing training opportunities for children with disabilities and other young people. I hope that Sinn Féin is not phrasing the motion in order to provide political cover for one of its Ministers, who must play a vital part in advancing this agenda. The Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment also has a key role to play in ensuring that training links not only with aptitudes and interests of young people but —

Ms S Ramsey: I was going to let the Member's comment about Sinn Féin pass, but the more I thought about it, the more I needed to respond. If the Member reads the motion, he will understand that it is the Minister for Employment and Learning who must take the lead on this issue. There are other Ministers who have responsibility, such as the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety and, as the Member stated, the Minister of Education. However, it is the Minister for Employment and Learning who provides training places for young people with disabilities. The Member must not focus on the Minister of Education.

Mr McCarthy: I thank the Member for bringing that to my attention. She acknowledges that I am saying that more than one Department has a vital interest in advancing the issue. The Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment also has a key role to play in ensuring that training links with the needs of business as well as the aptitudes and interests of young people. It is wrong to raise the hopes of young people with disabilities — or anyone's hopes — by training them for jobs that do not exist. Instead of a lengthy review, there should be a highly focused strategy led by the Minister for Employment and Learning that also involves the relevant Ministers and their Departments.

Although the Alliance Party agrees with the substance of the motion — and I thank my colleagues from Sinn Féin for tabling it — it feels that a different approach is more likely to deliver improvements for children and young people with disabilities. We all want to see improvements. I support the motion and both amendments.

Mr Newton: It is appropriate that the motion is debated. My colleague Jimmy Spratt has indicated how DUP Members will vote — if that becomes necessary. People who suffer from disabilities in Northern Ireland need socially inclusive and sustainable alternatives to traditional, separate day services. Such people should be given full access to a wide range of community-based educational, vocational and social opportunities. That is not to detract from the valuable work that is being done, which I will mention.

Those who suffer from disabilities should not be disenfranchised and segregated. I support initiatives that promote person-centred planning methods; approaches that facilitate access to mainstream further education; and vocational opportunities that provide young people with real qualifications that have equal status to those acquired by their more able-bodied fellow students. It is the responsibility of the Minister for Employment and Learning to smooth progress and facilitate access to increased college-based learning support, and, therefore, the delivery of education and training for disabled children and young people.

I commend two organisations in the Province: the Cedar Foundation, and Ulster Supported Employment Ltd (USEL). The Cedar Foundation is an award-winning organisation that works in partnership with community-based organisations, local institutes of further and higher education, training organisations, a range of statutory and voluntary organisations and, importantly, the private sector, to deliver the community inclusion programme. I urge the Minister to look carefully at the programmes that are in place due to the work of the Cedar Foundation — however limited they might be — and to increase the awareness of the needs of disabled people in the wider community and in further education.

The Committee for Employment and Learning was concerned about training and employment opportunities for disabled young people, and it invited representatives from USEL to give evidence at one of its meetings. I believe that Jimmy Spratt was in the Chair for that meeting, but I might be wrong. USEL has grown from what were originally workshops for the blind, and it has a long tradition in Belfast and throughout the Province. The organisation was invited to provide evidence on the work that it carries out. It has an excellent ethos and can-do attitude, and it provides manufacturing training and development opportunities to those with disabilities. The skills training provided by USEL offers those who gain expertise and knowledge to move outside of that organisation and into full-time private-sector employment. That gives the people dignity and responsibility, and enables them to prove their full worth in a competitive business environment, making them fully independent and appreciated members of society.

USEL is a charity, so although it provides manufacturing training, it is restricted in that it cannot apply for support from Invest Northern Ireland for its manufacturing training and development places, and it is, therefore, restricted in what it can offer. That obstacle was mentioned by USEL representatives in their evidence to the Committee.

The core focus of USEL is to assist its employees, and that is the ethos that Members have talked about. Examples that have been quoted by Members require us to think positively about how to address these issues. There will be different opinions on how that can be done, or how to provide the best service and opportunities, but Members' thinking must always be towards ensuring that the potential of the individual is maximised.

Mr Ross: The motion highlights an important issue: equal opportunities for those who have a disability. It is important to state that improvements have been made and that it is not all bad news, but that does not mean that further improvements are not necessary.

It is important that disabled people have the opportunity to further themselves and achieve greater independence and fulfilment in life. Good education and training opportunities are important for all children and young people, particularly those who are disadvantaged by a disability. A sound educational start provides the best building block in life, and an incomplete or substandard education or training means that young people will have fewer qualifications and fewer job opportunities. Statistics show that disabled people are twice as likely as non-disabled people to have no qualifications, and there are fewer disabled people of working age in employment than able-bodied people.

We must also improve the retention in training of those disabled young people, and overall, there should be better skills training through the various Pathways to Work programmes, for example. Not all courses are available to people with a disability or learning difficulty although, through the learning support funds, students with a learning difficulty can participate in a number of mainstream courses. A sound learning support service should be attached to all those courses for students who require it, and staff need to be given specific training on special-education issues. Many teachers, lecturers and other staff have little or no training in special needs, which makes things difficult for them.

Efforts must be made to root out employment discrimination and reduce disability disadvantage in employment by ensuring that young disabled people are given the same opportunities as their able-bodied counterparts. As my party colleague Robin Newton said, the Committee for Employment and Learning recently had the privilege of meeting with USEL. That company has been around for over 40 years and is the largest employer of disabled people in Northern Ireland. It employs a disabled workforce that earns a proper wage and produces commercially competitive produce. As well as running its own factory, USEL supports more than 1,000 people with disabilities and mental-health conditions in hundreds of mainstream jobs throughout Northern Ireland. It is through that kind of practical support that disabled people can improve their employment prospects and live more fulfilling lives.

The Department's role must be to enable disabled people to get into employment, but more of them need to be in high-profile jobs. It is also important that when disabled people get jobs, they stay in them. Just as teachers and lecturers need more training in special needs, the same applies to employers. A key message from the Committee meeting with USEL was that employers need training and advice on how to deal with disabled employees and the different challenges and situations that may arise.

Today's motion is important because it highlights the issue, and I give my support to the amendment tabled by the Ulster Unionist Party in the hope that the whole House can unite behind it.

Mrs M Bradley: Members will agree that there are concerns for families from the day and hour that their young people are diagnosed with a disability and that frustrations are abundant throughout the education of those children. The decision to fight for the education of a son or daughter in a suitable establishment is not an easy one to take. Nonetheless, there is often a sense of relief for many parents when their children are finally accepted into the system even though, due to underfunding and ever-increasing demand, it is constantly in financial dire straits.

For many years prior to my participation in politics, I worked with young people and adults with learning difficulties and various disabilities. I worked as a carer in a purpose-built hospital, which was one of the first of its kind in the Western Health and Social Services Board area. I witnessed, at first-hand, the desperation and determination of individuals to lead a normal life in a society that was very difficult and not accepting. Help was needed then to promote acceptance; and, unfortunately, in today's financially restrictive health and education services it is even more important to provide a vehicle for the personal development of each disabled person.

At the weekend, I had a phone call from a very proud mother telling me how her daughter had won two gold medals and two bronze medals at the Special Olympics in Shanghai. That parent's pride was palpable, and I have no doubt that that was one of the proudest moments of her life.

Unfortunately, if the general rule of natural law is played out, parents will predecease their children, which is the next worry for a parent after having secured education for the child or young person. The question: "How will they cope after I am gone?" has been asked by many of the parents I have spoken to and worked with over the years.

In order to ease that burden, young people must become as independent as possible, particularly those without siblings — they should be able to cope with day-to-day tasks without the active supervision of a carer.

In today's society, it is even more important that the threefold spectrum of requirements and expectations is acknowledged by all Departments, and each should participate in achieving the aims and objectives of each interested party. So, who are the interested parties?

According to research carried out in my area by one of the north-west's most proficient special-needs establishments, the interested parties are the parents, the service providers and, most importantly, the young people themselves. There can be no more powerful vehicle for achieving fulfilment than that which lies — sometimes dormant until provoked — within all disabled young people.

Those young people have told us, in a paper presented to the Special Olympics international symposium on disability, that they want to be allowed to stand on their own two feet, but they want support to try different things until they get the right job or the home that is best for them. We can see that happening in many of our bigger retail establishments, where it is obvious that there are members of staff with disabilities. However, those disabilities are lost in their sense of achievement and acceptance by their fellow workers as contributing individuals.

Where do we go, and what must be done, to help young special-needs individuals to achieve and exist as independent members of society? They say that they want partnerships between agencies, and that parents should work together to assist them in achieving their goals. They also want the creation of more opportunities to allow them to enter the workforce at an acceptable level, if that is applicable and beneficial for them. There is a need for greater encouragement and funding of transitional projects and an increase in the support networks that already exist.

All Departments should acknowledge that the right to say yes or no is a fundamental right of any individual. The right to control their future and to become a fully participating party in any transitional planning process is a big issue for any young disabled individual. They also need support and assistance, not to be controlled and cared for in departmental terms.

I could list many more requirements that those young people have. However, they cannot get the help that they need without the assistance of their families, teachers, classroom assistants and interdepartmental workers, who strive to provide for them, even when funding is consistently cut and school places limited.

I hope that the motion has prompted a great deal of thought among us all. I hope that, when we leave here, this will not be just another debate, but that we will see some action, and not just promises from the teeth out.

I support the motion and both amendments. I welcome the Minister for Employment and Learning to the Chamber, and I hope that the other Ministers who hold the budgets for our children will be generous in looking after them.

Mr Shannon: I thank the Members who tabled the motion and the amendments. I hope that Members can unite behind the thrust of the proposal. I will be supporting the amendment from the Ulster Unionist Party.

In 2003, DEL (Department for Employment and Learning) produced statistics that showed that over 20% of working-age people in the Province had a disability, whether physical or learning. Ten and a half per cent of the 18 to 30 age group have disabilities, and yet they come nowhere near that number in higher and further education. That is a startling statistic. There are those with moderate learning difficulties who can seek employment and fulfilment in skills that are more practically focused, rather than literary subjects. That is one field that DEL must begin to put time, effort and money into developing.

A major skills pool is lacking, and apprenticeship applications are down, meaning that there are fewer young people to fill that gap than there were a few years ago. The situation is getting worse. A young man in my constituency consistently misbehaved in class and was thrown out of more lessons than he sat through. After much pressure from his parents, it was found that this was happening because the boy had a learning disability. That frustrated the boy, and his frustration was acted out through bad behaviour, resulting in him being placed in many schools — and he was moved from a brave few. His parents pushed and persisted, and their son was taken out of mainstream education and enrolled on a vocational course. He began his training as a joiner, and in his first year he was named joiner of the year in his class. That is a success story, and there are many similar success stories that could be repeated many times if DEL would give young men and women who do not excel with words and numbers the chance to excel with their hands.

Vocational skills are just as important to any nation as learning skills, and the lack of young people applying for those apprenticeships to foster skills is very worrying. After being approached by parents who felt that their children would do better in vocational education than academically, I asked the Minister about the number of apprenticeships in the manufacturing industry available in Northern Ireland for the past three years. The answer may not have been what I was looking for.

Statistics for Ards Borough Council or for the Strangford constituency were not available. However, the answer showed that the number of apprenticeships fell from 1,027 in 2004-05 to 988 in 2006-07. Given the need for skills in the Province and the amazing difference that a successful apprenticeship or a new skill can make to the life of a young person who may have consistently failed in the three Rs, I do not understand why those figures fell.

Recently, I met David Hatton of the Engineering Training Council who told me that, 10 years ago, there were 1,000 applicants a year for apprenticeships. That figure has dropped dramatically to between 250 and 300 a year. I have digressed slightly, but that is a worrying drop in the number of young people applying for apprenticeships, and an aggressive approach must be adopted before a point of no return is reached. I could say much more on the subject of apprenticeships, but I will leave that for another day.

I wish to draw Members' attention to the success that has been achieved in my constituency by those with learning difficulties and disabilities. There are many charity shops in Ards town that not only donate their profits for the help and betterment of others, but play an active role in encouraging people with mental disabilities to take jobs, such as looking after a book section or sweeping the floor. Those jobs may not be big, but they are jobs and, importantly, they give those people a start. Jobs enable those employees to gain confidence around other people. Often, confidence is what they lack. Employment offers those people a chance, and the employer gains a willing helper. DEL should be working to enable more young people to undertake those types of activities — that is its remit, and it is not doing enough to accomplish it.

The Minister and many Members are aware of the example of Daisies Café at Ards Hospital, in which disabled young people have been given the jobs of baking, and serving tea and coffee. That is a café that, regrettably, my waistline knows well. My colleague Iris Robinson takes a special interest and visits that café regularly. Obviously, she does not eat the food that I do.

Mrs I Robinson: It does not show.

Mr Shannon: It just shows on me. That café has had success after success in training young people and enabling them to go on to further jobs.

My colleagues will present statistics that outline how the Department has not been keeping up to date. However, I urge the Department to recognise that current standards are insufficient and to step up its efforts — sort out an apprenticeship scheme, become more involved in organising placement schemes and assist young people with activities to better themselves and the community in which they live. Members have seen the results of such efforts — it can be done, and, therefore, I urge the Department to act now. I support the thrust of the motion and the UUP amendment.

Mr Speaker: Members will be aware that the Business Committee has arranged to meet as soon as the Assembly suspends for lunch. I propose, therefore, by leave of the Assembly, to suspend the sitting until 2.00 pm, and to return to the debate after lunch.

The sitting was suspended at 12.23 pm.

On resuming (Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Dallat] in the Chair) —

2.00 pm

Mrs I Robinson: The subject of the motion overlaps with some of the responsibilities of the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, and that is what I want to highlight. Objective 3 of the report 'Equal Lives: Review of Policy and Services for People with a Learning Disability in Northern Ireland', which is part of the Bamford Review, is:

"To ensure that the move into adulthood for young people with a learning disability supports their access to equal opportunities for continuing education, employment and training and that they and their families receive continuity of support during the transition period."

Sections 5.7 and 5.9 of the report detail the need for better provision in further education and employment for those who have learning disabilities.

My colleague Alderman Jim Shannon has already mentioned a success story in my constituency that is worth highlighting as having a particularly thriving outcome. Daisies Café, which is situated on the Ards Hospital site, provides an alternative form of day care for people with learning disabilities and mental illnesses through training and employment opportunities in a commercial environment.

The staff of Daisies Café take pride in providing its many regular customers with freshly cooked food using only the finest and freshest ingredients. That description may sound like an advertisement, but I hope that Members will bear with me. A different menu, developed to meet the needs and preferences of customers, is available daily. A wide range of food is available to corporate customers for business meetings and events, as well as for meetings of clubs and other organisations. Daisies Café has extended its programme of work to include outside catering for parties and occasions.

Behind the enterprise was a vision of providing alternative day care, training and employment to help those who otherwise may not have had the opportunities to gain the skills, self-belief and confidence that they need to take their place in the community as equals.

In 1999, the statutory and voluntary sectors worked together under a peace-initiative project to identify an alternative to day care in Northern Ireland. The aim was to provide opportunities for day care as well as training and employment in the community for people with a learning disability or mental illness. Social firms already in operation in Europe provided several useful examples. A social firm is an ordinary business that provides goods and services under normal business terms and conditions. The fundamental difference is that a proportion of its trainees require a carefully planned, supportive working environment because of mental ill health or other disabilities.

Extensive research that included visits to Finland, Holland and Germany was undertaken to develop a model that was suitable for Northern Ireland. Discussions were held with service providers, staff and trainees on trading, recruitment, and training as well on as the roles of directors and staff. A proposal was drawn up and shared with the local health and social services trusts as a new concept in day care for adults who require support to access the labour market.

The development of the proposal coincided with a greater public awareness of equality issues and a growing demand for acceptance and social inclusion of people with learning disabilities or mental illnesses. A suitable location was found on the Ards Hospital site, and extensive renovations were carried out to satisfy the rigorous building and environmental health regulations that must be met by all catering facilities.

Action Mental Health and the Ulster Community and Hospitals Trust led the partnership that developed Daisies Café. Other organisations have provided ongoing and critical support to ensure its continuing success. In particular, the Ards and North Down peace partnership boards have enabled Daisies to become a successful social firm that contributes to the local economy and provides day care, training and employment for residents of both boroughs.

Daisies Café has won awards for its service and business achievements, and it was showcased at the Tate Modern in London as part of The National Lottery's tenth birthday celebrations. Over the seven years that Daisies Café has been in existence, the number of permanent staff has risen from two to five and the average number of trainees to 15.

Its success shows what can be achieved when the needs of those with learning disabilities are taken seriously and they are assisted to live fuller lives.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I expect Daisies Café to have an influx of new customers after that, and, indeed, I hope that it does.

The Minister for Employment and Learning (Sir Reg Empey): I thank the Members who have taken the trouble to take part in this debate and to make their points. The tone of the debate has, so far, been very constructive, and as Mrs Robinson mentioned, there are cross-cutting issues. This is not a stand-alone issue for one Department; a number of Departments are involved, and it is important, therefore, that, as far as possible, a joined-up approach is adopted. I wish to set out some points, and then deal with the issues that have been raised by Members.

My Department is committed to the provision of appropriate training and employment opportunities for disabled young people and adults. The aim of the Department for Employment and Learning is to promote learning and skills, to prepare people for work, and to support the economy. Its remit includes the provision of training to prepare young people and adults for employment and to help people, including young disabled people, to overcome barriers to work.

The Department is also responsible for the provision of impartial careers information, advice and guidance for young people and adults, with a particular emphasis on 14- to 19-year-olds and those vulnerable to social exclusion.

The Department makes, through its Disablement Advisory Service (DAS), a substantial list of provisions. It currently funds a range of training and employment provision. Those include the job introduction scheme; New Deal for disabled people; Access to Work — that is, Workable (NI); Ulster Supported Employment Ltd; residential training at Parkanaur College; the condition management programme; and the work preparation programme under Pathways to Work.

The careers service also works with young people in schools. In particular, the career advisers attend transition-plan meetings for year-10 pupils with special educational needs and provide subsequent annual reviews. They work with a range of professionals and contribute to the transition plan by providing impartial information, advice and guidance on the range of educational, training and employment opportunities that are available.

Training for Success, a professional and technical training provision for Northern Ireland, commenced on 3 September 2007. The focus of that new provision is firmly on the individual young person and his or her needs and aspirations. Training will be flexible in duration to meet the needs and abilities of the young people.

The Department is committed to endorsing flexibility in respect of the training time permitted to enable young people with disabilities or additional needs to realise their full potential and to achieve targeted qualifications.

The new provision includes a job-ready strand, which is designed to enable participants to progress to higher-level training, further education or employment, by providing training to address personal and social-development needs, where necessary, including essential skills training. Additional specialist support services are available to any participant with an auditory, visual or other physical disability.

I have decided, because of my commitment to those young people, that a group with expertise in dealing with young people with disabilities and additional support needs will be established. That group will keep the Training for Success provision under review, and highlight any areas to be addressed — I know that a number of Members called for that. I have some other measures to announce during the course of my remarks.

The Department is also committed to improving access to further and higher education by students with learning difficulties and/or disabilities. It provides funding for further education colleges to support the enrolment of students with learning difficulties and/or disabilities on mainstream courses. Funding for such students is incorporated in the further education funding stream mechanism. That ensures that colleges are able to meet the cost of students with disabilities who may require an extra level of support.

As part of the Further Education Means Business review of funding, the Department, following consultation with the further education sector, agreed to ring-fence funds to ensure the sustained provision of education to students with learning disabilities who require a discrete learning environment. The funding of £1.5 million in the current academic year is an increase on the previous year's £1.2 million. That increase is to allow the colleges to address specific issues that were raised during the consultation, such as the need for additional classroom support in discrete classes.

An additional support fund has been increased from £1.1 million to £1.5 million in the current academic year, and that is available to provide further technical and/or human support, such as brailers, specialist software and signers.

Further education colleges collaborate with adult day centres to provide discrete training and development opportunities for young people aged 19 and over who have left special schools and who might benefit from further educational provision. However, further education colleges cannot provide the close supervision, nursing or other personal care that some young people with disabilities require.

In 2005-06, the number of students aged between 19 and 25 with learning difficulties and/or disabilities who were enrolled in further education increased by 751, compared to the 2001-02 academic year. There are now 1,549 such students and, of those, 693 — 45% — are taking discrete courses, and 125 — 8% — are on courses that are delivered in such places as day centres. The remainder are in mainstream further education classes.

The Department, in co-operation with the Association of Northern Ireland Colleges (ANIC), is currently undertaking a review of the nature and extent of special-needs provision throughout the further education network to determine how provision might best be improved in the context of the further education remit. That matter was raised by some Members during the course of the debate. That review, with the co-operation of ANIC, will enable us to continuously assess how things are going, because the cohort with which we are dealing will have different needs as we progress. The same provision will not be required at all stages — those needs will change, depending on the students who are coming forward.

As for higher education, the Department makes funding available for the disabled students' allowance, which is administered by the education and library boards. The disabled student's allowance helps to pay for extra costs that students may incur while studying, as a direct result of their disability, mental-health condition or specific learning difficulty. Those allowances can help with the cost of a non-medical personal helper, items of specialist equipment, travel and other course-related costs.

Through the disabled student's allowance, the Department funds the register of support providers, which is a register of professional and non-professional support workers who are recruited and trained to assist students with disabilities. The register, which is administered by the University of Ulster, is available to all disabled students in the universities, university colleges and further education colleges with higher education provision.

The Department also funds the Let's Work project at Queen's University, Belfast, which is aimed at students and graduates with a disability. A specialist careers adviser offers individual careers guidance and information sessions, supports access to work placements and part-time work, and provides workshops on job skills and options after graduation.

Moreover, the Department pays the universities a widening-access premium for students with disabilities. That is based on the number of full-time undergraduate students in receipt of the disabled students' allowance.

Capital funding must be mentioned. Since April 2000, the Department has allocated over £14.5 million to colleges to improve access for young people with disabilities. In 2006-07, that amounted to £943,000 and, in the current year, £1 million has been set aside with that specific aim. In addition, over the past three years, the Department has made available an extra £12.1 million for further education colleges, and some of that funding is being used to provide additional auxiliary aids and services, as well as extra staff training.

2.15 pm

Special support services are available to young people who have an auditory, visual, or other, disability. Financial support of up to £1,000 is available to suppliers, enabling them to buy specialist support. The Department refunds the cost of taxis to and from a supplier's premises in those situations where it has been decided that public transport is unsuitable for a young person who has a disability or additional needs.

Twelve projects receive a total of £8.9 million of European social fund assistance. That funding will last for two years and will end in March 2008. It was awarded through open competition to projects that have limited funds. Three of those projects — Barnardo's, Disability Action Northern Ireland and Triangle Housing Association Ltd — are aimed specifically at young people who have significant learning disabilities. Assistance to those projects totals £830,000.

I will deal, in no particular order, with specific matters that Members raised. Although he is not in the Chamber, Jim Shannon mentioned apprenticeships. The Department does not limit the number of apprenticeships that are on offer: numbers depend on employers' uptake of training for their own employees. The uptake for Training for Success is about 90% of that for Jobskills at the same time last year. We expect that uptake to pick up in the next three months, and we are initiating additional marketing campaigns to promote professional and tactical training and apprenticeships.

Mr Newton, who, I also regret to say, is not in the Chamber, mentioned Ulster Supported Employment Ltd (USCL) and The Cedar Foundation. I intend to meet representatives of the foundation in the next week or two, and I visited USEL's workshops in Belfast a couple of weeks ago. I was immensely impressed, and even moved, by the work that goes on there. Excellent products were being made. People had worked there for a long time, it was the centre of their lives, and they were doing an excellent job. I do not know whether the Committee has visited USEL's shops yet, but I urge it — and other Committees — to do so. Members would be very impressed were they to see USEL's work in action. Indeed, that organisation has some excellent plans.

Given that USEL is a non-departmental public body, my Department is its core funder. That is the reason that it has no access to Invest NI funding. However, perhaps the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment and I can discuss that.

Several Members referred to the transition into employment from school. The Department had 14 actions on which it was supposed to follow up. I received a report on those on 3 September, and, after reading it, it seemed that two of those actions had not been provided for fully. Action has, therefore, been taken to ensure that we meet all our targets and that we follow up on all the actions on which we are required to move. I am optimistic that within a short time we will be in a position to describe fully how we will implement that report.

When moving his amendment, David McClarty spoke about how we treat people in our society. The relative unanimity of the debate indicates that Members believe that a society is marked out by how it treats those who are less fortunate and those who are disabled. Listening to Mary Bradley's contribution, it is clear that she has had hands-on experience of the matters that are being debated. One could not help but feel the strength of passion in what she was saying.

In moving the motion, the Chairperson of the Committee for Employment and Learning referred to several matters, including European funding and the review of training in the voluntary and further education sectors. That review will take place, and I have authorised it already.

Alex Attwood referred to the appropriateness of some of the provision and to what he regarded as inconsistencies in it. Those comments are of concern to me, because my Department prides itself on ensuring that, no matter where people live in Northern Ireland, they have as much access as possible to services. We could all have been in different places or been born into the world with disabilities, so where one lives should not be a barrier.

As I have said, we are looking at the transport issue. I take on board what the Member says. I shall look at it and decide whether the Department is satisfied that there is consistency. There is certainly supposed to be, because, when we provide funding to colleges and other bodies, we expect that to be the case.

Jimmy Spratt talked about the provision of opportunities being a priority, and that is the rationale behind what we are trying to do.

Mr McCarthy said that a review could take ages and cost millions, but I can assure him that neither will be the case. Reviews are ongoing. There will always be reviews, because, as I have said, the cohort that is coming through at any point in time changes. What we fix today in order to achieve a balance will not necessarily survive a change in the make-up of the cohort that requires help. I will inform the House of the outcome of the reviews, and the Committee for Employment and Learning may wish to include the matter in its work programme in due course.

Robin Newton mentioned access to mainstream further education for disabled children and young people. In so far as we can encourage that, we shall. However, we must take account of the fact that, sadly, some of the folk who are coming forward require such extensive help that qualified medical help must be made available. That is why we take places in Parkanaur College; there are 15 residential places there, which ensures that people have their physical needs properly catered for.

It is not always possible to incorporate disabled students into mainstream further education, but one would wish to do so if it were possible. I think that the word "segregation" was used during the debate, and that is a word that we want to try to avoid. However, there are cases in which specific, qualified people are required to look after those young people.

I shall give Members one final piece of information in which they will be interested. In providing training and employment support, the Department is making every effort to give young people the best chance. I am pleased, therefore, to report that the Department is currently offering extensive support in this area. I dispute the suggestion that there is a "dearth" of provision, because, as far as the Jobskills programme and other initiatives are concerned, there is no limit on the number of places.

However, I agree that it is vital to ensure that provision meets the needs of particular client groups. For that reason, an expert group has been set up to keep the Training for Success initiative under review. Moreover, the Department has already begun work on commissioning a scoping study to ascertain the full extent of the Department's current provision for disabled young people and adults. When that study is completed, any gaps in provision of training and employment opportunities for disabled young people and adults will be identified. Consideration will then be given to how those gaps can be plugged.

I will endeavour to keep the Assembly involved, and I hope that the announcements that I have made about reviewing provision will satisfy Members that my Department is taking the matter seriously.

Mr Attwood: I thank the Members who contributed to the debate. There were 10 contributions, and I cannot do justice to the range and quality of those contributions in five minutes. I particularly welcome the Minister's announcement on three issues: the scoping study; the review involving ANIC; and the expert group that will consider, among other things, how the Training For Success programme is working for those who are the subject of the debate.

I say to the Minister, and this point was touched on by Alastair Ross, that there are a number of requirements needed to ensure that the Training For Success programme for young people with disabilities measures up. Those requirements include the need for in-service training; achievable goals; communication support; extended training time; and the need to ensure that training providers are providing quality of opportunity and access. We trust that the expert group, which will monitor how those issues develop, will consider some of those requirements.

A number of broad themes emerged during the debate. Jimmy Spratt, Robin Newton and Iris Robinson invoked best practice in the further education and commercial sectors; for example, in a place such as Daisies Café. USEL, more than others, certainly to the knowledge of the Committee for Employment and Learning, has achieved a lot in rolling out best practice. The Minister said that he visited USEL last week, and I understand that the Committee also intends to make a visit. USEL's presentation to the Committee, concerning its contribution in rolling out best practice to the further education and broader sector, was compelling and uplifting. I trust that that aspect can be worked on and developed over time.

Mary Bradley and Jim Shannon relied on providing examples of young people with disabilities having excelled and achieved great things. I trust that in one way or another the Assembly, or OFMDFM, will take appropriate steps to acknowledge the achievements of the Special Olympians from across this island, who have been in the press so much over recent days. Those who excel in business, sport or enterprise are role models to whom all of us should aspire.

Kieran McCarthy was right to put down a firm marker as regards a tight timescale, and I note the Minister's reassurance on that issue. As Kieran said, there is no mystery about what needs to be done. I do not know how true that is; nonetheless, tight timescales and firm deadlines are appropriate in order to try to maximise opportunities for people with disabilities.

In opening the debate, David McClarty said that one third of people with a disability are not in work. That is something that should always be to the forefront of Members' minds. That hard cold fact should be the impetus for the Minister, the Assembly and the Committee for Employment and Learning to take forward all the matters that have been discussed today.

There was one discordant note during this debate, when it was stated that the SDLP's amendment was:

"an amendment for an amendment's sake".

For the record, our amendment was informed by people from the disability sector. They certainly were not thinking that the amendment was being tabled simply for the sake of it. However, when judged in comparison with the UUP's amendment, I suggest that our amendment adds to the motion, whereas the UUP's amendment, arguably, takes away from it. That in itself demonstrates the quality of our amendment.

However, as I said earlier, it is not our intention to divide the House on an issue of this nature and given the range and quality of Members' contributions. I look forward to the Minister updating the Committee and the Assembly on a rolling basis regarding the matters that he has announced this morning.

2.30 pm

Mr McCallister: In this debate, we are dealing with a vulnerable group, along with their carers and parents, who deserve our support and regard.

Much has been done by further education colleges and their staff. It is important that we pay tribute to their work.

I reject what Mr Attwood said. The UUP's main focus in tabling the amendment was to broaden the debate and not lay all of this on the Department for Education and Learning. I will go into that later.

As has been mentioned by most of the Members who have spoken, there are many groups and community and voluntary agencies that should be involved in addressing this very important issue. All those involved in working for and caring for these groups deserve our thanks, and we give them credit.

I wish to place on record my thanks to Ms Ramsey, the Chairperson of the Committee for Employment and Learning. This is a vital issue. The Assembly has faced criticism over some of the issues that it has debated in recent weeks. However, one had only to listen to the debate: with a couple of exceptions, there has been unanimity on the way forward. Ms Ramsey spoke about real difficulties, such as limited opportunities, lack of choice, low rates of participation, and lack of co-ordination between Departments and agencies. Disabled people are four times more likely to be unemployed than able-bodied people. Those are all important facts that must be addressed.

Mr McClarty had to attend another meeting and made his apologies to the House. He opened his remarks by saying:

"The true test of the value of a society is how much care it takes of its weakest and most vulnerable members."

He went on to outline some of the work that, thankfully, is being done.

With respect to Mr Attwood, my party feels that its own amendment has struck the right note with the Members present. However, I agree with Mr Attwood that the House should not divide; this issue is far too important to be pushed to a Division. Mr Attwood was concerned about the delivery of training, and rightly so. He went on to mention the role of the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety.

Mr Spratt used some phrases about having to get to a stage of having more fulfilled lives. That is a key point. He also supported the review.

Mr McCarthy said that there are 300,000 people with disabilities, so it is an economic necessity to get this right. They must be supported, and the skills gap must be closed. I agree with him on that. There was a note of discord, however, when Mr McCarthy questioned why the motion and the amendments had been tabled. It was unfortunate and unhelpful that he brought that up. On the whole, his remarks were much more positive.

Both Mr Newton and Mr Ross mentioned USEL and the creation of partnerships involving not just Departments and agencies, but the community, voluntary and private sectors. It is important to create employment in commercially competitive companies.

Mrs Bradley mentioned concerns about personal development. Mrs Robinson referred to the Bamford Review. It is worth reiterating two points about the review.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. The Member must draw his remarks to a close.

Mr McCallister: I want to thank Members for their support of my party's amendment and the proposers of the motion for their acceptance of it.

Mrs McGill: Go raibh míle maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. At the outset, I want to mention that I am closely related to two young people who have physical disabilities — two young people who have achieved and of whom I am proud. I thank Minister Empey for his presence throughout the entire debate. I was heartened by his comments.

There are two amendments to the Sinn Féin motion. I want to turn to the SDLP's amendment. My party colleague, Chairperson of the Committee for Employment and Learning, Sue Ramsey, and I listened to Mr Attwood's remarks during the earlier part of the debate. I reassure him and Mary Bradley that all the points that are included in their amendment will be given due cognisance by the Committee if the Minister agrees to the review. If the Minister brings forward terms of reference, they must be examined by the Committee. In view of the debate and wider participation, which is important at all levels, I do not want Mr Attwood to feel that the points that have been raised in his amendment have been ignored. That would not be the case. Both he and Mary Bradley can be assured of that.

Sinn Féin accepts the UUP amendment. When Mr McClarty moved the amendment, he referred to Pathways to Work and the positive contribution that that programme has made towards getting disabled people back to work, or, perhaps, into work for the first time. Coincidentally, I attended a departmental seminar on Pathways to Work in Omagh yesterday. Officials from the Department for Employment and Learning and, indeed, some of their colleagues from the Department for Social Development were present. I found it extremely valuable. It is clear that a lot of good work is being done. There is no suggestion in the motion or either of the amendments that that is not the case. The Minister referred to that in his remarks.

Mr Newton, Mr Ross and the Minister referred to USEL. I happen to know the chairman of that organisation, with whom I spoke yesterday evening. He made several valuable points, which, interestingly, were raised by my party colleague Sue Ramsey and other Members in the Chamber. He referred to the lack of choice that is available to disabled people. They must have the same options as able-bodied people. I was glad that the Minister said that the review would be ongoing and that it is important that through the Training for Success programme, disabled people have the same opportunities and choices that are afforded to others.

I was interested in Mr McCarthy's comments about the cost of a review.

None of us wants to spend money foolishly. I am completely confident that Minister Empey — with his background — will not be foolish with the funds. If we have this review, the terms of reference will be scrutinised by the Committee for Employment and Learning. I do not expect that any Member would sit there and not challenge the spending of money foolishly by any Department.

Mr Shannon and Mrs Robinson referred to a particular café, and the points that they made about it are valid and valuable. They reminded me of something that the chairman of USEL said to me last night, which was that the social benefits of work are sometimes overlooked. It is extremely important that people with disabilities, and people who do not have the same opportunities as everyone else, engage and interact with others in the workplace. It is a positive act. Yesterday, at the Pathways to Work seminar, that point was made by people from DEL. Therefore, there is a bit of joined-up thinking here. Of course, that is all very welcome.

The Minister has made reference to an ongoing review of ANIC. That is valuable, because ANIC and the further education colleges have a very important role in the matter. I expect that, if that review is ongoing, its results will be put before the Committee for further scrutiny. The Minister also referred to capital funding for the improvement of access to the colleges. That is also important. I know that there have been improvements in all of this in recent times. Again, that is welcome. The fact that there will be an ongoing review, and that everybody will be keeping an eye on it, is very valuable.

In concluding, I want to say that the debate has been very valuable. When I think of two of my relatives, I want to reassure anybody who thinks that some of us do not engage with disability groups that that is not the case. We do engage with them. We have close experience of it. Again, for those who feel that that might be the case, I reassure them that it will not be. Sinn Féin accepts the amendment from the UUP. However, all that has been raised by the SDLP will be taken on board. Go raibh míle maith agat.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Before I put the question on amendment No 1, I advise Members that if amendment No 1 is made, amendment No 2 will fall.

Question, That amendment No 1 be made, put and agreed to.
